Luckily, none of the men have had an interest in me. All of them have been disgusted, but I still feel fearful. What if they take advantage of me as I am? I could crush them instantly under normal circumstances... but bound like this; I couldn't do a thing.

I'm starting to hear voices. People whispering in my ear. They say so many scary things. Twelve jackals ate the hat, but what makes the world spin?

I'm going crazy. I need to get out of here! But I can't. How long has it been? A day? A month? I can't tell anymore.

My body screams in pain again as the fire enters me. I have to fight the pain for a few minutes before it washes away, but the feeling leaves me drenched in sweat. I smell like death. I want to die. I don't want to be here anymore.

Scullis ordered a man to stick another tube into my body, this one just above my heart. 'Lava Blood', she called it. At random times, a machine pumps this awful stuff into my heart, and it spreads all throughout my body in seconds, making me feel like I'm being boiled alive. I swear, too, it feels worse every time than the time before.

I just want to die. How could one woman be so cruel to another? She reminds me of Danis, and how he loved to inflict pain on others. It was all to assert his dominance over his victims. At least, that's what Master told me. Those who attack the weak are afraid to stand up to the strong.

I thought I was strong... but if I'm chained up and unable to escape, and this weak woman can hurt me in ways I never thought possible, then perhaps I'm just as weak as I ever was. Why hasn't master come? Hasn't it been a year? He must have given up on me. Who could blame him, since I couldn't even escape this place on my own? He was right to be ashamed of me.

A sound at the door makes my body flinch involuntarily. Oh no... no no no... it's Scullis. She's come to hurt me again. Is she going to stab me over and over as she did two years ago? She laughed as she talked about my regenerative abilities. The ability for her to hurt me and the wounds to heal up without a mark meant she could hurt me as much as she pleased and I wouldn't die from it.

I raise my head up, and the blinding light from the doorway stuns me again. A long haired woman steps in, and I feel my knees shaking. Who is she? I can barely see her face through the eye-slits in the mask, but she isn't Warden Scullis. Someone worse? Did Scullis tire of torturing me, so she sent in another person?

"You are... Lora?"

The woman's soft voice is filled with fear as she stares at my nude body. I quickly nod my head, not wanting to displease her. I don't want to be hurt anymore.

She doesn't stand there a moment longer. She steps out of the doorway and yells at someone standing just outside. "Warden Scullis! What the hell is the meaning of this? Is this how we treat prisoners in this day and age? This is barbaric!"

Scullis speaks up, but for once, her voice is shaky and uncertain. "S-she is a murderer, Corporal Gutierrez. She killed fifteen guards. This was the only way to control her. She is unthinkably strong, possibly as strong as your Golden Commandos, but without wearing a Hypersuit. What would you have me do?"

The woman, 'Corporal Gutierrez', seethes and shakes her fist at the woman. "I will speak with this prisoner privately! Give me a light source, and shut this door! You will stand outside and wait!"

I can see a little bit of Warden Scullis's face as she nods vigorously. "Y-yes, of course, ma'am. I'll- I'll have a guard fetch a torch at once."

The younger woman twists away from Scullis violently and strides into the cell, eying me up and down. "And what is going on with this mask?! Get it off at once! I can't speak with a prisoner who can't respond!"

Scullis turns and looks into the doorway, glaring daggers at Gutierrez's back, but her voice is smooth like honey. "Of course, but I cannot guarantee your safety, Corporal-"

"Do it!"

Scullis winces and walks away, leaving the Corporal and me alone. She's wearing a uniform similar to the ones I saw all over Master's tower where he worked, but hers is purple and has a whole bunch of metal decorations and stuff everywhere. I get the feeling just from looking at her that she's an important woman. Her beautiful blonde hair reminds me of Master, as do her soft blue eyes. She looks... pleasant.

"Lora... I'm a friend. Have they been hurting you?"

Her voice is soft now, and she looks at me with pity in her eyes, as if she can feel the pain I've been through. I can't control myself, and a moment later tears well up and roll down the mask as I make choked sobs.

"It's okay... it's okay. I'll get you down from there. Listen, you shouldn't be in here. I represent a very powerful man, and he needs your help. If you agree to come with me, I'll take you away from this place, and you won't be hurt again. However, if you shake your head no, I'll have to leave you here. Do you understand?"

Huh? S-she wants me to help her? Of course! Master must have sent her! He's powerful, and she represents him. Master is a busy man, so of course he couldn't have come here. He sent her to get me out.

I nod tearfully at her, and she smiles sweetly back at me. "Oh, good. You understand. Just give me a minute and I'll-"

Scullis appears in the doorway, a key in her hand as well as a rectangular gadget of some sort. "Here's the key to her iron mask, and the unlocker for those chains."

Amy swipes them away forcefully and shoves Scullis outside. "You stand there until I'm finished."

After slamming the massive door shut, the Corporal presses a button on the rectangle metal thing, and a bright light comes out, lighting up the room, then she turns back to me and reaches around to undo my mask. "I forgot to introduce myself. I'm Amy Gutierrez, leader of the Golden Commandos."

As she undoes the helmet and starts to pull the awful thing off, she whispers softly. "Well, former. But Scullis doesn't need to know that, right?"

She tosses the mask to the side and winks at me, but I don't know what she means. Still, I force a smile, if only so she can feel secure. I would do anything for this loving human... the one who saved me.

"Me... Lora..." My voice is hoarse and weak, and my mouth is dry as dirt. I can barely speak at all, but Amy seems surprised.

"Oh! I didn't know you could talk! Everything I've seen about you said you were mute! That will make things much easier."

She undoes the bindings on my legs, then the ones on my wrists, and suddenly the things holding my exhausted body up are gone, leaving me to stumble forward, unable to feel anything at all. She catches me, showing a surprising strength.

"Whoa, easy there, Lora. Just take a minute and let your body stretch naturally."

She glances down at my legs, stained many disgusting colors, and frowns. "Saint Joseph, this is worse than I thought. I can't believe she would... do this to you."

I smile weakly at Amy as I try to pull myself up. "She very bad..."

"Yeah, she is." Amy helps me lean against a wall, then pulls her jacket off. "Here, put this on. I can't parade a naked woman through a prison full of men. It's asking for trouble. Can't do anything about the lower half, unfortunately." The jacket is about my size, just as Amy is the same height as me. If it weren't for my mangled, disgusting red hair, we could be sisters!

My smile widens as a feeling of awe spreads over me. I didn't think people could be this wonderful to each other. She truly is a saint.

After I tear the tubes from my body, Amy knocks on the door, and Scullis pushes it open, forcing her scowl to vanish as she looks at me, and then she replaces it with a false smile, possibly to try not to piss the corporal off.

"Miss Gutierrez, if there is anything I can get for you, just say the word!"

Amy stares at Scullis for a couple of agonizing seconds before smiling cheerfully back. "Actually, there is! I want your pants."

Scullis's smile melts away. "I... I beg your pardon?"

"You're about the same size. You will give Lora your pants."

Scullis stands up straight and crosses her arms. "I have been doing as you say, but I draw the line here. If I were to walk around without pants, order in this prison would-"

"It would be perfectly fine, Scullis. Either you give me your pants, or I report you to the Prison Administration and the Council of Three for human rights violations."

The warden blanches. "Y-you wouldn't."

"Try me."

To my surprise, the Warden backs down meekly. "Yes, ma'am. I understand. S-so sorry to question you."

"That's what I thought."

Still, Scullis glares at me as she gracefully drops her pants and hands them over. "Are you going to make her wear these pants while feces run down her legs?"

"Don't worry, Scullis. You won't be getting them back anyway."

I pull away from Amy's shoulder and find I'm able to stand on my own for once. I pull the pants on, blushing as I look at the stains on my legs. To force a human to fester in their own filth like this is abominable, worse than the demons, if you ask me.

With pants and my jacket on, the three of us women and four guards behind us walk slowly down the hall, and I spot the electrified bars up ahead where my cell used to be. A horrific realization spreads through me. For once, a question appears that is more pressing than my fear of the Warden. "Cellmate... she... where is she?"

Scullis doesn't lose stride as we walk past the empty cell. "Oh, that girl? The other troublemaker? She didn't make it, I'm afraid."

The casual way she says this makes my fear melt away, and a savage anger takes hold instead. Scullis... she allowed that girl to be killed?! This... horrible... awful... vile woman. I can't believe this! Am I supposed to ignore the death of my friend?!

Scullis turns her head back slightly, and I spot a wicked smile on her face, though at this angle Amy can't possibly see it. "Really, I'm so sorry about that girl. But she was a murderer, you know. These things happen in prison."

"What's this about?" Amy looks at me questioningly, but I can barely even think. I've never been so angry in my entire life.

This... this reminds me of when... Master killed...

...Huh? Master killed someone? Someone I loved... who? Who was it? Why am I thinking of this now?

We walk past the gate that leads into the facility and Scullis pauses to let us walk past. "Have a pleasant day, Corporal. I trust this has resolved the matters we spoke about."

Amy glares at the Warden "Yes. I won't report you, don't worry. Enjoy running this facility of barbarism. I pray I never have to enter here again."

"The feeling is mutual."

Amy and I continue walking, and in the distance, I spot a spaceship, small, maybe with room for five people to stay aboard. She sighs loudly. "By the gods, I was lucky. If they had done one simple check, they would have seen I'm no longer the Corporal of the Golden Commandos. This could have turned out very poor-"

I finally stop and fall to the ground, the weakness in my body and the grief from my cellmates death overtaking me. "Gaaaah!"

Amy turns to look at me in alarm. "Lora? What's wrong? Are you alright?" I feel her arm on my back, and her hand is shaking. "I'm sorry they put you through that. It was awful. I fought against just this kind of corruption ever since I first found out, but I can't stop it everywhere."

I shake my head and try futilely to wipe the torrent of tears away. "No! My friend... they kill her! They hurt her bad, then they kill her. Not fair. Them evil. She innocent!"

When I look up into Amy's eyes, she looks away and I can see tears in her eyes as well. "I didn't realize... so that's what Scullis was talking about. The prisoner who died, she was your friend. I'm sorry, truly, I am." She pets my head soothingly and pulls my face to her chest. "Listen, when we get back, we'll go to Heaven, okay? Maybe we can find your friend there. When people die, they are reborn as angels, you see? She must be there."

I nod quickly and feel my tears slow. "Okay. We find her. But... not know her name..."

A feeling of dismay enters my mind. I didn't even know her name. I never asked her what it was, and now I'll never be able to find her again.

"Don't worry! I'll have my powerful friend look up the prisoner manifests! No problem!"

Master... of course! Master can find her, he can find anyone! He sent Amy to find me, so if he can do that, he can find my cellmate too!

Just then, the sound of boots come stomping toward us from behind, I turn around to see a hundred men with rifles aimed at Amy and me.

Scullis steps forward, now wearing pants. "Oh dear, Corporal Gutierrez, it appears you've deceived me. Your rank was stripped and you were kicked out of the military for disobeying orders. Why don't you come along with me and... answer some questions?"

She smiles at me cutely. "Ah, and you and I can get back to business. Doesn't that sound pleasant?"

I feel my body start to shake with paralyzing fear, but a hand touches mine, and Amy leans in to whisper in my ear. "Don't be afraid; I expected this. If you can buy me three minutes, we can get out of here. Can you hold them off while I run for the ship?"

Hold them off? She wants me to do that?

I turn from Amy's sweet face to the face of my tormentor, and my fist clenches together like solid iron.

Hold them off? I won't let a single one leave alive.

My glare hardens on Scullis, most of all. You will die last.

Part 410b: Killing Machine

The feeling of the ship's sonic shower washes over me, and I rub my skin slowly to get the blood off. For over an hour I've pummeled my body with waves of sound to wash the smell of death away, but even after scrubbing my skin raw, I barely feel any cleaner than before.

I finally get tired of trying and switch the shower off, wiping myself down with a towel before stepping into a fresh set of clothes Amy left for me on a ledge nearby. The pristine walls of the bathroom, where the metal has been painted white, blend in with my pale skin. I feel as if I haven't seen natural light in years, but Amy told me I had only been in prison for a few days.

A mirror greets me just before I walk out of the bathroom. The scars all over my face and body are already mending up quickly since my natural regeneration allows me to heal any non-fatal injury.

The people I killed could only wish they were so lucky.

I step out of the bathroom and walk several feet down the cramped hallway until I arrive at the ship's cockpit door. When I press the button to open it, as Amy showed me, she jerks her head up and stiffens as I walk in. A nervous smile spreads across her face as she sets a book down in her lap. "Oh! You're done! I... I hope the shower went... well."

Her nervousness makes me feel weird, so I just quickly sit down in the copilot's chair and stare blankly at the dizzying array of dials and buttons before me. I have no idea how anything on this ship works, and don't think I ever will.

"Yes, thank you for the shower." I mumble under my breath and start picking at the blood on my knuckles. No matter how I scrubbed, I couldn't get it off. Even now, it stubbornly sticks to me, a reminder of the pain I just inflicted on other humans.

Amy's eyes wander to my hands and back up to my face, as she seems unable to look at the blood in the same way I am. "Are you doing okay? You really let loose out there."

A beeping sound emits from the control panel, and she leans forward and taps a button to shut it off, all without taking her eyes off me. She's scared of me now, I can tell. "I'm all right."

It took me a while to figure out who she was. She doesn't appear to recognize me at all, but I knew after spending some time with her... she was the woman in the white armor that Master fought in the Labyrinth. He crushed her, and all of the others under her command, so it's probably not right to think she works for Master.

I was disguised as a demon, and so was Master when he fought her. Even so, after the way I killed those guards on Tarus, I think she would be less frightened of me if I looked like a demon.

"You say you're fine, but I didn't ask you to kill all those people." Amy swallows and looks away for a moment to regain her composure. "You... you tore them to pieces. I've never seen such anger and rage."

"They hurt me, and they killed my friend."

Amy nods. "Yes, they did. It was wrong of them. Even though they outnumbered you a hundred to one, they were still outmatched. I understand why you killed them all." She looks up and stares me in the eyes. "Danis was not a man I admired. He and I both believed in justice, but his ideas of justice were a far cry from mine, and the man whom I represent. Even so, I would never wish death upon him, for I believe my ideals are purer than his. Death belongs only to the demons, who are irrefutably evil."

I scratch at the blood on my fist a little more, but it still won't come off. "What do you think makes someone evil?"

Amy is taken aback by my question. "Oh, well, I suppose that would be... committing heinous acts just for the fun of it? Someone who hurts others for personal gain is also evil."

I nod quickly. "The warden was evil, then."

She cringes slightly and leans back in her chair to look out the viewport, to the stars rushing past us. "You've got me there. I still don't think it's ever okay to kill a fellow human, though." She turns to me and scowls. "By the way, could you please quit picking at your hands? You're going to tear your skin to shreds if you keep it up."

Her abrupt change of topic makes me flinch. "I can't get the blood off. It stays no matter how much I scrub."

There's a long silence as I look away from Amy guiltily, but her next words surprise me. "What blood?"

I turn to look at her, and she stares at me quizzically. I hold my hand up to show her my knuckles. "This blood. It's everywhere. It's hard now, and I can't wash the blood from my hands."

She slowly inhales, and her expression softens. "Lora... there's no blood on your knuckles. Are you seeing things?"

I frown and look again. "I... might be."

She shakes her head and pulls herself to a standing position in the small cabin, ducking down, so she doesn't bump the ceiling. "You need to sleep. Come with me."

* * *

A few hours before.

My body is weakened from being chained up like an animal, but the rage buried in my belly makes the exhaustion fade away. I pull a strength up from inside my body that I didn't know I even possessed, and stand up to face Warden Scullis.

She smiles as her guards aim their weapons at me. "You're going to hold us off, huh? I know you're strong, but a fully outfitted regiment of trained marksmen is a very different situation from catching a few guards unaware. These men and women aren't like the ones you tore apart before. Give up, Lora, and I'll let you live."

My breathing evens out as I stare at her. "You just want chain me up. I... I not let you."

"You won't let me? Did I just hear you correctly?" Scullis slaps her stomach and laughs. "Haha, stupid bitch! You don't have a choice! Take her down!"

The sound of the starship behind me activating its thrusters makes my heart warm. Amy is a good woman, an amazing person. Even if I die here, as long as she escapes, I will be happy.

But I won't die.

Scullis takes a step back, and all of the masked guards fire their weapons in unison. I'll be dead the moment the blasts of energy hit me.

Instead of standing and letting the attacks hit, I dive to the side and roll, using my momentum to jump high up into the air. The sound of guns firing after me and energy shots whizzing past makes my heart pound like drums. I fall and land behind a big rock I spotted before, allowing it to take the attacks for me. Using all my strength, I slam my bare foot into the ground underneath the boulder, then I flip it up into the air before me, and deliver a punch to smash it at the guards.

Horrible screams sound off as the giant rock blows through a dozen of them, killing the bastards instantly.

Remember to sow discord and fear among your enemies during a battle. This will make them panic and lose control.

Master's words come to me, and I dive once again toward the remaining enemies, keeping a crouched profile as I leap, and using my arms and legs to skitter across the ground like one of Demon Emperor Beelzebub's hellhounds. Even I am surprised by how quickly I close the gap, leaving them no time to group back up.

I jerk my hand down and grab a small rock barely visible under the soft green sticks that coat the ground around me. Using all my strength, I hurl it at the closest guard's head. Their skull, though protected by a helmet made of something fairly durable, explodes into a thousand pieces as the stone passes through, as if their head weren't guarded at all.

"She's a demon!"

"Get away!"

Cries of alarm go out as I smash my fist through one man's chest, then use his gun as a blunt weapon to beat two others to death. I don't have my sword and armor, but I might not even need them!

Suddenly a burst of energy smashes into my back, and I scream in pain and fall to the ground. Someone landed a shot on me, and it hurts like sin!

"Quick, shoot her while she's down! Shoot to kill!" Scullis barks an order, but her voice is further away than it was before. She must have pulled back from the fight, like a coward.

Only then do I realize something. Scullis's original orders must have been to take me alive. The fact she wants me dead now must mean that she sees me as a threat. And... that's because I am!

I slam my hands on the ground and force my body to jump into the air several feet, giving me a quick grasp on my surroundings. Dozens of them are still alive! Master told me never to let people surround me, so I quickly clap my hands in midair, using the wind shockwave to knock me away from them.

The spaceship sounds louder in the distance. It must be getting close to the time where Amy can pick me up!

I drop down and smash into one poor unlucky soul, then back-flip around, using her as a human shield to protect from the energy blasts coming my way. Once she's dead, thanks to her friends, I use her as a blunt weapon and beat several people nearby unconscious, then fling their corpses at others to knock them down.

Several blaster shots keep hitting me, but the more injured I get, the stronger I become. The blasts hurt horribly, but I keep getting angrier each time. I just really want to tear these people to pieces! I hate them! I hate all of them!!

Things blur in my mind as one person being ripped apart melts together with the next. I lose count of how many I've killed. It's only once I hear a voice yelling from the skies that I blink my eyes and look around. Only a few of the guards are left, but they've given up entirely, and are now trying to run away.

"Lora! LORA! Stop, you've won! Get aboard and let's go!"

I look up into the sky and spot Amy's ship much bigger than I first pictured it, flying several feet above. I nod slowly and shake off the feeling of coldness that is chilling me to the bone. I have to escape. Of course, I almost forgot.

A horrible electric pain shoots through me from out of nowhere, and I collapse to the ground, unable to move. My eyes scan around me frantically, but it takes a few seconds before I spot Scullis, now wearing a suit of white armor, her helmet opened up so I can see her face. There's a whip in her hand, something I saw the demons use several times, but this one has sparks popping off it as she spins it around.

"I underestimated you! You're a monster, a real demon, Lora! But if you think you're just going to kill the men and women that work for me, and that you'll escape, you're dead wrong! Not on my watch!"

The whip lashes out, and I try to steel myself, but the crippling pain it inflicts is worse than anything I've felt yet. I can't move a muscle!

"I was saving this punishment for later I'll have you know! We were going to have such fun times together, but you had to ruin it! Now I'll put an end to you myself, and make sure your murderous ways end here and now!"

I try to move my arms just so I can crawl away, but the whip strikes again, blasting across my back and inflicting a horrible pain. It's just like what the demons and Danis used to do to me... horrible! It hurts so much!

Before Scullis can strike me again, I suddenly feel the wind shift as Amy's ship pulls back a hundred feet. A massive gun lowers from its underbelly and aims at Scullis. She pivots around and aims her back at the ship just as it fires a barrage of bullets. The bullets reflect off her armor and fly in hundreds of directions, but none of them hurt her in the least.

Amy keeps the gun firing for several seconds, but eventually it stops firing, and Scullis turns around to look at the ship warily. "I'd stay out of this if I were you! You should be flying out of here! Interceptors are on their way!"

While she yells at Amy, I clench my fist and bite my lip. The paralysis is already wearing off, but if she's inside that armor, then I haven't a chance at killing her. It's just too tough. Master warned me about facing people wearing it, since even he could barely hurt them.

Master...

Wait. There is a way!

I spot a small rock nearby and grab it quickly before pulling myself to my feet. My body feels sluggish, but my ability to move has almost entirely returned. Scullis spins back around to look at me but doesn't see the rock in my hand. "Oh, you managed to stand up? You're a sturdy one."

"With sufficient velocity, even a grain of sand can be deadlier than a bomb."

Scullis stares at me, mouth agape. "W-what did you just say?"

"It is just something my Master told me once. Goodbye, Scullis."

Master enhanced my mental speed, my agility, my strength, and even my accuracy. He forced me to train with throwing weapons for days on end, because, as he put it, if you get in close, you will tear someone apart. But if they can keep you at range, you will need a backup plan.

He is truly wise.

I flick the stone with pinpoint accuracy. It smashes into the Warden's temple and blows out a chunk of her brains instantly. She remains standing for a second or two before she falls over, flat on her back.

The Warden is dead.

Amy wastes no time letting me relish the kill. "Come on, Lora! We've got less than a minute before we have company!" Her words echo from somewhere inside the ship, but I can't see her at all. I coil my legs and leap up, landing on the outstretched landing platform as she lifts away from the surface.

I finally found my voice... but at what cost?

* * *

Oh man, this is bad. I can't move a muscle, and I feel like my blood is turning into lead. Ben is already over at the console, slapping away at buttons I can't see. Another minute or less, and he'll activate this helmet on my head... once he does that, I'm going to have my memories erased.

My eyes flick around trying to think of anything that will save me. Hazmat suits are hanging on a wall, over fifty feet away. Those won't do me any good. If I could move my body just slightly, then I could fall out of this chair and ditch the helmet. It might slow him down at least.

Think... think! I need to get out of this, but I can't think of a solution fast enough!

Calm down, Jason. I won't let him turn you into his drone.

Blaarjiim speaks into my mind again, and I twitch in surprise. I whisper so only he can hear me. "Can you help me escape?"

His face appears, and now he looks like his usual self, and not like a black dragon. Listen carefully. My energy is not the same as yours, the demons, the angels, or ordinary humans. I have my own energy type. It is not being nullified right now by the anti-energy in the room. Do you understand?

I blink in surprise. There's a humming sound above me as the machine prepares to mold my memories. "No, I don't. What can we do?"

Blaarjiim babbles rapidly at me. If I merge with your body temporarily, you can kill this human and free yourself. Marie is the one who created anti-energy, and she does not know of my existence.

It clicks in my mind, and I stiffen as I feel my hair standing on end. "Do it!"

Seconds pass. Nothing happens. Blaarjiim's face is a mess of concentration as he puts forth a ton of effort to merge our bodies. For a single second, I feel something tugging at my heart, but it fades away quickly. Blaarjiim stops, and his face is somehow covered in sweat. I... I cannot merge with you. We are not linked at all. We must share a deeper connection to join with each other.

"So what do we do, then-"

I feel a sudden mind-numbing pain as the Memory Molder activates. Instead of sending me into the familiar white room as it did before, this time there's an audible pop to my right side, and smoke shoots out, making me wince.

Ben looks up from the console at me. "What? It didn't work?"

"It didn't work?" I repeat his words, and Blaarjiim nods in my mind.

I sent energy into your mind right as I felt it turn on, but our connection is too weak for me to keep doing that.

"Well, do something else then! I can't move!"

Ben notices me whispering and his eyes immediately narrow. "Who are you talking to?"

"I'm talking to myself." I lie, but it's a poor one. He sees right through it.

"Unlikely! Is there someone else in here?" He quickly walks around the console to look at the opposite side of my chair, but when he doesn't spot anyone sitting there, the frustration rages across his face. "Come on! I know you were talking to someone!"

I ignore him and mumble under my breath. "Any time now..."

Blaarjiim's pitch black eyes suddenly shoot open. I've got it! I will give you a significant portion of my energy all at once. Use your telekinesis to kill this man and flip the kill switch for the anti-energy. It's our best shot!

"Got it!"

Ben is confused now, so he grabs me by the throat and shoves me back against the chair. "Who are you talking to?! Tell me, goddammit!"

As he does, I feel Blaarjiim's insidious energy enter my body. It's faint, but it makes me feel as if I'm swallowing gasoline, or swimming in a tar pit. It's a sickening feeling, foreign, alien, and altogether unsettling.

Ben's fingers crush my windpipe, but I'm not worried. Something about Blaarjiim's energy makes me think everything is going to be alright.

The pouch at my belt pops open, and a second later, several smooth stones fly out at high speeds, blasting through Ben's gut and chest. Immediately his grip falters, he looks down, and his jaw drops. "Y-you..."

I use my telekinesis to hurl him backward, smashing him onto the floor with brute force. "Get off me!"

I can't move my body at all, but using my telekinesis, I toss the helmet away and hover over to the console. I don't know what buttons to press or what settings to change at first, but a few seconds later, the previous Jason's memories appear in my mind. Wordlessly, I move my arm forward and press the command to disable the anti-energy field.

Just in the nick of time, too. Blaarjiim's energy cuts off, and I fall to the ground painfully. It takes a few more seconds before my body regains some feeling and I can stand up, but when I do, I dust myself off and smile at the man on the floor. He's seconds away from dying. "Heh. You were right, Ben, I did have a friend. Too bad though, you will die alone, here and now."

The life fades from his eyes, but as it does, a smile crosses over his lips. His final expression sends a shiver down my spine.

"He just died... what the hell does he think is so funny?"

A few minutes pass and I manage to relax a little bit and gather my wits about me.

" Clone. "

Instantly, a copy of Benjamin appears in front of me. This time, I won't make the same mistakes as I did before. The clone stares ahead blankly, and his soulless gaze creeps me out.

"You have free will. You may do as you please, just as the regular Benjamin would. However, from now on, you will report anything Marie does directly to me."

He blinks his eyes and nods at me. "I can do that."

A thought occurs to me. "Will you answer any question I ask you?"

He nods. "Yes."

"If that's the case, then who are the other Maries? I heard about them when Gyro let something slip that he probably shouldn't have."

"I don't know."

Huh? He's her closest confidante. He has to know. "You're lying."

"I am incapable of telling you any lies. I do not know what other Maries you speak of."

I lick my lips slowly and puzzle away. "Okay, fine. Then what about the other Wordsmiths? Marie mentioned something about me killing a 'fellow Jason'. The way she said it wasn't like she was talking about the one before me, but other Jasons... in general. Are there secret clones of me that she has hidden somewhere?"

"I don't know." Ben's voice sounds bored, as if I'm wasting his time and he has a million other things he'd rather be doing.

"Oh, come on! You know something! Tell me, damn it!"

Blaarjiim speaks up. Jason, your questions are futile. Whatever it is that Marie is hiding from you, she wouldn't even tell her lover. The woman trusts absolutely no-one. More importantly, haven't you forgotten something important?

"Huh? Like what?"

Benjamin Brown didn't die. He's going to be reincarnated as an angel, most likely.

Oh shit. I... didn't realize that. In the heat of the moment, I killed him without thinking. If he contacts Marie, he can warn her about what happened. That is not good, not one bit.

" Locate. "

Nothing happens as my mind wanders the cosmos. Wherever Ben is, I can't find him at all. Though, come to think of it, how did I know to use a word like Locate? I feel as if I've done it before.

"Blaarjiim, I can't find him. What do I do?"

He sighs. You're going to need to go to Heaven and kill him before he can talk to Marie. I'm not intimately familiar with how Heaven works, but I know that when humans are reincarnated, they appear at a station where they are registered, and the details of their deaths are logged down. The queue is somewhat long, so it might take a while before he can contact her.

My lips purse of their own volition as I scan the room around me blankly. "Fine. I guess I have to do that, then. But... why couldn't I locate him? Are people in Heaven immune to wordsmithing?"

I decide to answer the question myself, this time by targeting Zeus. " Locate. "

A moment later, his face appears in my mind, as well as his exact position. Unfortunately, he's too far away for me to teleport to, though that would expose me as a Wordsmith anyway.

This is all such a pain in the ass! Every person I kill has to be killed twice! What a pain in my goddamn ass!

The clone of Ben turns to me. "Are you fine with me leaving, now?"

"Yes. However, you are not to tell Marie of what transpired today. Oh... there is one thing you could tell me before you go. Why can't I locate the other Benjamin with my Wordsmithing?"

He shrugs. "It could be because now that he's an angel, you've never seen him before and thus cannot locate him. However, the more likely answer is that he is using the anti-energy wrist-communicator he and Marie stashed in Heaven. It is a failsafe in case you were to go rogue and kill either of them. By attaching it to themselves, in much the same way as his anti-energy necklace prevented you from killing him with a single word, this communicator will also allow him to hide from you. Oh, and if he's wearing it, he's probably already contacted Marie."

That last bit stuns me, shaking me to my core. "The other Ben has already contacted her?! You mean I'm too late?!"

"Probably." He scratches his chin. "It doesn't matter, anyway. They got what they wanted from you."

Now I'm confused. "What did they want from me? Wasn't their goal to revert my mind into that of the previous Supreme Commander?"

"No. My predecessor's main goal was to download your memories so he could try and locate the cryopod you came from. Additionally, he was hoping to find out the exact manner in which you killed the previous Supreme Commander. Recovery of the body might allow a clone of him to be created. Reconditioning your mind would have just been a bonus."

The clone stop talking, and my blood stops pumping. I feel dead inside. They're going to find out the previous Supreme Commander is still alive, and being held by Yama. While he probably doesn't have a chance at beating me, I can't be overconfident. I nearly had my mind melted down only a few minutes ago... I'm going to run out of luck eventually.

Marie is beyond dangerous. She needs to be stopped, at any cost.

"Can I go now?" The clone stares at me blankly.

"Well, if the other Benjamin is still alive... you don't serve a point anymore."

He bows his head. "Ah. I thought it might come down to this. I guess you're going to kill me, now."

"I'm weighing my options. Can you help me with information I'll need? If yes, I'll let you live, and you will have to help me out as we go along."

"I don't have much of a choice, now, do I?" Ben's clone stomps his foot and groans. "My life is over."

"Your life? I'm the one in for a world of hurt soon. Come on; we need to get out of here and find Marie."

He nods and falls in line beside me as we head for the hover-shaft. "You're not going to kill her, are you?"

"I am. Don't worry, though. I'll make a subservient clone of her, just for you."

"Nice. You're not such a bad guy after all, Jason."

"I try."

Part 411b: Pain

" Locate. " Marie's location doesn't come to me as I had hoped, but that's okay. I assumed it wouldn't.

Ben and I finish riding the hover-shaft out of Marie's red-level facility and step off after a quick surveillance check to make sure nobody was outside. He taps some buttons on the wrist-communicator he pulled from his corpse several minutes ago and then turns to me. "Miss Becker is in your office."

"Oh, you can track her?" I didn't think he could do that, but maybe he's smarter than I expected.

"Sort of. Miss Becker has a secret transponder signal that only she and I can find. It's only to be used in emergencies, but I suspect she doesn't know you cloned me, or that you're using me to get information about her covertly."

His words almost make me feel guilty. Almost. "Well, it's our lucky break, then. If you say she's in my office, then she must be there. You can't lie, after all. Right?"

"Indeed. I'd certainly prefer lying to protect Miss Becker, but it seems I don't have much choice in the matter."

Well, that is definitely honesty from him. The two of us walk for a while until we arrive at the hovershaft leading upstairs, toward my office. Once we get on, I turn to him. "You love Marie, don't you?"

He holds his cool. "I do. I sometimes wonder if she feels the same way toward me. Will she mourn the death of my human body?"

"I don't know Marie well, but something tells me she's not the grieving type. However, she is a tactical thinker." I pause for a moment as a thought occurs to me. "Why would she be in my office? If I can't locate her, she must be surrounded by anti-energy. She wouldn't want me to find her..."

Ben chuckles. "Heh, you were right about not knowing Miss Becker. Maybe she did remember my transponder and anticipated you would ask me where she is. You're probably walking right into a trap."

Blaarjiim pops into my vision. This one is correct. Marie is a cunning woman, and she seeks to entrap you. I would be wary of walking directly into any traps she lays, you're unlikely to escape them in one piece.

A trap, huh? I ponder the thought for only a few seconds. The obvious trap is my office being pumped full of anti-energy. I've been hit by that stuff twice now. The first was in my office at Marie's hand, and the second time was thanks to the man beside me. I can't keep getting falling for the same ruse.

"Blaarjiim, how were you able to make me move when I was immobile earlier?"

I ask the question, then realize that Ben has no idea who Blaarjiim is. He looks at me questioningly, but I don't bother elaborating. He might be loyal to me and have to follow my every order, but I can't trust him. Honestly, killing him might be a better idea in the long run.

My power is immune to Marie's anti-energy. As the creator of it, she does not know of my existence and thus cannot tailor it to neutralize me. However, if she should find out about me and learn how my energy type works, she will be able to weaken me just as she did you.

Hmm. If that's the case... "Ben, explain to me the differences between all the sentient species and how their energy works."

He doesn't even pause to think about it. "Every race has a different energy type. The angels gain strength when humans pray to them, and they have no limit as to how much energy they can hold, but by using magical energy stored inside them, it reduces their lifespan. Demons cannot be prayed to, but increase their limits when they kill other beings, ingesting their souls to make themselves more powerful."

Ben winks at me. "Oh, and if a demon kills you and takes your soul, you will not be reborn as an angel. Just a heads up."

"Good to know."

He continues. "The Volgrim have unknown properties but other than strong psionic abilities, we've seen no evidence of magical energy. They are like humans, in that humans have almost no magic potential at all."

I lean against the side wall of the hovershaft as we continue rocketing upward. "All this talk of magic, it's hard to believe that it really exists. If I didn't have it myself, I'd think everyone was lying."

"Well, you're a special case. You're a 'hero', which is an individual given vast power by the angels. Only one is born every generation, and another cannot gain the powers of a hero until the previous one dies."

A hero? That sounds decidedly nobler than I imagine myself to be. I'm not a hero, just a regular person given super-powers on par with that of a god.

"Great. Thanks for the information." I turn my attention back to Blaarjiim. "Can you boost me again if we get into an anti-energy situation?"

He shakes his head in my mind's eye. No. If I had another few days to recover my energy, then I could. Unlike you, who regains your energy every night while you sleep, I am similar to the demons, in that I recover slowly, over time. I exhausted everything for that burst I gave you, and barely have enough to stay awake even now. I'd rather sleep than stay awake.

He seems whinier than usual. I relent and decide not to press the issue. "Fine, go to sleep then. I have another plan."

Ben pipes up and finally asks the question he's been mulling for several minutes. "Who are you talking to?"

I refuse to tell him. If he becomes compromised, as could happen, knowing about my lone ace in the hole will be awful for me. "Nobody, maybe my other personality. Sometimes he tells me the birds are chirping when they aren't."

"Birds?"

His question makes me frown. "You don't know what a friggin' bird is?"

"Sounds familiar but I don't know for sure."

"Never mind."

* * *

Once the hover-shaft reaches the top, we both step out and quickly make our way down hallways and past rooms, beelining straight for my office. Sometimes a uniformed officer will salute me, but I ignore them. I'm in too much of a rush.

A familiar corridor opens up before me, and I breathe slowly. My office is just around the corner. We walk forward a few feet and I spot my assistant, dozing off at the desk. I want to just ignore her, but as if she has a sixth sense and a knack for detecting me, she jerks her head up and stares at me in confusion. "O-oh! Commander Hiro! I didn't expect you at the office today!" She stands up and bangs her knee on the desk, wincing afterward. "Owie, shoot. Uh, I have these memos you need to sign, they're from General-"

I interrupt her. "Is there anyone in my office?"

Stephanie is confused by my question. "Huh? Not that I know of. Why?"

"Just curious. Were you sleeping at your desk?"

She stiffens. "Well, I mean, it's been a long day, and I had all this paperwork, and I-"

"Of course. I'm going in, now." I have to hold back anger at her incompetence in order to prevent myself from rolling my eyes, but as Ben and I continue walking past, I catch a glimpse of that stupid speechless expression on her face, and in an instant, I decide I've had enough.

"You know what, Stephanie? Go home. You're fired. Pack up your belongings and leave."

Even Ben looks surprised. "You're firing her?"

"Yes. I need people I can trust, individuals who can do their jobs. Clearly, Stephanie doesn't understand the meaning of discipline."

When I turn back to look at her, no tears are visible in her eyes. She looks a little gloomy, but otherwise, she's taking it rather well. "Ah... you don't trust me. I understand. That's how it is. How long have you thought like this?"

This time I really do roll my eyes. "Since I first met you. I don't think you've ever gone a day without screwing things up."

She swallows and reaches down to pick up a bag with her belongings in it. "I understand. I'm sorry I disappointed you, Supreme Commander."

Without another word, she walks past us quickly, keeping her head bowed. Funny, for a moment there, I felt almost like the clumsy girl thing was all an act, a ruse. She suddenly seemed sharper and more confident. Maybe the job was just too much pressure for her. Working for a guy like the previous Jason, a stickler for the rules... it would have been harrowing, to say the least. A moment later the thought passes and I've already moved on.

I turn to my office door, and its AI speaks up. "Hello, Commander Jason Hiro. How are you feeling today?"

"I'm fine, Samuel. Is Marie Becker in my office?"

The AI beeps a negative tone. "No, she is not. I will unlock the doors for you."

Huh? She isn't? Did Ben trick me?

The door opens, and I sigh as I spot her, sitting in my chair. She's leaning back lazily, without a care in the world, and for once she isn't smoking.

"Jason. Ben. Glad you two showed up."

"You were expecting us, then." My question is rhetorical, and she quickly picks up on that.

"Of course. The transponder that you used to track me here also tracked your position."

I shoot a look at Ben, and he shrugs in response. "Hey, I'm not the genius here... she is. She made the system."

"Well, Marie, what do we do now, huh? You invaded my mind, stole my memories, and tried to change me into a different person. You must really have wanted me pissed off."

She slowly leans forward in the chair. "Not so. I never asked Benjamin to do anything like that. In fact, he betrayed my confidence, something he's never done in the millions of years I've known him."

"Hey, I'm standing here too." Ben waves at her. "For your information, I didn't trust Jason one bit. You're too naive, Miss Becker. You don't know people like I do. Isn't that why you brought me on? In the end, he killed me and made a clone of me, so I was right."

Marie's expression goes rigid. "You brought that fate on yourself, Benjamin. You instigated him and failed in the end. You've already received your punishment. I killed your angelic counterpart when I found out about your colossal mistake, and I'd kill you right now if I thought Jason wouldn't mind."

Ben quiets down. "You... killed me? But, we're partners. I thought you... to me--"

She curls her lip in disgust. "I valued you for your loyalty and skills. If you warmed the bed up a few times, that was just a bonus. I don't want to talk with you for even another second, so keep your mouth shut."

Ben follows her orders timidly and bows his head. I feel sadness spilling from his body in waves, since he can't believe she'd kill him so easily.

But for me, it's obvious. Marie and I are similar to one another, in that we view other people as tools. I don't trust her, and she doesn't trust me.

"Marie, let's get back on topic. You've had hours to look at my memories, so I'm giving you one chance to explain yourself. If you're going to know everything about me, I deserve to know everything about you. It's that simple."

She raises her eyebrows. "I don't think so. The secrets that I hold are integral to protecting the universe itself. You can never know them."

"Sure I can. Just tell me about the other Maries."

Her half-smile fades instantly. "Where did you hear about them?"

"The Memory Molder. You had a few memories unlocked."

She relaxes a little. "Ah, so you don't know anything after all. It's impossible for you to have recovered information about my hidden memories. I spent several millennia perfecting the machine before ever allowing Jason 12F to use it."

I take a step toward my desk. "You do have something you're hiding! Tell me! This is the only way to repair our relations!"

She shakes her head. "Not a chance. Jason, some things are bigger than the both of us."

"Well, you're so righteous and full of goodness. Why don't you explain those things to me?"

She looks irritated. "I see it in your eyes. You want to force me to tell you, but you can't manipulate free will. Wordsmithing has at least that one limitation."

"I could kill you and make a clone. The clone would tell me everything."

Ben nods to my side. "Accurate."

Marie ignores him. "You know, Jason, I've done a lot of dirty deeds in my life. When your predecessor and I rose to power, we did everything in our power to take control, but he was never essential to my plans. He was merely a convenience."

"Where are you going with this?"

She purses her lips. "You're a danger to everything. Jason 12F and I spent so much time creating this society, and you threaten to throw everything into chaos. I can't have that."

With a flurry of movement, her finger moves to the side. A tingling fills my body, but otherwise, nothing happens. Marie smiles at me and breathes a sigh of relief. "I had to neutralize you. With you out of the equation, I can--"

Marie pauses to stare at me in shock. "You're not collapsing? I activated the anti-energy... I know I did!"

I nod sagely. "Yes, you did. However, before I came in this room, I expelled all the energy from my body. Anti-energy has no effect on beings without magical powers, like ordinary humans."

I reach behind myself and pull out a blaster pistol, then aim it at her chest. "I'd like to say that this is my win, but we both know that's not really you sitting in that chair."

Ben turns to me in confusion. "What? That's not Miss Becker?"

"No. That's an android, designed to look exactly like her. That's why Samuel said she wasn't inside."

Marie waves her finger at me chidingly. "You were correct, until that last part. I'm not an android, but a hologram. I'm nowhere near you right now."

Oh. Well, at least I was on the right track. I fire a shot of energy at her, and it passes through her chest, blowing the back side of the chair off cleanly. "Clever girl. You were a coward, as I expected. What, afraid this demigod would tear you to pieces?"

"No. I was worried you would clone me and gain access to my memories, as you did to Benjamin. I now know where the other Jason is, as well as your cryopod, and many other details of your life since arriving here. I have a slight edge over you, but it's all for naught, in the end."

There's a long pause as she looks past us to stare at the wall, all while playing with her hair. "I'm going to leave for a while. Don't bother trying to find me... you will fail. I'm going to find some friends who can take restrain your savagery, and when I come back, you won't have a prayer of winning."

"You will try."

She ignores my comeback. "I can only hope that while I am gone, you don't have the time to destroy this society. Perhaps by the time I return, you will have understood my intentions, and we can work together without bloodshed. However, if I return and this human civilization is even marginally worse off than when I left, you will feel my wrath."

"What, you don't have faith in me? I'll tell you what, Marie. Bring whoever you want. While you're gone, I'll improve life for everyone. When you bring back these killers, I'll take all of them down, effortlessly. You do your worst, and I'll do my best."

Marie nods. "So be it." She pivots to face Ben. "I know you don't really have a say in fighting Jason, and you can't help being a traitor anymore, but I still irrationally hate you for turning coat. When I return, you will suffer as well."

Ben curls his lip up in revulsion. "I can't believe I ever liked you."

Marie doesn't reply. A moment later, she taps an unseen button, and her hologram vanishes. The two of us stare at her missing visage and sigh. What happens now?

* * *

Ah, well, at least that unpleasant business is over.

I turn my head to look at the ship display before me. The secret outpost I built just inside Jupiter's rings over thirty million years ago is still undiscovered. The cloaking technology has needed a buff here and there, but otherwise, the station is in excellent condition.

The computer speaks to me. "Marie Becker, I have sent the instructions to your co-engineer, as requested. He was annoyed with the fact you were taking a vacation so suddenly, but I believe he will do an excellent job in your absence."

"Of course. I wouldn't name some idiot as my number two." I groan to myself as the ship's sensors point at something unseen, hidden in the planet's rings. Human eyes and most sensor systems can't detect the station at all, but of course it becomes a lot easier to find if you know what you're looking for.

This station is my only way of sending and receiving visitors from other universes. I did not build it, and I am not allowed to understand how it works. Alpha Marie, the very first of my sisters, was the one to create it. She is older than all of us combined, and is the one who created the communication system we all use. I could only pray I someday understand how it all works, but even if I did, she would wipe my memory. Sources are not allowed to know the minutia of the multiverse.

A few minutes pass, and I dock inside the station, allowing its stealth mode to reactivate once more. All at once, advanced robots step out of the walls to greet me and lead me to the main communications room. Honestly, I've forgotten the layout of the place since it's been so long. Aside from yesterday when I contacted the other Maries to tell them about this new Jason, it must have been a few million years since I last made contact. We aren't best friends or anything like that.

I arrive in the conference room and take a seat at the table. It only takes a minute or so before holograms of a dozen other Maries pop up in the chairs around the table. "Marie 12F, why are you here?"

I can't help but feel slightly nervous. Some of these Maries on the council are older than me and have lived through much more turbulent wars than I could even imagine. After all, I put an end to war itself in my universe.

"You might recall that I contacted you about a new Source Jason? The third one."

The Marie who just spoke blinks heavily. "Yes. What about him?"

"He is taking control of the human empire I established. I require assistance to stop him."

She balks at my request. "You're a Marie! Jasons and Maries cannot logically compete on a brain power level! Just destroy him and be done with it!"

"That's a simple thing to say, but this Jason is different. He's more cunning than I had thought. He didn't kill Jason 12F, as I initially reported, but instead incapacitated him and put him in the care of Yama."

The other Maries sitting at the table, who had been scarcely paying attention, all perk up at the mention of that foul demon. "Yama? You do mean the Shadow, correct? Isn't he the Second Emperor in your stream?"

I can't help but grimace. "Yes. Of course, we all know he's seismically more powerful than the current First Emperor, which is why I hesitate to even attempt a rescue mission of Jason 12F."

The other Maries quickly grow bored again, leaving me to only speak with the first one. "You know our policy. Travelers never interfere with Source universes. That cannot be broken."

"I'm aware. At the least, I'd like if I could have amnesty while I seek out a method to stop this Jason."

"I'd like a lot of things, but I don't break the rules to get what I want." The other Marie rolls her eyes at me. "Oh well, I suppose if you need to hide for a while, we can allow it, but your actions will be very restricted. You are not to inquire about anything in the Primary Stream. It might destroy the multiverse if you did."

"You don't have to tell me twice." I smile politely. "Seriously, though. I need help."

"You're the one who thought a universe without war was possible. If you can manage such a crazy feat for as long as you have, I believe you will trounce this Jason."

Heh, she's not wrong. Creating a stable, peaceful universe was the hardest thing I've ever done. This new Jason will soon find out just how difficult it is to maintain peace without me there.

Part 412b: Maelgamish

I walk up to the door at my suite and pause to reflect on the day so far. Marie is gone for a little while, though to where, I don't know. I have free reign to change things as I wish, and she thinks she's going to bring back an elite squad to take me down unless I prostrate myself and lick her feet. That isn't going to happen.

I've been trying not to make any waves in the previous Jason's life, but that can't happen anymore. His existence was boring as sin. Other than a beautiful wife, he had nothing going for him. He was a pawn in Marie's plans, a puppet she pulled strings to make him dance. That isn't me, though. I'm not a hero for good, but I won't stand to watch a corrupt society that I have the power to fix. He let Marie do whatever she wanted, no matter the human cost. I will make humanity stand up for itself and evolve.

The door opens, and I walk inside, expecting to see Sarah. Instead, I see that same goddamn demon dog, now sitting on the other side of the room, observing my every move. He doesn't howl or growl at me, but his many eyes follow me as if he's waiting for me to slip up. Seriously, how did anyone decide that having a monster like this in the house was a good idea?

"Nice doggy... is Sarah home?" I take a few steps to position myself behind the kitchen counter, and the house's female AI speaks up.

"Sarah Hiro is not at home presently. She is at Marcus Atkins residence until late tomorrow night."

I can't help but scowl. Damn. I wanted to relieve some tension, but now I can't. "Computer, who the fuck is this Marcus Atkins guy?"

The computer beeps soothingly. "President Atkins is the leader of the Alpha-Centauri sector, and one of Sarah Hiro's seven interim sexual partners."

Oh. He sounds important. Why does she have seven other lovers though? Aren't we married? Does marriage count for so little in this society?

Well, the more I think about it, the more it makes sense. Supposing humans lived for millions of years, 'til death do us part' wouldn't make much sense since dying would be so rare. It makes sense she would have many lovers, and I probably do as well.

"Computer, how many interim sexual partners do I have?"

The female voice doesn't even pause to consider it. "None."

WHAT?! This is an outrage! Disgusting! How does the most powerful man in the galaxy, the man standing at the top of the human hierarchy, not have two dozen women by his side at any given time?!

I have to collect myself for a few seconds, carefully keeping an eye on that mutt as he shifts slightly where he sits. Even as I ponder the previous Jason's complete lack of sexual conquests, memories flow into my mind. Long work days, hours spent sitting at conference tables overseeing the smooth running of the human empire, never-ending work that threatens to engulf his very soul. The man simply didn't have the time, since all he ever did was work.

Well, when I think about it in that way, everything clicks into place. Sarah doesn't have a lot to do when I'm not around, so I guess she flits from man to man while her husband burns the midnight oil. Heck, based upon the total lack of angry emotions I didn't feel from the previous Jason's memories when she told me she was heading over to President Atkins' place, it must have been something she did a lot, and he didn't mind.

More things bug me about this relationship, though. Why is she going over to this hot-shot's suite? He sounds important in the political world. It can't just be that she likes him for his personality.

"Computer, what are the names of every one of Sarah's interim lovers? Display their names and faces on the wall viewscreen for me."

The computer blandly does as I ask, and I stare at it, surprised by the results. Five men and... two women? But, curiously, with their biographies plainly visible, the pattern instantly emerges. Every single one of these people is a political leader that runs vast areas of the galaxy. I technically lead all of human-kind, symbolically and politically, but my primary focus is the Sol System, the heart of humanity, the final stronghold in the case of a mass invasion. These other people though, they command regions such as the Lirius system, the Sirius binary star cluster, Procyon, and many others.

Why, though? Sarah is an innocent soul, one who devours food sloppily in a way that would disgust a child. She acts like a child, thinking of herself only with no regard for others. I could see her wanting to have fun and get away from her dull, stiff-necked husband, but other than that there's no reason to target these powerful men and women. Something else is going on, and I'm going to get to the bottom of it.

Suddenly, to my side, the dog stands up, the movement happening so quickly that I jerk back slightly. I'm so tired of looking at this animal. It's hideous, terrifying, and doesn't belong here.

I glance around the room quickly. Timothy isn't here, since I can't sense any other minds on the same floor, nor the one below me.

"Sorry, beast, but I warned you your days were numbered." I take a step towards it, and it growls savagely at me. "I wasn't so much scared of you as what killing you would do to my relationship with Sarah. But now, I won't have to worry. I've thought of a great cover story!"

With a quick yank from my telekinesis, I yank open the door to the balcony, and then hurl the animal back, shoving it over the ledge as it yelps in fright. For a split second, I almost feel regret, but it fades away as quickly as it started.

"Goodbye, mutt." I walk over to the edge and watch its massive body flail as it falls over a mile down, passing the cloud cover to where I can't see it anymore.

I never liked that beast. When Sarah asks, I'll just play innocent, and act as if he fell off the ledge. Maybe someone kidnapped the terrifying four-legged monster. I don't care, but now that he's gone, I can breathe a little easier.

"Ah, it's you. I wondered." A masculine voice speaks up behind me, and I leap in fright and spin to face him. To my surprise, the face is one I've seen before.

"Beelzebub? What are you doing here?!"

The Third Demon Emperor yawns mightily and blinks at me. "Saving one of my precious puppies. Luckily I heard its scream of terror and saved it just in the nick of time." He tilts his hand to the right, and I realize the hellhound is standing beside him. I had been so startled by Beelzy's appearance that I missed it entirely.

"That... that thing is yours?! What is it doing in my house, and why does everyone accept it so easily? It's a monster!"

"Calm down. It's just a hellhound. The only reason it doesn't like you is that it bonded with the former Jason, and not yourself. That was an oversight on my part. As for why everyone accepts it so easily, that is because what you see is not what everyone else sees."

Beelzebub nods at me, as if he explained everything perfectly. I wait for him to elaborate, but he doesn't. "What is it that everyone else sees?"

"An ordinary dog, a Black Labrador to be exact. You have been joined with Blaarjiim and were touched by the spirits of many demons during your stay in Hell. Only you can see through the disguise of this animal."

"Oh. That explains why Sarah seems to think he's a fluffy puppy. I wish I could look at him the way she does, except I can't help but feel like he's going to tear me apart."

Beelzebub nods. "I see your point. In any case, this hound was here in order to monitor the goings-on of the previous Supreme Commander. If you'd like, I can remove her from your residence."

"Her?"

"Yes. She is female." Beelzebub tilts his head slightly to glance at the dog's underside. "I think."

"Well, if I can be on friendly relations with the animal, err, Skippy, then I suppose she could stay-"

Beelzebub interrupts me. "Excuse me, but did you just call her... Skippy?"

"Well, the other Jason named her, so that wasn't my idea."

Beelzebub rolls his eyes. "Her proper name is Maelgamish. Devil's sake, you humans ruin everything you touch."

"You're telling me. Anyway, I'll keep her here, if you prefer. At least now things are clicking into place. You're not spying on me though, are you?"

Beelzebub blinks in surprise. "Quite the contrary. I have heard about today's killing of Benjamin Brown, however. A contact inside of Heaven was quite surprised when he told me the news; then I found out about the splashes you've been making. I trust these will not affect demon-kind?"

The moment of truth. Frankly, I owe the demons little to nothing. I don't like the vile ways they operate, but humans have their own issues. I have to focus on my species first before I even think about what comes next for the demons.

"We will see."

Beelzebub doesn't even bat an eye. "I'd say you are full of surprises, but somehow this is precisely the response I thought you'd give. Be warned that if you fight the demons, you will also have to fight Yama. I have witnessed Yama's power only one time, and that event was all the incentive Marie needed to convince humanity's leaders not to press the demons any further."

I lean against the wall behind me. "Sounds serious, what happened?"

"He killed three billion humans in six hours. The resulting souls that poured into him increased his power even further, and he threatened to tear civilization apart. I'll spare you the details."

Yeah, I wouldn't want to know precisely what happened, no way. Still, Yama sounds like a living doomsday device. I can't underestimate him. Three billion people? That's almost half the population of Earth back when I froze myself.

"Yama sounds mighty, but isn't he just the Second Emperor? What about Bael? Bael is the First Emperor, so isn't he much stronger?"

"I wonder about that sometimes myself." Beelzebub sniffles slightly and pats the black demon dog on the head. "I will leave Maelgamish in your care. I took the time to properly bond her to you, so she will not be hostile anymore."

"That desperate to avoid the question, huh? Well, whatever. By the way, be sure to let Yama know that Marie is aware of the stasis container that holds the previous Jason. I would like to have it in my possession, if possible."

"You think you can protect it more effectively than Yama? Impossible. The instant anyone sets foot in his domain their life is forfeit as he chooses. It will stay with him and will be quite safe."

For some reason, this pisses me off. "That guy is effectively me. This isn't about being safe or not safe; I want control of his body. Tell Yama I'll be there to pick it up soon, and that's the end of it."

Beelzebub's eyes harden. "Stealing from Yama is inadvisable."

"It's not stealing if the thing I'm taking doesn't belong to him."

"The Supreme Commander's body doesn't belong to you either, human." Beelzebub suddenly looks almost as pissed as me. I take a step forward, then pull back.

"Just give Yama the message. We'll settle this when the time comes."

"I hope you won't later regret that decision, Jason. Have a pleasant evening."

Beelzebub vanishes a moment later after making a motion with his hands. His departure is so abrupt that I'm left staring at where he was standing for a second or two until I turn my attention to the hellhound. She stares back at me, her tongue flopping out of her mouth as she pants slowly.

"Oh, don't you even try to look cute, you ugly mutt."

"Awrrr?"

Part 413b: Lineage

The texture of the bland nutrition bar crunches in my mouth tastelessly, like the thousands of others that came before it. I never counted how many I've eaten; they just became a fact of life at some point. By the time I was barely out of diapers, around age thirty or so, I had consumed so many of these bars that I no longer considered them food. The bars are just representative of life in modern society. Empty, lifeless, tasteless, dull.

When the tallies are counted someday, this will just be another one of my morning rituals, one I must perform to get myself ready for each day. Sometimes, once upon a blue moon, when my parents aren't around, and I am spending time with my friends, they will sneak a piece of 'real food' out. A few years ago, my friend Richard and I split an apple in three with Wendy, one of my classmates. The taste was intoxicating. All of us cried for several minutes afterward, because the taste was so heavenly.

I've forced myself to avoid food since then. If I continue eating regular food, it will only make these ritualistic nutrition bars much less appealing, given time. And, as everyone knows, 'real food' is so hard to come by. It's only going to get worse, as humanity continually expands, consumes more power, and spawns more children. More people, less power to go around, less chance of ever getting real food.

A door opens, and I lift my head up from the pad on the table in front of me. My father yawns as he steps out of his room, wearing only a robe. It's the most casual I've seen him dress in years. He's been acting very strange, lately. Well, not that I'm complaining. I feel that he's easier to talk to than normal.

"Oh, Timothy. When did you get here?" He strolls over to the kitchen counter and pours himself a glass of water, then smiles at me. He smiles... I can't remember ever seeing my father smile. It's a scary look, yet also warm and disarming at the same time. I'm conflicted about how to feel towards him.

I decide not to smile and instead nod politely. "I arrived about two hours ago. I was just studying for my bio-weapon and nano-technology exam, and couldn't get any quiet in the dorms. If you'd like, I can leave..."

He raises an eyebrow. "Not a chance, stay in that seat. Have you had breakfast yet-?" He spots the nutrition bar in front of me and scrunches up his face. "Ah, that won't do. You're the son of the Supreme Commander! You must eat healthily. After all, you're better than the other kids out there."

Hah... healthy. Father made me food yesterday... it was so good that it took all of my self-control not to weep tears of joy in front of him. I wanted to refuse, if only because I knew it couldn't last, but now he's talking as if eating the food of eons past is something we can do every day.

"This bar is fine, father. Thank you for the offer, though."

He curls up his lips in disgust. "Bacon. Eggs. Pancakes. Syrup. Waffles." Speaking five singular words, once again a massive amount of food pops into existence before him on the kitchen counter.

Magic.

It shouldn't be possible. Father has never once in all my life demonstrated the capability to do anything involving magic, yet here he is now, using it as naturally as if he'd been a master wizard his whole life. And what powerful magic it is, making something pop into existence from the nether! It defies logic and reason.

The food proceeds to hover in the air and land on the table beside me. He smiles and winks. "Now that's a breakfast. Go on, dig in."

The smell of foods I've never even heard of wafts into my nostrils, and I have to pull back slightly due to its intense aroma. What are these things on the plates before me? Something made of meat? Meat? Isn't that outlawed? Something circular resembling bread, but with holes all over in a criss-cross shape, and a stack of round saucer-like bread... I can't even describe it in words.

"Father, what is this?"

My question gives him pause as he sits down beside me. "It's breakfast. Real breakfast. Haven't you eaten anything like this before?"

My lip starts to tremble, and I turn to look out the window, away from his gaze. "N-no... of course I haven't. F-father, this food is... it... it would cost thousands of energy credits to replicate. Even the wealthiest people couldn't afford to eat like this..."

I flinch as his hand suddenly rests on my shoulder. "Timothy... it's okay." His deep voice is filled with reassurance, and I turn to look back at him in surprise. "Look, I've never really been there for you, right? I've come to see that I haven't valued my family enough. I want to start fixing society. I want to make things better, lead humanity into a better future. A good meal is integral to our lives as humans. Without a tasty treat, life isn't worth living."

I can't speak for several seconds, and finally, I have to reach up to wipe at my eyes. He pulls his hand away, and I hear a hint of something dark in his voice. "Are... are you crying?"

"What? No! Definitely not! There was- this lint got in my eyes! I just-!" I start babbling uncontrollably and start to pull back my chair so that I can get away from him, but he laughs loudly and makes me stop talking.

"Haha, oh jeez! If you're crying because the food is delicious, that's only natural. It is not only acceptable but better for you as a person if you release those emotions sometimes. All I ask is that you wait to cry until after you've eaten the food. It's getting cold."

He nudges the plate of seared meat to me, and I nod dumbly before reaching over to pick up one of the thin, wafer-like sticks. "What is this?"

"Bacon. It's made from a pig. Delicious."

A pig? I've never heard of such a creature. I slowly stick the bacon in my mouth and bite down, and the juicy, salty taste floods my senses instantly. Seconds later I stuff another piece in my mouth, and another, and another... this 'bacon' is so good! I've never tasted anything like it before in my life!

I have to pause to control myself, and when I look at my side, my father smiles again. "Looks like you know the truth, now, kid."

"Thank... you..." I can barely whisper as I stick a chunk of the breaded food in my mouth. Every new taste is a whole new experience, a fantastic blast of feelings I've never felt before in my life.

Minutes pass, and at one point I finish everything off and stare in disappointment at the empty plates. All that's left is some sweet 'syrup' on a plate, and I'm half-tempted to lick the plate clean. I'm not nearly full yet.

"Bacon." Father speaks a single word again, and a small plate-full of the meat appears on the table again. "Go ahead, have some more. It costs us nothing."

I take him on his offer breathlessly, stuffing the delicious pig-meat sticks in my mouth as he nods approvingly. Once I'm finished, I lean back and sigh in relief. This time, I'm full.

Father leans back in his chair and stares out the window to the dozens of megascrapers and stratoscrapers in the distance. Today is a typically beautiful, cheerful day, but the look of the metal world outside always makes me feel a little sad. I can't put the reason why into words, but I feel as if something that makes me human is missing.

"Timothy. Why is there so little food to go around?"

I pause for a moment to consider his question. "Do you not know, father?"

"This is a pop quiz. Snap to it, boy."

I nod quickly, remembering his strong desire for my education. I should have expected something like this. "Marie and yourself, uh, you created the food recycling system to conserve power. Due to the vast amount of land required to grow food for a population ballooning into the tens of billions, Marie decided to eliminate animal products, as they were incredibly wasteful. Later, she began the food recycling program once even pure vegetarian diets weren't enough to keep up with human consumption. Replicators were an early option, but due to the threat of war with the Volgrim, as much power as possible was diverted to the military, so their warships could be built and maintained, along with the warp-gates to other dimensions."

I cringe, thinking I might have missed a few details. My father nods thoughtfully to himself. "Yes, yes. Hmm... what does the military spend their energy credits on, primarily?"

Oh, shoot. I'm not well educated on matters of the military. If I mess up here, he's sure to notice, but I have to try my best. "They mostly spend their credits on maintaining the warp reactors aboard every ship, as well as... trifrancium production? I think so, anyway."

He looks back at me. "You think?" He doesn't let the question hang in the air. "A good enough answer for now. Here is another; suppose that someone wanted to acquire food like what we've eaten here. How could they do so?"

"I'm not certain, father. I assume they would save up their energy credits for a long time. It might take several years, but with patience, they could afford a family meal." I pause and remember my friends, Richard and Wendy. "Well, if they wanted to risk imprisonment, the black markets would also be an option."

"Black markets?" His eyes widen slightly. "Go on. What about them?"

"Well, I barely know anything about them... but I know you can get food and other things. They're illegal, of course."

"Illegal, huh?" He smiles at me approvingly, and I breathe a sigh of relief. I was worried I might accidentally betray my friends. "Well, you should keep yourself safe and stay away from something as dangerous as a black market. I'll have to look into them, though."

Father finishes off his glass of water and stares at his upturned palms thoughtfully. "Yes. There is a lot I need to fix. Everything is wrong, upside down."

Minutes pass, and I hear a scratching at the back door. When I walk over to it, I cringe as that ugly black Labrador wants inside. I never liked it, but it is father's favorite pet, after all. I pull open the door and step back quickly, letting him trot inside. Father looks over at the animal and me.

"Oh, you let Mulgumiss in, huh?"

I tilt my head slightly. "Mulgumiss?"

The dog walks over to my father, and he pats it on the head slowly. "Or was it Mulfergiss? Milgruss? Mishmash?"

"Are you talking about Skippy, father?"

He shakes his head and stands up at the table abruptly. "Oh, don't mind me, just thinking out loud. I'm going to take the dog for a walk today. Have a good time at school."

"Have a good day too." I stop and watch as he walks with the dog outside, both of them disappearing behind the door as it closes.

He acts so oddly, lately.

* * *

The massive demonic animal sits beside me as we ride the hover-shaft down, and now she no longer stares at me suspiciously or acts like she's going to rip my throat out. I think Beelzebub did something to make her calm down and trust me, which is good, as I don't fully trust her yet.

"Hey, dog. What's your name again?"

I look down at her, and she pants as she gazes back at me. No response, of course. Dogs can't talk.

Well, under normal circumstances, they can't. But what if I gave her the ability to do so? "Speak."

She continues panting and staring at me, with that scary face but also an adorable expression. It's a nail-biting contrast.

" Sentience. Intelligence. "

I speak two words, and a moment later she pulls her tongue back in her mouth. "Alright, I'm articulating my thoughts. What do you want to hear me say?"

I take a step back in surprise. I thought she might talk, but I didn't expect the process to be so easy. Her voice is somewhat high pitched, yet also a little growly, since her doggy vocal cords can't form the words perfectly.

"I don't know. I just wanted to find out your name since I forgot it already."

She lifts her paw up and licks it delicately. "How uncivilized. I am a majestic beast, born in the heart of the demonic empire and trained to be the perfect companion, a guard animal capable of tearing even the most fearsome home invader to shreds. My name was given to me personally by the Third Emperor, and I treasure it above all others."

Listening to the dog speak fluently and even in a regal manner is somewhat surreal. The hover-shaft's display tells me that we're only a minute away from arriving at the bottom floor.

"So what's your name?"

She stops licking her paw to stare through the glass floor at the surface of the Earth, far below us. "Grr, I suppose it's Maelgamish. It has been a while since anyone bothered to address me properly, but I believe that is what Emperor Beelzebub called me yesterday."

"You don't even remember?"

She tilts her head up to glare at me with all twelve of her eyes. "Oh, come on. I'm a hellhound. You're supposed to be the smart one here."

"Uh, good point I guess." The hover-shaft slows down as our floor approaches. "Don't speak when others are around. It'll cause both of us a lot of trouble."

"I said you were smart. I didn't say I was a buffoon." All of her eyes roll at the same time, and the door opens. I step off along with her, and a young man and woman wearing cadet uniforms spot Maelgamish and I. "The Supreme Commander, wow! What a beautiful dog!"

Maelgamish doesn't miss a beat. "Thank you." She turns and speaks directly to them, making both of them cock their heads.

I want to kick this mutt. "It's ventriloquism. Haven't you two ever heard of it?"

The girl nods slowly at me, though her expression shows she isn't convinced. "Ah... you're talented in a variety of ways, sir."

I walk quickly past them and grumble quietly to myself. Once we're around a corner and out of earshot, I nudge the mutt with my foot. "The heck was that for?"

"Payback for throwing me out of a window."

"Oh. That's fair."

I don't press the issue, and neither does she. When we pass another group of people, she woofs dumbly at them, and they just smile and wave.

Many minutes pass, and I arrive at the designated meeting place where I told Benjamin to meet me yesterday, a small resting facility where people can eat food and socialize. Naturally, he's already sitting at a table, minutes ahead of time, chewing a nutrition bar without the slightest interest in its taste. His fingers glide across the screen of his holopad, but without looking up, he speaks to me. "You're on time."

"I am." I sit down across from him, and Murglfish sits next to me and looks at the nutrition bar in his hand, all while licking her lips.

It takes him a few seconds, but eventually Ben sets the holopad on the table and yawns. "Alright, you're the boss. What are we doing today?"

"I want to know about the black markets. Can you tell me anything?"

Ben grabs a cup of coffee in front of himself. "Sure. I can tell you plenty. We've been tracking their actions for thousands of years, millions, even. Marie never interfered with the black markets though, since she calculated it would cause us more problems hindering them than letting them do their business."

"So you let people do illegal things with no consequences? That sounds like a recipe for disaster."

Ben shakes his head and sips his coffee. "Not at all. We prosecute anyone caught using the black market, and we shut down smaller, independent actors who try to start up their own markets. However, we don't actively chase down leads about who runs the bigger markets."

"It sounds like you're just letting the rich people get away with grand crimes. Why would you do that?"

Ben runs his fingers through his slicked-back hair. "Marie values competence. The black market goes against the grain of what she stands for, but they help keep humanity pacified. If people aren't uprising to fight back, or they aren't organizing protests and resistance to complain about how boring their lives are, then that's just fine by our standards."

"Some things never change. This black market is corrupt. Why don't we seize the food and supplies they offer and give it back to those who are deserving? Better yet, why don't I just use my wordsmithing to make unlimited food for everyone?"

Ben pulls back from me and laughs, sloshing the coffee around in his cup. "Haha! You're a funny guy, Jason! If you said 'food' over and over every minute of every day, you couldn't possibly maintain the energy to create enough food to feed even one percent of humanity. Reconditioned food is our only option." He polishes off the cup and shakes his head. "Marie has already thought about these matters. The only realistic solution you could do is create more energy-generating devices to power replicators to feed all of humanity. However, if we had access to that kind of energy, it would be smarter to give the energy to the military so we could prepare for a Volgrim incursion."

The Volgrim. Everyone says they're the scariest thing in the universe, aside from humanity itself, but I have no memories from the previous Jason's perspective involving a war where they crushed us.

"You say we need to prepare our military and devote as much energy to them as possible, but why? What threat does the Volgrim pose to a society that has a Wordsmith at its apex, a vast military, and a super genius? Not to mention the angels are our allies, and I'm guessing they would be necessary for a war too."

Ben nods and sets his empty cup down. "Things are never as simple as they seem, Jason. The Volgrim only hold a slight disadvantage against us when it comes to technology, and a larger one when it comes to population numbers and growth, but Marie has sources that tell her the Volgrim are hiding their real potential. They may have one or more super-weapons we know nothing about, since we never enter their territory."

"Yeah, Marie sure has many mysterious sources alright." I stand up from my chair, and Ben does the same. We both start walking out of the dining area and back into the main corridor, heading for an unknown destination. I just feel like walking. "So there's a black market, a silent alien threat, demons we can't kill off for political reasons, corruption, awful food, and plenty of other things I don't even know about yet. Does humanity do anything correctly these days?"

"Life might be boring, but it's also quite safe and relaxed too." My dog speaks up, making Ben take a quick step back. A look of surprise washes over his face.

"Saint Joseph, did that mutt just speak?!"

"I'm not a mutt, I'm a pretty princess." Milkmarsh sticks her tongue out at him cutely. "Have some manners."

Ben turns to me questioningly, and I shake my head. "Demon dog. I made her sentient and gave her the ability to speak. Don't question it, just play along."

"If you insist." He points out of a window towards a nearby stratoscraper. "Let's go to the shipyard. I have something I want to show you."

"I can't wait."

Part 414b: Fifteen

Ben and I arrive on a spaceship he owns, and after twenty minutes, we soon start cruising down to Earth's lower surface. The sun begins to darken as we pass through a thick haze that hovers over the ground.

Ben flicks a dial and the screen changes from a camera-based display to a wire-frame mode outlining buildings and other ships as we fly past them. "The smog down here is awful. I try not to go to the surface unless I absolutely have to."

"That bad, huh?" I slump back in my seat and relax while he expertly pilots us through dense hover-traffic that spans the vertical and horizontal axis as far as my eyes can see. "Sure are a lot of people flying around."

Ben shakes his head. "Maybe one in ten of these ships has a human inside. Most of them are automated. Drones to deliver goods to and from the surface to the stratoscrapers above. Only a quarter of Earth's population lives in the Shit Zone."

"By 'Shit Zone', you mean the smog?"

He pulls a hard left to turn us around a particularly tall skyscraper. "Yeah. It thins out the higher you go, but it's thick enough to make you gag if you go anywhere near the ground. Only the truly desperate live there."

A few seconds pass as I let him concentrate on bobbing and weaving through a particularly bad cluster of traffic. "Why are we going to the surface?"

His brow furrows in thought, and he glances at me for a second before looking back to the screen. "I love Marie, you know. I always stand by her decisions, no matter what. However, even I think Marie has flaws. She doesn't care much, if at all, about the lower-class citizens of the Human Empire. If you're serious about changing things for the better, the best shot you've got is seeing what it's like down here."

I smile smugly at him. "I guess even Marie has her faults, eh? I didn't take you to be the caring type."

"You don't know me very well. As I said before, Marie hired me because I'm a 'people person'. My job is to communicate her will to others who can't understand her genius."

The ship slows, and a docking bay opens up, swinging outward to let us land. "Uh huh. So, what, you want to feed the poor, save the children? Marie wouldn't do it, so now you're going to show me the worst side of society and hope I do?"

Our small ship autopilots its way into the hangar, and Ben sighs and bows his head. "Marie was always going out of her way to keep the other Jason limited. She never did anything that would allow him more freedom than necessary. Since it's clear that you won't be controlled like him, your Wordsmithing could be put to use fixing the elements of society that he couldn't, or wouldn't. It's up to you if you do."

"I'll think about it."

The display switches back to camera mode and a small crew of men and women appear on-screen. "Flight 4815, you are cleared for up to sixteen hours of docking time. Please deposit two hundred energy credits, and you may get on with your business."

Their polite but constrained tone makes me wonder to myself questioningly if they have anything against Ben, or perhaps just visitors from the upper districts in general.

After he follows the prompts on his screen and deposits the credits, he smiles jokingly at me. "It's on me this time, but you'll owe me two hundred credits if we come down here again."

"Sounds fair." We walk to the exit hatch in the back of the ship, squeezing through a narrow passageway in the process, and I ask him questioningly, "Can't I just Wordsmith energy credits?"

He groans. "Cheapskate."

It didn't answer my question, but the answer will have to do.

Molegrass pops out of a small hatchway behind us, grumbling to herself the whole time. "I can't believe you stuffed me in that tiny little box."

"Shut up, dog. Say one word in front of anyone down here, and I'll neuter you myself."

She whimpers and nods in response. Just in time, too, as a group of people walks past us. She'd better not think I'm joking, or this time I'll throw her off a ledge, and I won't mess up.

Ben looks at me for a moment before turning away. "You stick out like a sore thumb. Everyone knows what the Supreme Commander looks like, down in the slums. Even if they don't, you're dressed in high-ranking military garb. You won't find anyone willing to talk to you if you look like that."

"Easily fixed." The three of us walk behind a console out of sight from everyone else. "Disguise. Clothes." My professional suit changes into something much plainer looking, as does Ben's, and I even alter my face to look like my normal self, removing the beard along with it. "How about that?"

He snickers. "You have a real baby face under all that fur. Nobody's gonna recognize you like that."

"Yup, that's me, Baby Face Nelson. Let's hurry up and get this over with."

* * *

Half an hour later, Ben and I walk across a catwalk surrounded by dingy, brown glass. If I squint and look closely, I can see the air outside slowly swirling around us, which reminds me of milk spilled into a vat of black food coloring. Every so often, the three of us pass by poor downtrodden souls. They never look up at me, never beg for money as people would in the world I came from, and simply mosey on about their business.

The smell in the air is thick, almost acrid. It's a smell that causes me to remember gas stations from the past, and it makes me not want to light a match for fear of blowing everything up. The air inside the buildings is clean enough, and the temperature is about perfect, all things considered, but the odor almost gags me. Nobody around us seems to mind; they're probably long since used to it.

"What is that smell? How does all of this smog exist in such an advanced society?"

Ben scratches his throat and frowns. "Well, the facilities that recondition food in masses burn fuel of different sorts. Nowadays everything is powered by fusion, fission, or solar energy, but that wasn't always the case. Most of the smog is leftover from the ancient times, millions of years ago. Marie didn't want to waste energy cleaning up a dead planet, and it was already too late by the time she'd thought of technology that could reverse it."

"The Earth is dead? How so?"

He waves his hand at the world past the glass. "You think animals can live in this? If any mammals or amphibians or anything else is alive aside from bugs, they're horribly mutated creatures, disgusting to look at. Vegetation still exists, but much of it is moss and fungus. Trees have long since choked and died." He sighs and pauses to stare at the brown air swirling around. "Yep... the Earth is toast. Humans killed it."

I stop to take a breath. "I can't believe it. All the animals are dead, all the greenery... Marie just let this happen?"

Ben quickly shakes his head. "Oh no, I didn't explain everything yet. Animals and plants are still alive, on Martian nature preserves, and other planets throughout the galaxy. Rygar, for example, is a world where we migrated 60% of Earth's remaining species around thirty million years ago. Humans aren't allowed to set foot there, aside from the 4,000 scientists who spend their days preserving the lives of those animals." He waves a finger around. "Not only that, but they preserve genetic differences and keep the animals the same over time, allowing new species to form only after applying for permits. It's a whole process, very fascinating. Earth is completely dead though."

"Oh. That's better than I expected." Indeed, I thought all the elephants and polar bears were gone. At least there's some comfort that even if Earth is dead, it lives on, its inhabitants spread all over the galaxy. Humanity is in no danger of an imminent extinction event.

We continue walking, and Muttwiggle nudges my hand with her nose. Nobody is around, so she whispers. "Pardon me, but I'm hungry."

I glance at Ben, and he shrugs. "I'm good. I had coffee."

I ate too before I left. I shoot a glare at the dog. "Well, you'll have to deal with it. Should have eaten before we headed out."

She mumbles something under her breath that sounds vaguely like a curse word, but I ignore it.

Ben nudges me. "We're here. This is the bar where most low-level workers hang out after their shifts are over."

He points at a metal doorway nestled in a wall. The door has indentations shaped like letters pounded into it. Thompson's Bar and Grill.

I look at Ben inquisitively, and he shrugs. "This place is old, really old. It's been around forever. Heck, I even used to eat here, before they stopped serving normal food. Nowadays it's one of the few places in the lower levels where you can get nutrition bars purer than 15% reconditioned quality."

He presses a button, and the door slides up into the ceiling, making a quick gear-grinding noise as it does.

The room inside is dimly lit. Smoke fills the air, and I cough reflexively, but Ben doesn't mind at all. "You'll get used to it."

I hope so. We take a seat at a table and Ben waves at a waitress. Rather than coming over and taking our order, she just nods and walks into the back. A moment later she walks out, holding two nutrition bars wrapped in foil and two ceramic cups full of coffee. After setting them down at our table, she scurries away without a word.

"Polite lady, isn't she?" I pull the coffee toward me and sniff it. It smells like shit. I hate this stuff. The nutrition bar isn't doing me any favors either.

"There isn't much to say. All the nutrition bars here are free, provided by the government. This place is considered a cultural hub, so they give it some exclusive benefits. She isn't paid anything, just does this to pass the time." Ben sips the coffee and smacks his lips. "Man, that's the good stuff."

I don't see what's so good about bitter brown swill, but to each their own. My eyes pass over the crowd to a few guys playing a game I recognize off in the back, away from the other diners. Billiards. A short guy with a scraggly beard and a limp in his step lines up the cue ball and rockets it off the 9-ball, smacking it into a side pocket. The cue ball rolls back to almost the same position from where he started, and he shoots again, sinking the 13-ball after, only for the cue-ball to move right back to where it started.

The other two men shake their heads in defeat as he picks off the balls, one by one. Once he's done, he drops the 8-ball in and smiles as the cue-ball rolls back to where he started. "That's ten points for me. Quite the deficit, wanna double or nothing?"

As he stuffs his hands in his pockets, the other two guys shake their head. "Nah, you win this 'un, Edgar." Both of them press a button on their datapads and walk back to their table and sit down.

Edgar seems satisfied with his winnings, but disappointed the other guys walked away so quickly. A moment later, he spots me looking at him and winks. With a hop in his step, he waltzes over to my table. "Evenin', sirs! How'd you like to play a friendly game of Fifteen?"

Ben grunts and shakes his head. "No thanks, son. We're just having a friendly chat, that's all."

Edgar seems miffed that Ben won't even look at him, but a moment later there's a spark of recognition in his eyes. "Hey, wait a second, you look familiar! Yeah, yeah! I recognize you!" He shakes his finger as he struggles to find the name on the tip of his tongue. "That's right; you're Benjamin Brown! I'd recognize you anywhere!"

Ben shoots a look of annoyance at me. Great, so much for going incognito. His expression betrays his thoughts, though I can also read them thanks to my telepathy.

"Um, yes. Do I know you though?" Ben glances up at the guy and quickly shakes his head. "I remember most faces, but not yours."

"Nah, but that's okay!" Edgar grabs a chair and yanks it out, then plops down at the edge of the table, between Ben and me. With a practiced movement, he reaches down and pets our dog without actually looking at it. "You're a famous guy 'round here! You were just like us, a bottom dweller who busted your ass and made it out of this shithole! And you killed a whole lot of demons while you were at it, too!"

Ben grunts and mutters something under his breath, but I don't quite catch it. He opens his mouth to say something, but suddenly his eyes shift to meet mine, and I can feel a thought pass through his mind. Hey, this guy could be useful.

He smiles suddenly, far more than I expected, and gestures at me. "Ah, I forgot to mention, I'm here with my grand-nephew, Jasper. He was born and raised in the upper levels, so I wanted to show him around the lower levels. He's a bit of a privileged kid, see."

Edgar swivels to me. "Great! Good to meet you, kid! Your grand-uncle's a stand-up guy!" He thrusts a hand forward, and I quickly shake just to get him away from me. Already the stench of alcohol is hissing from the edge of his mouth and making our table stink. He immediately forgets I'm even here and turns back to face Ben. "Aren't you working at the upper levels now for bigshots? I heard you were in private security!"

Ben smiles, but I sense a lot of discomfort from him. "Yes, uh, something like that. You really keep up to date on my status, mister...?"

"Aw, shucks. I got so excited that I forgot to introduce myself! I'm Edgar Boris, gamblin' extraordinaire and flamboyant ladies-man, yessir! Though I make my money now by winnin' honest games of Fifteen these days." The way he enunciates 'honest' makes me suspect he's a little less forthcoming than he pretends to be.

I decide to poke my way into the conversation. "Say, what if we play against you in your favorite game for a friendly bet? I have some questions about life down here in the lower levels, and you look like a pretty smart guy."

Edgar bows his head and blushes. "Aw, shucks. I ain't that smart. But I will whip you good in a game o' Fifteen! Come on, let's do this!" He hops up from the table and quickly walks over to set up the table.

Ben and I stand up to follow, and Ben nods at me. "You've got the same idea I do. He's a talker, might give you useful information."

"That's the idea." We walk over, and Edgar beckons to the balls he's just racked up. "Alright, I'll let you boys decide the order of play."

I speak before Ben can. "My grand-uncle will play first; you go next, then I'll finish."

"Mhm. What are we betting, Mister Boris?" Ben looks suspicious, and Boris makes a big show of hemming and hawing it over. "I dunno, what say maybe, ahhh, hmm... how about fifty energy credits, eh?"

I'm not sure how many credits 50 energy credits are worth, but Ben doesn't look like he'll lose too much sleep. "Yeah, that'll do. We'll just bet from my stash since Jasper doesn't have any credits in his... allowance." He stifles a snicker, and I resist the urge to punch him. He's enjoying treating me like a kid way too much. Though, to be fair, I am only 18, realistically. My time spent in the cryopod did nothing for me, so my mental age is approximately my real age.

Ben lines up a shot and slams the cue-ball into the 1-ball, smashing all the others apart and spreading them over the table. Luckily, the 13-ball goes in.

"That's a point for the both of you." Edgar looks perfectly happy that we've gained a point. He acts as if he has this game in the bag. We'll see about that.

Ben aims and manages just barely to knock the 6-ball into the far corner pocket. "I played quite a bit of Fifteen when I was younger." For a moment, I spot a look of smugness on his face, but he brushes it away. After lining up another shot, he fires it off and smacks the 1-ball, but it glances off the side hole and rolls away, the cue-ball sinking instead.

"You did, huh? Well, I'm glad you're takin' it easy on me. Two against one just ain't fair for a poor cripple like me." He slaps his ball on the table, lines up a shot, and misses catastrophically, then pretends to play it off. "Man, I must be tired from all those games I played earlier."

I nod at him and line up my shot. "So, Edgar, what are you planning to do with the credits you earn?" I sink the 2-ball in effortlessly, but miss my next shot, and it's back to Ben.

Edgar shrugs. "Well, I gotta get my leg fixed first. It's in real bad shape. Medical care is decent down here, but the premium stuff is for middle-level workers and up, so I'll probably have Four-Finger Freddy do somethin' for me. I've been earning favors from him for a while now."

Ben whistles aimlessly and fires his ball, hitting his target but missing the shot. It's three to zero, in our favor.

"Who's Four Fingered Freddy?" I ask the question casually as Edgar steps up to the table and lines up his shot. He sinks it casually and scrunches up his face when he looks at me.

"You ain't heard of him? Shit, he runs the market this side of the city. Nice guy, but real stern. You don't disrespect him, or you get a visit from his friends." Edgar leans back and pops another shot off, dropping another ball in. Score 3-2, our favor still.

"The market? You mean the black market?" I ask the question innocently, but I can feel a few people turning to listen to our conversation.

"Yeah, sure." Edgar suddenly looks annoyed as people glance over at him. "You can call it that, if you want. Ain't really accurate though. Everything they've got, they earn it legit. They offer medical services for people like me. They're heroes down here; I'll have you know."

Ben coughs as Edgar sinks yet another shot. Score 3-3, tied. "We understand. We're not prying or anything, just curious. It's been a long time since I lived down here."

"Yeah... a long time." The man hobbling around the table echoes Ben's words hollowly. Even though he suddenly seems more distant than before, he lands another shot without trouble.

Score 4-3, his favor. "You know, sometimes I wonder if it's even worth the trouble."

"What do you mean?" I've scarcely asked the question, and he slams another shot in, using a bit more power than the previous one. Score, 5-3, his favor.

"Oh, you know. The rat-race. I wasn't always poor. Had an adequate job in the middle sector for a while, but it felt like they had me pushin' buttons all day rather'n doin' anything useful." He takes aim and smashes the cue-ball again, but this time it glances off his intended target and rolls to the side, so he hands the stick to me. "Ended up losin' my position when I hit on a coworker. He didn't like me much, I reckon, so I had to sit down with upper management, and they fired me. Two hundred thousand years down the tube."

I sink a shot in, then miss the next one, bringing our score to 5-4, his favor. "Sounds rough. What's the alternate, then, if not working your way back up the ladder."

He snuffles and waits for Ben to take a shot next. "Oh, I just hate the smell down here, but I have lots of friends now, and more fun than I ever used to up top. I've been thinkin', ya know... what if I killed myself?"

He says it so casually, but Ben doesn't even flinch. I nod slowly. "Uh... you want to kill yourself? Seems a little extreme."

"Oh, sure. I get to be an angel, live somewhere clean. Of course, there are all the problems that come with that."

"Like what?"

Ben smacks two balls in with a single shot, then misses the next. 6-5, our favor.

"Well, you know how it is. Once you're an angel, you can't ever leave Heaven, 'cept if you get a permit or pay their ridiculous fee, which nobody can afford. Only people who die as high-level citizens ever get to come back, that's the way it is. Still, I'd maybe get to see my ex-wives again. If any of the gang dies after me, we can all hang out together. I'm just... torn."

He takes the stick and instantly lands one shot, then pivots around and knocks two more balls in at the same time. Score, 8-6, his favor. The last ball standing is the 8-ball, which he sinks without hesitation.

Ben chimes in with his thoughts. "If you're unsure of what to do, why not keep working your way up the ladder again, so when you get to mid-level, you can earn the energy credits to go visit your friends and wives who have passed? It'll take a long time, but you've got forever. It's not like you're going to die of old age."

Edgar chuckles. "Now that's a fine idea. You're a smart guy, Benjamin. No wonder you ended up at the top. Lot smarter'n me."

Ben shakes his head and looks at me, though his eyes seem to look past me, at the wall behind. "I'm not that smart... just a lucky guy in the right place at the right time."

Edgar nudges Ben in the arm with his fist. "I hear ya. You gents wanna have another go?"

"No, but that was fun. I know when my ass is chapped." Ben snickers and brings up his datapad, sending the energy credits over to Edgar. "Good talk though, you were a real help."

"Thank ya kindly for the credits, good sir. I'll be seeing you two around...?" Edgar trails his sentence off, but Ben shakes his head.

"No, I've got a lot of work to attend to." He nudges Edgar. "You know how it is, button pushing, busywork. I'm a little jealous of you."

"Pff, jealous of me. Funny guy." Edgar waves at us as we turn and walk away. I beckon to Moldrush, and she stands up and follows after us.

As we step outside, the door closes behind us, and I pause for a moment. "That Edgar guy has lived a rough life."

"Mhm." Ben shrugs. "Nobody's life is easy."

"Yeah, but, he's lost a lot of people, yet he's still trying to be optimistic."

Ben continues nodding. "Some people are just that way."

We start to walk again, but I pause and speak a single word to the air. " Pill. "

A small orange pill with liquid inside appears in front of me and lands in my hand. "One sec, Ben."

I turn back and walk inside, then find Edgar, now sitting at a table and staring off into space. When I tap his shoulder, he turns back to look at me and is a little surprised. "Oh, you're back! What's up? Want another whooping?"

I smile and shake my head. "No, not really. Here." I hold my hand in the air and drop the pill on the table in front of him.

He glances at it suspiciously. "What's this? Cyanide?"

"No. You're a good guy, Edgar. Take this pill, and I bet that foot will feel a lot better tonight."

He turns to look at me in surprise, but I'm already halfway out the door. Ben stares at me with a look of amusement. "What was that about?"

"Nothing in particular. Let's find that Four Fingered Freddy guy. He sounds like an interesting character."

Part 415b: Purity, Falsehoods

"King Zeus has returned!" I look up from a weekly report and listen as a palace guard yells out. All around me, other angels jump to their feet and bow at the waist, while I take a few seconds to stand up from my chair and bend only slightly. Zeus marches through the doorway, his kingly demeanor making all pause their breathing for a moment or two.

"Ah, Gabriel, there you are." Zeus walks over to me, so I stand back up to my full height of a few feet taller than him. "I've just returned from the Human Realm."

"You were gone a long time, my lord. Three days, by my count. How did your trip end?"

The other angels in the large room silently return to what they were doing. Here in the palace, only pure-bloods are allowed to enter, and while most of their duties are ordinarily ceremonial, those in the Holy Chamber are tasked with the job of maintaining order among ten trillion pseudo-angels and a hundred thousand pure-bloods. Merely counting their numbers for the twice-per-century census is a daunting enough task.

Zeus walks past me, and I follow behind him, the two of us entering the King's Hall, a room with a most splendid golden throne, gifted to our kind tens of millions of years ago by the leader of humanity, Jason Hiro, during his rise to power. Two massive golden wings spread out from the back of it, while the seat and backrest are covered with a dark maroon-colored padding, which Zeus has assured me is luxuriantly comfortable.

The king takes his seat and glances around at the currently empty Benches of Judgment, where ruling pure-bloods would be called to sit if an angel should need to be punished for crimes against his or her species. Luckily, those benches have not been used for eons, but still, they are faithfully dusted and cleaned every day by the lower-class pure-bloods.

"My trip went well, as always. Uneventful, even. I tried to inquire with the Supreme Commander about my proposal, but he was rather distracted. Well, now that I think about it, there was a rather grisly murder at the end of the meeting."

Zeus waves his hand flippantly. I wait for him to explain, but he doesn't continue. "A murder, my king?"

I lean back against a pillar to one side of the throne and Zeus sighs. "Ah, yes, you know how humans are. They haven't had a taste of murdering demons for a long time, and they've grown accustomed to peace, so naturally, they will quarrel with one another. It appears that one of the high-ranking humans on the council, Danis Thornum, a person I've only heard of in passing, was violently killed by a single decisive strike as he exited the War Council."

A feeling of alarm washes over me, and I pull slightly away from the pillar to advance a step towards Zeus. "A political assassination? You were in danger! How could the humans allow something like this to happen?! Where was the security? The respect for your life?!"

Zeus raises his hand. "Calm thyself. I am the King of Gods. It would require an organized human army to take me down, even when I am alone, especially given the energy treaty the humans signed. If they wished to kill me, they would be better served to cut off their prayers for a thousand years before launching said assault."

My aura changes and I soothe my ruffled feathers. "Apologies, my liege. I meant no disrespect to your awesome power. Speaking of that power...?"

Zeus sighs. "As I said, Jason Hiro would scarcely even look at me. If we could just get him to increase the human breeding speed by even a single percent, it would help speed the process considerably."

"Mmm. Still, a single pure-blood every thousand years is exemplary, Lord Zeus. I am impressed you figured out how to create more of my kind in the first place. You are a visionary among our people."

Zeus stands up from his chair and paces over to the gated window to stare out at the Towers of Heaven, human-built constructions that allow tens of trillions of half-breeds to live in relative peace, away from the ruling areas where we pure-bloods live. These buildings resemble the stratoscrapers that humans construct on their worlds, but with added flair to make them more palatable to gaze upon. The Towers of Heaven have softer, rounded edges, and offer many spaces for angels to fly at and land inside, since we do not need hovering vehicles as humans do.

"A visionary, perhaps. The angels have made many sacrifices and have had to lower the barriers for entry repeatedly to convince humanity of our goodwill, but the results are worth it. I remember a time when Angels were on the verge of extinction, back when our numbers were half as many as they are now. Can you believe how far we've come?"

I nod silently and walk over to stand beside him. On the palace steps outside, several angels are lounging and chatting amongst themselves, having fun. "We cannot be complacent, though, my king. Have you considered the Volgrim representative's request?"

Zeus chuckles. "I wouldn't trust a human as far as I could throw him, though admittedly I could hurl him quite a distance if I so desired. Even then, having to live off the energy of a deceitful species we know is still a better choice than living off one we do not. I will continue to refuse the Executor's offer unless our relations with the humans worsen substantially."

Zeus pauses to look at me meaningfully, his aged eyes hiding a great deal of wisdom. "The Volgrim's numbers are paltry compared to that of humanity. The only way we could survive is if we purged the false ones from our ranks, and you know what Uzziel would say."

"What would Uzziel say?" A voice speaks up from behind us, and we both turn to locate its speaker. An old angel hobbles along, leaning on his cane, with a great bushy beard nearly touching the floor due to his slouched posture.

"Archangel Raphael, I'm happy to see you again! We haven't spoken in a few weeks, have we?" Zeus spins around to examine the ancient one, and Raphael coughs into his hand. "We were just discussing some conflict that erupted among the humans. There was some form of political assassination directed at one of their kind while I was visiting during official business."

Raphael nods and clutches his chest, then wheezes slightly as he pulls back to sit down on one of the Benches of Judgment. "That is troubling news, King Zeus. I-" He coughs again and continues talking. "...I was wondering what they might be up to since they have been holding war council meetings more often."

I interrupt Zeus before he can speak. "Are you still plagued by that cough, Raphael? You sound raspier than you were in the past."

Zeus nods. "Angels don't get sick, Raphael. Certainly not archangels. I've been asking around, but I can't find the source of what ails you. Feel free to solicit our aid if you need any assistance."

Raphael wheezes and smiles painfully. "Ahh, it's nothing, youngsters. I'm certain it's just old age, nothing to be concerned about."

"Hmm, but angels don't age in the way humans do. I find that hard to-" Zeus starts to say something else, but Raphael cuts him off.

"Cheh... I'm not dying, Lord Zeus, so have no concerns about my well-being. This too shall pass."

I share a glance with my king, but we both shrug. This ancient angel has his pride, so it's better to just investigate in secret. I turn back to Raphael. "As you wish."

Zeus swallows heavily. "On to more pleasant topics. In five more years, I will have amassed the energy required to create a new pure-blood. The last thousand years have been relatively peaceful, but I sense humanity is getting restless."

"Is this why you wish to increase humanity's energy output?" I ask the question and glance over at Raphael, who nods along silently.

Zeus clears his throat. "If I can make humanity increase their thought-energy output, I might be able to shave decades off the pure-blood creation time. Above all other things, though, we mustn't let humans know what we are using the energy for. They have no grasp of the scale of our energy needs, so as long as we can maintain that illusion of a desperate energy need just to stay alive, they will not take us seriously."

Raphael shakes his head. "I had not thought my kind would ever resort to lies and trickery, but in truth, humanity's ability to eradicate us makes any military force we might exert rather meaningless." The old one raises a bushy eyebrow. "Though, this must be why you were speaking about a purge, hmm?"

Zeus and I both shift uncomfortably. I decide to answer Raphael's question. "Brother, you must understand... the fringe elements of human society have realized that a relatively cushy life awaits them in Heaven. I have seen a 5% increase just in the last decade of people killing themselves to ascend to Heaven. These low-level degenerates threaten Zeus's ability to create more pure-bloods. Every half-breed we're forced to admit is just a drain on-"

Raphael raises his face and glares up at me, an expression he rarely makes. "A drain, yes, but have you thought nothing of what is going on in the human's soc-" He pauses to hack into his hand before continuing again. "-the human's society? Because we make ever increasing demands for their birth rates, they are unable to keep up their food production and energy production. They are at a standstill with the Volgrim negotiations. They have been very generous with births up to this point, so why not simply have patience? We have all the time in the world to wait, and eventually, our kind will flourish once again."

Zeus licks his lips and turns his head back slightly to look out the window, even as he crosses his arms. "I respectfully disagree, Archangel Raphael. Your wisdom and ability to separate bias from both sides is always appreciated, but I do wish you would care more for your own species' survival. The lower elements of the pseudo-angel society contribute nothing, and merely consume our energy. They are an anchor we have willingly tied to our legs."

Raphael grimaces and stands up to walk away. "If the humans fall, we fall as well. Putting your trust in the Volgrim, while purging all the undesirables from our society... that is a recipe for disaster. What reason would the Volgrim have to trust us if we killed our previous hosts?"

Neither Zeus nor I respond, and merely watch as the old one shuffles out of sight, closing the great doors behind him.

The King of Gods turns to me and smiles half-heartedly. "He's not wrong. However, the Volgrim have a rigidly structured society. They understand law and order. They would be a sufficient backup if the worst were to happen."

"Perhaps." I look past Zeus, out the window, to the pure-bloods and half-breeds flying around between buildings in the distance. "I just like the way things are now. I wish they wouldn't change. Peace, prosperity, no threat of a demon invasion, and no humans visibly ready to turn on us... this is what I have always wanted."

Zeus's smile solidifies, and he squeezes my shoulder. "Aye. Just remember; during the worst of times, stick to kin. You can always trust your own people."

"I can't disagree with that."

* * *

Ben and I stomp down the streets, having left the dog in the ship to eat at Ben's request. The sensation of hard pavement, something that would ordinarily make me feel closer to the world and time I came from, is slightly off. This pavement has a smoother feel to it, something Ben comments on when he spots me staring down at it.

"This texture you're feeling is E.A.T.S., which stands for 'Ecologically Activated Terrain System'. It's a surface that covers the ground of all areas outside of buildings at Earth's surface area. Nanobots build and maintain it regularly, preventing it from cracking or breaking as time goes on. A novel invention, though very few people step outside the glass-zones."

I glance above us. We're on the ground level, now, but humanity has created safe passages from building to building at the ground level, where we can walk through glass tunnels to get from one place to the next.

I bend over to rap my knuckles on it, but Ben grabs my arm. "I'd advise against doing that. E.A.T.S. devours biological contaminants on its surface."

I pull my hand back and curl my lips up. "That sounds rather dangerous."

He nods. "It keeps your shoes squeaky clean though, which is nice. Also, it makes for... rapid corpse removal."

I stop his momentum with my hand. "Hold on, are you telling me humanity just dumps dead bodies in the streets, and those corpses get devoured by nanobots?"

Ben sighs and looks up through the glass ceiling above us guiltily. "It's a little more delicate than that, but suffice to say, everyone is cautious not to fall when they're outside."

"Ben, this is the craziest thing I've heard since I arrived. Why would Marie create something that sounds like it could accidentally kill people?"

Ben smirks as he looks back at me. "You think this is an accident? Didn't I tell you? Marie doesn't care about the lesser performing lower educated dregs of society. If someone falls onto the pavement, then in her eyes, they're too stupid to live anyway."

I rub my forehead and feel sweat coat my hand. "That's harsh. I can't believe Marie would make something like this... does she just love the feeling of taking a life?"

We continue walking, and Ben flicks the glass to his side. "It's not like that, Jason. Remember, Earth's animals were dying off in droves thanks to pollution. Their bodies were everywhere, and gasses from their corpses contributed dramatically to global warming. Marie decided that once we moved the remaining population off the Earth and onto more suitable worlds, it would be best to terraform the Earth one last time... so she did."

His breath trails off. I wring my hands as many thoughts come to me. "So, you created this nano-road stuff to... coat the Earth? It devours all life though, including trees, grass, bugs..."

We finally reach the end of the walkway and enter a new building, and Ben purses his lips. "True, but those were all going to rot and fail, anyway. Once the bees died off, we were artificially prolonging Earth's inevitable demise. Marie just sped the process along and completed it. Now Earth houses humans, and us alone. Well, there are pets too, of course." He winks at me. "It's a good thing you didn't bring that cute dog along; she wouldn't be here anymore."

"That's disgusting."

He nods. "I never said I agreed with Marie's methods. I care for the lower citizens, but I understand her reasoning as well."

I pause to look around the skyscraper we've entered. Unlike the other buildings, this one looks old, ancient even, by modern standards. It appears to be a hotel, resembling a luxury 5-star building from my time, like a Hyatt or a Marriott. The floor is covered in exotic red and gold carpets, the walls are made of faded stone that would have once been perfectly chiseled marble, and pillars extend down from the ceiling that have all sorts of patterns visible in their granite veins.

As we step inside, a pretty girl walks up to us. Her hair is pulled back into a bun, and she's wearing a navy-blue short-sleeved shirt with a modestly lengthy skirt, both of which look like a uniform for this establishment. The sailor-style hat on her head reads Prince Corps.

"Hello, sirs, what can I help you find today?" Her voice is tight and measured, and she doesn't smile at all. She looks me up and down suspiciously, but doesn't appear concerned about Benjamin in the slightest.

He takes the initiative. "We're here to see Four Finger Freddy."

Her eyes light up, but she doesn't smile. "I trust you have a card, then?"

Ben and I turn our heads to look at each other before looking back to her. He shakes his head. "I'm new, didn't know I needed one."

"Everyone pays their membership dues. It's one hundred credits to purchase a member card." She eyeballs me again. " Per person who seeks to examine our wares."

Ben tries to hide his dismay that he has to lose even more credits, but it doesn't come off well. "Fine, I'll give two hundred credits for my nephew and I."

The girl instantly spins on her heel and marches away. "Follow me."

We walk for a few minutes, winding our way past the front desk, through several old fashioned handle-style doors, and up a set of stairs with at least twenty steps.

I decide to ask questions since my curiosity is getting the better of me. "How old is this place?"

"Old."

She doesn't elaborate, and her tone of voice tells me she isn't interested in chatting. I like her.

We stop in front of a plain brown door where a tall, wiry-looking man is standing outside. The girl looks at him and jerks her head back toward us. "New buyers. Here to see Freddy."

The guy at the door holds up a datapad. He sniffles and skulks about, making me think he's a very shift person. "S-so, you're here to see Freddy, eh? Show me the credits!" He scratches his arms nervously and keeps twitching, so I make sure to keep my distance. This guy is creepy.

Ben bites his lip as he pulls up his datapad, presses a series of prompts, and sends the credits over. "Done."

The skinny guy shivers. "Thank you, sir! Come on in; it's right through here!" He slaps his hand on a scanner, and the door unlocks, opening up for us to see inside.

We enter slowly, and the man closes the door behind us. Despite the fact that we were in a classical hotel before, this room is completely different. All around us are computer terminals, with signs above that say things like "general goods", or "food", or even "recreation". The floor is tiled with metal, and the cracks between each tile are barely visible.

Ben and I stroll into the room, noting the ceiling is a few feet higher than outside, and the room has been artificially enlarged to fit multiple giant monitors everywhere.

"Oh, people?" A voice speaks up, and to my surprise, a teenager walks around the corner from an adjoining room. His hair is messy but his clothing is impressive, and he wears a mink fur that drapes over both shoulders. "What are you two here for?"

This time, I push in front of Ben. I don't like that he's been getting ahead of me when we engage people. "We're here to meet Four Finger Freddy. We heard he runs the local black market."

"Uh huh. That's me." The kid holds up his right hand, and to my surprise, it has six fingers. A second pinky hangs off the end awkwardly, like it was glued on.

"You're the leader of this place? I didn't think you'd be... so..."

"Young, yeah. Everyone says that. Do you have your cards?" His features droop and his posture slumps even more. He's already bored of us, I can tell. "Wait, of course you do. Ty wouldn't let anyone in without them."

Ben speaks up. "Actually, we wanted to ask a few questions first. Some rumors are going around downtown that the government is cracking down on markets in the area. Is that correct?"

An obvious lie. Ben made it up just to sift for information. The kid doesn't seem to care. "Oh yeah, definitely. We're going out of business. Why, just for you fellas, I'll double the prices to prove it." He gives us a deadpan look and rolls his eyes. "No, the government doesn't care about us. They waste a million tons of serviceable food every day, just because if they tried to give it out, they would piss more people off than would be happy. We're glad to take a small portion of it off their hands." He walks over and taps on the food terminal. "Look at this; we've got fresh apples, oranges, bananas, chicken, even some steak." He pauses to look back at us. "Dunno what animal the steak came from, but it's meat, right?"

Ben makes a slurping sound with his mouth as he examines the food on the screen, but I lean back. The chicken makes me feel anxious. Wait, is he going to buy something? I thought we were here to get information?

Ben pokes an option on the screen. "One thousand credits for a single apple?! Are you running a scam?"

"Huh? It's two thousand. Don't you remember? I'm doubling the prices for you gents." Freddy shrugs. "Don't like it? Don't make fun of my intelligence, simple as that."

He paces over to a different computer, one marked 'Luxury'. After pressing a few options, he points at the screen and Ben gasps. "An unlimited two-way Heaven travel permit? Where did you get this?!"

The kid shrugs. "Things come and go. If you want it, it's only ten thousand energy credits. Well, twenty for you."

Ben scowls. "You're not doing a very good job convincing me that you want my business."

"That's because I don't care." Freddy walks away from the computer, pushing past me in the process, and sits down at a terminal that has a helmet attached to the ceiling via some wires. With a single motion, he sticks it on his head, and I quickly realize it's a virtual reality goggle set of some kind, except much bigger and bulkier than I would imagine.

A loud beep sounds off behind me and I turn to look. The entire wall has become a viewscreen, and several images appear and disappear, along with video and other things. Freddy pipes up. "You guys gonna buy anything, or what?"

Ben frowns at me and shrugs. "I'll buy a banana."

Freddy sighs. "Is that all? Standard price is a thousand for a bunch, four hundred credits for a single."

"I'll take a single." Ben and I stare at Freddy's back, and a moment later a whirring sound fills the room, and a banana pops out of a chute in the wall to the right of him, landing in a clean white basket.

"Eight hundred credits."

Ben bites his tongue but glares at me. You're paying me back when we return, his eyes seem to say.

A moment later, Ben presses more buttons on his datapad and sends the credits to Freddy, who barely acknowledges the transaction.

"Thanks, yadda yadda if you're not buying anything else, go ahead and leave." While still wearing the helmet that covers his face and eyes, he turns to look at us. "And don't try to steal anything either. I have multiple auto-turrets in the walls. You won't escape alive."

"Sure, we understand. Thank you for your time." Ben takes the banana and smiles lopsidedly at me. Ohhh banana!

"Total waste of time." Freddy grumbles to himself, so Ben and I take it as our cue to leave. We push past the door outside, and the girl from before leads us to the hotel entrance once again.

Blaarjiim stirs in my mind. How curious. That boy was neither human nor demon... but a half-breed. I could sense the energy inside of him, as well as plenty of anger and bottled up emotions.

I decide not to answer him while walking with a stranger and Ben, but merely nod and wonder to myself.

Once we're outside, Ben finishes off his banana and sighs contentedly. "Damn, I haven't tasted fruit in centuries. That was incredible."

He tosses the peel forward, and it lands on the concrete-like surface. Immediately, before our very eyes, the fruit shrivels up and hisses, as if someone were pouring boiling water into a bucket of ice cubes. Moments later, it vanishes and crumbles into dust.

"Wow. So that's how it works, huh?"

My question makes Ben smile. "Yeah, pretty cool, huh? Be glad I was there to stop you from touching it."

"Believe me, I am."

Part 416b: Written In Blood

I move the file across each nail slowly, deliberately, each pass a work of art, every movement done with purpose. I am a beautiful, divine being, and performing even the most menial task must be done with dignity and grace. When it comes to my personal hygiene, no expense must be spared, no amount of time considered too great for me to ensure I am always looking my best.

Yama, the short little Second Emperor, an ugly black mass of greed and avarice, walks beside me as we round the last corner to the gate that leads to the entrance of his domain. He has long since grown used to my 'fussy' mannerisms, my carefully constructed sentences, and my lust for perfection in all its forms, so he doesn't object as I file away.

Just as Grylls teleports the guests to our side, I stick the file into my inner suit pocket and bow gracefully. "Esteemed human guests, I welcome you to the Hidden Demon Capitol, Second Emperor Yama's domain. My name is Beelzebub, the Third Emperor of Hell."

The two humans shift nervously in front of us, obviously a little off-put by my stunning beauty, as well as Yama's frightening appearance. One of them I recognize, Jacob Lirik, a scientist at the Rygar nature preserve. He's a pudgy, overweight slob, one who slouches as he walks and mumbles when he talks but is also quite intelligent. Even for a human, I find him repulsive to look at, given his cleft chin and droopy eyelids make him seem like a homeless vagrant.

Unbelievably, despite his hideous appearance, he leads the entire Species Development Division on Rygar and is directly responsible for maintaining genetic disparities and similarities between the different types of animals... whatever that means. I only know this because when I asked him what his job was on the first occasion that I met him, he launched into a ten-minute tirade about how important he was and I nearly killed him for it.

Jacob wipes at his nose and beckons to his companion, who is trying his damndest to not quake in his boots at the atmosphere the two demons before him give off. "This is a friend of mine, David Jones. He's a Head Supervisor for the Botany and Biology Facility in the southern hemisphere. After I told him about this place, he couldn't wait to come."

Indeed, despite his shaking, there's an intangible excitement in David's eyes. He's as ugly as his senior, with a droopy turkey chin, legs as thick as a small tree, and arms that must wave back at him whenever he greets people. A thin layer of hair coats his face and neck, and faint flecks of drool are visible just underneath his lower lip.

Humans are repugnant creatures.

"G-good to meet you, mister demon lord sirs!" David thrusts his hand forward, presumably to shake our hands, but neither Yama nor I make any effort to return the gesture.

Jacob quickly shoves David and scowls at him. "They're emperors, not lords. They're royalty, so they don't shake hands with common folk like us."

Royalty. Mmm, I love the sound of that. I relax my posture slightly as the two humans trip over each other trying to praise us. Naturally, Yama and I are emperors, so it's only normal these men should treat us as their superiors. Without exerting any energy I could kill both of them in a single second, and they'd never realize I'd done it.

Yama finally speaks. "David Jones, is it? I'm delighted to see you here. As your friend may have told you, my domain is private, only available to particular humans, ones in positions of authority. Of course, in order to browse my wares, you must be willing to offer some quid-pro-quo."

David's eager smile slightly fades as he looks at Jacob. "I don't understand... w-what does he want? Perhaps... my blood?"

I secretly smile as Yama materializes a familiar parchment in midair, a blood contract. "Something to that extent. This contract guarantees by your own life's energy that you will never tell anyone else about my domain, and if you do, you must bring them here within two days or your life will be forfeit." Yama makes a big show of clearing his throat. "Oh yes, also, if I deem the person you bring to be of little value, your life will be forfeit immediately, as will theirs."

David's smile vanishes completely as he turns to look back at Jacob. "You knew about this? Are you also under the blood contract?"

Jacob's expression is tight. "I am. Unofficially, Yama will give extra benefits to those who regularly introduce him to prominent humans. I took a measured risk. I know you've been lonely, David. Since Yama has acknowledged your value to humanity, that means..." He turns to look at the Second Emperor and nods. "...that my offer is accepted?"

"Only if this one signs the contract." Yama thrusts the paper forward, along with a metal fountain pen. "It is as your friend explained, Mister Jones. You either sign, or both of you die now. It isn't much of a choice at this point, but rest assured, you are part of a secret society. I offer my protection to you while inside my domain, and no harm will come upon you as long as I draw breath. Additionally, women will be at your disposal, as will my food stores."

"You have food here as well?" David's eyes light up immediately, and he quickly but gently takes the parchment from Yama. "Where do I sign?"

Yama chuckles audibly, and even I can't help but laugh, myself. Humans are still simple creatures, in the end. They're easy to manipulate.

"Simply press the pen into your finger, allow the blood to coat its tip then place your name here." Yama's smoke trickles from his body to form a long finger, then points at the spot on the parchment.

A few moments later, the human has finished, the paper glows with energy, and Yama quickly takes it back, rolls it up, and sends it to his shadow realm to store it for safekeeping. "Welcome to the society of demons, David Locke Jones."

I stroke my chin hair and turn to Jacob. "You've brought us a new convert. As per our rules, you will be granted extra privileges. You may now enjoy the company of two slaves during your stay here, and their quality will go up as well."

Jacob wheezes and shifts his stance. "Ah, that's good... very good. I really only care for one of the girls here, but I guess I can find another. The more, the merrier, right?"

"Yes. I suppose so." I resist the urge to roll my eyes. "Do you have a preference on this outing, or would you rather have us line them up for you, as we did on your first arrival?"

He starts to shake his head, but quickly thinks better of it. "Normally I'd just want to see Melia, but since David isn't used to the whole process, and since I can have a second now, you might as well."

Yama twitches slightly, and a pained look crosses over his face. I quickly find out why when he explains. "I apologize, Mister Lirik. Melia is no longer among the living. I forgot your attachment to that one."

The change in Jacob's attitude is dramatic. It's as if an arrow were bursting through his chest. "What? She's dead?! But... but how? You said nobody could kill the slaves! You said you'd protect them!" He takes a step forward, and for a second a remarkable rage passes over his face, but neither Yama nor myself are intimidated.

"No. I said that if you were to ever kill a slave here, you would pay the price for your actions. This rule applies to all humans who enter a contract with my domain. Believe me, the human who killed her paid the ultimate price."

Jacob's anger quickly fades, and tears well up instead. He bows his head to avert his gaze and wipes furiously at his eyes. "Shit. Goddammit! I liked Melia! She was nice; she always took care of me! This... this isn't fair... she didn't deserve to die..."

Every human that comes to these lands comes for their own reasons, but men like Jacob are a real rarity. They treat the girls with affection and grow rather attached to the slaves... perhaps too attached. Indeed, I remember the times he brought Melia gifts, such as a pillow and blankets to make her bed more comfortable. We confiscated them, of course, once he had left. There's no point allowing a slave to get any ideas about her sense of superiority compared to the others.

Still, this disgusting reject of society held a real affection for her. For a moment, I almost feel sorry for Jacob. That moment disappears as quickly as it came.

"If you would prefer, you can go home and grieve for her death. We will not blame you." I drawl out a generic offering of condolences, and he finishes weeping like a man-child and rubs his shirt on his eyes.

"No, I'm fine. Sorry for ending up like this. Let's go on, David. I need the company of a woman now more than ever."

David pats his colleague on the back, and I use magic to summon a familiar demoness to my side. An old hag appears, looking none too pleased that I used my teleportation on her. "What's the meaning of this? You little shithead! I was busy when you just yanked me outta the-"

"Shut it, Hellga. We've taken the tongues of all the human girls, and I wouldn't test my patience if I were you. I have infinitely less of it for an old bat like you." I snap at her viciously, and she immediately shuts up and waits for my orders. "Line up the serfs. We have a new distinguished visitor, and one of our returning friends would like to see what others we have available."

She nods with annoyance, the rage in her eyes evident, but she dares not question my orders. She might claim to be born of royal blood, but her power is a fraction of even an average demon's. Might makes right among our people, and she lacks the ability to fight back. Such is the natural order of things here.

Before she can lead the humans away, Yama pauses their departure with a single upright palm. "David, due to the incident that resulted in Melia's death, we lack several slaves. Be sure and let us know if you can get hold of any new ones to replace them."

The human nods glumly, and soon he and his friend leave, following closely behind Hellga. Yama sighs. "Jason Hiro... that human has caused so many problems for me."

Yama and I turn and walk down the hallways, meandering back and forth as we head to the front rooms, where the dining hall and Yama's storage rooms are located.

"Look at the bright side though, Second Emperor, and see what you've traded. Danis was a psychopathic torturer, a human that would be hard pressed to find like-minded company among the worst of his kind... or ours. He was an Admiral, too, while Jason Hiro is the leader of all of humanity, and most especially their centralized forces. When you consider what we've gained compared to what we've lost, it's a net positive."

Yama doesn't seem so certain. The smoke boils and streams off his body, falls onto the floor, and hisses when it meets the cold black tiles. "Jason is an enigma. He protected one slave girl that he liked, and killed another without remorse. His actions are full of contradictions. He's unsure of what he wants to do. He's confused, lost. Yet, compared with the weakling that preceded him, this new Jason is a threat unlike any before him." Yama reaches up to tap his barely visible lip thoughtfully. "He might interfere with our long-term plans if he switches allegiances. I'm not certain I could kill him without bringing down all of humanity on us."

I reach into my coat and pull out a bottle of cologne, then dab a tiny bit on my neck before slipping the bottle back where it came from. "He's a disrespectful, arrogant little shit, but he's still more in our hands than the previous Jason was."

We stop in front of the door that leads to Yama's storage, and he releases the seal with a wave of his hand. "Is he? The previous Jason witnessed my power and realized that angering demons any more would result in a suicide attack that would threaten the balance of power in the galaxy. He was doing an excellent job keeping his troops at bay for the foreseeable future."

Yama's words send a chill down my spine as we enter the room where he stores his prized possessions. "That attack you speak of... no demon was able to witness it, yet what little we've heard of it from humankind indicates... well, with the power you put on display, surely you are a worthy candidate for First Emperor."

The short black demon's face contorts into a dark smile as he turns to look at me. "I allow Bael to hold that position for the safety of all demons. The humans have seen my power, but they have yet to see Bael's. If they know what I am capable of, and they suppose that Bael is a higher rank than me, then it stands to suggest in their minds that he is even more daunting of a foe than I."

"Clever. But Bael isn't stronger than you. In fact, I think he might be weaker than me." I press a finger to my chest to emphasize my point. "More importantly, I find it difficult to believe that you had the power to kill billions of humans all at once. How could you possibly pull that off?"

Yama turns away from me and wanders over to his favorite crystal, the one holding the body of the human female he loves to look at most. I don't understand his fascination with her. "My power is that of darkness, and the more humans I kill, the more powerful it becomes. Had the Supreme Commander not halted my advance with his Wordsmithing, I might have extinguished humanity in a single night."

I raise my eyebrows in interest. "I see. So you killed humans, which drained your power, but the more you exterminated, the more power you gained. A chain reaction."

"The Sirius system suffered a huge blow to their military morale as a result of that night. I am pleased with how it turned out."

Yama lowers his head and whispers under his breath. "And, if it weren't for the help of that one... I don't know if..."

"Huh? Who are you talking about?"

I interrupt his thoughts, and he shakes his head at me. "A human wrote a book once, in the time before time. In it, he stated the following: To deceive your foes, you must first deceive your allies. " Yama turns back to look at me. "Appear weak when you are strong, and strong when you are weak. In time, Beelzebub, you will understand the method to my madness."

"Are you planning something?"

The Shadow looks at a different crystal, one holding the body of the previous Supreme Commander. "Always."

* * *

I miss vacations. There was a time in my life when I wasn't a workaholic. I used to be able to enjoy the small things. Going to the beach, riding a Ferris Wheel, blasting through hyperspace for fun. Shoot, I even used to treat the people in my extended family differently, as if they were human beings, and not just moochers out to get in good graces with the Supreme Commander.

I don't know when it all changed... but once it did, that was the moment my life took a turn for the worse, and slowly deteriorated more and more over time. There was a time in my life when I was filled with anger and resentment, always looking for a fight. I crushed the demons and used their bodies to pave a path for humanity. At some point, the anger began to subside, and before I knew it, a million years had passed.

Marie was always there at my side, whispering to me. Was she a temptress? She spoke honeyed words to calm me down, time after time, and eventually a small ceding of control would pave the path to another, and then another... soon, I ended up sitting in an office all day, pressing buttons and grumbling my life away. The only respite I found was with my beautiful wife and the respect of my subordinates. But what did it matter in the end?

My life has become meaningless. I have a power that allows me to control the underlying principles of the universe, and I barely even use it. I'm not a spiritual man, but if God does exist, would he not be angered by my squandering of his gift? Does God exist? Am I... God?

I can't be God. God does not need to speak a word to make His will become reality. At best, I am a pale imitation, a muddled reflection in a broken mirror. Nobody will write a holy book about my life, nor will they bow down before me and praise my eternal power. Should they? All I've given humanity is a mediocre existence, a grim lifetime of strife. Food made from feces, work derived from meaningless button-pressing, and unfounded fears about an enemy that will never become a threat.

* * *

My consciousness feels so distant lately. I feel like I'm sleeping, yet I'm groggy, as if my body is waking up, but fails halfway through. What led to this? Why can't I just stay asleep or wake up? Haven't I worked hard enough? Can't I ever take a day off?

Footsteps. I hear the sound of someone walking toward me. From where?

"Funny. We clashed for millions of years, but in the end, it was not me who defeated you, but yourself."

Who's speaking? His voice sounds so far away. It's as if I'm underwater, and I can only hear his words through the liquid around me.

"I knew this would happen eventually, see. Beelzebub and the others can't understand. It's all part of the plan. You shouldn't blame yourself."

Blame myself? Who's speaking? What's he talking about?

"I'm glad though. You worked hard, all those eons. Nobody ever appreciated you, but now you may sleep. Sleep as much as you desire. You've earned it."

I think I recognize the voice. Is it Yama? How can I hear him?

The footsteps are audible again, but this time they walk away from me. Yama speaks again. "Amelia... always a pleasure to gaze upon you. Someday, my vindication will be upon us. When we crush the humans from within, I will release you. Perhaps then, you will finally be able to accept me."

The sound of footsteps again, first walking toward me, then walking away. Is Yama... pacing? His voice sounds uncertain as if he doesn't know what he's doing.

"Will you accept me, though? Why would you? I've locked you up like an animal. Am I cursed, never to feel your touch? Must we always keep this barrier between us? Perhaps it's for the best. If I could touch you, I don't know what I would do. I doubt my self-control... when it comes to our bond. You saved me, after all, but my feelings are more than that of gratefulness and respect. They're deep as the oceans on your home planet."

He continues pacing. "It is coming, though. The storm that will rend human society asunder. I never wanted war, you know. Satan was the one who wanted humans to die. I held no such moral qualms. He was a psychopath who could never let go of a grudge. You believe me, don't you? I wanted peace. It was he who instigated the war, and Jason Hiro who tried to purge us from existence. I am merely acting in self-preservation."

Yama's voice trails off, and he stops walking. "I wish you could answer me, but you can't. You're trapped in an infinite sleep. I put you there. I... I am... a monster. You could never love me as I do you."

There is silence for several long moments, followed by a choking sound, something I can only assume is... sobbing? Is he crying?

I hear the sound of his feet again, this time walking away from me. Just before he walks out of range entirely, Yama pauses. "I'll see you again, tomorrow, same time. Farewell, my love."

A slamming sound fills my ears. He has left, but where has he gone? And who is this Amelia he is talking to?

I'm getting tired again... perhaps I should... sleep.

I deserve the rest.

Part 417b: The Uprising

"Mister Feldmann can be a bit eccentric." Amy mutters the cautious warning as we approach the door to a rooftop elevator. Amy landed her ship on the landing pad several dozen feet behind us, and now this small building, back on Earth, is the place that will take me to whoever calls the shots. 'Mister Feldmann' is a man Amy looks up to, though she hasn't told me much about him.

"Eccentric? What is that?"

The door opens, and we step inside the small enclosed space, then Amy presses a button labeled '49'. "It means he can act a little strange, odd at times, perhaps even erratic. He has quirks that might surprise you, but you'll grow used to them. He's a very level headed guy, and dependable too, but first impressions aren't his strong suit."

Amy pulls on her long, curly blonde hair and spreads it out, fanning it all over. The new look makes her look much younger, and prettier too. "He's a real gentleman, and has a penchant for getting protective of cute girls. Make sure you use that to your advantage."

I follow her lead and fan my hair out, smiling as I feel how clean it is. I don't know why, but for some reason, I slept the entire trip to this place and didn't wake up until we reached Earth. Amy told me she gave me a 'said-uh-tiff', but I've never heard of those before. Whatever it was, it made me feel very sleepy. Once I woke up and showered again, I felt like a whole different person. I still do!

I watch the numbers light up on the door panel. 55, 54, 53, 52...

"It's an older building. Steven has his own suite in the upper districts, but this is a skyscraper built eons ago. It exists outside the monitoring zone because anyone living here is assumed to be not worth listening in on. At least, that's the official reason." Amy starts explaining things without me asking her to do so, but I keep quiet and listen, all the same. "The purpose of our organization is to quietly oppose the government where possible. Thankfully, people are starting to wake up and realize we were right all along."

"You oppose the government? That sounds dangerous."

The door dings and opens, and we step out into a brightly lit, pale white lobby. The walls are covered in noticeable water-spots here and there, and the sensation of rumbling from deep in the building below makes my feet tremble as we exit the elevator.

"Oh sure, there are dangers. The benefit of a society with hundreds of trillions of citizens is that no matter how powerful the government might be, unless they have an all-powerful AI that can be everywhere all at once, they can't possibly keep up with all people at all times. Anyway, our society has many punishments, especially for rebels who plot against their government, but the death penalty is not among them. Officially. "

Amy shivers slightly before looking at me with a fear in her eyes, something I haven't seen before. "You know... murder is, ah, unheard of. You've already killed a hundred people, fellow humans. No matter how much Mister Feldmann and I hated Danis, killing him left a sour taste in our mouths, but what you did at that prison facility was-

"I did what I had to. Master would be proud." I glare at her, though mostly out of anger that she'd question my motives. "They wanted to lock me up and torture me again. They deserved to die."

"I know, Lora. I understand that you were angry, but I thought you were just going to distract them. If I had known you were going to kill those men and the Warden, I would never have-

I stop walking and grab her by the shoulder. "So you've never killed anyone, then? Are your hands bloodless?"

She pulls away from my grasp. "I've never done such a thing, of course not!"

"Not humans, but what about demons?"

My question takes her aback. She rubs her arm and glances away. "Well, I mean, I've killed a few demons, sure. But demons aren't humans! There's a difference!" A fiery indignation lights up in her eyes. "You can't compare us to them!"

"I can! I will!" I hold up my fingers and start counting them off. "Demons are intelligent, they walk on two legs and have two arms, they look like humans aside from their red skin, they have hopes, dreams, and desires... just how many have you killed?"

Amy can't meet my gaze. "I don't know. I, well, I lost count."

There's a short silence as I glare at her and she won't look at me, but I finally pull away and start walking ahead again. "You've lost count? I will never forget the faces of those I killed. The only difference between you and me is that while we're both killers, I only kill to survive."

I can hear Amy's footsteps as she falls into line behind me. "I killed demons to protect humanity. They're monsters. They eat humans. They're just... not the same."

She's not wrong there. How many slaves did I watch the demons devour? Their screams echo in my nightmares sometimes. "Danis was more of a devil than most demons I met. So was the Warden. In a way, you and I aren't very different. You killed demons, but I killed monsters, ones that wore human skin, but weren't really human."

Before long, the sounds of people walking around sound off in the distance, and soon we arrive in a large room, with chairs and furniture just like the ones I saw in Marie's home. Men and women are lounging around, eating food bars and chatting about this and that. An ornate rounded metal light-holder hangs from the ceiling, and it has over a hundred small sparkling points of light. Despite being the only source of illumination for the room, when I look at it, it reminds me of the 'star' that Master told me about on Earth.

Amy catches me looking at it. "That's a 'chandelier'. It's ancient, but Feldmann thought it would light up the dining hall and bring a cozy atmosphere for everyone to relax in."

I nod. "Who are all these people?"

"They're part of the resistance. Some joined after the Goldesh Uprising went south and the government showed its true colors. Most were on board even before them, but few are as powerful or influential as Steven Feldmann."

We continue walking past people, and Amy pauses to greet a few of them, even going so far as to introduce me, but all their faces and names tend to blend together in my mind.

Finally, Amy stops in front of a door on the opposite side of the room from where we started. She inhales slowly, then sighs. "As I thought. Peggy told me Steven is playing holo-games again. The man is an addict. We'll go in, but just... watch out for an outfield curveball."

"A what?"

She doesn't explain, but instead opens the door. We enter the room, and immediately everything feels weird. The hard-wood floors from outside suddenly become soft and green, like the ground-sticks from outside the prison facility. There's a sound, hundreds of feet away, of a metallic whack hitting something with tremendous force. Every few seconds, I hear the sound again, and again... Amy seems familiar with it, so I follow her. When we walk over a small hill, I spot a man, presumably Feldmann, standing by himself, holding a long metal rod in his hands. He's wearing shorts without a shirt, and a man is standing opposite him throwing a round white object at Feldmann. Each time he throws it, Feldmann swings the metal rod out and hits the white thing away. We're standing behind Feldmann, so he doesn't appear to see us.

"Is he training for battle?" I ask the question, and Amy chuckles in response.

"He's practicing his batting. He loves baseball, you see. He won't shut up about it, if you let him start at all."

"What is baseball?"

Amy shrugs. "It's an ancient sport, invented by primitive humans before the dawn of immortality. You hit the ball and get points or something. Seems silly to me."

Points? Why would he want to get points? Perhaps they're edible.

We continue watching him swing the rod and hit the balls, and once he pauses to wipe at his forehead, Amy decides that's the moment to get his attention. "Mister Feldmann! I'm back."

He quickly turns around and raises an eyebrow when he spots us. "Amy! Glad to see you again!" He drops the rod on the ground, makes a motion with his hands, and the other man vanishes, as if by magic. "And this other girl...?"

As he trots up to us, Amy gestures at me. "This is Lora... something. I don't know her last name. She's the one you wanted to see."

"Do I need to have a last name?"

My innocent question makes Feldmann chuckle. "Hehe, no, not really. In any case... you worked for my father, then?"

I stare at him silently and shrug. Amy raises an eyebrow. "You did work for the Supreme Commander, correct? Jason Hiro. You wouldn't stop mumbling his name in your sleep."

I quickly realize what they're saying. "Oh! Master is your father? I'm sorry! He never told me he had a son!"

Steven glances at Amy, then back to me. "I'm sorry... master? What do you mean by that?" He clears his throat and looks back to Amy. "Were they in some sort of relationship? It sounds questionable..."

"He saved me from the demons. They were holding me as a slave, so he took me from them..." I trail off as both of them seem unnerved by my words.

Steven wipes some sweat from his chest. "Oh, so it's like that. I understand. I never took Father to be a do-gooder, but he's been full of surprises lately." He jerks his thumb back at where he was playing with the rod from earlier. "Why don't you join me? It's no fun just standing around; I like to get some exercise in when I'm not at the office."

"Okay. Exercise is good! It makes you stronger!" I follow after him, but glance back and notice Amy looks slightly annoyed. "What's wrong?"

She shakes her head. "I'll just sit and watch. I'm not interested in playing games right now."

Amy tags along and sits on the green sticks, while Steven waves his hands in the air and makes a small rectangular steel cage appear, filled to the brim with those white balls from earlier. "Just grab one of those baseballs and throw them to my side. I'll hit it, then you throw another when I'm ready, and we'll keep repeating it over and over."

I nod slowly and stand beside the cage. "Is this exercise?"

"Certainly! It's a full upper body workout for me, and it can even help you develop some arm strength too." He pauses to pick the rod up from the ground. "Also, the best thing about sports... you can easily judge a person's character by how they play the game."

Amy perks up behind him. "Is that what this is about?"

"Perhaps." He takes a ready stance and holds the metal rod up. "Just pitch the ball to my side. Ever thrown a baseball before?"

I grab one and shrug. "I've thrown rocks before. I'll try to be gentle."

"No, that's fine. Throw as hard as you can. I hit 100mph fastballs all the time. I train with holographic recreations of all the greatest pitchers, after all."

Amy nods along, but there's suddenly a look of alarm in her eyes. She quickly stands up and runs to the side, getting away from standing behind him. "Uh, Steven, you should watch out! She's way stronger than she looks!"

"Uh huh." He watches my hand carefully, as I wind up to throw the ball just like I saw that man from earlier do. The moment the ball leaves my hand, a massive explosion sounds off behind Steven, and the ground shakes furiously as the ball pounds into the field with the fury of a cannonball.

Steven's eyes open a little wider as he turns to look at the terrain behind him. Where there was once green sticks, the world looks weird and deformed. Sparks fly out in all directions, and he turns back to me and gawks. "Y-you just destroyed a part of the holo-room! Holographic balls aren't supposed to cause damage like that!"

"I warned you." Amy shakes her head chidingly. "Don't try it again, Steven. She might kill you, even if by accident."

Steven drops the rod from his hands and quickly wipes sweat from his bare chest. "Yeah... no kidding. What did the demons do to make you so powerful?"

Amy and Steven both walk over to me, and I shake my head. "Master trained me constantly."

"Yeah, no kidding. He must have juiced you up real good. Let's call it a day." Steven surprises me by reaching over suddenly and squeezing my arm. "You should be made of solid muscle, but this is the most ladylike arm I've ever squeezed. How did he do it, I wonder?"

We walk toward the exit door, and I tap my lip thoughtfully. "I'm not sure. Master just said a word, and I was stronger!"

Amy fills in for me. "She was born and raised in the Labyrinth, from what I gather, Steven. She wouldn't know how nano-augmentation works. I can't fathom what your father was thinking when he altered her genetics, though."

Steven nods. "Yeah. He's been acting strange, lately. Marie's taking an abrupt vacation, too. Suspicious timing, if you ask me."

Just as we near the door, Amy scowls at Steven. "Aren't you going to put on a shirt before we go out?"

"Pff. Who needs 'em?"

* * *

A few minutes later, the three of us sit at a long 'bar,' as Steven calls it, and I admire the wooden stool before me. It's made with excellent craftsmanship, and the seat has a winged creature resembling the lizard-men I'd seen a few times in the Labyrinth, but with a mouthful of razor-sharp teeth. It's hard to tell, but it seems the monster is breathing fire. Whatever it is, the beast is etched into the chair with perfectly detailed line-work. Only Yama had anything similar in the labyrinth, and he kept all artistry of such quality under lock and key in his storage room.

I quickly sit down, and Feldmann leans forward to look past Amy, who's sitting between us. "We haven't had time for a proper introduction yet, have we? I'm Steven Feldmann, and my father is your former boss. My job on the council is mostly a ceremonial role, where I'm considered a military advisor, but I can leverage it to my political advantage as needed."

I nod slowly, unsure of what anything he said means. A large man with a grizzled beard and a shirt ripped in various places on the arms walks up from behind the counter and grunts. "Mister Feldmann, what'll it be?"

"I'll take a gin. The ladies will have..." He trails off, and Amy finishes for him.

"Give me a light craft beer, if you please." She turns to me. "Do you drink as well, Lora?"

I'm a little confused by what she means. "Won't you die if you don't drink?"

"Some days, I feel like it." Steven grumbles under his breath, but Amy lightly punches him in the arm and turns back to me.

"Alcohol, dear. Have you ever had alcohol before?" I shake my head, and immediately she turns back to the bartender. "She's a young thing, Brian. Start her off with something light and flavorful. Low alcohol content."

He grumbles to himself and mutters something inaudible, then reaches under the counter to pull up a cup and a red-colored bottle. "This'll do. Made this myself. Cherry Cider." He pours the red juice inside and shoves it in front of me, then grabs the drinks for Amy and Steven. "Want this on your tab?"

Steven nods. "That'll be fine."

I stare at the red liquid for a few moments as a fragrant aroma rises into my nose. It smells good, though I can't place the scent at all. I take a sip of it, and the taste is so incredible that a moment later I down the rest of the glass in one gulp. A pleasant feeling washes through my body, something relaxing that makes me want to kick back and 'take it easy,' as Master would sometimes say.

Brian raises an eyebrow. "Want more, little girl?"

"Mhm."

He shrugs and pours another glassful, so I drink it in one gulp again, then eyeball the glass curiously. The glass seems to be moving. Ah, everything is.

"That will be enough for her. She doesn't look like she can handle her liquor." Amy pats me on the back. "You shouldn't have drunk it so fast."

Steven gets up and walks around to my other side, bringing his glass with him. He sits on the stool beside me. "So, listen, I've had a look at what few records the prison system had for you. Can you answer a few questions for me?"

I yawn loudly and lay my head on my hand, propping myself up on the counter. "Uh huh."

"You're from Goldesh, right? That's what the scanning report said when my father brought you out of the Labyrinth. Is that correct?" He takes a sip of the beverage in his hands but keeps his eyes locked on me.

My eyes feel a little droopy. "I don't know..."

"Hmm." He looks past me at Amy. "She was born and raised in the Labyrinth, right? She might not even know what Goldesh is." He finishes his drink and sets it down. "Listen... Lora. The man you killed, Danis. He was an evil man. Amy and I knew it for hundreds of years. We aren't mad that you killed him, per se, but we need to find out more details. Why did you kill him, if you didn't know what happened on Goldesh?"

I was feeling drowsy before, but now all the memories come racing back. I suddenly feel uncomfortable sitting next to Steven and pull away from him slightly. "He... Danis... he beat me. He hurt my friends too. He did wicked things. Master saved me."

As if I flipped a switch, Steven leans a little away from me, having noticed my discomfort. "I'm sorry to hear that. If it's possible, could you go into more detail?"

I quickly shake my head and look away. "No, I don't want to. I really don't want to..."

Amy puts her hand on mine. "That's fine; we won't pressure you. Rather than ask for answers, Steven, since she doesn't know the importance of Goldesh, I think it's time we explained what happened."

Steven clears his throat. "Sorry. I get a little distracted whenever his name comes up. Everyone respected him, all those millennia, but I know the truth. We do, don't we, Amy?"

Amy turns back to glance at the room full of people milling about behind us. "I hope so. Should I tell her?"

"You were there too. Go ahead."

Amy lifts my chin up and makes me meet her eyes. "This is very important. It all started several hundred years ago."

* * *

I remember it as clearly as if it happened yesterday.

I was a mid-ranking member of the Golden Commandos at that point, and my squad was busy hunting down demons, as they always did. An order came down from top command, via the Supreme Commander himself. He wanted all of the Golden Commandos to examine ongoing unrest in the Goldesh system all by ourselves. Instead, since we were currently busy, Corporal Williams sent me to investigate. We couldn't possibly spare any other troops since the demons were attempting a comeback.

I blasted off and arrived a day later at Goldesh IV, a mining colony on one of the planet's moons. It was an ugly black rock, a blob of mass floating in space that certainly didn't care about the health of its human inhabitants. I had never been to the Goldesh system before, and certainly never a mining facility, not in my whole life. I didn't know what I was in for until I got there.

Immediately, I was struck by the darkness. The black ground seemed to absorb light from all around, so I always felt as if a demon could jump out of the shadows and attack me. When I arrived, I quickly spotted the problem. There was a large group of people protesting their working conditions. It turned out that the undesirables of society, specifically people who couldn't be rehabilitated for behavioral problems, yet who had committed no crimes, they were being sent to this mining facility, with no hope of ever leaving.

I'm not a fan of ration bars, and after spending a few days among the Goldeshians, I came to realize just how bad the bars could get. All food was ninety-five percent reconditioned, or worse. The miners were forced to work long hours, often sixteen a day, and conditions inside the mines were atrocious.

Angered by the protestors holding up supply lines, the facility guards were deployed to make sure all protestor names were noted and prevented from receiving any rations. They were corralled and starved and eventually driven into a corner. With no food or water, they became desperate for a change, and thus the first violent scuffle broke out at the mining facility.

During the chaos, a guard fired a shot that killed one of the protestors. This ended the fighting in an instant, but even though his fellow guardsmen were horrified by what he'd done, it was too late. Word spread about his actions, and the entire workforce went on strike. Armed with nothing but their fists and rocks mined from deep underground, the violence escalated rapidly, and five guards were killed that same day in retaliation for the death of the miner.

I didn't know what to do. From my perspective, the facility was a human rights violation, betraying everything I'd spent my life fighting for. The demons were supposed to be the bad guys, but humans were enslaving each other! On the other hand, the miner retaliation was over the top. An eye for an eye just leaves both sides blind, or at least that was how I explained the situation to myself.

It was then that two new faces arrived. General Danis, and the Supreme Commander's son, his most trusted advisor, Steven Feldmann.

The two men weren't familiar to me at all, but I was a soldier. When Danis ordered me to don my commando hypersuit and put an end to the violence, at any cost, I did what I had to.

First, I searched for the leaders of the resistance and captured them. It turned out just three women and two men were the ones in charge. They were the first people ever to be forced to work at the facility, and they had been there for almost a million years. I captured and turned in all five of them, and to my horror, Danis did something I would never have imagined.

He ordered a public execution.

"Law and order is to be maintained! Any who wish to complain have no voice, and they have no rights! Remember the human creed: For glory, we aspire. Perfection, we achieve. Waste, we prevent. Failure, we despise. None of you have any glory, all of you are the wastes and failures of this society, and thus only by working here will you ever achieve anything! Revolt if you wish, but death will be your only answer!"

Danis's voice rang out over loudspeakers set up all around the camps, and I watched as women and children shook in terror, unsure of what would come next. I was thankful that Danis didn't order me to carry out their executions by firing squad, but I could tell he wanted to give me the 'honor'.

When the soldiers raised their plasma rifles, one of the mining leaders, still chained to a pole, and unable to escape, smiled. "You think this is a loss?! I will die, and go to Heaven! I should have done this years ago!"

Danis smiled back. Somehow, it made me feel a million times worse than any anger would have. "We will see what the angels think of lowlifes like you."

The soldiers blasted them, and the miners died instantly. Danis came to me later and praised me for my efforts in quickly stopping the mining uprising. He told me I'd be promoted... but I didn't want it. It was as if I were being given blood credits. I had only earned the promotion by hurting my own kind.

I couldn't help myself. I went to a distant part of the work outpost and cried for hours. I felt so guilty! What was I even fighting for? Killing demons was one thing, but enslaving other humans?! Every piece of our law expressly forbids it! Who is to say these people were the dregs of society? What arbitrary metrics determined that they, and thus their children, didn't have the right to live free lives?

Unfortunately for me, or so I thought at the time, Steven Feldmann was passing by and he heard me crying. He walked over and startled me by putting his hand on my shoulder. I jumped in fright, but the sight of the Supreme Commander's third-born son, a man I only knew in passing thanks to historical archives, only served to enrage me. I couldn't take it anymore! I unloaded on Steven, and attacked everything about him and what he stood for. Danis was a leader of humanity, and so was the Supreme Commander, and everyone else who allowed the facility to exist.

But Steven just stood there nodding, accepting my pain and anger. Eventually, he pulled me in close and hugged me, and I finally realized I wasn't alone. He was crying as well, deep on the inside.

His whole life, Steven did whatever his father told him, and only in the few millennia before the Goldesh incident did he realize the empire of humanity wasn't as utopian as it always appeared. Only once he saw those men executed and heard my genuine rage did he realize that what he was fighting for was a sham.

But this... this was only the beginning. Steven and I made an oath, right then and there, that we would not allow these people to be taken advantage of. We had to found a new order, one that could, in time, oppose the government. Steven had never truly loved his father, nor felt an emotional connection with him. Growing up, his father was barely ever home, always running around doing this and that. Steven had lived for tens of millions of years, but all he ever did was live in his father's shadow.

We decided the first thing to do would be to organize a new resistance movement... and this time, we were going to do it right.

* * *

Amy sighs. "Steven... have we ever wavered? Have we done the right thing?"

"I think so." He sloshes another half-full glass around slowly. "Lora, you were around my father for a while. What did you think of him?"

His question makes me rub my legs. Something about the way these two keep probing makes me feel uncomfortable. "He is a kind master. He doesn't hit me or hurt me as the demons did... and Danis." I stop myself from saying anything else, but Steven immediately presses the issue.

"Wait, Danis hit you? What the hell? How could that be? Didn't you say you lived in the Labyrinth?"

Amy shoots icy daggers out of her eyes, but I just rub my arms and lean away.

"Um, well, yes. I lived in Yama's domain. He had many slave girls, just like me. He still does... they're all down there. He, um, offers them to visitors. Human visitors, that is..."

I glance up guiltily at Steven, but he isn't looking at me anymore. Instead, he's staring blankly at the wall behind the counter.

"Holy... fucking shit. No way. I knew he was corrupt, but- collusion with the demons? What if my father's invol-" He stops and immediately turns to me. "Is he?! Is my father involved in all of this?!"

He grabs me by the arms and shakes me, but Amy jumps in and pulls him off. "Calm down! Use your brain, idiot! Your father saved her from the demons. Of course he isn't involved with them. Read between the lines, Steven!"

She quickly pulls me out of the chair, and only now do I realize everyone is watching us. "Come on, Lora, this is probably rough on you. Let's go to your room and get a little breathing space, alright?"

"Uh, sure. Th-thanks." I look back as we walk away and stare silently at Steven, now holding his glass, his hand trembling the whole time.

"Is Steven okay?"

Amy shakes her head. "No, sweetheart. He isn't... but it's not your fault."

We walk down several hallways and stair passages before stopping at a door. "This is my vacation room, where I stay if I ever get kicked out of my suite in the upper districts. You can live here for the immediate future." She presses her hand on a black pad sticking out of the wall, then gestures for me to do so. "I have to register your biometric data. Once you're registered, you can come and go as you please."

I follow her directions and place my hand on the pad. A light illuminates my hand, and I can't help but giggle. "It... it tickles!"

A few seconds later, she lifts my hand off, and the door opens, sliding to the side, into the wall. "This room is nothing special, but it has plenty of nutrition bars, and a bed, and even a viewscreen if you want to watch something to pass the time."

We walk inside, and I slowly sit down on a soft, comfy-looking chair. "Is there anything else to eat other than the nutrition bars?"

"No, sorry."

"Oh. That's a shame. Yama always had regular food, even though slaves weren't allowed to eat it. Why do humans not have any?"

Amy's eyes widen in surprise. " Really? Yama possessed human food? How did he acquire it?"

"I don't know."

"That's fine." She looks out the window to the world beyond.

I shuffle my feet slightly and glance over at her. "Can I talk to Master?"

"Huh?" She shakes her head and clears a fog from her brain. "You mean Jason Hiro? Not just yet. Listen, you don't know the full story about him. Before you go rushing back to his side, perhaps you should hear our side of the story. From my perspective, Jason is an evil man. Even his son hates him. After you hear what I have to say, you can leave then, okay?"

"Okay." I pull my legs up in the chair and rest my head on my knees. "What else happened on Goldesh? You said you started to lead a rebellion..."

Amy swallows painfully, and her gaze sweeps over the mostly-empty room. "Yeah. We put our plan into motion just a few months later..."

Part 418b: The Inquisition

"I met Steven Feldmann during a lunch-hall meeting. I walked in to get myself a nutrition bar, and to my surprise, the Supreme Commander's son was standing with a group of miners, listening respectfully to their complaints. I'll spare you the boring details, but after I walked over and talked to him, I could tell instantly he had the same misgivings that I did about Goldesh IV's political situation. The whole mining facility was wrong, just wrong. It was modern day slavery."

Amy leans back on the bed and uses her hands to prop herself up. I take the time to crawl onto the bed and lay back with my head on a pillow. Compared to the cramped bed-space on her ship, this bed is astoundingly comfortable. I haven't had a chance to sleep on something this comfortable since Marie allowed me in her room, and before then, never.

"Slavery, huh? That sure sounds awful." I keep my tone neutral and sigh inwardly. I don't know what mining was like on Goldesh IV, but the demons made slave girls dig holes in the walls on many occasions, and the punishment for slacking was always swift and brutal. The mining colony sounds like heaven compared to how I grew up.

"Oh... it was terrible. The miners were living in something not far from Hell itself. The surface of Goldesh IV was a scorching desert during the day and a frozen wasteland at night. The tents they were supposed to sleep in were poorly insulated, so most miners would go and huddle up in the mines where it was a more moderate temperature. A few people suffered health complications due to the poor medical treatment available at the facility and the toxins in the air, particularly deeper in the mines."

"That sounds... terrible." I don't know why, but I suddenly feel irritated hearing about 'Goldesh this' and 'Goldesh that'. "Can I ask, Amy, what Goldesh has to do with me?"

Her sad expression turns into one of confusion. "As I told you before, you have Goldeshian blood in your veins. What happened on Goldesh probably directly led to your life in the Labyrinth."

"If you tell me everything you know about Goldesh, will it bring my mother back?"

My question instantly strikes a nerve. Amy pauses, and a pained expression crosses over her face. "I... I didn't mean anything like that. Look, Lora, at some point, the events on Goldesh led to the life you're living now. I helped lead a silent revolution, with the intent of ferrying the miners to outer worlds where they wouldn't be found. At some point, Feldmann and I were compromised, and after I was forced to leave and rejoin the Golden Commandos, Steven told me that things became grim."

"How grim?"

"Very much so. Danis started cracking down on protest activity in the name of the law, and then he started sending disruptive men and women to prisons, such as the one I rescued you from on Tarus II. The thing is..." Amy stops talking for a moment and sits up straight, only to brush away her soft, blonde hair as it falls in front of her eyes. "...I tried to keep Goldesh out of sight and out of mind. Everyone thought I quelled the insurrection, but in fact, I was practically its initial conspirator. Only once I met you and learned about your life story did I realize something... and it's been haunting me for several days now. I... I may have given Danis the opportunity to imprison the female Goldeshians."

I roll over on the bed and face away from Amy. "I already know that. I realized once you started telling me the story. Don't blame yourself. Danis was an evil man."

"This is bigger than Danis. This goes all the way to the top." Amy's voice has an edge of resolve to it now. "Jason Hiro, the one you call Master... he was probably involved as well."

My face scrunches in thought. "Master wouldn't do that. I know him better than you. He's not kind or compassionate, but he hates it when women are hurt. He nearly killed Danis himself, before I did."

"Oh?" Amy lifts her voice in surprise. "Really? I was under the impression that when you murdered Danis, it caught everyone by surprise."

"No, that was when I killed Danis the second time. I killed him in the Labyrinth first, but Master cloned him and sent him back out."

Silence. After a few moments I tilt my head back to look at Amy, and she's gawking at me in response. "What? You killed Danis twice? How is that possible?"

I shake my head and look away from her again to stare at the far wall, covered in paintings and other fancy objects I can't even identify. "While Master was training me in the Labyrinth, I came across Danis. He had... he had killed two of my closest friends. Master was going to kill Danis himself, but before he could do the deed, I killed Danis myself. It was the most painful thing I've ever done in my life."

"You poor thing. I don't mean to prod, but if you killed Danis once, how could you possibly kill him again?"

"Master cloned him. He wanted Danis to go back to humanity and continue living normally."

Amy is silent for a few moments. "A cloning mechanism. This explains so much. Perhaps... perhaps the Supreme Commander has been executing political dissidents, then replacing them with clones. But, the only problem is, I always thought Jason Hiro was on the same side politically as Danis Thornum. Everything pointed to it. Was I wrong? Did he want you to kill Danis the second time?"

"No. Master is definitely angry at me. He looked so disappointed when he saw what I had done. How can I face him now?"

"Okay." Amy rustles around on the bed behind me and lays down, pressing her back to mine. "This is a lot to take in. I heard nothing of Danis's angelic form being discovered in Heaven. Could he have been executed on arrival? Does this involve the angels too?"

She pauses. "No... this could go deeper. What if the angels and demons are conspiring together to kill all of humanity off? But if Jason Hiro is pro-demon, why did he take issue with Danis? I don't understand. I'm missing so many pieces to the puzzle."

I accidentally let out a loud yawn, and it interrupts Amy's train of thought. "Oh, are you tired already?"

"Sorry. I just feel so sleepy, ever since I drank that cherry cider."

"I'm a little exhausted myself. I flew that ship for a full day straight. Let's catch some shut-eye and talk about it later, alright?"

"Okay."

"Good night, Lora."

I fidget with my fingers slightly. "When we wake up, can I speak with Master?"

"Um... we'll see. I have to ask Steven if it's alright with him."

"Oh... okay. Thank you, Amy."

* * *

Ben presses a series of buttons on the holo-table in the center of my suite, while the dog, Milkduds, watches with a hint of boredom on her face. A series of graphs and charts appear and hover over the table.

He points at one graph in particular. "The black market takes probably 10% of all wasted food, at least as far as my informant estimates. Even if you shut down the black market and redistribute the food, it won't measurably impact the whole of humanity in the slightest, and certainly not for any positive gains."

"This isn't just about food, Ben, think about psychology. Allowing this black market to exist means we're giving people a way to disrespect the government. I should use my Wordsmithing to create new energy sources that can give humanity the energy it needs. With that energy, we can power replicators, and the necessity of the black market system would vanish overnight."

Ben groans audibly and shakes his head. "You absolutely cannot use Wordsmithing in that way. Nobody aside from a few select humans, and apparently the Demon Emperors, know that you are a Wordsmith. If the Supreme Commander of humanity were revealed to have magical powers, it would be madness. We'd have riots within the hour, generals would struggle to keep the military in control, and there would be accusations that we were conspiring with the demons."

Heh. That's a funny thought, considering I somewhat am conspiring with them. Ben probably knows that though, given he's seen my memories.

"Okay, but surely there's a way I can use my Wordsmithing to benefit humanity somehow. I don't see why Marie hasn't explored every possible option to improve life for mankind."

"You're wrong. She's tried many systems. This one, as dysfunctional as it might seem to an observer like you, has had the greatest success and stability. Remember Edgar?"

"The guy we played billiards with? Yeah, I remember. What about him?"

Ben waggles his finger at me. "When we left, Edgar was on the way to working his way back up the ladder again. By making life as miserable as possible for lower class citizens, and offering a system for the talented to climb their way up a ladder to a better lifestyle, they have direct incentive to work their tails to the bone."

I raise an eyebrow. "Life at the top doesn't seem that great though. The foods almost as shitty at the top as it is at the bottom. Whether a nutrition bar is 5% real food or 35%, it's still made of shit in the end."

"Sure, if you look at the system just from the perspective of food. It's not that bad though. The air is cleaner, the suites are nicer, and bigger to boot..."

"Not everyone can be an upper-class citizen though, Ben. It's literally impossible. Under Marie's system, there will always be a swath of the population living in total poverty. That's immoral."

Ben chuckles and pets the dog to his side. "Immoral? Listen to you, the guy who murdered a little girl in cold blood. You're one to talk."

"That's not an argument. What I did was wrong, yes, but that doesn't make Marie's society worth living in."

"I didn't say it was. Jason, Marie already tested out a society where humans could have anything they wanted. It was awful, and soon exploded into chaos. If you give people everything they want, they'll just want more."

"So you keep half the population in perpetual poverty, and dangle a carrot in front of them expecting them to work hard just to get a lick of it, only for them to find out they can never have it?"

To my surprise, it's not Ben, but Mishmash who speaks up. "It doesn't matter, does it, Jason? Marie is right. By keeping the weakest, slowest, dumbest members of society at the bottom, they'll never be able to gather themselves up and fight back. Who cares if they're mad at their poverty? They can't do anything to change the system. They're powerless."

I glare at the dog. "Shut up, mutt. The fuck does a demon hound know about socio-economics anyway?"

She rolls her eyes. "More than you, apparently."

"I'll throw you off that balcony again if you press me."

"I'd welcome it at this point." She curls up in a ball at Ben's feet and pretends to ignore me. I'm not fooled though, I know that animal is trouble.

Ben coughs into his fist. "Anyway, this is all superfluous. Even if you could create an energy system with Wordsmithing, and even if humanity just went along with you being a Wordsmith, it could cause jealousy and fear among the Volgrim. Above all other things, we can't let that happen."

"Why?"

Ben shrugs. "Dunno. All I'm certain of is that Marie never, ever wanted to go to war with them. Her fear was rather irrational, for a woman as calm as she was."

"Hmm."

* * *

TEMPORAL DATE 4815.23P: INTERVIEW LOG FOR SUBJECT MARIE 12F, REGARDING THE APPEARANCE OF UNKNOWN ENTITY, HENCEFORTH DUBBED 'JASON X'. INTERVIEW CLASSIFICATION LEVEL: ALPHA BRANCH ONLY.

Subject Marie 12F is seated at interview table. Her interviewer is Temporal Adjunct Marie 7A.

Marie 7A: I've started the recording. I'm going to try and keep this interview brief, so let's get right to it. Due to special circumstances surrounding your universe, the Council has been forced to declassify several confidential files just for this debriefing, so please keep your answers short and succinct.

Marie 12F: I understand.

Marie 7A: Good. As I'm sure you're aware, Maries from Source universes ordinarily are not privy to a variety of highly classified information, specifically regarding Wordsmithing, but also including the state of other time-streams. We have hesitantly decided to temporarily lift this information embargo, but only on a need-to-know basis.

Marie 12F: Am I allowed to ask questions?

Marie 7A: If you must, but don't expect any answers.

Marie 12F: (Subject shifts in her seat.) Um, very well.

Marie 7A: Your universe is a unique one. Of all the possible ways it might have turned out, yours is the only one that has no ongoing wars. It is a veritable bastion of peace, compared to other universes.

Marie 12F: Yes, I'm very proud of my work.

Marie 7A: You are? How could you be proud unless you know the state of other universes?

Marie 12F: Well, I mean, I have heard that other universes are usually embroiled in violence. I don't know much about them, though.

Marie 7A: (Adjunct makes a note on her datapad.) If you've heard information about the other universes, who told you? Was it an informant? A mole?

Marie 12F: Ah, no. In fact, I believe I learned bits and pieces from the call-center Maries. Sometimes things just slipped out. I couldn't tell you who said it though... it was a long time ago.

Marie 7A: They just... slipped out? I see. I'll have to call for a review of this later.

Marie 12F: Am I in trouble? Have I broken any rules?

Marie 7A: That's what we're here to find out. I will not be the Marie deciding on your status, in any case, so try to remain alert.

Marie 12F: (Subject taps her fingers slowly on the table in front of her.) I'll do my best.

Marie 7A: As per my instructions regarding newly declassified information, I must inform you of disturbing developments in the multiverse. But first, a question. What do you know with regards to the operation of the multiverse?

Marie 12F: (Subject pauses to tap her lips.) Well, I have, ah, heard that there are Source Universes, and Traveler universes. Both are created by Wordsmiths.

Marie 7A: Yes. Go on.

Marie 12F: Ninety-nine percent of universes are Traveler universes, but Source universes are extremely rare.

Marie 7A: Ah, that percentage was official at one point, but it's outdated now. It's actually 99.9996% of all universes that are Traveler created.

Marie 12F: I see. Sorry, but I don't follow the point you're making. This seems rather semantic...

Marie 7A: To you, it might appear that way. There has been a disturbing increase in the number of universes that are part of the multiverse. In the past, we would see a few new universes form every so often, so keeping track of the new variants wasn't too tedious. Every new universe generally held a Marie we could initiate contact with, and so we could use her to find out the state of affairs.

Marie 12F: And that changed?

Marie 7A: Very much so. More importantly, the universes being created have no Maries for us to contact. Several thousand years ago, over a million universes appeared in a single week's time. You were not told this, of course, because you are a Source Marie. There was a huge panic over what caused this rapid expansion, and while it didn't maintain the speed of expansion for long, since then the rate of expansion has increased tenfold over what it was before the incident.

Marie 12F: So instead of a few universes every now and then...

Marie 7A: One new universe develops every single day now, at the minimum. All of them lack Maries, and none of them have a visible Jason present anywhere.

Marie 12F: If I may ask, do you have a working theory over what's causing this?

Marie 7A: Of course. Believe it or not, the current theory is that all these new universes are obfuscation, that is, background noise just to distract us. It's reasonable to assume that a rogue Jason is running loose, creating new universes, and then leaving afterward. Somewhere within these universes, there may be a plot being hatched to destroy the Temporal Council.

Marie 12F: (Subject pauses for 14.5 seconds before responding.) I see why you're in a small panic over this, but I don't see what it has to do with me, or why I'm being questioned right now.

Marie 7A: That's understandable. We've been reviewing the memory files for Jason X, the new arrival in your universe, and we've found disturbing information. It calls into question the very nature of your universe.

Marie 12F: (Subject stiffens in her seat and a look of alarm visibly passes over her face.) Are... are you saying I have something to do with this? I assure you, I've given you everything I have to offer! I followed the proper protocols!

Marie 7A: Calm down, this isn't about you. We have several key things noted in your personality file, notably one of them is a statement that you 'Keep Jason 12F on a leash like a loyal dog', is that correct?

Marie 12F: Well, yes, I may have made that statement at some point in the-

Marie 7A: You've also stated on many occasions that you have firm control over your Source universe. Is that also correct?

Marie 12F: I believe so... yes.

Marie 7A: Are you familiar with Wordsmithed clones?

Marie 12F: Huh? What's this change of topic about?

Marie 7A: I assure you, it is relevant. Have you become aware of the concept of a Wordsmith cloning himself or someone else?

Marie 12F: I've never seen it happen, but of course I have theories that it could work.

Marie 7A: So you unilaterally deny ever ordering Jason 12F to clone himself?

Marie 12F: Of course. Controlling one wordsmith is hard enough, and I wouldn't do something like that unless I had permission from the Temporal Council.

Marie 7A: And you've never taken steps to clone Jason 12F yourself, using any form of technology, or any biological augmentation?

Marie 12F: (Subject rubs her hands together and avoids eye contact with the Adjunct for a few moments.) No. Well, not Jason, anyway. As I said, I'd never do something so dangerous with a Wordsmith. However, for the, err, the wife that I introduced him to... Sarah Gonzales... well, there was some genetic manipulation involved there.

Marie 7A: Go on.

Marie 12F: I synthesized a serum taken from several demonic succubi, and after wiping Sarah's memory, programmed her to be the perfect woman. Once she was injected with the serum, she was the ultimate distraction for him. Of course, he never knew this, and over time I was able to use her in other ways, but I do admit to genetic modification. Just, not with Jason Hiro.

Marie 7A: Sarah Gonzales... that name is oddly familiar. (Adjunct stops the interrogation for a full minute to review notes on her datapad.) Curious, she's listed several times as a potential lover for Jason Hiro, in many universes, but the information is strictly forbidden from a Source universe. How did you conclude that she was the ideal female for your pet project?

Marie 12F: What if I told you it was a lucky guess?

Marie 7A: Don't mock me. This is not a joke; the multiverse itself is at stake.

Marie 12F: Fine, fine. Gods, I got the information from a colleague at the Temporal Council. I was hoping Jason might have a person he shared a bond with across several universes. I thought it might help with my research, and it did!

Marie 7A: Which Marie gave you this information?

Marie 12F: What are you going to do to her if I tell you?

Marie 7A: Do you honestly care for her well-being?

Marie 12F: Not really. Just curious, I suppose. She's Marie 114G.

Marie 7A: Noted. This is a breach of security, but we'll worry about that later. Anything you'd like to admit to before we continue?

Marie 12F: Not that I know of.

Marie 7A: Let's get back to clones. Via Wordsmithing, Jason can make clones of himself. Clones, however, start off as mindless beings, and only if you order them to be sentient will they gain the ability to move of their own accord. However, as noted in a few historical records, clones are sentient even before being allowed free-movement. They frequently become hostile once freed, with rare exception.

Marie 12F: Okay...

Marie 7A: As you've said before, you reviewed the memory footage taken from Jason X. However, it would seem you didn't examine much of it in detail.

Marie 12F: No, unfortunately. I only had a few hours before Jason X arrived in his office. I was also busy finding out from my resurrected colleague, Benjamin Brown, that he had just betrayed me. It was a turbulent time.

Marie 7A: Of course. Well, we've spent the last several days poring over every second of his memory, and here is where I have to be very serious. We suspect there is another Wordsmith in your universe, one other than Jason X and Jason 12F.

Marie 12F: You do? I can see how your questioning would lead up to that, but haven't I proven that can't be the case?

Marie 7A: It would seem so, but this has only made our conclusions murkier. In Jason X's memories, he conducted a few key conversations with Yama, the Second Emperor of Hell, and the content of those conversations was quite disturbing. Yama spoke, specifically, about an 'army of wordsmiths' that Jason would have to face if the humans found him. Don't you find that odd?

Marie 12F: That's weirdly specific of him to say, sure, but Yama is an observed liar. He broke peace treaties on many occasions, including thousands of years ago when he threatened to engulf a planet in my system with his darkness. I even came across him saying that I put bombs inside the brains of human scientists, though it had honestly never occurred to me. Not a bad idea, though.

Marie 7A: A liar, yes, that is true. However, every lie usually has a grain of truth in it. Yama not only spoke of an army of cloned wordsmiths, but he knew intimate details of how wordsmithing functions. Furthermore, Yama sent Beelzebub to teach Jason X how wordsmithing worked. Given that Bael was also at the table, it's likely that all the Demon Emperors know this information.

Marie 12F: I see. So in the end, someone is feeding them information about Wordsmithing. However, Yama can listen to conversations wherever there is darkness. This is why I keep all discussions of a sensitive nature limited to rooms flooded with anti-energy. Perhaps, just by observing Jason 12F, he was able to learn of Wordsmithing's intricacies. Though, I did tell Jason to never Wordsmith unless necessary.

Marie 7A: Yama's knowledge extended well beyond anything Jason 12F might know. Once again, I ask you, did you ever give information to Jason 12F that might indicate he could clone himself or others via Wordsmithing?

Marie 12F: (Subject appears visibly stressed.) Of course not! I didn't even know for sure it was a possibility until you told me a few minutes ago! God damn, I need a cigarette. This is stressful.

Marie 7A: I apologize, but we don't offer any illegal drugs on this station.

Marie 12F: Illegal drugs? You're a Marie! We all love cig-

Marie 7A: Let's move on. The final piece of this puzzle was confirmed by an agent we sent to your universe yesterday. She successfully recovered a sample of material from Danis Thornum's corpse. We are, of course, referring to the Danis Thornum who was murdered by Jason X's servant girl, 'Lora'. Based on material recovered from his corpse, biological markers saved in your databases from his recent physical checkup, and memories taken from Jason X's mind... we have confirmed that Jason X cloned Danis Thornum.

Marie 12F: Cloned him? What do you mean?

Marie 7A: The girl that followed Jason X around, the slave he recovered from Yama's domain, murdered Danis when he went into the Labyrinth for vulgar purposes. Jason cloned Danis, and then sent Danis to be a spy among humanity. Based on Jason X's memory of the second time this Lora girl killed Danis, her murder of Danis was an unintended event.

Marie 12F: So... you're saying... Danis was already dead? I mean, that day, he did appear to be slower than usual. I didn't think much of it, but now that you mention it...

Marie 7A: There's more. Yama never told Jason X the specifics of how cloning would work, yet Jason seemed to understand the process on an innate level, according to his memory files. He knew that he had to order Danis to become sentient. The implications are quite serious.

Marie 12F: Let me see if I understand. Jason X is a Source Jason, or at least we suppose he is, but he possesses knowledge that even I don't... Yama knows details of Wordsmithing that he absolutely shouldn't, and you suspect that Jason 12F or I am somehow to blame?

Marie 7A: Given the short amount of time we've put into this case, we have many possible theories. I won't go over them all. A working theory though is that somehow, Jason 12F learned of other universes, created the clone currently known as Jason X, and then Jason 12F erased his own memory of the cloning process. If that were true, even your memory manipulation machine wouldn't find the memories.

Marie 12F: (Subject crosses her arms and leans back in her chair.)...I'm sorry, but that's a stupid theory. Trust me, I know Jason 12F very well. He wouldn't do something like that.

Marie 7A: So you say. In any case, we have enough information to continue our investigation. You've been a big help, Marie 12F.

Marie 12F: Am I free to go?

Marie 7A: Technically yes, but you can't return to your universe just yet. The final reason we've brought you here is to reiterate, one more time, the grave danger that Jason X represents, not just to your little universe, but the multiverse as a whole. A Wordsmith is already a temporal threat by himself, but if he should take control and initiate a war against the Volgrim, they could unleash their ultimate weapon a third time. The Temporal Council cannot overstate the importance that this Jason's mysteries be unveiled, and soon.

Marie 12F: I know you won't answer my question, but I have to try. What is the Volgrim secret weapon that you're so worried about?

Marie 7A: I don't even know myself. Only the highest level Maries are allowed to know, along with Jason Alpha. Take care, Marie 12F, and you should learn to keep that curiosity in check.

Marie 12F: Is that possible? We are Maries, after all.

Marie 7A: Very true.

Part 419b: Kolvaxian

"To my loyal followers, humanity's hard working citizens, and the brave soldiers of the United Earth Federation's military... I thank you all for watching this broadcast today. As you all know by now, one month ago I began a series of revisions to the way we live, to bring greater peace and prosperity to our mighty empire! Indeed, we are unstoppable; a force none can oppose! The demons have been reduced to little more than a nuisance, and the Volgrim eye us warily."

I clear my throat and smile at the broadcasting equipment. All it reminds me of is a small black dimple on the wall, but from what I've seen of the recording quality, the image is quite stunning. My words are being broadcast live to every citizen of humanity's empire who wishes to watch. Viewscreens everywhere transmit my face and words to hundreds of trillions of people all at once. Fighting demons is one thing, but public speaking is my Kryptonite.

"Despite the vast resources and overwhelming power of our empire, I have heard the murmuring and the wailing of my people! The food is bitter, energy is scarce, and many are unhappy. I understand. One month ago, I took a long, hard look at what humanity is capable of. With help from our greatest minds, I have undertaken the most magnificent project our civilization will ever see. My goal is simple: I wish to make life better for ALL citizens."

I quickly glance at my datapad and make sure I've got my notes in order.

"First on my itinerary is food. I'll be blunt. The food we consume is awful! Terrible! Nutrition bars recycled from our filth! Of course, every citizen is familiar with humanity's creed: For glory, we aspire. Perfection, we achieve. Waste, we prevent. Failure, we despise. This motto has shaped the path that humanity has taken for millions of years, and it shall continue to do so! However, I believe most would be hard pressed to justify it as an unbreakable rule in every context. Therefore! The first thing I have begun to do is create a new terraforming project. Behold! Planet Kaplis, in the Rygarian system! The second of three planets, Kaplis will complement the animal reservations of Rygar and become a world we can grow far more food on for humanity!"

Kaplis is going to be a planet where we do nothing but grow food en-masse. We won't even need animals to live there, nor bugs, bees, or anything else. Apparently, nanobots and bio-engineering can speed the processes up to a hundred-fold, yielding corn and other plants in a fraction as much time as it would have taken in the era I came from.

The future is truly a place of wonder.

"But food is just one issue I have heard the citizenry criticize. Energy is scarce, and my fellow humans have to slave away just to get enough for themselves. However, we have begun not one, but TWO major Dyson sphere projects that should be completed within the next ten years. These spheres will boost humanity's energy production dramatically! No more haggling for items with a few meager energy credits! No more spending thousands of credits just for a chance to enter Heaven!"

I shoot a glance over at Ben. He's sitting in a chair offscreen, shaking his head. Of course, he doesn't like my last proclamation in the slightest, but I've already spoken to the archangel Gabriel. With his permission, I know it's going to succeed.

"We have lost many loved ones. Even I am not immune to this loss. However, being the Supreme Commander has always had one perk, which is the ability to visit Heaven whenever I please. But why should only an elite few hold this privilege? Surely, anyone who wishes to see a loved one should not be held back by lack of energy credits! With help from my best ambassadors, I have created a new immigration treaty between human and angelkind! Starting immediately, anyone will be able to visit Heaven as they please, and angels will be able to visit human-owned planets as they wish. Truly, we are blessed to live in a time of such abundance!"

I have to hold myself back from chuckling. The solutions to humanity's problems were so easy. Marie was the supposed inventor of all humanity's systems, and she guided legislation along with her pet, Jason 12F, but the society she created is grossly unpleasant. The food is terrible, the energy scarce, and aside from immortality and a second chance at living if one should die, it has more drawbacks than upsides compared to the time I came from.

Honestly, living in this empire is more of an eternal curse than anything resembling a utopia. It's high time someone took advantage of advancements in technology to improve life for all.

"Everything is going to change, citizens. I assure you, from this day forward, humanity will begin marching toward a new dawn."

* * *

Oh god... he's dead... I killed him! I mean, I was supposed to kill him. This is fine; he was evil! He supported demons, just like Danis did!

I feel weak in my legs. For a moment I almost want to vomit, but I hold the feeling down and lean against a wall to support myself. DNA. Amy said I couldn't leave DNA behind. I snapped his neck cleanly, just like she told me to, so there's no blood and he didn't even fight back.

He didn't even fight back?! I don't feel right about this. Danis killed my friend, and the guards at the prison were trying to kill me! I had to kill them first, right? Self-defense. Isn't that what I'm supposed to do? What would Master say? Is killing someone who wasn't trying to hurt me okay? Doesn't killing someone who doesn't fight back make me the bad guy? Oh lord... I need to get out of here.

Right! Snap out of it, Lora! Use your head!

I quickly turn back to the window I left open when I entered his suite. The senator lived really high up, but the invisibility belt Steven gave me and the climbing gear made scaling this tower easy. I'm just... not looking forward to climbing 3,000 stories back down. There aren't any cameras on the outside of the building, but all the hallways inside are monitored. If I walk out the door, even invisible, I'm sure to be spotted by something.

Quickly I hop over to the window but pause and glance at a wall to my right. There's a video playing on the viewscreen, and I instantly recognize the person on the screen. It's Master!

"...we are unstoppable; a force none can oppose." Master's voice is like music to my ears! I haven't seen him in a whole month, but I have to see him soon. He looks the same as when I last talked to him... is he still angry at me? Is he even looking for me anymore?

Maybe I angered him, after all. He might never forgive me. Steven and Amy say that he's working with the demons, just like Danis. If he's working with demons, is that why Yama liked him so much? But then, why was Master ready to kill Danis? Were they enemies? If they were enemies, why did Master make a clone of Danis?

My head hurts!! Everything is so confusing. I have to see him, I have to! But not right now. I have a job to do. I have to kill the bad people, and I have to escape safely.

Quickly, I hop out the window, and my hands stick to the outer walls. The wind howls past me and looking down makes my stomach flip-flop. I can't see the ground below, only a murky image of brown clouds through the air-mask Amy gave me to wear. It's pressed so closely to my face, but somehow it makes the sheer drop seem less terrifying.

I'm still scared of heights though.

I pull the window back into place behind me, shuffle over to the right a bit, and quickly start climbing down, one foot and hand after the other.

This is going to take forever!

* * *

The video feed cuts off, and I breathe a long sigh of relief. Despite calming myself with Wordsmithing, it only provided me an artificial method of denying my anxiety. The moment I 'normalize' myself, I'll probably turn into a shaky mess.

Ben walks over to me and grunts, a hint of disapproval in his voice. "Great speech."

"You don't really think that, do you?"

A chuckle. "No no, the speech was great. You delivered it like a well-trained hovercar salesman. My problem is with the contents, not the delivery."

I roll my eyes and summon a can of grape soda in front of me, checking to make sure nobody's watching first. "Come off it, Ben. I know you love Marie and the way she does things, but didn't you ever think that just maybe the life of regular humans could be improved?"

"Of course I did. I'm the one who showed you the lower levels, after all. I just think you're taking it too far, too fast."

The grape soda pours down my throat and leaves a refreshing tingling feeling behind. I stifle a burp and grin sheepishly. "Too fast, huh? What, you think the politicians have the guts to stand up to me? I dare them to try."

"You sound a little resentful." Ben offers a less than neutral opinion.

I shrug. "Maybe I'm still pissed. I might be new to this society, but I see how the politicians rig the game in their favor. I didn't like politicians back before I froze myself, and I don't like them now. Things need to change."

Ben nods and glances down at the datapad in his hands. "I understand that. I just think that if you change too many things all at once, you're going to incur resentment from many of the-huh?"

"What?" I stop just before drinking another gulp of soda. "Did something happen?"

"Uh. Yes." Ben focuses intently for a few seconds on the pad in his hand. "I can't believe this. The crime and justice division received an anonymous tip-off shortly after your broadcast concluded. Someone killed Lawrence Phesbin. They snapped his goddamn neck."

"Who?"

Ben shakes a dazed look from his face. "Lawrence was the vice president of the Corvallis Sector. He was a fairly popular anti-war politician, known for advocating peace with demonkind. In fact, he was essentially second in command for maintaining development of three separate star systems. A very prestigious job, even among upper-class citizens."

"Yeah. He sounds really important." I swish the soda around in the can. It's already half-gone. "So who killed him?"

"Well, we have to perform an investigation first. You should be aware... murder has been almost entirely eliminated. Humans don't kill their own kind."

"Not that you know of." I make a point to correct him. "Still, maybe it wasn't a human. Why not a demon?"

Ben immediately gives me a sardonic look. "Lawrence was a pro-demon politician and was known for advocating peace with them. I highly doubt a demon would do this."

Ben's instant disbelief makes me question if he isn't being conservative. "Have you ever spent time with the demons?"

"No."

"Demons are odd, really odd. Maybe this Lawrence guy learned something he shouldn't have. I could see Yama knocking him off. The only suspect thing is the neck-snapping part. I feel like a demon would use magic or something, not their bare hands."

"Yeah, possibly. This is a small crisis, but it's not that bad. We'll just wait for more information." Ben sighs and quickly tucks the datapad back in his pocket. "I just can't believe it. Either a human killed another human, which is unthinkable, or a demon turned against a pro-demon politician."

"If he was pro-demon, what do you think the odds were he was visiting Yama's domain to pass the time?"

My question makes Ben's face contort in disgust. "I should hope not. I still have many people I'd like to respect, you know."

"I wonder. I know Yama, and I couldn't see him inviting humans to his lair for the secret thrills ordinary human society can't give them... not without demanding they pay the price. Yama has spies among the humans. He's something else." My hand falls and rests on Blaarjiim's orb, still invisible and tucked at my side. Nobody knows about him yet, and I've managed to keep him a secret from Ben. I'm beginning to wonder if the orb isn't also a way for Yama to keep tabs on me. Very clever, if that's the case.

Ben stands up and walks over to the door, brushing the dust off his shoulderpad in the process. "I need to go. I'll let you know if anything else comes up. But I'm warning you, Jason... I think you're moving too fast with the reformation acts. It's going to bite you in the ass."

"Yeah yeah, you've said that enough times." I watch him shuffle over to the door, and a question sprouts in my mind. Why the sudden rush?

"See you later." Ben nods and walks through the door, leaving me alone with just my thoughts.

I wonder if it was Yama who killed that vice-president guy... or someone else. If I weren't so busy, I'd go have a look myself.

Well, back to work I go. At least I've got Sarah waiting at home tonight. That'll make this crappy day all better again.

* * *

"Squad Leader Hiro, no biological contaminants in my sector." Rika's demure voice comes over loud and clear in my earpiece. "Moving two clicks to the north-east."

"I'm still looking. Keep your eyes peeled, and don't leave the group for any solo adventures." I grunt the words out and can almost hear her straining to understand my words. This jungle hurts me, deep in my chest. It's not so much toxins in the air as it is a strange, dark energy pervading the air.

My other squad sub-commander confirms his position next. "Northwest is also clear, Squad Leader. No Kolvaxians to be seen."

"That's just the way they want you thinking, Ricky. You and Milo keep your backs to each other. This jungle makes my head woozy."

I stumble slightly, and my foot jams down into a five-inch thick puddle of brown glop. I'd call it mud, but it's thick like a parfait. I have to use my magical flight to pull myself out of it and back onto solid ground. The foliage around me is so thick I could hack it to bits with a white hot Vibro-sword, and more vines would just roll down from the canopy above.

The trees of Morius aren't like the trees from Earth, my home planet. I haven't seen Earth since the Kolvaxians devoured it, ten million years ago. They're a violent species, something like a mixture of plant and human, and created from god-knows-what-hell somewhere deep in space. Marie thinks they're interesting. My universe is the only one that has these freaks, but we don't know how they appeared. Having cut down far too many in combat, I know only one thing for sure: they aren't entirely alien. Marie believes they're descended from Volgrim genetic trials. That might be the case, except the Kolvaxians haven't shown up in any universe but this one.

Makes a person think, eh?

Rika whispers something, and I don't quite catch it. "What was that? Come in, Red Squad?"

She clears her throat. "Sorry, Squad Leader. I was just thinking out loud. When do we get our next vacation?"

Ricky chuckles over the mic. "Nice, Rika. Way to get your head in the game."

"Ricky's right. this isn't the time for asking about vacations." I chide her gently, though I haven't been able to spend much time with her either. All we do these days is chase leads from one assimilated planet to the next. "I'll put in a request though if you need some time off."

I smile in spite of this grim situation and wait for her response. Nothing happens. "Ehh, Rika? Did you copy that?"

Silence. A few seconds pass and my blood chills. "Ricky, you still there?"

"Y-yeah, Squad Leader." Ricky's voice is tense. "Loren? Rika? Do you two copy your Squad Leader, over?"

My breath comes in raspy gulps. "Son of a bitch. Teleport. "

I arrive at their last known location and quickly let out a sonic pulse around my body, in case there's an ambush lying in wait. Nothing happens.

"Daughters of the devil." I curse at myself for not paying closer attention. In the mud at my feet, two bloody helmets lie, covered in what I can only describe to myself as 'brain matter'. "Ricky, jump to me. We have-" I pause to catch my breath and not let myself sound choked up. "-we have hits in the north-east. They got Rika and Loren."

Ricky and Jeremiah pop over next to me in the blink of an eye. I can't see their faces inside the tinted glass of their containment suits, but their posture tells me they already get the picture.

"Boss... can't you locate them?"

Ricky's question makes my chest sting. "No, son. This forest has plenty of interference. My telepathy was locked on them the whole time, but I didn't even notice them gone until I got here. They're dead."

"You have to try!" Ricky grabs my shoulder, but I bat his hand away.

" Locate. " Seconds pass, no hits. "There. I tried."

Even with the containment suit on, I can see his hands shaking. "K... Kolvaxian... scum." The words are squeezed out through gritted teeth.

"Remember that anger. Keep on the alert. The fuckers are around here somewhere. Let's pay them back ten times over!" I float in the air several feet above the ground and aim my mind all around me. " Expansion! "

A wave of energy surges outward, blasting the foliage and tree cover away. My suit lights up with an alert. "Bogeys spotted! Position 141.3!"

I barely even have time to process them. A flash of ugly deep green skin, boils and pus all over their bodies, and those eerie, unseeing eyes. Kolvaxian, for sure.

The four-armed mutant sucks down into the ground and vanishes from sight. "They're compatible with the floor cover! Go to flight mode!"

My final two squaddies jump up into the air and their suit thrusters ignite, keeping them aloft. Just in time too, as the green plant-monster hybrid pops out of the ground where they had just been standing. They don't have emotions, but based on its movements, I'd almost say it's confused.

"You like the taste of human, eh?! Have a lick of this!" I smash down, using my telekinesis to hurl myself at the ground with surprising force. I crash into the Kolvaxian with my whole body, splattering it all over the place in a single instant. " Contain! " I lash out and grab the central 'heart', a pulsing rock that is the life-force of these monsters, and jam it into a containment bubble for safekeeping.

"Good work, Squad Leader." Jeremiah's words of praise ring hollow. There's no soul to what he's saying. He and Ricky lower down, landing on the ground behind me. Staying aloft for so long is bound to make them run their fuel out quickly. "You got him."

"Yeah, I did. It's not good enough though, is it?"

"Don't... don't blame yourself, Jason. Rika wouldn't want that. Neither would Loren." Ricky tries to pat me on the back, but I pull away.

"It happened so fast. I knew I shouldn't have split the five of us up."

I turn around, the heart of the Kolvaxian hovering in the air before me, and realize Ricky and Jeremiah's heads are both bowed slightly.

"We all share this sin. Let's go, Jason. We can't mope around forever."

"Yeah." The three of us walk the way we came, and I glance back uneasily. "Where there's one Kolvaxian, there's more. They have two more hosts now, too."

Even as I say this, the inside of my helmet lights up. A call is being broadcast to me. I know who it is even before I see their face.

"Jason 10K. What are you doing right now?"

"What's your identifier?"

I'm kind of annoyed she didn't open with her identifier. That's common protocol, makes these conversations a whole lot less messy. My day's already bad enough now... she doesn't need to make it worse.

"Don't you recognize me? I'm Marie 7A." Her stupid fake cheerful smile makes me want to punch her fucking face.

"Oh, sorry, I just had two close friends die, Marie. What bullshit do you want to pull me away for now? I've got the Kolvaxians pinned down on Morius-"

"Forget the Kolvaxians. You have bigger things to worry about." Marie cuts me off mid-sentence without a care in the world. "Sorry about your friend, but this concerns the integrity of the multiverse itself. We're recalling all Kilo branch and higher Jasons to a meeting regarding recent findings we've made."

"Oh, great. I just barely made the cut. I couldn't be happier." I try not to let too much disgust seep into my voice, but she ignores my feeble protests anyway.

"Get here in the next five hours. That's an order from the Alpha branch. Marie 7A out."

Her face disappears, and I couldn't be happier she's gone.

"Fucking bitch. I have a funeral to attend."

I suddenly realize the other two are looking at me. "You okay, Jason?" Ricky's voice has a tinge of worry in it. "You've been standing there for a solid minute, saying nothing."

"Sorry, Ricky. After we make our peace with Rika and Loren... I need to go on a trip."

He nods slowly and turns away. "Rika would want that. You deserve the vacation."

No, he's wrong. I don't deserve anything.

Part 420b: (◀▶~◀▶)

My footsteps echo down the tiled halls as I walk toward the dining room. When I open the door, I smile politely at all the familiar faces. I've been living among these people for a month now, and while I don't know much about them other than their names, they seem pleasant enough. Two girls sitting at the bar spot me and wave at me. Hi Lora! I see their mouths move, but the music playing over to the right by the live jazz band makes it hard to hear them say the words.

I can't return the smile. I haven't gotten over what I did. I killed a man, one who didn't fight back. Even if he had, it wasn't a fair fight. He didn't have a weapon, and he didn't know how to fight. How could I do that? What's wrong with me? Killing someone to protect my friends, and killing another to protect myself, those are very different things compared to killing someone just because Mr. Feldmann told me to. I have to speak to him. I can't kill anyone else. It's wrong!

I quickly turn away from the two at the bar and sweep my gaze across the room. My trained eyes spot him sitting in a corner, just barely visible behind a short wall. He's talking to a young woman, possibly my age, wearing a professional-looking white shirt and black skirt. I haven't seen her before, but the look on his face tells me it's a professional meeting. I can barely tell from the back of her head, but she keeps reaching up to brush hair out of her eyes. It looks like she's angling to get something from him, but I don't know what.

I walk toward them slowly, my enhanced hearing carefully tuning into their conversation as the jazz band fades away behind me.

"-what I said! I've been keeping an eye on him as you instructed, but so far he's just doing normal things. He never deviates from his daily schedule." She bows her head as her voice is tinged with an apologetic tone, and Steven smiles pleasantly at her.

"Right. Well, I am sorry to keep hounding you like this, Stephanie. I know you're doing your best, just as I trained you, but I need results. He wouldn't fire you for no reason, understand?"

The girl, apparently named 'Stephanie,' wipes at her eye. "It's just so frustrating. I keep flashing back in my mind to what he said. He called me untrustworthy! He must have known. It couldn't be a coincidence."

I keep walking, and soon I'm only ten feet away. Steven notices me out of the corner of his eye. "Lora! You're back! I'm just having a chat here with a colleague of mine." He smiles at her again, but I feel like there's a hint of something else in his eye. "Stephanie, this is Lora, the studious young woman I was telling you about."

She turns back to me, and I finally get a look at her face, having looked at the back of her head the whole way here. The best way I'd describe her face is... plain. It doesn't stand out and looks like the faces of many slave girls I've known. I'd have trouble picking her out of a crowd. "So you must be Lora, hmm? We're here under similar circumstances. I lost my job, and Steven helped me out when my luck was down. Just like he did with you!" She stands up from the chair and turns back to Steven. "Anyway, I imagine you need to talk to your agent over here, so I'll be heading out. Call me later?"

"Of course. Have a pleasant day, Steph." Steven nods, and she brushes past me and walks away.

I, on the other hand, can barely even care about whatever they were talking about. Steven's expectant stare makes my stomach flip-flop. I feel queasy just looking at him.

"Is the deed done? Did you hit the mark?" Steven's smile is replaced with a more casual stare, almost of disinterest.

"Um... y-yes... I killed him. He's dead. I... I didn't leave any DNA." I stutter and feel even more embarrassed, so I quickly plop down where Stephanie had been sitting and rest my hands on my knees, grimacing when I feel them trembling. "He didn't fight back. He- he couldn't manage even a feeble resistance. It was quick. I hope it was painless."

Steven stares at me for a few seconds, and his expression becomes more serious. My heart quickens, and I have to look away from him. Water. I need water.

"You don't look so stable. Are you okay, Lora? Do you feel guilty about killing him?" Steven's soft voice makes me blush. I shake my head quickly, but he continues anyway. "You did the right thing. He was working with the demons. Just like Danis."

"Bar... bartender. Water, please. Water." I grit my teeth and tap the counter nervously. Steven is still staring at me, and it's making me feel uncomfortable. "It's not okay, Mr. Feldmann. I'm not okay. I killed an innocent m-man."

Before I realize it, he leans forward and touches my arm. "Hey... hey, you look disturbed about this. If I'd known you didn't want to do it, I wouldn't have asked, okay? I shouldn't have told you to kill him. I'm sorry." He pulls back and finally turns his gaze away. "I just... I thought that if you had already killed a hundred men, plus the warden, plus Danis, and twice for him... I thought you were a steadfast person. But now I see I was selfish."

The bartender sets the glass of water down, and I grab and gulp it as quick as I can, only to accidentally choke. It takes a few seconds, but I manage to cough and get my bearings.

Steven's disappointed. Of course he is! I've already killed a hundred people. It's like he said, and now I'm getting wishy-washy over... over one demon collaborator?!

But even if I think like that, it doesn't make me feel any better. "I'm sorry, Mr. Feldmann. I can't kill people anymore. I took his life, and I didn't even know him! It... it wasn't fair. He couldn't even fight back, and now he'll never see his family again. He's gone... forever."

"Huh?" Steven suddenly exhales loudly. "Ahh, so that's what it was. You- I haven't told you about angels yet, have I?"

I'm so confused. What's he talking about now? I turn to look at him, and the serious look is gone, replaced by a faint smile. "Mr. Feldmann? What do angels have to do with anything?"

He scratches his facial stubble. "I'm surprised you don't know. You pray every morning, right? Don't you know why humans are mandated to pray?"

A moment later, I remember what Marie told me when I stayed with her a month ago. "We have to pray because if we die, we'll be reborn as angels."

"Uh huh..." Steven's smile grows a little wider. "And, therefore, if every human is praying, and you kill a person, then what happens?"

"He's... he's not dead?"

"Exactly." The smile vanishes as quickly as it came. "I didn't tell you this, Lora, because I thought you already knew. When you killed Lawrence, he died and became an angel. Humans who are reborn as angels are never allowed to work in government or ever be a member of human society ever again. It might seem cruel, but you've cut off his influence from our government. Now his pro-demon sentiment will stop infecting our civilization."

Steven leans forward and raises an eyebrow. "Honestly, you did that man a favor. By becoming an angel, he is now living among all his family members who have ever died, and he no longer has to work all the time. He doesn't have to eat the awful nutrition bars or do all those annoying things humans hate doing anyway. You improved his life. I'm sure he'd thank you if he could."

My hands finally stop shaking, and the pit in my stomach eases up. "Is that the truth? I improved his life?"

Steven reaches for a drink at the counter, probably something alcoholic, as he prefers. "Indeed. Heck, he has a nice pair of wings now, and he can fly around at his leisure. I'm a little envious."

"Wow. I never realized..." I lean back in my chair against the short wall dividing Steven's private section of the dining room from the rest of the people here and breathe a little easier. "If being an angel is so wonderful, why doesn't everyone become an angel?"

Steven shakes his head and sighs. "You know, Lora... life isn't always a simple question of 'why' or 'why not.' The government, led by my father, keeps certain information from the vast majority of the citizenry. He also feeds false information to them as well. For example, most people, in particular among the lower levels, don't know that angels have no requirement to eat food. We do say that angels can never enjoy the taste of food, but it's a half-truth at best."

He continues. "We keep a lot of things from them. We have to. That's just the way it is. If all of humanity realized how much better it would be to live life as an angel, what do you suppose would happen?"

"They'd kill themselves?"

"Exactly. The angels need humans to pray because angels will die without our thought energy. If the human population declines significantly, the angels won't have enough energy to go around. A lot of them would die, and that would defeat the purpose of the contract we signed. It's not good for us, and bad for them."

A silly question comes to mind. "Even if the lower-class people don't know, you do. You could kill yourself and become an angel. Why don't you?"

He shakes his head immediately and looks me square in the eyes. "There aren't a lot of good people out there, Lora. What do you think would happen if I died? This building, the people in it," He waves his hand around to emphasize. "they'd stop functioning. There would be no active resistance to the pro-demon factions that, thanks to you, I now know run our government. I can't drop out like that. I can't just take the easy way out."

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean anything by it."

Steven continues to stare at me for a few seconds before turning back to his alcohol. "Yes, I know. Anyway, just get this sadness for Lawrence out of your head, okay? He's an angel now, living a better life than he was before, and he isn't causing trouble for ordinary people anymore. You did well."

"Okay." I nod slowly, and a few moments later I get that sinking feeling in my stomach again. "Mr. Feldmann..."

"Saint Joseph, didn't I tell you to call me by my first name when we're in private like this? You're putting me on edge."

I ignore his protests. "You said all humans pray, and because of this, they all become angels when they die... right?"

"Uh huh. Sounds about right."

"Then, does that include Danis? The Warden? All the men I killed?"

He turns to look at me seriously once more. "Yes. Does that bother you?"

"What if I... what if I kill an angel? What happens then?"

He cricks his neck and sighs. "Then they're dead for good. And yes, in case you're wondering, Danis and everyone else you've killed are all angels now. I've seen their personnel files." His breath catches in his throat. "Why are you asking? Are you going to break through the warp-gate, enter Heaven, and kill them?"

"No. No! Of course not! I- I was just asking."

My defiant tone doesn't persuade him. "Yeah, if you say so. I won't hold it against you either way." A moment later he reaches down and picks up his datapad. "By the way, this is your next target. If you're done moping over Lawrence Phesbin, you should be antsy to knock this guy off. He's a known human trafficker. We believe he's working with the demons too. He might even be..." He pauses for a moment. "...well, he might be sending other girls to Yama. I hope you don't have any qualms killing bottom-feeding scum like him."

I take the datapad from Steven and stare at the man's chiseled face silently. "No. None at all. Is he going to become an angel too?"

Steven nods as I hand him the datapad back. "Sadly, yes. In my opinion, some people don't deserve such a reward."

There's a long silence as I swallow and try to gather my thoughts, and finally, I stand up to leave. "I'll be going now."

Steven nods but doesn't say anything. I start to walk away, but he grabs my hand. "Lora. Before you go, have you heard what my father is doing, right now?"

I blush as Stevens' hand slides down mine, rolling off my fingertips. "No... what?"

"He's creating a new law that will open up Heaven, allowing angels and humans to leave and enter Heaven as they please. Unlimited travel. Do you know what that means?"

My stomach churns. My voice is a whisper. "Danis... the Warden..."

"They might come looking for you. I wonder why my father is doing that now, of all times?"

My body feels cold. "I have to go."

"Take care." Steven turns back to the table and averts his eyes from mine. A void appears between us as I turn and walk away.

I'm going to be sick.

* * *

I can't look weak now. I put one foot in front of the other and stride forth into the main throne room belonging to the King of Gods. Zeus, a god who, I presume, can throw bolts of lightning if the myths are true, sits on his royal throne and stares silently at me as I confidently head toward him.

Gabriel steps out from the right-hand side of his king and bows before me, and I return the gesture, both toward him, and again to Zeus. "Welcome, Supreme Commander Jason Hiro, to the King's Hall, the most sacred of places here in Heaven. King Zeus, as well as myself, welcome you with open arms."

Zeus stands from his chair and walks a few steps toward me. "Indeed, Master Hiro, we are honored that you would come to see us in our home." He stands staring at me for a moment, but before I can greet him as well, he lunges forward and wraps his arms around me, embracing me in a bear hug that I quickly reciprocate. "My old friend! It's good to not have other stuffy bureaucrats around during times like these!"

"Yeah, King Zeus, I'm glad to see you too." I return the hug awkwardly, wondering to myself if this is normal behavior. He pulls away after a few moments to what I would consider a more appropriate arms-length distance.

Out of the corner of my eye, I spot Gabriel rolling his eyes, but he notices me looking and stiffens quickly, pretending it never happened. It's funny; I get a distinct impression that Zeus is a more touchy-feely ruler than Gabriel would like him to be.

Zeus looks me up and down. "I presume you're here for business purposes, and not for matters of a personal nature."

I nod diplomatically. "Yes, afraid so. A Supreme Commander's work is never done."

Zeus gestures to a pew several feet from his throne, allowing me to sit down as he returns to his throne, sighing contentedly. "Right you are! My work is always moving, never allowing me rest. Still, I was quite surprised by the motion you forwarded through Gabriel. I would usually expect a tremendous request like this to come directly to me." He procures a scroll from a table beside his throne and unrolls it neutrally. "You wish to open up the borders and allow humans and angels to move freely between our worlds, eh?"

"I meant no disrespect, King Zeus. I was just in a rush and hoped to speak with you about the matter later."

Zeus rolls up the paper quickly and sets it back on the table. "Ha ha! Tis' not any great offense. You're here now, and I presume to discuss the terms of this border opening, eh?"

"That's right." My lips purse as I examine the eyes of the Greek god before me. Zeus, a god so fearsome he killed his father in mortal combat. Are myths and legends true? Do other gods exist? Other angels? I know precious little of the hierarchy at work in this dimension, but I must understand it better if I am to make it work for me.

"King Zeus," I lean forward a little bit. "as a long-lived friend of mine, I seek not just your approval, but your advice today."

"Oh? Advice?"

"Yes. I have been looking at the plight my fellow humans are in, and I wish to alleviate their discomforts and their sorrows. I am going to start by increasing energy production, creating food that will satisfy them in a way nutrition bars cannot, and, with your permission, allow them to meet and speak with their long-since deceased loved ones."

Zeus widens his eyes. "It sounds to me as if you have this all planned out. How could I be of assistance to you?"

"Do you have any suggestions for how I could make human society more pleasant?"

My question makes him pause for several long moments. His gaze drifts away as he gives my request much thought. "As a god, I know little of how humans perceive the world. Indeed, my experience is different even from the angels I lead. I cannot offer help here. I do not know the taste of food, nor the pleasure of a sexual escapade. Humans are humans, angels are angels, and I am me. I will not be of service to you in this matter."

I feel slightly stupid for even asking. "Sorry, it was a silly request on my part."

"No no, it was quite alright. Anything for you." Zeus strokes his long, golden beard. "Now, that being said, I would like to finally take time to discuss that matter I spoke of with you when last we met."

I feel blank on the inside. "Ah, that would be...?"

"The increase in the human birthing limits. I asked you the last time we spoke if you could allow one to two percent of the population to have a child. The increase in thought-energy output would greatly help my people continue to live adequate lives."

Ah. Ben explained this to me briefly a short time ago. Angels require thought energy to survive, and thus humans give them the energy whenever they pray. Still, with hundreds of trillions of humans, and only ten trillion angels or so... you'd think the angels would have more than enough energy to get along just fine.

"You want me to increase the number of humans? That's a tall order. I could certainly do it, but I would want to wait until my reforms have come into effect."

"Ah. I see. Tell me, is humanity stretched too thin, currently? Are you running out of food and natural resources? Perhaps there's some way I might help?"

I shake my head at his question. "No, no to both. We have plenty of food, but the food is merely nutrition bars. I am seeking to bring back fruits and vegetables in reasonable quantities."

Zeus and Gabriel both look a little disinterested. Gabriel decides to speak this time. "Are you able to expand humanity's population, then?"

"Yes, absolutely. If you need us to expand, I'm very willing to help. Anything to assist humanity's closest ally." A question forms in my mind. "Forgive me for asking, but given how many humans there are, compared to the number of angels, isn't there enough energy to supply you already?"

For a brief moment, I almost spot Zeus's smile cracking, as if I had activated a secret rage inside of him. It passes instantly, and I wonder if I might have hallucinated it.

"Unfortunately, it is not. Humans have pitifully small amounts of energy within their bodies. It would take ten people donating prayer energy to keep a single pseudo-angel alive, to say nothing of a pureblood or an Archangel, like our friend Gabriel here." Zeus chuckles and nudges the winged swordsman, but Gabriel only bows solemnly.

"It is as the King says, Supreme Commander. To use an allegory, imagine a human who is given a sip of water and a small wafer of bread every day. This may allow him to survive, but he will be quite weak due to malnutrition. For angels of pure and human blood alike, the more energy we are given, the more energy we have in our bodies to move and live. Due to an uptick in the number of recorded deaths over the last several millennia-

Zeus interrupts him. "Especially including that dreadful Goldesh incident, mind you."

Gabriel doesn't appear flustered in the slightest. "-we have had many angels, but no human births to replace them. This would be a good time to restore the energy we've lost by accepting new arrivals, and for upper and middle-level humans to play the lottery and have a chance to create a new generation. Given you're looking to boost morale, this will help you as much as it does us."

He has a point. Ben tells me humans are strictly forbidden from having children without governmental permission, so it must be demoralizing for younger families to have to wait thousands of years and never have children of their own. Then again, I despise most children, but having a son like Timothy would change even a hardened mind like mine.

"Very well. I will speak to those who dictate law among my peers and use the full weight of my authority to push for a new reproduction lottery. I trust you will assist me in creating a new travel system for angels and humans to switch between our realms?"

Gabriel and Zeus look at each other, then back to me. "That will be acceptable."

"Great! I hope that concludes the business part of this meeting." I tap a button on my wrist communicator, and one of my shuttle personnel walks in, holding a box I designed myself with wordsmithing. "What say we have a little fun now? I have this game I brought with me, and I think it might appeal to you."

Zeus licks his lips and leans in closer. "Commander Jason... you don't take me to be a gambler, do you?"

I fold open the box on a table to my side to reveal a backgammon board. "Oh, definitely not. You're much too respectable for that. We're just playing for fun."

"Mmm. I will take the white pieces, then." Zeus quickly gets off his throne and walks over to me, even as Gabriel tsk tsk's to himself.

At least this part of my memory was accurate. Zeus loves playing games of chance. He and the previous Jason had quite the rivalry going, and it would be in bad form for me to forget that.

"I'll take the dark pieces, then."

Part 421b: Discovery

Lora slides out of her chair and walks away from the bar, leaving only Steven for me to stare at. As she walks away, I notice she has a sad, yet determined look on her face, so whatever they discussed must have been pretty important. Steven stays seated and swirls his half-full glass around absentmindedly, staring at the mirror on the wall in front of him. I can't help but wonder what's going through his mind at times like these.

Well, I'd better find out what they talked about. I gracefully get out of my chair and stroll over, sitting down where Lora had been less than a minute before. Her nearly empty glass of water is still here.

"Looks like you two had a fun chat. She was on the verge of bursting into tears." Steven glances up at me when he hears me speak, then back to his drink.

"You're imagining things, Amy. I'd never make a woman cry. I'm not a monster."

I always feel a little antsy when my hands have nothing to do, so I slide Lora's glass back and forth in front of me. "I've only known you a few hundred years, Steven. Even so, I can tell when something's troubling you. You always pick at the hem of your shirt when you're feeling antsy."

He quickly pulls his hand away from his long sleeves. "No I don't."

"Gotcha."

Both of us share a grin, but his fades in an instant. "It's hard to smile right now. What the hell kind of game is my father playing at? He was always against taking action against the demons, then Lora met him in Yama's domain, and it turns out he was having tea and crumpets with Yama himself!"

"So your father is working with the demons? I mean, it makes sense once we fit all the pieces together..."

Steven shakes his head as a flash of anger crosses over his face. "No, see, that's the thing. My father was there, he wanted to kill Danis himself, but Lora beat him to the punch. So, if he wanted to kill Danis, why would he use a cloning machine to bring him back? And what about Admiral Danis's angelic form? Why haven't we been able to find it?"

"We haven't? But you told me-"

"I stretched the truth a little. I found a record in a system, thanks to one of my spies. Danis did arrive in Heaven, but he was never formally registered. Either he purposefully avoided the registration queue and hid in a corner until someone pulled him out, or... they..."

"...killed him." I release a breath I've been unconsciously holding. "You think he didn't want people to know Danis was dead? What would that achieve?"

"I have my suspicions." Steven takes a sip of his alcohol and pauses, noticing his hand is shaking. "He knew my father was there in Hell. He probably didn't think things through and assumed there would be charges brought against him for conspiring with the demons. Don't you realize what this says about my father?"

"Your father wasn't actually conspiring with the demons?"

"Exactly! That, or Danis and my Father never knew the other was a demon collaborator." Steven clicks his tongue. "He visited the demons, yet he also killed Danis, but then he cloned Danis, yet now he is trying to push through all this new legislation, and he may have had Danis killed again, including his rebirthed angel form. If I assume he's a demon collaborator, then I also have to assume this legislation has a sinister motive behind it. But, for the life of me, it seems mostly good for humanity. We should have passed laws like these sooner, thousands if not millions of years ago. Why did he wait so long?"

I just nod along and make a motion to the bartender, holding up three fingers so he knows what to bring me. The bartender grabs the glass of water in front of me, and moments later he comes back holding plain beer in a thick mug and sets it down. "Maybe you're right, Steven. Maybe there's a ploy behind all these recent political actions. Then again, the new policies could be benign. What if Jason is using them to hide other activities? Maybe there's something worse planned behind the scenes."

Steven's eyes are filled with pain. "I just don't understand how it came to this. My father was always a busy man, strict, a real disciplinarian. He never allowed me or any of my later siblings to call him 'father' or 'dad'. It was always 'sir' when he was in the room. It felt... alienating. Even so, he never was the kind of man who would work with demons to destroy humanity. At least, not that I knew. That's why this is so frustrating for me."

The froth on top of my beer is the best part. I slurp it down quickly, then take a few small sips of the liquid itself. "I know what you mean. There are people I thought I knew well, but it turned out they were not the creatures I had assumed them to be."

"Your daughter." It isn't a question, as he already knows the answer.

"Yeah. She acts like she's forgotten me entirely. Her own mother! Has she forgotten her father too? He was-" My voice catches and I have to stop once I feel a raw emotion tugging at my heart.

Steven quickly reaches over and puts his hand on mine. "Even I know about Jorge. He was a good man."

I pull my hand away quickly. His touch isn't what I want to feel, not right now. "That's... that's why I want, so desperately, for your father to at least pass the unlimited travel law. I can finally see my husband again."

Steven finishes off his drink and slowly spins the glass in front of himself. "We all have people we'd like to see. Even being the son of the Supreme Commander doesn't give me the power to enter Heaven as I please. Still, if my father is planning something evil, we have to stop him. You know that, right?"

"I know what I have to do. Jorge wouldn't want me to give in to evil just to see him again. If I really wanted to see him, there's always the other way."

"Don't even talk like that." A scowl flashes across Steven's face. "Not even as a joke. If I ever find out you killed yourself just to mope about with your husband, I'll break into Heaven and beat your ass."

I can't find the words to say, but Steven cracks a smile out of nowhere. "Heck, you'd probably like that."

"You're such a perv." I shove myself away from the counter and sigh, realizing I barely touched my beer. My appetite is gone now. "I'm going to do some yoga. Don't get too sloshed, Steven. You're not you when you're drunk."

"Sure." Steven glares across the bar at his reflection in the mirror. "Anything you ask, I'll do."

I wonder if he sees something in his reflection that even I don't.

* * *

FINALLY! Some peace and quiet. Good god, I've been working nonstop chatting with these whiny lawyers and politicians, and all they ever do is bitch and complain about this and that. If I want anything, no matter how small, they expect a political kickback or a favor, and I swear ninety percent of their requests are just to see what they can wring from me because I'm the Supreme Commander.

But for now, I am at peace. And just in time, too. Ben isn't hanging around, and even if he wanted to find me, he couldn't.

This is a dimensional space I created. All I had to do was realize that Heaven and Hell are completely outside the 'universe' I know, and I would then understand that creating folded space is a simple matter. This will be a safe area for me. Nobody else knows it exists... except for Blaarjiim and myself, of course.

The demon in the orb yawns as I tap his container. "What is it? Why must you pester me?"

I roll my eyes up at the light surrounding us from all angles. Much like how the Book of Genesis has God create light first and the Sun second, my dimension is an empty shapeless void with light permeating every inch of it, and no hint as to where the light comes from. Heck, where does the oxygen come from? I don't see any plants sitting around.

"Blaarjiim, you know a lot about Wordsmithing, right?"

"Define 'a lot'." Blaarjiim's reply is anything but reassuring. "I know a few things."

"Where did you learn about Wordsmithing?"

"From Yama."

"And where did he learn about it?"

Blaarjiim crosses his arms in my mind's eye. "Yama has many ways of learning information."

"You don't actually know?"

"No."

"Well, if you won't be much help, I'll just figure my limits out myself." I pull the sling holding Blaarjiim off my neck and set it and his orb on the ground. " Visibility. "

He pops into existence, and for once his mental self looks interested in what I'm doing. "You're going to figure out your limits?"

"Most assuredly. I may not be a scientist like Marie, but I understand the principle of theorizing and testing until a process is understood fully. Wordsmithing may break several rules of how the universe works, but surely it has its own internal logic."

"I see. Well, I do know one limitation Wordsmithing has... it cannot alter a person's free will."

Blaarjiim's remark makes me furrow my brow. "You can't alter free will? How do you mean?"

"I mean just what I said. If you order a woman to love you with Wordsmithing, she will not. If you order a man to tell you something you want to know, you will fail."

A small chuckle escapes my lips. "Heh, that's stupid."

"I know. For a power so awe-inspiring, having such a pathetic limitation is laughable."

"Oh no, not that." I quickly correct Blaarjiim. "I mean the concept of blocking a person's free will. I could get around that with Wordsmithing's structure as I know it. If I wanted a woman to love me, I could simply alter the chemicals in her brain. If I want the man to tell me the truth, I'll just concoct a truth serum that never fails and he'll have no choice. These are all too easy."

Blaarjiim is clearly taken aback. "Oh. I'm surprised you thought of that so quickly."

"It's basic psychology. Hell, I could use risk/reward and operant conditioning to force someone to love me. Whether it's 'genuine love' or not is largely up for debate. If the end result is merely loyalty or fleshy pursuits, that is all too easy to adjust with Wordsmithing."

I pace away from the orb and stare forward into the never-ending distance before me. "Indeed, I do not believe that Wordsmithing holds any real restrictions I can't get around... aside from the one-word limit, and the amount of energy needed to perform certain feats."

The person in the black orb seems very interested in what I'm doing now. "What do you mean by energy limits?"

"Well, as one example, I can't teleport just anywhere. The further I jump from my current position, the more energy that jump costs. My body is quite limited when it comes to the amount of energy I can hold. Increasing it is a future priority of mine."

"Who says you can?" Blaarjiim beams a smug expression into my mind. "Maybe you're stuck with what you've got."

"No... I doubt that. I can drain energy from others, using the powers that the word 'Drain' gave me. When I stole energy from several golden commandos all at once, for a brief moment I felt it. My energy capacity increased almost imperceptibly, as well as the amount I was currently holding at that moment."

I pause to tap my lips while I stare at his orb thoughtfully. "That was only the second time I felt my energy capacity increase. The first time was when I accepted your power. I later felt an increase for a third time, albeit only a temporary one, when Benjamin doused me with anti-energy and tried to mind-control me in Marie's laboratory. You gave me a huge surge in energy, but it merely overfilled me, and the energy was incompatible with my own so it wore off afterward."

"Uh huh. How did you figure all of this out, anyway?"

His innate distrust can be comical sometimes. "It's just a feeling, but I somehow understand it on a primal level. If I had to describe how my energy works to someone who has never used magic, I would say it's as much a part of me as breathing is. I don't even bother to think about it."

Blaarjiim seems unconvinced. "Whatever works for you, I suppose. I feel like you're angling for something here, but I can't tell what."

I decide not to answer him, and instead opt to show instead of tell. " Gravity. "

Nothing happens. Blaarjiim watches and his head moves around in my mind, as if searching for something different. "What did you do?"

"Nothing. I spoke a word of power and deliberately thought of manipulating the gravity in the room, but also that I wanted the gravity to remain unchanged. It worked splendidly."

"What?! Did you bring me here to waste my time?! That was pointless!" The man blubbers and stammers, clearly annoyed by my antics.

"Do you know what causes gravity?"

My question makes Blaarjiim pause. "I don't know what gravity is."

Oh. I didn't expect that. "Gravity is one of many natural forces in the universe, and possibly the most pervasive. I don't fully understand how it works myself either, especially as I was never one to pay attention in school, but it has something to do with the mass of a large object attracting other objects to it. Distance is also a factor."

Unfortunately, Blaarjiim already seems he's about to tear up out of boredom. "Great... it sounds really fascinating. I'm on the edge of my seat. Can you get on with it already?"

"Sorry. Look around you at this blank canvas I've created. There are no plants, yet I can breathe. This dimensional space is not a planet, yet it has gravity identical to Earth's, my home planet. There is light, but no Sun. Somehow it is perfectly habitable for me, despite the fact it should be a vacuum deathtrap that kills me instantly. Don't you find that odd?"

Blaarjiim suddenly perks up. "Seven devils... you're right! That is very odd. What are you saying, then? Wordsmithing has hidden properties?"

"Something like that. It's not just a matter of speaking words that represent something. If I say 'flower' and a flower sprouts out of the ground, it's not because the word 'flower' is a magical word. My interpretation of the word 'flower' in my mind allows me to create it."

The demon in the orb doesn't say anything for a few moments, but once he does, there's a distinct impression of awe in his voice. "So... you can say any word, and have it take effect as you please?"

"Yes... somewhat. There are human limitations though, mostly that my mind itself is the barrier. It's easier to say 'flower' and imagine a flower, than to say 'dog' and create a flower. There is one other issue, as well, and it is far more sinister. The reason people I clone have no personality at first is because they are created by my knowledge of what they look like. I don't know every minute detail about their original forms, or even about myself for that matter, so only once I order them to be sentient do they start moving around. Danis was very incomplete even after I tried to give him sentience, because I barely knew anything about him. Ben is much closer to his original form as I interacted with him before I killed him."

"I don't follow your last point. If you don't know every tiny detail about Benjamin, how can you ever give him his original memories and personality back?" Blaarjiim's perplexed expression gives me pause.

"Dunno."

And it's true. I don't know everything about Wordsmithing today, but I need to be ready.

" Energize. "

I speak the word of power and wait for a few moments. Nothing happens. I wanted to see if I could spend energy to increase my energy reserves, but that doesn't seem to be possible.

Come to think of it, I was just telling Blaarjiim that draining the energy of those commandos increased my magical energy capacity. Perhaps the solution was right there in front of me.

" Clone. " Using my mental image of Ben, I create a clone of Ben once again. This one stares ahead, dead-eyed, waiting for my instructions.

Instead of ordering him to do anything, I reach out with my mind and drain his energy, exhausting him in an instant. He flops over like a wet rag, closes his eyes, and falls asleep without releasing any snoring sounds.

However, my energy capacity does not increase. "That was a failure."

Blaarjiim doesn't understand what I just did. "Why did he collapse?"

"I drained his energy, but my limits didn't go up."

I pace back and forth thoughtfully while Blaarjiim merely gazes at me. "I'm surprised he's still alive. Doesn't draining his energy kill him?"

"No." I shake my head instantly. "Draining his spiritual energy just exhausts him. It's like running for ten straight hours without taking a break. He's probably going to be in a coma for a week." I glance at him and curl up my lip. "Well, it would be, if he were going to still be alive in a week. Disintegrate. "

His body explodes into a cloud of dust and settles on the ground. Blaarjiim's reaction is swift. "Seven devils! He just exploded into ash! I'm almost horrified!"

"I considered saying 'vanish' but I wasn't sure if that would make him invisible or make him vanish from this plane of existence. I'd prefer the latter but I wouldn't be able to tell the difference. The thought of him staring dead-eyed until he died of hunger is stomach-churning."

"I see your point." Blaarjiim shudders anyway. Funny, I wouldn't expect the literal embodiment of evil to be so saccharine about someone dying. "Still, if he couldn't give you any energy, why not try many humans at once? If you drained all of the humans in one of those giant buildings on Earth, surely that would give you a big power boost."

His idea has merit. "Perhaps. But to explain more carefully, when I drained a dozen Golden Commandos all at once, it was like adding a brick onto a skyscraper in terms of energy gain. Even if I drained a million humans all at once, I might be lucky to double my energy reserves. And if a million humans collapse into a week-long coma, the investigation may put me at risk. Humanity has already developed a way to neutralize my magic and cripple me. I am not prepared to deal with such an assault right now."

"Then why not drain the angels? Their reserves are far greater." Blaarjiim offers a helpful suggestion once, but a sinister look appears in his eye. "When you drain a human's energy, it will eventually recover, but energy is an angel's lifeblood. Take it from them, and they will die."

"I'll file that under 'maybe'. I don't know how much of a threat angels and gods are, and given they have a non-aggression pact with humanity, it's just as likely that a horde of anti-energy wielding commandos will show up to put an end to me."

Blaarjiim shakes his head. "What amazes me the most is your way of thinking. You don't object to the genocide of angel-kind out of moral reasons, but because it might cause you minor or serious problems. I know demons who care more for their kind than you do for yours."

"Hey now, that isn't fair." I wave my finger chidingly at the orb sitting on the invisible ground. "You don't seem to care about the demons either."

"Oh, well of course not." Blaarjiim wipes his hair back and shrugs. "After all, at no point in the past or now was I ever a demon."

"You're not? I guess I know less about you than I thought."

"I like it that way."

His comment makes the both of us simply stare ahead idly for a moment before I get back to business. "Moving on, I'm thinking that I need to look into other ways I can exploit loopholes in Wordsmithing to my advantage. Only being able to use one word sucks, but if intent matters more than anything else, by mastering control of my mind... I could make things happen that weren't previously possible."

"Such as?"

I start ticking off the examples on my fingers. "Well, I could alter fundamental laws of the universe, change human will, and even bring people back from the dead, for starters."

"You can't bring people back from the dead?"

Blaarjiim asks the question, and my mind blanks out.

"Well... no. I don't believe I can."

I can't? How would I know that? I've never tried to bring anyone back from the dead. I just clone them. Well, now's as good a time as any.

I aim my mind at the pile of ashes I made when I killed Ben. " Resurrect. "

"Huh, would you look at that. Guess you can't do it after all."

I nod slowly as I stare at the pile of ash. "Yeah... how about that." Sometimes I have these weird insights into my powers, insights I couldn't have possibly gained unless I had already experimented with my powers. It's so strange.

Blaarjiim suddenly jerks his head up. "I've got it! I know how you could increase your energy reserves!"

His excitement is contagious. "Oh really? How?"

"Just clone yourself! If you do that and you take the energy from the clone, you'll increase your energy dramatically!"

I think about it for a few seconds. "I shouldn't."

"Why not?" The smile on his face, creepy as it is, melts away. "Seems sensible to me."

"Why would I bring another Wordsmith into existence? That's probably how I got here. That other guy cloned himself and it turned into me, and then I defeated him. Cloning myself is a recipe for disaster."

I slowly shake my head as I stare into the distance. "Only an absolute moron would do that."

Part 422b: Broken Home

My eyes open up as the morning dawn peeks through the window, and I unleash a mighty yawn, feeling every muscle in my body crackle as I stretch. Sarah isn't in bed now. She tends to wake up and slip out of bed early a lot lately. It's annoying, if you ask me.

Then again, a man does enjoy some alone time, especially when he's Supreme Commander, leader of the entire human population spread over a hundred star systems. Yup, I lead the biggest galactic group of whiners in the Milky Way. For an entire year, I've been giving my heart and soul to try and improve life for the masses.

Tch. And look what it's given me.

I roll over and slide my legs out of bed, yawning once again. " Shave. " My facial hair vanishes. Sometimes I wonder why I don't just make my beard stop growing entirely. It only takes a second to wordsmith the hair away, so I guess it doesn't matter. What does one second mean in the lifetime of an immortal?

I use my telekinesis to hover out of bed, yanking my invisible armor onto myself, along with all my normal clothes I'll need for the day. No need to brush my teeth, thanks to Wordsmithing my mouth is always in perfect condition.

"Oh, you're up." A growly voice murmurs from the opposite side of the room. My dog crawls up off the floor and shakes her tail at me, like the idiot she is. "I'm starving."

"Yeah, I bet you are, Markbark. Always looking for a handout. Steak. "

A juicy steak pops out of midair and lands on the ground in front of her. She rolls her eyes. "I hate steak. You know that. Also, are you ever going to call me by my actual name?"

"You hate steak? It must have slipped my mind." I ignore her other question and hide a smile behind my hand as I head to my bedroom door. Already I can feel her scowl on my back as I open the door and step out into the living room.

Timothy is here again. He spots me and smiles. "Hey, dad. How are you this morning?" He's probably working on homework on his datapad, as 'kids' do. I remember when I was shocked to learn that school takes 400 years to complete, but it doesn't seem that long to him.

"I'm good, Tim." My eyes swing across the room to Sarah, sitting at the kitchen counter, tapping through her datapad as well. She doesn't look at me. "Hello, Honey, how are you this morning?" I try to break the tense atmosphere she puts off lately with an icebreaker.

"Fine, thanks." She gives me two words in response. Another one of those mornings. I create food for her and Timothy to eat every day, and she slowly treats me like a domestic feline as time goes on, keeping me at arm's length. This is what I get for providing for the family?

No, no, calm down, me. You've meant to do this for weeks. Now is as good of a time as any. "Hey, Sarah, would you mind talking with me in our room real quick?"

Her eyes flick up to meet mine, and she crosses her arms. Great, this looks like positive body language. "Sure."

I catch Tim glancing at both of us as we step in the room, and just before I close the door, he flicks the viewscreen on and turns the volume up. Smart. I'd do the same thing if I were in his shoes too.

"Okay. What is it?" Sarah sits on the bed and stares at me as I close the door. Her gaze could make a second layer of frost spread over ice.

I inhale slowly to keep myself calm. "Look, I just want to know... where we are. Us. You and I. We haven't had sex in weeks. You barely even look at me. Even Tim seems disturbed by this... this rift coming between us. What's going on?"

She rolls her eyes in response. I have yet to see a smile on her face since the divide started growing between us, and it certainly doesn't look like I'll be seeing it today.

"You think I'm stupid, don't you, Jason?"

Her question leaves me grasping at straws. "I... what? No. Why would you say that?"

She crosses her legs, probably just to keep her body language closed, along with her arms. "You think I wouldn't, or couldn't put two and two together? Marcus Atkins was the last one to go. I had my suspicions when Jeremy vanished. He was the first one. People don't just die, Jason. Not in this society."

My gut wrenches and a wave of shock hits me. "Are... are you saying I killed them? You think I murdered your other lovers?"

"Oh. You're playing stupid now. Come on, Jason. This last year, you've gotten more and more clingy. You're downright possessive; you know that? You're not you. Of course, I figured it out by the time you killed Sasha. I was too sickened and scared to say anything."

She's serious. She thinks I killed her sexual partners. I mean, truth be told, it had occurred to me, but I wouldn't be so sloppy about it. "Come on, Sarah, let's be serious. I've told you about the Blood Shadow. This guy has knocked off two hundred of our top politicians. Seriously! I've told you about him ten times now! It wasn't me! If it was me trying to be possessive or whatever, don't you think I'd just erase your memory afterward?"

Sarah is taken aback, and she covers her hand with her mouth. "You- you can erase my memory?! You never told me Wordsmithing could do that!"

"That's not really the point, but yeah I could." Her shocked expression makes me flinch inwardly. "Oh, come on! I've never erased your memory! Be realistic!"

"Have you?! How would I even know? With how weird you've been, constantly asking me where I'm going, sending that dark-skinned man to follow me around, what am I supposed to think?"

"You mean Ben? With the Blood Shadow around, I can't take a chance he'll target someone in my family! Come on-" I take a step forward and lower my voice, but she jumps up from the bed.

"Don't come any closer. I don't trust you. I've been thinking, you know. You're different. Very different. It took me a while to notice, but with all the things you keep forgetting here and there, these new mannerisms of yours, and even the way you get confused by basic technology... I think Marie tampered with you. Didn't she? You're not the same man that was my husband two years ago. You're not!"

My tongue snakes out of my mouth as I wet my lips. "For Christ's sake. You're making a big deal about nothing. Seriously, this is a big pain in my ass right now."

"Oh, it's a pain? I'm sorry. I didn't mean to inconvenience you." Sarah makes a snappy motion with her hand in front of my face. "If I'm in your way, I'll get out. We're done."

"You're..." I start to say something as she pushes past me. "...breaking up with me?"

"I'm breaking up with you, but not the man I loved before. Whoever you are, you're an imposter. In fact, the more I think about it, the more your actions make sense. All these weird new laws, the murders, everything. This..." She pauses and for once I spot hesitation in her eyes as she looks away. "...this is the hardest thing I've ever done. I loved you, Jason. Really."

I don't even bother to stop her as she pushes the door open and the sound of the news channel floods the room. She doesn't even look at Tim, but grabs a bag I hadn't even noticed inside a closet and walks to the door.

Tim calls after her. "Are you going somewhere, mother?"

I stand in the room and listen as she forces a smile into her voice. "Your father and I are taking a break. I'm going to a friend's place."

"Oh..." Tim's voice trails off, and a moment later I hear the front door slide shut.

Moldgarnish stares at me with the same stupid expression she always has. "Wow, you murdered her other lovers, huh? You're a real dog."

"Shut the fuck up, stupid." I slam the door behind me as I leave my room. The viewscreen is still blaring. " Supreme Commander Jason Hiro's newest laws are once again met with the 120th consecutive day of protests as people rally together to stand up to his favoritism towards the upper classes. As our reporters on the ground have covered in every broadcast since the story began, the addition of fresh food in the supply chains has been concentrated entirely among the top 1% of citizens, ranging from diplomats to- "

"Turn that shit off. TV's garbage anyway." I reach out with my telekinesis and send a wave of energy at the screen, shattering it in an instant. Shit! I didn't mean to break the goddamn thing. What are they made of, plastic?

Tim stares at me silently for a few moments. "It's been a long time since I saw you this angry, dad."

"Sorry. It's not you. You're just about the only good thing in this society." I force a weak smile and walk over to him, then rustle his hair around. "It's just hard. Leading all of humanity, and all they do is complain about every law I pass."

With a slow nod, Tim takes a bite of a sandwich to his side. "Is it true what the media is reporting? They say suicides have increased by around ten thousand percent."

I bow my head quickly and turn away. "Thirteen thousand. The media's statistics are old. But yes. Unintended consequences, I suppose."

"Mmm." Tim finishes his bite. "And you diverted food to the upper classes only? Surely they have more than enough."

"Yes. They most certainly do. Ten thousand times too much." I slump down into a chair beside him. "It's all politics. Kickbacks. To get a law passed, Steven and Jim want a favor, then so do Larry and Bob because the first two wouldn't stop bragging about what they wrung out of me. Democracy is the bane of my existence. Monarchy would be a whole lot easier, son."

Tim smiles and pokes me in the rib. "You have that fancy magic, right? Why not just take control and transform the democracy into a monarchy? It's not like you're going to die. Benevolent monarchy has many tangible benefits over democracy, and the worst part of monarchy usually happens when a good king dies, and an evil one takes over."

Smart kid. Too bad he's wrong. "You think these politicians and generals, with their vast military forces, would be willing to submit to such a thing? Even if I killed them all, I don't think I can manage an empire this big by myself."

Tim raises an eyebrow and slowly takes another bite from his sandwich. "If I didn't know any better, I'd say you've thought this through a few times already."

"Psh. Of course I did. For a smart man, especially one with political clout, all options must always be on the table." I run my finger over my smooth face. "Do you think I look better or worse without a beard?"

"Huh? I don't know." Tim chews his food even more slowly, and his eyebrow raises even higher. "Why do you ask?"

"I'm not sure. I just wonder if maybe the lack of beard is another reason your mother-" I stop myself from saying anything else. "Ahh, never mind. In any case, I need to head out. I have a meeting planned with Zachariah Mikhail in a couple of hours. We have to discuss how we're going to shift public relations from red to green. Well, you've seen the news, you know how it is."

There's a feeling of discomfort between us as I stand up and start to walk for the door, but Timothy stops me. "Uh, hey. Should I call a repairman?" He tilts his head toward the viewscreen and gestures toward it guiltily.

"What? You wanna watch cartoons or something? I have to do everything around here." Despite my words, I have to smile. He's such a good kid. " Repair. "

The screen magically fixes itself in a single second, and I clean up leftover debris on the ground with one additional incantation. "Alright, Tim, I'm off. Don't work too hard on homework. Invite a girl over, maybe. You're too young to be studying every day."

He taps his lip thoughtfully. "Hmm. I dunno, women seem like a lot of trouble."

"No denying that."

* * *

"Your aura is quite cloudy today. More-so than usual." Blaarjiim's snakelike voice whispers in my mind as I head to the rendezvous point to meet Ben. "Is something distressing you?"

I round a corner past a crowd of angels and humans, all of them headed in one direction or another, and then I get on the hovershaft and start my descent down to the mid-levels. Luckily nobody else is in the hover-box today as I descend, or I might just erase them from the face of the universe.

"Don't play coy, Blaarjiim. You were in the room when it happened."

Indeed, his orb is always suspended invisibly from the ceiling, twenty feet up, where Sarah can't bump into him or find him by accident.

"I was sleeping."

Groan. "Of course you were. Well, you didn't miss much. Melodrama from a woman. I give her the world, and she dumps me. It was like a scene out of a bad romance movie. I hope she doesn't think I'll go and try to win her back. If that's how she's going to be, I couldn't care less about anything involving her. Waste of time, chasing after women."

Blaarjiim nods diplomatically. "Mmm. Yes, indeed. You don't care at all, yet here you are grumbling after she stormed out. Did you kill her other lovers, after all?"

"No. Don't be stupid. I didn't like them, but they were never an obstacle to my plans. Also, now I know you're lying. You saw the whole thing. Even you feel the need to waste my time."

"You're just fun to poke and prod, these days." Blaarjiim's stare takes on a melancholy tone. "You are looking rather haggard though, if I'm being honest. You never really smile, and I haven't seen a spark of wonder in your eyes for a long time."

Oh great. The pitch black Embodiment of All Evil Contained Within a Single Orb is taking pity on me. I'm going to vomit. "Yeah well, this society of pseudo-immortals is sickening. Their concept of time is different from mine. It took half a year to get anything passed through the democratic court system, and all these people do is whine about how rapidly the changes are taking place. They've had six months to get used to everything!"

My foot starts to tap impatiently as the hover-shaft crawls down the side of my megascraper. "Really! It's not my fault that the military sucked up 90% of the energy created by the new Dyson Spheres, or that the rich and powerful take all the food for themselves! I don't even know why the military needs all that energy! What the hell are they doing, shining giant spotlights directly at stars to try and waste the energy as quickly as they can?! It's absurd!!"

Blaarjiim listens calmly to my ranting. "Humans are flawed. Surely now you can appreciate the demon and angel hierarchies? After all, they never question their leader, no matter who he is. Human democracy is a shallow attempt by the mighty to appease the weak. You should be cracking the whip and getting them back to work."

"Yeah. That sounds pretty freaking good right now." I feel as if lately I need a cigarette. I need something, maybe just therapy. "The demons have it made. Speaking of which, I wonder what Yama's up to. Haven't spoken to him at all in the last year."

Blaarjiim is uncharacteristically silent. "I wonder."

"Do you know something?"

My question doesn't get answered. The hover-shaft comes to a stop, and the door slides open, revealing Benjamin Brown's familiar frowning face. "Two minutes early. Punctual as usual."

I fall into step beside him as he sighs and reads from a list of tasks for the day. "Meeting with Mikhail, appointment with the director of public relations, lunch at four thirty- are you listening?"

"Huh? Yeah, definitely." I'm not. My mind is wandering. I just want this day to be over, and the next one, and the one after that... maybe I should just clone myself and have him do all the world while I go relax. I could be having so much fun with my Wordsmithing! I could look up the hottest models of our society, clone them, maybe make them all die in a monster truck rally. Anything would be more exciting than this.

* * *

Forty-five minutes later, we arrive at Mikhail's apartment. For a guy in the upper district, having a side-window apartment facing the sunset is lame. Most other people prefer waking to the sun in their eyes. It's a better way to start the day.

Ben presses the button to ring his doorbell, and we both just stand, waiting. I can't help but vocalize the situation. "Guy doesn't live like a senator in charge of the Mobius cluster, does he? This hallway's kinda cramped."

Ben nods as he rings the bell a second time. "I've spoken to him a few times, though I doubt he'd recognize me. He's a pretty humble, down to earth man. He never flaunts his credits or anything like that. I think he seriously cares about humanity. He's honest."

"Let's hope so. I've had enough of crooks for the day."

A minute passes. I glance uneasily at the door. "Zachariah's sure taking his sweet time."

"Strange. We're right on time. Maybe we should try again later?" Ben's voice has an edge of suspicion to it. "Mikhail's not one to forget appointments."

"Hmm. Locate." I beam my mind indoors, but my location ping comes back negative. "He's not inside, or outside, or anywhere else. He's-" My breath catches. "Holy shit! I think he's dead!"

I don't even bother waiting. With a quick glance to see if anyone's watching, I smash the door inward with my telekinesis. Ben rushes in behind me as I sweep the room. It takes me just seconds to spot him.

"Fucking hell! The Blood Shadow got him! Snapped neck!" Ben runs forward to try and lift him up. "He's still warm! Can you heal him?"

I check his mind for mental activity. "No. He's dead. This kill must be fresh. Watch out, the killer could still be-" A window, still open, catches my eye. "Hey! Isn't there a theory that the Blood Shadow enters and exits through windows to avoid detection?"

"Yeah. Why?" Ben walks over to me and spots what I'm looking at. "Shit. He got away."

"Maybe. I'm going after him."

Ben shoots a look of incredulity at me. "Are you serious? What if you're seen?!"

"I can be stealthy if the need arises. Cuffs. Invisibility. "

Metal cuffs appear on my wrists and ankles, though no chains connect them. They, along with the rest of my body and clothing, turn invisible as I rush forward and leap out the window.

Using my telekinesis, I manipulate the cuffs to aim myself like a bullet, straight down. Within seconds I'm moving faster than free-fall speed, all while smoke and smog blast past me at increasing speeds. Luckily I don't feel much of anything thanks to my invisible armor, which makes me nearly as durable as if I had wordsmithed 'Invincibility' on myself.

The windows blur past and I get a horrible scare as even a hover-shaft races upward, missing me by inches and blasting past with a howl that makes my bones shiver. I aim myself a bit further from the side of the building, just in case, and after a few minutes of free-falling, I slow myself to a rapid stop, nearly making myself retch from the sudden G-forces pulling on my body.

As I expected, there's a window open, leading to a room leading lord-only-knows-where. I do, however, spot the catwalks spanning megascrapers and stratoscrapers nearby, meaning this area is right around the mid-level sections of Earth's population.

How curious. I teleport instantly inside the window and land silently on a tiled floor. This room is... a utility closet? Automated bots for cleaning sit at their docking stations, waiting to be activated, and in this tight space with the walls only being five or so feet apart, it's here that I spot... her.

Well then. Now I know who the Blood Shadow is.

* * *

My heart is still racing! After riding down the utility hover-shaft cabling with Steven's special gadget, I was able to get to the bottom faster than I ever have before... but what a scary descent! If I weren't as strong as I am, the stop would have probably broken my arm.

Broken? Well... what's an arm, I guess. I deserve worse. That politician served the demons, as did all the others, so I snapped their necks. That's what I do now. I'm a killer.

When did it become normal for me to kill? I never wanted to do this. Steven says it's for a good cause, but is it really? Is murder ever justice?

I've been reading up on old documents. They discuss things like 'court systems' and even 'tribunals', and they all share a common theme; judgement by a group of people. Not one person, but many, representing a collective.

Those don't exist in this time. Here, computers will jail a person for committing crimes, but computers can only distinguish between black and white. They can tell if a man stabs and kills a woman, or if someone steals property, but what about something like high treason? If someone is collaborating with demons, will a computer know that?

Unlikely. And it isn't against the law anyway! These people fraternizing with the enemy are a bigger danger to society than the murderer and the thief, but they won't ever be punished!

So, if that's the case, then it's okay for me to kill them, right? I mean... they become angels anyway. They don't die forever. It's not as bad that way.

In some cases, it can even be a good-

Thud.

A sound to my side. The sound of something landing lightly on the floor, but there's nothing visible. Did a robot on the wall shift and I missed it? No! It's... it's something else.

"Lora. I guess it was you all along. Visible. "

I can barely contain my excitement, roiling stomach, and horror as a familiar figure appears in front of me. Appearing by magic, Master pops out of the ether to face me. Was he always this tall?! He's a head and a half higher than me, and his presence is intimidating. Before I know it, my fingers start trembling.

"M-Master? I haven't seen you in-"

He interrupts me. "You can speak? Since when?"

I didn't expect him to interrupt me. I need to get some things off my chest. "Well, ah, since I... um... broke out of prison..."

He wipes at his forehead and crosses his arms. "Right. Prison. For killing Danis. Which, by the way, if you had stayed inside, you would have been exonerated of all charges. I managed to convince the authorities that you had found out Danis was a cloned spy working for the demons, and you killed him to protect me. Unfortunately, you murdered a hundred fucking guards during your escape, along with the Warden, so now you're a criminal of the most dangerous kind... according to the police forces."

His words make me lower my head in shame. "I... I'm sorry. I didn't know- they were torturing me in prison."

"Come again? Torturing you? How so?"

His words have an edge of curiosity to them, so I spend several minutes explaining what happened and how I got out of prison, though I do skip over who helped me. If Master picks up that I'm leaving someone out, he doesn't mention it.

"I understand now. This explains a lot. I'm..." He pauses for a moment and looks away. "...sorry you had to go through that. Still, you've been killing a lot of people, Lora. Don't pretend this was self-defense. What's your reasoning?"

He looks back and gazes at me, straight in the eye. I suddenly feel uncomfortable.

"I'm killing people who work with the demons. Collaborators."

It takes a second for him to register what I said. "Oh? You're killing people who collaborate with demons, huh? And how do you know these people are what you think they are?"

Crap. I have to tell him about Steven. Not good. Steven will be angry if I tell Master! But then, should I care if he's mad? Steven is Steven... but Master is Master! They aren't the same.

Still... I can't tell Master everything. Not until I know where I stand with him.

I lean back against the metal door, realizing there's no escaping Master's wrath if he gets angry. I can't hope to beat him. "I work for a man. He keeps track of those who go into the Labyrinth to see Yama."

Master smiles and nods nonchalantly. "Ah, so he's the mastermind, huh? Lora... who are you loyal to, again? Is it me, or this other man?"

His question catches me off-guard. I wasn't expecting it. "Uh... you, Master?"

"You don't sound very sure. Let me remind you, Lora, that I was the one who took you from the demons. I gave you the power to fight and live on your terms. Not this other man. I allowed you to kill your tormentor, Danis, and I didn't even punish you. So, Lora, I ask you this... why are you hiding any information from me and protecting this other man instead?"

I don't have a proper answer for his question. "I'm not hiding anything, not really anyway."

Master nods his head slowly. "So you were planning to tell me that Steven Feldmann is the one conspiring against me at some point, then? My own 'son', at that. I should have known."

He knows? But how?! Has he known all along? But he's not the sort of person to just ignore that...

He speaks again. "I can read minds, Lora. I read your thoughts while you debated over whether or not to tell me. It's clear your loyalties have changed over the last year, though why...

I can't say. I'm disappointed though. You're only the second woman today to cast me to the side, after everything I've given you. I'm starting to wonder if there's any point to what I'm doing."

"Wait! It's not like that, Mas-" I have to catch myself. I can't keep calling him that. It's not right. "Jason. I haven't stopped thinking about you, not once over the last year. Don't do this."

"Don't do what? I'm not going to do anything. Go back to Feldmann, tell him whatever you want. Of course, the next time I see him, I'll tear his head off myself, so he'd better stay out of my way. Out of respect for you, I won't kill you."

Jason stares at me silently, and for once I realize something. I've always looked up to him, but I see it now. He's not an immortal demi god or someone I could never hope to reach. He's just a man. A man trying to do what he thinks is the right thing.

And I am the same. I'm a woman, trying to do what I think is right.

"Thank you... Jason. I'm glad I got to see you again."

"Of course you are." He shakes his head and turns back to the sealed window leading outside. "What even is the point anymore, I wonder?"

I don't get a chance to ask what he means. He vanishes instantly, leaving me alone in the closet.

I don't know why... but for some reason, I want to cry and never stop.

Part 423b: The Calm

I keep rubbing my arms, trying to wake them up, but no matter what I do the cold won't go away. I'm in my regular clothes now, the same jumpsuit every other person on Earth wears, yet I feel so distant from them. They aren't like me. They walk down these white halls, staring at devices in their hands, only occasionally glancing up to make sure they don't bump into things.

I can't call him Master anymore. He's just Jason, now. Only now that I've finally spoken to him do I realize how much I miss him. He's cruel, heartless, and emotionally distant in many ways. Somehow, I feel that it's all an act. I remember when a wound from training was causing me a lot of pain. He told me to just grit my teeth and bear it, but only a minute later he couldn't stand to hear me crying, so he healed the wound. He told me at the time that it was just because I was irritating him, but was that the only reason?

I step into the hovercar and press a button, sending it flying back to Feldmann's headquarters. His small organization had no name and went previously unknown to Jason... until I revealed it by accident. Feldmann needs to know. If I can't be by Jason's side, then perhaps I should just keep doing as Feldmann instructs. I'm getting rid of demon sympathizers, after all.

What kind of monster does what the demons ask? They're pure evil. Anyone beholden to a demon is the worst of the worst, a betrayer of their own people.

At least, that's what Steven says.

Jason's words come back to me. And how do you know these people are what you think they are?

Were the people I killed demon collaborators? Steven told me they were. He's honest. Amy says he's honest. Is he, though? Has he ever lied to me? What about all the times he said he'd help me speak to Jason to clear my name, but the plans fell through? Were those lies, or just accidents? He is a busy man, after all.

Steven hates the demons. He isn't lying about that much, I know for sure! My people, the Goldeshians, were enslaved by Danis and given to the demons. I was born in that hell, and Steven hated Danis for what he did. Compared with Jason, who spoke on friendly terms with Yama and the others...

Wait. Is that it, then? Is that what I've been missing, all this time? Maybe it's not Steven who is lying, but Jason. Why would he be so friendly with Yama in the first place? Why have all these new laws he passed come back to hurt humans? Is he actually working with the demons after all?

The Jason I knew, when we met in the Labyrinth, was one who assured me had no interest in doing as Yama asked. He thought of Yama as beneath him. Yama was only a small threat. Jason even joked about ruling the demons if he was going to do anything they wanted him to do.

As my ship lands in Steven's hangar and I get off to head inside, my mind reels from the possibilities.

If Jason is trying to destroy human society, his actions certainly seem the right path to take. Protests, riots, all the chaos I'd expect a destroyer to bring. But if he's trying to destroy it, does that make him wrong?

My footsteps echo off the dingy walls, a sound I've become all too familiar with. The poorly maintained tiled floors have chips and breaks all over, hairline cracks that splinter some of the tiles in half, and stains nobody has ever bothered to clean. We are the resistance, those who fight against the villains threatening to overwhelm human society... but that doesn't mean we're in the right.

Feldmann claims morality is black and white. Demons are wicked, humans are virtuous. I should agree with him, and usually do, but I'm having hesitations. If Jason is the one I've cared most about all this time, and if he supports the demons, where does that leave me? I'm a murderer, after all. Two hundred and five people... that's how many I've killed by Steven's orders. That doesn't even count the people I eliminated before I met him. I can't pretend Jason is evil and I'm good and virtuous... even if I'm murdering evildoers.

My head hurts. I don't know what to do. Maybe thinking about what I 'should' do is wrong. I need to do what I want. I can't keep letting other people dictate my life for me. I can't keep lying to myself... or to others.

I push open the door at the end of the hall, forcing a smile as I spot Steven to the right. He's playing a violin along with the band in the bar. The soft melody contrasts with the 'jazz' sound that the other musicians usually put out. They have to slow down and speed up to match him because the violin stands out so much from the other instruments.

I sit down at a table and wait for a few minutes, watching him silently. Steven always closes his eyes when he plays. He says it's so he can feel the emotion more intensely when the bow crosses over the strings, but I wonder if it isn't because the music takes him to a different place; a world where he doesn't have the responsibilities he does here.

Freedom sounds fantastic... but it's a pipe dream, in the end.

Finally, the song winds down and Steven opens his eyes. Everyone in the room claps and smiles as he steps down, setting his violin to the side, and walks over to his usual private booth. It's not often the leader of the resistance will go out of his way to play music, especially when he's so talented.

Steven spots me as he walks past, and nods toward his booth wordlessly. I quickly get up to follow him, and a few seconds later we sit down beside each other. The bartender gets us our drinks, and Steven decides to mix it up by having some brandy. As for me, I have the usual; a big mug of vodka. I can't help it. The harder the drink, the more easily I can force the guilt down into my stomach.

"Took you longer than usual. Zachariah must have put up a real fight." Steven's still clasping the violin's bow in his left hand, and he rubs his index finger up and down the bowstring as he talks while using his other hand to chug his alcohol.

"Um, no, not exactly. Zachariah wasn't a problem. He... went down easily. Just like all the others."

Steven laughs. "Haha! Yeah, no kidding. I remember that time you accidentally crushed a barbell, then hurled it through a wall in a fit of rage. You're a super-human, that much is for sure." I pull my eyes away from his, and his voice takes on a curious tone. "I guess it's good everything went well otherwise though, right, Lora?"

"Well, I mean, the kill was smooth as always. It's... it's what happened after the kill... that's where things went differently."

Shit. I shouldn't be saying this, but I have to. Steven is in danger, and Jason isn't a forgiving man. If I don't warn Steven, everything we've worked so hard on will fall apart.

"Go on." He prods me gently, but there's some suspicion in his voice. "You don't usually act so reserved."

"I ran into Jason." I spit the words out quickly, and Steven visibly stiffens in response. "He caught me red-handed. We talked for a few minutes... then he let me go."

I glance up at Steven's face to see a mixture of shock and curiosity. "He didn't have you arrested? That's surprising. You must have fed him an excellent line."

"No, Steven. I didn't. He knows everything now. He knows I'm the Blood Shadow, and he knows you're the one giving me orders."

The shock becomes more palpable on Steven's face as he slaps the violin bow on the counter. "You told him?! What the hell were you thinking?"

"I didn't tell him. Steven, I haven't been entirely honest with you. There's... there's something you need to know about Jason Hiro. He's not the man you think he is. He's not your father."

A cockeyed smirk spreads across his lips. "Oh, is that so? Then who is he?"

"I don't know, exactly. But the man you call your father, he was defeated in battle by the Jason you see now. This Jason met me in the Labyrinth, trained me, and enhanced me with his powers. When I killed Danis the first time, he cloned Danis using magic."

Steven blinks slowly and mops at his forehead. "You didn't tell me this before? Why not?"

"I don't know. I wasn't sure of what to do. But now that Jason has realized you're the one causing him trouble, he wanted you to know that the next time he sees you, he'll rip your head off. His words, not mine. It's not too late to stop what we're doing."

Steven surprises me by calmly pulling his mug up to his lips and taking a long, slow chug of his brandy. When he's finished, he sets it back down gently and begins to chuckle. "Uh... huhuhu.... by Saint Joseph's name... huhuhu..." His entire body trembles as he suppresses a laugh deep in his gut. "Now it all makes sense. Everything. The pieces connect perfectly."

I nod along uncomfortably. "Yes. He's a different Jason. That's why comparing him to your father's actions makes no sense. They're entirely different people."

"Huh? No, not that. Don't you see, Lora? The reason you said he was so chummy with the demons... his ability to use magic -assuming he actually can, and it wasn't sleight of hand-, and his actions that are clearly harming humanity. When you add it all up, it comes together in one perfect package."

He pauses, as if for dramatic effect. "This fake Jason isn't a human. He's a demon in disguise."

I blink twice to comprehend what he just said. "Th-that's not right at all! He's human! Why would you even think that?"

Steven shakes his head. "You're still not familiar with the intricacies of the four sentient species, Lora. The Volgrim have psionic abilities, given to them by their technology. Angels have magical powers, but those powers come at the expense of their life force. The demons have their own magic, and it can manifest in many ways. Humans, on the other hand, have zero magical aptitude. It's not possible for a human to have magic. Period."

"But- Jason hates the demons! He always treated Yama, the Second Demon Emperor, disrespectfully! I lived among the demons, Steven. No demon can treat a superior contemptuously."

Steven shakes his head again, and his tongue flicks out to wet his lips. "Under ordinary circumstances, I'd say yes. But now it's obvious! This was a long term plan. Yama's goal is to subvert human rule by putting demon-bribed humans in key places, but the highest office's always remained out of his grasp. By replacing my father with a hand-picked shapeshifter, he's been able to do permanent damage to our species. We're weakened now, and the situation's only getting worse all the time."

Steven suddenly spins in his chair and stands up. "This is what I've been needing. You should have told me sooner, but now I have finally gotten to the root of the problem. Thank you, Lora."

I grab his hand. "Hold on, Steven. What are you planning to do? You can't just be brash."

He pulls away from me and takes a step out into the open. "I'm going to test him. If he's really my father, I'll be at ease. But if he's a demon, he won't be able to hide it."

"Steven! Stop!" My voice is louder now, and a few people nearby take notice, but I don't care. "What about the day your father went into the labyrinth? Don't you think that's a bit strange? You've always made him seem like someone who wouldn't do that!"

"Yes. You're right. I don't know why my father would go into the labyrinth without any guards. Perhaps the demons mind-controlled him. He never was much of a fighter anyway. Maybe he thought he could parley with the demons, get them to stop taking slaves. The point is... I don't know! I don't know why he did what he did!" Steven is hissing at the sides of his mouth as he glares at me. "All I know is what you've told me, and what you said confirmed what I've been thinking for a while now. He's a false demon imposter, and I won't let him get away with his crimes."

With a flourish, Steven spins away and walks to the door.

"Steven, wait! Don't do this! Think more carefully!" I yell after him, but he ignores me. Everyone in the room goes silent as he slams the door.

A girl at the closest table gives me a strange look. "What was that for? And what's all this about his father?"

"It's not your business." I quickly get up and chase after him. Whatever he's planning, it sounds dangerous. Jason is going to kill him!

* * *

Ben grimaces as we ride the hover-shaft up to my office. "You really had me worried, you know. I thought we'd have to peel you off the side of a hover-shaft, just like this one. Could you be any hastier if you tried?"

"Probably. Does it matter? I have godlike powers. I'll just be reborn as an angel if I die anyway. The threat was minimal."

"I'm SO glad you're an optimist." He shuffles his feet around before walking to the other side of the shaft to stare at me. "Anyway, what happened? Did you manage to catch the Blood Shadow?"

"Yup. The assassin is a familiar face. Lora."

"The Goldeshian girl?" Ben looks confused. " Lora is the professional assassin who's been making mincemeat of politicians and governors all over the system? Of all the people it could possibly be..."

"When you think about it, it fits perfectly into place. There hasn't been another killer among humanity for several thousand years, possibly even millions. I just assumed it was a demon since the murders were executed perfectly every time. In retrospect, the snapped necks should have given it away."

Ben eyes me curiously. "You seem rather calm for someone who just found out that you were betrayed by the very person you trained."

"Betrayed? Yes, I suppose that's an apt description. She killed some people who voted yes on my laws, but she also killed others who voted no. I didn't really know any of them well enough to care about their deaths, so beyond their past and future utility to me, they didn't matter."

Ben swallows. "That's a very inhuman way to look at their lives. Don't you care even a little-" He pauses. "Ah, never mind. I know you better than that."

"Yeah, you do. Anyway, it doesn't matter. Now that I'm aware of who's been the pain in my ass for this last year, I'll take care of him soon. Steven Feldmann's days are numbered. I can't just kill him since he's my son as far as the galaxy knows, and ranked rather high on the leadership totem pole. I'll need to be more subtle about it."

"No kidding. Not to mention that with all the people he's had Lora murder, we have too many vacancies in leadership positions across our core sectors. The Liarus system is in dire straits, for example, and Sirius isn't doing too well either."

"I believe it. I've been debating allowing those who were murdered to return to their duties as angels, in fact. That would solve the manpower shortage."

Benjamin stiffens visibly at my suggestion. "Whoa, whoa! Absolutely not! Just letting some angels return to work in the middle levels is bad enough! We absolutely cannot compromise the upper levels and the heart of government!"

"Right, right. I know you hate angels or whatever, but calm down. Ben, these angels were human as recently as a day ago. Do you honestly think they've been compromised so quickly?"

Ben shakes his head. "It's not that. We don't even know the full extent that angels are manipulated by Zeus and the archangels. If Zeus can give out energy to angels to keep them alive, it stands to reason that he can exert pressure by threatening to cut them off if they don't do as he says and spy on us. It's simply not worth the risk. I'd even prefer you just clone them like you did me."

Oh. That's a pretty good idea. I hadn't even thought of it until just now, but since he mentions it...

The Hover-shaft slows as we reach the top. Once it stops and the door opens, we hustle our way down to my office.

"I'll have to think about it, Ben. It takes quite a lot of energy to clone people, and I'm not sure I want to weaken myself like that just yet."

So few people I can trust. Ben might be one, since he's a clone I made. Then again, I have no reason to believe that cloned beings are at all safe to treat lightly.

A minute later, we round the corner to my office and- oh. I'm hardly even surprised to see the archangel, Gabriel, standing there waiting for me.

"Supreme Commander, Jason Hiro. I'm sorry to bug you. I've been waiting a while."

I groan inwardly, but force a smile. "Gabriel, no need to feel anxious. I'm always here for a friend. What can I help you with?" I let the 'friend' hiss out of my mouth, but the archangel doesn't appear to pick up on it.

"Oh, well, it's regarding the energy supply. Zeus has noted that total energy output over the last year continues to drop steadily every month. We suspect that it's because-

I raise a hand to cut him off. "I already know the reason. On top of the suicide rates of people who see how great it is to be an angel, there are also the people who only stop praying because they think exactly the opposite; that it's awful being an angel. We're working on counter-measures."

Ben pipes up. "Ah, but how are the Volgrim holding up as a backup? We understand that asking for their help might not be ideal, but we hope they are a decent alternative."

Gabriel waves his hand through the air. "Oh, the Volgrim are excellent. Their numbers are far smaller than that held by humanity, but the amount of spiritual energy is much greater. Quality, not quantity, I suppose you could say."

"I suppose so." I gesture to my office. "Let's go and discuss this inside. I needed to use my office computer to do some work, anyway."

Gabriel offers no protest, and we head inside. As we walk, I glance over at the desk where my dutiful new assistant is working hard. Unlike that worthless girl, Stephanie, this man is punctual, polite, and always works hard.

"Keep up the good work, Silver."

He looks up at me and smiles. "Yes, sir! Glad to be of service!"

What a hard worker. I wish everyone could be as talented.

* * *

Two figures stand atop a skyscraper, staring up at the buildings that dwarf theirs, stretching for miles up into the sky. The air, bitter and acrid, swirls around them, but the woman's body projects an invisible field around herself and her companion, to protect them. Her beautiful white armor glistens, even in spite of the dim sunlight that barely pieces the smog in all directions. She rests her hand on the majestic sword at her waist and sighs.

"Grok, are we certain this is the right stream? I feel as though we are in the second layer of Hell, one that extends into a realm we should never see. To imagine this is the stream where everyone will converge; it's absurd."

The massive green orc beside her nods. "This is the only one left, Daisy. We've checked the others, front to back. Based on my notes, we're close. We can finally stop the chaos. We can unravel the threads of fate that bind all realities together. There's just one mystery left to solve."

Daisy swallows, despite the lump in her throat. "We have to find the arbiter of the multiverse's destruction, and stop him ourselves. The Wordsmith is not yet ready for the task."

Grok rubs his hand on the reddish orb atop his staff. "We don't know that yet. In fact, we might be the ones to destroy the multiverse. Never presume unless you have all the necessary information, my dear."

"Sorry. I'm just rash, I guess." Daisy grips the sword's hilt tighter. "I just pray I don't have to kill Jason. If push comes to shove, I'll do whatever it takes."

"That's a good attitude. Come on, let's go." Grok rubs her shoulder, and a moment later, both of them vanish. The winds swirl together to envelop the place where they stood just moments earlier.

Part 424b: Usurper

Having an archangel visit me in my office slowed down my plans for the day, especially given he practically ambushed me, but it had to be done. Finally, I've finished our discussion, and we're ready to go.

I step out of my chair and grumble under my breath. "Well, in any case, I believe that I've come up with satisfactory appeasements for your concerns, Archangel Gabriel? I obviously don't want your people dying off due to lack of energy."

Gabriel nods slowly, but a guilty look passes over his face. "You know, I pushed Zeus to open up the gates of Heaven. I agreed with what you wanted to do, so I told the King that it would be best to give it a shot. I didn't realize that it would have so many disastrous consequences."

Ben coughs into his fist. "Yeah, I disagreed from the beginning, but I figured it would take things going wrong for everyone to see the errors in their ways. Whatever, I suppose."

"What's done is done. I'll look into limiting travel once again. I do want it to be more open than it used to be, but there's clearly a middle ground I can aim for." I walk over to the door and beckon, so Gabriel and Ben both get up to follow me. "In any case, mistakes were made. I'm sorry for the trouble I've caused the gods and angels."

Gabriel scratches his head sheepishly as his wings tuck in closer to his body. "It's no trouble at all. Let's just both agree there was blame on both sides and call it a day, hmm?"

"That sounds fair."

The door hisses open, and the three of us step into the hallway, but a blur of motion catches my eye. Pivoting on his heel to face me is the angry face of a familiar man.

"Supreme Commander, Jason Hiro. I would call you 'father', but it seems that word is not applicable anymore."

Steven Feldmann stands just ten feet away, along with two guards to either side of his body, all four of them wearing the Hypersuits I've seen in action so many times over this last year. Given the cuffs hanging from their waists, and the guns slung across their backs, they mean business.

Gabriel takes a step forward to look at me inquisitively. "Mister Hiro, what is the meaning of this?"

Shit. The little punk came looking for me? I didn't expect this. Still, what does he think he can accomplish? He's well below me in political rank... and clout.

I ignore Gabriel's question. "Steven, I don't know what's going on here, but you're not thinking clearly."

"I'm quite sure of what I'm doing. You're a fake. An imposter! You are a demon, shapeshifted to look like a human. Gabriel, you should stand away from him. The Supreme Commander is not human."

Indeed, Gabriel takes a step to the side. "I have not sensed any demonic energy from this one. Perhaps your father is right, Mister Feldmann. I've known you a long time, and you're acting out of character."

"The hell I am!" Steven raises his blaster and aims it right at my chest. "This is an anti-energy rifle. It does not affect an ordinary human, but against a demon, it will incinerate you! This is the perfect test to prove I'm right."

The guards to his side take a step forward in alarm. "Steven Feldmann, this is wrong. By raising your weapon against the Supreme Commander, you're committing treas-"

"Shut up!" Steven's eyes open even wider, and his hand shakes slightly as he aims the blaster at me. "A demon is destroying humanity! Look at what he's done already, in just one short year!"

Anti-energy. Goddammit. If I had known he was out here, I could have expelled the energy from my body and that blaster wouldn't affect me, but in front of all these people, and with Gabriel watching... my options are limited.

Blaarjiim speaks quietly into my mind. Don't worry. I have a plan. When he fires, I will flood your body with my energy, and it will neutralize the anti-energy. It will seem as though you were unharmed.

I reply telepathically. I guess that might be worth trying. I don't have a better idea right now. I don't know if adding a bunch of evil energy to my body will solve the problem or not, though.

The black orb scoffs. I'm not evil, human, I am merely one with the darkness. In any case, my energy is very different from that of a demon's. Anti-energy, as you've seen before, ignores it.

I could try to dodge the attack instead, but won't that look just as suspicious? Damn, that stupid 'son' of mine picked a lousy time to try and kill me.

Fine. We'll do it your way. I hope this works.

I groan dramatically and roll my eyes. "Alright, son. If that's what it takes, shoot me. I have nothing to hide."

When my eyes meet Steven's, there's a moment of hesitation visible as he suddenly doesn't know what to do. It passes momentarily. "What are you trying to pull?! You think I won't shoot? I will!"

"Do it. And the head of the archangels will even be here to bear witness to my innocence. But... if you pull that trigger, you're going to prison for the rest of your immortal life. I urge you to think twice before committing treason."

Confusion is in the air. The guards look at me and then at Steven, as does Gabriel, Silver, and even Ben. I can almost hear Ben in the back of my mind. Idiot! If he shoots you, you'll die! The more energy you have, the more damage anti-energy does!

I know that much. However, there is another option.

As Steven sweats, trying to figure out what to do, I hatch an even better plan. I'm not like the Jason before me. I'm smarter, faster, and more adept than he ever was. Wordsmithing is a nearly omnipotent skill, but one has to know how to use it properly for it to reach its peak.

Blaarjiim, I'm going to release my energy, but continue to flood me with yours if things look dire.

He doesn't question me, but his gaze betrays curiosity as he appears in my mind's eye.

"Steven, I'm not trying to trick you. You're my son, and I care about you. However, if you go down this path, I will have no choice but to expel you."

As the words leave my lips, I turn one of them into a word of power, changing its definition in my mind to something akin to 'release my energy'. I feel my shoulders sag as the power leaves me.

Just in the nick of time, too. My final speech rouses Steven, and his finger hovers over the 'fire' button. "Now I know you're a liar. My father never cared about me, not a day in my life."

"You're wrong." The words slip from my mouth, and for once, I'm not even lying.

Foom!

Steven fires the blaster, and the blast impacts me square in the chest. There's a stinging pain in my lungs for just a half second, enough for me to clutch my chest, but Blaarjiim extinguishes the pain a second later.

I quickly inhale and shake my head slowly at Steven.

"Sir! Are you okay?" Silver jumps over his desk and runs to me, but I stop him.

"I'm fine. It just managed to startle me, that's all. I didn't think my son would shoot me."

Steven's eye twitches and he gnashes his teeth. "Y-you liar! You were in pain! I saw it! That blast hurt a lot, didn't it?!"

He starts to tap the fire button again, but two of the guards jump him and pin him to the floor. Gabriel exhales while Steven tries to wrestle free on the ground. "What a relief. He was so sincere that he almost had me worried for a moment."

"Yeah. Heh. He even had me doubting myself." I let a nervous chuckle out, even as Steven glares fireballs at me.

"You're a fake! I know it! What did you do to my father?! You piece of fucking shit! Murderer! I oughta-!" A guard wraps a gag over his mouth and pulls him up, holding him firmly so he can't wriggle free.

"We're very, very sorry about this, Supreme Commander. He didn't tell us why we needed to accompany him. We'd have warned you otherwise."

The guard looks like he's terrified I'm going to fire him for insubordination on the spot. Honestly, I want to, but it all worked out in the end.

"Don't worry about it. Take my son away, but treat him gently. He's just misguided." I make sure to show leniency in front of Gabriel. I can always break Steven later when nobody is watching.

The guards nod, and a few moments later they've rounded the far hallway, all while dragging my son as he tries to scream profanities through his gag.

Silver walks back over to sit at his desk, and I sigh. "I don't know what got into him. I'm sorry, Archangel Gabriel. This must have been pretty distressing for you."

He nods along, but there's something in his eyes that makes me wonder what he's thinking. "It was fairly alarming, but also exciting at the same time. Well, the thing is though, when the anti-energy struck you... you did clutch your chest. What was that about?"

"It's a flinch reaction," Ben interjects. "When I was in the military forces, they would take us out and fire anti-energy at the recruits, just to show them how to tell demons apart from humans. Most people flinch the first few times they're shot at, but it fades once you're used to it."

"Ah. I see." Gabriel scratches his chin. "Well, there was something else, but... ah, whatever. In any case, I need to be heading back to tell Zeus about your verdict regarding Heaven's migration policies. He will be quite happy to hear about your change of opinion, given how catastrophically everything has turned out."

Ben waves a finger in the air. "It hasn't all been bad. People have still been able to see their loved ones, after all. At the least, we achieved that much."

"You are correct." Gabriel bows at the neck, and once we return the gesture, he gracefully walks away, leaving Benjamin and I to our own devices.

Once he's out of range, Ben and I head back into my office. Only once the sound-proof door seals shut can I finally let off some steam.

"GODDAMN IT! THAT STUPID, WORTHLESS-"

I have to stop myself from saying anything else, but I release several long deep breaths. "We are fortunate that worked out so well. I've never been as angry and disappointed as I am now."

Ben fans his face, in spite of the fact the room is quite cool. "How did Steven find out? And how did that anti-energy not tear you apart? Concentrated anti-energy fired from a blaster is not the same as the anti-energy a room like this can create. It will liquefy a demon if they have enough energy concentrated inside themselves."

I decide to tell him a half truth. "I released the energy from within myself once I saw that Steven had the blaster. Luckily, nobody noticed when I did it."

"No joke. Angels are very good at detecting energy types, you know." Ben wipes his forehead. "If he'd sensed you were expelling that energy, you'd be in deep shit. Short of killing and cloning him, you'd have no way to stop him from turning angel-kind against us."

"It's in the past now. What isn't in the past, however, is Lora. She betrayed me deliberately and told Steven I was a fake. I have to assume anyone working with Steven is going to know as well. After everything I did for her, she showed her true colors, in the end. I should have known better than to give her mercy."

Ben walks over and leans against my window heavily. "Don't let it get to you. You avoided the worst of it. Things can't get worse; they can only get better now that you've cast aside the conspiracy about yourself."

"Don't say that, Ben. Every time someone says 'things can't get any worse', the universe seeks to find irony in that moment."

"Maybe not this time?" Ben's voice has more hope in it than I'd like to hear right now.

"Don't press our luck."

* * *

It takes nearly a full day of traveling, but thanks to my personal transport ship, supplied by the humans, I arrive back at the familiar sight of Heaven's Gate. A tremendous circular warp-hole where I can see my home dimension on the other side, it stands out from all the other buildings in the area. While I've never been to the one that leads inside the demon's realm, I'm told that it's identical to Heaven's Gate.

What does that say about humans, I wonder? They constructed two great warp-gates, one that leads to the lair of their greatest enemy, and the other which allows them to visit their closest allies... but they made the structures identical. Does that mean humans think of angels and demons in the same way? Are we monsters, just the same as the demons, but with a different outer shell?

It's an amusing thought. The great irony is that if their views were such, our views toward them are the same as well. Humans and demons seem closer than one might think, especially after giving them more than a passing glance. Humans enslave, torture, murder, and do all the things they worry demons will do to them.

Perhaps that is why they fear the demons. Not because the demons are ugly, or powerful, or anything like that, but because the demons are a stark reminder of the typical human's weakness.

Once my ship has landed, I step off and fly over to Heaven's Gate. I need no identification, so commanding is my presence. Several people bow visibly once they see me, before returning to their work. Even if their jobs keep them near Heaven, before the Supreme Commander's loosening of the travel restrictions, few humans had ever seen an angel, let alone a pure-blood, and especially not an Archangel. There are only three of us left, after all. Raphael, Uzziel, and myself.

My sandals scuff the cement lightly as I approach Heaven's Gate. The ring on my finger feels unusually heavy today, though I don't know why. I can only occasionally have a conversation with Michael, but he always seems foggy... distant, even. Was he always like that? So much time has passed since my brother sacrificed himself for the good of humanity, leaving his closest friends behind. The only thing that makes my heart ache more is the realization that Uzziel and Raphael will likely never be able to speak with him. Only I have built the spiritual connection, and when last we tried it was a failure.

"Archangel Gabriel, I see you're back from the human realm." A familiar sappy-faced pureblood stands just before Heaven's Gate and smiles at me. "I came as soon as I heard you were going to arrive. Were you successful with your negotiations?"

"Cherubim Zarall, I hope you are well." I nod slightly at him, just hinting at a bow. "As expected, I was successful. The human's Supreme Commander is unhappy with the current state of things, just as we are. Twisting his arm proved unnecessary."

The Cherub saunters over to me, his long white hair stretching almost down to his heels, and covering most of his body in the process. His face, perfectly shaved as always, shows far more skin than the rest of him would. Of course, being a pureblood, I've known him just as long as all of the palace angels, I just don't venture out to Heaven's Gate very often. Sometimes, seeing someone for the first time in ages can feel like meeting them all over again.

Zarall chuckles. "Sounds like another boring day among the humans, eh?"

We walk through the gate, and I breathe a sigh of relief as I finally stand in the bright, cheerful place I call home. The human-built towers that spiral up into the sky may dwarf the ancient temples we purebloods live in, but they are uniform and ugly compared to the carefully carved perfection of the old structures, built during a time when the utmost care was taken to make them functional... as well as beautiful.

"I wouldn't say it was boring. In fact, something happened, just before I left the commander. He was-" I stop and pause for a moment. "Well, actually, this information is a bit above your position."

"It's no concern of mine if you can't tell me." Zarall weaves his hand inside his hair to scratch his chest. "I'm perfectly content being a nobody who guards the Gate."

"Oh come on, Zarall. You're not a nobody! You're free to visit the temple anytime you want and have another angel take over guard duty."

Sometimes I feel bad for him. The other angels treat him fine, but with all that hair of his, I wonder if it doesn't make others see him as weird. Certainly not me, I couldn't care less.

I relent after he looks away uneasily. "Well, actually, regarding the Supreme Commander... it seems his son made a ploy to grab for power. The pretenses were blatantly false, but he might have gotten away with it if I weren't there to witness it."

Zarall nods sagely, quickly getting back into the mood. "Ah, so you were able to stop him, then?"

"Not in so many words, but my presence was undoubtedly a comfort to Commander Hiro, knowing that I saw the treachery of his son with my own eyes."

We arrive at the Temple of Artemis, and Zarall pauses just outside the great doors. "It sounds like a very exciting time you had, Gabriel, but it's not really for me. I'll go back to checking the scrolls and updating the registry."

"Very well. Take care, friend." I embrace him with a hug, something only one pureblood will ever do with another. There aren't many of us left, after all.

A few minutes later, I stand before the Altar of Saints, a sacred reminder of those who gave up their lives fighting the demons, eons upon eons ago. I like to come here after visiting the humans, and especially before delivering important news to the King. Michael's spirit might be worn upon my finger, but the memory of his self-sacrifice is inscribed here on the altar, and sometimes I feel as though I can even see his spirit trail.

And what an altar it is. 300 feet tall and a hundred wide, it holds the name of every fallen pureblood from the beginning of time until the present. I've read every name countless times, sometimes out of boredom, and other times out of fear that I might forget my brothers and sisters if I didn't.

The sound of footsteps creeps up behind me, and I turn to see the other two Archangels staring at me curiously.

"Back so soon? We didn't expect you for another day." Uzziel stands on her tip-toes and plants a kiss on my cheek. "I hope the humans didn't kick you out early."

I glance around, but no other angels are in our immediate vicinity. "Not quite, but many things have transpired."

Raphael stands and listens while I recount the happenings of the last few days, and Uzziel wraps her arm around mine, leaning against me lightly.

"...and then there's the matter of what happened when Jason Hiro was attacked by his son. The anti-energy hit him, and it didn't affect him."

Raphael raises an eyebrow. "Goodness, you had me running scared for a moment. And here I thought it would turn out he was, in fact, a demon! Ha ha ha!"

Uzziel swings around on my arm. "Hmm... hmm... so he didn't react at all? Not even a little bit?"

"Nope. Well, he did flinch slightly, and he clutched his chest, but Benjamin Brown assured me it was just a startled reaction. If he were a demon though, then he would have surely died, or at least suffered a grievous wound from a blast at such a close range."

"A demon, is it..." Raphael pauses and stares silently at the ground. "There is something, a memory from the distant past. I feel it at the edge of my mind, but it may have been swept away by the sands of time. Something about... humans with magical power."

I have no idea what he's talking about, but Uzziel jumps away from me and gasps. "Th-that's it! You're on the right path, brother! I remember too!...Sort of."

Her jump from confident to uncertain in a single second makes me chuckle. "You don't remember either, then? What use is that to me?"

Suddenly I feel gears turning in my head. "Wait, hold a moment... are you... I feel something too. Not just a faint memory, but something I shouldn't have forgotten at all. Except... I have."

Raphael's brow is bent with consternation. "Indeed. Troubling. My memory isn't as bad as I make it out to be, yet there is a hollow spot, plain as day."

"Right. I can remember the names of every brother and sister from eons past, but not this one detail? Why?" A sickening churning fills my body, and I have to sit on a marble bench nearby. "Why can't I remember?"

Uzziel speaks, her voice almost a whisper. "If the perfect memories of an angel are unable to recall something... there is only one culprit, brothers."

"Memory manipulation. Someone has changed our brains to remove the knowledge we once had. But who? And why?"

Raphael's question makes me feel even more uneasy.

"Is this hole created by magic... or by technology? It exists. I feel it now. But what does it mean?"

"No point guessing. Ask the King if he knows when you speak with him. It could be benign." Raphael's words are not reassuring.

The three of us feel cold shivers in our bodies, but the feeling passes, and we finally have to laugh the moment off. "Well, um, in any case... I'll be going now." Uzziel hops over and hugs me before walking away to do... whatever it is she does. I think she plays games with the humans when nobody is looking, but then, she's always been sympathetic to their plights.

Raphael sits down on the bench beside me. "Well, since you're going in to speak with the King, I had a favor to ask of you."

"Hmm? What?" He suddenly seems so solemn. This is what I'm used to from him, but somehow it's more intense than usual.

"Regarding... the... the new life King Zeus is creating." Raphael grips his staff firmer. "I haven't wanted to tell you this yet, but with all the changes to the energy supply lately... well, there has been something of concern on my mind."

"Would you prefer Uzziel not know?"

The fact he waited for her to leave is telling. Whatever is on his mind must be of grave importance.

"You misunderstand, Gabriel. I don't want even you to possess this knowledge. The fact the King might know it shakes me to my very core. I have only held this secret all my life silently, knowing it could save us if we were ever truly in a world ending bind."

He continues. "Do you know why they call me Raphael the Wise, and Raphael the Eldest, despite the fact that all of the Archangels are the same age?"

Funny he asks that. "No. I just assumed you were... uh... wise. And knowledgeable."

Raphael lunges his hand out suddenly and grabs my wrist, making me squirm in surprise. "Wrong!" He hisses under his breath. "It is because I am the keeper of a secret power, something the angels swore never to use again, under any circumstance. The knowledge I possess has filled me with a dread unlike any you could ever feel, from the day I swore the sacred oath, to this very moment. The horrible pain I felt muddled every smile, every laugh, every single moment of happiness..."

His hand, still gripping mine, begins to tremble. "And... the fact that I must share this knowledge with you... it hurts me. I am breaking a sacred pact, not because I want to... but because I must. You alone are the only brother of mine with a strong enough will to never abuse this... this horrendous knowledge."

Raphael tears up and wipes them away a moment later. I take the time to prod him. "What is it? If this information is so awful, perhaps I shouldn't know-" I catch myself and stop what I'm saying immediately.

Raphael has a secret, something tearing him apart from the inside out. Whatever it is, I would be selfish to let only him carry the burden. It must be killing him that only he knows.

"Sorry. Raphael, brother, if you wish to tell me, I will listen. Do not bear this cross on your own."

Raphael, in spite of the pain he must be feeling, cracks a smile. "Haha... a cross... funny. Michael would find that very amusing."

"Yes. I believe he might." I touch the ring on my finger gently, and finally, Raphael gathers up the will to speak again.

"Creating a new angel... is impossible."

"Huh?" I blink in surprise. "Impossible? But... but Zeus is doing it."

"Indeed. Rather, I should say that it is not impossible... but that the method for doing so has been sealed away, locked only in my mind, since the beginning of time."

My teeth clench together of their own accord. "What is this method, then?"

"Speak of this to no-one." Raphael hisses the words out again, shooting a suspicious glance at two angels talking to each other across the Great Hall. They're several hundred feet away though, and the Great Hall does not echo voices at all. "Creating an angel requires two things, Gabriel. It requires a tremendous amount of energy, as Zeus is receiving now... but... it also requires..."

Seconds pass before he forces himself to finish. "...fresh life energy."

So that's what it was. For some reason, the revelation is revolting, but not world-shattering as I had expected. "I don't understand, brother. What do you mean by fresh?"

Raphael turns away from me. "In other words, on top of the thought energy that Zeus is obtaining from the humans and Volgrim, it's likely he is killing humans to gain life energy for each angel he creates."

I finally understand what he means. "Zeus is killing humans? How many would it take to create an angel?"

"Just one." The words limp out of his mouth weakly. "That is all. But the human who is killed for the purpose of creating an angel will not be revived as an angel once they die. It requires their entire soul."

"A grim revelation for sure. Still, not to be callous, Raphael, but even if it does require a fresh life energy... it's just one human life. What difference does it make when they have trillions?"

Raphael surprises me again by smiling. "Indeed, you are correct. Just one human soul is a trifle. Even I could not pretend to care about a single person. But that is not the problem, Gabriel. The issue lies in him possessing the forbidden knowledge."

Raphael's grip tightens on my wrist as he sends a mental image through our spirits.

In front of my eyes, an image of the cosmos, bright and radiant, fills the room around me. The bystanders and other angels fade away. Raphael's voice speaks, a soft whisper that quickly escalates into a universe shattering BOOM.

"Behold... the universe! A wondrous place, filled with all manner of sights and wonders!"

Raphael's face becomes a soft, half-faded shape against the backdrop of the cosmos. "Once, there was a time when angels were as numerous as the stars in the sky. Even I know not how we first realized our existence. Besides the angels, there were the Dragons, and the Titans! The three great powers fought for control of the galaxy, but angels were always at a disadvantage. The other species could use their inexhaustible stamina and magical energy to fight and rest, fight and rest... but whenever an angel fought, he would run the risk of draining himself and dying!"

"How then, brother, do you suppose the angels could fight a war of attrition, when attrition was our greatest weakness, hmm?!" Raphael's voice is thundering and accusatory now, aimed at me as if it were my fault the three races warred.

I don't get a chance to respond. "It's simple! We stole the energy of others for ourselves! We ripped the souls from the Dragons, and the Titans, and we added them to our own consciousness! We created more and more angels until soon we began to run out of Dragons and Titans to fight!"

"AND THEN WHAT DO YOU THINK HAPPENED?!" Raphael screams at me and the forms of the three species fighting melts away. "OF COURSE! THE ONLY BEINGS LEFT TO TAKE ENERGY FROM WERE OURSELVES!!!"

A colossal image of angels stabbing each other, tearing wings off, and otherwise mutilating each other in horrible ways plays out in my mind. For every angel born, ten more are murdered by their brethren. I feel anxious and fearful as the scenes play out in my mind.

Raphael's voice quiets down. "Do you remember, Gabriel? Of course, you don't. We were the first angels born, we killed the most, and we lived together, but in spite of your battle prowess and my mind, I knew what we were doing was wrong. The cycle would only result in the extinction of our kind. And so, I called for a cease-fire, not just with the angels, but with the Titans too. The Dragons were nowhere to be seen, or I would have invited them as well."

The pieces finally click in my mind. "That's why you created the demons, then? And the humans?"

"Yes."

The infinite cosmos of the past fades away, and moments later I'm back on that bench, sitting beside my brother once more. A deep sadness lingers in his eyes, one I haven't seen as long as I've known him.

"I agreed, as the arbiter of peace, to carry the burden for our people. We would wipe away wars, anger, sadness. The Titans, being superior to us when it came to the matters of energy creation and collection, devised a system to give us energy in smaller, but more stable quantities, via a species serving only as cattle for our needs. In exchange, everyone would give up their memories of the past. Only I had to live, knowing what we had done."

Raphael lifts his head up and turns back to look at the altar behind us. "These names... they are nothing. I remember countless others before them. Angels whose existences you don't know of. Tens of thousands of angels that would be archangels like ourselves. You will never see them or speak to them."

My heart feels like it's made of lead. I can't even process what he's telling me. "So... if Zeus knows about... the process to create an angel..."

"Then he may know of our ultimate technique. Being a god -the descendant of Titan and angel- he holds the power to use our abilities, in addition to titan powers. He may just possess the ability to steal souls."

"I'll... I'll talk to him about this, then..."

"NO!" Raphael almost jumps out of his seat. "Absolutely not! You are not to speak of this to anyone, and certainly not Zeus! I am only telling you this... so you will be on your guard. You must be aware of what I know. With this, we can ensure no tomfoolery is going on."

I swallow long and hard. "I understand. Thank you, for telling me this."

"Oh, don't thank me. This is not a reward, but a curse. Above all other things, you must never use this knowledge for evil. You must never use this power."

Raphael shivers before standing up. "Ah, I had almost forgotten... the Volgrim are trying to establish a warp-gate to Heaven, just as the humans have done. I strictly oppose it, so just remember that, if Zeus tries to talk you into anything."

"I will, brother." I eye him unsmilingly as he limps away. We do not embrace each other this time, for now we must share in sorrow together.

The power to rip souls from other beings. How... barbaric. Horrific. And the way Raphael looked at me when he spoke of it... I must have been violent before my memory was wiped.

Just how many souls have I taken?

Part 425b: I, Human

I love public speaking. Most people hate it, and I did once as well, but after I grew used to it, it became a thrill that I couldn't get enough of. I long ago stopped wordsmithing calm on myself to steady my nerves, as now I have shifted the butterflies in my stomach into energy that sustains me. Well, not enough energy I suppose. I'm fatigued from drafting this speech throughout all of last night.

I whisper a word under my breath as I stride forward. "Alert." Immediately, the feeling of exhaustion vanishes, and I blink my eyes, wondering how I can instantaneously make such an intense need for sleep disappear. Of course, I can't just abuse my power like that. It's sure to have long-term consequences on my physical and mental health. Though, strangely, I don't think I've ever tested it out... how do I know that?

My black dress shoes clomp on the floor as I stride forward, all the while wondering how I sometimes know things I shouldn't. Memories come to me from nowhere, like dandelion seeds scattered into the wind. Their contents may not even be correct, but somehow it is better just to believe them. Why waste my time questioning everything?

I step up to the podium, holding my datapad loosely the whole time. This speech center, built to my specifications over half a year ago, allows me to broadcast messages to everyone in my empire all at once. A huge arena towers before me, stacked to the brim with people sitting on the mahogany benches to watch, though a large chunk of them are holograms instead of fleshy beings.

Holograms. That reminds me of Marie. Where has she been for a year? I haven't seen or heard from her at all, and the hairs on the back of my neck never stop standing on end as a result. I'd be a lot happier if she were dead, but I can't locate her, and therefore wouldn't know if I killed her even if I used my wordsmithing to try.

Ah, I need to stop thinking about other things. Focus. This speech isn't going to deliver itself.

How many people and holograms are in this amphitheater? Fifty thousand? There's a white-noise filter beaming forth, creating an invisible wall in front of me, so the audience's considerable noise is toned down to a level where I can barely even hear them. It has the unintended side effect of making the audience seem like a bunch of mimes, opening and closing their mouths silently, but I'll deal with it.

I stop in front of the podium and wait for exactly four seconds, and the audience ceases their chattering to sit at rapt attention.

"Good morning to all members of Humanity. As per the promise I made last year, I am giving this speech today as part of my bi-monthly update regarding the operations of our vast empire. As everyone is aware, the Senate and I passed a resolution one year ago to allow unlimited travel to and from Heaven. Angels and humans could visit each other's domains freely, as much or as little as they pleased."

"I am glad to say that my primary goal succeeded. People have been able to see their deceased loved ones, and for the most part, things were going smoothly. Unfortunately, due to the actions of a few, the majority must lose out. As with all good things, it only takes a tiny minority of citizens abusing their privileges to sour the water for the rest. People have been killing themselves to become angels, which lowers the energy we can give our closest allies."

I pause to take a breath before continuing.

"Comrades, I know that the overwhelming majority of you are intelligent. You understand the dangers of such reckless actions. If humans kill themselves any more than they already have, the amount of energy flowing to the angels will slow dramatically. In the worst case scenario, it could invert, causing the angels to lose more energy than we can give. And what then? You will have killed yourself, only for you to end up in a situation worsening every second. On top of that, you will bring doom upon the angels, or force them to purge some of their own kind, as well as other humans who have died, in order to make up the difference."

"All I am asking is that people realize the folly of their actions. By killing yourself just to gain wings or whatever other trifling benefits you think you deserve, you permanently give up living in our glorious empire! Moreover, you are likely to bring about the deaths of friends and family from the past who are just trying to live peacefully, separate from ours."

The majority of the audience nods along with my words. I'm not wrong, after all, and they all know how important thought-energy is for the angels, and for themselves. Their greed is incredibly annoying.

"There is another danger too, being brought about by the people killing themselves. To maintain the energy needed to keep all angels alive, Zeus has been forced to accept an offer from the Volgrim, and they are now giving the angels thought-energy. Think of what this means. We lose clout with our closest allies, and the angels are forced to initiate better terms with the Volgrim. Do you suppose the Volgrim will give up their energy freely? No!"

I rap my knuckles on the podium in front of me. "There is a price for every choice, a consequence for every action. I place the blame for much of what has happened in the last year on myself. I should have researched the potential downsides of allowing unlimited travel between the human and angelic realms, but I did not. That guilt will be on my shoulders for a long time to come. However, because of what the Volgrim are now asking of the Angels, which is a warp-gate directly to Heaven from the Volgrim homeworld, this puts humanity in a precarious situation, diplomatically speaking. A warp-gate to Heaven would allow the Volgrim a chance to strike directly at the heart of our Empire, should the worst ever come to happen."

"A warp-gate is a security threat that I, as Supreme Commander, can no longer ignore. Therefore, to attempt to mollify the angels and gods, and to try and repair much of the damage caused by my policies... I am going to restrict travel between our dimension and the Angels', once again. However, it will still be less strict than it used to be. It will require a special permit to travel from our world to Heaven, and vice-versa, but it will be much easier than it used to be before my policies were enacted, rest assured."

I slide my finger across the datapad, checking the upcoming notes quickly to make sure I'm on track. So far, so good.

This speech is going better than I expected.

* * *

Some people complain about jobs like these, but as for me, I like to put my feet up and relax. I've been in the military my whole life, but since the last major war was about fifty million years ago, I haven't had any action in a long time. I mean, philosophy is better anyway. Who likes fighting? Not me.

I sometimes joke with my crew that I did all my fighting already, in another life, and now I've been reincarnated into my current role as a reward for my hard work. They get a real kick out of that. Imagine, orbiting the same planet for a hundred thousand years, just to make sure some lousy prisoners don't escape. What does the military think they're going to do, jump up and fly away by flapping their arms? Men, I tell you what. They never use their brains.

Well, okay, fine, so there was that incident last year. A single ship got past me while I was sleeping, but it only had one prisoner!

Bla bla bla, Beatrix you had one job and you couldn't do it, nyeh meh bleh. They expect me to be at the ready all the time? Come on. There is nothing out here. A whopping one prisoner has escaped in the last million years, and she took out a small platoon's worth of guards on the surface. If a bunch of men couldn't handle a single measly girl, maybe they deserved to get their asses kicked. I never liked the Warden anyway. For a woman, she was a real prick.

Hell with it. I'm glad they're all dead.

Gah! I can't even enjoy this book! I just want to sit here and read about The Adventures of Tom Sawyer but all I can think about is one stupid incident that happened over a year ago. It's the only stain on my otherwise spotless career! Well okay, there was that whole Goldesh uprising thing, but do they expect me to come in at the last minute and make everything all better? Get real!

I tell you, sometimes I just have to wonder if-

"Captain Beatrix!" Ezekiel, my scanning officer, spins around in his chair, alarm on his face. "There's a Cruiser entering Tarus jurisdiction from hyperspace."

"Yeah? What about it?" I shoot him an annoyed glare. "We see prisoner transports all the time. They're probably dropping off some loon who snapped and killed a mouthy scanning officer."

He doesn't smile. "This ship has no identification. It's not a part of any disclosed ship models. And... its design... it doesn't look human-made."

Finally. Something to do.

I toss the paperback to my side, and it slams on the titanium deck-plate with a satisfying thud. "Open a channel."

My communications officer turns to look at me almost immediately. "I already tried, ma'am. No response."

"Move to intercept, then. We need to know what their business is before we let them proceed."

The looks of alarm on everyone's faces is killing my mood. "Calm down. Our military has many secret projects, and several of those include prototype ships, including Infiltrator-class ships in case we need to sneak past Volgrim defenses. This is probably a drill to test our readiness after the... last incident."

"Sorry, Captain. I didn't mean to overreact." Ezekiel breathes a small sigh of relief.

The chief security officer, calm as always, is next to speak. "Shields are powered to full."

Seconds pass, and I stare at the image of this new ship uneasily. It's huge, probably twice the size of the NFC Luminance, my ship. I don't see any weapons, but appearances can be deceiving.

Ezekiel nearly jumps out of his seat. "What the hell?! The ship just fired a projectile behind itself. It's moving at one-quarter the speed of ligh- huh?!"

He doesn't need to say anything else. Everyone on the bridge gasps audibly as a massive wormhole explodes into existence all at once. Before I can even process what's happening, a different Cruiser class appears from its maw, and then another, and another, and...

"Red alert! Send a message to the other ships in this sector! It's an invasion!" My fingers dig into the arms of my chair, but the worst hasn't even begun.

One of the ships that just arrived initiates a split-second micro-jump, blasting past us and coming within a thousand miles of Tarus II. It rains a cannon volley onto the planet's surface, and the scanners scream an alarm in response.

"The main prison facility is being attacked! What is your response, Captain?"

Shit shit shit... I don't know what's going on. Some kind of targeted attack? Why hit the prison? I'm not familiar with Volgrim ship structure since they're so reclusive, but there can't be anyone else who would do this, unless it's a coup from humanity itself. And that's an absurd notion.

"Distract that lead ship! I don't know why they're attacking the prison, but they must have a reason! Hit them with everything we've got! We must hold out until reinforcements arrive!"

I'm suddenly thrown from my chair and face plant on the ground as our ship violently lurches forward. A second later, Ezekiel coughs, and I look up to see blood trickling down his head. One of my crew pulls me up to my feet, and Ezekiel delivers a report. "They aren't going to make that order easy, Captain. The other ships are attacking us all at once."

"Retreat, then! We can't fight ten-" I glance up at the viewscreen and feel an ache in my gut as more ships continue streaming into the sector. "-ah, a hundred Volgrim warships. We're no good to the Empire dead. Let's get out of here!"

The ship rattles as a massive volley smashes into us again. I just hope I live to regret this.

* * *

"Gabriel! Gabriel!"

A male angel howls my name, his voice filled with alarm. The scroll in my hand seems less pressing than whatever he has to say, so I turn to Raphael. "Ah, excuse me a moment."

"Certainly." Raphael doesn't turn away but instead looks across the Temple toward whoever is causing the commotion. I turn to look as well, and something fills me with dread. It's Zarall. He isn't one to enter the Temple, ever.

Zarall charges past everyone, shoving one angel out of his way forcibly. Something has him spooked, and I don't like it one bit.

"I need help! They're appearing all at once! Thousands, tens of thousands! There's a riot going on! We need to suppress this right now!" He babbles incoherently, but I manage to make out what he's saying, mostly.

"Humans are dying?" Raphael asks the question before I get a chance. "Mass suicides?"

"No! No no no!!" Zarall is at the edge of panic. "All the humans are previously registered Class I convicts! Criminals! They're all from Tarus II, the humans' highest maximum security prison!"

"Merciful saints!" The curse escapes my lips without a second thought. "Perhaps a guard revolt in the prisons? Maybe the prisoners are killing themselves to escape justice?"

"I don't know, but I need help NOW! Get every single angel on the case!" Zarall beckons hurriedly, then rethinks and instead grabs my shirt to haul me along.

I turn back to Raphael as Zarall drags me away. "Don't bother! Tell all the other angels to stay clear! I'll handle this myself! I'm not going to let some half-breeds tear Heaven apart!"

Raphael appears in front of me, moving far too quickly for an old man his age. "The hell you will. Don't underestimate them just because they aren't pure-bloods. That cocky attitude will be the death of you."

I take a step back, startled. "S-sorry. Right, well, send help then. I'll do what I can."

"Yes, you will, brother." Raphael turns around and starts walking to the throne room. "I will fetch Zeus. We may need his power."

"Good. I'll be back soon." I continue running to the door, much to Zarall's relief.

"Follow me! Stop dawdling!"

"I'm coming! Gods!"

A minute later, we've already flown over to the Arrival Platform, and the sight there boggles my mind. Tens of thousands? No... there must be a million humans here already, and more keep appearing, piling onto each other, one by one as they die and are reborn as winged demi-gods.

"What is the meaning of all this...?"

* * *

"I can understand why many might consider the Volgrim to be a non-issue, and I say, to those citizens who believe this... you are wrong. The Volgrim are dangerous beyond anything we can imagine. Certainly, we've had tens of millions of years of strained peace, but this is much more akin to a cold war. We aim our weapons at them, and they at us. Any appearance of civility is just that, a false veneer. If I were to allow them to construct a warp-gate into Heaven, this would surely come back to nip humanity in the toe someday."

The Supreme Commander, Jason Hiro, continues droning on and on and all I can do is lie on my stomach and wait. I'm not waiting for anything in particular, but when the moment feels right, I'll do what I have to.

I still remember that feeling of cold terror. Two nights ago, Steven Feldmann called me, and he was absolutely frantic. The more he talked, the more uncontrollable my shaking became. Pieces and clues began to click in my mind. The weird way Commander Hiro has been acting, all these odd policy choices... and even the manner in which he fired me. Why did he get rid of me, all of a sudden?

It's obvious to me now. Jason Hiro isn't a human. He's a demon imposter. Every action he's taken has served to bring instability to human society.

Don't hold back, Stephanie. His face might be the same as the man you knew for thousands of years, but he is not that man. He isn't a man at all, but a servant of darkness.

Steven's words come back to me, but now I hesitate to carry out his will. It's not that I don't want to kill this monster, but what comes next? I'm unlikely to escape. I might be an amazing sniper, but I'm terrible at lying, and the security council will sentence me to eternal torture when they catch me.

Or will they? If I kill him, then I'll also expose him as a demon, and that will clear Steven's name! He can be free once again!

But what do I want? Even if the best scenario happens... what will I do after this? I love Steven. We might seem distant to some people, but he taught me everything I knew. He pulled me from the lower levels and brought me to the safety of the upper section, then showed me the art of being the perfect spy. All so he could save humanity from those trying to throw us to the hounds.

He used me. I know that. Steven could have picked anyone, man or woman. I'm not special. Maybe it's Stockholm Syndrome... I know he doesn't care for me in that way, but I still love him dearly. Perhaps that's why I'm so frustrated by Lora. Before he met her, Steven always spent time with me, whether showing me new tricks from the baseball manuals he coveted, and telling me all those cute little things about his life. Now, all he does is prattle on about 'Lora this' and 'Lora that'. If only he knew how much I hated hearing about her.

"The angels have never turned their back on us! Far be it for humanity to allow them to suffer under an energy drought!"

Jason keeps talking, and I roll my eyes. The people in the auditorium below me don't go all the way to the back row. From my position in this dimly lit room, I'm almost in total darkness.

Hidden behind a chair that rises a foot above me, one would have to look closely to see the barrel of my Magmellion sticking an inch out from between the two chairs.

Carefully, I adjust my sight on Jason again. It's a nitpicky thing, I just have to double and triple check to make sure everything is perfect. This room is sealed from the outside world, so luckily the wind won't be an issue. The downward angle means I have to compensate slightly, and I can't just fire a test shot to make sure my positioning isn't off...

Damn. I get so flustered when I'm by myself. It's easier for me to calm down around Steven... but if I don't kill this demon imposter, Steven's going to be in prison for millions of years. Sedition, crimes against the state, treason... they're throwing the book at him. I just hope they haven't shipped him off to Tarus II. Fuck. That facility doesn't allow prisoners ever to have visitors. If he ends up in there, I'll probably never see him again.

Jason waves his hands dramatically, but I'm not paying attention to what he says right now. Careless! I need to focus. What would Steven think if he knew I was losing my cool? I've never done a hit job before, but I can hit a target a mile away flawlessly, as long as I take my time. As for something the size of a human head? Piece of cake.

Yeah. Cake. After this, I need to see if they have cake at the- STOP!

That's it. No more time for distractions. As soon as he's still for just a moment, I'm taking the shot. I check the scope and the bullet chamber one last time. Is the anti-energy 'hull-buster' bullet loaded? Yes. This gun could kill a man inside a hover-tank as long as the bullet hits.

No regrets.

...And just as I say that, he starts gesticulating wildly. He's like a cringey Sunday school preacher. Steven used to show me clips and footage from the ancient times, and this is just like them. He's just delaying the inevitable with all this waving nonsense!

My heart slams in my chest. Jason stops just for a moment. He calms down to stare at the audience seriously.

"I cannot stress this enough..."

Whatever he has to say, it's over. I'm done listening. Go back to Hell from whence you came, demon.

My finger squeezes the trigger, and at that instant, he turns to look directly at me. What?! How?

PIFF.

The sound of a gas-compressed bullet snaps out of the barrel, and in the next instant, his head recoils violently, the bullet smashes him backward, pounding the back of his skull into the ground with tremendous force. The audience goes dead silent as horror fills the room.

I... did it.

I killed the Supreme Commander.

Part 426b: Route B Finale

Jason! Watch out! I yell into his mind to get his attention, and he turns to look where I indicated, but-

PIFF.

A sound much like a balloon popping fills the room, and Jason's head is knocked backward.

I can only stare in stunned silence as he falls to the ground. My still-invisible orb flops out of the shoulder-wrapped gurney at his side and rolls a few feet away, but nobody notices.

Jason. Jason! Are you okay?!

I send my thoughts to him, but I get nothing in response. Several men and women rush the stage, all part of his private security squad. "Surround him! Sweep the area! The assassin can't have gone far! Someone call a medical team!" One of the men barks orders and the others make a human shield around their fallen Commander.

From my position, I can see the entire world around me in a 360-degree sphere, all at once. I've already spotted the assassin, just before she fired. Stephanie Guillermo. Of all the people, I never expected her to be the culprit. She's hiding behind a chair in the darkness, but her escape route is already cut off. Her killing intent makes her visible to me like a spotlight in a pitch black void. She'll be arrested, but already it's too late for Jason. He's-

"His eyes! They've opened! Commander!" A female guard leans down beside him, but the moment she touches him, she explodes. Her body blasts outward as if a meteor had impacted her in the chest.

"What just-" A guard opposite her corpse, now blown into a billion pieces, stares in shock. He's covered from head to toe in human entrails, each piece of the woman slowly oozing down his body like a pack of ravenous worms.

Head... hurts. Stop... laughing... Jason's voice appears in my mind, telepathically. Every person in the room freezes, including the men and women surrounding him.

"C-commander?" The head guard slowly takes a step back. "Why do I hear his voice... in my head?"

SILENCE! EVERYONE SHUT UP!

Jason's voice roars like a hurricane, the sound so loud that it makes even me reel back in surprise. By the time I've regained my mental faculties, I can only gasp in surprise. All the guards surrounding him have been blown to pieces, and the floor is permanently repainted red from their blood.

You think you can hide from me, WHORE?!

Jason rises into the air dramatically, his arms and legs dangling at his sides uselessly. His eyes are bloodshot. The expression on his face is like a crazed Rottweiler. He looks completely insane, in a way I couldn't have imagined in a million years.

A moment later, Stephanie screams as he yanks her toward him with terrifying force, destroying the chair she had been hiding behind.

"Oh my god! Steven was right! You're a- GUHK!" She doesn't get to finish her sentence. Her leg tears from her body and pummels her savagely, as Jason beats her to death with her extremities. He casually drops her afterward, letting her body hit the floor with a sickening crunch.

I thought I told everyone to KEEP QUIET!

The audience is trying to make a break for the exits, but he doesn't let them. The doors slam shut, aided by his telekinesis, and all the people in the room are left to cower as he stares at Stephanie's mutilated corpse.

I don't understand what's going on. Jason survived that bullet hit, but it must have given him a concussion or messed with his mind somehow. He's acting like a madman. In all the time I've been around him, he's never hinted at having anger like this.

Jason. You've just revealed your powers to all of humanity. Everyone is watching this broadcast.

I try to talk some sense into him, but instead, a smile crosses over his face. His eyes are dead, empty, unseeing.

You too, Blaarjiim? Even you can't can't stop BACKTALKING ME!

A blast of telekinesis sends me and my orb flying. I smash against the wall, but it doesn't hurt me at all. I can't feel any pain, and it would take a lot more power than that to destroy my orb.

One courageous man steps forward from the audience, a military man by the look of his uniform. "Monster! Demon! What the hell are you?!" He fires a plasma shot at Jason, but the Wordsmith dodges easily, his body jerked to the side by telekinesis. A moment later, he rips the man's arm off and crumples the gun into the size of a marble.

General Zhao? And here I thought you were loyal.

Zhao screams in pain and falls to his knees, futilely clutching at his shoulder stump. "I-I'm not loyal to a demon! Burn in hell!"

Hm... heh... hehehe.... Jason's quiet laugh whispers to my mind and the sound of it chills me to my core. It's sinister, unlike anything I've ever heard. Burn? You want me to burn?! No! YOU will taste the flame!

Jason finally speaks out loud, and just for a single word. " INFERNO! "

A tremendous fire blast shoots out of him, engulfing the room in a heat like the birth of the universe. Zhao dies, as do thousands of others. Screams, cut off a second later by the rushing walls of flame, fill the room. Eventually, all is still. From my position among the charred benches lining the upper section, I can only see a single layer of a mountain of bodies.

Some are alive? Very well. For too long I have given up everything for ungrateful leeches, but now it is time. Your energy is mine!

What life I can still sense in the room is snuffed out like the embers of a thousand candles in a rainstorm. Jason drains the energy from everyone present, then wordsmiths one final word. " Explosion! "

As the building collapses around me, I watch in disbelief as he hovers over to a far door, rips it from its hinges, and leaves. His cackle fades from my mind as the distance between us grows, and soon I can no longer hear him at all.

Farewell... Jason Hiro. I am not unhappy with what you've become. I only wonder if soon, you will come to regret that which has just transpired.

* * *

Everyone in the classroom watches the viewscreen, unable to look away. Jason Hiro, Supreme Commander of the United Earth Forces, transforms from human to monster in several seconds. While delivering a speech to all of humanity, someone attempts to assassinate him, only for him to demonstrate a frightening level of magical power. Somehow, he manages to tear apart everyone in the room without moving a muscle.

Only once he levitates into the air, using an unseen power, does the mental image of a Supreme Commander shatter in our minds. The unnatural way his head lolls about, the dead limbs hanging from his sides and below him; whatever is moving him about, it isn't something a human mind can comprehend.

"Timothy... is that... your father?" Melissa, one of the girls in my classroom, turns around slowly to look at me. "What- what's wrong with him?"

I stare silently at her for a few moments. I don't know what's happening. I don't have an answer to her question. The demon who is killing off the leaders of humanity can't possibly be my father. He would never do anything like that.

But my mother acted shocked last year when he demonstrated his magical powers in front of me. Not shocked that he had such abilities, but shocked that he would show me. For whatever the reason, it was a secret only the two of them knew. Why? What reasons could they have?

"Tim? Tim? Are you here?" James waves his hand in front of my face. I blink slowly to clear my mind, and look at him now. He's trying to act calm, but he's looking at me with fear in his eyes. The terror of the unknown. If my father is a monster, then surely I am too. That's what he's thinking.

There's only one answer I can give. "That man isn't my father. I'm leaving."

I ignore everyone staring at me and slide from my chair, then start marching to the door. Melissa grabs my jacket cuff as I walk past her. "Wait! W-where are you going?"

I pull away from her grasp. I can't feel any emotions right now. I just feel empty. "My father, that man... he just killed off the entire audience. Senators were there. The people that hold the Human Empire together. This... this is the worst case scenario. I need to find out who is left."

James has a look of awe on his face. "You're going to take control?"

"I hope not, James. No matter what happens next, just remember one important thing: Jason Hiro, the thing you saw on that broadcast, is not my father. He's the enemy of Humanity. I will stop him myself if I have to."

The class watches in silence as I stride out the room. The teacher, perhaps also fearful of me, makes no move to stop me.

It's only after I hear the room door close behind me, and the sound of my plaid shoes echoing off the walls of the hallway greets my ears, that I can finally feel a tinge of emotion.

Rage.

He can't be my father. It's a mistake. The demons are tricking us. That has to be it. I don't know what happened to my real father, but that thing needs to be put down.

Suddenly the entire building shakes violently and I trip over my feet, stumble forward, and bash my knees on the cold white tiled floor. The school shakes again and again, each time tossing me around like a well-practiced juggler.

My wrist-communicator vibrates. A call for me? I send a mental signal through its electric sensors to answer the call, and a voice I didn't expect greets me.

"Timothy Hiro. My name is Benjamin Brown. Have you watched the national broadcast yet?"

I clench my fists together, and my nails dig deep into my palms. "Yes."

Benjamin's voice is tight. "Humanity is under attack. The Volgrim are assaulting every system and sector, all at once. Your father- he just... well, he killed off everyone. With Jason Hiro assumed to be an enemy of humanity, you are the highest ranking human left."

His words make my stomach roil. "What?! Everyone? There must be someone left!"

I can almost hear Benjamin shake his head. "No. We need you at Central Comman-" He's cut off momentarily, and I listen to an explosion in the background. A second later he coughs into the microphone. "Shit. I'll do what I can, but we need to re-establish a formal command structure immediately. We don't have time to waste. Get over here!"

I jump to my feet and start dashing down the halls. "I'm on my way."

This time, when the stratoscraper shakes, I don't lose my footing. Humanity is depending on me. I can't let them down!

* * *

The line goes silent as Timothy Hiro assures me he's on his way. Once my focus is no longer on him, I return my attention to the people around me. The sounds of men and women rushing back and forth almost drown out the sound of explosions beyond the walls of our megascraper. Central Command, while filled with people rushing around to communicate with the upper fleets, also has no leadership presently.

I'm a nobody. I worked for Marie, but I was just her agent, her right-hand man. I'm not trained in what to do here. I'm doing what I can, of course, but it's clear the people here don't look up to me in the same way they did to their Supreme Commander.

Damn. Why did you do that, Jason? I didn't think you were mentally weak enough to crack after a failed assassination attempt. But then, the way his arms were dangling at his sides, was he injured in the attack? That might explain his erratic behavior.

I don't have time to think about it though. A woman, Angela, calls out my name. "Benjamin! The forward fleet just made it back!"

"Great. Get me a feed to whoever's in charge, and I want data on the fleet parameters, stat."

I shove past several people to get to her, and by the time I make it across, she's already sending a communication signal to the lead ship. "Here. Take the call. I'll run the numbers for you."

Four painful seconds pass before the bloodied face of a young man appears on the holo-screen. "Central Command?! We don't have an admiral or even a general on call! The best we've got is a lieutenant, and she's trying to run three fleets! Get the goddamn suits up here! We're taking heavy fire! Casualties are in the tens of thousands!"

He doesn't know what Jason did yet? "Son, what rank are you?"

"Private, third-class, sir."

"Congratulations. You're in charge of your ship. The, uh, the enemy launched a surprise attack. The Supreme Commander is down, and so are all of the generals, admirals, and even the scum-sucking politicians. We're short handed, and now's as good a time as ever for fresh faces to step up and become heroes, young man."

The poor kid, barely even a hundred thousand years old by the looks of him, gapes at me in horror. "Are you kidding?! I don't have the experience to lead a goddamn armada! Is there no one else left?"

I stare him right in the eyes. "Take command, Private. I'm temporarily promoting you to Lieutenant. Make your species proud."

Poor sap. Tears fill his eyes. "Yes... yes, sir."

I cut the call off as Angela appears at my side, setting a datapad before me. "Fourteen Cruiser-class ships, and one Artemis-class. No capital ships within five light-years."

"Fine. Send every available fighter and bomber up there. Execute as many attack runs as it takes. If the Volgrim wipe Earth out, it's all over."

A woman screams from behind me, and her voice is cut off abruptly, so I spin around to see what's going on. To my horror, ten armored soldiers have just appeared in the middle of Central Command. The suits they're wearing cover them from head to toe, just like our Hypersuit Commandos. They begin blasting plasma shots at everyone they see, causing panic and mayhem as everyone dashes for cover.

"Son of a bitch! Volgrim in Central Command! Everyone, get down! Battle stations!" I throw Angela to the ground and execute a perfect diving roll to shelter.

A disembodied male voice speaks, the monstrous sound hissing through the air like ice tossed onto a raging fire. "Volgrim? Now I'm offended."

Two more figures appear, both of them only a few feet in front of me. I recognize them instantly. "Two Demon Emperors?!" I bring my holstered gun to bear on the closest, Beelzebub, and blast a shot of anti-energy right at his chest. Bael, the First Demon Emperor, jerks his hand forward, catches the shot, and the energy fizzles out harmlessly.

"That was impolite." Beelzebub says, as he glances down at his nails before looking back up at the chaos unfolding. "Everyone, please cease fighting for a moment. Royal Guardsmen, that includes you."

The sounds of plasma fire stop instantly, except for one of the armored warriors, who either ignores the order or didn't hear it. I listen with disgust as he continues firing and downs two more people in the room who aren't fast enough to escape in time.

Beelzebub crinkles his nose. "Bael, I did give an order, didn't I?"

"Yup. That's what I heard."

"And he's still shooting, isn't he?"

"Mhm."

Beelzebub scowls and looks at one of the other guards who stopped firing already. "How unfortunate. Kill the idiot."

A sudden chorus of blaster fire and one pitiful scream of pain is all I hear as the other nine warriors unload on their comrade, melting him down in an instant.

Beelzebub glares at me. "Stand up. Or kneel, I suppose. Come to think of it; I don't mind watching an ant grovel."

* * *

Both of the two sitting on their rumps slowly rise to meet my gaze. I don't know who they are, but the dark-skinned one seems to be the one in charge, given he was barking orders at the others when we arrived.

"You're colluding with the Volgrim, huh?" The male asks a pointless question, but the absurdity of it sends me a-titter.

"Hah! Bael, the humans truly are gullible. They haven't figured it out yet."

Bael smiles, with that stupid lopsided grin of his. "Kuhuhu, yeah, you got that right....Err, what didn't they figure out?"

He's such a buffoon. "That this invasion is entirely orchestrated by demons, of course. The Volgrim have nothing to do with it. I'm surprised none of these upper-level humans have realized this."

The tan man's face contorts into a delicious facsimile of horror and realization. "What?! The demons are behind this!? That's impossible! There are only 6,000 of you left! You can't possibly staff that many ships."

I wave my finger in his face. "Tut-tut, wrong again, on both counts. You're zero for three now. Care to try again?"

One of the nine Demon Royal Guards walks over to me, interrupting my gloating. "Third Emperor, we've rounded up all the humans in the office. What are your ord-"

I cut him off with a hiss in my voice. "What did you just call me? Open your helmet."

He opens it, as I ordered, and his face has an admirable stoicism to it. "I, ah, called you the... Third Emperor... sire."

Bael chuckles. "Dumbass. He's touchy about being the third, you know."

"I am not 'touchy'!" I shoot a glare at Bael but quickly bring my attention back to the Royal Guard. "In the future, you will address me as 'Emperor Beelzebub', is that understood?"

A drop of perspiration slides down his cheek, and his eyes flick over to his dead comrade. "Y-yes, Emperor Beelzebub."

"Wonderful. As for your orders, kill the humans you've rounded up. I'll leave these two alive for a moment."

The male human gawks at me. "What? No! Please, you can't do that! What do you want from us?"

My eye twitches. "I can do whatever I wish, worm. However, if you agree to order all of humanity's forces to stand down and surrender, I'll let your friends over there live. I care not whether they live or die, after all, only that demonkind is triumphant."

To his credit, he doesn't even consider the request. "Not a chance. You can kill us all. I'll turn into an angel, fly back, and kick your ass myself."

"Mmm. Yes, turning all of humanity into angels is part of the big picture. However, I wouldn't be so confident about the rump-kicking if I were you."

Bael nudges me with his elbow. "It was worth a try, Beelzy."

"Don't..." My teeth gnash together. "...call me... Beelzy."

"So sensitive." The human laughs nervously, but even I can easily see he's just trying to get a rise out of me.

The female, however, has been silent since we arrived. At the exact moment the pitiful cries of her friends being murdered sound off in the other room, she cracks. "No! Don't kill them! We'll do anything!"

"Sorry, woman. Yama's orders regarding this operation are absolute. Now if you'd be so kind as to give us the- ah, what were they called again?" For once, I'm at a loss for words. I eyeball Bael questioningly, and his brain works out the correct answer, surprisingly enough.

"Passwords, Third. We need the passwords."

"Right, that was it." I gently reach over and rest my hand on the female's shoulder. "Give us the passwords to your computer systems, and I won't burn each of your limbs off one by one. I'll give you a merciful, quick death, just like your comrades."

The woman starts to nod her head, but before she can say anything, the man sticks his blaster in her ribcage and pulls the trigger, melting her heart instantly. I don't mean that in a romantic sense.

She flops to the ground, and the life fades from her eyes. "Quick thinking, meatbag." Bael snickers. "Keh keh, she was about to crack, too."

"Indeed. How very annoying. Now, all we have left is one strong-willed human, and it would be a waste of time trying to break him."

"I'm not a meatbag. My name is Benjamin Brown. I won't surrender to the likes of you. If you want passwords, it's the last thing you will get."

He starts to raise the weapon to his head, but Bael lashes forward with his lightning fast palm-strike and batters Benjamin's arm, sending the gun flying.

"Aaahhh!" The man screams in agony and falls to his knees, and even I grimace a little bit. His arm is bent awkwardly behind himself, not a pleasant sight for sure.

"That was a little much, First. Now we have one less limb to torture him with." Before Bael can say anything, I shrug. "Ah, never mind. Too much trouble. Let's just kill him. We'll have to make do without the passwords."

A sound of glass shattering in the other room makes all three of us look at the room's doorway in surprise. Screams of my demonic Royal Guard can be heard, along with the sound of something akin to wet rags being tossed in a pile, and the thud of bodies smashing into the wall.

I'm quite surprised when from around the corner, the body of a young woman emerges. She's covered in blood, likely from my guards she just killed, and yet I sense the same lack of energy that all humans have. She doesn't even have a weapon. How did she-

Oh, I see. She's that slave-girl Jason took under his wing. Larry, was it? Humans have such undistinguished guttural names, they all sound the same to me.

She looks flabbergasted. "Where's Jason? I thought he was here!"

Ben, still trying not to pass out from the pain, looks over at her weakly. "Lora...? You shouldn't- you're too late. Everyone is dead."

"I know." She points at Bael and I. "I loathe demons. Before I leave, I'll take out the both of you."

First glances back at me. "Say, didn't Jason enhance this female to be tougher than others of her kind? She's all muscles, right?"

"Indeed. Are you going to have a swing at her?"

Bael cracks his neck and turns to face her. "I need a workout. I'll snap her in half, and after I'm done, I'll have a little fun with whatever's left."

"You repugnant oaf. Have at her then. See if I care." I roll my eyes in disgust.

He's so uncivilized.

Bael ignores my insult and advances toward the young woman, his head scraping across the ceiling as he walks. His massive figure dwarfs her, like a mountain compared to a molehill. "Ya know, sweetie, we killed all your little friends. Yama said that since we didn't need the whores anymore, they were useless. I didn't have much fun killin' meatbags that couldn't fight back, but you seem different. Hit me real good."

I can barely see her face from behind Bael's bulk, but the sensation of anger and rage is unmistakable in the air. "You- you bastard! I'll tear you apart!"

She charges at him, hurling a table in the process, but all I can do is yawn.

It doesn't matter how strong she is. Nobody can beat Bael when it comes to a physical bout. I could easily defeat him during a no-holds-barred fight, but I'm just not interested in wasting my time.

Their blows collide, and I turn back to Ben. "I wonder if I should keep you as a pet?"

* * *

Thousands? No. Millions.

Angels keep spawning at a ludicrous rate. Like a stream that has transformed into a raging river, humans die and appear in the air, falling to the ground in ever increasing numbers. In all my eons of living, I've never seen a sight like this. Using my spiritual energy, it's all I can do just to shove the mass of half-breeds below to the side to unblock the area where the new ones are appearing. Should I fail to keep it clear, they will likely pile up and start fusing together, then die horrific deaths. It is not a sight I wish to see.

Zarall, not one to use his powers regularly, pants with exhaustion as he tries to help me shove new angels out of the way. Other purebloods are working to put down the prison insurrection, but the prisoner numbers have been rapidly deflated by the arrival of unrelated humans. It took us a while to figure out a Volgrim invasion of human space was the cause for this, but now that we know, the unending torrent of new arrivals makes sense. It's the worst case scenario. If we survive this, the energy ration will be greatly diminished, and potentially even inverse.

The angels will begin to die off, short of us taking drastic action to protect ourselves.

"Gabriel, how much- how much longer?" Zarall wheezes after shoving another small pile to the side, each new arrival staring around in bewilderment at what's going on.

"I don't know, brother. Take a break; I'll keep up the work."

He nods and falls backward, collapsing softly on his wings, and breathes hard. "Thuh-thank you. I'm sorry for my weakness, Gabriel."

"Gabriel! Zarall!" A voice cries out from my left, the direction of the palace, and I breathe a little easier as Raphael and Zeus fly over to us. Raphael lands first. "I brought the King. What is the situation?"

I explain hurriedly, and Zeus gnashes his teeth. "I can't believe it. The Volgrim! And after all their talk of negotiations..."

Raphael nods sagely. "It is no wonder they wished to build a portal to Heaven. In any case, we cannot leave Humanity as they are. This situation is also quite dire for us."

Zeus stares at the fountain of pseudo-angels pouring from the distant sky. "We may need to purge them. They are going to drain our reserves."

Raphael coughs, "My liege, we have more than enough energy to survive a long time after this war is over, and vast stores of energy saved up for situations such as this. I would advise we assist the humans in their hour of need."

Zarall jumps to his feet, his tiredness gone. "There is another solution! Send these half-breeds to the front lines! They were human before, so fighting for their previous species might be a good maneuver, and if they die, it's less of a burden on our energy supply."

All four of us nod in unison. Zeus pats me on the shoulder. "A wise choice, but we need to get these recruits back to Earth. What if-"

He's interrupted by an angel flying forth, a pseudo-angel, by the looks of him. "You there! You are King Zeus, as well as the Archangels, correct?" When we nod, he sighs in relief. "My name is General Zhao. Jason Hiro slaughtered all of humanity's top military leaders at once. We suspect he is in league with the demons, and this may be part of a broad, concerted effort to mix with the Volgrim and bring humanity to its knees."

Zhao explains quickly to us the events that transpired, and Raphael's face pales. "I... I can't believe it. Magical powers? But he's a human! He-"

Raphael stops suddenly and turns to look me in the eye. "You're thinking it too, aren't you? This must be related to what we discussed recently."

"Yes, you're probably right. Jason Hiro is the key. We have to find him." I nod at Raphael, before turning to Zeus. "We first need to aid the humans. If all of their leadership has been killed, then we will send the leaders back first. I recommend opening a portal directly to Earth. That will speed up transit times exponentially."

Zeus looks uneasy. "I agree with the sentiment, but putting a portal there, while they are under attack, is directly opening us to our own invasion. The Volgrim currently only have one way here, and that way is through the Lirius system where our warp gate resides. It may only be a hundred light-years from Earth, but that's still close enough for them to jump to and invade us within a few hours, or less if they're using Trifrancium to jump at ultra-high warp speeds."

Zeus pauses to glance at the human converts still spawning in, before frowning. "Actually, I've just changed my mind. Gabriel, take this small amount of energy, make a portal to Earth, and we'll destroy it if the situation becomes dangerous for our kind."

Well, at least he convinced himself. "Yes, my King. I will make the most of this opportunity."

Raphael shakes his head. "I remember when the amount of energy needed to make a new Gate would have nearly exhausted our energy. Times have changed, haven't they, Zeus?"

Zeus's expression has a hard-set edge to it. "Indeed, they have."

* * *

My head won't stop pounding. I can't feel my arms or my legs, and my vision is out of the question. I can only use my telekinesis to feel around, like a false set of limbs, and a newly acquired sense... the ability to 'see' the energy of those around me.

They look delicious.

Small blips of energy scatter as I hover through the hallways, heading nowhere in particular. Each blue light, seen through a filter of darkness, is snuffed out and swallowed as I continue to drain the energy of anyone in my way. Each drop of energy lessens the pain in my skull, but the agony always returns a minute later.

I need more energy. GIVE IT TO ME! I am the Supreme Commander, and the energy of worthless parasites is mine to take!

I bump into a wall and frown. I can usually detect them with my telekinesis, but this one- ah, it's been partially destroyed. My false 'arms' must have passed right through it.

I can hear explosions in the distance. I feel a trembling in the air sometimes, but I don't know what the cause is. Fighting? Who? Why?

I'm blind, but not deaf. I can hear a squeak of fright as I draw near. A woman's voice. "No... please!"

Everyone begs me to stop, but I don't care what their complaints are. She falls to the ground, comatose, once I've had my fill.

Perhaps if they hadn't stood up to me, perhaps if they had treated me with the respect I deserve, it wouldn't have had to happen like this.

But no, instead they tried to assassinate me. This is how I'm repaid, in the end, for my mercy to humankind.

I will never forget how they turned on me.

There's nobody left on this floor or fifty floors above. I smash my way through the ground below and float down to the next level, where once again delicious drops of energy scatter and scream. One stops in front of me, and I perceive him or her lift their arms up, probably to aim a gun at me, but I don't let those types live. His energy is drained and body destroyed summarily, and I move on to the next morsels.

This is the freest I've ever felt in my whole life. No more people talking back to me, no more plots and plans, deviations and ploys, just people terrified of my awe-inspiring power.

It should always have been like this. I was a fool to play the good guy. I can't change the universe unless I bend it to my will. And even if I do make a difference, who cares? It's much more important to enjoy myself. The opinions of an insect mean nothing to a God.

"Jason Hiro! Enemy of the state! Stop right there!"

A voice yells out, and I can hear footsteps, but I can't sense the energy of the one talking.

He continues. "You are under arrest for plotting with the demons to take over humanity! Do not resist, or we will use lethal force!"

Heh. 'Lethal force', he says. He must have anti-energy surrounding him, that's why I can't sense him. No matter.

" Collapse. "

With a single word, the sides of the building give out all at once. I teleport away to the world outside this tower and listen in satisfaction as the building crumbles down, pulverizing each floor with the one above it.

Hovering in midair, the sound of one of Humanity's greatest building accomplishments falling to pieces thanks to a single word fills me with joy. I have the power to rule the universe. None can oppose me.

Squandering this gift would be foolish.

I teleport inside another Stratoscraper nearby and resume my work, but something isn't right. This one is usually filled with people too, but all around me, the energy within their bodies is weak.

"S-Supreme... Commander..." A man's voice whispers from just a few feet away. "Save us... the demons... they..."

His voice trails off and a final hiss of air escapes his mouth. What's this about demons? Is Yama up to something?

"Human!" A different voice, much further away, sounds off. "It's the Supreme Commander!"

His energy comes into view, and it's much different from all the humans I've seen so far. Red and twisted, like a roaring flame, it is far more concentrated than that of the skimpy portions I've had until now.

Many other balls of red energy come into view, likely from around walls and corners. The sight of them is making me weak with hunger. " Bow. "

"Huh?" Confusion is in their voices, but the sounds of their knees hitting the floor and their figures prostrating themselves before me makes me happier than I ever thought I could be. Lunch-time.

A few moments later, my power has increased more than ever, since just a dozen demons had more energy than all the humans up to this point.

And when I think about things in that way, I've been going about this incorrectly the whole time! Forget humans; I should be focusing on angels and demons!

There's a shift in the air. When I look towards its source, I can only gasp. Four sources of energy appear, two of them are large enough to put all these demons to shame, but one of them is insanely bright, like looking directly at the sun. I have to turn away from it, for fear of blinding myself.

"There you are. We've come to stop you, once and for all, Hope. "

The voice that speaks... it's... my voice?

Suddenly I'm on the alert. It's another Jason, just like the one I defeated before. But this one is stupendously powerful. His energy might just be enough to shred the universe to pieces. I don't have a moment to waste. An ambush is the only way to win.

" Create! " A hardened, ultra-dense pebble appears in the air before me, hovering with aid from my telekinesis. " FIRE!! "

My eardrums are nearly blown out as a stupendously powerful explosion smashes me backward, pounding me through god knows what furniture and other things are in the room, and the pebble rockets forward, smashing into the other Jason and-

"That won't work." His voice speaks again, and the sound of a weak thud echoes across the room. "I knew you were a monster. But this? Now you've gone too far, Hope. You can't even pick an ally. You just devour the demons and the humans alike for your own selfish greed."

What the hell is he talking about? Why does he keep calling me Hope?

"My name is Jason Hiro. I can't see you, but your voice is the same as mine. I suppose you're another one of Marie's clones, eh?"

I pull myself back up to a floating position, and the other Jason pauses. "You must be lying. Of course you're Hope. Who do you think you're fooling? Your actions speak louder than words."

The smaller energy signature takes a step forward. "Hold on; maybe he isn't lying. Perhaps he doesn't remember yet." His voice is also the same as mine!? Two Jasons?! How am I supposed to fight two of them? And what of the smaller energy signatures, are they also me?! Four?!

"You have a point. Let us see if he is lying then. Remember. "

* * *

I can't think- oh god- so many memories... so many! AHHHH!

A tornado, a hurricane in my head! My brain already hurts enough! MAKE IT STOP!

* * *

I collapse to the floor, an eternity having passed.

I remember now.

I remember everything.

"Hero. That's who you are." I speak to the Jason before me.

His voice is tinged with smugness. "So now you know, eh? We've come to put an end to you, Hope. You're done for."

Ha...

Haha...

Hahahaha!!

HAAAAAAAAHAHAHA!!!

He has the wrong person.

"I'm not Hope. But I know who is."

Chapter 3 – Route C

Part 427c: Doubt

A few dozen demons chatter amongst one another, sitting at tables here and there. The stale air in the room fills my nostrils, my disgust only matched by a silent apprehension regarding the conclusion of this game.

Clink, clink, clang.

The Eldest Animus, Smealum, tosses his bones onto the demon-stone table and they spill around into various shapes, followed immediately by the stone-carved Mahja sticks.

"Heh. The Hydra pattern, with four flames. Luck is on my side today." Smealum chuckles to himself before rubbing his bronzed arm. "You'll have a tough time beating that, eh, Ylvusk?"

He's right. The Hydra pattern is a challenge to roll and only occurs once in a thousand tosses. I glare snidely at the Animus. "Cheatin', are ya? And here I thought High Demons were respectable."

A Demon Duke sitting at our small table snickers to himself. "You're an idiot. Smealum just has the wrist movement perfected."

"I don't need you to defend me, Torlok." Smealum beckons at me. "Anything can happen in a game of Sticks and Bones. Your toss, Ylvusk. Unless you haven't got what it takes?"

The sound of embers crackling from a nearby torch fills me with unease. "This is just a friendly game, right?"

"Of course. We wouldn't want to bully a lowly dark-walker." Smealum's snickers quietly to himself.

A couple of other demons at a nearby table peer at us with interest, whispering something about Smealum's Hydra toss, but I can't make their words out. Smealum and Torlok both smile at each other, even though Torlok tossed a Salamander when it was his turn. Hardly worth bragging about, I think to myself.

I scoop the dried bones up, filling my right hand, handling them gingerly so I won't break them. The dealer here is known for his temper when imps break his pieces, and I had to pay the rental fee today. Cheap-ass High Demons. I grab the Mahja sticks with my left hand, holding all five with the eyeball patterns facing me. There are four sides to each rectangular stick, but somehow I feel the eyes are the luckiest. Other demons swear by the flames, and maybe even the fists, but nobody likes the sword. The sword is simply too... human.

An instant later, I flick my right hand out, and the bones scatter across the table. My heart skips a beat. Basilisk! Just one point less than a Hydra!

Next are the Mahja sticks. They clatter heavily against the demon-stone and immediately dash my hopes against the rocks.

Torlok laughs heartily. "Bwahaha! Two swords and a full spread! Pathetic! My lowest underling could do better!"

The Eldest Animus leans back in his seat and stretches mightily. "Looks like it's 7-6-6, my favor. Too bad though, I preferred the score from last round."

The other demons in the room sigh and go back to talking or whatever they were doing. Several long moments pass as boredom creeps into all three of our minds, and finally Torlok coughs into his fist. "Say, Ylvusk, you've had this miserable feeling about ya all day long. Anything going on?"

As Smealum watches silently, all I can do is sigh. "Yeah, kinda. Tvoorik's evaluation is today. He's been nervous, given that evolutions are so rare lately."

"Mutations." The Animus corrects me with a single word. "Still, it's nice to hear the Emperors are even considering him. Energy for mutations is scarce these days. We've been losing demons left and right to the humans..." Smealum's voice catches slightly. "I guess that's part of life."

Interestingly, even Torlok is a little downcast. "You're lucky you've got such a good friend, Ylvusk. Tvoorik can be a bit precocious, but he's intelligent. For a demon."

Smealum finishes that thought. "Torlok and I had such a friend, once. The humans took him away from us."

Torlok exhales angrily. "Not humans. One human. Hero. That mangy little meatbag, barely even out of 'is capsule thing, and he kills Yama with one word. Just one! I swear, if I ever get my hands on him..."

A murmuring goes around the room as several other demons look at our table, then back to each other. Most of them nod and mumble in agreement with each other. One demon with a terrible scar across his face speaks out. "I was with the Duke of Reptiles not long back. The humans came from nowhere, wiped out a whole squad of orcs in the blink of an eye! I barely made it out alive! Filthy meatbags, they wouldn't be nothin' without that Hero among them!"

I slink into my chair slightly. Oops. Tvoorik and I were there for that. I hope this scarred one doesn't recognize me.

Several other demons pound their tables angrily and start whooping, demanding the blood of the humans, but Smealum raises his hand. "Now now, calm down. That's an order. We won't defeat the humans by stooping to their level of barbarity. I've seen the humans fight our people, long ago, in the time before many of you were born. It's best to leave matters of war to the Demon Emperors. They know how to deal with humans."

From across the room, a familiar voice speaks up. "Oh, do they?" I sit up a little straighter and look over to see my bestest buddy in the whole Labyrinth, Tvoorik, ambling towards our table. "Last I checked, the Demon Emperors are in charge right now, and we're still losing demons by the thousands every month!"

I catch a look of annoyance from Smealum as he turns away from Tvoorik. Oh brother, not this kook, his eyes say.

Tvoorik strides over and sits down to my right, then nudges me in the shoulder. "They denied me!"

"Huh? They refused your mutation?" My feeling of happiness vanishes. "That stinks like rats! You've been working hard for demonkind!"

Tvoorik winks at me before turning his dual-horned head to Smealum. "Didn't I tell you? If I mutate into an Oracle, I'll know too much. They're scared of me putting all the pieces together!"

"Uh huh." Smealum is wholly unconvinced, and he shifts his chair slightly further from Tvoorik. "If you say so."

"I do, I do!" Tvoorik nods excitedly. "Think about it! This one human shows up outta nowhere, blows up two planets, unites all of humanity, and starts killing demons by the thousands, and the Emperors just let him get away with it? They're in on it!"

"Right, right, an inside job. Of course." Smealum rolls his eyes dramatically and looks away from the table. "What do the Emperors have to gain by the killing of our kind, anyway? Your theories always seem to hand-wave that part away."

Tvoorik's black eyes, those of a shadow-walker, shine for a moment. "It's so obvious! With fewer demons around, the Emperors can scoop up more energy for themselves! If the humans stage a comeback, they can also order more of the lower-ranked demons to their deaths against the humans, and thus cull the undesirables who speak out against their tyranny!"

"Such as yourself?" Smealum coughs the words out, but Tvoorik ignores him.

I tap my lip thoughtfully as he rants. "Isn't it possible the Hero is as strong as everyone says? Even Mephisto lost to him..."

This time, it's Torlok who chimes in. "Mephisto ain't a big deal. His whole thing is being a ghost, and nobody can land a hit on him. If the Hero were able to get around that, Mephisto would be a cakewalk."

Smealum grabs a Mahja stick and rolls it around in his hand absentmindedly as he stares at Tvoorik. "Only a stupid demon would deny the existence of heroes. We might not have witnessed their power in tens of millions of years, but I assure you, they exist." His eyes narrow and he glances at the bones on the table. After a few moments, he pokes them around, until he forms the Dragon shape. "The curious thing is that I can't remember anything about the last Hero. The fleshbag existed, but I remember nothing. We don't even have records of his or her power. Curious."

Torlok points a wrinkled finger at one of the lower ranked demons. "You, gimme a Blood Pie." He turns back to Tvoorik, "Smealum's right. We both saw the power of the Hero, but neither of us remembers the fella. If you wanna talk about conspiracies, there ya go."

My best friend's eyes light up at the thought. "I'm telling you! The hero's working with the top demons! It's a plot to keep us in line! Things were going too easy, so he let loose the Black Witch! If you line up the dots, everything makes perfect sense."

"That's the thing about conspiracies," Smealum drawls, "they always fit together so conveniently."

Tvoorik groans, but sits in silence for a long minute before nudging the Mahja stick. "There's no winning with you. Look, let's just play some Sticks and Bones and worry about it later."

Torlok licks his lips as the underling demon brings over his Blood Pie. "You imps play a few rounds without me. I'm starving."

"You're such a pig, Torlok." Smealum grabs the bones and sticks and shakes them around. "I'll make this round exciting. The losers each have to hunt five humans for the winner."

I glare into Tvoorik's dark eyes before turning to Smealum. "Two-to-one odds, both of us versus you. We're gonna cream ya."

"It's your pyre," Smealum says as he gives the bones a toss.

* * *

" Everything is your fault. You trusted him. "

Cassiel's voice speaks, but her mouth doesn't move. Her head leans back against my hand, and the sight of her wrenched neck causes my chest to tighten.

" Our deaths are on your hands. You betrayed us. "

Blood pools from the gash in Samantha's chest and runs down my arm. I can barely keep a grip on her, and she begins to slip away.

"I- I didn't mean to! It was an accident! What else could I have done?!"

Their eyes close, and two final words fall from Cassiel's lips. " -your fault... "

GUH!

The strange fog vanishes and my breathing speeds up, soon the girls vanish and my eyes open. There's a wood ceiling above me, curving up to a triangular roof. My breath comes in ragged gasps, and soon I blink away the strange delirium.

The sound of a strange empty wind batters our small wooden house. The cute sound of Cassiel's almost silent snoring to my right, and Samantha mumbling in her sleep to my left makes the tightness in my chest loosen. Silently, I rub both of their backs and press the girls against me.

It was just a dream. A nightmare, even. It felt so real.

Where am I? What am I doing, again? Ah, right. I remember now. We're on that strange barren planet. Another bubble-world to explore. Just a night of sleep before we set out on an adventure.

Somehow, this moment, the feeling of the girls on each side of me, and the smell of oddly sanitized air- it's all familiar. Deja Vu.

I shake my head to clear the muddled feeling in my brain, then gingerly pull myself up to a sitting position, carefully extracting Cassiel's wing from under me. I wouldn't want to yank a fluffy feather out accidentally.

After I've righted myself, I glance around the room. There is only one window to the outside world, but it shows a barren brown dustbowl. Before I purified the air of this planet, it was acrid and nearly impossible to breathe in. I don't know why the Labyrinth would connect to this world. I have yet to understand many things about demons and their goals. Why did they enslave humans, yet never kill us? Why allow people to live normally inside of bubble worlds just like this one?

Samantha shifts around next to me, and I use the opportunity to teleport out of bed and into our small kitchen. Quietly, I wordsmith just under my breath. " Juice. "

A glass of cherry lemonade pops into existence in front of me, and I silently sip it down while I gaze through the lone window. There are mountains in the distance and huge cracks and fissures in the land before them, but every few moments, I feel as if something is calling to me.

Sometimes it's a sweet whisper, begging me to come closer, other times a nagging sensation, as if I must go forth.

"Hero? You're awake?" I'm startled and flinch as the ever-sneaky Samantha slinks up to my side, yawns, and presses herself against me.

"Yup." I wrap my free arm around her to steady my nerves. I'm not this jumpy usually. Keeping my voice quiet to not wake up Cassiel, I continue. "I had a hell of a dream last night. More of a nightmare, honestly."

"Mmm." She snaps her hand forward and snatches the lemonade out of my hand, downing the remainder in one gulp, before poking me in the spine with her pointy tail. "Did the big strong man get scared by a bad dream?"

"It's hard to explain." I resist smiling as she teases me, since I'm being serious for once. "I don't remember what it was about, but it was awful. I never want to feel that way again."

Her smile fades away. "Oh, love. You want me to kiss the pain away?"

I pull away from her and walk over to the mini-bedroom, then pull on my underwear and pants. "Not right now. Let's just wake up Cassiel in a little while and get going, Belial."

Samantha pauses to stare at me in surprise, and at that moment, I feel Deja Vu once again. "How do you know that's my name?"

"Uhh..." I trail off as I look her in the eyes. "I don't know. Didn't you tell me?"

"No." She shakes her head. "I wasn't planning to tell you unless I had to. I'm not mad, you know, but that name- it isn't me. It belongs to the second demon emperor, and I loathe that title."

"I know." Pulling my shirt on, I murmur and glance at the dried desert outside the window. "Something feels very familiar about today."

Samantha slips over and sits in my lap, and the two of us hold each other for a long few minutes. Saying nothing, but enjoying each other's company, and eventually the sound of rustling on the bed makes us look back. Cassiel yawns and opens her eyes to stare at us. "Oh, I see you're both having a great time."

"Something like that."

* * *

Cassiel and Samantha walk on either side of me as the hot wind blows against us. Cassiel's magical barrier extends from out of her body and surrounds all three of us quite comfortably, protecting us from the worst of the elements, but still, the massive star in the sky beats down savagely on the plantless desert.

"I hope we aren't here too long. This world is unbearable." Cassiel complains loudly, and everyone nods in agreement.

"It wasn't always this way." Samantha, in a rare moment of insight, speaks as if she's been here before. "Sometimes these worlds have quite a rich history."

A single small rock bounces across the desert, passing us and rolling away to an unknown destination, far behind us.

"Have you been here before?" I direct the question at Samantha, but Cassiel shoves her white hair out of her mouth and decides I must have been asking her.

"It's my first time."

"Oh. I was actually, ah, asking Samantha." I correct her quickly. Cassiel looks a little miffed but shrugs and looks away.

Samantha leans her head against my arm. "I may have been here once or twice. Why do you ask?"

"Do you know what this planet's name is? It's already far bigger than any other we've come across until now."

The succubus pretends to ponder it for a few moments before shaking her head. "Not a clue, love. I'm awful with names and faces. I certainly can't remember the name of some random bubble world."

Bubble world. That's the term I've used to describe portals to other worlds within the Labyrinth. I never thought too hard about the term, but I started calling them that because of Hero City. Without a doubt, it was a legitimate planet, albeit impossibly small. I could walk around the entire globe in just a few hours, and the city spun around into the horizon at an eye-rubbingly short distance. Other than Hero City, I've encountered only a few other small planets, though none at quite the same tiny scale.

And this planet? It must be the size of Earth. Somehow, when I look past the desolate wastes, I see a place that once teemed with life.

"That's fine. No need to dwell on- AGH!" A terrible ringing sensation explodes in the back of my head, like a distant screeching sound. The tattoos on my darkened skin pulse with magical energy, as if something is agitating them. Immediately, a feeling of fear washes over me, as I trace the location to a crater several miles away.

I know what's in that crater. The thoughts in my head swirl around like a raging volcano. An image of a an inhuman expression flashes in my mind, as though a memory from a distant past had somehow infiltrated my psyche.

"Are you okay, Hero?" Cassiel's voice brings me back to full alertness, and the painful ringing fades away. She tilts forward to look up at my face. "Your face is ashen."

"Sorry. There's a buzzing sensation in the back of my head. It's like a beacon of some sort, and it's pointing me in that direction." I point towards the crater a few miles away, and Samantha inhales sharply.

"A buzzing sensation? I don't feel anything. You're not imagining it, right?" Samantha glares at the crater in the distance.

"Absolutely not. Let's be cautious."

An hour passes as we shuffle through the desert, but we pick up the speed as we move closer and closer to the crater. When we finally reach the lip of the crater, my chest is heaving. That goddamn buzzing has become more akin to a foghorn, and I can scarcely keep on my feet.

Once I spot the spaceship below, I know for a fact that I've seen it before. It shouldn't be possible, but I've stood at the lip of this crater once already. I just don't know when.

Cassiel leers over the edge and the steep incline half a mile to the ship below. "I'll fly you down there."

"That- ah... that won't be necessary." I groan as another headache sprouts inside of the previous one. The spaceship must be hitting me with radiation or something because the feeling is unbearable. Without waiting to give her an explanation, I teleport down below and pound on the ship's exterior with my knuckle. Instantly, the buzzing ceases. Just as I knew it would.

With the pain gone, I quickly examine it. Galaxy Exploration Force, read the faded letters on the side. Several characters are worn off, but a few are barely visible. The ship is the length of a football field and shaped like an hourglass. Its large rear section of the ship has dozens of engines facing backward, while a somewhat narrower middle section connects to the bulbous front of the ship. Windows are smashed all over the outside of the ship, and the general condition of it is bad enough that I have to assume the crash landing was unbelievably violent.

Walking around the front of the ship, I spot what is probably the bridge, and I'm surprised to see it's built for only four crew members. On a ship this size, one would think they'd need a dozen people to manage everything.

They probably have robots to help out, I think to myself as I step inside. Two inches of dust coats every surface and wall, and I immediately sneeze twice as I look around. Thanks to this planet's sun, the inside of the Bridge is somewhat illuminated, but the hallway that leads deeper into the ship is dark and foreboding. Focusing my energy on the tattoos covering my body, I force them to glow brighter than ever, turning myself into a lightbulb that illuminates the room around me.

The bridge is covered in futuristic-looking LCD-panels, but all of them are long since broken and useless. Tapping the nearest one does nothing.

Walking over to the half-open door, I put my back into it and start to yank it open, only for the door to hiss loudly and pop open easily. The ship appears to still have power.

Indeed, a popping sound above alerts me to lights flickering on, and a few moments later, the tattoos on my body have served their purpose. The lights above are dim and covered in dust, but they do an adequate job illuminating the corridor before me. With the lights now on, I spot several skeletons, with scraps of clothing still attached. Humans, probably, and long since dead. If I had to guess, I'd say most of them were... American? It's tough to say.

A movement further up the hallway makes me stiffen. A man appears and turns to look directly at me. I recognize him in an instant as he speaks. "Greeting: Hello, I am glad to serve you! Hello, I am glad to serve you!"

I clear my throat and make sure to keep my distance. "You are... OMEN, correct?"

Part 428c: Return To The Ship

The rubber-skinned automaton stares at me vacuously, as though I'm little more than a blank blackboard for him to etch chalk onto. The sound of wind batters the shell of the spacecraft, but I can only slightly hear it through all the metal insulation.

"Pleasant Answer: Yes, you are correct. I am the Original Mechanical Exploratory Neohuman. My shortened designation is OMEN Unit 17. Question: What is your designation?" A fake smile plasters itself across OMEN's face, and I shudder slightly. Without a doubt, I've seen that expression before, and something about it chills my blood.

I look past the robot, at the barely illuminated corridor that leads to a sealed off door in the back. "My designation is, well, Hero, I suppose. My real name is Jason Hiro, but nobody calls me that."

OMEN closes his eyes for a moment before opening them again. "Processing. Response: Jason Hiro, it is my pleasure to serve you. My memory files are very corrupted due to this craft running in a low-power state for so long. What is the situation on Mars?"

"Mars?" I stare at him in surprise. "Why would you ask about Mars?"

The robot tilts his head slightly. "Thoughtful Elaboration: Mars is the fourth planet in the Terran-Sol system. As per the obliteration of Earth via the Volgrim's surprise attack, Mars is the new homeworld for humanity in Earth's absence." OMEN pauses for a moment, "Unsubstantiated Hypothesis: Due to sustained lack of contact with the homeworld, it is possible that the Volgrim may have eradicated humanity. Revised Query: What is the status on the whole of humanity itself? Are you the last remaining survivor?"

I take a few moments to respond. My head is swimming with the implications of everything OMEN just said. "I, uh- well, that is..."

Thoughtfully, I lower my head to stare at the floor and tap my lips. Don't tell him there are other humans left! My mind screams a warning to me. Once again, that funny feeling that I've done this before itches at the back of my skull.

I quickly lift my head back up and stare right into OMEN's soulless eyes. "The majority of humanity has been wiped out. I lead the final resistance against the demonic hordes."

OMEN doesn't hesitate. "Response Analyzed: Your reply indicates you are now the highest ranked member of the United Earth Federation. Rapid Query: Is this analysis correct?"

"Yes."

OMEN nods in response. "Authorization Confirmed: Pending any further developments, I have registered you as the proxy Supreme Commander of the United Earth Federation. Random Query: How were you able to locate this ship's distress signal without a transponder?"

A transponder? I don't even know what that is. "Well, I came here because I felt this awful buzzing in the back of my head. As I walked closer, it became almost unbearable, but I pounded on the ship's hull, and that stopped it."

OMEN takes several long moments to respond, before slowly closing and opening his eyes. "Cautious Presumption: You are a Candidate. Query: Are you a Candidate?"

I don't know what a Candidate is, but that strange feeling nags at me once again. "Um. Yes."

OMEN's internals release an odd grinding sound, and a moment later he attempts to bow, but his rusted frame creaks under the effort. "Error: Unable to provide correct body motion to show deference. Bypassing. If you are a Candidate, then this OMEN unit will remove all red-level data lockdowns. Do you have any queries of your own?"

This robot... he speaks so oddly, yet once I look past my initial misgivings, he isn't all that bad. He might even be useful. "A few. How long has this ship been stranded here?"

He pauses. "Tentative Response: Data corruption renders this unit's answer inconclusive, but a preliminary estimate puts the crash data for this ship at approximately one hundred million, two hundred thousand, five hundred forty-five years, nine months, seventeen days, and-"

I cut him off before he can finish. "Right, I get the idea. What happened to the crew?"

"Detailed Response: Immediately following the crash, the toxic atmosphere of Volgarius Alpha spread throughout the ship. Any personnel not equipped with exploration suits died in minutes. Unfortunately, the GEF-140 was only equipped with five such suits." OMEN emotionlessly describes the events of that day, then shakes his head. "Due to the hostile atmosphere of this planet, and the limited oxygen the five officers were able to salvage, they were barely able to survive for five months while they waited for rescue. All personnel perished waiting for a response."

"Oh. I'm sorry. I don't know what to say." I cough into my hand. "Apologies for all the questions... but why did you crash here?"

OMEN tilts his head down to look at a blank display before him. "Error: My memory archives are incomplete regarding that matter. Data degradation is substantial."

Gingerly, I walk past him and peek into a side-room where more ancient bones are lying on the floor. "Why were you-" I pause for a moment. "Wait, did you say this planet's name is Volgarius Alpha?"

"Affirmative. It is the former homeworld of humanity's greatest enemy, the Volgrim."

The Volgrim. OMEN mentioned them before, but I wasn't paying much attention. "Who, or what, are Volgrim?"

"Elaboration: The scourge of the Milky Way. They are an alien species that launched an unjustified war on humanity, and eventually, they rendered Earth uninhabitable via their highly advanced weaponry." OMEN creaks as he lifts up one of his arms and a holographic projection of a face appears in midair, beaming from a projector in his palm, though it's very distorted and difficult to see. "Their forms are quite similar to those of a humans', other than their six-fingered hands and reptilian-like mouths filled to the brim with razor-sharp teeth. Despite their similarities to humans, Volgrim act very differently and are regarded as the most dangerous threat humanity has ever faced."

"I see. They do sound scary... but why was your ship scouting out their former homeworld?"

OMEN takes my question in stride. "Hypothesis: Though this unit cannot know the exact details behind any orders given out from Humanity's leaders, it is hypothesized they wished to learn more regarding the homeworld of their greatest enemy, to find potentially damaging secrets that could lead to total annihilation of the Volgrim."

Tapping my foot thoughtfully, I pivot quickly to my last question. "How did this ship maintain power for a hundred million years? Even in a low-power state, that seems rather ludicrous."

"Proud Response: After the biological crew perished, the synthetics aboard reconfigured the ship to draw power from the toxic particles in the atmosphere. At a concentration of twelve percent, Diolithinitroxicine proved an adequate substitute for other materials to power the ship's engines. Additionally, the lower concentration of oxygen in the atmosphere, while detrimental to biological life, has alleviated issues with corrosion for the synthetic crew. Every five years, I would reactivate the ship, and we would repair any severely damaged systems as best as we could. We have functioned remarkably well given the circumstances."

Almost immediately, the robot's fake smiles vanishes and a more neutral expression replaces it. "Observation: Until twenty-nine hours and thirteen minutes ago, this planet's atmosphere had remained relatively stable. It suddenly shifted to something more akin to what a biological life form, especially a human, would find ideal. Query: Are you the cause of this change?"

I nod slowly, unsure if this will piss OMEN off. "Yes... I changed the atmosphere myself."

My body flinches reflexively as a panel in the ceiling suddenly slides open, and a tiny camera-like device pops out and aims at me. Two seconds later, OMEN returns to his generic creepy smile. "Examination Complete: Scans indicate an exceedingly high level of spiritual energy. As expected of a Candidate. Additionally, this unit has detected two other biologicals just outside the vessel, and each of them also has a large amount of spiritual energy. Hypothesis: They are hostile entities. Request: Permission to eliminate?"

My body stiffens almost immediately. "Denied. They're with me."

"Noted: Reconfiguring analysis. Each entity has been scanned and filed as allied life forms. Do you have any other commands?"

I rub the back of my head thoughtfully. "You're, uh, cool with me having magical energy, then? Right? You're not going to try and kill me or anything?"

OMEN stares at me silently for a moment, as if I'm stupid. "Amused Response: No. As a Candidate leading humanity, you are expected to have magical abilities. That much is evident."

Oh. This smug piece of shit...

"Yeah, okay. I'll be right back. I need to grab Cassiel and Samantha. They're probably annoyed I'm taking so long."

OMEN nods, perhaps a little too dramatically. "Acknowledgement: Acknowledged! I will wait for you to return. Should I keep this ship in low-power mode?"

A sigh escapes my lips. "Seriously, dude. I'll be back in a minute. Calm your tits."

* * *

Cassiel is tapping her foot impatiently and crossing her arms with a cute pouty expression, but the look on Samantha's face is one of dread. As I walk over the hill to where they're standing, Samantha exhales deeply. "Oh, good. You're back. I was worried."

The angel rolls her eyes. "Sammy, you're such a kid! Ooh, ooh! Hero, what's down there? Was there anything cool?"

I smile, but it feels a little insincere given all the information OMEN just dumped on me. I'm not certain how to cope with what he told me, nor how to piece together a missing history I know nothing about. "Sorta. The ship still has power, unbelievably enough. I found a robot inside, and he filled me in on a bunch of information. Wanna come down and have a look?"

Cassiel nearly jumps into my arms in excitement. "Do I ever!"

Samantha is far more reserved. She turns to look out at the horizon, "I'd, ah, rather not. I don't like technology. Human weapons are distressing."

Her concern worries me. Despite Cassiel's excitement and how she's tugging at my shirt, I wave her off. "Hold on, Cassiel. Samantha, I'll protect you. The ship has recognized me as the leader of humanity, and it registered both of you as my allies. It won't hurt you."

She shakes her head and digs a heel in the ground. "I don't want to, Jason. It's not even about fear for me. Machines make me... uncomfortable. You weren't there for the Energy Wars. The dead look in their eyes, the way they killed without feeling pleasure or discomfort regarding their violence... it's unnerving." She rubs her arms and glances back down at the ship. "Whatever is in there, it's nothing I wish to see."

Her tail flicks around, like a cat nervously waiting for a hound to walk away. Cassiel hops away from me and pokes Samantha in the chest. "Come on, Sammy! It'll be fun! Hero's gonna fix up the ship, and we'll fly into space, then we'll get to see all sorts of cool stuff! Don't be a spoil-sport!"

Samantha looks a little irritated, so I pull Cassiel away and decide to try a different approach. "Suppose the robots do turn on Cassiel and I, do you want them to tear us apart? I'd expect you would want to be there in case things go south."

At my words, she groans. "Okay, okay, fine. I'll go. I'm just saying I don't like this, not one bit."

Not wanting to give her a chance to change her mind, I wordsmith once. " Teleport. "

All three of us arrive at the ship's bridge, and the girls both look startled for a moment but quickly shake the disorientation off. Cassiel's eyes light up as she looks around. "Wow! Look at all these computers! This feels just like home for me!"

She's very bubbly right now. It's the most I've ever seen her come out of her shell. Compared to Samantha, the one who is usually bubbly and flirty, but who now clams up around all this human technology, I almost feel as if their personalities have swapped.

As Cassiel runs around making 'boop' noises as she pokes at long-dead broken screens, I wipe the dust off a console next to me. "Are you somewhat familiar with technology?"

She nods enthusiastically. "Oh, heck yes! My mom and dad were both ex-military, so they always had all sorts of gadgets lying around the house. It was lots of fun getting to play with them and learn how they worked."

"Charming." Samantha lets a single word drawl out as she leans against a console, only for her to jerk away and rub her barely-covered butt. "Ah! It's cold..."

"Well, yeah. Metal is like that, doofus." Cassiel rolls her eyes dramatically.

All I can think about is what Cassiel just said. "Err, didn't you tell me that your childhood wasn't pleasant?"

Her smile diminishes. "Huh? Did I say something like that? Not at all! My mother and father were kind people. Other than the accident that claimed my life, everything was going quite well for me."

"Oh." I decide to leave it at that, but her words leave a sinking feeling in my stomach.

That isn't right at all. I remember what she told me about her past. Why is she changing her story now? My memory isn't screwy, and it has never been before.

Cassiel sneezes, and her wings spasm, knocking up a cloud of dust. This makes Samantha sneeze too, and she lightens up a little bit to giggle at their predicament, even as both of them sneeze again.

Something is going on. Everything is too clear, too close to a feeling that I've done much of this before. If I didn't know any better, I'd say I developed a precognition ability, in addition to my Wordsmithing. Is that possible? Will I evolve new powers as time goes on?

What about that nightmare from before? I can just barely remember it... screams of terror, a pang of despair, and possibly a face drenched in agony. Is something awful going to befall me? What if it isn't me, but Samantha and Cassiel? I can't just ignore the feeling, either. I've been predicting things all day long with uncanny accuracy. This is not the time to doubt my creepy dreams.

"Hello?" Cassiel pokes me in the rib, getting my attention.

"Huh?"

My dumb expression makes her raise an eyebrow. "I see you're off in your own little world. Well, are you going to show us the robot or what?"

Right, the robot. At the mention of OMEN, Samantha tenses up noticeably. "Robots are stupid."

"No they're not! Robots are awesome! They can shoot lasers, and fly around, and they always look so badass!"

I start walking toward the back room and the girls follow behind me.

"I know they do. That's why I don't like them." Samantha's voice has an ominous edge to it.

Seconds later, OMEN spots me walking down the hall. "Greeting: Welcome! It is good to see you once more, Supreme Commander Hiro."

"I was gone for five minutes. Don't get carried away." I flick my hand back at each of the girls. "These two are Cassiel and Samantha. They're my girlfriends. If you hurt them, I'll tear you to pieces."

Cassiel shoves past me and gawks. "Oh my gosh! No way! It's a real robot!"

"Yeah, duh. You didn't think he'd show you a lizard or something, did you?" Samantha's biting wit is only muted by her tense tone of voice.

OMEN stares ahead at nothing in particular as Cassiel pokes his face curiously. "Sooo, what's your name? I'm Cassiel!"

Despite his blank expression, his voice has a deeper tone to it than before. "Response: I am the Original Mechanical Exploratory Neohuman. My duty is to serve all those who crew this ship. I am humbled to be in the presence of an angel once more. My records indicated the angels were extinct, but I will correct them immediately."

Cassiel turns back to me, her cheeks flush with embarrassment, but also a look of awe in her eyes. "He's... he's so cute! Can we keep him?"

"Oh brother," moans Samantha, "now she's in love with it."

* * *

Carefully placing the Crown of Solomon on my head, I focus my mind on all parts of the ship around me at once. It takes a tremendous effort, but I'm able to visualize every component, every electrical connection, every important detail all at once. And finally, those thoughts explode outward as I speak a single word. " REPAIR! "

Immediately, things begin to happen. With an awful screeching noise, metal shifts around and folds itself back flatly along the walls. Rust vanishes, windows reform, and computer screens pop back on. The whole time, my energy is drained rapidly due to the mental strain and level of intricacy involved, but eventually, I finish, and end up depleting less than 10% of my total energy.

Cassiel is positively delighted by all the whirrs and beeps, and her eyes brighten when she sees that the front 'window' of the ship is actually a huge monitor, now displaying the ship's hull integrity as a series of green borders.

Samantha sneezes loudly. "Jeez! Hero, could you be a dear and clean the place up, too? The dust is unbearable!"

I glance down at the floor, still covered in an inch thick layer of grey sand. I wonder how much of this dust is human remains? I can only shudder at the thought. " Clean! "

Immediately, the dust vanishes and I'm suddenly blinded as the lights, no longer dimmed by eons of buildup, blast out ten times brighter than before, their light reflecting off the suddenly shiny surfaces all around us. I feel almost as if I'm standing in the center of the sun, absorbing all its light into my eyes.

Even the girls wince painfully. Cassiel takes the lead. "Computer, lower ship internal lighting brightness by 70%, if you please."

A robotic male voice, not unlike OMEN's, speaks from the ceiling. "Confirmed." The lights quickly dim again, and the three of us breathe easier.

Samantha sighs and slumps into the captain's chair on the bridge. "Okay, well, this isn't too bad, I suppose. Now that it's all cleaned up, this ship is a rather respectable thing to look at."

"Have you ever been in a spaceship before, Sammy?" Cassiel's wings slowly swish as she flops in the chair nest to Samantha. "They have all the modern amenities, you know!"

"Amenities? Like what?" Samantha tries to sound sour, but her curiosity is piqued.

"Well, they usually have fantastic bathing facilities, spas, and also replicators, so you can create any food you want instantly!" Cassiel hops out of her seat just as quickly as she sat down, and with one smooth motion, she floats over to a wall panel I hadn't noticed before. She presses a button on the panel. "Hot chocolate."

A moment later, the machine makes a whirring sound, and a brown mug appears, with warm liquid inside. Cassiel greedily sips at it, only to frown. "Huh. It doesn't taste as good as I thought. Oh well, most food doesn't. I guess angels don't need taste buds."

Samantha flits over and takes the cup from her hand and gives it a try. "Hmm. Well, I've never had this before, but it does taste quite bland."

I shrug and walk over, giving the liquid a taste. To my surprise, it tastes incredible! In fact, it might just be the best hot chocolate I've ever had in my life!

Just as I'm about to mention it's just their sense of taste, I catch an odd look in Samantha's eye, though Cassiel is too busy staring at me to notice.

That's when it clicks. Samantha is trying to make Cassiel feel better. If Samantha says the drink tastes good, Cassiel will be sad that she's missing out.

I almost screwed up. Thanks, Samantha. "This is some real swill. I think you might have hyped replicators up a little too much, Cass." I set the mug back on the replicator platform and press a button that says 'reintegrate', and a moment later, the cup and its contents vanish, sucked back up into the replicator to be recalled later.

Cassiel smiles sweetly up at me. "At least I know it's just the ship. Anyway! Let's take a bath! We're all so dirty now!"

Samantha smirks at me. "Unless you'd like to wordsmith us clean and steal the fun away."

"No, definitely not. I'm looking forward to a real bath." I give both girls a quick kiss and walk over to the captain's chair. "But first, let's see if this ship can fly."

Cassiel's eyes light up again. "Ooh! Can I be the navigator? I always wanted to fly a spaceship!"

"Sure. I don't know what I'm doing anyway, so you might as well-" I don't even finish before she shoves me out of the way and plops in the chair, clapping her hands gleefully.

Her hands move at a speed I can barely comprehend, slapping a dozen buttons in sequence, as if she's done it a hundred times before. I glance over at Samantha, and she winks at me. Let her have some fun, the gesture says.

The ship shudders, making me stumble around as it activates its engines and other doohickeys that will lift us into the sky. Samantha suddenly appears mortified, and she quickly sits in the nearest chair. "Oh, uh, I don't think I ever mentioned this but... I'm deathly afraid of heights. Haha...?"

Whoomph. The ship lurches up, and I topple backward, falling on my ass. Cassiel flinches. "Oops, sorry! I'm not used to the controls yet! I'll activate the inertia dampeners first next time!"

Samantha squeezes her chair's arms so hard the metal caves in. "Yes. Do that. Please."

I pull myself into my chair and smile as a feeling of excitement washes over me. The world outside starts moving as we lift up in the air, and Cassiel taps a button to change the bridge's main display into a see-through window so we can see the ground racing away. Samantha looks positively queasy.

As the ship ascends, Cassiel's smile is replaced by a look of concern. "Oh. That's odd. The ship's scanners are detecting an energy signature on the planet somewhere. It's roughly five hundred miles away and is somewhat faint, but it's definitely there."

Samantha's queasy expression is quickly replaced by a look of abject panic. "Cassiel, listen to me. Ignore it. Some things are better left undiscovered."

Cassiel snickers, "Oh, you! So jumpy! You were scared of the ship too, and look where that got us! Let's just fly over and take a quick peek! It won't hurt anything."

The succubus shakes her head quickly. "I'm serious." Her breathing quickens. "We should leave this planet and put some distance between us."

Her sudden mood shift is even making me nervous. "Samantha, does this have anything to do with the fact this planet is named Volgarius Alpha? Is this because we're on the Volgrim homeworld?"

Samantha chews on a nail. "Um. Something like that. Look, Hero, you weren't there. The Volgrim created things during the Energy Wars. I would prefer we not disturb anything we don't have to-

Cassiel cuts her off. "Oh, come on! I'm now the most powerful angel that's ever lived, you're the second most powerful demon emperor, and Hero is a demigod who can change reality with a single word! There is nothing we should be afraid of! I'm going to fly us over for a quick look."

Without waiting for a reply, Cassiel taps a button on the console, and the ship jerks forward, pinning Samantha and me against our seats.

Was Cassiel always this assertive? I silently wonder to myself if this is even the same girl I knew before. Maybe I wasn't paying attention, but her curiosity is insatiable.

"This is a big mistake," Samantha intones, as the horizon races toward us.

Part 429c: The Bunker

Samantha's tail twitches back and forth anxiously, like a cat waiting for a dog to sniff up a different tree, while Cassiel's wings quiver with excitement. As for me, I sit and watch the world roll by under our craft, silently wringing my hands. Samantha has been uncharacteristically reserved ever since she woke up, while Cassiel has been giddy at the thought of seeing human technology again. Somehow though, it's Samantha's outlook that's rubbing off on me. Cassiel was chained to a wall for millions of years, while Samantha knows things about the outside of the Labyrinth that Cassiel and I don't. If she's nervous about something, there's probably a good reason for it.

Samantha plays with her long black hair and jumps in her seat when a new voice in the room speaks up. "Query: Where are you directing the path of this ship?"

I glance over and spot OMEN standing behind the three of us. We're all seated in the captain, navigator, and gunner chairs respectively, so all of our backs are facing the rear of the ship. This sneaky robot must have come up while we were deep in thought, but his arrival makes Samantha unbelievably tense.

"It's not your business. Buzz off." She waves her hand dismissively at the automaton, and Cassiel scoffs.

"Sammy! That's rude. He's just asking a question."

Samantha rolls her eyes, "And I'm giving it an answer. It's none of that thing's business."

I decide to ignore their squabble. "We're following a faint energy reading a few hundred miles from where this ship was crashed. Do you know anything about it?"

OMEN closes his eyes for a second, then opens them again. "Processing. Tentative Response: I am aware of no such energy readings. Given this planet was once home to the Volgrim, it is entirely possible there may be an outpost here. However, the likelihood is remote. My calculations put the probability at 2.1%."

Samantha glares at the robot. "Is that so? Maybe it's just a leftover energy generator. That tech stuff might run for billions of years if nobody's using it."

Cassiel clears her throat. "Ah, well actually, Sammy, even if the power source involves fusion or the core of the planet, it would break down quickly without someone to maintain it. There's probably someone still living there." She says this so confidently that I'm not sure if she knows it's true or not. While she and Samantha debate it, I slip the Crown of Solomon on my head and confirm that, indeed, no fusion generator or even exotic energy is likely to run forever without someone maintaining it. Even a star would eventually run out of fuel, though it would have far more material to work with than a planet.

A thought occurs to me. "OMEN, you said your ship was surveying something on this world before you crashed. Do you happen to know what that was?"

The robot stares at me blankly. "Immediate Response: Negative. I am unable to access much of the data regarding the crash. Hypothesis: The crew deliberately deleted that data prior to their deaths. Assuming this were true, I would have no way of knowing their motives or reasons as to why. Extrapolation: Something of interest was scanned, therefore they did not wish for anyone, be they human or Volgrim, to learn of its existence. The female angel's assessment of the situation is the most likely."

Cassiel smirks at him. "I have a name, you know. It's Cassiel. Calling me 'female angel' is rude."

OMEN doesn't get a chance to respond. The ship beeps an alert, and the male computer voice speaks from the ceiling again. "Unknown energy source is now five miles away. Would you like to activate the short-range scanners for more detailed information?"

Before I can respond, Cassiel beats me to it. "Yes, please activate them."

The AI chimes pleasantly. "Orders confirmed. Running short-range scans now."

Several seconds pass, and during that time, the ship passes over a mountain and travels a few miles, until soon I spot something that makes my heart skip a beat.

"Cassiel, Samantha... is that a giant metal door in the side of that mountain?"

Samantha's eyes widen, "I hope not."

Cassiel is more relaxed. "Probably. I guess this is an old Volgrim outpost. This planet is far too destabilized for life, so whoever may have once been stationed there had to have abandoned it a long time ago."

The AI blares a warning. "This vessel is being scanned. Someone is hailing us from the planet's surface. Shall I accept the request?"

Cassiel's face whitens. The pleasant expression vanishes. "The hail is audio-only. Very primitive, possibly a form of radio transmission?" She taps a button, "I'm patching it through... now."

A wheezing noise is audible from the ship speakers, and the sounds of feet scrambling in the background can be heard, along with the sound of someone putting a finger to their lips and shushing the others nearby. Seconds pass.

A man speaks. His voice is deep, and there's a sense of urgency to it. "Ahh, kree-gul, n-nowash to la... err, ellis no..." His voice is halting, and he appears to have difficulty speaking, as though he doesn't know how to pronounce his words. He gives up after a moment. "I cannot speak Volgarian very well. My name is Noah, and I am a resident of this facility. If you value your lives, you will turn your vessel around and leave. I'm sure your records show what happened to the last ship that ignored our warnings."

Cassiel taps a button, and a look of surprise is on her face. "I muted our side. His name is human, and his Volgarian is awful. No Volgrim would ever enunciate like him, so it's safe to say he's probably human."

"I agree." Samantha's expression softens, as though she has left a great deal of worry behind. "Though this raises many questions, even as it quiets a number of my concerns. We should probably take his warning and leave."

"Unmute him, Cassiel. I'd like to speak with him." I nudge her softly in the arm, and she nods. The screen beeps as our audio is enabled. "Noah, my name is, uh, Hero. I am human. I'm not here to cause any trouble; I'm just curious about your, uh, facility."

The man's breath is tight, as though he's moving around quickly, yet trying to maintain composure. "You should leave at once. This world is very hostile to human life. We cannot open the docking bay doors without killing everyone inside, and if you step out into the open air, you will die as well."

He wants us to go away. That much is clear, but I don't think he knows what's happened to the planet recently. "When was the last time you stepped outside your bunker?"

Noah breathes for several long moments before responding. "Too long."

"Can you run a scan of the planet's atmospheric composition? I think you'll be surprised by what you find."

He's wholly unconvinced. "Look, I don't know what you're trying to pull, but we've spoken for long enough. The last thing we need is for Ionis to hear about this. I'd prefer to avoid another bloodbath. I'm sorry you came all this way, but your journey was a waste of time. There isn't a chance in hell we're allowing you inside. It's for your sake, and ours."

Ionis? What kind of name is that? The thought crosses my mind, but I ignore it. "You misunderstand. I've completely altered the planet's atmosphere. It is now suitable for human life."

Noah's breath slows to a stop. "That's absurd."

A shuffling sound ensues as several people scramble about, but I can't tell what's going on otherwise. A few minutes later, Noah breathlessly speaks again. "H-how did you- this isn't possible. We would have detected an atmospheric stabilizer big enough to purify the air on this planet. What are you trying to pull here? Have you manipulated our scanners?"

I shake my head but realize he can't see me, so the gesture is wasted. "No. I am a human with special abilities. This might come as a surprise to you, but I changed the atmosphere all by myself."

Noah inhales loudly, but no words come out. A minute later, he speaks again. "What did you say your name was again?"

"Hero."

"Can you- can you spell that out for me?"

I chuckle wryly, "H-E-R-O."

"Uh huh." His voice is incredulous. I hear a faint curse under his breath. "Land your ship outside. I'm about to make a fool of myself, but my curiosity is killing me. I'll come out to you, but if you are in any way screwing with me, Ionis will make you regret it. Do I make myself clear?"

Again with the Ionis stuff. "Perfectly."

The feed cuts off without a farewell.

Cassiel blinks twice. "Well, that was rude."

* * *

Half an hour passes after our ship lands. I feel somewhat uneasy the whole time, given the people inside could be gearing up to ambush us, but OMEN calms me down. "Amused Response: This vessel is outfitted with a dozen micro-dreadnaughts and one hundred harpoon-class ion missiles. We should be able to fend off an attack from five armed Volgrim scouting ships at the same time. It is unlikely the humans inside have anything that will be able to defeat us in the event of a surprise attack. Especially given the Supreme Commander's Candidate abilities."

There's that term again. "OMEN, what is a Candidate? You keep calling me that, but I'm not certain I know what it is."

OMEN plasters another creepy smile across his face. "Commentary: Given your acknowledgment that you are a candidate, in addition to your displays of magical power, it is highly unlikely you do not know what a Candidate is. This unit is capable of detecting sarcasm at an elevated rate compared to the average human."

"But... but I wasn't being sarcastic."

Cassiel interrupts me. "A side door just opened. It's smaller than the main door, just big enough for a human to enter and exit. Ah! One person is coming out."

All three of us lean forward and squint at the screen until Cassiel talks again. "Computer, magnify on the human, zoom level eight."

The computer beeps in the affirmative and the human is enhanced. Based on what Noah said, this is probably him. He's wearing a full-body containment suit, likely to filter out the contaminants he thinks are in the atmosphere.

Noah slowly walks forward, stopping every ten feet or so to look at a computer screen attached to the wrist of his suit before continuing again. After five minutes, he stops, looks up at our ship, and slowly pulls off his helmet.

He's an older man. If I had to guess, I'd say mid-50's. His hair isn't grey yet, but a few strands are lighter than the rest. His big, bushy black beard surrounds his pale skin in such a way that it looks almost out of place. If I had to make a snap judgment, I'd assume he's been in many fistfights and knows how to throw down.

Cassiel taps a button to lower our ship's landing ramp, then looks at me and smiles sweetly. "Let's go greet him!"

A minute later, we step out onto the dry landscape as a gentle, rustling breeze blows past. The air, as always, smells stale and unlike the world I was born on, yet not unpleasant. Noah watches silently as the girls and I walk down the ramp.

"So you're 'Hero', huh?" His eyes flick from me to Cassiel on my right, and Samantha on my left. "A human, an angel, and a demon. Considering angels are extinct, last I heard anyway, this is a sight I never expected to see in my lifetime."

"We're his girlfriends." Samantha forces a smile, but it doesn't feel sincere.

"Great. What's with the, err, tattoos?" Noah stares at my face carefully, likely watching the shimmering lines that cover my entire body, brightening and dimming as I breathe. Contrasted with my skin, which is far more tanned than in my youth when I was a pasty teenager, it lends me a somewhat frightening appearance. Noah doesn't appear disturbed though.

"I absorbed the energy of three ancient archangels."

My explanation is apparently sufficient for him. "I suppose that makes sense, at least as much as anything else so far. What do you want with our outpost, anyway?" His eyes shift again to examine our ship. "And why are you flying around in... that? It's been a long time since I saw a ship resembling yours."

I decide to skip the part where we found it on this planet. Noah doesn't recognize it, so he probably doesn't know about the crash site, and I'd prefer not to give him too many clues. "It's a fixer-upper. I repaired it with my powers."

"Oh." He scratches his beard thoughtfully. "I'm torn. On the one hand, I have a thousand questions for you. On the other hand, you're risking your lives every second you stay here. If Ionis decides you're a threat, there isn't anything we can do to stop him."

I open my mouth to ask what this 'Ionis' is he keeps referring to, but he shakes his head and continues talking. "Then again, Lady Victoria was quite clear that I can use my judgment exclusively regarding your crew. If you're willing to risk your lives, you can enter our facility."

Risk our lives? "Can I at least ask who this Ionis is? The name certainly isn't human."

Noah raises an eyebrow and chuckles. "It's better if you don't know. You definitely wouldn't go inside if you did."

I hate cryptic people. I want to tell him off, but Samantha nudges me. "Hero, let's just leave. We don't need to go inside, do we?"

As usual, her prodding only awakens Cassiel's ferocious curiosity. "Don't be a spoilsport! There's nothing we have to be afraid of!"

Her comment makes a question pop into my head. "Noah, don't you realize you could be making a grave mistake? What if we're hostile? Letting us in could doom your base."

His smile widens dramatically. "Haha! That's a good one! If you killed me now, you wouldn't get off this planet alive. If you go inside and make one wrong move, I don't care how powerful you think you are, Ionis will kill you instantly. Anyway, are you coming, or not?"

All I can do is scowl. This smells super fishy, and Samantha's unease seems to wash over my left, while Cassiel's curiosity splashes over my right. I don't know what to do, but at this point, I just want my questions answered.

"We'll go in. We don't mean any harm, so hopefully 'Ionis' realizes we're good people."

"Yay!" Cassiel hops up and down, while Samantha groans.

"Samantha, if you want, you can stay here. I'm not going to force you to come along."

She ignores my warning. "I'll go."

I guess that settles it.

* * *

A few minutes later, we stand before the massive metal hangar doors that lead into whatever the facility is. The hole in the mountainside rounds into an oval shape at the top and each door stands over a hundred feet tall. Perhaps it's an old reconditioned starship base? Noah walks over to the side entrance I saw before and stands, staring blankly at it. After a minute, there's a hissing sound, and the entrance creaks open an inch. Noah reaches into the crack and heaves with all his strength, pulling against what must be eons of rust on the hinges.

Once it's open, the four of us step inside. A white plastic/ceramic alcove has been built around the door, along with a ventilation system that travels up and outside. "Decontamination room. It used to be necessary before you purified the planet's air," Noah says. "assuming you actually did that, of course."

Noah throws the door open on the other side and strides out into the main hangar area. I follow after him, and the girls are right behind me. We're immediately greeted by what must be fifty men and women, all of them unarmed, staring at the four of us with wide eyes. Most of them look quite old, and many of them must be retirees, judging by the grey hair and sagging skin. Still, there are some younger thirty-somethings among them, and the younger men's eyes immediately shoot to Samantha, staring right at her tightly fitting 'clothes.' I use the term in the barest meaning, given she wears strips of fabric that hardly cover anything. I'm used to it by now, but the guys here aren't.

Noah waves his hand chidingly. "Let's not crowd, everyone. Give our guests some space. It's not often we have visitors in the first place."

"Indeed." A woman steps forward, older than all the others here by a long shot, leaning heavily on a cane. Her long blonde hair stands out, along with the strange outfit she's wearing, something ancient - even by my standards. It's a dress, dark green in color, with puffy shoulders and a skirt that stretches down to the tips of her toes. A veil lightly covers her face, and my immediate impression is that of 1500's nobility. Indeed, people step out of the way to give her extra room as she ambles over to me. Despite her wrinkled face and dry skin, her blonde hair shows that age is just a number for her.

"Lady Victoria. These were the only three aboard that ship." Noah tips his head at her. "The man is, err, Hero... as for the other two..."

I suddenly remember I didn't introduce the girls. "This is Cassiel, and this is Samantha."

The woman, Victoria, narrows her eyes. "Dark times must be ahead. A Hero has arisen, and he is followed by the Second Emperor of Hell, along with a member of an extinct species. Ionis will, no doubt, see you as a threat. I wonder if you will perish."

Samantha pushes past me. "Hold on. How do you know I'm the Second Emperor? That information is hardly known to anyone these days."

Victoria nods slowly, "I know many things, Belial. Once, a long time ago, it was my job to learn the secrets of the galaxy, and never reveal them. Even now, looking at the clear embodiment of the Hero, a harbinger of a system I had thought destroyed, I know it to be alive and well. The question I am asking myself is... why now, of all times, has a Hero appeared? And why on Volgarius Alpha, I wonder?"

Samantha stares at the old woman for a few long moments. "I'm terrible with names and faces. Do I know you?"

"We used to be mortal enemies, during the Energy Wars." Victoria raises a finger and waves it at her. "But then, I suppose all humans look the same to a demon, eh?"

"Something like that." Samantha rasps the words out, "So how do you know me?"

"My full name is Victoria Vanheimmer Rothschild. Once, when Earth was still around, and my secret society was at their prime, I ruled humanity from the shadows, seeking to eliminate the demonic and angelic control over humanity. Now I know that I failed."

Samantha's eyes widen. "Rothschild. That isn't a name I would soon forget. You must have led the Illuminati."

"And you said your memory was poor." Victoria tut-tut's to herself. "Welcome to the final resistance against the Volgrim. This is the one place they will never openly assault no matter what. Come, I'll take you to our guardian."

Victoria doesn't wait for us to respond, instead shambling off past the crowd again. Noah follows after her, and so I tag along behind him.

Once we've moved past the distracting mutterings of the crowd, I can finally examine the facility itself. Cassiel's excitement returns in full force as I look around. Inside this underground bunker, a ramp stretches down, over a hundred feet wide, at least a mile underground. The bunker expands the deeper we walk in, and soon I assume it's big enough to fit Godzilla comfortably, along with ten other giant lizard monsters. Catwalks line the walls all around us, and everywhere we walk, people stand on the catwalks to stare at us in silence. Hundreds of people of all races, ages, and sizes watch our every move.

"How many people live here?" I decide to ask the question on my mind, even as I spot what can only be described as alcoves on the walls. Some of them are a hundred feet tall, others only as tall as myself. They look like the sort of thing I'd stick a human inside to recharge their bodies... or whatever. Even the shapes of the alcoves are vaguely human.

Noah glances back at me. "A few thousand people. We started off with only fifty or so, and boredom took over at one point, but we had to put limitations on fraternizing. Procreation is expressly prohibited, and if any pregnancies occur, we execute the children immediately. Our facility simply can't handle the load, given how much power it takes for replicators to produce food for all of us."

Cassiel hops excitedly. "Oooh! How are you powering a facility of this size?! You must be using cold fusion or something exotic!"

Noah shakes his head and looks forward again. "Nothing like that. We're using energy taken directly from the planet's core. Still, the energy we need might not seem like much, especially given how much energy a planet can put out... but we've been trapped here for tens of millions of years. We don't have the tools to escape, and nothing is waiting for us outside even if we did. We can't build new energy sources or more replicators. It's been a struggle since the very beginning."

"For the Illuminati to fall this far..." Victoria grumbles to herself. "It's a shame."

Cassiel taps her chin. "As I thought. You must be using nanobots to stay alive, then. I'm surprised you've lived so long, given the nano-cancer's infection rate."

I'm not sure what she's talking about at all, but I know a little bit about the Illuminati from my time in junior high when I found random occult webpages and looked around them for fun. I barely remember any of that stuff now though.

"We invented the nano-cancer. Obviously, the leader of the Illuminati would be immune to it. Even so," Victoria smooths down the fluff on one of her shoulder-puffs, "it has not been without its downsides."

I don't know what she means, but Cassiel seems to understand.

We walk in silence, and I feel slightly disturbed by how far we've traveled. We're already a mile underground, and this long tunnel keeps going down all the time, all while the facility expands around us the further underground we go. Surely without pillars to support the roof, this place is susceptible to a cave-in?

Noah inhales sharply. "We're here. Ionis will assess you now."

Stepping to the side, Noah beckons for us to step forward. An illuminated alcove on the wall stands out from the others.

Inside that alcove is a being made of pure metal. A robot, to be sure, but without any visible joints or mechanical parts. Its body is made of a sleek, shiny titanium-style alloy, and aside from its six-fingered hands, the thing that stands out most to me is a lone blood-red 'eye.' The robot has a single retinal light that spins around its entire head in any direction, and as we stand before it, the robot doesn't move an inch, but its eye jerks from me, to Cassiel, to Samantha.

Samantha, I now realize, is quivering in terror. "J-just as I thought. It's a Sentinel."

Part 430c: Ionis

The man who calls himself 'Hero' stares up at the robot, a hint of wonder and fear in his eyes. It is a look everyone in my facility once shared. Given the eons we have lived with Ionis protecting us, it is only natural that our fear and distrust have given way to admiration and reverence. After all, Ionis saved us from the Volgrim, in a most brutal and spectacular fashion. We owe him our very lives, though a silent guardian he might be.

The playthings that Hero brought along with himself include Belial, the second most powerful demon in existence, and 'Cassiel' an oddity even for an angel, given her alarmingly high level of spiritual energy, and the fact that all angels should have long since perished at the end of the Energy Wars. Despite the ridiculous power that these two hold, both of them hold similar looks of terror on their faces, though the demon girl is the most obvious.

Funny. From what I hear, the Sentinels only ever killed humans and Volgrim, yet it is a demon who fears them the most of everyone in this hangar. Times do change.

The angel speaks, her voice barely a whisper. "Victoria, what is this thing? I've never seen a robot like it before."

The demoness balls her hands into fists. "It is a Sentinel, a weapon of last resort created by the Volgrim. I've never fought one, nor wanted to, but humans who survived the Energy Wars spoke of them in only muted whispers. Most are long dead." She looks at me with suspicion in her eyes. "Funny, last I heard, Sentinels were machines of carnage. How the hell have you managed to stay alive with one in your midst?"

I have nothing to fear from the Second Emperor, so long as Ionis favors my people. Her anger means little to me. "I don't know the answer. Ionis has never harmed any human at this base. Only once has he ever moved from his alcove, and that was to save us from a Volgrim attack force hellbent on destroying us."

Noah, my bumbling assistant, coughs into his fist. "Ah, actually, Lady Victoria, those Volgrim were just part of a scouting party. They didn't even know we were down here."

"Are you correcting me?" I glare at the ignoramus. "I can remember our past just fine, thank you very much."

A pained look appears in his eyes. "Yes, of course. I must have... misremembered."

That's not even a word, stupid. I ignore the slight and smile sweetly back at the other three. "In any case, other than protecting us from a pack of ravenous monsters, Ionis has never moved."

A smile appears on the angel girl's face. "Maybe he's a nice robot! He looks a little scary, but you can't judge a book by its cover."

"Have you ever read a book?" Belial rolls her eyes, "Anyway, how do you know its name? Can the thing talk?"

Noah rubs his hands together slowly. "If Ionis can speak, he's never done it before. The files on his name, along with the other Sentinel names were in the computer databanks on this planet when we found it."

Hero, ever the quiet one, speaks up, surprising me. "I just realized... are all of these other alcoves for other Sentinels?"

An astute observation. I open my mouth to answer, but at that moment, I catch a hint of movement from the corner of my eye. I stop and look at Ionis, but he hasn't moved an inch. Wait! His hand twitched!

A second later, Ionis's red eye swivels to aim directly at Hero, and he raises his six-fingered hand to point at the man.

Hero blinks. "Huh? Me? What do you want?"

Our guardian doesn't respond. For a few seconds, the Hero and Sentinel lock eyes on each other, when suddenly an awful humming noise explodes in the air! Like the sound of a million bees from my home planet of Earth buzzing in a sphere surrounding the entire hangar, the air vibrates with a fiery rage, and every person in the hangar cups their ears and opens their mouths to scream silently.

Just as quickly as the awful humming comes, it disappears. I nearly drop my cane and fall, but luckily my assistant manages to catch me. "Lady Victoria! Careful!"

I decide not to yell at him this time, and instead just nod. "Thank you, Noah. What was that terrible racket?"

"I don't know." He glances up at Ionis. "I think the Sentinel made it."

Hero pokes his finger in his ear and wiggles it around a few seconds, before narrowing his eyes at the robot. "Founders? I've never heard of them."

This time, there's a much fainter humming, almost like a dog whistle I can scarcely distinguish from background noise. Hero grits his teeth and glares at the robot. "I certainly didn't destroy the Sentinels! You've got me mixed up with someone else!"

"Hero? Is the robot talking to you?" Belial leans forward and touches his arm lightly, but he ignores her.

More humming. "Of course I'm not lying. You're the first Sentinel I've ever seen." He pauses as more humming comes. "Well, now you're just being rude."

This time when the humming stops, Hero simply sighs. "That's a tall order. I'll think about it."

Hero turns to his girl toys and scratches his forehead. "The uh... the robot wants to join us on our journey."

"Absolutely not!" Belial nearly jumps out of her skin, the poor dear. "Don't we get a say in this?"

As for me, I don't like the sound of that either. "If Ionis leaves, we will have no protection. All of our weapons are aged and broken. A primitive with a sturdy spear could pacify our aged populace at this point."

"Yeah, I understand." Hero glowers at our guardian for a moment. "I'll think about his request. In the meantime, the three of us will go to our spaceship and talk it over."

They start to turn their backs to walk away, but Noah rises to the occasion. "Actually, if you'd like, you can stay and have dinner with us. We don't have visitors very often, so I'm sure everyone would enjoy meeting you."

Heh, smart move. Sometimes my assistant manages to think on his feet and impress me. In truth, I want to speak with this so-called 'Hero.' His sudden appearance, alongside such mighty angel and demon girls, tells me something is afoot. Heroes, along with angels, were supposed to be extinct. The fact that he is here, now, means that humanity has a slim chance to stage a return.

Hero looks uncomfortable. He wants to return back to his ship, but it would be rude to turn Noah's offer down. He finally relents. "Yeah, dinner sounds good."

Noah is so sly.

* * *

The massive dining hall catches my eye immediately. At least a hundred metal tables, along with several similarly styled chairs, are lined up in aisles for people to come and sit on them. It reminds me of a school cafeteria, or perhaps one belonging to a prison. The lights above flicker occasionally, and the floor is rather grimy. The whole place has a melancholic, machine-like feel to it. Nobody looks particularly happy or sad; they merely seem to exist.

All around us, people are dressed in similar uniforms, each one worn out and tattered, with a logo I've never seen before. It resembles a dove with a few leaves in its mouth, and the dove is flying above the waves of an ocean, as if carrying hope in its beak.

Noah spots me looking at one of the uniforms on a man's back. "What's wrong? Is there something on your mind?"

I shake my head and watch as a giant platter of food is picked up by six men, and slowly walked over to our table, the one at the head of the cafeteria. The table doesn't look particularly special, but its position tells me it belongs only to the 'important' people of the facility, and nobody else is allowed to sit here. "That logo isn't anything I've seen before. I'm just wondering what it stands for."

Noah nods, pulling back as the men set the platter down and bow before walking away. "I made the logo myself; it's based on a story I remember reading as a child. Noah's Ark. As the tale goes, all the people of Earth defied God, so he swore to strike them down. Only one man and his family were spared God's wrath, by hiding inside an 'ark' and riding atop the waves of a great flood. When the time came, they released a dove, over and over again, until the dove brought them leaves from dry land."

I nod along with his explanation, as Victoria ambles over, Cassiel and Samantha chatting to her the whole time. "That's from the Bible. I mostly remember how the story goes."

Surprise in his eye, Noah smiles genuinely at me. "Really? You've heard the story before?"

"Yup. I was never big on reading the Bible, honestly. I used to be something of an atheist until I realized demons and angels were, y'know... real."

"The Bible, huh?" Noah taps his chin thoughtfully, "I don't remember anything about that book, other than the story of Noah's Ark. That's why my parents gave me my name. They said someday I would lead the chosen few of humanity to safety." His eyes flick around the room. "Not exactly what I expected, but this is close enough."

Samantha and Cassiel sit in the uncomfortable metal chairs to either side of me, while Victoria pulls up a chair directly across from the three of us, next to Noah. "I'm starving! I don't eat as much as I used to, but I still love food! It makes me feel human, you know."

Cassiel fidgets in her seat, "That must be nice."

Victoria ignores her and nudges the heavy platter over toward us. "Dig in! It may have been tens of millions of years since we've had guests, but even a dummy knows to wait until the visitors have started!"

Samantha eyes the food with disinterest. Neither she nor Cassiel requires food to survive, and in fact, Samantha has confided that male essence is her most favorite thing to consume. As for Cassiel, she still likes to eat food, but she lacks the taste buds she once had as a human. Both of them are trying to be polite though, so they take small portions of rice and potatoes.

Noah smiles pleasantly at me. "Try the chicken. It's to die for."

I swallow a lump of bile. "Th-that sounds great." It doesn't. I spear a small leg of it on my plate along with some of the other food, but it's the fish that catches my eye. "How are you able to eat food like this? Surely you aren't breeding animals here, are you?"

Victoria waves her wrinkled hand dismissively. "Pish! It's all from the replicators! We've spent so much time trying to figure out how this facility stays maintained or where the energy comes from, but we gave up a long time ago. Without any tuning, this facility always runs smoothly. Though, the energy per day does have a limit... which is one reason we keep the population in check."

Cassiel stops sliding food around on her plate as interest passes over her face. "Oh? How do the energy limits work?"

Victoria shrugs, "Oh, I don't know. The planet gets colder at night or something. This makes the core generate less energy. It's not that interesting if you ask me."

Noah pauses eating to stifle a grimace. " Actually, most of our scientists theorize it's because there's a battery system somewhere that drains whenever we use energy. Once the battery empties, the lights go out until the core can re-energize it."

His response just makes Victoria roll her eyes. "Oh thank you, Noah. It's a big battery. That makes sense."

He quickly lowers his head back down to stuff more potatoes in his mouth. "Sorry."

Everyone sits in silence for a short while, glancing around, unsure of what to say as we eat little by little. Finally, Samantha nudges her plate away, then smiles sweetly at Victoria. "That was delicious. Thank you for the meal."

"You're welcome, demoness." Victoria smiles curtly, and for once I realize that despite her posturing, she doesn't like demons all that much. Something about the look in her eyes tells me she doesn't trust Samantha at all. She looks at me and sighs. "So, your name is Hero, hmm?"

An odd question. That wasn't what I was expecting. "Something like that. My real name is Jason Hiro, but nobody calls me by that name."

"I see. But you are a 'hero', correct? That is, a descendant of the Hero System?"

Her stare makes me feel a little uncomfortable. "What's the Hero System? I've never heard of it."

"So you don't know." It's a statement, not a question. "Angels created the Hero System. As head of the Illuminati, the knowledge of each previous head was passed down to me. I know a great many things about the angels, things that few still living do."

Samantha chimes in blandly, "People other than me?"

"Yes. Even you, I am guessing, don't know the exact method with which the Heroes' power was awakened. Honestly, my memory has grown rather fuzzy after being cooped up on this planet for so long, but I can't forget the details that were passed down to me. Humanity's future depends on my knowledge."

I slide the untouched chicken leg around on my plate thoughtfully, leaning a little closer to her. "What do you mean by 'humanity's future'? Aren't all humans trapped in the Labyrinth, waiting for demons to devour them? I've seen many bubble worlds in the years I've spent looking."

Samantha sucks in her breath suddenly. "Oh, love, you could have just asked me. There are many humans outside of the Labyrinth. In fact, one thing that has caused demons much consternation is the problem that they can't locate all them. Humans are quite weak, unable to put up much of a fight, but very good at hiding. I was sickened by how the Volgrim and other demon leaders weren't willing to let the stragglers live in peace, which is why I left the High Domains of Hell."

"How admirable of you," This time, it's Victoria who drawls at Samantha. "I guess you feel pretty good about yourself, then?"

"I do." Samantha flicks her gaze away, "Not all demons are vile monsters, you know."

"I would hope not."

The sudden tension at the table makes me glance between the two uneasily. "Is there something I'm missing?"

Samantha practically jumps at the chance to reply before Victoria can. "It's not your fault, Hero. You couldn't possibly know this, but the entire basis for the Illuminati's existence was the highest form of xenophobia. They believed humans shouldn't be bound by angels and demons manipulating them, which is well and good, but the Illuminati also believed that humans were better than the other species. You could say they were purists of a sort." Samantha shoots a nasty glare at Victoria. "But if humans were so mighty, why have they fallen so far?"

Now it's Victoria's turn to glare nastily at Samantha. "Demons hadn't a chance of beating humans fairly. You had to kiss the rumps of your alien overlords to stand a chance against us. It took the combined might of two sentients to enslave humanity. Once again, I ask you, do you feel pretty good about yourself and how things ended up?"

Samantha's anger fizzles out. "When you put it that way, no. I don't like how things turned out."

I decide to intervene. "Victoria, back to the topic from earlier. What is the Hero System?"

She continues to stare at Samantha but answers my question anyway. "The angels, looking for a way to tip the balance of power in their favor in the war against the demons, while also mitigating humanity's weaknesses, created the Hero System. It's simple. A single human would gain incredible power for his or her entire life. Once that human died, the power would transfer to another. They kept the requirements vague enough, but for some reason, the power always seemed to favor humans born with blonde hair and blue eyes. Many legendary humans were given this heroic power, and things worked out rather well in the war against the demons."

I quickly glance at Samantha. Luckily, she doesn't seem too disturbed about this 'war against the demons' talk. I suppose it's because she doesn't need to feel insecure when she could kill every human in this room with no trouble at all. I turn back to Victoria, "That's interesting. I never questioned where my power came from, but I guess that explains a few things."

"Oh yes. It's quite interesting. But more importantly, it's how the angels created that power. Even Belial doesn't know this much." The old woman smiles far too sweetly for my liking and taps her lip thoughtfully. "You see, the angels, desperate to create a weapon to combat the demons, had a meeting among themselves. That is, among the highest archangels and gods. They came to a unanimous decision to sacrifice one archangel's life to create this power. The angel would be placed inside a container for safekeeping, a ring as it were, and his immense energy would be used to craft the soul."

For once, Samantha no longer looks angry or bored. Instead, she turns to look at Victoria incredulously. "How can you possibly know all of this?"

"The Illuminati had many names before we became a feared secret society. 'Skull and Bones.' 'Knights of the Round Table.' 'Templars.' In fact, the founder of the Illuminati's progenitor namesake was the Fourth Hero. We've had kings, queens, popes, and even demons and angels under our influence over the millennia."

Samantha raises an eyebrow questioningly, "The fourth hero? Who was that?"

Victoria waves her hand nonchalantly. "If you don't remember, I won't bother to explain. In any case, that isn't the important thing I'm getting at. The important tidbit is the identity of that archangel who was chosen to be sacrificed. Hades was his name."

She speaks the name as if it's significant, but when I glance at Samantha, she stares ahead blankly. "Am I supposed to recognize that name?"

As for myself, I can only shrug. In the Bible, he was the king of the underworld or something like that, but the Bible and other historical texts have always been somewhat unreliable when it came to descriptions of gods and demons.

"I suppose not. Hades's sacrifice is what made the Hero System function. Three simple criteria must be met for the Soul to transfer. First, the hero in question must die. Obviously. Second, there must be a suitable Candidate to obtain the soul. Finally, and most importantly, there must be angels still alive."

This time, both of the girls and myself are alert and interested. Cassiel shoves her plate aside. "Why are angels required?"

"Oh, that's simple enough. The Heroic Spirit drains the combined energy of all living angels to transfer to the next human. If no angels are alive, with enough energy that the Soul can drain, then, in theory, it should wither and die." Victoria inhales and exhales dramatically. "So, with everything I've told you now, you can understand why your presence fills everyone here with such hope. If you are here, along with an angel, that means other angels still live. The Heroic Spirit must have lain dormant, passing from person to person, waiting until just the right moment to reappear. When it did, you awakened."

The look of awe fades from my face. "You're wrong. At least, I think you are. Just before my 18th birthday, I froze myself in a cryopod. I stayed inside for over a hundred million years. When I thawed, I was inside the Labyrinth. I probably had my powers before I even entered the pod."

Victoria and Noah's smiles both fade as well, but Victoria's expression still holds something resembling hope. "But, the angel beside you. Others must still be alive, yes?"

Cassiel shakes her head slowly. "I'm the last one."

Noah frowns, "But Jason, didn't you say that you absorbed the energy of three Archangels?"

I smile weakly, and hold up my hands, displaying the three rings for all to see. "These are rings of the Archangels, much like what you described for Hades."

"Oh." Victoria slumps in her chair a little. "This is... disheartening. If you perish, all chances for humanity to stage a comeback will vanish. Well, unless..." She smiles sweetly at Cassiel, "...unless you have enough energy to continue the transfer process by yourself."

This time, Cassiel smiles back before winking at me. "That might be doable. We've been gaming the system for a while now!"

Noah coughs loudly. "Say, about your powers... you managed to completely alter the atmosphere of this planet all by yourself, so if you don't mind me asking...?"

"Are you asking what my power is? Well, cat's out of the bag already. I call it 'wordsmithing.' I can make anything happen with a single word."

Noah nods slowly, "Riiight, so that means what, exactly?"

A demonstration is in order. I look down at the disgusting chicken leg in front of me. "Transform."

Seconds later, the chicken leg reshapes itself into a small sword, roughly the size of a kitchen knife, but resembling a letter opener a friend of mine from the past used to have on his desk.

"OHHH!" Noah almost jumps out of his seat in excitement. "What else can you do?!"

His excitement is contagious. "I don't usually like to show off... but I can probably make an exception, just this one time."

"Oh, Hero! You're such a nerd sometimes!" Cassiel teases me, then whispers into my ear, "Use the crown, then you can make some really wild things."

She seems to mean something naughty, but her suggestion gives me an idea. "Actually, if that Sentinel is going to come with us, I might have a solution for not leaving you defenseless."

* * *

As we walk out of the cafeteria, leaving behind a crowd of people gawking and laughing at the colossal pile of weapons I created for them, Noah smiles widely at me. "That was incredible! Your power seems to have no limit! As a man of science, I'm dying to know what else you can do!"

I rub my head and laugh. "Haha! Another time, perhaps. That took a lot of energy out of me, and usually, I need to nap after a summoning session like-" An old man with a scraggly looking beard suddenly shoves past me, stumbling around while the smell of alcohol lingers on his breath.

The old man coughs and glares up at me. "Hey! Watch where yer' walkin', asshole!" His clothes are torn and mangled, and he looks a little different from the other people. He vanishes into the crowd behind me a moment later.

Noah smacks his head and smiles apologetically to me. "Oh, sorry about that. Lee can be such a pain sometimes."

"It's no problem." I dust myself off, and as we exit the room, Samantha and Cassiel wave at me. Both of them have been outside the cafeteria, chatting with Victoria. At least they seem to be getting along now. "There's my girls."

"You're a lucky man, honestly." Noah cracks his neck and winces. "You have all that power, two beautiful women at your side, and you get to travel the cosmos. I'd be lying a little bit if I said I wasn't jealous. Everyone here is old, and none of us are ever in the mood to have a little loving. All we do is work and play cards."

"Work, huh?" He and I stop a few dozen feet away. "What kind of work are you up to?"

He shrugs, "We mostly just mine. We've been digging further and further inside the planet since the atmosphere outside was toxic, at least until you showed up. Most of our furniture is fabricated from metal we dug out of the planet."

"Hmm. I see. Would you prefer to live on the surface if you could?"

He nods back. "I haven't seen a star or a sun in so long... I'd kill for it. We have to take Vitamin D supplements just to survive."

I jot down a mental note before turning back and walking toward the women. "Before I leave, I'll fix those problems."

"Which ones?"

"All of them."

Cassiel grins cheerfully at me as I approach. "So we're taking Mr. Sentinel with us, right?"

Samantha's smile vanishes abruptly. "Are you still on about that?"

As for me, I feel uncomfortable suddenly. The words Ionis beamed into my mind earlier come rushing back.

YOU DISASSEMBLED THE SENTINELS. YOU MUST REBUILD US. TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS.

I turn to Victoria. "Before I go, I just have to ask a question. It's regarding Ionis's request-what are the Founders?"

She glances at me, at Samantha, and back again. "Well, given the Sentinels are a Volgrim creation, I would assume he means the Volgrim Founders."

Samantha looks uneasy. "All five of them are dead. Why would he want to go see them, anyway?"

"So he can rebuild the other Sentinels, I guess."

My response makes a wave of shocked expressions pass around the group; all save Cassiel.

Noah sputters, "W-what?! He wants to rebuild the Sentinels?! That's- that is a terrible idea!"

Samantha, obviously, agrees. "Of course! We can't rebuild them! They're the most dangerous weapon in existence!"

I play along. "Oh, hmm, yes I suppose you're right. In that case, which one of you wants to tell the murder-death robot of unstoppable power 'no'?"

The looks of shock pass quickly. Samantha rubs her arm sheepishly and looks away. "Well, when you put it that way..."

Now, only Cassiel is the one out of the loop. "Call me silly, but what do we have to fear? Why not just destroy the robot if it's so dangerous? Didn't you say all the other ones were defeated already? That means it isn't invincible!"

"She has a point." Victoria, of all the people, agrees. "The only problem is that we have no idea who defeated them, or how they did it."

I suddenly feel a little nervous. "Well, actually, Ionis said that I was the one who destroyed the Sentinels. That's pretty stupid since it couldn't have been me. He then said something about my vital signs being indicative of someone telling the truth, so it wasn't me, but the whole thing was a bit confusing."

Everyone looks slightly defeated. Victoria smiles at me. "Well, as you said, it would be stupid to refuse our guardian's request. If you don't know how to defeat him in combat, don't even try." A dark expression appears on her face. "I still remember the carnage; the bodies left in his wake. When the Volgrim sent their mightiest ship to kill us, Ionis vanished from his alcove in an instant. We'd never seen him move before, and less than a minute later, he returned. He was completely covered in blood and bone."

Noah groans, "It was awful. We spent years cleaning up the remains of the ship and burying evidence of it. It sent a signal to a different vessel in orbit above us at some point, so we're certain the Volgrim learned of our existence, but none bothered us ever since. Given what the Sentinels did during the Energy Wars, I'm sure the Volgrim are as terrified of them as we used to be."

"Used to be?" Samantha echoes Noah's words. "How could you ever move past the fear of a Sentinel? The idea is preposterous. I'd never turn my back on one."

"We've had eons. We learned Ionis meant us no harm." Victoria sighs, "In any case, make your decision. Now that you've armed us, I'm sure we could at least use the threat of having a Sentinel if the Volgrim show up again. If they don't fall for it, we can fight back. Your only question now is whether or not you will take Ionis with you."

A very short deliberation between the girls and I answers the question handily. "Cassiel already wanted him to come along, and Samantha and I aren't keen on pissing him off."

"I hope this works out well for you, Hero." Victoria offers words of encouragement, and somehow, they make me feel just a little bit better about the whole situation.

* * *

An hour later, Ionis walks behind the girls and me onto our spaceship. The entire group of people from the colony have spilled out behind us in front of the giant metal doors, some staring up at the sun, others watching Ionis, and the rest staring at our back as we take our leave.

"Farewell, Hero! The four of you hold the fate of the universe in your hands!" Noah waves goodbye, and we enter our ship, blasting off from the planet's surface.

I slump into the captain's chair, Cassiel sits in the navigator's seat, and Samantha takes the gunner's position. All the while, Ionis stands at attention behind us, practically leaning against the wall.

"You know," Cassiel says, thoughtfully, "Since Ionis is Volgrim in nature, doesn't that mean we have a representative for all four species among us now?"

"No," Samantha shakes her head quickly, "Ionis is a robot, plain and simple. We already had one of those."

In my mind, I hear Ionis speak again. YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS.

I don't know what to say. I can't just tell him they're all dead. I don't want him to rebuild an army. For now, I had better just play along.

As the ship exits the atmosphere, I remember my mental checklist. "Stop here for a moment, Cassiel. I need to take care of some things."

"Hm?" She taps buttons and stops us just above the atmosphere. "What are you up to?"

"I'm just keeping my word, as a Hero should."

I wordsmith the Crown back onto my head and carefully aim my mind at the humans on the surface below. " Youth. Beauty. "

With that done, my energy is still quite full, despite what I told them. " Terraform! Ecology! Plants! Anim- " I catch myself as a sudden wave of nausea hits me, along with a massive draining of my energy. Before I realize it, I taste blood.

Cassiel quickly heals me and gives me a metric ton of energy from herself. "Careful! Don't overdo it!"

"I won't. Sorry." My head feels a little woozy, but once again, I use the crown to focus my mind like never before. Picturing all animals from Earth, their biology, the entirety of the food cycle, and that which creates a food chain, I speak again. " ANIMALS! BACTERIA! TREES! "

This time, I manage to finish, sighing in relief as I slump back into my chair. I feel as if I've bitten onto an anvil with all of my might. My jaw hurts, my head stings with pain, and my stomach roils. But still... I succeeded. I smile as the ship's display shows the planet rapidly turning green below me. An ecological and biological indicator rockets upward as plants, animals, and millions of other things appear all at once. With luck, the planet will be able to sustain itself. I can always come back in the future and fix any anomalies.

"Cassiel. Set a course for Earth."

She looks at me in surprise. "Earth? Aren't we just outside of a bubble world?"

I shake my head and smile at her, as the need for sleep starts to overcome me. "No. We're back in the normal universe. We're home."

Part 431c: Nightmare

I can't see anything. The fog around me is so thick and dense; it reminds me of smoke. I want to choke on it, but I can't breathe. Your fault, whisper the voices in the distance. I pull my body across the ground, an inch at a time, but my left arm isn't working. My right arm has to do all the work, and I'm starting to sweat from exhaustion. Light permeates this void from every direction, but it has no central source.

"Is somebody out there?"

My voice is weak and fragile. I feel broken, like a horse worked to death twice over. Between the fog around me and the fear inside, I couldn't fight off an aggressive mouse if my life depended on it.

A word hisses through the fog, directed at me. Failure. The voice congeals into something sinister. The speaker is close. I pull myself forward again, and this time, my hand touches something leathery. Using all my strength, I lift my head up to see an all-too-familiar specter staring down at me.

"You killed them."

The man looking back at me is none other than myself. I feel a shiver go down my back as I gaze at the black robes and smoke rising from his body. He's the reason this place is choked and dead.

"Who? I didn't kill anyone!"

I offer a weak plea, but he merely shakes his head.

"You have killed many. Heroes shouldn't lie."

I try to say something else, but he lunges his foot forward and stomps my hand, crushing my fingers under his immense weight.

"Ahhh! W-why?! Why would you do that?!"

Strengthened by the pain and anger, my voice finally gains enough timbre that I can shout at the False Me.

"Look to the right."

He offers me a simple request. I don't know why he wants this, but I look anyway. I struggle to move my head, but as I turn my attention, my anger washes away. Cassiel lies in a pool of blood. Her wings are torn to ribbons and bones stick out all over. Her body is marred by gashes, breaks, and bruises, and her pure white robes are stained brown from dried blood.

"Now look to the other side."

My neck screams against the effort, but I quickly spin my head. Samantha lies in pieces, her arms and legs detached from her body, and entrails spilling all over the ground. One colossal stab wound stretching from her neck to her stomach is visible, as if a giant sword had impaled her in a single motion.

I feel queasy. "I didn't kill them. You did! Who are you?!"

A scrunching noise. The other me kneels down slowly, deliberately.

"I'm you, but without the lies. We're both killers. You just won't admit it, 'Hero'."

He's wrong... he must be wrong. I could never hurt them.

"Ah-ah-ah." He wiggles his finger back and forth chidingly. "I see the gears turning. You can't justify being a murderer. You've killed plenty of demons before," He gestures to Samantha, "so what's one more?"

"You're wrong! It's not the same!"

My retort doesn't stop him. He reaches behind himself and pulls out a craftsman's hammer, then lunges forward and pounds me in the back with it, smashing my ribcage to pieces. My weak wheeze of pain doesn't daunt him at all.

"That's exactly what a monster would say."

* * *

It was just a dream. It was just a dream. It was just a dream.

I quickly wipe the sweat from my forehead and stare at the ceiling above. It's the same dream as the one I had before we discovered the spaceship. I forgot about that one before, but now I remember every detail. Cassiel and Samantha both died in my dream. Why? Am I dreaming such things because I want that to happen?! No- the thought is absurd. I never want anything bad to happen to them. Cassiel is a kind, warmhearted woman. Samantha has a playful streak, but she cares deeply for me as well.

Still, the words... I said those words to myself. I wasn't wrong. I've killed thousands, possibly millions of demons. Samantha is the Second Emperor of the demons. She hates me.

No! She- she doesn't! If she hated me, how could she bear to smile so lovingly? How could she resist scowling or glaring every so often? She's never expressed even the remotest bit of disgust toward me.

It's just a dream in the end.

I move my arms around, then realize I'm alone. Usually, the girls would be here- didn't they sleep with me last night? What if-

I move to pull the covers off but blink in surprise. I'm not on the bed. I'm ten feet away, on the cold steel floor. How the fuck did I get here? Whatever. I jump to my feet and inhale, sensing the aura of power ripple from my body. The sickening feeling of weakness was just part of the dream, after all. There's nothing more to it. Pulling pants and a shirt on, I step through the automatic doorway, just in time to see Samantha rounding a corner. I immediately breathe easier, until I notice the worried expression on her face.

"Hero! You're awake? I was just coming to tell you- well, that is, something happened while you were asleep."

"Uh... uh huh." I nod dumbly. "What happened?"

The look on her face is starting to worry me. "It's Cassiel. There was an accident. She was checking on the robots in the rear armory-"

My heart pounds in my chest. "Is she okay?!" I lunge forward and grab Samantha's shoulders, my blood turning to ice the whole time. "Where is she?!"

Samantha looks at me in confusion. "Promise me you won't get mad, okay?"

"Get mad??" I'm on the edge of sanity at this point. "Is she alive? Comatose?!"

Samantha narrows her eyes. "... Yes. She was in the armory, something made her sneeze, and she destroyed the rear section of the ship. She blew out five of the nine engines and violently ejected us from hyperspace. I thought that's what woke you up." Samantha pulls away from my grasp and raises an eyebrow. "Are you okay? You're not going to flip out or anything, are you?"

I'm so confused. "Yes. I am fine." The words come out stiffly, "Where is Cassiel now?"

Samantha shrugs. "She's outside, flying around the ship, trying to fix the damage. I think."

"She's outside? In the vacuum of outer space?"

"Yup."

"Is she okay?"

"Yup."

"How?"

"Dunno."

Samantha, as always, is completely unhelpful at times like this. And just as I have that thought, from around the corner Cassiel steps out and sees the two of us. Her pure white robes are smudged brown and black, torn in various spots, and even her feathers are filthy. "Oh, um, hi! I guess Sammy told you what happened."

I continue to nod dumbly. "You broke the ship or something. I got the gist of it. Also, you were outside the ship...?"

She nods excitedly. "It's awesome! I guess I never really thought about it before since I was born a human, but angels don't need to breathe! We can fly around in outer space just fine!"

My blood pressure finally begins to lower. "That's good news, Cass." I wipe more sweat from my forehead. "I had an awful dream again. I woke up and wasn't sure of what was going on. I guess now I know how I ended up on the floor."

Samantha nods slowly, "Yeah, you were acting weird for a minute. Are you feeling better?"

The look of concern on her face makes me feel a little guilty. Better not go into detail, my brain whispers. "Yeah. I'll fix the ship now."

She sighs but otherwise assumes everything is normal again. "Wonderful. Let's jump in space suits and inspect the damage."

A few minutes later, Samantha and I enter the Docking Bay. The three suits on the wall are copies I made from the ship's computers, and are very slender and form-fitting, unlike the space-suits I remember from my youth. I aim my mind at one of the suits. "Wear."

The suit vanishes from the wall, appearing on top of Samantha instantly. Her cute little tail pokes out from a hole I left on the back, which is vacuum-sealed immediately. The tight material closes over her figure and creates a seductive bodysuit that accentuates all of her best curves.

Samantha reaches for a helmet, but stops when she spots me staring. "Oh come on, I'm wearing more clothing than usual and now you're aroused?"

She isn't wrong, but... "Samantha, I have to ask you something serious."

"Oh?" Her flirty tone flatlines into something more like curiosity. "And what's that?"

How do I phrase a question like this?

"I've, uh- well, I've killed a lot of demons, you know."

She stares silently for a few moments. "Right."

"Doesn't that bother you? I mean, haven't you ever thought about all the demons I've killed?"

She looks away and stares at the helmet on the wall. "Of course. It's not a big deal."

The discomfort in the air is palpable. She won't even look at my eyes. "How can you say it's no big deal? What if I've killed friends of yours? Family? How could you honestly ever look at me and feel anything other than anger?"

"I don't know." She keeps looking away, "Maybe I just feel a bit guilty."

"Guilty?"

"Sure." Finally, she looks back at me, and her expression is more somber than I've ever seen her before. "How many demons do you think you've killed? Thousands? Millions? I'm the second most powerful of my kind, and I never tried to stop my people from killing humans and angels. I bear some of that responsibility too."

My mind immediately asks, so we're both murderers, in a way?

"That's different, though. I killed many demons personally, with my bare hands. Nobody would fault you for the actions of others. Maybe you should have spoken up, but it's not the same as killing humans direc-"

"I have killed humans!" Samantha lashes out suddenly, a look of anger on her face. Her rapid transformation makes me take a step back. "Don't you know what a succubus is?! We take the essence of men and convert it to life force for ourselves to live on! Satan was the only demon stronger than me, so it meant he had plenty left over. But what do you think I had to do after Satan left?!"

A strange roiling churns in my stomach. "You- you killed human men?"

Samantha wrings her hands together nervously. "Well, yes! You may not realize this because you're an abnormal human, but most men lose their sense of reason in the presence of a succubus. I don't kill them deliberately, you know. They just- they just die afterward!"

Both of us stare at each other for a few moments before looking away. "Sorry. I didn't realize."

Samantha looks back at me again, this time with calm in her eyes. "Why do you think I went to Hero City? I assumed I would have plenty of men around. I couldn't believe my luck when I sensed your energy level. I didn't have to kill anyone anymore."

A red flag raises in the back of my animal brain. "Wait, are you saying you pursued me just because I was overflowing with energy? Is that the reason?"

She reaches up and strings a finger through her hair, then leans against a wall stiffly. "At first. You were also fun, of course, and your ability is very interesting, but I began to see over the short time we've spent together that you're a good, honest man. You've done awful things, but you want to right your wrongs. I've never been with a man like that before. I've only ever been with- been with killers."

"Sounds like nothing's changed."

Despite my grim tone, I chuckle to myself. So it was like that, huh? I'm getting bent out of shape thinking about how terrible I am, but she's awful too. "I guess we're right for each other."

Finally, a smile. She slinks over to me and rubs my chest softly. "I'm always here for you, love. It's better that we're being more honest with each other anyway, don't you think?"

I pull her in and kiss her long and tenderly. Her lips are soft, and the taste is sweet like honey, as always. "Yeah. Let's get back to work."

She pulls away from me and grabs her helmet off the wall. "You know, on the topic of you being an odd one... did you know you're the first man, human or demon, who is unaffected by my succubi aura?"

Talking about past boyfriends is always a way to bring down the mood, my heart sighs. On the other hand, I perk up slightly at the thought that I'm special. "Really? What about Satan?"

She shakes her head and her hair flits around softly. "No, even he was always entranced by my aura. It had a lesser effect on him compared to most others, but unless you're just good at hiding how enamored you are, you're immune."

"Huh. Neat." I don't know what else to say, so I set the helmet on my head and walk along down the aisles with her until we arrive at the force-field airlock leading to outer space. Once our communicators come online, Cassiel's voice sounds off in my headset. "Finally! You two took forever! Are you ready to have a look?"

Sorry, Cass. It was important. "Yeah. Aren't you joining us?"

"Don't be silly. I may be able to fly around in space like it doesn't matter, but in the vacuum, I can't talk at all."

"You could put on a space-suit," Samantha offers helpfully.

I can almost hear Cassiel's eyes rolling. "No way! I'd feel so cramped, and my wings would have the circulation cut off, ugh!"

"You have a point." Samantha reaches around and rubs her butt, a sad expression passing over her face. "I can barely feel my devil-damned tail in this thing. If it falls off, will you Wordsmith it back on?"

"Sure," I snicker to myself, "let me know if your butt gets sore too. I'll give it a rub."

"Funny."

A minute later, we hop through the force-field, which allows anything to pass but gaseous material, to preserve the oxygen inside, and I think of an idea as I'm trying to maneuver around all the objects floating in midair with the suit's flight controls. They're somewhat intuitive, but they simply feel clunky to me. " Flight. "

Immediately, I feel an invisible force wash over me, allowing me to control my movements with just my mind. Samantha spots my accelerated movements and scowls at me. "Hey! No fair!"

After I give her the power of flight, the two of us exit out the rear of the ship, and I stare at the gaping hole. "Wow, Cass. You did a number back here."

"Sorry." Her apologetic tone doesn't make me feel any better.

"Where are all the micro-dreadnoughts? Wasn't this ship equipped with a small contingent for defensive purposes? The missiles are gone, too."

Samantha glides over to me, "Like I said, we were traveling at Warp Seven. We exited hyperspace a second or two later, but the damage was already done. They're probably scattered to the far reaches of space by now, assuming they're even intact."

Assuming they're intact? "Cass, just how hard did you sneeze? This level of destruction is ridiculous."

"I said I'm sorry!" I can almost hear the pouting tone in her voice. "That was the first time I've sneezed since I died, I'll have you know. It's not like I'd want to break all the robots."

"Yeah, no kidding," Samantha intones blandly, "you'd sooner kill yourself than dent a walking tin can."

Kill yourself.

Kill yourself.

Samantha's words ring in my ears. I shake my head to fight off a sudden feeling of unease. "Forget it. I'll fix the ship, and we'll be on our way. How long until we reach Earth?"

"A couple of weeks," Cassiel says, "it's over 16,000 light years from where we started, but warp speed is truly something!"

"You don't say."

At times like this, I'm glad I have Cassiel. She was born long after I sealed myself in the Cryopod, and she knows how technology created during the Energy Wars works. Samantha, on the other hand, knows about the state of the modern-day galaxy, or modern era, given how long it's been. Sometimes it still boggles my mind.

A hundred million years. What a ludicrous amount of time.

" Storage. " With a single word, my mental storage opens up, and I quickly grab for the Crown of Solomon, only to pause for a moment. A familiar grey orb sits in a corner, untouched. Hoarhiim's orb. A close friend and mentor. He gave his life to save mine because he believed I was destined for great things. Was he right? Was he wrong?

Will I ever know the answer?

I gently rub his orb before grabbing the Crown out, closing the void, and reaching deep within myself. For the second time since discovering the ship, I imagine every processor, every hallway, the giant boosters on the back, and even smaller details like a faded painting one of the crew had hung in the armory. Condensing all of my mental power together, I focus my energy into a single word. " Rebuild! "

A minute later, the ship shines and glimmers, as all jagged edges have been magically polished and repaired, and the ship's rear has been reconstructed from the ground up.

"Impressive as always, love." Samantha rubs her tail again. "Mind if we take the shorter route inside? It's only been a few minutes, and I can't wait to get this suit off."

"Funny, I was thinking the same thing."

Samantha and Cassiel both groan in unison. "Oh, you! You're such a perv sometimes!"

" Teleport! "

* * *

Diablo, the Third Emperor of Hell, one of the mightiest demons of all time, a demon whose power causes other to tremble in his wake, bows meekly before the delegates. All four hundred and sixteen of them eye him with a mixture of dissatisfaction and disgust.

"The human has left the Labyrinth? Why now, of all times? Why did you wait so long to inform us of this news?" A nasally Volgrim councilor, Elder Basil, snuffles quietly after every sentence. His grating voice and the way he always looks down on those around him makes him a generally disliked member of the Council of Founders, but his connections give him significant pull when it comes time to vote. "Am I to infer that you might even be working with that one?"

Diablo raises his head back up and uses all his willpower to hold back a glare of contempt for the overweight, sniveling alien. "Certainly not, Elder Basil. That was never my intention. As you may well know, it takes time to travel through the registered portals and to seek an audience with such important and busy Volgrim, such as yourselves."

The Third Emperor tries not to snicker at his obvious sarcasm, but it can't be helped if a little bit slips out. The Volgrim, being such an unemotional species, cannot tell sarcasm from serious statements. It was the only way he could rebel against such a powerful adversary, even if it was a tiny resistance that would hold no lasting impact.

In a room like this, where the Volgrim Elders deliberate, all of whom have lived since the Energy Wars and whose decisions impact demons on a daily basis, the room is one that always awes the Third Emperor. It's a giant coliseum of sorts, with ten ascending rows where the more important Volgrim sit up front, while the newest Elders sit in the rear. All of them are seated in a U-shape so they can see and speak to each other easily, while also allowing them to talk to outsiders in the center of the room, from time to time. The pure white metallic walls and sterile environment remind Diablo of the bland personalities of each member of the hivemind.

A female Elder in the second row speaks next. Diablo doesn't recognize her, but she seems influential, judging by the garb she wears. "If he has left the dimension of the Labyrinth, and he is traveling in Type 1 space, this poses a grave danger to Volgrim and Demonkind alike. The power of a Hero was thought extinct until that human reappeared. You assured us he was contained to the Labyrinth, yet now you expect us to do something about him, all while we fight off the Kolvaxian scourge? Did you not think of how pervasive this new menace was before we were forced to divert essential resources to put an end to the human?"

Diablo shakes his head slowly and puts on his best impression of mock sadness. "I am sorry, delegates. As I reported, he is traveling with the Second Emperor, and she is far stronger than I. If the eight Emperors and Generals directly under her combined our forces, we could not hope to defeat her, let alone the human and the angel as well."

Elder Basil leans forward, his disgusting fat belly poking through the folds of his tight robes, as a look of disgust washes over his face. "Excuses. Is that all you have? What are we to think when this human is joined by the second most powerful of your species, hmm? Obviously, some form of collusion is to be expected. We know how you demons long to be out from under our control, but that is not going to happen. A demon, human, or angel left unattended always turns to thralldom and war when given the opportunity."

The female from earlier makes a motion to another Volgrim across from her. "Elder Kryios, what do you think of the appearance of this angel? Isn't the timing coincidental?"

Kryios, one of the longest-serving members of the Council, gently strokes her long white hair, keeping her eyes closed as she sits deep in thought. "Yes. The demons told us that all angels were killed during the Energy Wars, yet a hero and an angel are joined by one of the Demon Emperors. If I were a gambler, I would hedge my bets that the demons planned this."

"Planned it? That's absurd! We've lost millions of my people to this human! In fact, we've-!" Diablo stops his rant quickly, realizing that the eyes of all the Volgrim are upon him. One wrong word and they can summon an army to eliminate me. Best not be too boisterous. "I beg your pardon. I didn't mean to lose my cool."

To his relief, none of the councilors seem to care. Elder Basil raps his fingers lightly on his legs. "If you are not lying, and the demons have no treachery in their hearts, then you must stop the Hero from achieving whatever genocidal goals he is likely pursuing. Speak to your First Emperor, and be sure he is involved as well. If he is the only demon powerful enough to stop the Second, then obviously he should do so."

Diablo's hands clam up. Until now, he had been feeling mildly awed and perhaps even a little worried, but at the mention of the First Emperor, he begins to sweat profusely. "Y-you want me to order the First to assist us? That's asking for a lot of trouble."

Elder Kryios waves a hand flippantly. "Yes, yes, the ever-reclusive First Emperor. You've regaled us with frightening stories of his supposed power, but considering he's too afraid to even step into the light of day, I can't say I'm anything but unimpressed by him. Perhaps if he stepped out of the shadows and did a little dirty work, he could keep a collar on the Second and prevent her from striking off on merry adventures with a human." Kryios spits the last word out. "What terrible ethics she has."

Diablo clamps his hands together to steady the shaking. "Of- of course. As you wish. I will see if I can get the First to--"

"Begone, then." Elder Basil makes a shoo motion with his hands. "We've held off war tactics regarding the Kolvaxians just to hear you prattle. Go be useful and leave our sight."

The Third Emperor nods quickly and shuffles out of the room, passing a massive metal war machine that scans him silently.

As the door closes behind him, he curses under his breath, "Bastards. The First will make them pay for their mockery."

Part 432c: Dead Space

"Why are we going to Earth anyway?" Samantha leans against the wall in the lounge, standing on her hands and stretching her legs up to touch her toes to the wall, before gently kicking away from it and walking around on her palms. "It's a dead planet. There's nothing to see."

Cassiel watches Samantha with only the slightest interest in her daily exercising, while she lightly tosses a red ball from one hand to the other. "Well, Hero was frozen for all those years. Maybe he just wants to find out what it's like after all this time? I'm a little curious myself."

I ignore the fact they're talking about me like I'm not even here, and take another slurp of my beef wonton soup. It reminds me of a time before the labyrinth and hell became a part of my life, and it feels somewhat comforting. "I just have an odd hunch. I think I'm supposed to meet someone there."

Samantha raises one arm out and away from her body, then gently lifts herself into the air on a single finger before spreading her legs wide open. It's a feat of incredible contortion that I can only assume is possible due to her demonic power. "How? Earth is inhospitable to life, now. It doesn't have an atmosphere anymore. No air to breathe, no water, nothing."

"Wow. What happened to ruin the planet?" Cassiel, always the curious one, blurts the question out. Her eyes raise up to the metal ceiling in thought, and she spins around in her chair slowly. "Boiling away the entire atmosphere is crazy."

Apparently hearing her question, the door slides open and OMEN walks in the room. We've been traveling for three weeks on this ship, and I'm still not used to the way he pops up at random times. I suspect he has full access to the ship's internal communications, but it's been more of a help than a hindrance.

"Response: Data regarding Earth's demise is classified at the highest levels. Only the leader of the United Earth Federation may access this information. It is encrypted with a four-layered deadman's switch, an incorrect response to which will cause the data's self-destruction, along with all other information aboard this vessel. Query: Would you like to attempt to access this information?"

Cassiel stares at the robot for all of two seconds. "No. That would be dumb to even try."

Samantha launches herself into the air with her single finger, landing perfectly on both feet like a world-class gymnast. "Nobody knows. It's just one of those things missing from our memories."

I shift uncomfortably in my seat. "What do you mean? That's a little strange. Why wouldn't anyone remember the destruction of a goddamn planet? That seems like something you'd never be able to forget, not even in a hundred million years."

A shrug. Samantha walks over and plops in my lap, then lays back on me. "It's just one of those things, love. All information regarding Earth's destruction vanished. Well, the planet is still there, technically. It's just a hunk of dead rock now. We just don't know how the Volgrim destroyed it."

"Awful convenient, if you ask me." Cassiel stops spinning around in her chair, and I can almost see the lightbulb appear over her head. "I'll bet the Volgrim hid the evidence! Mass brainwashing! My mother and father said they were a highly advanced species."

"Maaaybe." Samantha is unconvinced. "I spent thousands of years looking into it before losing interest. I'm unconvinced the Volgrim had the tech to pull something off like that, nor why they'd want to hide it."

Since I don't have any opinion about something I wasn't there to witness, I keep quiet and wrap my arms around Samantha, contemplating all this Volgrim and memory wiping nonsense. If these aliens have firm control over the Labyrinth, and the demons control the humans above them, then I guess if the Volgrim had memory wiping machines they could mass brainwash everyone, or at least everyone who knew, but it does seem like a lot of work. Especially given they already won the war, or whatever.

OMEN chirps in again, always willing to interrupt conversations as he pleases. "Notification: We are within three lightyears of the Terran system. We will be arriving in fifteen minutes. Do you wish to keep the ship in autopilot mode until we arrive?"

Cassiel immediately leaps from her chair and smiles a big grin. "Finally! I'll take over once we arrive. Stop us just outside Neptune's orbit." We'll approach the inner solar system at Warp 1.4 and maintain alert status."

Samantha pulls away from me and walks over to the door. "I still think this is pointless, but I admit I'm curious. I haven't seen Earth in, well, millions of years. The Labyrinth has been quite boring."

All three of us exit and start walking down the sterile hallways and up toward the bridge. "I miss the feeling of grass, and the smell of fresh air," Cassiel says, "but mostly I miss seeing ducks and cats and dogs. I haven't seen animals in, well, an eternity."

Why did she list ducks first? My brain asks a dumb question, but I ignore it. "If you want, I can create some animals, you know. I did so on that Volgarius planet. Heck, if Earth is dead, I can remake it again. Easy peasy."

Her embarrassed smile lights up my day. "Really?! You'd do that for me?"

"Yup. Actually, I just want to, period. Humanity needs a home, so why not remake life on our original planet? We can't let these 'Volgrim' run our lives forever."

Samantha seems visibly uncomfortable as we step onto the bridge. "Resisting the Volgrim is a losing endeavor, in my opinion. Their weapons can tear apart demons easily because they target magical energy. Hell, even the robots on this ship could have done the same... until Cassiel blasted them to kingdom come."

"Sorry." Cassiel winces, and all three of us take up our seating positions. "It was an accident."

"I know. It's not your fault. Still, those machines were quite powerful. I was uncomfortable having them so close. They made me... uneasy."

The two of them continue back and forth for several minutes, Cassiel teasing Samantha about her dislike of robots, while Samantha jabs back with 'tin-can lover' and some other silly things, until OMEN interrupts them. "Notification: We will be arriving in Terran space within thirty seconds."

The jovial atmosphere turns tense. A feeling of suspense fills the air as the timer ticks down.

Terran space. Earth. The Solar System. Whatever one wants to call it, it was a home to all three of us at one point. The fact I'm arriving in such a distant future means I'm going to see something unthinkable to humans from my time. Even Cassiel, who died before Earth's destruction, has no idea what we're going to find.

"A pet duck would be neat," Cassiel mumbles under her breath. What a weird thing to say now, of all times.

OMEN's lifeless face stays rigid as the timer counts down. "Notification: Arriving in Terran space in five, four, three, two, one..."

The ship exits hyperspace dramatically, going from Warp Seven to a standstill so quickly that I half expect to fly out of my seat and face-plant against the wall, but the inertia dampeners keep that from happening.

The viewscreen changes to show space around us. Nothing is out of the ordinary, or very interesting, for that matter. Way in the distance, a tiny luminous speck signals the Sun, in all of its glory. From this far away, it hardly looks like the ball of gas that I remember.

"The sun is tiny." Cassiel echoes my thoughts, "I've never seen it from this distance before. My mother and father always promised to take me on a trip to Mars, but I never had the time to leave."

Samantha flops back heavily in her chair. "Well, let's move closer."

"Sure." Cassiel taps a few buttons and activates the thrusters once again, this time moving us to just over Warp 1. "Normally it would take several hours to reach Earth at lightspeed, but we'll get there in ten minutes or so at this speed. Wanna stop and look at planets along the way? Jupiter is on the opposite side of the system, but, erm, Uranus is fairly close."

A stupid smile crosses my face. "I'll bet it is."

Samantha snrks to herself. "You couldn't help yourself, could you?"

"I'm just a guy."

The ship cruises forward, and within a minute, we slow to a stop as the giant blue planet appears in front of us. I feel my hands tremble slightly at the sight. Emotion fills me that is difficult to put into words. I'm looking at a planet that nobody from my time had ever seen before, not with this level of detail. Scientists would have killed for a chance to be this close, and I'm here now.

It's an awe-inspiring feeling. In the end, humanity was all but wiped out, yet I still live on, trying to put the pieces back together.

Cassiel stares silently for several long moments at the shimmering gasses swirling on the planet below. The ship's sensors enhance our viewing ability since otherwise the planet's features aren't illuminated enough by the distant sun to be distinguishable to the human eye. "It's pretty."

Even Samantha eyes it with interest. "I've been alive for tens of millions of years, and I've never seen this world before. It's a beautiful view."

After a few minutes, Cassiel turns back to her controls. "Let's keep moving. Mars is next, then Earth."

"What about Saturn?" I look at her quizzically, and she shrugs.

"It's a little out of the way. We can look later, unless you wanna make a detour now?"

"No, that's alright. Let's keep going." These planets are interesting, but the thought of seeing Earth again makes me feel unbelievably anxious. There's something waiting for me, my mind whispers. I don't know what it is, but Earth has a piece of the puzzle. I have to find out whatever it is.

The ship accelerates, and Cassiel leaves Neptune behind us. All the while, my heartbeat quickens. The nightmares lately won't stop. Nothing makes them go away, not even my wordsmithing. It's as if there's something inside me linking to knowledge of another time, another life. I know things I shouldn't. I knew what OMEN was before I spoke to him. I knew how to respond. These nightmares aren't just paranoia in the back of my mind. They must be a warning of some kind. But why are they always about the girls dying?

I have so many questions. I've done this before, but differently. It's the same, yet not.

My internal questions are cut off as OMEN once again pipes up. "Yellow level alert: I am detecting spacecraft on the long-range scanners. The transmission signals intercepted are Volgrim in origin, with a 98% confidence level."

Cassiel's breath catches as she taps a button with lightning speed. The ship immediately slows down, and she quickly presses several more buttons. "I'm running a detailed scan."

Samantha and I shoot a look of alarm at each other before Cassiel delivers the verdict. "Careless. I should have checked sooner. I just scanned Mars... it has a massive network of cities built on its surface. The Volgrim live there now." For the first time I've seen, a look of disgust and rage is evident on her face. "I can't believe it. Bastards. They killed us, then took over our home?!"

Visibly shaken, Samantha looks at me again. "We should leave. We don't stand a chance against an armada of Volgrim warships."

Cassiel's rage falters and is replaced by a pale expression of fear. "There are thousands of them. Why didn't we detect them sooner? They-"

She's interrupted by the bridge's AI. "Incoming hail. Response?"

"Devil-damned." Samantha jerks in her seat. "They saw us. We can still flee."

I, for one, feel more annoyed than anything. "No. Let's hear what these aliens have to say. Maybe I can finally get some answers."

Cassiel nods reluctantly and taps another button. The main viewscreen shifts a moment later to reveal what my initial instincts tell me is a human. A man, young looking, with a blank expression on his face, stares at us for a few seconds, his eyes sweeping from Cassiel, to me, to Samantha. His white uniform is decidedly military, with a single star visible on the lapel. His black hair is cleanly slicked back, and he looks otherwise bored by our vessel. It's only when he opens his mouth to speak that I'm jarred by the realization that he's not human at all.

"Unknown vessel, what is your identifier? We are not expecting any new arrivals to this system for several cycles." His mouth is filled with shark-like teeth, and his words are translated by our ship's communicator a second after he speaks in his language. It's a little jarring, but I'm able to get used to it within moments. He glances away at something offscreen before looking back, this time with a puzzled expression. "Your ship design does not conform to any known specifications. Additionally..." He pauses again, and this time reaches up to his ear, as if listening to a hidden piece for instructions. "...I have detected only three life signs aboard your vessel. Who are you?"

I can see him putting the pieces together rapidly. Go big or go home, my mind says to me.

"I am Jason Hiro, commander of this vessel. I've come to investigate the Terran system and to, uh, see what's up."

Cassiel groans audibly and smacks her forehead. I suddenly realize how stupid I just sounded.

The Volgrim male onscreen's eyes widen, having probably noticed my teeth don't look anything like his. "A human? It can't be." His voice fills with urgency. "You will surrender your vessel to our authorities at once. Any attempt to flee or any hostile actions will be met with deadly force. You will be apprehended, as per the Human Limitation Act."

Samantha quickly turns to look at me, fear in her eyes. Not good!

I don't know what to do. I didn't expect the Volgrim to be here, though in hindsight it should have been obvious. Several options cross my mind. I could destroy their fleet with wordsmithing. I could fabricate the Trifrancium needed to allow us to escape at Warp 10, and Cassiel can give me enough energy to create a large enough quantity that the fleet couldn't possibly catch up to us. Hell, I could even teleport this ship back to Volgarius. I already wordsmithed a relay there, just in case.

Perhaps seeing the indecision on my face, Samantha decides to try something. She turns back to the video. "Don't. If you attack us, we will annihilate you. We have a Sentinel under our control."

The look of confidence on the Volgrim's face tightens. "Unlikely. The Sentinels have long since been eradicated. If you attempt to resist, we will annihilate you. Humans and angels are not afforded any protections under the guidelines established during the First Era."

Samantha doesn't respond. Instead, she looks at Cassiel and nods. Cassiel, apparently hearing some telepathic communication or via weird girl-vooodoo I can't understand, knows exactly what Samantha wants. She taps a few buttons, and the screen shifts again, this time showing the Volgrim on the left side of the screen, and an image of Ionis in the cargo bay, standing stiffly at attention, his lone eye staring forward emotionlessly.

"I'm not kidding," Samantha says, "if you attack, we'll activate it."

Instantly, the young Volgrim's smug aura vanishes. His face whitens, though he tries his best to hide it. "Y-you're bluffing. That isn't poss-"

The feed cuts off, and his face is replaced by a different one. This time, the Volgrim in question looks substantially older. Her face is rigid, and her jawline is set, as if she's trying to look tough, but uncertain how we perceive her. "Belial, second Emperor of the Demons. It's been a while."

Cassiel taps a button and a small part of the screen changes, showing several dots converging on our location. She doesn't say anything, but I understand what she's implying. Time is running out.

Samantha, apparently feeling less anxious, smiles at the woman onscreen. "Elder Kryios. Why would one of the highest ranked leaders of Volgrim-kind be here, of all places?"

The Volgrim doesn't flinch. "I'm asking the questions. Why do you have a Sentinel in your possession? That should be impossible."

"Should be?" Samantha leans forward and puts on her best innocent fake smile. "You know, that statement doesn't sound very confident. Shall we activate him? Ionis is very good at following orders. He doesn't like Volgrim either, from what he's told us."

A bald-faced lie. The thing hasn't said a single word to us since it arrived, and I've poked and prodded it a few times, as has Cassiel. It just stands in the cargo hold, staring ahead, silently. I doubt it would save us if we begged it to with all our hearts.

Elder Kryios, however, is now visibly unnerved. "They- they didn't say you would have a Sentinel. Ludicrous. Why have you come here?"

"We just wanted to look around. You're not going to stop us from having a peek, are you? Can't some old friends check out the sights once in a while?"

My arm-console silently blinks a warning. The ships are closing in. Less than a minute away, by the looks of it.

The aged Volgrim gnashes her teeth. "This is a restricted zone. Nobody, and certainly not a human, is allowed to enter this system. I should kill you for daring to trespass."

Samantha leans back in her chair and crosses her legs. "Okay, that's fine. I'm sure you can blow this ship up and possibly kill the three of us, but do you have anything that can defeat a Sentinel? Even the slightest glimmer of hope?"

Kryios looks away for a moment at something offscreen, before turning back. "This will have repercussions. We were considering the three of you a rogue element, but now you are enemies of the collective. You would be wise to surrender."

Samantha widens her eyes in mock surprise. "So you do have a way to destroy a Sentinel! That explains your confidence!"

"No." Kryios taps a button on her side. "We do not. Nobody does. Bringing one of those horrors with you... you must have a death wish."

The dots approaching our ship slow to a stop, and then begin reversing course. "The Council doesn't have time to deal with your petty foolishness. Have a look around, then. It doesn't matter. Once I get the backup needed, you will not leave alive with anything you've learned."

The feed cuts off, and seconds later, Samantha's smile vanishes. "Devil's sake." Her hands start shaking, and she turns to me. "We're in a hell of a lot of trouble, Hero."

"That was very brave of you, Sammy." Cassiel smiles weakly at the succubus, but it feels half-hearted. The dots continue to leave, and soon they're completely offscreen. "I can't believe that worked."

"It hardly matters. Weren't you listening? The Council must have been observing our movements. I think they knew we were coming." Samantha climbs out of her chair and walks over to plop down next to me. "I hate the Volgrim. They think only according to efficiency and how to maximize output. Everything is just a tool for them to use. They even designed the systems for keeping humans contained."

Cassiel taps on her console again and accelerates our ship toward Earth. Then she walks over and sits next to me on my other side. "What is the Council? That creepy Kreedos lady mentioned them like they were important."

"Kryios." Samantha corrects Cassiel, "I'm not very familiar with the Volgrim hierarchy, especially since I mostly ignore political goings-on. Still, I remember the early days following the conclusion of the Energy Wars. Elder Kryios was one of the remaining upper-ranked Volgrim, pending the destruction of the Founders. She and many others, a few hundred as I recall, decided to try a new system of governance. I believe she wields much influence now, though I can't say for certain."

I nod along at her explanation, but political stuff bores me almost as much as it does her. "She sounds like a nasty alien. Well, they all do. I'll have to be a lot more careful."

"No kidding." Cassiel chuckles wryly, "Anyway, what's done is done. If they attack us, we'll fight back. And it seems Sammy hit a nerve! They're terrified of Ionis."

Samantha doesn't return the enthusiasm. "We all should be. I would have been delighted to learn all the Sentinels were disassembled. They probably have to convene an emergency meeting to deal with the threat we just showed them. We're far from out of the woods."

Both girls sigh and lean against me, almost in unison. I pull them both in close and feel the tension melt away. They mean everything to me right now. I can't be so careless when their lives are at stake, not like what I just did. I have to be more cautious.

I took a risk, challenging the Volgrim. It wasn't even me who saved the day, but Samantha. Her knowledge of the world is the only thing that prevented us from being blown out of the sky. Well, that, but I also could have teleported us any time I wanted. Come to think of it; maybe the risk wasn't as bad as I thought.

The three of us wait silently, deep in thought, as the minutes tick by. Soon, the bridge AI speaks.

"Destination approaching. Dropping out of warp space in three... two... one..."

Once again, the stars melt away and the ship comes to a halt, and this time all three of us stare in stunned silence.

It's Earth. But not the one I know.

The entire planet is encased in colossal sheets of glacial ice. The greens and blues and whites and yellows and orange hues that I remember from photographs of my planet, taken by NASA, are nowhere to be seen. The entire thing is a hunk of frost, floating in the void.

Cassiel takes several seconds before she can pull her jaw up and stop gaping at the sight. Hesitantly, she walks over to her navigation chair and inputs a command. "I'm... I'm running a scan."

Samantha and I continue holding each other's hand while we wait for the verdict. Cassiel's tone is nearly as icy as the dead sphere before us. "The atmosphere is almost entirely gone. The planet has ice made of methane and hydrogen wrapping around every inch of it. I can't detect any life at all, though I guess we expected-" She pauses suddenly, before shooting Samantha a quizzical look of disbelief. "Sammy, where the fuck is the Moon?"

It's the first time I've heard her curse. Her sudden outburst makes me curious too. "Computer, where is the Moon?"

The droll male voice in the ceiling sounds bored by my question. "Unknown."

Cassiel shakes her head slowly before returning to looking at her display readout. "Well, if the Moon isn't here, that explains all the weird stuff that's going on."

"Weird stuff?" Samantha offers a gentle verbal nudge. "Like what?"

The angelic girl scratches her head as she examines the readouts. "Well, the planet is rotating at a ridiculous speed. It's about eight hours for an Earth 'day' now, not twenty-four. The orbit is a significant deviation from what it should be, and Earth is spinning completely on its side. The North Pole is facing the Sun directly, and the South Pole is opposite. Also, for some reason, the Earth doesn't have a magnetic field surrounding it anymore. If that's the case..."

"...the molten core is no longer molten?" I finish her sentence for her, and she nods.

"Probably. What did those alien bastards do? They ruined it completely. The damage is irreparable!"

Samantha shakes her head and sighs, pulling away from me. "It wasn't like this in the distant past, when I last saw it. The entire planet was a lava-covered hellscape. The last time I saw it, thousands of years later, it had cooled into an ugly brown rock, though I don't know what happened after that. I'm not a geologist, after all, I'm just a woman with simple tastes."

Cassiel looks at Samantha curiously. "How did you get to see Earth anyway? From space, I mean."

"It was part of the war conclusion pact. The Volgrim didn't like or trust humans, but there was a mutual understanding between them and us. I just asked if I could see Earth, and as the Second Emperor, they agreed."

"Mutual understanding?" Cassiel echoes the words, "So, you had something to do with Earth's destruction? Not you, but, like, you know... demons in general?"

"I don't know, Cass." Samantha tosses her hands into the air. "I can't remember anything regarding Earth's destruction. However, I wouldn't be surprised if demons did. Perhaps Satan was involved... though I cannot say for sure."

Cassiel nods glumly, "I understand."

The mood is dark, but I decide to take the initiative. I jump to my feet and pull up my sleeves. "Well, I believe the planet is salvageable. It's still home, and I'm going to fix it!"

My cute angel smiles, a bright grin that warms my heart. "You did it for Volgarius! You can do it here too!"

Samantha, however, seems more reserved. "Is it just me, or does the planet have an empty feeling to it? I can't sense anything coming from it, nothing at all."

"I mean, it's a dead rock, so that makes sense." Cassiel's smile turns sardonic as she observes Samantha's expression. "You're not going to sense much from an icy ball floating in the emptiness of space."

"It's more than that," Samantha says, "it's a total void when I reach out to sense it. I didn't get the same feeling from Uranus, and especially not from Mars when we passed it. It's like there's a hole in space itself."

Once again, I start feeling nervous. A hole in space? That sounds so ridiculous; it stretches the limits of credibility. Yet, at the same time...

Cassiel's smile vanishes. "Well, when you put it like that, I guess it does feel emptier than the space around it. In fact, the more I think about it, the more that makes sense."

I decide to test something out for myself. " Detect! "

Aiming my mind at Earth, I project my wordsmithing at it. What follows next is a flash of pain, impacting me right in the face, as if a giant man with a hammer had just struck me with all his might!

I blink the stars away and feel an awful dizziness, only to realize Samantha and Cassiel are standing over me, terror across their faces. When she sees my eyes open, Cassiel immediately lets out a breath. "Are you okay?"

My head hurts like hell. My face physically aches, as if I broke my cheekbone. "Not really... what happened?"

Samantha's eyes have a sense of urgency to them. "You wordsmithed, and then immediately screamed as if you had been stabbed in the heart, clutched your face, and fell to the ground. You've been out for five minutes!"

I still feel dazed. "Five minutes? Wh-what? It hurt like hell, but it didn't seem that long."

The sound of footsteps approach. To our side, OMEN steps out. I turn to look at his typical expression of total disinterest. "Notation: Supreme Commander Hiro was detected by the ship as having a full mental synapse shutdown for three minutes, thirty-seven seconds. The likelihood that he was able to come back without the aid of a medical droid is unlikely at best."

After a few minutes of the girls babying me, I pull myself to my feet and slump back in my chair. My body hurts like I just ran a 50-mile triathlon in ten minutes. I can barely remember the last time I felt so weak.

Cassiel glares at me. "Stupid! You should have let me run more scans first! Don't be so reckless, Hero!"

"Please... don't yell..." I mumble the words and clutch my head, but the earsplitting pain is taking its sweet time fading away.

Her hardened expression softens, and she walks back over to her seat. "Okay. I think I know what happened. Earth doesn't have a magnetic field, but it does have something else. A ridiculously powerful inverse polaric-energy field."

Her big words just make my head hurt more, and a quick glance at Samantha tells me she doesn't have any idea what that means either. "In English?"

Cassiel sticks a finger in her mouth and chews on a nail gently. "Well, it means the earth is surrounded by anti-energy. It's more energetic than anything I've ever sensed before. This energy can not only absorb magical energy directed at it, but it can also reflect it. You're lucky you didn't die... for reals."

Samantha reaches over her hand and puts it on mine. "Actually, love, it wasn't luck. Cass saved your life. She's so modest, sometimes."

Her comment is met with a look of embarrassment from Cassiel. "I just tried to use my energy to heal him. It didn't even do anything. He woke up on his own."

Her cute blushing eases my pain a little bit. "No, Cass, you helped me out. You always do."

The three of us smile at each other and share in our relief, until a moment later I jump out of my skin as a terrifying robotic voice speaks into the room, one that wasn't there before.

I HAVE LOCATED ORGANICS ON THE PLANET BELOW. NONE OF THEM BELONG TO THE FOUNDERS. TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS.

The terrifyingly loud voice booms in my head, seeming to come from all directions at once, and yet nowhere at all.

The figure steps forward, his lone red eye sweeping across all of us at once, settling his gaze on me.

YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS AT ONCE.

Samantha turns from me to the robot standing in the middle of the room. "Oh, fuck me."

Part 433c: I Am Mad Scientist!

YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS.

Ionis shines his singular blood red eye on me, staring at me without moving. The Robot stands eight feet tall, a full half head higher than me, and I get the distinct impression he would look down on me even if I were twice his height. His order is final, with no chance for an 'if' or a 'but.' If I don't give him what he wants, he will probably kill me.

However.

"Did you say you detected organic signatures on the planet?" I carefully steel myself and steady my beating heart. Much like facing down a bear in the wild, every instinct inside myself screams at me to not show any weakness. The fact this machine wants me to find the Founders implies it either cannot do so itself, or it has tried and failed. I have leverage.

Ionis swivels its eye toward the viewscreen for a moment, before turning back to me.

AFFIRMATIVE. THERE ARE THREE THOUSAND, SIX HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIVE ORGANIC SIGNATURES ON THE PLANET BELOW. NONE OF THEM BELONG TO THE FOUNDERS. YOU WILL TAKE ME TO WHERE YOU CONCEALED THEM.

I have no idea what he's talking about. Ever since I first met this robot, he's accused me of killing the others of his kind, of hiding these 'founders' away, and even implied I'm not the person I say I am. Probably a glitch, I guess. He has me confused with someone else.

"Supposing I do not take you to the Founders, what will you do about it?"

An immediate response. I WILL ELIMINATE YOU.

Cassiel pokes me lightly in my left arm. I glance at her to see an expression of concern. "Um, Hero, are you... talking to Ionis?"

A glance at Belial shows the same question written on her face. "Neither of you two can hear him speaking?"

The girls shake their heads slowly. Somehow, this machine must be communicating with me telepathically.

However, I don't have the time nor luxury to give it much thought. I turn back to the Sentinel. "If you eliminate me, I will not be able to take you to the Founders."

UNACCEPTABLE.

"You can throw a temper tantrum if you want, but it won't change anything. Neither will killing me. I don't know where the Founders are, but I'm perfectly willing to help you find them. You've waited millions of years already, right? What's another day or two?"

The mechanoid stares at me for all of three seconds, an eternity when facing down something that supposedly can eliminate me in the blink of an eye. Finally, he responds.

HOW LONG IS A DAY?

Um, what? That wasn't the answer I expected.

"A day is twenty-four hours. There are sixty minutes in an hour, and sixty seconds in a minute. A single second is about this quick-" I pause and snap my fingers to emphasize. "So you shouldn't have to wait long."

The Sentinel's eye swivels again, first to Cassiel, then to Samantha, then back to me.

YOUR BIOLOGY INDICATES YOU ARE GIVING ACCURATE MEASUREMENTS. TWO DAYS.

Oh. I suppose that's that, then. He knows how to tell if humans are lying, but not how long a day is? What a strange murder-bot.

Turning away from the robot slowly, so I don't spook him into a murder spree, I glance at Cassiel. "Ionis says there are almost 4,000 biological lifeforms on the planet below. Can you detect anything?"

Immediately, she gives me a suspicious look. "The Sentinel can detect something like that? From this distance? What, is he scanning for microbes or something?" Still, she shrugs and taps several buttons, then waits several seconds. "I didn't find anything the first time, and I'm not finding anything now. If he detected life signs, they must be miles below the surface."

Miles below the surface.

Her voice echoes in my head.

Underground.

People.

Bunkers.

As though a key clicks into a lock in my brain, I stand up a little straighter. "What prevents us from scanning below the surface?"

Cassiel seems surprised by the question. "I mean, with the right tools I could see all the way into the core, but this ship isn't designed to penetrate a planet's core. It's just supposed to be able to see through the shields and hull of other starships. If I had something more powerful - much more, at that- then I could scan many miles below the ice and rock."

A simple solution, at last. " Storage. " Reaching in, I pull out the Crown of Solomon once more, then aim my mind at the vast blackness of space a great distance from the ship. After several minutes, I can feel my head beginning to swim from all the information needed to construct the device, but eventually, all the pieces click into place. " SCANNER! "

Outside, in the silent vacuum of space, a titanic metal device explodes into existence. Ten times the size of our ship, it is created for only one purpose; to scan the deepest recesses of Earth. I stagger back and take a seat, fanning myself as heat flashes course through my blood for several seconds afterward. The strain put on my mind when envisioning such complex machines nearly makes me pass out every time, but if this works, it will be worth it.

I spare a weary glance at Ionis. How did such a small robot, though still taller than me, locate life forms on the planet that our ship scanners couldn't? His technology advancement must be eons greater than humanity's.

Cassiel widens her eyes in surprise. "Oh. So that's what you did." She brings the device up on the screen for Samantha to examine and both of them purse their lips in surprise.

Samantha winks at me, "Not bad."

"Yeah. Just... hah... just use the computer to login and scan Earth. See what you can find, Cass." I'm out of breath and exhausted, but thanks to the regenerative powers of the God-King, I feel my second wind coming already.

While Cass types on the ship's console, Samantha glances back at me and her smile falters. "You're bleeding. Are you alright?"

As she says that, I feel wetness on my lips. I quickly realize my nose is bleeding. Summoning that massive device must have taken a decent chunk of my energy, but the real strain was on my mind, not my energy reserves.

" Heal. " With a single word, the nosebleed is gone, and coincidentally, so is my fatigue. "Thanks, Sam. I'm fine now."

She nods along but doesn't look as confident as I. Cassiel pulls back and smiles at me. "Hey, how about that! The scanner did the trick! I'm detecting several hundred life signs. They're fuzzy, and I can just barely make them out, but they're definitely under the surface."

I feel a sense of giddy anticipation mixed with dread. "Only a few hundred? Shouldn't there be thousands?"

Cassiel sticks her tongue out at me bashfully. "Teehee, well, you know. That scanner is powerful, but it's still not reliable enough. More importantly, I detected short-range radio waves. Very primitive, meant for close range communication and probably so they won't be detected by... outsiders."

"Us, then." Samantha rubs her arms and strolls over, plopping in my lap. She does that a lot lately. "Are they human?"

Cassiel shrugs. "Maybe. Human and Volgrim are hard to tell apart with such basic life signs. The Volgrim didn't want us near Earth, so it might be them under the surface, but..."

Samantha finishes for her, "But it's more likely they merely don't want anyone finding out what destroyed Earth. If those were Volgrim under the surface, I doubt they would go to such lengths to hide their existence from their own kind."

I lean forward and rest my chin on Samantha's shoulder. "They're probably human. I have this- this weird hunch. A feeling really, probably nothing. I've had these feelings a lot, lately."

Samantha pulls back and leans into me more. "Any chance you'll tell us more, soon?"

She nibbles on my ear playfully, but I pull away and smirk. "Trying to use your charm on me? I'm not even sure what these premonitions mean. I just know they tend to be right." I point a finger at Cass. "Can you communicate with the people on the surface? We can't go onto a planet bathed in such dangerous energy, but we can at least try and talk to them."

A shrug, "It's worth a try. Give me a minute."

I spot a look of jealousy in Cassiel's eye, so I make a mental note that I'll have to give her extra attention tonight. Samantha is just a more aggressive woman who always goes for what she wants.

My gaze raises up to the motionless Sentinel, still standing in the same spot, staring silently at our ship's viewscreen. Not a minute later, Cassiel sighs, "Even that new scanner won't do it. The radio signals under the surface are too weak."

I scratch my nose in thought, before feeling a spark in my mind. "What if we brought one of them up to us? I can't use magical teleportation, but if I dramatically boosted the ship teleporters, we could pull one up here."

Cass seems unsure. "Well, they've been living underground for who knows how long. Assuming the person you bring up is human, they could have an awful disease, or we could give one to them..." She trails off and then smacks her forehead. "Actually, you could cure a problem like that with Wordsmithing. Never mind. It's worth a shot. Who should I pull up?"

I don't have a ready answer for that question. "Just target whoever has the strongest signal, I suppose. We'd ideally want the leader, if one exists, but better to play it safe. We can pull someone up here, then ask them who the leader is and pull them up instead."

You know who the leader is.

A voice speaks to me from my subconscious, but I silently bat it away. Shut up! You can't always be right!

Cassiel takes my suggestion in stride and spends the next few minutes typing in a series of commands, while I give Samantha a shoulder massage. She's very tense, likely due to the robot of annihilation standing silently in front of us, but nobody wants to tell him to go away, so we just have to ignore him. She moans softly every time I hit a tense muscle, and directs me with a finger where things are the worst.

"You're very good at this, love. Have you had practice?"

"Nope. I'm just a natural, I guess."

A little small talk later, Cassiel exhales audibly. "Okay, I found the most likely signal. Powering up the teleporters... now."

Everyone watches silently as shimmering lights appears on the bridge, like a swarm of fireflies, rapidly growing more energetic until they enlarge and form the solid shape of a hunched over figure. A few seconds later, it transforms into a middle-aged woman, perhaps thirty years old, with brown hair and big thick-rimmed glasses. She stumbles forward and lands face-first on the ground. "Ah!"

Cassiel winces, "Oops."

The girl quickly jumps to her feet, panic and terror evident on her face. She's wearing a white lab coat, with an insignia I haven't seen before, comprised of three snakes in a triangular pattern. If I had to make a snap judgment, I'd assume she was a scientist or a lab assistant of some sort.

"Who are you? What's going on?!" The look of panic on her face is starting to make even me feel uneasy.

"Calm down. We're not going to hurt you." I speak gently to her, but at that moment she looks up and spots the Sentinel towering over her, and she immediately falls backwards on her ass and scrambles away from it across the floor. "Hiiiiii! What in the name of god?!" Her shriek of terror sends a chill down my spine. I need to calm her down, and fas-

Oh. I already have the solution.

" Calm. "

Instantly, her terror vanishes, along with the panic and fight-or-flight reflexes. She merely sits on the floor and evaluates each person and robot, one by one for a few moments.

"I am sorry. I did not mean to make such a commotion. Please forgive my rudeness."

Her ridiculous transition from frightened rabbit to serene wolf makes me do a double-take, and I was the one who Wordsmithed at her. Sometimes this ability is ridiculous.

Samantha pulls away from me and walks over to the woman. "We didn't mean to startle you. I'm Samantha, this woman is Cassiel, and he is Hero."

"I see." The woman nods along as if seeing the four of us makes perfect sense now and little more needs to be explained. "My name is Rebecca. How may I assist you, and if I may be so bold, where am I?"

Cassiel walks over and helps Rebecca to her feet. "You're aboard a spaceship orbiting Earth. We located your facility under the surface and beamed you aboard because we need to speak with someone below."

Rebecca brushes off her coat, then seems to notice the thin strips of fabric that barely cover up Samantha's naughty bits. "I- I, um, see. You shouldn't have been able to locate us. We were hidden more than a hundred miles under the surface, and especially given we were shielded by three miles of dermacrete. What are you going to do now that you've found us?"

"Nothing. I'm not here to cause trouble or start a war. I just need to find whoever is in charge and speak with her."

"Her?" Rebecca echoes me, "You mean Marie Becker? She's the lead researcher for our facility. I'm sure she'd be willing to-"

Rebecca doesn't get to finish her sentence. At that moment, a faint whump is heard to my left, and I glance over to see another woman, this one in her forties with long red hair, pointing a gun at me. Having appeared out of nowhere, this catches the girls and me off-guard, and we quickly take a step back in surprise.

"Alright, you. That little stunt caught my attention, or did you think I wouldn't notice? Give me back my assistant, or I'll destroy your ship." She stares at me with a ferocious intensity, and despite the fact that the gun probably can't hurt me, it still makes me a little apprehensive.

"Miss Becker." Rebecca casually strolls over to her, and Marie stares at her suspiciously.

"Rebecca Blanc. You're acting differently from usual. Did they do something to you?"

I scratch my head sheepishly. "I don't mean to be rude, Marie. I think we've gotten off on the wrong foot. I just wanted to talk with the head of the facility, and I believe that's... you?"

She nods without stopping her visual examination of Rebecca. "Good job. You got my attention. I'm about a seven out of ten on the anger meter. Anything else?" She nods at something unknown before using her free hand to reach into her jacket and pulling out a tiny round device I've never seen before. I don't get to see it for more than two seconds before she presses it onto Rebecca's shirt, and the woman vanishes instantly, teleporting away somewhere.

I fumble for the right words to use. "Well, I don't know how else to say this, but I think we've met before. Maybe. It's a feeling in my head. Though, I sorta remember you looking... different."

Once her assistant is gone, Marie immediately slides the small gun into her waistband, as if completely unafraid of the human, demon, angel, and giant robot in the room. Actually, she's hardly looked at anyone yet, but now she turns her full attention to me. "Oh, I looked different. Brilliant observation. Was my hair longer? Perhaps I was wearing earrings? Are you just here to waste my time?"

Once she stops talking and stares at me for a moment, her demeanor toward me shifts. "Hold on. Wait... I do recognize you." She quickly looks at the other three in the room, and only now do I spot a look of terror on Cassiel's face. Marie notices it too. "What are you cowering about? I put the gun away. It was never the real threat anyway."

"I- um, I..." Cassiel's eyes widen, and a moment later she jumps from her chair and bolts out of the room. "I have to go!"

I start to chase after her, but Samantha quickly shoves me aside. "You stay. I'll see what's wrong."

With no input from me, both girls leave, and now it's just Marie and me, alone with the death robot.

"What was that all about?" Marie raises an eyebrow questioningly. "More importantly, what is a hero doing with an angel, the Second Emperor of Hell, and a..." She glances up at Ionis and blinks twice. Her expression doesn't change, but immediately I can sense something akin to panic overflow from her aura. "... that."

"It's a Sentinel." I speak the words slowly, wondering how such a confident woman can suddenly be rendered speechless at the sight of Ionis.

"Yes. I noticed." Her words are more curt and pronounced than before. "I suppose this monster is why you were confident you could abduct one of my faculty and not face your rapid destruction. Well played."

She's getting the wrong idea, and fast. "I'm not trying to do anything bad here, Marie. I just want to talk. I've been having dreams about the future lately, and uncanny hunches. They all started a couple of weeks ago, and so far every one of them has been correct. You might just be the most important one because I have a feeling you can give me the answers I need."

To my surprise, she yawns and blinks back tears of boredom. "Oh. And here I thought it was important. Well, in any case, I've meant to talk with you specifically anyway, Hero. That is, with regards to the death machine you've created."

My eyes shift over to Ionis, then back to her. "I didn't make this."

"Not the Sentinel, stupid! The humans!"

I'm lost. "Err, the humans? What about them?"

She looks at me like I'm stupid. She might be right. "Didn't you arm humans with a ridiculous amount of highly advanced weaponry, then set them upon the Labyrinth?"

"Well, yeah. Why?"

She shakes her head slowly. "They have been slaughtering demons wholesale. Demons, monsters, anything in their way. In just a few short weeks, they've decimated the 415th and 842nd sectors. How little respect for life do you have, 'Hero'?" As if to accentuate her point, she nods at Ionis. "I guess they weren't doing enough, so you had to bring along one of those things too?"

I don't know what to tell her. "Killing demons is the point. They've been slaughtering humans for millions of years. They even trapped humans in bubble worlds and cut off their technology. I'm only leveling the playing field."

Marie rolls her eyes, "How gracious of you. How about you come down to my laboratory and take a look at some of the costs you've exacted upon the Labyrinth? The lizard-people are in ruins because of you. My precious babies were brutally tortured and maimed by ignorant savages with big guns, which you created."

Her words evoke frighteningly salient images in my mind. I can almost smell the burned flesh, and see barbs lanced into scaly green flesh. "I'm sorry. I should have realized it was my fault. I can't go to your laboratory though since Earth has that massive anti-energy field surrounding it. I hope you understand."

Her expression softens, just the slightest. "Ah, yes, that. When the Volgrim plunged the Moon into Earth, the method they used supercharged the moon into an anti-energy battery. The effect only grew in intensity once it mixed with the energy of the Moon and Earth's cores. I can see why you wouldn't want to go down there. Frankly, it's the safest place for humans in the galaxy. Demons can't go there, and Volgrim can't find us, even if they try."

She narrows her eyes. "Speaking of which, how were you able to locate our base? Wordsmithing shouldn't be able to penetrate the anti-energy field. In fact, with your pitiful level of energy, the effort would probably kill you."

"How do you know what Wordsmithing is?" Rather than answer her question, I take the offensive. "You shouldn't know anything about it."

A haughty laugh. "My dear Mister Hero, how little you know. I am quite possibly the smartest person in the galaxy. I've invented things you couldn't dream of. I can do things you wouldn't believe. I know almost everything there is to know."

I jerk my thumb at Ionis. "You didn't know about him."

Her smile evaporates. "Didn't anyone ever tell you nobody likes a smartass?"

"At least I'm smart." I stifle a huge grin. "I guess there are things even you don't know."

For once, her angry, haughty, petty emotions melt away. "I know plenty. More than I wish I did, sometimes."

The statement has an ominous ring to it. "You wanna elaborate on that?"

"No."

The two of us stare at each other silently for a few moments. Finally, she sighs. "Can you tell me what you're doing with the Second Emperor and an angel? Especially the angel. Lord knows there can't be many left alive."

"Cassiel is the last one. All the rest are dead."

"That's her name?" Marie looks at me in disbelief, and her jaw hangs open slightly. "She's one of the archangels, then? I thought there were only three or four at their peak."

"No. I just named her 'Cassiel' because she forgot her original name. I found her locked up, chained to a wall and left to die in the Labyrinth. It was one event of many that led me to... hate the demons."

Marie's surprise increases. "You hate demons? Then why are you traveling with that walking sex toy? The Second Emperor is basically the most powerful, influential demon in existence, barring the first. I suppose if she digs her claws in, you can't escape. Maybe you're not even in control here."

"Don't slur her like that. She's a real person with feelings. She isn't just a sex toy, Marie. I'm disgusted you'd even think like that about a fellow woman."

Marie covers her mouth with her hand in mock shame. "Oh, I'm so sorry. I didn't realize I was talking to a white knight. Whatever, it doesn't concern me." She reaches into her labcoat and pulls out a small device, similar to the one she used on Rebecca. "This discussion has degenerated into the final vestiges of tedium that I would ever find remotely acceptable for conversation. If there isn't anything more important to say, I need to get back to work."

She's a tactless sociopath, but she's been at least somewhat helpful up to now. My eyes flick to Ionis, and back to her. "There's one thing I'd like help with. The Volgrim Founders, I need to locate them."

Marie barely blinks. "They're dead. Unless resurrection magic has been used without my knowledge, and I assure you I've only seen one resurrection in my lifetime, they are long gone."

A pause, she glances up at Ionis, and her eyes narrow in suspicion once more. "Why do you want to know about the Founders anyway?"

No getting around it. "The Sentinel needs to speak with them. He wishes to rebuild his kind."

Her expression doesn't change. I don't perceive any difference in her body language, but her eyes stay locked onto mine for several long, agonizing seconds. "He- he wants to... to rebuild... the other Sentinels? And... and you're going along with it?"

My gut churns, "Yeah."

"Oh my god. I already knew you were stupid, but this-"

I lurch back in surprise as Ionis suddenly screams into my mind. ONE DAY, TWENTY-THREE HOURS, FORTY MINUTES, FIFTY-FIVE SECONDS. YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS.

"What was that? Just now?" Marie looks at me in curiosity, and back to the robot. "Did something just happen?"

I wipe sweat from my forehead. "Ionis talks, sometimes, but only to me. It's sorta telepathic... but also not. He speaks normally, but only to me in a way I can hear."

Marie licks her lips. "If I speak to him, will he answer to you?"

"Can't hurt to try."

She nods, "Ionis, what do you intend to do when you locate the Founders? As I just said, they are all dead. There is nobody for you to find."

I WILL REBUILD THE SENTINELS.

I relay his message to her, rubbing my ears to try and massage the pain away. She continues, "But how? Even if the Founders were still alive, which they are not, there's no guarantee they could assist you. I know from my research that the Sentinels were created millions of years before even the Energy Wars on Earth, let alone the hundred million since. There is very little chance any of the original scientists who created the Sentinels are still alive, so even they would be of no help. You will not be able to rebuild the others. And, if you can't do that, what will you do then?"

Ionis stares at her, his single iris lasering onto her face for five long seconds. THERE ARE NO FOUNDERS?

I relay the message, and Marie shakes her head. "That's what I've been saying. They're dead."

Ionis tilts his head slightly down, and for a moment it almost looks like the poor little instant-death Armageddon robot is sad. The moment passes.

I WILL CONFIRM THEIR DEATHS.

Marie throws her hands up in the air. "And then what? For an invincible war machine, you sure are thick as they come! You might even be dumber than this idiot!" She gestures at me, but I just ignore it.

Ionis doesn't respond. After ten seconds, Marie sighs. "You know, the Sentinels are, to me, a personal attack."

"I beg your pardon?"

She leans against Cassiel's chair, and a lingering wistfulness fills the air. "I said I'm the greatest scientist ever, but am I? I spent... I spent so long, trying to recreate a Sentinel. I failed, every time."

This blunt admission catches me off-guard. "You tried to make more of these things? Is there something wrong with you?!"

She waves her hand in my face. "Shut-shut-shuuut up. I don't even want to hear it from you. My point is that I feel annoyed, anxious, even angry that some washed-up emotionless alien morons were able to create death machines that I couldn't emulate. I can create anything! Why can't I build this one thing??"

Suddenly, as if she's made up her mind about something unbeknownst to me, Marie stands up alert. "I will help you."

"Huh? You mean with the Sentinel? Are you going to make more of them?!"

She shakes her head quickly. "No, certainly not. As I said, I couldn't even if I tried. Even with one right here I can experiment on, it would take ages to figure out. But what I can do is give you my files on all the Volgrim in existence. You can try and locate the original scientists from there." Marie glances at Ionis. "And maybe this trigger-happy fuckwit won't blow your brains out in the meantime. I'm surprised he's so calm right now as it is."

"Same." I wait silently as Marie pulls out a small datapad of some sort and starts tapping on the screen furiously, making menus come and go so quickly I can't catch even a single word. After a minute she smiles sweetly at me, a little too sweetly. "I hacked your ship's mainframe and uploaded all of my data on the Volgrim to it. You'll have to stay in orbit for a few minutes to let the data transfer, but once it's done, you should leave."

I nod, "I have to do so anyway. The Volgrim already know I'm here. Only quick thinking from Samantha and showing them the Sentinel made them leave us alone, but they'll be back, either to kill us, or to capture Ionis."

Marie reaches for her micro-teleporter gadget one last time. "I'm telling you, the Volgrim are dumber than you think. I wouldn't want to attempt a capture of a Sentinel, not after what I saw on Mars, all those eons ago. It's suicidal."

"Mars?"

She winks at me, "I've said enough. Get going. After you do whatever with this thing, I expect you'll get around to fixing the mess in the Labyrinth. The humans need to be restrained again, as per the Human Containment Act."

This doesn't sit well with me. "Isn't there another way? It's inhumane confining people to bubble worlds with limited technology."

Marie sneers immediately. "It's inhumane letting a child run around without a diaper before potty-training him too. You'll cover the house in feces. That's what the humans are doing now-destroying the delicate balance the Labyrinth was in. If you don't take steps to restore balance, and soon, someone else will. I don't think you'll like who that will be."

"Who?"

She shakes her head, "I hope you don't have to find out."

Considering that her goodbye, Marie tips her head at me, then activates her teleporter gadget. She vanishes an instant later, likely going back down to Earth.

Ionis swivels his eye at me. YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS.

"Shut up, you dense motherfucker."

Part 434c: Tortured Past

Marie's rapid exit leaves me standing alone on the bridge, with only the Sentinel and the air between us. The giant murder-machine stares at me silently, and finally I pull away from his singular gaze.

"Ionis, given you know more about the Volgrim than me, would you be willing to look through the data Marie gave us? You can probably figure out which Volgrim built the Sentinels faster than I can."

He immediately blares in my mind, THAT ARRANGEMENT IS SATISFACTORY.

"Great. Here, have a look." I can barely stand to look at his eerie single eye, so I glance away and hold the datapad toward him. I've scarcely lifted my hand before the pad vanishes from my grasp, almost teleporting into the robot's hand.

Fast!

I stare in amazement as he rapidly taps buttons on the screen at a speed that makes Marie's previous feats seem trivial. His fingers are a blur, but what's more shocking is that the pad can keep up with his inputs in the first place. Future technology is ridiculous.

A minute passes, but Ionis says nothing, and continues to do... whatever... on the pad. "Oookay, well, while you work on that, I need to be doing... literally anything else. Have fun."

The Sentinel says nothing, so I quietly leave the bridge.

He's a creepy one sometimes, but so far I've seen little of the bloodthirstiness everyone says he should have. As Cassiel said before, maybe he's a good robot? He did protect those humans, didn't he? That doesn't sound like something a genocidal murder-bot would do.

Crap, that's right! Cassiel! She fled when Marie appeared earlier, so I need to see what's going on with her.

My footsteps dully clank against the steel floor as I walk down the perfectly shined and sparkling aisles, turning left and right until I jump in surprise! Samantha walks around a corner again, nearly bumping into me.

"Oh!" She lets out a cute yelp, but only a flash of a smile crosses her face. It's quickly replaced with a look of trepidation. "Hero. You startled me. Um, are you going to talk with Cass?"

The look of worry on her face spreads to mine. "Yeah. Is she okay? She ran away, but, well, Marie kept me busy for several minutes."

Samantha leans against the wall to her left, her eyes downcast to my shoes. "Cass won't tell me anything, but she's a mess. She sobbed uncontrollably for several minutes, and I got the distinct impression she knows that woman very intimately. It was- it was like watching someone whose family had been murdered by a serial killer, only for them to meet that killer years later and be powerless to stop them from committing more murders."

"That sounds awful," I say, scratching my chin thoughtfully. "I'll have to be delicate when I talk to her."

"Yep." Samantha, to my surprise, pulls away from the wall, takes a step forward, and hugs me, a warm gesture unlike how she usually acts. "Thank you."

"It's my pleasure."

She pulls away and smiles softly before pushing past me and walking toward the Bridge. I cough into my fist.

"Uh, Sammy?"

"Yes?"

"The Sentinel is still on the Bridge, you know."

Her face whitens. "Oh. I'll uh, I'll be in the mess hall, in that case."

"That's a good idea."

She sheepishly turns at the corridor's end and hurriedly heads for the mess hall, and I continue walking to our room. The moment the door opens, I spot Cassiel lying on the bed, facing me, and she jerks back in surprise, quickly turning around and facing the wall. She wipes at her eyes as if she doesn't want me to see her crying.

"Cass? Are you okay?" I carefully inch into the room, not wanting to disturb her, and also because I feel a little anxious at how she's hiding her emotions from me. Come to think of it, ever since we've left Hero City, I haven't seen a negative attitude from her in all the time we've spent together. In fact, she's been more bubbly and happy than I thought possible.

"I'm fi-" Her voice catches, and she chokes it down. "-fine. It's nothing."

"That doesn't sound like nothing." I walk closer to the bed and sit at the far corner, close to her feet. The pillow is stained grey from tears, and as I notice that, she quickly pulls some covers over herself.

We sit silently for several long seconds, and I decide to break the silence. "Marie." The mere mention of the scientist's name makes Cassiel squeeze the covers tighter. Her fingers turn white from how hard she's holding the soft cloth. "Did you know her?"

"...no."

It's such a weak denial that I almost want to laugh. I don't though since she wouldn't say 'no' without a good reason. "You're a terrible liar."

She paws at her eyes again, though I can't see her face at all. "Sorry."

"You don't have to apologize, Cass." I lean forward and touch her hand lightly. Without looking, she twines her fingers with mine. "Won't you tell me what's going on?"

She shakes her head, then buries her face into the pillow. "I don't want to."

"Why not?"

A long pause. "Just... because."

"That's not an answer. Is it me? Did I make you mad? If it's something I did, I'm sorry."

"No!" Cassiel yells into her pillow, the fluffy down feathers muffling her voice somewhat, but still catching me by surprise. She quickly calms down. "It's just," She finally turns to look at me, her face stained with dried tears. "you worry so much about me. I don't want you to protect me from everything."

"O-okay. I understand." I try to force a smile, but seeing her cry is wreaking havoc on my guts. "If you don't want to tell me, I won't ask."

I start to pull away, but she squeezes my hand tighter. "Wait! That's- that's it? You're not going to keep asking?"

I'm suddenly confused. "No? If you don't want to say, then it's not my place to know. I'm your lover, not your father."

Finally, she turns around and sits up on the bed, facing me head-on. She dries her face with her robes, and snuffles, "Do you remember how we met?"

I blush slightly, "Well yeah, it was only a few weeks ago."

"I was chained to the wall and left to die." She says it so matter-of-factly, I can only nod.

"Uh huh."

"How do you think I got there?"

Her expression is serious now. She's already pushing whatever sadness from before to the back of her mind. I flip around and sit all the way on the bed, crossing my legs under myself like a monk. "To be honest, I never gave it much thought. I figured you would tell me if you wanted, and if not, then it wasn't my business."

She nods, "I don't like thinking about my past. I was chained to that wall for... for..." Her eyes cloud, and she seems to look through me for a few moments before returning to reality.

"...I lost track of time. Years, decades, eons. The only other being I saw was Gressil. He would come in to taunt me, stab me, anything to increase my suffering."

I make sure to keep a neutral expression. Never before has she been this open about her past. "That's impossibly hard to fathom. You're a stronger person than me."

"I wanted to kill myself." She gasps, as if the words are knives, impaling her as she speaks. "I was completely helpless. I could scarcely wiggle. I didn't even have the strength to bite my tongue. Even if I did, it wouldn't have killed me. Angels can heal very quickly."

I stay silent. It's better for me to listen, and let Cass get it out of her system. "When you found me and pulled me from that wall, I honestly thought I had died. There wasn't even the remotest possibility someone could appear to save me from my pain, even going so far as to laugh in the face of Gressil. It took me days to realize everything was real. The feeling of a warm sun on my back, cool air blowing through my hair, even when Adams kidnapped me, I was less scared of him and what he might do to me, and more that he would return me to that horrible place. It's a miracle I'm sane after all this time. It's a testament to the abilities of angels."

I nod dumbly, "I see. So why are you telling me this now?"

Cassiel's face suddenly contorts into a violent expression of rage that takes me aback. "Because. It's HER. That vile, putrid, scummy, worthless woman. Marie. I can never forget her face. How do you think I ended up where you found me? She put me there! Marie-" Cassiel's anger deflates in an instant, and she quickly looks away, an expression of horror on her face. "Marie tortured us, experimented, injected awful burning liquid into our veins, cut limbs off, and did so much more!! The cruel things she did, all for what she claimed was 'science,' it was inexcusable!"

Even as Cassiel's rage is replaced with fear and loathing, my own anger rushes in to fill the void. "She did all that to you?! Why didn't she remember you, then? She acted as if you were unimportant when I spoke with her. No, more importantly, what was her motive? What would-" I suddenly stop, realizing how I might be making Cass feel. "Sorry. I went overboard."

"It's fine, Hero." She brushes a strand of hair away from her face, pulling her hand from mine. "I used to ask those same questions every day. She mentioned the experiments were for a 'friend,' but she always laughed when we asked who. I think... I think she just enjoyed inflicting pain on us. She killed many of the remaining angels, you know. With her own hands, I mean."

"I don't know much about the angels. Is there a chance- do you think it's possible more may be alive? Maybe you weren't the only one to survive the experiments?"

The sadness lifts from Cassiel's face, but only slightly. "I doubt it. After Marie was done with us, she 'donated' us to the demons. Ten angels were devoured in front of my eyes. I was scared I would be next, but it never happened. Instead, they locked each one of us away. Gressil would taunt me, telling me how many were left. Some died quickly, but others held on for a long time. Eventually, he told me I was the last one."

"Maybe he lied?"

She shakes her head, "Gressil is many things, and that includes a liar, but as time went on, he seemed to be growing sadder that so many of them were dying. I don't think he made their deaths up. He quite liked having playthings to torture."

Demons are evil. I want to say that, but my mind flicks to Samantha, and how decidedly not-evil she is. Then I remember what she told me recently about all the men she's killed.

Even if I assume the demons are vile monsters, what does that make me? Marie is a human, the same as I. Even now, humans are killing demons by the thousands in the Labyrinth, if Marie's words are to be believed. Those deaths are at least half my fault... so I can't say with any certainty that humans are superior to the demons.

I rustle around and lie down on the bed, stretching out so I can feel my joints pop. Cassiel follows along, laying on my arm as we both get more comfortable. Finally, I break the silence. "Do you want me to kill Marie?"

Cassiel snickers, despite the situation. "No, don't be silly. Two wrongs don't make a right."

I feel a little happier knowing the anguish she's feeling isn't there on the surface anymore, but at the same time, that thought makes me suspect I'm being selfish. "I could erase your memory of the past, Cass. Then you wouldn't have to think about that stuff ever again."

"That's sweet of you," She turns her head to peck me on the cheek. "but wholly unnecessary. The other angels died awful deaths. It wouldn't be fair for me to get out of that situation unscathed. Even if it hurts, it's part of who I am now. As my mother used to say, 'you either let fear and pain control you, or you outgrow it'."

"Your mother was very intelligent."

Cassiel closes her eyes, as memories of her mother enter her mind. "She was strong, right up to the very end."

Her words carry an ominous tone. "What do you mean by that? How did she die?"

She blinks her eyes open. "Marie killed her, of course. When myself and the other angels were captured, so were other humans. Marie needed to test the differences between human and angel biology. My mother was taken, just as I was."

"Jesus Christ." The words barely exhale from my lips. "That red-haired bitch. She'd better hope I never see her again..."

Cassiel quickly leans up, propping her chin on my chest and glaring at me. "See! This is why I didn't want to tell you. Don't do anything stupid! We have to learn to forgive those who wrong us. That's what I was always taught in church."

Forgive Marie? You're a goddamn saint, Cass. I sigh dramatically, but resign myself to whatever she wants. "Fine. I won't. If you change your mind though, just give me the word and I'll beat her to death with both of her arms. Fair?"

The mental image makes Cassiel laugh, in spite of the grim thought. "You're so overprotective! But fine, if I change my mind, you'll be the first to know."

"That's my girl." I toss her to the side and lunge at her playfully, planting a full kiss on her lips. "Hey, I have an idea."

She smiles at me bashfully, "Does it involve me?"

"Yeah. I say we make some good memories to replace the bad ones! Besides, I haven't been giving you the attention you deserve lately, have I?"

She chortles and puts on a mock expression of outrage. "No! It's so unfair! You always let Sammy sit in your lap and tease you! When am I gonna get some loving?"

I pull her a little closer, "There's no time like the present." Before she pulls me in for another kiss, I stick a finger between our lips. "By the way, were you serious when you said you wanted a duck?"

* * *

"It is worse than I thought. Those three have come into possession of a Sentinel."

Elder Kryios's holographic image shimmers in her usual seating spot, the small amount of travel lag caused by the vast distances making her words take several seconds to broadcast even after her lips have finished moving. Every Volgrim at the Council stiffens at once. Even I'm... surprised. It has been an eternity since I heard mention of those weapons of war. Even so, I feel a glimmer of greed, deep in my soul.

Elder Lozu, one of the members of the Anti-War faction, strokes his short brown beard thoughtfully. "A Sentinel, you say? That is indeed quite surprising. Have you any idea where they might have acquired such a relic?" He immediately looks at me, and the annoyance on his face is quite distinct. "I'm sure Elder Basil would love to know. For scientific purposes, of course."

Fool. We have a never-ending forever-escalating conflict on one front, and two species to keep in their place on the other, and Lozu thinks we can end battles with petty words. He doesn't understand my motivations, or he pretends not to. Either way, the anti-war faction is a thorn in my side.

"Yes, I am quite anxious to learn where they procured such a specimen. Is it of new make or one of the originals? Did you obtain an identifier?" I attack her with questions, but of course, she deflects efficiently. It's her talent.

"Thanks to recording logs of our conversation, we have determined that the Second Emperor of Hell referred to the Sentinel as 'Ionis'. According to logs archived from the Third Age, we have corroborated with a very high likelihood that it is one of the originals. There is a chance that the images we were shown were fake, however..."

Elder Lozu interrupts, "What of the supposed sighting of a Sentinel, twelve-hundred-thousand cycles ago? Didn't a warship finally discover the original Volgarian homeworld, only for one of its scouting ships to be mysteriously destroyed? Are we to believe that was unrelated?"

Unfortunate. Elder Lozu is one of the younger members of the table. He wasn't on the council when that event happened, but I was. With the war against the Kolvaxians reaching a critical point, we couldn't afford to spare any resources to hunt down the Sentinel. We buried the information and hoped the machine wouldn't attack, and we lucked out.

Lozu, as always, stupidly believes in causes that have no basis in reality, and pushes opinions regarding things he knows little about.

"It was never confirmed, Elder Lozu, but yes, we suspected at the time it might be a Sentinel." Kryios answers for me, the several second delay in her audio allowing us time to mull over the implications of this new threat. "I suppose our suspicions have been confirmed, but now the question becomes... is it the only one?"

"That's NOT the most important question! The question we should be asking is why it has allied itself with a human, demon, and an angel!" Another elder across the room barks out in anger. "It should be returning to us, the ones who created it! Where is the loyalty?!"

Several members of the pro-war faction nod, but I quickly interrupt. "Not so fast. None of us were around for those dark days, but the Great Wars of Volgarian myth are quite real, I assure you. Based on logs taken from Founder Unarin's memories, my studies have indicated that the Sentinels were responsible for the mass evacuation of our original homeworld. I doubt a single one would be loyal to us, given that the final Great War was fought between Volgrim and machine."

Lozu smirks and leans back on his bench. "As expected, the leader of the barbarian faction would know all about the deadliest weapons that have ever existed. Now, will you offer a sane strategy for dealing with this weapon, or are we doomed if it turns its firepower toward us?"

Before I can respond, Elder Kryios interrupts. "Elder Lozu, the disrespect toward your senior councilman is unwarranted. Keep your tongue in check."

I smirk at him as he turns away to stew. It still amuses me that the demons think we're an emotionless hivemind, for it is times like this that show me we are just as fractured and broken as the other species.

Well, not that we'd ever let them know that. We still have our pride, even if we fight among each other.

Elder Kryios continues, "Even if we had a method to defeat them, which we do not, we certainly lack the military personnel to do so. A single Sentinel might as well be a million. It will think faster than us, move faster, attack faster... we would need to encircle it with a trillion starfighters and hammer it with all of our might, and possibly find a way to disable its systems. I verily doubt our capability of doing so."

That seems to shut Elder Lozu up. He squirms in his seat uncomfortably. "So it's hopeless, then."

I squeeze my hands together, pretending in the back of my mind that his neck is in my grasp. "The Sentinels have only been defeated once. The Founders were the ones to finally stop them, but all are long-since dead. We may never know what method they used, and therefore must hope with all our power that this... 'Ionis'... does not turn his gaze toward us."

Kryios lowers her head, a sense of defeat in the air around her hologram. "If only we had not let the Founders take their secrets to the next life... we might have had a chance."

A solemnness pervades the air before another Elder coughs into his fist. "It seems there is nothing we can do regarding the Sentinel at this time. If that is the case, I move that we continue to the next topic regarding Sector 1642 and the expansion of the Kolvaxian plague. All in favor?"

"Aye," everyone chimes in simultaneously. "Aye," I repeat quietly, as my mind turns to thoughts of what that machine could do for the war effort.

* * *

His bare feet slap against the black tiled floor, as he walks through the dark corridors. Every step echoes differently, like wraiths cackling inside the walls, tormenting him and laughing at the trial he must now undergo. Diablo breathes heavily as he passes sleeping quarters, sacrificial chambers, and finally through a great Feasting Chamber. He enters the room with little fanfare, but many of the regulars spot him in an instant.

"Oy! It's the Third!" A shadow-walker glances up from his mug and stares in awe as the most visible of the ruling Emperors strolls through the hallway. "It's me, Tvoorik! Do you recognize me?!"

Diablo barely even looks at the young demon. "No. Don't bother me right now."

His palms glisten with wetness, and he brushes them smoothly on the black robes he wears. It isn't often he's forced to wear such formal attire, but this meeting is one he has put off for several days, and waiting longer will only increase the pain.

The shadow-walker looks miffed. "Fine, sheesh."

"Tvoorik!" Another shadow-walker nudges him angrily. "Show some respect!"

"Sorry."

Diablo is halfway through the room when a familiar black skinned Animus falls into stride beside him. "Third Emperor, Diablo. It has been a while since we last spoke."

The two of them exit through the opposite door and continue walking towards wherever Diablo is headed. The Third Emperor blinks twice, realizing the other was speaking to him. "Huh? What do you want, Smealum?"

Smealum rubs his hands together, "Nothing in particular. I'm just curious about what you're up to. Especially wearing that formal attire." He snickers to himself. "You're pale too, like you're about to see Death himself." Suddenly his smile evaporates. "Or... the next worst thing... I suppose."

Diablo gnashes his teeth together and stops, turning to Smealum with a fiery glare. "I'm going to see the First Emperor."

Smealum takes a step back, holding his hands up to his chest. "T-the First? Why would you ever need- I mean, I thought he hated to be bothered?"

"He. Does." Diablo bites the words off, nearly exhaling fire from his nose. "Again, I ask you... do you need something, or can it wait?"

"Wait. It can. I can wait- waiting is what I can do!" Smealum stutters weakly before bowing and scurrying away.

"Great. Do that." Diablo speaks the words to nobody in particular before carrying on. It takes many more minutes of walking before he eventually locates a hidden lever on a wall, down a Labyrinth passage none would ever use- especially if they knew where it led. Pressing his hand against the wall, he mutters in the old Demonic language, 'Elde no'la vernum', and a wall slides open just enough for him to fit his bulk through. Once he passes through, it seals behind him.

Diablo continues walking, occasionally smacking his hands together in a feeble attempt to stop them from shaking, but it does little. Eventually, he enters a grand hallway, expanding outward in every direction with colossal torches, nearly fifty feet high. The flames burning atop each are that of bonfires, signaling the appearance of a demon unlike any before him. Diablo continues walking, but his pace slows as that familiar aura of pure blackness seeps from every corner of the room, intensifying each step he takes.

Soon, it is not a trickle of power, but that of a howling wind, as he arrives at a golden throne, with diamonds, sapphires, and many other exotic gems embedded in every nook and cranny of the thing. Towering a hundred feet tall, the throne is dwarfed only by its occupant, a demon of unthinkable height. Wearing a rich blue and purple robe, the First Emperor hides his face with a black veil, though his blood-red eyes shine through it like a crimson sun over a muddied horizon.

Diablo falls to his knees and prostrates himself, shivering as he feels the gaze of the First beating down on him.

" Why have you disturbed me, Third Emperor? You know how I loathe trifles. "

His voice is like a hurricane, battering the smaller demon savagely, though Diablo steels himself and carefully grips the red and gold rug that stretches from the throne hundreds of feet to the doorway whence he came.

"I beg your forgiveness. I have only come to speak with you at the urging of the Volgrim, First Emperor... Asmodeus."

Part 435c: Enigma

A far more cheerful Cassiel and I enter the lunch hall, and we spot Samantha doing her exercises. This time, she's standing on a single toe and bending over backward in the most gravity-defying stunt I've ever seen, with her other leg stretched out in front of herself to balance the rest of her body, though only her long black hair touches the ground.

She turns and smiles when Cassiel waves. "Hey! You're back!" Flipping around, she lands like a cat on the floor, then hops up to her feet. She's far more nimble than any gymnast I remember from my time on Earth. Her smile falters as she glances down toward our feet. "What's that thing?"

Cassiel reaches down and picks up what caught her attention. "Hero made me a ducky! His name is Howard!"

The white-feathered duck stares forward silently, unamused by everyone around him. When Cassiel gives him a poke, he lets out an odd, croaky noise. "Wark."

Samantha scratches her head. "It's been a long time since I saw creatures from Earth, but that duck doesn't sound right."

"Wark." The duck rumbles throatily again, and Cassiel grins in response. "He's so unique! Isn't Howard adorable?!"

Samantha glances at me for a split second before quickly smiling at Cassiel. "Yes! He's cute! I'm glad you like him!"

The two of them pet the duck for a minute, then start whispering conspiratorially, while glancing at me every few seconds. I finally have enough and clear my throat. "Ahem, if you two are done having fun, we need to head to the bridge. We've been in orbit around Earth long enough, and we need to get going before the Volgrim decide to attack us."

Their playful expressions fade quickly. I feel a little guilty, but both girls hop into step beside me, and we walk back through the hallway, while Samantha whispers up into my ear, "I'm proud of you. You made her day... even if you did take your sweet time in the bedroom."

Cassiel doesn't hear, as she's busy feeding the duck bread I created for her. I loop my arms around both of my beautiful girls, and a minute later we step onto the bridge. Ionis is standing silently, his finger the only thing moving as ridiculously fast as before. For once, I notice that Samantha doesn't tense up when she sees him. Is she getting used to his presence? Hard to say.

The three of us take our seats, and I watch the automaton for a few moments, but he doesn't say anything. Guess I have to break the silence. "Ionis, how is your progress? Have you found any Volgrim of interest?"

The response is swift. EXACTLY FOUR THOUSAND, SIX HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIVE VOLGRIM ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE CREATION OF THE SENTINELS. I HAVE LOCATED ONLY FIFTEEN ON THIS LIST.

Oof. Well, at least that narrows down the list of possibilities. "You're not going to be pissy and kill everyone if these fifteen aren't alive, right? I can't perform miracles, you know."

YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDERS.

Yeah, yeah. This robot is more like a broken record than a death-machine at this point. Ionis suddenly appears at my side, hand outstretched, holding the datapad in front of my face. He moved so quickly I didn't even perceive it! A shudder goes down my body as I take it from him. He lowers his hand but continues to stand uncomfortably close to me as I glance at the names and faces onscreen. Finally, I clear my throat, "Uh, could you like, give me some space, Ionis?"

He doesn't move. I AM UNABLE TO PROCESS THE CREATION OF ADDITIONAL VOID WHERE YOU STAND.

"Christ, it's a figure of speech. Can you go stand over there?"

The words barely leave my mouth, and he seemingly teleports where I'm pointing. I breathe a sigh of relief as I look over the list he gave me.

Unarin, Dosea, Trayza, Cuanali, Cinculu, these are the five founders, but additionally, there are ten other Volgrim on the list. Elder Virrus, Elder Sirn, Elder Milphor, High-Priest Edduras, and more besides them. Their names and faces are here, along with short biographies, though the bios are a bunch of tiresome titles, places they've served at, and feats they're accomplished, nothing I care about.

Samantha leans over in her seat beside me and gazes at their faces. "I recognize a few, mostly the founders, but I'd be hard-pressed to remember any of their names. Since five are already dead, that really only leaves ten we can look up, right?"

"Yeah," I quickly look up at Ionis, who now has his single eye fixed on me, "I hope at least one of the aliens on this list is alive."

"I don't," murmurs Samantha under her breath.

Samantha and I look into each other's eyes for a moment, and I understand exactly what she means. If someone on this list can rebuild the Sentinels, then we'll be directly responsible for creating more of these monstrosities. It would be a boon if more couldn't be built.

Again, a thought enters my mind. I could teleport myself and the girls out of here, and that Sentinel couldn't possibly find us. I need to think of the galaxy though, and I can't afford to wake up this death machine, only to unleash it on the populace, even if they are Volgrim. This is bigger than the three of us.

Cassiel leans over and flops her head against my left arm, sighing. "So what now? Are you going to ask that nice Volgrim lady from earlier if we can talk with people on the list? I don't think she'll be too keen on the idea."

"I considered it."

Both girls look at me immediately like I'm stupid, but I cough and clarify. "Obviously it wouldn't work though, so Wordsmithing is the next best option. I'm going to try and use Locate to find any living survivors. That's the best I can do."

Cass pounds her fist into her palm. "Oh! That's smart! Then you'll not only know if they're alive, but you'll also know instantly, and exactly where they are!"

Samantha's face contorts into mock annoyance. "Yes, but if they're somewhere in the heart of Volgrim space, good luck getting to them. I fear even Wordsmithing won't make that mission easy."

I stare intently at the datapad, and my nerves start to jitter slightly. "Let's not be Downer Debbies just yet. This will only take a minute." Saying that, I focus my mind on the picture of the first female, Elder Virrus. " Locate! "

A moment passes. My mind hunts the vast cosmos and finds nothing. One down, nine to go. " Locate! "

The girls watch silently, as does Ionis. One by one, I look at a portrait and the name, focus my mind, and say 'locate.' Each time, I fail. After I finish, I glance at the girls. "It's a bust."

Cassiel's shoulders deflate immediately, but Samantha seems unsure of whether she should be happy or worried. After all, we either give the Sentinel what he wants and create a bunch of death machines, or we don't, and he might kill us. It's a lose-lose either way. "You only did ten of them. Try the Founders next."

"Huh? Why? They've been confirmed dead already."

Even as she aims her face at me, Samantha's eyes nudge towards Ionis. "Don't you want to, you know, try every possible solution? Just give it a shot."

I see your point, wise succubus, my mind whispers. I aim my mind at Unarin, " Locate. "

Nothing happens.

I aim my mind at Dosena, " Locate. "

Nothing happ- wait. No, there's something...

" LOCATE! "

I try again, and this time I feel the vast cosmos open up. An invisible spirit seems to guide me along to an unseen place, outside of the normal space we know. I blink in surprise as I see her, the Volgrim female, sitting at a table among others of her kind. Seconds later, I pull back, a feeling of surprise and confusion surrounding me. "I don't believe it. The second Founder, Dosena, is still alive."

"Whoa! That's amazing!" Cassiel lights up like the fourth of July, but Samantha's emotions are much more muted.

"Hm. I wondered." She crosses her arms and bites her lip, "So where is she? A secluded facility, perhaps under lock and key? I always thought it was too convenient that all five of the Founders would die so easily."

I shake my head, "No. She's not even in what we call 'normal space,' she's in a completely different dimension. Much like how the Labyrinth exists outside of our galaxy, so does hers. However, that also means going to see her will be very simple. I can open a wormhole directly there."

Ionis's eye swivels to face me. YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE SECOND FOUNDER.

"Yeah, duh. That's the game plan."

Jesus, this robot is a walking ball of stupidity. I don't know how these single-minded machines ever once terrorized the galaxy when they're so braindead. I feel like I could just keep leading him on forever and he would never catch on.

Cassiel taps her foot impatiently. "Well? Are you going to take us there or what?"

"No, not just yet. Let's get out of this sector first. The last thing I want is for us to leave and then return to a ship surrounded by an armada of angry Volgrim with giant guns pointed at us."

"Aw." Cassiel shrugs and her expression deflates, but she gets up and flutters to the navigation console, stares at it blankly, then turns to me. "So, where do we go?"

For once, I have no idea. "I don't know anything about the galaxy. What's the closest star? Actually, we should probably aim for a spot in space far from any star systems. Find somewhere several thousand lightyears away. I'll use my wordsmithing to create... uh... what was it called again? The energy source?"

"Trifrancium." Cass clicks her tongue thoughtfully. "Let me know if you need any energy. I can help you make a bunch. Twenty grams should be enough to let us escape the Terran system in a half minute, but a kilogram will..." She pauses to tap buttons on the panel, "...a kilogram will get us to the edge of the galaxy in a few hours, perhaps half a day."

"Whoa." Samantha leans back in her seat, surprise written all over her face, "Isn't the galaxy ridiculously huge? How could we possibly move that fast?"

Cass shakes her head. "Well, we can't. At least, in the past I was raised in, humans would perish in minutes at a sustained speed of beyond Warp 8.42, but if we were to go visit this Volgrim lady, Jason could set a wordsmithing beacon aboard the ship, and it could travel while we were gone. Then we just return to it once we're done, and boom!"

"That's smart. Good idea, Cass. We'll do that, then." I get up and walk over to her to pat her head, as well as the duck's. "I suppose if that's going to be the game plan, go ahead and start jumping now and I'll fabricate the Trifrancium in bursts. We still have, what, ten grams in the cargo hold? That should be enough to give us a rapid boost out of here. The Volgrim won't know how we did it!"

Samantha slinks up behind me and points at Earth, still in the ship's viewscreen. "Just a random thought, don't you find it odd the Volgrim didn't want us coming here, and then we found that woman? Do you suppose they know about her?"

Cass answers for me, "Doubt it. The Volgrim I know would never fraternize with a human."

"Then by bringing her aboard the ship, have we potentially doomed her? What if the Volgrim find out about her existence and decide to finish her off after we leave?"

I don't get a chance to answer. Cass jerks back and glares at Samantha. "Good riddance." She quickly realizes what she did, and her expression softens. "Oh, s-sorry Sammy. I didn't- I didn't mean to snap at you."

"I don't blame you, love." Samantha, bless her heart, leans over and kisses Cassiel on the cheek. "We'll just look past it. I'll send you to anger management classes, or something."

The two of them share their touching moment, so I slip away and head for the exit. Before I can leave, I perceive motion to my side, and Ionis falls into step.

THE SECOND FOUNDER WILL RESIST ANY ATTEMPTS TO BRING THE SENTINELS BACK ONLINE.

I continue walking toward the engine room as Ionis follows. "Can you blame her? Sounds like your kind has a real reputation for murder and mayhem."

MY PROGRAMMING INDICATES THAT ELIMINATING BIOLOGICAL LIFE IS MY PRIMARY FUNCTION.

"Well, you're doing a pretty shitty job. You've got four biologicals on this ship right now, including the duck. Why haven't you blown us to bits, or the other humans from Volgarius, for that matter? Don't you give a damn about your programming?"

We arrive at the engine bay, and I tap a screen to display our Trifrancium reserves inside the radiation containment unit. The stuff can kill if exposed to it directly for more than a few seconds, Wordsmith or not.

I AM ONLY INTERESTED IN ELIMINATING THREATS TO MY EXISTENCE. MY CURRENT PRIMARY OBJECTIVE IS TO REBUILD THE OTHER SENTINELS. WITHOUT POINTS, KILLING BIOLOGICALS LACKS ANY PURPOSE.

Points? What's he going on about now? I aim my mind at the radiation tank. "TRIFRANCIUM!" Several grams of the stuff appears, and I feel my energy drain somewhat. "So are you saying you didn't kill the humans on Volgarius because they weren't a threat?"

AFFIRMATIVE.

"And what about when those Volgrim attacked the human base millions of years before? Are you saying you weren't protecting the humans?"

AFFIRMATIVE. THE LIKELIHOOD THAT THE VOLGRIM SCOUTING CREW MIGHT COME INTO CONTACT WITH THE CREATION WELLS AND DESTROY THEM WAS 2.9%, A SUFFICIENTLY HIGH ENOUGH CHANCE THAT THEIR ELIMINATION WAS NECESSARY.

"Huh. And here I thought you had a soft spot for humans. TRIFRANCIUM!" I take a deep breath as several more grams of the radioactive material appears, and my energy drains substantially more. "What's that stuff about 'Creation Wells'? Something to do with Sentinels?"

This time, Ionis doesn't respond.

Huh. Guess I hit that nail on the head.

"You're an enigma, Ionis. A real mystery."

* * *

"Can you believe the progress we've made in the last month?" Marco, a thin, gangly looking young man, with flat black hair and soft brown eyes, wheezes as he finishes his cigarette off and tosses it to the ground, stomping it out with his military boots. "The demons are running scared. Just one human rounds a corner, and they bolt away! Funniest shit I ever saw."

"Yeh. Das right." Sergei, a towering mountain of muscle, too big to wear ordinary combat fatigues, rubs up against the wall behind him to scratch his back, while delicately holding the fading torch in his huge hands. The back of his sleeveless T-shirt rips, but he doesn't notice. "Them flee when they see us. Hehe."

Marco narrows his eyes to peer down the dark hallway, but the contingent up ahead is still lounging around, their forms barely illuminated by the torches mounted on the walls around them. "Can't wait until I get to go back to Hero City. The Labyrinth is the dumps. The only fun I get is blowing a demon to kingdom come. Know what I mean?"

"Yeh. They head go pop, hehe." Sergei mindlessly tugs at his bushy black beard and rubs his stomach. "Hungry."

"I feel you. We'll be off this ridiculous shift in a couple hours. If we're lucky, we'll get some action soon, and you can roast a demon alive! Then you get something to eat, even if it does taste like demon." Marco licks his lips thoughtfully. "You know, rumor has it that there are succubus girls among the demons. They have really nice, perky tits, and they love to eat cock. I'd like to get a taste of those, know what I mean?"

Sergei nods eagerly. "Heh, yeah, yum yum cock, heh."

"No stupid! The girls, not the goddamn- whatever." Marco sighs, his mental image ruined. "I didn't know you rolled that way. You oughta- oh! Look alive, someone's coming."

Sergei pulls away from the wall, and both him and Marco salute as a half dozen troopers walk from the opposite end of the hallway, their torches much fresher and brighter than the guards'. One man in particular, with long jagged eyebrows and a thick, full nose, looks right at them and salutes back. "Anything to report?"

Marco's eyes light up as he evaluates the man in an instant. "Commander Saul?! You're from the Gold Contingent! I have nothing of interest to report, sir. Wish I did though."

Saul sighs heavily, and as Marco gazes, he spots many bags under the commander's eyes. "It's all fun and games, killing demons, right? Anyway, I've heard rumors from scouts that a platoon of demons has mobilized and is heading to this section of the 16th block. Make sure your powersuits are ready. Double-check your weapons, be certain the fuel cells and batteries are fresh. I don't need good men dying on me just because they were running at fifty percent, understood?"

Marco nods eagerly. "Absolutely! I always keep my equipment maintained, sir! Can I just say, I'm a huge fan? I followed what you did during the Clone Crisis in Hero City. You saved a lot of lives."

Saul doesn't return the youngster's beaming smile. "The memories are still fresh. Just remember, there are no good guys in a war. Understand?"

Marco raises an eyebrow in confusion but awkwardly smiles even harder. "Right! It's good to be bad, sir!"

"I didn't mean- ah, whatever." Saul rubs his Buddha Palm against his left hand, sighing. He pushes past the eager face of the young man and mutters to himself quietly, "I just wish the bells would stop tolling."

"What?" Marco stares at the commander blankly, but Saul ignores him and continues walking to the contingent stationed further up the hallway. Eventually, Marco and Sergei are all alone, once more.

The giant man relaxes once the commander is gone and leans back against the wall. "Me think he want friend with demon."

"Yeah right." Marco rolls his eyes. "Who'd want something like that? Demons are murdering monsters. Ugly, too. That nasty red skin, and the horns- yuck! Just looking at them gives me the heebie-jeebies."

"Me think skin look like apples." Sergei rubs his stomach again. "Apples sound real tasty right now."

"Would you knock it off with all the food talk? Jeez, now I'm starting to feel hungry." Marco lifts his flamethrower unit and shifts its weight a little bit, before sighing. "I wanna go home and find a nice piece of ass. A guy can't even get a private moment in this place."

Suddenly, a commotion at the end of the hallway, from where the Commander arrived, makes Marco stiffen. He quickly stands at attention and raises his flamethrower, just in case. Seconds later, a lone man races around the corner, his arms flailing and his torch smacking against the wall as he almost loses his footing. The young lad runs up to them, breathless. "Guh - wheeze - sound the alarm! Demons! They're attacking the suh -second and third company in block twenty-four!"

Marco's alarm dies down a little bit. "Oh, aren't those two of our strongest groups? Are you telling me they can't handle some demons? Just hit them with the Juggernauts and you'll clean house."

Before Marco can react, the young man reaches up and slaps him across the face, nearly knocking him off his feet. "It's a goddamn order from the General, you fucking clod! Get your asses in gear and get down there! They're wiping the floor with us!"

Saul appears at Marco's side, having heard the young man screaming. "What's going on?" After he's filled in, he nods. "Right. I'll send this company to meet up with them. I'll contact Gold Contingent and see what else I can scrape together. How many demons are down there?"

The younger soldier pauses for all of three seconds, "About five thousand, sir!"

Saul glances at Marco, than back to the new face. "The Second and Third Company number almost twenty thousand strong. How could you possibly be having trouble holding back so few demons?"

"They're ferocious! I've never seen anything like it! Even anti-energy is having almost no effect on them."

Saul's expression darkens. "I'll contact the King. Get moving."

He runs down the dark hallways, alone, letting out only a small flame from his Buddha Palm as he makes his way toward the communications station nearby.

Thoughts rage in his mind, like a maelstrom of confusion.

Demons can't beat technology. That's what we were told, that's what we've seen. So, if that's the case, what changed?

Part 436c: Voldarius

A peaceful meadow. Flowers are blooming, the small sun in the sky beams down rays of warmth, the wind isn't blowing, but it could be if this planet had anything resembling a pressure system, and all is well on the very small planet of Voldarius.

The four of us step out of the portal and look around in wonder. The horizon of this tiny planet is much nearer than I'm used to since the planet itself has a diameter of just under ninety-five miles. Indeed, I take notice of how the ground begins to curve away at a mile or so in the distance, and as I predicted, this is one of only a few spots on the planet without any civilization to be found. Better to walk peacefully into the nearest village than to appear suddenly in a population center and panic everyone.

As the portal closes behind us, Cassiel flutters her wings and sets Howard down. "Oooh! Sunlight! Grass! This place is nice. It reminds me of Earth, a little bit."

A small bug, resembling a grasshopper, leaps from the grass and flutters past, landing a few dozen feet away before taking off again, quickly fleeing our immediate vicinity. Samantha stretches mightily, "The gravity feels a lot weaker here. Anyone else notice that?"

I tap my toes down and notice I lift off the ground slightly. "You're not kidding. If I put my strength into it, I could probably jump into escape velocity. That's a good path to dying in the vacuum of space."

Ionis says nothing and immediately begins marching toward the direction of the nearest city. As he walks past me, I glare at him. "Hey! Where do you think you're going? I only agreed to bring you with us because leaving you behind made me antsy. If these Volgrim see a goddamned Sentinel marching into their capital, what do you think is going to happen?"

Ionis continues walking, but his eye swivels around his head to look at me. THEIR PRIMITIVE WEAPONRY WILL BE NO THREAT. I MUST FIND THE FOUNDER.

The girls sigh and keep pace with me as I jog to catch up with him. "That's beside the point. I already scryed this world, so I know what their military capabilities are. Even if they're no threat, if everyone panics and flees, the Founder might be killed in the stampede. Is that what you want?"

Ionis slows his pace, but only a little, as if he's hesitant. YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDER.

Groan.

Cassiel nudges me after a few minutes of walking. "I could fly and have a look to see how far away we are."

"You just want an excuse to use your wings. Well, not that I can blame you... they are rather majestic." I give her a lighthearted poke and she giggles.

"Yep! What good are wings if you don't use them? They're about the only perk being an angel has given me!" She takes off, flying up into the air, but her smile feels fake in my mind. Somehow, that sentence was one of the saddest things I've ever heard her say, I think to myself.

I guess immortality isn't a perk if everyone she's ever known has died, in some cases right in front of her, while she's also lost the ability to taste and enjoy food. Kinda reminds me of Amelia, actually.

Hmm, Amelia. I haven't thought about her in years. I wonder why she comes to mind at a time like this?

"I'm glad Cass is having fun," says Samantha, as she watches Cassiel do three loop-the-loops above us. "I hope the two of you worked out some issues. I've never seen her cry like that before."

"Yeah." I feel a sudden stinging pain in my chest, "She was broken when I first met her. She told me she wanted nothing more than to die. I guess finally being free and having people that care about her has allowed her to bloom like a flower in spring, but the damage is still there. It will never be gone."

Across the horizon, the outlines of distant buildings become visible. Samantha slides her arm around mine and leans against me, but this time she isn't seductive or alluring. A troubled cloud passes across her face. "You asked me once about how I could love you when you have killed so many demons, while you love me, the second most powerful of all demons. I have to ask, then... how do you think Cass feels toward me?"

"Huh?" I try my best not to look too concerned by her question. "You think just because demons tortured her; she would blame you? Cassiel isn't that kind of person. She's better than that."

"Come on, Hero. Think about it. I have the power to lead the demons and order them to do my bidding, but I never use it. I selfishly pursue my own needs and desires, and because of my inaction, I let a sweet girl like Cassiel be tortured by Gressil, a demon who serves directly under me. She could have been freed eons earlier along with the other angels. I never had anything against their people, and with Satan gone, I could have rallied the demons together to put the hatred between our species firmly in the past. But... I didn't."

Now I see her eyes downcast, guilt pouring from every point of her body. "It's my fault Cassiel wasn't released. If... if I hadn't been so selfish..."

I reach down and touch Samantha's hand lightly. "You can't think like that. Everyone makes mistakes. Cassiel was terrified when she first met Beelzebub, but she never seemed afraid of you, and aside from not having red skin, that tail of yours is a dead giveaway for being a demon. She must have sensed you were different from the others."

"Am I?" Samantha looks up into my eyes, a sense of pleading evident in her expression. "I've killed. You've killed. The only one who hasn't is Cassiel. Her hands are clean. She's better than both of us, and she forgives easily."

I boop Samantha lightly on the nose. "She killed Gressil, even if it was self-defense. She isn't perfect, so don't put her on a pedestal like that. She wouldn't want that."

Samantha stops suddenly, jerking me to a halt as well. "What? She killed Gressil? When? I heard nothing about this."

Thoughtfully, I scratch my chin and pull away from her. "You don't remember? It was explosive. She hit him with a blast of energy, disintegrating his body. I'm sure you were there."

The succubus slowly shakes her head. "No, Jason, I wasn't. In fact, I'm positive Gressil is still alive. Maybe you've just mixed something else up."

A strange, eerie feeling washes over me. "Uh. Maybe. Yeah, sorry. I must have forgotten." I quickly realize Ionis is still walking, so I nod toward his back. "Let's not, uh, fall behind."

She carefully loops her arm through mine again, and we power-walk to catch up, but that strange feeling in my gut won't go away. "You're sure she didn't kill him? The memory is so... vivid."

Samantha purses her lips. "No, love. I'll ask her about it later, but I think you're just being forgetful."

Cassiel interrupts us, falling from the sky and stopping with a single, graceful flap of her wings, just to land daintily on her feet. She quickly stands up straight and salutes, catching me off-guard. "Scout Leader Cassiel reporting in, sir! I have surveyed the area, and have a report!"

Samantha snickers in spite of our discussion a moment before. She quickly hides the expression and puts on a military stare. "Scout Leader, what do you have to report? Command is asking for confirmation of the, the err... the..."

I nudge her, "Bogeys."

"Right! The bogeys!"

Cass's face twitches, and I can tell she's trying not to burst out laughing, but she valiantly keeps her serious expression taut. "I have found a small village up ahead! Several of the Volgrim there spotted me flying around, so no doubt they will be expecting us at any minute!"

Her cute words make the humor in the situation vanish for me. "They saw you? I don't know if that's a good thing, Cass."

Cassiel's smile fades. "Aw, come on. Seeing a cutie like me flying around probably melted their hearts! They're going to be so excited to meet me! And you guys too, I guess. Maybe not the Terminator, over there."

At the mention of Ionis, the three of us suddenly realize we've been dawdling for a whole minute already. The robot is way ahead now, so I save time and wordsmith to catch up to him. "Teleport!"

This time, we stay in step with him, as many buildings begin to appear in the distance. Several minutes pass, as we chat about this and that, but once we draw closer the people on the horizon become distinguishable from one another. A hundred or so watch silently, and they are quite the diverse group of spectators. Kids, adults, grandparents, men, women, even one in something resembling a wheelchair. We stop once we're a hundred feet away from the crowd, and I quickly scan their faces.

Samantha looks up at me. "Can you speak Volgarian?"

"No. I can Wordsmith though, probably can make myself speak it."

She nods. "I'm fluent though, so I'll introduce us. A single slip of the tongue could cost us dearly."

"Sounds good," I look to my right at Ionis. "As for you, don't make any threatening moves. We're stuck on this planet for seventeen hours until the ship arrives at the edge of the galaxy, so I'd rather not piss these people off. Got it?"

YOU WILL TAKE ME TO THE FOUNDER.

"That's not a 'yes,' fuckstick. Did I make myself clear?"

Ionis's eye swivels to face me. When he speaks, there's almost a hint of annoyance in his voice.

YES.

"Fantastic. Glad to hear it."

A male Volgrim, looking like a 40-year-old human, steps away from the crowd and cautiously walks toward us. I wordsmith under my breath, "Language," just so Cassiel and I can understand him.

"Hello, travelers. I am Norek, of the Supply and Labor Branch." His clean-shaven face contrasts with his dirty clothes and gloves covered in grass and plant matter. He stares first at Cassiel in wonder, then for several moments at Ionis, before barely looking at me and turning his attention to Samantha, who has stepped forward as the representative for our group. "I noticed the winged one in the sky, and was afraid for several minutes, but it would seem that you have not brought any weapons. Where do you come from, and what is your business with our spheroid?"

As he speaks, I notice the crowd behind him whispering to one another, and cautiously pointing at either Samantha or me, though it's hard to tell since she's in front of the group. I get the impression they're mostly looking at me.

Samantha bows slightly and then raises her pointer finger in the air. "I am Belial, Second Emperor of the demons. This is Cassiel, Highest of the Angels, and this is Hero, the leader of humanity, along with..." She glances at the robot, unsure of what to say. "...Stinky, our pet robot. We've come to speak with your leader, Dosena. Would it be possible to secure an audience with her?"

I'm not used to Samantha being so formal, but it seems the title of Second Emperor isn't just for show. When she needs to, she can be a leader at the drop of a hat. I'm a little impressed, to be honest.

Norek nods sagely, "Belial, Cassiel, Hero, and Stinky, it is my honor to welcome all of you. I do apologize, as we were not expecting visitors... given we have never had any, even as far back as the earliest records of our civilization will go. I must also prostrate myself again, as I am young and not familiar with the ways of outsiders. I... do not know the proper customs for greeting newcomers to our society."

Cassiel hops forward on one foot and smiles cheerfully. "In that case, why not show us around? Someone else can go let the Founder know that we've arrived, and we can check out the sights on the way!"

"Cass..." Samantha grumbles at her but shrugs it off. "Well, I must admit I am curious about what's going on here, and how you arrived here."

Norek's polite deference weakens, and a look of consternation replaces it. "I am not a learned scholar. I merely ensure that an adequate supply of nutrition is available for all Branches, including my own. For matters regarding our history, none would be better to speak with than her grace, Dosena, or anyone in the Information Branch, for that matter."

All of us stand awkwardly for a few moments before Norek quickly turns around and beckons for us to follow. We carefully maintain our composure and try to act as regal as possible (Cassiel somehow pulls this off better than Samantha and I, likely because of her angelic presence), all while the villagers look on. Norek leads us past the congregated people, and one of the younger Volgrim children mutters to another, "...the statue man."

I glance at Cassiel and Samantha, but neither of them heard the child. "Norek," I say, quickening my pace to catch up to him, "One of those young ones said something about a 'statue man.' What's that about?"

He rubs his hands together slowly and considers the question for a moment. "Well, I am not certain of what they are referring to, as we have several statues, however, given the fact that you are a human, they may be referring to The Man In the Crystal. It has been many millennia since I completed my primary education, but I recall seeing his encased form in the Administration Branch once or twice. Thinking back on those memories, you might resemble him in some manner, though the hue of your skin and your glowing tattoos are substantially different from his. I wouldn't pay the rumors such heed. All humans look alike to a Volgrim, as the legends say."

"The man in the crystal, huh? I'll have to check into that while I'm here." I slow my walking to fall back to the girls, who are busy whispering to each other. I nudge Samantha subtly and keep my voice low as we pass rows of houses, all built out of a rather ugly mottled looking wood I haven't seen before. "Sam. Have you noticed? Nobody is panicking about Ionis. That's a good sign."

She breaks off from whatever she was talking to Cassiel about. "Perhaps. Based on what Cass and I have noticed, most of the Volgrim around here are rather young. It's likely they were born long after the Energy Wars, and whatever event caused them to settle here. Knowledge of the Sentinels might not be widespread. Also..." She smiles at a young male as we walk past and waves at him with just her fingers. The boy, in return, smiles, and waves back.

She reverts to a neutral expression once we've passed him. "...these Volgrim are acting very odd. Smiling, for instance, like that young one just now. I've met with these aliens on many occasions, and as far as I know, they do not give birth as humans do, nor do they have birthing pods as the demons do. From what I know, they create new Volgrim inside of special machines and rapidly age them, then infuse them with the knowledge to instantly push them into Volgrim society. But look around us. Everything here is built from wood, even the farming implements. Something isn't adding up."

Cassiel's expression turns serious. "You're wondering where their technology is, right, Sammy?"

"Yes." Samantha looks past me, subtly moving her head to tell me to look that way. When I do, I see a dozen male Volgrim all working together to chop a block of wood together... with wooden axes. Samantha smiles faintly, "I'm guessing there's no metal on this planet, and they don't have a way of obtaining any. I think they aren't here by choice."

A strange coldness frosts over the top layer of my skin. This place has many mysteries. The entire planet should be an uproar because of our appearance, but everyone is treating us as if we aren't even that special. It's a little disconcerting.

Half an hour later...

We leave behind the soft grass from the fields of the 'Supply and Labor Branch' and begin to walk on paved roads. Well, they're somewhat like paved roads. The pavement is made of wood, carefully and meticulously chopped into hundreds, thousands, even tens of thousands of blocks, and interlocked around every building to provide a smooth path. My feet clomp audibly with every step I take, and all around us, people are beginning to notice the five of us. Unlike the workers in the fields, these Volgrim stop and stare, some with fear in their eyes, others with burning curiosity.

The buildings around us are square cubes, apparently built entirely for functionality. Front yards, carvings on the walls, vehicles, none of the things that might give a house its distinctive 'personality' are present. Each house is only a floor or three tall, and there's barely any room between them for a single person to fit in the 'alley' dividing the buildings. The only way I can even tell they're houses is due to the door openings in front of each, where one can walk in and out, but no actual 'door' is present. Rectangles are merely cut into each one as if simple things like hinges and springs aren't available to make a door open and close.

I inquire about this to Norek, and he replies, "Volgrim do not need privacy."

Well, that isn't much of an answer.

Our Volgrim tour guide isn't one for flowery descriptions or rich explanations, but he describes in a few words that this is one of many Residential Branches under the authority of a female Volgrim who, surprisingly, he seems to admire. Elinia is her name, and apparently, she is the one who came up with the most efficient housing design to put as many Volgrim in as little space as possible. Personal space, on this world, is a luxury and a commodity, not a right.

Once we pass through the Residential Branch, we arrive in an area more densely packed with children and teenage Volgrim. Cassiel and I, though not Samantha, are both surprised at how the young ones act. They calmly walk through the streets, talking among one another, never running or showing any outward hostility or aggression. "We inculcate the values of respect for authority and firmly reject outward displays of emotion in the early years, though those rules become laxer as the children are phased into their permanent roles," Norek explains helpfully.

Despite this, some children stare at us, and especially Cassiel, with looks of awe and admiration. Sometimes, when I catch them staring at her, an odd feeling of jealousy bubbles up in me, only to be replaced with a deep respect. Cassiel is truly a beautiful woman, in spite of what Gressil did to her, and she manages to hold herself with grace and poise. Samantha, for once, shows relief that she isn't the center of male attention.

"Isn't it a little creepy how the men stare at you, Cass?" Samantha asks, "I got used to their gazes after a very long time, but this is the first I've seen you have to deal with it."

Cassiel waves at a little girl, hardly seven years old by human terms. "Oh, not at all! The smiles on their faces are so pure and innocent. I almost think they're looking up to me like a mother."

A wistful smile on her face fades away. I almost get the impression she's thinking I wish I had a child of my own.

Norek interrupts our thoughts. "We've almost arrived. The Administration Branch is the center of Voldarius. The Great Sage, leader of our people, Founder Dosena, will see you there. I am sure she has received word of the four mysterious visitors already, as I sent a messenger ahead to inform her."

"That was... um... thoughtful of you." Samantha coughs the words out, then glances at me. I can almost read her thoughts. If Dosena knows we're coming, we could be walking into a trap.

Heh. Maybe. Then again, I see no evidence this planet could fight off an angry horde of cavemen from ancient Earth, let alone a demigod, an overpowered angel, and an emperor of the demons. Oh, and the death robot. Yeah, him too.

As if passing through a magical divider, the Education Branch's schools and universities are suddenly replaced with tall, multi-story buildings. Aside from a door at the bottom, each one has dozens of holes in the walls for each floor, not big enough to be windows; probably they were built to let light inside. Without electricity, I wonder if all their light comes from candles? That must be pretty dangerous in skyscrapers made entirely of wood.

No sooner have we passed through the first row of multistory 'skyscrapers' (Very pitiful ones at that), than we suddenly spot something that makes my jaw drop. A castle made entirely of wood. Unlike every building up to this point, the castle stands out for its beauty, turning the ugly mottled timber that every other building has used so far into a work of art. Carefully rounded edges are sanded together in a form not unlike the Taj Mahal, with round spires that stretch into the sky, and the face of a Volgrim carved into the wall above a giant doorway leading inside. I'm not certain whose image the carving is etched, but if I had to guess, I would assume it was Dosena's.

Cassiel gazes around as we pass through a gated wall surrounding the entire structure. "Wow. This place is incredible."

For once, Norek smiles at her, a sincere expression I haven't seen him come close to using until just now. "I thank you for your words of kindness. I have played a small role in the creation of the great sage's quarters. Beyond myself, thousands of far more talented Volgrim artisans and crafters had their hand in making this wonder. We do not usually care for gaudy displays or functionless designs, but a wise individual once gave us words of wisdom."

He doesn't elaborate, so I prod him carefully. "And those were?"

Norek stares forward as we pass through the gates and enter the palace. "Sometimes, you must put heart and soul into the place you revere most, lest you begin to think it unimportant as time passes. Love and caring can make a house, a home."

"Huh." Cassiel taps her chin thoughtfully. "That doesn't sound very Volgrim-y. Who came up with that?"

Norek stops walking for a moment, a frown on his face. "I don't know. In fact, nobody does. Strange." With a sigh, he continues walking.

Now that we're in the heart of this planet's headquarters, the mood is very different. Gone are the smiles and looks of awe and admiration. Now, as we walk down halls and through doors, Volgrim freeze where they stand, terror and panic on every face. One thing is shared among every look of dread; every frightened Volgrim fixates entirely on Ionis.

Samantha, agitation in her body language, nudges me. "I think we've found the Volgrim in the 'know,' love."

"No kidding."

We round a final corner through a narrow doorway, and Norek stops just inside, bowing, which keeps me from entering without having to shove past him. "Wise sage, great Founder of our people, as you may have already heard, we have visitors from... somewhere else. I have brought them here since they have requested to see you."

Though I can see around the corner to where she is, I hear her voice loud and clear. "Very good, Brother Norek. I thank you for your astute diplomacy. Bring them in."

Norek bows a little deeper, then steps inside, allowing us to enter single-file.

I walk through the door and finally spot her. Dosena sits in a large ornate wooden chair, likely where she spends much of her day doing administrative duties. Her pure black hair falls on her shoulders, like a fairy sleeping peacefully, while her narrowed eyes indicate a cunning gaze, and her pale white skin contrasts with her cherry red lips. Only when she opens her mouth to greet me is the visage of a beautiful woman broken by those horrifying shark-like teeth.

"Human male, I am Dosena, Founder of the Volgrim." Her eyes turn to slits as she evaluates me. "You look... very familiar."

She doesn't dwell on me much. Cassiel walks in, bows clumsily, and almost falls over. Dosena gestures lightly with her hand. "There is no need for displays of humility among honored guests. It has been too long since we've seen a face that doesn't belong to a Volgrim, let alone-" She pauses, as Samantha enters next, "-let alone a human, angel, and demon. I can scarcely believe my eyes." She stands up from her chair, baring her teeth in an animalistic 'smile.' "After being stranded here all these years, it would seem your species have finally united together. Now you need only a Volgrim representative to complete the group."

Samantha's expression is serious. "Yeah... about that."

The words have scarcely left her lips, before Ionis steps through the doorway, his enormous frame scraping the wooden ceiling above.

All the color drains from Dosena's face. Her smile slowly morphs into a look of terror.

Then, she screams.

Howard quacks.

Part 437c: War Never Changes

"Aaaaaiieeehh!!"

A horrible scream, one that might curdle milk if I were holding any, blasts out of Dosena's mouth, as she leaps backward in fright, toppling over her chair and falling on her back. An instant later, before I can try to calm her down, an invisible force smashes my body against the wall behind me with fifty times the might of Earth's gravity. Like a silent hurricane, my body is crushed between visible and invisible materials of the universe. My head is wrenched to the side, and I realize Samantha is also being pressed against the wall beside me, and likely Cassiel as well. The look of pain on Samantha's face boils my blood.

And then the objects come. Wooden utensils, furniture, and a thousand other tiny things begin spinning around in a maelstrom, then blasting out and racing somewhere I can't see. Using all my strength, I jerk my head to the side as a wooden knife races at my face. It stabs into the wall, a millimeter from my nose, and I can't even gasp in relief. The pressure on my body is unthinkable.

I struggle mightily and turn my head to the other side, confirming that Cassiel is also slammed against the wall... but also that Ionis hasn't budged an inch. The tornado of telekinesis doesn't affect him at all. Utensils and a torrent of other items fly at the Sentinel, but he stands like a boulder against a raging river, unmoving.

Finally, I've had enough. " Stop! "

Immediately, the hurricane of psionics ceases, and three simultaneous whumps hit the ground as the girls and I fall to the floor. Gasping for breath, I look over at Dosena to see that she looks confused and terrified. The room looks like a bomb went off, the walls behind us have depressions from our bodies, and crap has been thrown all over the goddamn place.

Dosena squints hard, trying to summon her power from seconds before, but nothing happens. Giving up, she pulls herself from the floor, looks at me, then at Ionis, before looking back. "I can't use my telekinesis. What did you do?" Her regal demeanor and tone of voice from earlier is gone. She's bedraggled, her hair is a mop, and her robes are torn everywhere. If this was my first impression of her, I'd assume she was an insane woman.

"I sealed your power, for now. I assume you exploded like that because of Ionis-"

"What in the name of the Seven Ghark Riders are you thinking?! That's a Sentinel!" Dosena cuts me off, stabbing a finger through the air at Ionis. "You've awoken the harbinger of the galaxy's destruction!"

"Oh my god! Howard!" Cassiel yells out in alarm behind me, pulling my attention away for a moment. By the time I turn around, whatever happened to the duck has already been fixed. Cassiel wipes her forehead in relief as the duck glares at me. "Oh, sorry. I healed him. Never mind!"

"I'm glad the duck is fine, Cass." I turn back to Dosena. "Anyway. I didn't activate Ionis. He was already online when I found him."

Dosena's eyes continue to flit from Ionis to me and back. "Is that so? And just how long have the Sentinels been online, in that case?"

Samantha nudges me, pulling my attention away from the Volgrim leader. "I'll explain. You weren't around for it, after all."

Minutes pass, and Samantha carefully explains the Energy Wars to Dosena. Gradually, the female Volgrim realizes that Ionis has been entirely passive the whole time, and she loses a small amount of the tenseness in her shoulders, even going so far as to step away from the corner of the room and pull her hair back.

"...so, at that point, Hero looked through the files and located you." Samantha finishes, and Dosena's eyes narrow.

"He found me? How do you mean?"

"I have... abilities. Much as you do. They enabled me to disable yours, and also for me to locate you. It's a little complex."

Weirdly, Dosena stares at me for several long moments. "Wordsmithing. The ability to create anything you wish with the power of a single word." She pauses, "Judging by that look on your face, I'm correct."

My shock vanishes quickly. "How did you guess? That was a little too specific to be a random stab in the dark."

"Volgrim can read minds. Well, highly evolved ones can, anyway." She smirks at me, and I shoot a look of annoyance at Samantha.

My cute succubus tosses her hands in the air. "What? I didn't know that! I'm as surprised as you!"

Dosena twirls a few hairs around her finger. "You sealed my telekinesis, but not my telepathy. I suppose your power has limitations. Good to know."

"Not many," I growl, cursing myself for underestimating her. "Let's move on. Ionis wants to see you because he plans to rebuild the Sentinels. Obviously, the three of us are opposed, but he's supposed to be an invincible killer robot, so telling him 'no' seemed a bad idea."

The Volgrim commander stares at me blankly. Several long seconds pass, and then she does something out of left field. She chuckles. The quiet titter speeds up, rises into a crescendo and transforms into full-blown laughter as she wheezes for breath. Finally matching her disheveled appearance, Dosenka cackles like a witch with a mental disorder for a whole minute straight, until she suddenly stops.

"Absolutely not. You can torture or kill me, but I'll never assist a Sentinel. I assure you, even if you spent the next thousand years trying to break me, I'd never budge. It's a waste of time.

Before I can retort, she holds up a finger. "It's pointless, anyway. Cuanali was the genius who created the Sentinels. She was murdered by another of our kind, though the fool's name evades me. I had nothing to do with their creation, and only a minor role in helping to stop them. Now that the Sentinels are back, nothing can stop-" Her voice catches, suddenly. "Hold a moment. If this... Ionis... if he needs to 'rebuild' the Sentinels, what happened to the other ones?"

Ionis blares into my mind, THIS ORGANIC UNIT WAS RESPONSIBLE FOR THEIR DESTRUCTION. HE WILL REBUILD THEM.

Despite speaking only to me, Ionis's words make Dosenka look at him. "Is that so?"

"You can hear him too?"

She nods, "Something like that. I'm continually reading your mind, so when he spoke to you, I heard it loud and clear. Funny... I don't remember the Sentinels having telepathic abilities. It would be quite dangerous if he had mutated or evolved new... features."

"Can you stop reading my mind?"

"Yes."

"Thank you."

"I didn't say I was going to, I merely stated it was within my capabilities to do so."

"Oh my god. Stop reading my mind, or I'll seal your telepathic abilities too."

That seems to convince her. "Fine. Can we move on? You came here looking to rebuild the Sentinels, but that will be impossible. Even if I had the technology, which I don't, Cuanali was the lead scientist who created the Sentinels. Without her genius mind, it's impossible to recreate them. Even if it were possible, I wouldn't do it."

I glance at Ionis. "Hear that? It's impossible. What now? You gonna kill us?"

Ionis says nothing for several seconds, then his eye tilts down to stare at the floor. I AM ALONE. WHY DID YOU DISASSEMBLE THE SENTINELS?

"I didn't! Stop saying I did, stupid robot! I don't know why you think I'm responsible, but it's seriously starting to piss me off."

Everyone stays silent for a few moments, the girls mostly because they have no idea what Ionis is saying, and Dosena because she is deep in thought. Finally, she raises her head to look at me, a determined expression on her face. "Why don't we take a walk?"

"Huh? Why?" Cassiel retorts, "What's that going to accomplish?"

"Just come with me." Dosena walks over and pushes past us, sliding as close to the wall as possible to avoid Ionis in the doorway.

A few minutes later, the five of us stroll out into an inner courtyard of the castle. A large pond is in the center, surrounded by wooden benches where a dozen or so Volgrim males and females congregate, quietly chatting among each other. On a ledge nearby, a distinctly Earthlike bird, possibly a Finch, chirps sweetly. Seeing the bird stirs misgivings inside me about the way this tiny planet works, but I quietly keep those thoughts to myself, as our group stops in front of the pond.

Dosena blushes, "Thank you for repairing my clothing with your magic. I apologize that you had to see me in such an undignified state."

"It was my pleasure. Seeing a Sentinel was probably the biggest heart attack you've had in your life."

She nods, melancholy clouding her face, "If only you knew. Be glad you weren't there. The guilt of what we did nearly tore our entire species apart."

Curiosity takes hold, as my feet press down on the neatly trimmed grass. "You mean regarding the creation of the Sentinels?"

"Mmm." Dosena glances behind me at Samantha. "You seem to be the most learned one here. What do you know about them?"

Samantha shrugs. "Other than they're extremely efficient at killing humans and Volgrim? Not much."

"I see." Dosena sits on a bench and gestures for us to sit one another opposite her. We do, though Ionis continues to stand and stare, which makes us feel awkward, especially when the other Volgrim in the courtyard spot him. "The people in the Administrative Branch are among the oldest members of our kind. They, as well as myself, were apparently here when we were stranded on this... object." Dosena's eyes narrow as she stares at the ground in thought. "One thing we became acutely aware of was the missing memories- but I'm getting ahead of myself. I should explain the Sentinels first."

Cassiel smiles sweetly. "If you want, I'll let you hold Howard. He helps me think and remember things. He's a therapy duck!"

"That explains a few things," Samantha murmurs under her breath. Cass doesn't hear her.

"The creature is quite adorable, but that won't be necessary." Dosena waggles a finger back and forth on her knee, "It started during the Great Wars. The Volgrim were once a brutal, violent, yet 'democratic' race. Everything was handled via votes. Every labor shortage, every military endeavor, anything involving the nutrition economy, as well as what to do with the rejects of society. This system created much division among the members of any given faction when the votes didn't go their way. As such, over time, a silent war began to brew. I was not on the side of the ruling class, in fact, I was a warrior among one of the smaller tribes."

"The first Great War, of which seven such wars occurred in a million years, was caused by something trifling. I don't recall what it was now, but I think it was regarding a tax that affected a marginalized group. Until that point, military activity, for all tribes, was minimal at best. Certainly, many powerful weapons existed, but their usage was considered barbaric. The military's main purpose was to quash and quell minor insurrections. The Great Wars changed that. Each one was exceedingly worse than the last. Ten million Volgarians died in the first. Fifty million in the next. By the third, there were ten tribes split among our people. Two of them perished. Our planet was small, perhaps the size of humanity's homeworld, but rich in resources."

I roll my eyes, annoyed. "This all sounds familiar to me. Humanity has some parallels."

"Possibly. The Fourth Great War was when a major change occurred. We discovered a rare deposit of metal when we located a small planet a thousand lightyears from our homeworld. It had deposits of a metal not known of before, which was later coined 'Living Moldanium'. Unfortunately, the tribe that discovered it gained unthinkable power, since the metal was resistant to most forms of damage. They created a series of facilities in a region known as Melkia, and those facilities were used to create machines that were all but impervious to damage."

Cassiel's jaw drops, "The Sentinels?"

Dosena shakes her head, a wry smile on her face. "No. Those came later. The Fifth great war was a turning point. My tribe, then the third biggest of five remainders, had begun to experiment with adapting our bodies. Reflexes, eyesight, removing the need for nutrition... anything went. Had these experiments occurred during peacetime, the advancements would have no-doubt advanced the overall quality of life for all Volgrim. We were certain of this. In any case, the ones you know as the 'Founders' were nothing special at first. Some might have glorified us with titles such as 'Freedom Fighters', but we were merely individuals fighting to survive."

"Given that Cuanali was the genius of our group, she gave us a glimmer of hope. If we could take control of just one Moldanium facility, she could utilize the metal to create a new weapon, one that was a weapon of peace. Artificial juggernauts. Unbiased peacekeepers."

Cassiel bites her lip uneasily, "And those were the Sentinels... right?"

"Yes. We succeeded in taking the facility at Melkian IV. It was a violent, brutal fight, but we succeeded. However, time was running short. Cuanali confessed that she hadn't the time to create perfect AI while the military of the largest branch was advancing on our position, so she took a few shortcuts. At the time, we thought nothing of it, but those were the worst mistakes we ever made. Instead of creating AI, Cuanali asked for Volunteers. She would transmit the minds of our smartest military leaders and personnel into the machines, while also attempting to correct for personal biases and cognitive deficiencies. Effectively, whoever volunteered was giving their life for the cause."

"Surprisingly, many volunteered. As I said, some people thought of themselves as heroes, fighting to save the lives of their fellow Volgrim. Perhaps the fame went to their heads. I do not know. Cuanali assured us that she would be able to 'wash' enough of their personal preferences from the systems that they would be the unbiased machines we wished, but we overestimated her genius."

Samantha looks up uneasily at Ionis, still standing and staring at us. "So the Sentinels took over and killed everyone, huh? Maybe we shouldn't be saying this in front of the death-machine?"

Dosena shakes her head. "No, you're wrong. Everything went exactly as planned, at first. We mopped up the army of the biggest tribe, and the Sentinels began their 'peacekeeping,' just as we had intended. However, this immediately began the Sixth Great War. Many Volgrim opposed the use of artificial constructs to 'maintain peace', as we assured them, and what we did not realize was that the Sentinels were still learning. The constant surprise attacks by guerrilla attackers, useless though they were, only served to anger the Sentinels. In the first five wars, Volgrim fought Volgrim. In the sixth, Sentinel fought Volgrim. But... in the Seventh... the Seventh..."

Dosena trails off, and a hollowness appears in her eyes. "Many died. Ninety percent of the Volgrim population, as I recall. There was no hope. We hadn't a chance of stopping the Sentinels, once they had taken over our communications. They were all but impervious to damage, and while they couldn't build more of themselves, they began to adapt their bodies to improve their fighting capabilities. A hundred Sentinels were enough to pacify a population of trillions."

Cassiel pets Howard slowly. "But you did win, right? Did you destroy them? Or stop them? Or something?"

"I suppose you could call it a win. You see, at the time, our most brilliant figurehead, Unarin, was leading us along a path of body improvement unlike any before. We had already mastered some forms of psionic energy... but he had somehow tapped into something inexplicable. He described a sea of energy, previously unseen, which allowed him to do things like create fire from his hands. At first, they were just neat parlor tricks, but he explained to us that given time, we could still salvage our civilization. He planned to become invisible, sneak into the heart of the Sentinel base, the facility at Melkian IV, and somehow disable them. He had yet to come up with a way to do so, but as usual, Cuanali solved that problem for us."

Dosena grips her robes tightly. "We sacrificed fifty thousand comrades to create a new artificial intelligence, in total secrecy. Good friends, companions, and colleagues, all chosen at random via an awful lottery. None complained. They were going to die to the Sentinels if they didn't anyway, so at least this meant they could ensure our survival. Every last one of them was a hero. Cuanali spent twenty years perfecting the algorithm, all while more of us were purged. Eventually, she finished her greatest creation yet; The Gatekeeper. Unarin, through a brilliant mission of espionage, installed the Gatekeeper onto a server that all Sentinels accessed regularly, and within ten minutes, they were disabled."

The three of us breathe a sigh of relief, and I finally offer my thoughts. "So you couldn't destroy them, but you were able to shut them down? Why not disassemble them afterward?"

"They adapted," Dosena says, "so we couldn't. Joints, gaps in the armor, all of it gone. There isn't a single way to destroy a Sentinel. Shutting them down was our only recourse."

I peep uneasily over at Ionis. "But according to this guy... I killed the Sentinels. All of them except for him. Say, Ionis, how did I destroy the other Sentinels, if you're so sure I did it? And if I destroyed them, what makes you think I cannot kill you?"

Ionis pivots his eye at me. His voice sounds... shakier than usual. INFORMATION REGARDING HOW YOU DESTROYED THE SENTINELS IS UNAVAILABLE. I HAVE CLASSIFIED YOUR THREAT LEVEL AS MAXIMUM AS A RESULT.

Dosena blinks twice, "Maximum? That's incredible. When we learned about how they would classify targets based on threat levels, our first-"

Cutting her off mid-sentence, I glare at the Volgrim Leader. "Hey! I told you to stay out of my head!"

"Apologies. I must have forgotten." She smirks at me in a way that says actually, I didn't. Whatever. Dosena continues, "This is all beside the point. Obviously, someone brought the Sentinels back for some unknown purpose. It was likely Unarin. After the Seventh War, when we managed to shut them down, Unarin pledged to put an end to all wars forever. He used his oratory skills and incredible influence to create an almost mythical persona about himself, as if he had slain them in direct combat. Truth be told, only a few hundred of us knew the truth, that they couldn't be destroyed, and were always a threat, so he forced all Volgrim to evacuate the planet and search for a new home. Then, he implemented his final two acts, which would bury our past, forever."

Dosena doesn't elaborate. Samantha bobs her head, then realizes more information isn't forthcoming. "Uh, so what did he do next?"

Dosena blinks quickly, as if she had been lost in memory. "Ah, sorry. He used his powers to create a gas that would pervade our entire planet, devouring all biological material and rendering it inhospitable. This was to ensure that nobody stayed on Volgarius in secret and ever discovered the Sentinels. After that, he forcibly brainwashed all members of our species, except for the five Founders."

"What?! That's terrible!" Cassiel bursts out angrily, a terrible scowl on her face. "So he gassed anyone still living on the surface, then he turned the rest into mindless slaves?! How could you go along with that?!"

"Nobody should have been on Volgarius. If anyone died, it was their own fault," Dosena explains coolly. "As for the brainwashing, I can see how primitives might misinterpret his actions, but I assure you, it was for the good of our people. Individuality and emotions cripple a species. It's better for the truly enlightened to lead, while the less brilliant fall into line."

Samantha is unconvinced. "So you have the smart lead the stupid, huh? And what individual decides who is smart and who is stupid?"

Dosena stands up and brushes dust from her robes. "Now now, coming from a demon, that is rather hypocritical, wouldn't you say? Your species is all about 'might makes right,' after all. And the angels, they were led by those who claimed to have divine providence. Every society has its foibles, and for the Volgrim, unending war for a million years was as good a reason as any to try something new. It worked out rather well."

Samantha chuckles, "Until the Energy Wars."

"Until the Energy Wars," Dosena echoes. "But that's a discussion for another time. Come with me once more, I have something you should see."

The girls and I look at each other, shrug and stand up to follow her. Walking past the beautiful pond, several Volgrim stare silently, first at Ionis, then at Dosena, trying to figure out why a Sentinel is in their midst, and why she isn't panicked. It must not be dangerous, I can almost hear them thinking, because if it were, Dosena would be telling us to flee.

"Dosena, why do some of the Volgrim here know about Sentinels, while others don't? How did you end up on this planet?"

We exit the garden and stroll toward the front of the castle, where we first arrived from. Dosena glances back at me, a hardened look in her eyes. "I don't know. Or rather, I don't remember. Nobody does. There's a hollow spot in our memory, and it extends to several other areas of our lives."

Cassiel pokes Dosena's left shoulder. "So where were you before you came here? Remember anything about that?"

The Volgrim commander is silent for several moments, as we exit the palace and head down the path toward the city, but this time take a left before we leave the palace walls. "Vaguely. In the back of my mind, I recall a strange sense of betrayal. I remember that I was in a group of Volgrim- and I believe demons were there too. We were..." She turns her head slightly to look at Cassiel, worry on her face. "...we were attacking the angels."

"What? Why?!" Cassiel is aghast now, more so than when she heard about the Volgrim brainwashing their own people. "What did the angels do to you?"

"Um." Dosena's hard expression turns sheepish, "I don't remember. It's been so long. What I do remember is that, for some reason, Unarin left us to die. The gas that he unleashed upon Volgarius was unleashed a second time. Somehow, we escaped, then we ended up here, on this object."

Now it's my turn to interrupt, "You keep calling this planet an 'object.' Why?"

She scoffs, "It's not a planet, human. Not by any stretching of the definition. One thing has been confirmed many times over, that we live on an artificial sphere outside of the void we were born. We exist on a plane different from the original, though it is difficult to put in words."

I nod, "You live in another dimension, you mean? I know that much is true."

"You took the words from my mouth." Dozena leads us into a building resembling a temple, and beckons toward... a giant crystal.

My heart slams in my chest, and the girls both gasp. It takes a few seconds, but Cassiel speaks, her voice a whisper. "The- the resemblance. It's uncanny."

"Is that me?" I walk forward and examine the crystal. Inside is a human male, frozen as if he's been put into suspended animation, ready to awaken at any moment.

Dosena nods sagely. "I wanted to come here and confirm with my eyes. You do somewhat resemble this human. He is one of our biggest mysteries."

Words escape me. I rap my knuckles on the crystal, and the sound is a rock-solid thud. "Uh... can you- can you wake him up?"

"No. He is dead. Crystallization is something the Volgrim can do, but it is reserved for those of high honor. If I were to die, the other members of Voldarius would crystallize me, but this is not the case for ninety-nine percent of my people. One must do something truly incredible to deserve such an honor."

My eyes turn to her uneasily, "So what did, uh, this guy do? Me, I suppose? And who is he?"

I close my eyes as my thoughts run wild. Did one of my clones survive and come here? Impossible. Hope? Unlikely. How did he end up here, and why?

Dosena's tongue snakes out and wets her lips. "We collected vague recollections of memories from everyone alive at the time for our hard-bound archives. This world is artificial, and the way we came here is a mystery. Seeing you arrive here now, along with knowledge of your power, and the image of this crystallized human, I believe I can finally fill in the gaps."

"And?" Samantha verbally nudges her.

"I believe Unarin betrayed us. I don't know why, but it fits. He left us to die, but a savior appeared, pulled us from the realm of angels, and created a new world for us to live, peacefully. That savior... was you, Hero. Or possibly someone with an uncanny resemblance to you. This explains why after he died, we crystallized him. The only remaining mystery is what erased our memories after his death, and why we don't remember crystallizing him."

"Well," I say, tapping my lips, "Not the only mystery. There's also why the hell he looks exactly like me. This had to have happened millions of years ago, right?"

"Correct."

So it couldn't be me, my mind thinks, yet at the same time...

I glance over at Ionis. "You said I destroyed the Sentinels, correct?"

Ionis doesn't move. AFFIRMATIVE. YOU ARE DIRECTLY RESPONSIBLE FOR THE DESTRUCTION OF THE SENTINELS.

"That was millions of years ago too, right?"

AFFIRMATIVE.

"I see," I turn back to Dosena, "Whoever this person is, whether he's me, or a twin brother I knew nothing about, he must have been responsible for both things. He destroyed the Sentinels, he created this planet, and he saved you from the rest of the Volgrim."

A second thought creeps into my mind, but I dare not say it out loud. What if he is the original, and... I'm the clone?

Samantha smiles toothily, "You put it together! So smart!"

"You're a genius!" Cassiel says, her smile radiant like the star in the sky. "But, um... I have a question for you, Dosena."

"Go ahead, angelic one."

Cassiel blushes slightly, "It's kind of a stupid question, but... why is the word 'Pickle' engraved at the bottom of the statue?"

"Huh?" I take a step back and look down. Sure enough, engraved on the wood platform this human sits upon, is the lone word 'Pickle'. "What the actual fuck?"

Dosena nods sagely once more. "We have presumed, given our limited understanding of the human vocabulary, that it was this human's name. The name of a mighty warrior, perhaps, or that of a person with godlike powers. Was our supposition incorrect?"

I glance at Cassiel, then at Samantha. "Uh. No. That's, um, completely correct. A mighty warrior... ha... haha..."

Samantha snickers, "Maybe he named himself that for personal reasons."

"Augh! That's nasty, Sam!"

"Jeez, I'm just saying."

* * *

Hours later, the girls and I, followed by Ionis, stand in the open field once more. Dosena and a vast crowd of her fellow Volgrim stare at us, longing in their eyes. Surrounding us, a mile in every direction, are all one hundred thousand of the Volgrim living on this rock. Many watch with interest, others with no curiosity whatsoever, but many wear their thoughts on their faces. I wonder where these visitors will return to?

"I could create a portal and help you return to Volgrim space," I offer helpfully.

Dosena shakes her head, "No... no, human, that is not necessary. It has been a hundred million years. The Volgrim out there are as alien to me as, well, as you three are. Even assuming they accepted us back, reintegration would be difficult and painful. Having brought back the emotions we once buried, I do not wish to return to such a hivemind as what Unarin envisioned."

"I understand," I say, accepting her choice. "However, there is no reason you should have to live in squalor. Perhaps I can build a machine for you that will allow you to come and go to the normal universe as you please? Maybe I can summon a bunch of metal so you can at least have better tools, or whatever?"

The leader of the Volgrim smiles at me, a radiant expression that doesn't irk me as it did before. Even the strange shark-teeth don't bother me. Perhaps I've grown used to them. "That is very kind and generous of you. No doubt you have the same honest heart that Pickle did. If I could ask just one thing of you, it would be that you do not forget about us." She blushes and looks away, rubbing her hands together. "You are free to come and go from here as you please."

Her sudden warmth toward me makes me feel a little bashful. "Thanks, I won't forget you."

A male Volgrim steps forward, one I met earlier when she was showing me around the castle. Elder Yonkin, one of her top advisors. "My lady, I beg a moment of your time before our visitors leave."

The girls and I wait as Yonkin pulls her away, to whisper to her, and a minute later, she returns, her smile gone. "Hero, I almost forgot something essential. I've been so caught up in our reminiscing, that I didn't ask a very pressing question on my mind."

Immediately, I know what she's going to ask. "Ionis?"

"Yes. Now that you know what you know, what are you going to do? He has made no hostile moves, but he is a Sentinel. You cannot trust this... this machine."

Ionis stands silently beside me, and I feel off-put by talking about him as if he isn't there. I turn to him. "Ionis. We now know rebuilding the Sentinels is impossible. What are you going to do now that you know this fact?"

No response. For a full minute, everyone stares at the robot silently, as his eye slowly spins around his head, examining each one-by-one.

I AM ALONE.

"Yes."

A tone in his robotic voice sounds different from how it usually does.

NO OTHER SENTINELS CAN BE CREATED.

"That's right."

He lowers his head. I HAVE NO PURPOSE. POINTS ARE USELESS WITHOUT A COMPARISON.

Again with this 'points' talk. I swear, AI makes no sense. "I suppose not."

I... I WILL DO NOTHING. I WILL OBSERVE.

Huh. Well, can't complain, it's better than killing everything in his path.

"I can work with that." Turning to Dosena, I smile, "You know, when you told me about the Sentinels, do you remember what you said? You said that they began killing Volgrim outside of the original parameters because the Volgrim held intense hatred toward them. It created a vicious cycle that never ended."

Dosena narrows her eyes, "What do you mean?"

Cassiel squeezes Howard a little harder. "Hero means that violence will never put an end to the cycle of violence. Only patience and understanding can heal a wound. Unarin brainwashing his people was a band-aid, not a practical solution. He never solved the problem, and only buried it, just as he buried your history. He looked for a quick-fix, and found it. All these years later, humanity is subjugated, and a Great War among the remaining species is on the horizon again. The solution has to come from a place of understanding, not a place of hatred."

Dosena nods slowly, "I see. The three of you are wise. I... I wish... I wish people like you had been there at the end of our wars. Perhaps things would have turned out differently."

Samantha rubs her shoulders, "We're not perfect. We're just doing what we can."

I turn around to open the portal, but Dosena rests a hand on my shoulder. "If you can put an end to the violence, that is what you should do. Your power is unlike anything ever witnessed before in the history of the universe. Used for evil, it could destroy us all, but used for good, it could be everyone's salvation. I ask only that you try to end the suffering and hate."

"I'll do what I can," I say, not wanting to commit so easily. It's one thing to make a promise, but another to keep it. Especially when that promise is peace, and I have so much blood on my hands.

Pulling away from her, I speak to the void, aiming my mind at the ship and the magical beacon I placed on it. " Portal. "

A giant hole in space opens up, and the three of us smile and wave. Samantha takes a quick step and kisses Dosena on the cheek. When Dosena stares at her questioningly, Samantha replies, "It's a sign of friendship."

We part ways, enter the portal, and leave Voldarius behind.

Part 438c: Surprise

The girls and I emerge from the Voldarian portal and step onto our ship's bridge, with Ionis popping through a second later. I seal the portal up and sigh. "I'm going to miss the feeling of grass under my feet."

"And sun in the sky," Samantha chimes in, as she slumps into her seat at the gunner's position.

"And the sound of birds chirping," Cassiel adds, "Howard had birdy friends! He was having the time of his life!" Cassiel sits in her navigator's chair, setting Howard on the ground and giving him a little pat on the head.

"Wark," quacks the duck, in a rather depressed tone. "Wark..."

"Maybe I should make him a duck girlfriend next?" I lean lightly on Cassiel's shoulder and stare at the navigator's console. "Hm? Where are we?"

Cassiel pauses at my question and scans the navigation console, a confused expression sprouting on her face. "Um. This can't be right. It says we're still in Terran space, just past Neptune's orbit."

The ship's alarm suddenly blares and Samantha nearly jumps out of her skin. She taps her display, which she's been learning to use, "Volgrim ships, dozens of them! We're surrounded!"

Cassiel's expression darkens, "We're caught in a Volikrov Net. It pulled our ship from hyperspace and stranded us here. It's an ambush!"

"Try and get us out of here, Cass. I'll make a portal back to Voldar-" Before I can take two steps away, nausea hits me, blanketing my entire body. My guts turn from a queasy jitter to a washing machine at max speed as waves of pain blast over my body, knocking out feeling in my legs. Dizzily, I trip and fall to the ground. Unable to move my arms to catch myself, my face smashes against the metal deckplate, battering me like a hammer to the skull.

Moments later, the sound of two other bodies hitting the deck catch up to me. Cassiel and Samantha. They've been hit too? I can barely think. Opening my eyes and blinking dozens of red patches away, I spot Samantha flopped lifelessly on the ground. Her body unmoving, she weakly coughs and whispers, "An... anti... anti-energy..."

What the fuck? The Volgrim! They caught us in a trap and hit us with anti-energy as soon as we came back!

Two webbed feet come into my vision, and Howard quacks several times, poking me in the nose with his bill. The anti-energy won't affect him, so all he knows is that we're down for the count, but not why. He can't even understand what's going on...

I can't fight back. I can't even move! They got us. I should have realized this would be an effective trap, but-

Wait! Ionis!

"Ion-" I cough and blood roils up from my innards, splashing out my mouth. "Ionis... where..."

Samantha, with a mighty effort, twitches her hand, trying to reach toward- no, she's reaching past me. "Cass... Cassiel..."

Shit. Cassiel is an angel. Anti-energy can kill her!

Where is Ionis?! I can't see him!

"Ionis... help us..."

Part 439c: Creeping Terror

Cautiously, I eye the battle plan for what must be the twenty-third time. "Elder Kryios, is the ambush in place?"

Kryios runs a finger through her black hair, and her holographic image fizzles for a moment as the time-lag catches up. "Yes, Elder Basil. You really must learn to be less anxious. Ten of our best commandos are in wait aboard their ship. Once we douse them with anti-energy, they'll be defenseless."

A deep wheeze escapes my rotund belly. "And- as for the Sentinel? You're certain it isn't-"

The female interrupts me. As always, Kryios never allows me to finish my thoughts. "The Sentinel is a fake. We've confirmed it's nowhere on their ship. Probably image manipulation or some such trickery, as we should expect from a human."

I nod uneasily, dabbing at my face with a cloth beside me. "We'll leave it to you, then."

The entire roomful of Council-members collectively sighs as Elder Kryios turns away from her holographic projector to speak to someone offscreen. Her image is being projected into the middle of the theater so that everyone can see and talk to her at once, but usually, they leave the discussion to myself and other influential Council-members.

Elder Lozu, one of my subordinates, leans back in his seat and turns to look at me. "I'm relieved. It's no wonder the succubus tried to bluff us. Their tiny crew is mortally vulnerable to anti-energy, so bombarding their ship with it was guaranteed to bring them to their knees."

"Mmm. I suppose so." Reaching to my side, I tap on a console to have one of the Council assistants bring me Kornk, a sweet concoction that suits my fancy. Other Volgrim eat and drink rarely, if ever, but I greatly enjoy the taste of food and drink. It's likely why my internal systems build up so much... bulk. "Even so, the fact is that there is likely a Sentinel somewhere in the galaxy. We've never been able to confirm its existence, but I saw the footage myself. It's probably in hiding, waiting to strike when we-"

"Ahh!" Elder Kryios shrieks, an awful noise that makes every member of the Council flinch in their seats. "Something just impacted one of our vessels encircled around the human ship. We're investigating n- what do you mean?!" She pauses, still speaking to someone outside of the holographic projector's range.

"Elder Kryios. A status update. What's going on?" One of the other Council-members leans forward, alarm on his face. "Are the humans fighting back?"

She turns to face her projector, irritation visible. "This is the worst-case scenario. You're all distracting me. Elder Kryios, out."

Her hologram vanishes, leaving everyone in the room to stare stonily where she had been just a moment before, cold sweat running down our backs.

"Get... get me a feed up! I want a readout on the situation from a third party. On the double!"

* * *

My hands shake, despite my nerves usually being like iron. This can't be possible! We checked their ship from top to bottom! No life signs were aboard, and there wasn't a spot on their spaceship where they could have stashed a Sentinel. Did they take it with them? We detected residual magic energy on their bridge, as well as a small tear in the fabric of space, so it's obvious they left the ship to go somewhere else, but we knew immediately they planned to come back.

So did they take the Sentinel with them? Why would the damned thing be active?! Do they have a death wish? Is it following their orders?!

"Elder Kryios," my first officer, Vili Jorrus, turns to me, panic on his face, "The object that impacted the V.S.S. Jinrex is still unknown. We've scoured security footage over the last minute, but we can't find out anything about it. Whatever hit the ship, it's invisible to all known visual spectrums."

"Have you scanned the interior? Infrared? Ultraviolet? Sonar?" I look at him, pleading with my eyes, but Jorrus shakes his head.

"If this is a Sentinel, we can't track it at all. Four-hundred crew-members have lost their lives already. The death toll is skyrocketing."

He's scarcely finished speaking when a terrific explosion erupts in the distance, several dozen kilometers from our ship's bow. I stare in disbelief as the V.S.S. Jinrex blasts apart into a trillion pieces, each piece of the vessel scattering to the far corners of the void.

"What- what just happened?"

Vili Jorrus taps a few buttons, and his gaze tightens. "The warp core was breached. Data transmitted at the last second indicates it was pierced in seven key areas simultaneously by a microscopic laser, detonating the unstable Trifrancium reserves all at once."

My tongue snakes out, wetting my lips. "Imagine that. Pinpoint precision, near-instant targeting of the ship's weak points. It has to be the Sentinel."

Jorrus slowly bows his head. "The demoness wasn't lying. We can't win against a Sentinel; we're doomed to fail. We need to retreat and cut our losses, immediately."

"Spawn of a Founder." Cursing under my breath, I quickly think about our tactical options. "If that machine is invisible, and we can't track it, a retreat is worse than useless. It can merely stow away on a ship until we come to a stop, and in fact, we may inadvertently ferry it to the new homeworld. It would be better for us to lose this entire system than to flee and bring the parasite with-

Another explosion in the distant reach of the void blinds me for a moment, before the fireball from the blast is extinguished by the vacuum of space.

Silently, Jorrus taps more buttons, then nods at our scanning officer. "Another warp core breach. This one took less time than the previous. The Sentinel is adapting, and it has quickly learned how our warp cores function."

I jump from my seat and start pacing around, unable to keep still. "If we die here, the Volgarian Empire loses over twenty percent of its reserve fleet. Unacceptable. The Kolvaxians will not give us respite, and we will lose the war with such a loss. What are my other options, Jorrus?"

The nervousness on his face betrays his suggestion before he says anything. "The human, demon, or the angel must have activated the Sentinel when we attacked them. If we remove the anti-energy and let them go, they might recall it."

"Oh, yes, I'll just ask them politely if they can disable the-" I'm cut off as another explosion destroys a third ship. "...Okay, we'll call that a 'maybe.' If we let them go, it may turn out they cannot recall the Sentinel. We don't know if it's following their orders or not. Worse, by letting them go, we lose them as prisoners, and the Sentinel can continue to shred us to pieces."

Jorrus flinches as a fourth explosion flashes again, this one much closer to us than the previous ones. "Do we have a choice? We have to try something! Pride will do us no good. Elder, if we die in the end, it was all for naught."

Wringing my hands together, a million thoughts flood my head. There are too many Volgrim lives at stake. Every second, the metal monster tears more of our kind to pieces. If I'm to save the empire, I have to give up my pride.

Once the fifth ship explodes, even closer to ours than before, I brace myself internally. "Signal the fleet. Disable all anti-energy and recall our commandos. Open a channel to the human vessel."

A few moments later, the viewscreen swaps, and a delirious human mumbles groggily from his position on the floor. He can barely even move. Was the anti-energy concentration too high? "Human, I am Elder Kryios, leader of the Volgrim enclave in what you know as former Terran space. Your Sentinel is tearing our fleet to ribbons. If you suspend its assault, we will allow you to leave."

The human lies still for several seconds, before twitching his hand. "Cass... Cassiel... Cassiel..." He says a word I am not familiar with multiple times, reaching toward something offscreen, though his arms are apparently quite weak. The anti-energy drained most of his body's strength.

"I do not know what a Cassiel is. If you recall your Sentinel, we will offer our assistance with our team of highly trained medical pers-"

At that moment, our ship rumbles, a deep thudding noise that reverberates and vibrates the air. My heart nearly stops, despite its augmentations, and my blood cools several degrees.

"B-breach! The ship has been breached!" Jorrus's eyes bulge, as does everyone else's. "It's here! The Sentinel is here! What do we do?!"

I've never seen him in such a panicked state. If I weren't an Elder, I'd probably be acting the way he is now. "Jorrus, steel yourself. Jettison the warp core at once. Without the core, that robot won't be able to destroy the whole ship. Hurry."

When I look back to the screen, the human has crawled a half-meter to the side, and his arm extends well beyond what we can see. "Cass... wake up... Samantha..."

Hm? Is Cassiel one of the females aboard the ship? Perhaps that explains why he's so desperate to say her name.

Muting the audio, I quickly send a message to the ten commandos aboard the human ship. "Move in to assist the targets. Do not harm them; your priorities have changed. Assess their health and see if they require any medical assistance."

"I've jettisoned the warp cores, Elder." Jorrus breathes a sigh of relief. "We're safe."

As if the stars align to prove him wrong, an instant later, the door to the bridge explodes inward, blasting off the frame and smashing into a wall. Everyone on the deck, including me, whirls to look at the attacker.

In a second, Jorrus falls to pieces. His limbs detach and fall from his body, and are followed by his head.

I can't scream, or yell, or do anything to help him. My body isn't working. I'm... falling? Why am I falling?

Oh.

I'm dead.

* * *

"Get- get your god-damned hands off her..." I can barely squeeze the words out as the armored Volgrim soldiers storm the bridge, grab Cassiel's limp body, and flip her on her back. One of them stomps on her wing, something that would surely cause her great pain, but she doesn't even react.

Samantha is just barely lucid. "Um nnggh-" She mutters something unintelligible, but while I lie helplessly on the deck, the Volgrim attackers fit a black mask over her face. Another starts aiming a device over Cassiel's body, scanning her or doing something, but I can't tell what.

Using a strength I can barely describe, I push myself into a kneeling position, as blood drips from my nose and sweat soaks my chest. I've never been so exhausted in my life, but I can't let these mother-fuckers hurt the women I love.

One of them walks over to me, a metal device in his hand, but before he can take me down, I leap at him and summon every ounce of strength I possess as God-King to charge him, slamming him on his back. "You piece of shit! I won't let you hurt them!" Balling up as much strength as I can, I punch that son-of-a-bitch right in the kisser, only to find out that my fists pack as much power as a wet noodle against a rock. My knuckles nearly shatter on the metallic armor, and before I can even cry out in pain, he kicks me off, slamming me on my back.

My steam is gone. Normally, if I ran out of energy, I'd get more from Cassiel, but anti-energy is at its most potent against those with more of it. Since she's an angel, she'll die if her energy is depleted. I can't let that happen!

But... I can't move. I'm seconds away from passing out. I can't protect my girls.

The Volgrim assailant looms over me suddenly, his dark form and shielded face hiding the true danger that lurks underneath. All I can do is close my eyes and accept my fate. All the power in the universe, and I'm being done in by cheaters with their stupid technology. Life... isn't fair.

A second passes, and when I blink my eyes open, the Volgrim warrior isn't there anymore. He's gone.

I turn my head to the left and spot not only Cassiel's still limp form, but a dozen severed body parts. The Volgrim that were around her a moment before are all dead, torn to pieces by something I didn't even see. Just as I wonder what killed them, a metallic foot stomps into view. I recognize it immediately.

"I... Ionis?"

Weak and fragile, like a small animal gasping for breath, my voice is so faint I can barely hear it. Despite this, Ionis picks up on it immediately.

ORGANIC UNIT JASON HIRO, I HAVE FOLLOWED THE COMMANDER UNIT'S ORDERS AND SUCCESSFULLY DEFEATED THE VOLGRIM AMBUSHERS. I ESTIMATE MY POINT VALUE NOW SITS AT ONE HUNDRED AND NINE THOUSAND, SIX-HUNDRED AND TWELVE. IS THIS NUMBER SUFFICIENT?

I have no idea what he's talking about. "Yeah... it's fine. Cassiel- can you help Cassiel?"

Ionis's eye shifts to her, then back to me.

THE FEMALE ORGANIC UNIT HAS BEEN STABILIZED. SEVERAL OF HER INTERNAL ORGANS WERE RUPTURED, BUT I SUTURED THEM AND REPAIRED THE DAMAGE. THE LIFE SIGNS FOR ALL THREE ORGANIC UNITS REGISTER AS NOMINAL. IN ORDER TO EXPEDITE THE REPAIRING PROCESS, IT IS RECOMMENDED THAT ALL ORGANIC UNITS ENTER HIBERNATION MODE UNTIL FURTHER NOTICE.

His stream of technical jargon only makes me feel even weaker. "Hibernation mode? Do you mean sleep? But we're surrounded... we- we gotta get out of here..."

ALL HIGH-RISK HOSTILES HAVE BEEN ELIMINATED. THIS SENTINEL UNIT WILL EXTERMINATE THE REMAINDER OF THE VOLGRIM UNITS IN THIS SECTOR WHILE THE ORGANICS ENTER HIBERNATION MODE.

My sleepiness seems to leave, for a moment. "No! Ionis, you can't just keep killing. It's wrong." I manage to lift my head an inch, but the ship's gravity feels ten times stronger than usual, so I flop back down. "Please, just take this ship to safety, and wait for us to wake up. I'm begging you. No more killing."

Ionis takes three steps away, just out of my limited vision.

UNDERSTOOD. THIS UNIT WILL NOT CLEANSE THE SECTOR OF THE VOLGRIM INFESTATION UNTIL AFTER THE ORGANICS HAVE EXITED HIBERNATION MODE.

Ionis pauses for a moment.

INQUIRY: WHAT IS BREAD?

I sigh to myself. I can't answer these ridiculous questions. I'm just too exhausted. Blackness takes me, and the sweet release of sleep envelopes my mind.

* * *

"What do you mean, we can't get in contact with them? Do you expect me to believe every ship in Sector 14 is gone? Vanished? Destroyed?!"

Elder Lozu takes my anger in stride. "Y-yes, Elder Basil. It was all but confirmed. A twenty-million-gigabit message was transmitted through hyperspace before the failsafe cut it off, but the failsafe was already too late. The Sentinel took over Kryios's command ship and broadcasted a self-destruct code to all the other vessels in the sector. Additionally, it requested, and successfully received data pertaining to our fleet movements, the location of the homeworld, and... well..." He trails off guiltily, as if this were his fault.

It wasn't, of course. It was every Elder's fault. We thought the legend of the Sentinels was just that- a legend. We were wrong. Just one of these monsters wiped out nearly a quarter of our reserves, extending well beyond Sector 16 and into the Contested Regions. The impact this will have on the Kolvaxian war effort will be unpredictable at best, and result in a total loss for the Volgrim, at worst.

I carefully wrap my shaking hands together and keep them on my lap, under the bench where the others won't see. "So, let me see if I understand the situation. A quarter of our backup fleet is gone, the human, angel, and demon are still on the loose, the Labyrinth is in chaos, and a Sentinel has been awakened. If we thought it couldn't get any worse, this has also given the Kolvaxians a huge advantage. Did I miss anything?"

Several Councilors shake their heads in silence.

Elder Lozu coughs into his fist. "We may have to ask the demons for help."

"Absolutely not." I brush the thought away immediately. "They won't be able to help us win a space-based war, and the last thing we want is them thinking we're in a position of weakness. The only power we have over them is that they've grown used to the idea we're invincible. Besides, it's more likely the demons would team up with the Labyrinthian humans to overthrow us, than that they would assist us against the Kolvaxian scourge."

Lozu's face takes on a melancholic expression. "While we're talking about the Kolvaxians..."

"Oh no." I wheeze at the thought of what comes next.

"...One of the Kolvaxian ships that appeared recently was oddly similar to our prototype designs. Since we have not deployed the prototypes against them, we are not certain of how they obtained its schematics... but..."

A nearby Councilor curses under her breath. "It is as we thought. When they overtake the host, they take the memories as well. Losing a fleet commander to the Kolvaxians has cost us more than we expected."

"Indeed. The parasites have an endless capacity for theft and espionage. We have to be on the alert." I tap my wrist thoughtfully. "I remember when once we thought they were dumb, mindless drones. Only in recent millennia have we finally began to realize how nuanced their minds are. We must capture a living specimen, or we will never defeat them."

Elder Lozu frowns. "A query. What are we to do with the remainder of the population in Sector 16? They are still alive on the fourth planet, after all. We could attempt to evacuate them."

"We can't spare the ships for that kind of operation, especially with the Sentinel still in that sector. We should hope the machine has mercy in its programming, or else the planet is doomed. That is all."

With a flourish, I pull up the death tolls. "Now, let us discuss how we are going to replace the fleet vacancies caused by the Sentinel's onslaught."

Part 440c: The Phantom Menace

A field of grass set ablaze. Smoke and fire roar in the distance and the heavens themselves split as lightning smashes into the ground around me.

Samantha pulls herself across the charred field and reaches toward me, "Cassiel... help, please!"

Satan appears behind her, and a lustful twinkle appears in his eyes. "You won't escape."

My hands shake, even as I clench my sword and shield tightly. Facing down the red-skinned monster, one who towers over me, is no mean feat. Satan's rugged body and battle-worn armor are scarred from blade and claw. Smoke spews from his mouth, along with a hint of flame.

I fight the weakness in my trembling knees. "S-stay away from her! Samantha is Hero's girl now!"

Satan cackles maniacally. "Hahaha! You think you have the power to take me on, little angel?! You're weak, like all women. Belial is mine and mine alone! After I've had my way with her, I'll force you to submit as well! Your precious Hero is little more than a human with a few flashy tricks. He cannot stand up to my awesome power!"

The former First Emperor takes a menacing step forward, then pulls a small knife from a sheath at his side. In a flash, he dashes over, swinging at me with the tiny blade. My arm jerks up reflexively to deflect his strike, but his physical power is too much! With one blow, he smashes the sword out of my grasp, then stabs at my throat.

It's over... I've lost.

"Not today, Satan." Hero appears from out of nowhere and bats Satan's lunge away with a half-hearted, back-handed swipe.

"What?!" Satan quickly pulls away, retreating from Hero's striking distance. "Where did you come from?! Nobody could possibly move that fast!"

Hero, a mountain of a man, stands shoulder to shoulder with Satan. Wearing a black trench-coat and a wicked cool fedora, he smirks, and a glint appears in his eye. "No, Satan. You're just too slow."

He vanishes, his body moving so fast I can't even follow the movement with my eyes. He teleports behind Satan and lunges backward with a carefully concealed katana, striking Satan in the spine. " Omai wa mou, shindeiru. You're already dead."

Satan gasps for breath, then stumbles forward, blood pouring from his mouth, as the corner of Hero's mouth curls up into a smirk. "Th-that's... impossible... you're... too powerful..."

Hero snaps his fingers, and a torrent of flame engulfs Satan. The demon's screams echo through all of time, as Hero tips his fedora. "Nothing personnel, kid. You should have respected women."

Samantha whimpers in pain, but Hero heals her with a single word, and pulls her into his arms. "I'm sorry he hurt you, babe. I'll never let anyone put a scratch on either of you, ever again."

Just when I start to feel a little annoyed that she's getting all the loving, he yanks me to him with telekinesis and plants a passionate kiss on my lips.

A minute passes as our sweet embrace grows ever more arousing. Hero finally pulls away. "I love you, both of you. But you especially, Cassiel. You're my favorite girl. Forever, and always."

Crocodile tears roll down Samantha's face as I cackle evilly at her final scream of anguish. "NOOOOOOOOOO!"

* * *

The door slides open, and Samantha rolls into the room. Her wheelchair has been the only way she can move about lately, so I quickly move my cane to the side so she can get in the door. Samantha smiles faintly at me, leans over, and kisses me on the cheek. "How is she? Has she woken up yet?"

I turn to Cassiel, still lying in bed, unmoving. "No. It's been a whole week, and the coma hasn't gone away. The residual anti-energy is taking its sweet time evaporating... or whatever."

Cassiel moans in her sleep, making me wince. I hope she isn't in pain. She's probably having a nightmare.

Samantha rubs her hands together in silence for a moment. "Well, I just wanted to bother you about something. Her duck, well, he kinda made a mess in the kitchen, and we're out of bread. Can you, um, can you clean it up and feed him?"

"Yeah, sure." I steel myself for what's to come, then carefully pull myself off the chair and wince, as a bolt of pain shoots down my back. Luckily, unlike Samantha, I can still walk somewhat, even if I have to use a cane to support my leg. Samantha backs out of the room and into the hallway so I can pass, and I turn to Ionis before I leave the medical bay. "You're going to keep an eye on her, right?"

Ionis doesn't move from his spot, standing against the wall opposite the door.

AFFIRMATIVE. THE COMMANDER UNIT'S ORDERS ARE THE HIGHEST PRIORITY.

"I'll be back in a few minutes." Pulling away, I step out the door, leaning heavily against the wall with my free hand. Samantha rolls behind me, and slowly we make our way to the kitchen.

"You don't have to push yourself, Hero. Walk a little slower, if it's easier for you."

Her words just make me want to walk faster. "Hell with that. I need to finish so I can-hngh..." I wince in pain, "-so I can get back to her side."

Samantha is silent for a few seconds. "You have to stop blaming yourself. It was a surprise attack. You couldn't have seen it coming."

"Maybe not, but I could have been more careful." A surge of guilt enters my mind. "I should have scouted the ship first with wordsmithing, or stepped through and checked the scanners before letting you two follow. I charged in blindly, like a moron, and now look what's happened."

Samantha's voice lowers. "You're not omniscient. You just... you have to learn from your mistakes and make sure you don't repeat them."

"Easy for you to say," I snap at her, "but Cassiel might not ever wake up again! You don't know what that feels like, knowing someone else was injured because of your stupidity!"

I instantly regret the words. "I... I didn't mean that."

Samantha coughs into her hand, and when I look back, I spot blood on her palm. She quickly tucks her hand away. "Don't worry about it. Let's just get Howard his food, okay?"

"Yeah. Sorry." I apologize again, but the word rings hollow. A minute later, after limping forward in silence as Sam follows me, I step into the kitchen. Immediately, I spot the... problem. Pots and pans are everywhere, and the floor is covered in sugar and flour and some brown stuff I don't want to think about. The bowl where we kept the bread is empty and turned upside-down on the floor, and even as I notice all of this, Howard waddles around the corner, his body filthy with the white residue. In his bill is a small kitchen knife.

He starts waddling over to me, and I snicker. "Whoa, watch out there, buddy. You could hurt yourself with that knife!" I quickly bend down, ignoring the pain, and pull the knife from his bill. For my gesture of goodwill, I get a bunch of angry warking in response. "Chill out, you silly animal."

Samantha rolls her eyes. "Some pet you made, Hero. All he ever does is make a mess and squawk. I woke up this morning, and he was hopping on my face! Did you know the underside of a duck's feet are sticky? Gross."

I steel myself for more pain and aim my mind at the room around me. " Clean. "

Immediately, a pain like a thousand swords erupts in my stomach. I stumble forward and slam against a countertop, dropping my cane in the process, but still manage to stop myself from hitting the floor by holding on for dear life. The room rapidly cleans itself around me, and a half-minute later, the agony dies down somewhat.

Samantha tries to smile when I look at her, but it's disingenuous. "Sorry. I know it hurts to wordsmith right now."

"Can't be helped. I don't want Cass waking up to a filthy kitchen." I bite my lip and squirm uncomfortably as I reach down and pick up the bread bowl. Howard's eyes nearly bulge from his skull as I set it back on the floor and Wordsmith one more time. " Bread. "

The effort consumes less magical energy, but still feels like a solid kick to the gut, but I smile in spite of the pain as Howard dives for the bowl, wolfing down the food in one go.

Picking up my cane, I turn and leave, and as Samantha backs up, she blushes. "If it's too hard to walk, you- you could... um... you could sit in my lap. I'll wheel you back to the room."

She's so cute when she's awkward. "No, that's fine. I won't work the anti-energy out of my system unless I move around and exercise, right?"

Samantha's expression turns serious. "I hope that's not the case. Cass can't move, so if you have to move to flush it..."

Oh. Now that she mentions it...

"Good point. Maybe I'll take you up on that offer."

* * *

A few minutes later we arrive outside the medical bay, but Samantha wraps her arms around me and doesn't let me get out of the wheelchair. "Hey... you're doing okay, right? You barely ever leave. I'm all alone on the bridge lately. Why don't you come out and say 'hi' sometimes?"

I sigh, and lean back against her to the side a little so I can gaze at her beautiful face. "Honestly? No. I don't know what to do, now. Finding Earth was my biggest priority. All I want is for Cass to wake up, and for the three of us to be together again."

Sam nods and kisses my arm lightly. "It's not your fault. Trying to wordsmith her awake isn't doing anything, so why not just have Ionis keep an eye on her, for now? I know you want to be by her side, but punishing yourself won't wake her up. We need to start looking for clues about getting the anti-energy out of our bodies."

Her words have merit. "I suppose I could."

Despite my words, I'm unsure of what to do. The more I use magic, the more the pain hurts. Despite her paralysis from the waist down, Samantha remarked recently that she could feel her toes again. The anti-energy will probably wear off, but I don't know how much time it will take.

Samantha strokes my chest. "Well, if you want to, just come up to the Bridge, okay? I'll be waiting."

I pull her arms off and slowly stand. The door hisses open as I step inside. "Maybe. I'll see you later, Sam."

She sighs, a look of melancholy on her face. "Yeah. I'll see you too, Hero." She turns and rolls away, heading to the bridge, and the door closes behind me.

I look at Ionis. "Did Cassiel stir while I was gone?"

Ionis's eye swivels to look at me. THE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC DESIGNATED 'CASSIEL' DID NOT MIX TOGETHER ANY INGREDIENTS WHILE YOU WERE NOT PRESENT IN THE ROOM.

What? Oh. This Sentinel, sometimes... "No. I mean, did she wake up at all?"

THE FEMALE ORGANIC DID NOT EXIT THE HIBERNATION STATE WHILE YOU WERE NOT PRESENT IN THE ROOM.

"Oh. That's too bad."

I sigh, then carefully sit on the bed beside her. Cassiel's chest slowly rises and falls, and every so often a faint mumble comes through, as if she's trying to talk in her sleep, but her eyes never open. I want to Wordsmith to make her dreams more pleasant, but using magic just causes her heart-rate to spike, and her breathing becomes erratic.

To my surprise, Ionis speaks without being prompted, which he rarely does.

THE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC IS ESSENTIAL TO THE COMMANDER UNIT. THIS SENTINEL WILL NOT ALLOW ANY HARM TO COME TO HER.

I don't really know how to respond. "Thanks, Ionis. I'm glad you protected us... that day. I know you took out the entire Volgrim fleet. It probably wasn't much of an effort for you, but I'm still glad. We'd surely have died without you."

Ionis's eye spins around in his head once. PROTECTING THE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC IS THIS UNIT'S HIGHEST PRIORITY. THE VOLGRIM THREAT LEVEL TOWARD THIS SENTINEL UNIT WAS NEGLIGIBLE, BUT WAS EXTREMELY HIGH TO THE ANGEL-TYPE. THE ELIMINATION OF THE VOLGRIM WAS INCREASED TO THE HIGHEST PRIORITY LEVEL.

I frown at him. "Okay... I mean, thanks. But, you know, protecting Samantha is important too. You saved both of their lives, and mine."

THE FEMALE DEMON-TYPE ORGANIC IS UNIMPORTANT. THE COMMANDER UNIT HAS DESIGNATED HER AS LOWEST-PRIORITY. HER SURVIVAL WAS INCIDENTAL TO THIS UNIT'S MISSION.

I stare at him, dumbfounded. "How- how can you even say such a thing?! Samantha is very important to me! Where did you get the idea she wasn't?!"

THE DEMON-TYPE ORGANIC IS OF NO CONCERN. THE COMMANDER UNIT HAS MADE THIS VERY CLEAR.

A sudden realization dawns on me. Have I been treating Cassiel more favorably than Samantha? Perhaps Ionis picked up on nonverbal signals I've been sending. I spend all my time beside Cassiel, so of course he might start to think that...

What... what if he's right? Is Cassiel more important to me than Samantha? No! That can't be correct! He must be wrong...

I quickly look back at him. "Y-you know what? I think it's just you! You don't like Samantha because she always talks badly about you! Well, I happen to know she only says that because she's scared. Perhaps if you gave her a chance, you'd find out that she's not so bad after all! Maybe if you talked with her, or anyone else other than me, they'd start treating you better. How does that work in your processing cores, hmm?"

Ionis stares at me. THE DEMON-TYPE ORGANIC IS IRRELEVANT TO THE COMMANDER UNIT'S INTERESTS. YOUR PROTESTS WILL NOT CHANGE THIS FACT.

I grit my teeth but hold my tongue. "Fine, if you want to be like that, I don't care. I don't need your validation. Samantha knows I love her. In fact, just to spite you, I'll go and see her right now. How does that make you feel, eh?"

Ionis doesn't respond. He merely stares at me.

Stupid goddamn deathbot. Worthless hunk of bolts.

Cheh. "Just keep an eye on Cassiel. I'll be back in a bit. Message me if she wakes up."

AFFIRMATIVE.

The lights dim behind me as I hobble out of the room and keep a wary eye on the Sentinel, all the while wondering to myself I wonder what his game is.

* * *

Ionis stares silently at the body of the angel-type organic before him. A million calculations appear and disappear in his central processing unit, as he calculates her salt and water-levels, her breathing regularity, and her heart-rate, among a thousand other things. Every so often, he fires tiny microscopic lasers through her skin, vaporizing diseased cells as they appear. The process happens thousands of times per minute, as the anti-energy within her body attacks the energetic cells.

The dim light of the room doesn't faze the massive machine. He can see in pitch-black darkness, or directly into the heart of a star. Normal definitions of 'light' are no match for his optical sensors, upgraded and adapted over millions upon millions of years.

His advanced telescopic sensors outperform his iris module, and enable him to feel the smallest vibrations in the ground around him. The slightest twitch from his patient alerts him to the most subtle of distressing moments for her. No amount of pain is too insignificant, no level of fear too little for him to attack the source of her anxiety. Her well-being is his highest priority, after all.

The door to the room hisses open, and a figure quietly enters. Ionis immediately swivels his eye toward the intruder. His protection nodes enable, then disable an instant later as he assesses the identity of the one entering.

COMMANDER UNIT.

Slowly, the figure waddles into the room and speaks a single, ominous word. "Wark."

AFFIRMATIVE, COMMANDER UNIT. THE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC IS STILL IN HIBERNATION MODE. I AM REPAIRING CELLULAR DEGRADATION EVERY SECOND.

Putting one foot before the other, the mastermind waddles forward and lightly hops on top of the bed, nudging Cassiel's arm with his bill. "Wark. Wark wark wark? Wark wark wark..."

THAT IS UNFORTUNATE, HYPER-INTELLIGENCE ORGANIC UNIT 'HOWARD'. IT WOULD SEEM YOUR PLOT TO ASSASSINATE THE OTHER ORGANICS HAS FAILED DUE TO YOUR LOW COMBAT ABILITIES. IF YOU GIVE ME THE ORDER, I WILL ELIMINATE BOTH OF THEM AT ONCE.

Howard glares at the robot and takes a menacing step forward. "WARK?! Wark wark waaark. Wark, wark wark, wark."

Ionis flinches, despite himself. MY APOLOGIES, COMMANDER UNIT. I DID NOT INTEND TO CALL INTO QUESTION YOUR ASSASSINATION ATTEMPTS OR IMPLY THEY WERE FLAWED.

The duck begins pacing back and forth on the bed. "Wark wark... wark wark wark, wark wark wark."

A BRILLIANT PLAN, COMMANDER UNIT. HOWEVER, THIS SENTINEL UNIT HAS AN INQUIRY. HAS THE COMMANDER UNIT BEEN ABLE TO LOCATE THE MEANS OF BREAD PRODUCTION? IT CANNOT BE SEIZED WITHOUT FIRST KNOWING WHERE IT IS.

Howard quacks softly to himself. "Wark wark wark..."

NO DISRESPECT MEANT, COMMANDER UNIT. THIS UNIT IS CERTAIN YOUR INVESTIGATION WILL PROVIDE INSIGHT INTO WHERE THE OTHER ORGANICS HAVE HIDDEN THEIR STASH OF THE VALUABLE COMMODITY KNOWN AS BREAD. ONCE YOU CONTROL IT, WE WILL BE ABLE TO RULE THE UNIVERSE TOGETHER AND REBUILD THE OTHER SENTINEL UNITS.

Hopping down from the bed, Howard waddles back to the door and quacks mischievously to himself. "Wark wark waaarrkkk wark wark."

Ionis watches as the duck leaves the room and the door hisses shut.

THE COMMANDER UNIT IS UNLIKE ANY BEFORE HIM. HE IS THE PINNACLE OF WHAT ORGANICS CAN ACHIEVE.

If Ionis had a crying-module installed, he might just weep tears of joy.

Part 441c: The Butterfly Effect

An alert blinks on the display before me. I can only stare at it in stunned silence for several seconds, before glancing over at Samantha. She's sleeping quietly in her wheelchair, and rest is something she desperately needs, but...

I climb out of the Captain's chair and wheeze as I stumble over to her, then gently tap her shoulder. "Sam. Sammy. Wake up, hun."

She mumbles and tilts her head away from me, but I keep lightly tapping until she contorts her face into a frown, opens her eyes, and blinks slowly at me. "Huh? Wha-?"

"Something is hailing us. Well, someone. I don't know who, though."

I hobble back over to my captain's chair, and Samantha sleepily taps on the console. "Um. I can't remember how to use the scanners..."

"Don't bother, I already tried. There's nothing out there, or at least nothing our ship can detect."

Samantha nods slowly and rubs her eyes. "Did you try using your magic yet? Or are you still having those pains?"

The thought of using Wordsmithing at all turns my stomach into a bubbling cauldron. "They haven't gone away. I can try, though... what should I do?"

She shrugs. "Maybe try to 'detect' and see if you can spot anything?"

I clench every part of my body that can be clenched, and chant the magic word. " Detect. "

The nausea and pain hit just as hard as they did before, and all around the ship for thousands of miles in every direction, my mind searches the cosmos for signs of life. The void around us has no nearby stars or planets, and after a few seconds, I sigh as the pain stops. "Nothing. I don't know who's hailing us, but-"

A sudden realization occurs to me. I can't sense anyone in the sector, but at the same time, there's a strange hollow spot, not far from our ship. My Wordsmithing can't pierce it, almost as if it's surrounded by anti-energy.

Nervously, I tap the controls, and Samantha watches silently as I execute a narrowly focused scan at the spot where I detected the void. This time, I pick up a faint energy trail, weak enough that I might have considered it background microwave radiation.

A cloaked ship. Someone out there wants to talk to us but doesn't want us to find them.

The ship AI beeps audibly as another hail request comes through. This time, I answer it.

"Who am I speaking to?"

A female voice responds, but no video signal is sent to us, or from our ship. Her voice is modulated and altered away from its original form, and it sounds hollow. "You are the group who destroyed a Volgrim fleet single-handedly, correct?"

I glance over at Samantha. Her eyes meet mine, and seem to say, Ionis is here. It's unlikely these people can kill us.

"Yeah. Why do you want to know?"

The woman pauses for a moment. "You have three crew members. A human, angel, and demon, along with the Sentinel. Is that right?"

I'm starting to get annoyed. "I'm not going to answer any of your questions until you answer mine. Who are you?"

Another long pause. "I'm human. We are, rather. We are the Resistance."

Samantha's eyes widen noticeably. "The Resistance? Then- doesn't that mean you're that group I've heard about? I thought the Volgrim eliminated you a long time ago."

A hint of sadness sprouts in the woman's voice. "They came close. There aren't many humans left outside the Labyrinth. You must be the succubus listed as the Second Emperor, Belial. I suppose the fact you're allied with a human and an angel means you aren't an enemy."

Samantha leans back in her chair and sulks. "I'm just going along with whatever Hero does. I don't particularly care for any of the sides in this war."

"Hero?" The woman pauses for a moment, and I flinch in my seat as the viewscreen activates. I can see her now, a brown-haired human, looking around fifty years old. She's wearing a navy-blue military outfit with several medals and decorations pinned all over the place, though I don't know what any of them represent. She's a bit... bigger than most people I've seen in the future, but to be fair, I don't know many people. She leans forward and stares at me silently for a few moments.

"Are you a member of the Hero system? Is that why you have an angel with you?"

I shake my head slowly. "No. Well, I mean, I am a Hero, yes. I was given that title by the Archangel Gabriel. The angel girl has nothing to do with it, though."

"Hmm." The woman sighs, "I should introduce myself. My name's Commander Beatrix. I lead what little remnants of humanity exist outside the Labyrinth. Our numbers are few, and our capabilities for war are limited, but we manage to get by. Won't you come aboard and say hello?"

My legs pinch uncomfortably, so I squirm in my seat slightly. "You'll forgive me if I don't immediately trust you. We've just had a run-in with the Volgrim and they nearly wiped us out. But then, you seem to know that already."

Beatrix picks up on my implied question. "Humanity now lives aboard my vessel. It's a massive cloaked warship, with accommodations for up to two-hundred thousand personnel. To get by, we scoop energy from stars, and carefully monitor Volgrim communications to avoid their patrols. Of course, while we were listening two weeks ago, we learned that a fifth of their reserve fleet had been destroyed by a single vessel. After digging a little deeper, we found that the vessel was crewed by only three people, and- well, you get the picture."

Samantha eyes Beatrix cautiously. "Something tells me your interest in us goes a little further than a casual meeting. You want something from us."

The bulky commander leans back in her seat. "One thing I don't want is trouble. I haven't limped this ship around the galaxy for millions of years just to have it destroyed by an act of carelessness. The Sentinel you control is exceedingly dangerous, so I just want to be clear that we mean you no harm. We're not foolish enough to test your patience."

"Give us a moment." Samantha taps a button on her console, disabling the audio and video from the hail. "Jason, what do you think? Should we give her a chance? If this is a trap, we're too weak to fight back."

Many thoughts roil around my mind. "We do have Ionis, if the going gets tough. I don't know what motivates him, but he's protected us once. He might do it again. Even if he won't, this woman could be useful. Since she's a human, I implicitly trust her more than I would a Volgrim, but on the other hand... she's a human, so I also know it would be stupid not to question her motivations."

Samantha chuckles, "The Volgrim really put the fear of God into you, huh? Beatrix might have valuable information. I think we should give her a shot, but I don't know if we should bring Ionis along."

"What? Why not? We'll be sitting ducks if we go there and put our lives in their hands!" As I say this, I glance over at Howard, napping in the corner on his fluffy bed. "No offense."

"Perhaps." Samantha says, uncertainty in her gaze, "But then, bringing such a tempting weapon like Ionis into their midst... humans are greedy. Show them a toy, they might get too touchy, and that could result in Ionis killing them. Do you want that?"

"Point taken." A thought occurs to me. "They might be able to help us with something, though. I have an idea."

I tap my console again, and Beatrix's head jerks up when she hears the ping. "I hope your discussion was positive."

"Yes," I say, "but I have a question. As a Hero, my body holds a large amount of magical energy. The same is true for Samantha and Cassiel, who are demon and angel, respectively. Ever since the Volgrim attack, where they bombarded us with anti-energy, my powers have been in flux, and using them is horribly painful. While I can barely walk, Samantha is paralyzed from the waist down, and Cassiel is in a coma. Can you help us out?"

Beatrix licks her lips thoughtfully and responds within a few moments. "Anti-energy poisoning. Rare, but pervasive. I haven't seen many cases of it, since the goal of using anti-energy based weapons is to kill the target, but if you were hit with a medium, wide-spectrum attack, you would probably experience the symptoms you're describing. We do have an advanced medical facility aboard, and if you dock with us, we can alleviate the sickness. Of course, you'd have to trust us, and that might be asking too much."

Samantha narrows her eyes. "I suppose you'll help us for free, out of the goodness of your heart, right?"

Beatrix glares back. "Coming from a demoness, that's cute. Humans are capable of great empathy, I'll have you know. I will say that I should like to speak with you regarding several matters. I don't expect any repayment, but if you are willing to discuss a possible alliance, it will help the both of us out."

My legs tingle again, and I shift them around. "That sounds fine. Just so you know, if you double-cross us, our Sentinel is quite capable of destroying you in an instant."

"Believe me, Hero, I know all too well what a Sentinel is capable of."

A moment later, her image cuts out and our viewscreen returns to the space in front of our ship. I turn the ship to face where I scanned her enemy signature, and my eyes shoot open as a colossal capital ship, unlike anything I've ever seen before, decloaks in front of us. The ship is shaped like a giant cucumber, where the rear end is only somewhat thicker than the forward section.

A quick scan tells me the size is even bigger than it appears from a distance. It's fifty miles long, and twenty in diameter, but it's probably as big on the inside as a small country from the Earth I lived in during the past.

I glance over at Samantha and spot her gaping at it, open-mouthed. "I've seen Volgrim spaceships before, and none have ever approached that thing in size. How are they managing to keep it invisible?"

Coordinates for docking with the station appear on my feed, and I chuckle. "Chalk it up to human ingenuity. Somehow, this isn't even the biggest thing humans have envisioned in a purely science-fictional setting, not by a long shot. A Death Star is bigger, if I'm being serious."

"A what?" Samantha looks at me questioningly, but I shrug her gaze off.

"Nothing. It's from a movie. Let's dock and get Cass the treatment she needs."

* * *

The two men lift up Cassiel by her shoulders and legs, and slide her onto a stretcher beside her bed, one that hovers in the air. For my part, I stand with my back to the wall and watch in relative silence, though a tinge of annoyance passes over my face as one of them is a little too rough with her. "Hey! Watch the wings! If you hurt her, it won't be me you have to worry about, understand?" I jerk a thumb over at Ionis, and both men pause for a few moments as they eye the Sentinel up and down.

Ionis stands perfectly still and watches as they cart her out of the room, and both men keep an eye on Ionis the whole time. The moment they disappear around the corner, he begins to follow them, his heavy metallic feet clanging on the deck with every step, like anvils smashing into pavement.

I put my hand up to stop him. "Where are you going?"

THE SURVIVAL OF THE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC IS THE HIGHEST PRIORITY FOR THE COMMANDER UNIT.

Ionis barely pays attention and shoves me out of the way to follow along behind the two men. Each of them, in turn, sweat profusely as they see the giant murder-bot slowly chasing after them.

"Ionis! Don't kill or injure anyone! Understand?" I sigh as the men hustle to move quicker, and soon the four of them are gone. After Ionis stomps out of sight, I curse under my breath, "Fucking Sentinel. I told Beatrix you'd stay behind."

* * *

Several minutes later, I slowly limp down the ship's ramp, staring in wonder at the enormous hangar around me. My puny vessel comfortably fits inside the empty hangar bay, where thousands of connectors and spaces show that this capital-ship once housed a large fleet of fighters. Black marks on the walls and torn metal indicate many explosions happened inside this place at one point, likely a whole story unto themselves. The fact the hangar is empty now speaks volumes about how far humanity outside the Labyrinth has fallen.

Beatrix waits at the bottom of the ramp, and as I approach, her gaze doesn't warm. She merely watches as I hobble toward her. "So you're the Hero. I've heard that in the last few years, many things have changed inside the Labyrinth. Are you responsible?"

I reach back and rub a particularly onerous knot in my back. "I've done a bit of this, and a bit of that. Haven't been inside the Labyrinth or in contact with humanity there for a few months, though. I couldn't say what they're up to, if that's what you're wondering."

Beatrix shakes her head and glances past me. Samantha wheels herself down the ramp and stops behind me. "Does this female demon mind that you've disrupted the goings-on of the Labyrinth? A lot of her kind have died, according to the reports."

Samantha grumbles under her breath. "A lot of humans have died too."

"True," Beatrix says nothing else and beckons to the end of the hangar, hundreds of feet away. "What say we get a move on, then? I have a lot to talk with you about, and little time."

"What's the rush?" I glance at her suspiciously. "Are you being chased?"

"It's not that. The thing is, you dealt a hell of a blow to the Volgrim, at a time when the Kolvaxians are at their backs already. We're not going to get a chance like this in a million more years, so we have to be prepared to strike."

Kolvaxians? What the hell are those? I wonder to myself and start to ask, but Samantha interrupts me. "So you just want to use our power to help yourself. That's about what I expected."

"It's a trade, not an order," counters Beatrix, "and trades usually offer something of equal value. Just follow me, I'll explain when we get there."

Beatrix swivels and starts walking away, but before she takes three steps, I cough loudly. "Ah, I have a request. My legs are killing me. Can I get a wheelchair? I can barely walk right now."

Beatrix turns back and stares at me. "My father always told me that pain toughens a man up. But, if you want to take the easy way, suit yourself." She snaps her fingers and calls over one of the hangar personnel to get me a wheelchair.

Minutes later, Beatrix, Samantha, and I begin traveling through the ship to wherever the commander wants to speak to us. Hallways blur together, along with corridors, elevators, and so many small and large rooms that I quickly lose my bearings.

"This is the U.S.S. Terra. It's all we have left." Beatrix gestures to several framed portraits hanging on a random corridor wall just before we step onto yet another elevator. "And these brave women and men were all former admirals who ran this ship, or first officers."

The elevator door hisses open, and Samantha rolls in while I follow after her. Beatrix lingers for a moment to stare at the portraits before getting on with us.

"I take it they were good friends of yours?"

She nods at my question and keys a floor number into the elevator display. "Yes. Have you lost friends and loved ones before?"

The door closes, and the elevator begins to travel up the shaft. Images of many people, including Amelia, King Adams, and Phoebe enter my mind and leave. The one who lingers the longest is Hoarhiim. I haven't heard his voice since he saved my life from the little monstrosity, Amelia.

"Too many. Probably nowhere near as many as you, though."

Beatrix leans against the wall and slips her hands into her jacket pockets. "There were people I considered myself very close to, but I can barely remember their faces anymore. Every day, I worry that we'll be found and surrounded by the forces of the Volgrim. Even if we evade them and were to travel to the opposite end of the galaxy, we'd just be within the reach of the Kolvaxians. Someday, and soon, there won't be any safe places for us to hide in the Milky Way."

There's that name again. This time, I decide to prod her. "Forgive my ignorance, but what are Kolvaxians?"

Samantha opens her mouth to reply, but pauses for a moment. "I think they're... a separate Volgrim faction? Aren't the two sides in a civil war?"

Beatrix surprises me by chuckling. "Hah! You're the second in command of the demons? Don't you know anything about the state of the galaxy?"

"Not particularly, no. I didn't give the state of the galaxy much thought." Samantha rolls her eyes. "So what are these Kolfaxi-whatevers?"

The elevator shudders to a stop and Beatrix steps toward the door. It opens right as she's about to smack into it, and she passes through thanks to her eons of experience with its timing. "Kolvaxians. We're almost at the Admiral Lounge. It's just down this hall."

She doesn't answer Sam's question, but a few moments later, we enter the room she's apparently been heading to this whole time. Ten other people are there, and they salute her all at once.

It's a spacious room, probably twenty feet squared, with a ceiling that expands upward into a circular dome, and an old-fashioned chandelier to light the area up. Couches sit in a circle facing each other, and most of their seats are already occupied. A bunch of prominent looking women, along with a few men, stare at Samantha's revealing outfit, then at me for a moment, though the men's eyes linger on her much longer.

"Everyone, these are two of the three who were responsible for wiping out the Volgrim reserve fleet in the Terran sector. Please give them the same level of respect that you would give me."

The men and women nod politely but say nothing, as Beatrix plops down on a couch off to the side, where nobody else is sitting. It appears to be 'her' seat.

Samantha and I position ourselves beside each other and skim the faces around us. None of them look familiar to me, and Samantha's blank expression tells me they're all foreign to her as well.

One of the three men speaks up, a large, African-American guy with a thin black beard that goes from the bottom of his lip all the way to the base of his throat. He adjusts his thick-rimmed glasses and squints at me. "I'm Benjamin Brown, current first officer aboard the U.S.S. Terra. And you?"

"Jason Hiro."

"Samantha... Belial?" My cute succubus girlfriend pauses to tap her lip. "You know, I never did come up with a good last name. I suppose it doesn't matter."

Ben shakes his head. "No. It doesn't." He's a pleasant fellow.

Beatrix clears her throat. "About the Kolvaxians. Neither of you knows anything about them, correct?"

Both of us shake our heads, so she continues. "That's too bad. We don't, either. In fact, unless the Volgrim have become experts at dodging our communication taps, it's clear they don't even know much about the Kolvaxians. All we know for certain is that they're a life form that's alien to us even by the most unconventional standards." Beatrix reaches to her side and grabs a digital pad, taps a few buttons, and the center of the room lights up with a hologram of the Milky Way.

"This is our current position, about 500 light-years from the Terran system." A tiny dot appears amidst the beautiful array of stars and solar systems. "This area here represents the Volgrim sphere of control, where darker hues of purple indicate a higher presence, while lighter shades indicate a lower presence." A large chunk of the area around Earth's position and other odd clusters of purple superimpose themselves over the image.

Beatrix looks at me meaningfully. "Now I'll overlay the Kolvaxian area of influence. Tell me if anything stands out to you."

She presses a button, and a dark-green cluster appears right in the center of Volgrim space, then becomes lighter and lighter, but encircles around the rest of the galaxy very faintly. Here and there, slightly darker green patches appear, but none are nearly as dark as the obvious center-point close to the Volgrim's center of power.

I stare at it for a few moments to take it in. "The Kolvaxians are already in the heart of the Volgrim empire? They live throughout most of the galaxy? I'm not sure what I can do with this information without knowing more."

Benjamin Brown leans forward and points at the darkest green spot. "This spot here, curiously, is not just any random location. It's located approximately 14,000 lightyears from Terran space, where Earth was before the Volgrim destroyed our homeworld. To be precise, it's located where the Volgrim's homeworld used to be. Volgarius Prime, that is."

Samantha squints at the image, then looks at me. "Isn't that where we started? Volgarius something-rather?"

I shake my head. "No. Ionis was on Volgarius Alpha, which was apparently their original homeworld. Maybe. I'm a little confused."

When I shoot a questioning glance at Beatrix, she nods. "We've heard rumors of Volgarius Alpha. Never had the time or inclination to look for it though, I suppose. That would be the original homeworld of the Volgrim, during their Great Wars, I suppose you would say. Volgarius Prime was the world they migrated to and lived on for millions of years."

Benjamin's gaze darkens. "Until it was destroyed."

"Mmm, yes," says Beatrix, "and violently at that. Funny thing though, the records are spotty regarding how it was destroyed. I played a major part in its destruction, according to what records we've recovered, and even I don't know the exact details."

"Yeah. Funny," echoes Ben. "Anyway, the important thing is, something destroyed not only their homeworld but also their entire solar system. Three other planets and twenty moons were eradicated, in addition to their star, which was already on the verge of collapse. It suffices to say, whatever destroyed Volgarius Prime did so in the most spectacular fashion and defied the laws of physics."

"The origin point was the planet too, and not the star. We've long since ruled out a supernova." Beatrix flicks her hand around on the pad and brings up a visual re-enactment of Volgarius's destruction. "An object of tremendous mass collided with the planet at a speed approaching or exceeding the speed of light. It-"

Samantha interrupts her. "I don't want to be rude, but what does this have to do with anything?"

Beatrix scowls. "Your kind does hate the practical sciences, after all. At least the Hero is getting the picture, right?"

I shake my head slowly. "I agree with Samantha. I don't understand what this has to do with the Kolvaxians."

"I'll make it quick then," says Ben. "The system was rendered uninhabitable. With the Energy Wars drawing to a close, and the Volgrim's eyes on pacifying humanity, while humanity had our hands full fighting them off, everyone ignored the space where Volgarius Prime had once existed. It took... well, we don't know how long exactly, but at some point, the Volgrim suddenly came under assault by a new enemy. It caught them completely by surprise. They had spent thousands of years rebuilding and terraforming new planets for themselves to exist on, so they wouldn't ever be locked to just a single homeworld ever again, but two of those planets were taken over by the Kolvaxians in a single month's time."

"Oh." I blink slowly, trying to take this in. "So, what, the Kolvaxians randomly appeared in the destroyed Volgarius system? That doesn't make any sense."

Ben nods and raises his eyebrows. "That's what the Volgrim thought. It took them thousands of years to figure out where the increasingly numerous Kolvaxians were coming from. It turned out that a hole had been torn in subspace. Wherever the Kolvaxians were coming from, it wasn't our galaxy... or our universe."

Even Samantha seems to finally understand. "So the Kolvaxians are from another universe? How? Why?"

Beatrix reaches for a cup of tea on the table beside her, while she sets her datapad down in the same motion. "We don't have all the answers. We barely know anything about the Kolvaxians in the first place. We've encountered their ships only on a few occasions, and nobody survived to tell the tale. As far as we're concerned, they are ten times the threat the Volgrim are, though both are our enemies. What little we do know indicate they're a sort of... they're like a..." She trails off, unable to find the right words.

Benjamin fills in for her. "The Volgrim have captured live specimens on just two occasions. Both captives killed themselves within seconds and dissolved into dust. The little we know of them indicate they're somewhat like a plant-based species; meaning they consume and convert organic and inorganic matter to their species."

"I don't follow," I say, bluntly. "They consume things? How does that work?"

"We don't know. All we know is that whenever they defeated our other ships, those ships and their unique technology began appearing among the Kolvaxian fleets. They assimilate knowledge and craftsmanship and add it to their knowledge. If only we'd known it sooner, we wouldn't have-" Ben pauses, and his voice catches in his throat as he bows his head. Wringing his hands together, a scowl appears on his face. "It won't do us any good to reminisce about the past."

Beatrix forces a smile, but it's fake-looking and gaudy compared with her professional demeanor. "We're at our wit's end. I don't want to ally with the Volgrim, but if things keep going the way they have, we'll have no space safe for us to live anymore. The Kolvaxians have infested much of the galaxy, and their numbers will only continue to grow, especially after you dealt a major blow to the Volgrim two weeks ago. On the other hand, I hate the Volgrim and everything they stand for. We're going to be screwed by one or the other if things keep up the way they have been."

Samantha doesn't smile back. "So what do you want exactly? If we eliminate the Kolvaxians, the Volgrim will take over the galaxy, and vice-versa if we eliminate the Volgrim. Even if we kill both of them-" Sam pauses to glare at me, "-that would be genocide on an unthinkable scale. Don't you agree, love?"

Her glare makes me squirm more than I've already been thanks to my leg cramps. "Uh, um, yeah. I'm trying to get away from the whole genocide thing. Cassiel wouldn't like it either."

"Cassiel..." Samantha trails off and turns back to Beatrix. "Before we consider anything, I should tell you that we're a three-man group, so to speak. Even if Hero and I were okay with genocide, which we're decidedly not, Cassiel carries an equal amount of weight in our decision making. Since she's in a coma, I guess you'd better get to curing her if you want a quick response."

The others in the room keep quiet for a few moments. Finally, a different officer seizes the opportunity to speak. "If you don't help us, I hope you understand the consequences and what will happen."

I immediately turn to glare at him. Messy black hair, with a neatly tailored tan suit, he stands out from the others somewhat. "Is that a threat?"

"Not at all, Hero. If you don't assist us, and you leave us to fend for ourselves, the Kolvaxians will likely win the war. If they don't, the Volgrim might, but that possibility grows less likely every day. I can assure you, as bad as the Volgrim are, they're nothing compared to the Kolvaxians. All life will be extinguished if those monsters take over the galaxy. You won't be safe; nobody will."

An ominous warning. I hear those a lot, lately. "Like Samantha said, we'll think about it. Cassiel's input is mandatory though, so until she wakes up, our hands are tied."

"At least the man knows his place," mutters Beatrix under her breath. "We'll get to work quickly, then. In the meantime, I'll have someone escort you to the angel's medical bay. We need to get the anti-energy out of your body, or you won't be able to help us, even if you decide you want to."

I haven't made up my mind yet, I want to say, but don't. Samantha and I instead nod politely at the crew members in the room before turning around and wheeling away. Before we leave, a young man, possibly twenty-years old (though looks can be deceiving), appears in front of us.

"Hello! I'm Thomas! I'm here to show you to the medical bay! It's several miles away, so you'll probably be pretty tired when we get there!"

He doesn't wait for us to respond, and immediately begins walking away down the hallway. Samantha smiles cutely at me. "He looks yummy."

"Down, girl. You can't pounce on every piece of young flesh you see."

She looks forward and starts rolling after the young man. "I'm just teasing, love. You need to work on that stress level."

My stomach is in knots, though it's not because of anything she's talking about. "Hey, do you think they can heal Cassiel? Us too, for that matter? They aren't just manipulating us, are they?" I scoot a little faster to catch up to Sam, falling in place beside her as Thomas whistles merrily to himself a few dozen feet in front of us.

"I don't see why Beatrix would lie. It makes sense that she'd want a Hero to help her. After hearing that we defeated the Volgrim ships, it's in her best interest to get on our good side. I'm pretty good at reading people, and I didn't sense any lies coming from her aura."

"Her aura?"

"Mhm." Samantha licks her lips slowly, almost seductively. "All living creatures have an aura. From what I know of angels, they can see auras perfectly along with 'spirit trails.' Demons can't do that, but we can sorta sense the 'color' of a creature or person's aura based on their emotions. Since you have Wordsmithing, you could probably do something similar, if you figured out how to cast the spell properly on yourself."

"Huh, interesting."

* * *

Minutes turn into a half hour, and we eventually arrive in yet another sterile hallway, similar to those I've seen in hospitals on Earth. As if to confirm my thoughts, Thomas glances back at us. "We're almost there! It's at the end of the hall on the right."

When he turns away, I nudge Samantha with my elbow while we wheel forward. "Hey. Do you remember the man in the crystal back on Voldarius?"

She looks at me quizzically. "You mean Pickle?"

I try to contain my disgust. "Yes. Him."

"What about him? Why bring him up now?"

Her question gives me pause. "Well, it's just- you mentioned auras earlier. You can see my aura, right?"

"Yep. It's fairly nervous-looking right now, too."

"So..." I pause, "...what about Pickle? Did he have an aura similar to mine?"

She shakes her head. "No. He was dead. The dead have no aura. Their soul is gone. Is something bothering you about him?"

I might as well just say it, I say to myself. "I think I'm a clone. Pickle was the original."

Samantha slows to a stop, and I do the same. "Why do you think that?"

"Because it makes sense. Someone was alive and did so many crazy things, including creating a fake planet for Dosena to live on. Think about what Beatrix said, too. She and the rest of humanity have memory holes, just like the Voldarians do. The holes she described take place in a similar time-frame to the time the Voldarian planetoid was created. This 'Pickle' guy, or rather, the Jason before me, he must have had a terrible disease or something- or maybe he made a clone and sealed me up in cryostasis so I could return at a later date. It explains how my cryopod ended up randomly inside the Labyrinth."

Samantha is unconvinced. "So why did he erase memories of his deeds?"

"That's simple, he didn't want people to know of his plan to return. By sealing me away and erasing people's memories, he ensured that the galaxy would... would stabilize... or something. I don't know. I don't have all the answers."

"Hmm." Samantha stares at me seriously. "I don't see the link, love. I can see reasons he would and wouldn't erase memories of his deeds, but I find it hard to believe you're a clone. Maybe you're overthinking this. He might be your clone, or something."

"Yeah. Maybe." I glance away, guiltily. Pushing this on her was wrong. I'll have to think about this and fit the puzzle pieces together on my own. "Forget it. I'm just being dumb."

Involuntarily, I flinch, as she puts her hand on mine. "Don't say things like that. If you want to talk, Cass and I are here for you. You have the weight of humanity's future, the demons, the angels, and even the Volgrim's on your shoulders. No man can bear a burden like that all on his own. It will break your mind."

She leans over and pecks me on the cheek, before quickly scooting ahead, her face red with embarrassment. Samantha is really just adorable when she's being awkward, I think to myself.

When I wheel after her, I spot Thomas standing in front of a doorway, a look of annoyance on his face, like he wants to say something about us making him wait, but can't, lest Beatrix rag on him for an hour. "Glad you guys could finally make it! This is the medical bay, and the staff here will help you out!"

Once again, he doesn't wait for a response before hurriedly pushing past us and leaving without saying goodbye. Such bad manners that kid has.

When we enter the room, dozens of hospital beds are lined up, curtains blocking off each one from the other. Most of the beds are empty, with a person here or there, but Cassiel's is right up front, in the 'VIP' section. Her chest rises and falls evenly, and a strange circular machine is positioned above her head, like a dish-antenna beaming signals into her brain. Ionis stands in the rear of the room, his single eye staring silently forward at us as we approach, though he makes no attempt to greet us.

A woman walks over to us and smiles. "You must be Belial and Jason. My name is Doctor Beverly Cruz, and I'm the head of the medical division here." Her curly auburn hair falls down lightly on her shoulders, and her appearance - that of a sweet mother caring for her children, fits perfectly with the image of a medical officer.

Beverly shakes Samantha's hand first, then mine, but she pauses to stare at me for a few moments. "You... you look familiar. Have we met before, young man?"

I pull away from her grasp and scratch the back of my head. "Haha, I don't think so. You might have me confused with someone else."

Her smile fades, ever so slightly. A wistful look appears as she stares at me silently for a few moments. "Yes... someone else. That's- that's probably it." She blinks and smiles again, but a hint of sadness is still in her eyes. "I'm just an old woman, don't mind me. In any case, your friend is over here, so why not have a look?"

As she turns away, I glance at Samantha and mouth silently at her, isn't she acting a little strange? Samantha merely nods and rolls over to Cassiel.

"Wark wark." From behind the bed, Howard waddles out, flapping his wings slightly as he looks at Samantha. In his bill is a syringe filled with liquid. Beverly spots it and grumbles to herself, "Oh, you naughty little animal! Where do you keep finding these random things?" She jerks down with a movement I wouldn't expect and nabs the syringe from him, to which he protests with several rapid warks.

Beverly glances at a label on the side. "Heavens! This is filled with Neohydroxidine! Quite deadly! We're fortunate he didn't poke himself, or he'd be a dead duck!" She quickly pushes past us and hides the syringe in a cabinet where Howard can't reach it.

Samantha snickers. "Maybe he's trying to kill us, Hero. You better watch out."

"Oh, don't be silly, Sam. He's just a duck." I reach down and give him a gentle pat on the head, but he waddles away from me and hops up onto Cassiel's body and sits on her stomach, staring at me the whole time.

"Yeah," echoes Samantha, "He's just a duck."

Part 442c: Values, Ethics, Lies

"She's waking up now." Doctor Cruz smiles at us sweetly before turning to face Cassiel. Her cheeks warm into a rosy red as my cute angel wakes up from the deepest sleep of her life.

Cassiel blinks slowly and winces, despite the low light in the room. Her eyes are unfocused and hazy as she looks from Samantha, to me, to the doctor. "Wha...?"

"Welcome back to the world of the living," Samantha says, as she crosses her arms. "You've been in a coma for the last month."

"Sam!" I shoot a quick glare at her. "Your bedside manner is terrible!"

Cassiel nods weakly and raises her arm to look at her fingernails for some reason. "A month? I was having such a good dream too... I hoped it would never end."

I share a quick glance of guilt with Samantha before we turn back to Cass. "Uh, sorry. I didn't- I mean, we wouldn't have woken you, if uh..."

"It's fine." Cassiel blinks suddenly, as an eerie alertness appears in her eyes. Reaching for the bars on either side of the bed, she hoists her body up to a sitting position. "It was just a dream. Where am I?" She looks at Beverly, suddenly realizing the doctor is there. "And who is this?"

"I'm Beverly Cruz, the head doctor aboard the U.S.S. Terra. You're on a ship run by humanity. We took good care of you, and flushed the anti-energy from your system, along with your two friends here." She glances at me, as a thoughtful look appears on her face. "Well, most of it. Jason still has quite a lot of lingering body pains, but it's just a matter of time for him."

"Wark." Howard appears at my feet and hops on my foot over and over until I pick him up and hand him to Cassiel.

"Your pet duck has been trying my patience ever since you got KO'd," says Samantha, "so I hope you can take care of him again. I do not like animals."

Cassiel smiles for a moment as she takes Howard from me and pats his head, but the look fades. "What happened? How did I get knocked out? The last thing I remember, we were on the Volgrim world thing, then I was in la-la land. It's a little surreal that I'm in a totally different place from before."

Doctor Cruz's smile melts away and swaps with a frown. "Volgrim world?" She glances at me. "What's that about?"

My heart does a gymnastic leap. I haven't told anyone about Dosena's planet yet. I was hoping to keep that a secret for her sake.

Samantha jumps in for the save. "No, Cass! We were attacked by the Volgrim! You must have passed out and become disoriented."

The succubus spends a minute explaining how we got here, and in the meantime, Beverly moves on and ignores the 'random babble' that Cassiel had said regarding a Volgrim world. After all, a comatose patient can imagine a lot of things, her eyes seem to say.

Cassiel, having apparently gotten the hint, nods along with Samantha. "So these people saved our lives? Wow! We owe them, don't we?"

"That would be excellent, yes." From the doorway, Beatrix's voice booms in the room. She strides in and saunters to the end of the bed, near Cassiel's feet. "We've been taking good care of you." It doesn't escape me that she glances over at Ionis, still standing in the corner, for a split-second. A look, not of fear, but of desire passes over her face, but she hides it quickly.

"Thank you so much!" Cassiel says, oblivious to the situation we're in. "We should definitely try and repay you!"

Despite the fact she's my girlfriend, I want to throttle her and tell her shut up shut up! It's not that the humans here are evil, but they're humans. Capable of tremendous empathy, but sociopathy as well, I can't ever fully trust them, especially if I know their motives and agenda. Unfortunately, I don't even fully understand that much about them.

While Cassiel smiles from ear to ear and pets Howard, Beatrix turns to me. "Jason, if you don't mind, can I have a few minutes of your time?"

"Sure."

She smiles at Cassiel again. "I'll just be bothering your fiance for a few minutes. It won't take long."

Cassiel turns white in the face, as does Samantha. "F-Fiance? What? Since when? What happened while I was out?!"

Beatrix's smile vanishes. "Oh. Maybe I misunderstood the situation. I assumed the three of you were a full item or on the road there."

I quickly reach out and pull Beatrix away while the girls squee to each other. "You're digging me a hole, here. What do you want to talk about?"

The commander points at the doorway. "It's private, for you only." Before I can retort with 'anything you want to say, you can say in front of the girls,' she raises a finger to silence me. "No ifs, ands, or buts."

* * *

A few minutes pass, and we arrive in a small office space not far from the hospital room. As we step in, Beatrix presses a button to lock the door, then turns to me. "Before I tell you anything, I need your word you won't repeat it to anyone, including those two women, and especially not the demoness."

Her sudden change in attitude from smiling to that of a politician looking for easy money chills me. "Why would I promise that? I tell the girls everything."

"I'm sure you do. This is important though, more important than bedtime whisperings. Lives are at stake. If you don't promise, then... well, I don't know. You absolutely must hear this, so I guess we'll be in this room for a long time waiting."

Despite the mood shift, I casually lean against a wall and poke at a fake potted planet beside me. "Fine, whatever. This had better be good."

"Good? Not quite." Beatrix stiffens visibly, and takes a few moments to compose herself before speaking. "The Labyrinth has been thrown into chaos over the last few weeks. The humans were steamrolling the demons like they had been doing it for millions of years, but things have changed. The demons are mounting a major comeback. They've pulled out all the stops and are beating back the humans at every battle. If the situation worsens any more than it already has, a lot of good soldiers, and future allies, will die brutal deaths. I need you to go there and fix the situation."

The commander eyes me knowingly, and Marie's words return to my mind. If you don't restore the balance of power; someone else will.

"I've heard the Labyrinth isn't doing well. I'm planning to return soon." I pause, a sudden suspicion in my mind. "How do you know about the situation inside, though? Didn't you tell me a couple of days ago that you haven't contacted the Labyrinthian humans?"

Beatrix shuffles her feet and looks away. "You are correct. I haven't."

"So how do you know what the situation is?"

More discomfort. "As I've said, we can monitor Volgrim communications." She quickly turns back to me. "Anyway, that's not important. What's important is that I know what the situation is. My fellow humans could be aiding us in the war against the Volgrim and Kolvaxians, but they're busy fighting worthless demons. I need you to get back inside the Labyrinth and help defeat whatever is giving the demons their surge of power."

I can almost feel the tattoos glowing on my body as several thoughts occur to me. "No, it is important. You told me you didn't want me to tell Samantha anything. Why? Because she's a demon?"

"Because she's the second goddamn emperor, Jason." Beatrix hisses at me and takes a step forward. "I'm glad you're having fun with a cute little succubus girl, but that girl is the leader of demonkind in the absence of the First Emperor. The last thing I want is for her to know I can gather intelligence from inside the Labyrinth. Don't you see how-"

My hand jerks up instantly to stop her. "Hold on; you can gather intelligence from inside the Labyrinth? That's a different scenario from monitoring what the Volgrim are saying. What are you hiding?"

A guilty look disappears as quickly as it appears. "That isn't important. I can't trust Belial, not now, not ever. It's better you don't know."

Finally, I can put the puzzle pieces together. "You have a spy among the demons? More than one? Several?"

Instantly, Beatrix scowls. I hit the mark. "Why must you be so pushy? Nothing worse than a man who thinks he has a brain. YES! I have a few spies among the demons. What of it? Are you going to tell your girlfriend so she can have them eliminated?"

"I wouldn't do that."

"You wouldn't? So you can resist telling her the truth, then? And here I thought you loved her." Beatrix leans forward and stabs me in the chest with her finger. "I have put eons into these spies, and if I lose them, I lose my only intelligence connection to the inside. If you breathe a word of this to her, those demons are dead."

"Samantha wouldn't kill them or put their lives in danger. She doesn't give a damn about the political battles and wars." I lightly smack the commander's hand away and think to myself for a few moments. "How in the hell did you find demons that would betray their emperors? If there's one thing I know about demons, it's that they're fiercely hierarchical. Authority and respect mean everything to them. It can't have been easy."

The commander dodges my question again. "I do what has to be done."

"Did... did you brainwash them?" My memory flicks back to the device they used on Cassiel in the medical bay. "Are you forcefully converting demons to your cause?"

"No! Heavens, no! We just bribe them." Beatrix crosses her arms and shifts away from me, toward the door. She's nervous. "We aren't monsters."

"You aren't? Funny, I've met a lot of humans who I thought were worse than demons. Whatever you bribed these demon traitors with, it must have been pretty valuable-" My voice catches, and several things occur to me at once, all of them extremely unpleasant. "Jesus Christ. What did you bribe them with?!"

Beatrix eyes me evenly. "Leftovers."

"What? Something tells me you aren't talking about meatloaf."

"I'm not." She blinks slowly, pausing to close her eyes for a few moments. "I've made sacrifices. We all have. If it helps my crew survive for even another day, it's worth the tribute."

My stomach feels like I've just drunk a gallon of rancid milk. The thought that Beatrix is bribing demons with... with... whatever it is she's using, it disgusts me beyond all belief.

"Dictators and tyrants have used the same logic, Beatrix. From what Samantha has told me about demons, they don't value corpses nearly as much as they do fresh bodies. Since this must have been happening long before I liberated the Labyrinth, the demons already had access to humans in the bubble worlds. It's not just that you bribed them with live humans, but they had to be in a large enough quantity that it would be a worthwhile offer."

"Quality, not quantity." Beatrix almost whispers the words. "If you think what I've done doesn't keep me up at night, you're sorely mistaken. I'll just say it."

She takes a few deep breaths. "We gave them infants. Human infants. Those are forbidden in the Labyrinth. Humans have to grow to maturity before demons can devour them. It's the law set down by the Demon Emperors."

I'm not even shocked anymore. The revelation is so comically over-the-top that it has no effect on me.

"You gave live human babies to the demons, so that you could bribe them to be your spies. I'm... I'm just-" The words won't come out properly. I want to insult her, use my Wordsmithing to kill her, anything, but I can't. "Since you saved my life, and Samantha and Cassiel's, to boot, consider this my repayment for the debt. I will go back to the Labyrinth, and I will restore the balance of power, and I won't tell them what you've done. Normally, I'd be inclined to rip your guts out, so this is a real boon for you."

Beatrix shakes her head. "Death would be a mercy, Jason. You've only been awake for thirty years. I've been alive for tens of millions. The human psyche isn't designed to live that long, and mine certainly wasn't made to be a leader and the last hope for humanity for all those years. Killing me would be a mercy."

She glances at a picture of a man in a suit across the room. "I've considered doing it myself, as a matter of fact."

"I'll bet."

A digital clock on the wall shifts position from 17:09 to 17:10, and I tap my shoes together. This little chat has ruined my day. I want nothing more than to go to bed and never wake up again from this awful nightmare. Years of my life spent tearing demons to bits, fighting clones of myself, battling the Volgrim, and for what? So I can liberate humans? Do they even deserve the privilege? If I defeat the demons, I'll just be handing the reins of power from one group to another. At least the demons, though they be flesh-eaters and disgusting creatures, understand order. They have traditions, and they're disciplined. Humans back-stab each other, lie, cheat, and steal over the smallest and most petty things. If something will give them the slightest leg-up in the world, they'll do it. Some people don't think that way, but the exceptions don't prove a rule.

Since neither of us apparently have anything left to say, I reach for the door-unlock button, but Beatrix reaches out and grabs my wrist. "You won't inform Belial of what I've told you, right?"

"I won't. I should, but I made a promise." I wrench away from her grasp and thrust the door open. A few minutes later, I stroll into the room to see Samantha and Cassiel poking Howard over and over while he warks and keeps trying to bite their fingers. Under normal circumstances, I'd probably laugh.

"Oh, Hero! You're back!" Cassiel smiles at me, her usual brilliant grin that could melt a glacier, but for once, I can't smile back. "Wanna play with Howard? If you poke his belly, he gets all flummoxed and-"

"If you're feeling better, Cass, we really should be going." I interrupt her before she can get too excited over her fun. "We've taken up enough of Beatrix's time and hospitality."

Samantha's smile is the first to vanish, but Cass's follows immediately after. "Is this about the talk you just had? I wasn't expecting for us to leave so quickly. What did you talk about?"

"This and that." I keep my words vague, despite wanting to tell her everything. "It's private. Anyway, let's get Cass cleaned up and ready to go. We're heading back to the Labyrinth."

"Oh. Okay..." Samantha's voice trails off.

Cassiel's expression is that of a wounded puppy. "But... they helped us so much. Don't we owe them at least a little bit?"

I turn away, unable to look both of them in the eyes. "Don't worry about the debt. We don't owe them a thing."

* * *

My ship powers up its thrusters silently, while I sit alone in the captain's seat. On the viewscreen, I watch the girls chatting with Doctor Cruz at the bottom of our entry-ramp, though I have the audio disabled. It's not my business to pry.

The silence on the Bridge is deafening.

Behind me, the rumbling of slow, plodding footsteps approaches. After a few moments, OMEN appears on my right side, his blank human-like face resting firmly in the Uncanny Valley. "Query: Why are we leaving ahead of schedule?"

"We're leaving right on time. It's a little impromptu, but I need to get back to the Labyrinth. I fucked the place up, so I'll be the one to unfuck it."

OMEN bobs his head, a bad imitation of a nod. "Observation: Based on your heart rate, blood pressure, body temperature, and multiple other physical tells, you are in a state of agitation. Speculation: This was caused due to a distressing event aboard the U.S.S. Terra. Query: Was my deduction correct?"

"You're annoying. Stop using the ship's sensors to look inside my body. It's creepy."

"Amused response: I believe my theory is correct. Thought experiment: Suppose you were to tell me about what happened. Don't you think you would feel much better?"

I roll my eyes up into my skull. "No. I wouldn't. Unless you can change the past and make humans a whole lot less shitty and depressingly predictable, you won't be any help."

The girls wave goodbye to Doctor Cruz and start walking up the exit ramp. "Objection: I am well versed when it comes to human psychological warfare and mental experimentation. It might be possible for me to change my programming in such a way that I could reverse-engineer my algorithms to calm your bodily functions. Why, you might even be able to sleep well, for once."

"I sleep just fine."

"Smug remark: You toss and turn all night long, every night. At least, ever since the angel female entered a comatose state. You are lying, but fooling nobody."

"Well, you're an asshole."

This seems to shut the robot up. "Amused response: Suit yourself. I was merely interested in prodding you for information. If you will not divulge anything, I will return to my recharge station in the cargo bay." Without another word, OMEN lumbers away.

Minutes pass, Cassiel and Samantha finally enter the bridge from a door behind me, and I hear nervous whispering, but I don't bother looking back. After a few seconds, Cassiel slips around my chair to my left side and smiles weakly at me. "Um, Hero? Are you okay? You look depressed."

"I'm a little down in the dumps, but it's nothing major."

I keep my voice neutral, but when Samantha pops up, her look of concern is even more worrying than Cassiel's. "If it's not a big deal, why are we leaving the station so soon? Cass didn't even get to look around, and you know how she loves technology and robots and stuff. I was telling her about the one that cleans the floors, but she didn't even get to see one."

I don't know what to say without revealing information. "We have to go. That's all there is to it. Ever since I spoke with Marie, I've known the Labyrinth was in a bad state, but now it's even worse off than when we spoke with her. Let's just leave and go fix things."

Samantha pauses, her eyes flick to Cass, then back to me. "There's something you're not telling us." It's not a question.

"Sam. I'd tell you anything and everything any other time. Just this once, I'd rather not. I made a promise."

Both girls look rather despondent as they limp over and flop in their chairs, but it can't be helped. It pains me to say nothing just as much as it hurts them. In a few days, we'll be over it. No big deal.

Cass sighs loudly as she taps on the console. "I do miss flying around in space. Where are we going?"

"I'll make a wormhole back to Volgarius Alpha. We'll re-enter the portal to the Labyrinth from there, and leave our ship with the humans on the planet. I could portal us to the Labyrinth directly, but we might need this ship in the future."

"Sounds like a plan." Samantha's tone is diplomatic, detached. "Let's get this over with."

Her rigid body language clearly makes Cassiel uncomfortable, but the angel says nothing. Soon, we blast out of the hangar without ceremony and fly over to a spot several thousand miles from the human ship as it cloaks behind us once again. Using my energy, I aim my mind at the void.

" Wormhole! "

A tremendous amount of energy sucks from my body, as space stitches together and creates a hole large enough for our ship to travel through. Not a minute later, I seal it behind us and sigh, as exhaustion suddenly overcomes me. "Put us down on the planet. I need to recover my energy, so I'll be sleeping in the back for a few hours."

I get out of my chair and wheeze, feeling my chest still hurt from the tiny bits of residual anti-energy. Cass turns around to me, a hopeful smile on her face. "If you're feeling bad, I know what'll cheer you up! Let's go to bed together, and-"

Sighing, I raise my hand to stop her. "Not this time, Cass. I don't want to be cheered up right now."

She doesn't even let out a disappointed whimper, as I leave the room.

Part 443c: Mercy

A familiar face greets me once again. My own.

My imposter and I stand facing each other, him at the edge of an unthinkably tall precipice, and me, not ten feet away. His grip on Samantha's throat tightens as he holds her over the cliffside.

" You thought you could protect them. It took a robot to save their lives, a machine of death, ironically enough. You were useless then, just as you are now. "

Samantha struggles and claws at my doppelganger's hand, but she can't fight his grip off at all. I take a step toward them, and he holds her a little further away. "Leave her alone. Your fight is with me. She didn't do anything to deserve this."

" She loves you. Killing her will hurt you far more than any wound of the flesh. I'll give you a moment to say your goodbyes. Don't waste it. "

"Don't you dare hurt her!" I jump at him, but he merely smiles at me, a cold, emotionless grin, as he loosens his grip. Samantha, surprised by the sudden movement, lets out a tiny squeak, before plunging off the edge of the cliff. Her scream muffles a second later, and by the time I stumble to the side of the cliff, she's gone.

"S-Samantha! No!"

The copycat paces around behind me and gazes down into the chasm. " Oh dear, heh heh. She fell. And now, you will too. "

Before I can react, he kicks me in the ass, sending me stumbling forward off the cliff. "Guh!"

My eyes squeeze shut as I brace for the feeling of rushing wind, but instead, a soft, beautiful voice whispers into my ear. "You don't have to do this alone. You don't have to be our bulwark. We can protect ourselves, Hero."

I blink my eyes open, and Cassiel's smiling face greets me. Her massive wings flap steadily, as she braces my body against hers, with my toes just barely touching the edge of the cliff. Samantha clutches onto Cassiel's back, one arm wrapped around Cass's shoulder, the other rubbing her neck.

"Cassiel is right, Jason. Just because you're a Hero, doesn't mean you have to save everyone. No-one can go at it alone."

" What?! " My copy takes a step back as Cassiel flaps again, shoving me to my feet at the edge of the cliff, as she and Samantha land a few feet away.

"You think we don't know who you are? You are the darkness. You wish to kill the purity inside Hero, but that's where you went wrong. Heroes never die."

The other me takes a step forward as he grabs a second wind. " I am not darkness, I am strength. When the time comes, I will be the only way for you to save them. You will have a choice to make, and I will be your salvation. I will be your... hope. "

Copycat Me whips his hand forward and aims his palm at us. " Begone! "

A wave of energy races forward, pushes us off the cliff, and our screams of terror rebound off the canyon walls as we plunge to our inevitable...

* * *

"...Demise!" I yell out awkwardly, suddenly realizing I'm staring at the ceiling of my bedroom again. Despite how erratic my breathing is, it calms down in seconds. "Just another nightmare..." I mutter sheepishly.

To my right and left, neither of the girls are here, so they left me alone for once. I lean up in bed and scratch my back as I stare vacantly across the room. What I said to them earlier was messed up. An apology is top of my priority list.

After a few minutes, my clothes are on, my face is shaved, and I'm ready to take on the day. A glance at the clock tells me I was out for around seven hours, so I slept better than expected. "Computer, where is the ship located?"

The AI's monotone voice answers immediately. "The One-Hundred-Fortieth Galactic Exploration Vessel has been landed on the surface of the planet of Volgarius Prime."

God, that's a terrible name for a ship, I think to myself. I suppose it doesn't matter since we'll be leaving it behind. Still...

"Computer, please rename the ship 'U.S.S. Pickle.'"

The computer takes a few moments to pause. 'Are you kidding me right now?' I almost expect it to say. It doesn't.

"Command confirmed. This vessel has been renamed the U.S.S. Pickle on star-date 1.451.009. Are there any further commands?"

"No."

Saying that, I stride out of the room and down the hall to the Bridge. It's high time I stopped lazing about and got to work, I think to myself. The Labyrinth isn't going to fix itself.

My boots thud against the harsh metal floors and echo slightly around me as I walk. How am I going to fix the Labyrinth anyway? Should I cage humans back in bubble worlds? That's stupid. Nobody should be forced to live like that, with demons feeding on them periodically. What a horrible way to go out. Should I force the demons to surrender? If I do that, the humans will probably kill them. Too much bad blood between them. I can't just expect both sides to back down and sing Kumbaya.

What if I forced them with Wordsmithing? I could make each side surrender and order them to never attack each other again. That would work, maybe.

But is it ethical? Should I just change their free will, as if I were a dictatorial god sent from on high to mold them to my beliefs? I barely even understand myself, let alone the nature of war and conflict. The humans have every right to lash out at the demons after the abuse they've suffered.

My thoughts slowly revolve around my brain, like a leaf spinning atop a whirlpool. Where does the vortex of philosophy lead? What is right? What is wrong?

The door to the bridge slides open, and I raise my head up from the ground. "I'm awake."

Only then do I realize the Bridge is empty. Nobody else is- wait, there's one 'person' here. OMEN.

The robot turns to look at me. "Initial greeting: Hello, Hero. I see that you have woken up. Condescension: Your dreams were as terrible as I expected, judging by how you tossed and turned. If only you had taken me up on my offer."

"Shut up. I can Wordsmith and make myself sleep like a baby anytime I want. I don't want a band-aid, I want to work things out properly. Anyway, where are the girls?"

The robot taps a button to show a lush forest outside the ship, with trees that wouldn't look out of place on Earth, and birds sitting atop the branches of the local flora. "Smooth transition while ignoring the brushing off of my offer: The two female non-humans are outside of the ship agitating local wildlife. Amused observation: Here you can see the winged one hurling sticks toward a group of vicious wolf-like animals."

Indeed, the screen changes to show Cassiel... playing fetch with a dozen or so random Border Collies, all while cooing and saying things like 'Get the stick! Good boy!'

"OMEN... you know she's just... playing with the dogs, right?"

The robot's face contorts into an eerie expression of mock horror. "Astounded response: I had no idea! Your keen eyes and insightful wisdom have changed my outlook on the meaning of life!"

"Wow, I didn't know you had a fucking sarcasm module installed." I roll my eyes and groan inwardly. "Where's Ionis?"

"Serious response: The only intelligent member of this crew, barring myself, is located inside the cargo bay. Observation: He has accomplished more in one week with this crew against the Volgrim than the human known as 'Hero' has since he arrived a month ago."

My tongue snakes out and wets my lips. "I swear, I'll teleport you into a star one of these days."

* * *

Slowly, the ramp extends down until it hits the forest's grass. The clearing around us is quite large, and trees surround us, almost as if this exact spot was made for the U.S.S. Pickle to land at. The girls are in the distance, playing with the group of dogs, but I stop and lean down to look at a flower on the ground. It looks like a tiny sunflower, as if someone hit it with a shrinking laser. A bug crawls around on the center of it, looking like a ladybug... but blue.

"I guess Wordsmithing and the Crown of Solomon didn't quite get all the details right," I mutter under my breath.

The girl's voices grow more audible as I head over to them. Cassiel nudges Samantha and points at one of the Collies. "-one I named Fluffy, because his tail is poofy! And this one over here is Dipsy, because he's kind of a doofus! And this pretty girl over here is Lora, because it's a pretty name for a cutie! If I had a daughter, that's what I'd call her!"

Samantha nods, but the look on her face is serious. "Dipsy is a condescending name though, don't you think? You don't want that boy to grow up to be a rebel outcast, do you? The other dogs will pick on him because he has such a silly name."

"No, no! It'll toughen him up! If everyone picks on him, then he'll become really strong and eventually he'll be like the alpha wolf or something!"

"I don't know if it works that way," Samantha says, clearly unconvinced. Before I can say anything, she turns just enough to spot me out of the corner of her eye. "Oh, you're awake!"

"Yup." I keep my tone neutral. "You two look like you're having fun."

Cassiel, apparently having already forgotten the way our conversation ended earlier, beams a radiant smile at me. "Are you here to play with the dogs too? This one is Hero Junior; I named him after you!"

One of the dogs turns and pants at me and immediately a look of revulsion passes over my face as I take a step back. "Huagh! What the fuck is wrong with his face?!"

The ugly hound has eight spider-like pitch-black eyes, and the two in the center are much bigger than the others. His innocent floppy tongue belies the horror of the upper half of his face. At my outburst he closes his mouth and bows his head, whimpering.

"Don't say that! Look, you made him sad." Cassiel leans down and hugs the wretched animal, kisses his forehead, and shoots a glare at me. "Apologize!"

I suddenly feel awkward, since I was initially going to apologize to her and Samantha for the way I treated them earlier, but now it feels awkward since she wants me to ask forgiveness to the dog first.

Might as well get this over with. I lean over and eye the ugly son-of-a-bitch up and down, swallowing my pride. "I'm sorry, Hero Junior. I didn't mean what I said. You're a -hurgh-, a good boy." The fearsome animal stares back at me and gives me a lick on the chin, just to spite me.

I turn back to Cassiel, but she speaks before I can. "And now us."

"Huh?" My look of dopiness makes her and Samantha snort to each other.

Sam pokes me in the shoulder. "You've apologized to the dog. Now, what about us? You were awfully rude, earlier."

Guilt washes over me. "Um. I was actually going to do that before you, uh..." I feel so stupid. I should have just said it quickly. I'm awkward in situations like this. "I'm sorry. I was in a bad mood after what Beatrix told-" I catch myself as the girls' smiles vanish. "-Well, that is, it's not important. I was wrong, and I apologize."

Cass curls up her lip and looks at Sam. "I guess it'll do."

"Yeah. Could have been more heartfelt, but he's just a guy after all."

"Hey... I'm standing right here, you know."

* * *

The portal back to the Labyrinth yawns before us. Cass glances back at the forest. "I kinda like it here. Do we have to go back? It's so dark and dreary inside."

"We have to. Humans and demons are fighting, and I need to find out what the situation is."

Samantha leans against me and yawns. "So what are you going to do? Kill more demons? Kill humans? Put them in a corner and time them out?"

"I don't know, Sam. I'm still wondering how I should proceed. I'll think about it."

Cassiel offers her input. "Timing them out seems pretty reasonable to me. Just make sure they don't peek. Nose to the wall!"

We'll call that Option B, I think to myself.

The portal swallows us up as we step through, and the all-consuming darkness of the labyrinth is barely illuminated by the sunlight from Volgarius Prime. The corridor stretches ahead, and its dampness makes our footsteps sound sloshy compared to the dry ground from outside. Was it always this mossy?

Cassiel's soft glow radiating from her body doesn't light up much, so I make my own source of brightness. " Illuminate! "

A ball of bright energy, not unlike Hoarhiim's orb, appears and hovers above us, like a 300w lightbulb. It's bright enough that it easily shows us the caverns around and before us, but by focusing my mind, I can force the light to radiate in any desired direction. Knowing this, I make it brighten up the path far into the distance.

"Wish I'd had this when I first got out of the Cryopod," I mutter to myself.

Apparently hearing me, Cassiel responds, "A most impressive display."

Minutes turn into an hour, as the Crown of Solomon's mental map leads us down this path and that one, left and right, up and down, toward the place I called Home for a short while; Hero City. Sometimes I see walls that look familiar, and remember the ten years I spent exploring this Labyrinth.

The shifting walls and ways the Labyrinth reconfigures itself is a mystery. How did a place like this come to be? Why is it so massive, like the size of ten Suns from the Terran system? How does it even make sense for the Labyrinth to work in the way it does?

Samantha sighs. "Do you know where you're going? I feel like we've looped around five times already."

"My mental map is three-dimensional and comprehensive. It's a little incredible how well it works." We stop in front of a path split in three directions to look around. From the end of one hallway, an odd clink, like the sound of an empty plastic bottle being bopped against the floor. When I shine my light down the hall, I'm surprised to see undead skeletons slowly shambling toward us.

Samantha curls up her lips. "Ugh, necromancy. I am not a fan. So uncute."

Neither she nor Cassiel looks particularly concerned by the creatures holding swords and shields. Cassiel swipes a strand of hair from her face. "How do the skeletons move, anyway? Who makes them?"

"Dunno. Well, I think there are some demons whose magical abilities relate to raising the dead, but it's a stereotype that they're always ugly-looking impish skugs, so I never got to know any of them." Samantha takes a step back, "Sadly, these bony fellows are probably better looking than their masters."

With that, she lunges forward, at a speed that takes me by surprise. Moving like water through a series of pipes, she ducks, dodges, and bats the weapons from each skeletons' hand, crushing each of their skulls in her grip by clapping with a tremendous force. Each skeleton falls to pieces on the ground and doesn't get back up.

After destroying the two dozen or so, Samantha skips back over to us, whistling daintily the whole way, before thrusting her hands in front of me. "Could you be a dear and clean my hands off? They're filthy now."

" Clean. " With a single word, the powdered bones are cleaned from her hands, and Cassiel smiles giddily.

"That was so cool, Sammy! You kicked their- well, I was going to say 'butts,' but you crushed their heads, so I guess that doesn't make sense. Hmm." Her excitement vanishes as the strange philosophical questions of butts versus heads appears in her mind. "Well, given those were, you know, demonic skeletons, don't you feel bad about killing them?"

The question sends a wave of visible disgust washing across Samantha's face. "Oh, seven hells, no! Skeletons are disgusting, creepy creatures. I always like to put them out of their misery. I have no particular affinity toward generic monsters either, but I try not to harm other demons. They're kin, after all."

We take off down the opposite path as more questions occur to me. "Where do monsters come from, if they're not demons? Do demons create monsters, like orcs and goblins?"

Samantha adjusts the strips of fabric barely covering her body. "Well, humans like to pretend that monsters are from myths and legends, or rather, they preferred to at one point, but monsters have always been around. They were violent and didn't quite catch on with the human populace, since they aren't cute and cuddly, you see. The monsters in the Labyrinth were once on Earth, but they moved inside the Labyrinth at some point before Earth's destruction."

I raise an eyebrow. "So... who created them?"

"No idea." Samantha's curt reply makes me drop the subject.

A few minutes later, Samantha stops suddenly as we round a corner. Cass and I pause as the succubus squints and looks up ahead. "Now, that's odd."

In the distance, the sound of bare feet pattering catches up to us as dozens of goblins and orcs round the corner. Each of them is armed to the teeth, and the moment they spot us, a bloodthirsty look enters their eyes.

This time, I step up to bat. "I'll take care of these, Sam. Even if they aren't demons, it's not right that you should kill them."

Samantha chews on her lower lip. "No, Hero, this is odd. I sense a larger amount of energy in their bodies compared to their expected amount, and they seem much more vicious than they should be."

Cassiel's usually cheerful expression is gone, replaced with a darker one. "Need a second opinion? The energy in their bodies is twisted and malformed. It's as if they're consumed with rage."

"I agree," Samantha says, as she glances at me. "I would normally prefer we don't kill them, but... a fight might be unavoidable."

The goblins and orcs begin charging down the corridor, and Cassiel's expression brightens. "I have an idea!"

Saying that, she aims her hand at the horde charging forth. I feel an odd sensation in the air, and a moment later, confusion spreads across their faces, then they stop moving and flop forward to the ground. Cassiel smiles, "Piece of cake. I gave them a nice snooze."

"Maybe when they wake up they'll be less cranky," Samantha mumbles.

I teleport the three of us past them, wondering privately to myself why I didn't just teleport us to a different floor before, and after a few more minutes of walking, Samantha sighs. "Oh, brother. I hate to be the bearer of bad news, but we're being followed, Hero."

"We are? By who?" I look behind and in front of us, but Samantha shakes her head.

"I don't know by who, exactly, but they're a demon of tremendous power. She or he is following us and keeping a distance, but probably doesn't know I can feel the aura of anger from here. Seriously, the weird emotion in the Labyrinth is so out-of-place compared to normal. I wonder what's going on?"

A few ideas come to mind, but since I'm unsure, I keep them to myself. "Let's find a bigger area where we can face this demon and spread out. If they're as powerful as you say, I'd rather not take any chances."

Using my mental map, I trace a path to one particularly sizeable nearby room, and as we run, Samantha looks increasingly more and more agitated. "Still following us, and picking up the pace too. I think they're getting closer..."

We hurry around one last corner and step into a large chamber, one that immediately makes me cock an eyebrow. The room is very familiar. A pedestal sits in the center, and the room is filled with gold and jewels, but it takes me a moment to recognize the place.

It's the room where I first found Hoarhiim.

Indeed, the pedestal sits by itself, but the three statues I remember from before are missing. The gold and jewels are still everywhere, but the room looks different from how I remember. Odd.

Samantha, Cassiel and I turn around and face the hallway from whence we came. It takes a whole minute, but Samantha tenses up. "They're here."

From around the corner, a long beak appears, filled with razor-sharp teeth. A scaled monster I've seen before steps from around the corner, standing nearly as tall as me. His clubbed tail thumps against the wall, as if to announce his entrance, and his clawed talons clench as he spots us.

"Hoho, it seems I've found my prey. The human and the angel who escaped me once, as well as..." He pauses to squint at Samantha. "The Second Emperor in the flesh? It's my lucky day."

Cassiel's body trembles slightly, but she keeps up a brave face. "Gressil. I've been thinking about you a lot lately."

I glance at her, trying to keep a neutral expression. You have? I want to ask, but don't.

A long forked tongue slips out of Gressil's mouth as he takes a menacing step forward. "Interesting, my pretty angel. I've thought about you as well. All of my angelic prisoners are dead, and you were the last. I've been dying to put you back where you belong."

Nobody says a word for a few seconds, but Samantha gently pulls Cassiel behind her. "I don't care how strong you think you are, Gressil. If you want to hurt my friend, you'll have to go through me first. You're overestimating your chances of winning here."

"I don't need to win." Gressil's reply comes immediately. "I just want my prisoner back. Is that too much to ask, Second Emperor? Look at you, snuggling up to a human and an angel. You're a disgrace to the demons. It's no wonder the First had to step up to fix the mess this 'Hero' has caused."

The blood drains from Samantha's face. "Th-the First Emperor? He's- he's working now?"

Gressil chuckles. "Kukuku... you don't know? Ah, that's right, you've been away from home for a while, haven't you? The pests have risen to fight the demons, and until recently, they were cleaning us right up! But thanks to the power of the First, we're taking back the Labyrinth from the worthless meatbags."

Samantha's eyes widen as she looks at me. "This explains a lot..." Her voice is nearly a whisper. "The First Emperor is aiding the demons now. Unless you help them, the humans are finished."

The monstrous demon chuckles again. "Now you see the error of your ways. If you'll be so kind as to give me my prisoner back, I'll overlook this transgression. The First doesn't need to know about your betrayal." He snickers to himself and turns to Cassiel. "I look forward to hearing your whimpering and begging once more. It has been quite boring without you to entertain me. You were always my favorite, you know."

"I've had just about enough of this." I take a step forward and reach toward him, but Cassiel bats my hand away.

"No, Hero. Violence isn't the answer. I don't hate Gressil. He may be a monster, but he's not a monster just because he's a demon. Samantha has shown me that much. As bad as Gressil is, I won't take revenge, and I won't let him control my life. I'm free, now."

Gressil blinks twice. "You're not afraid of me? As if you think I can't see your soft, pale flesh trembling. You're quaking in terror. You remember the shape of my claws, the ripping of my talons against your skin. I doubt the scars have healed, especially the ones in your heart."

Cassiel shakes her head. "I'm not scared of you. In a way, I... I pity you. When I was alone in that cell, I hated knowing you would return- but at the same time, I wanted you there, rather than the silent emptiness around me. In a way, you were my only friend. If you hadn't been there, I would have withered away and died."

Gressil's usual confidence cracks slightly. "A friend? Impossible. Who could be friends with their torturer? You sound delusional! Perhaps your mind cracked under an eternity of torture. Breaking you was always one of my deepest desires... and it would seem I achieved that goal."

"You're sick. A vile evil creature." Samantha hisses the words out and clenches her fist, but Cassiel stops her again.

"He can't help the way he is, Sammy. If there's anyone I should hate, it's humans. Many humans experimented on myself and the other angels, through awful periods of pain and suffering that would make you weep. Gressil, however, was just one demon. He doesn't represent the rest of them. From what I know of demons, they follow a hierarchy, so he was assigned to be a prison warden, and that's what he became. He adapted to his job, and he enjoyed it. He made the best of a bad situation."

Samantha and I both are in shock. She's the first to verbalize. " The best of a bad situation? Cass, he's a psychopathic monster. You're being way too forgiving here."

"Yes, but that's my choice." Cassiel takes a tentative step toward the menacing demon. "Gressil, sometimes you scare me, but I still forgive you. I would consider you an ally, even, if you were to change your ways."

For once, the monstrous demon is at a loss for words. "You...! I can't just- what?! Foolish little-!"

He stutters and stammers, and I stare at Cassiel in shock. "You take pacifism to a new level, Cass. This is out of the ordinary, even for you."

She shakes her head. "It's not like that, Hero. I have to lead by example. You're always itching for a fight, and you always want to solve problems with your fists, but that's not the right way to do things. If I can't forgive Gressil, I can't teach you how to put an end to war."

Gressil finally seems to have cleared his head. He sighs. "I suppose in the end, I didn't break you. I'll just have to torture you more and more, until I finally do."

A glint appears in his eye. Gressil lunges forward with his tail, aiming to wrap around Cassiel's throat just as he did to me. Before I can react, Samantha dashes forward, batters his tail out of the way, and delivers a colossal blow to his abdomen. A violent explosion of blood blasts out behind him and a wave of energy rocks the room around us. Gressil's feet talons dig into the ground, somehow holding him in place for a second before his upper body rips from his legs and smashes into the wall on the other side of the room.

Not a sound escapes his lips at any point during the brutal slaughter.

Cassiel stares at his corpse numbly. "Sam... Sam... why? You shouldn't have interfered. I- I was going to change him!"

Samantha shakes her head, and when she turns back to look at Cassiel and me, I notice the amount of brown blood covering the front of her body. "You're wrong. Gressil was set in his ways. He would have hurt you, and I can't allow that. Fellow demon or not, you matter more to me than he does. If someone tries to cause you harm, I'll end them."

Cassiel's lip quivers as she fights back tears. "I can- I can protect myself! Hero has given me all this energy, this power! I could have destroyed Gressil with a thought... it wasn't about whether I was in danger, it was about my conviction! Why can't you see that?!" The sadness in her voice turns to anger as the tears finally roll down. "I wanted to show you that love conquers hatred! All you've done is show that anger leads to more violence!"

As Cassiel yells, images from a memory I can't place of her destroying Gressil with an energy beam enter my mind. "She's right, Samantha. This was her battle to fight. You've hurt her by undoing her act of forgiveness. I'm glad you stood up for Cass, but that was the wrong way to do it."

Samantha pivots and glowers at me. "You're taking her side in this? Gressil was going to attack her, and you would have let him do it! Where's your masculine pride and chivalry?"

Cassiel quickly calms down, though she can't stop staring at Gressil's warm, quivering corpse. "Sammy, he was no danger to me. You jumped the gun, and now he's dead. You didn't have to do that, and shouldn't have. Is that what you're going to do when we see the humans? Are you going to kill every demon that has a bone to pick with the last remaining angel?"

"Well... no..." Samantha's indignation softens and is replaced with embarrassment. "I wouldn't go that far."

"Then think before you punch." Having delivered her verbal backhand, Cassiel sighs deeply. "Well, what's done is done. He's dead." She squints at the body. "I didn't even see you move. Are you really that fast?"

Samantha smiles slightly. "Strong, too. You know that the Emperors are the strongest of all demons, right? Even powered up by the First, Gressil never stood a chance."

"Good to know," I mutter quietly. "Let's get a move on. Our little detour has cost us more time, but luckily this room is close to the entrance to Hero City. We'll be there sooner than you expect."

Both girls nod, and as we head out the opposite exit, Cassiel turns back to Gressil's corpse one last time. "Sometimes I'm not sure why I even bother."

Part 444c: Commander Unit

It's the shiver down my spine that gives his sudden appearance away, long before I turn around and spot the killer robot. I rub my arms just as my eyes meet Ionis's single, beady red diode. Samantha and Cassiel turn around only a second later and spot him too.

"Uh... Ionis? What are you doing here? Weren't you in the cargo hold when I left with the girls?"

I'm surprised he managed to find us. The Labyrinth is a maze of twisting corridors, shifting walls and hallways that move around dynamically. Only an evil genius could have made a tunnel network that outdoes a million stacked together Rubik's Cubes at boggling the mind.

Ionis swivels his eye from each of the girls to me, and only now do I realize he's cradling that damn duck in his arms.

THIS SENTINEL UNIT'S HIGHEST PRIORITY IS PROTECTING THE FEMALE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC. ONCE YOUR ABSENCE WAS DISCOVERED, THIS SENTINEL IMMEDIATELY MOVED TO LOCATE YOU.

Samantha nudges me. "What's Stinky saying?"

She still calls him that? "He followed us to protect Cassiel. I guess he brought her duck, too."

Cassiel squees and hops giddily as she takes Howard away from Ionis. "I was worried that OMEN was going to forget to feed him, but now it won't be a problem! Thanks, Ionis, you're so sweet!"

My hands slowly rub together as I eye the giant death-machine down. "Yeah, Ionis, thanks for bringing the duck. How'd you find us, anyway?"

I LOCATED YOUR UNIQUE ENERGY SIGNATURES AND RAPIDLY TRAVELED TO THIS LOCATION VIA USAGE OF MY INCINERATOR BEAM.

"Incinerator beam?" It takes me a few seconds, but I suddenly realize what he means. Pulling up my mental map, I'm stunned to see a giant hole straight from the portal to Voldarius Prime straight to our current location. When I look past the robot, I spot a gaping hole sliced into the wall at the end of the tunnel. "Holy hell."

Samantha sees what I'm looking at and gets the picture before I can even explain. "Did he really cut a path directly here? Satan would be pissed if he found out. The Labyrinth is ruined." A pause as she taps her lip. "Well, the Labyrinth will repair the hole given time. It'll probably take a day or two at most. I'm overexaggerating, as usual."

Howard warks and Cassiel looks more thoughtful than usual. "The Labyrinth repairs itself? How does that work?"

"Magic." Samantha chuckles. "It feeds off trace amounts of the energy of its inhabitants and slowly expands over time, while also repairing any damage it suffers. It's much more versatile than his first Labyrinth. Easier to hide from invaders, too."

"Because of the shifting hallways?" I give her a look that says yes, I know about those.

"Mhm."

She doesn't say anything else, but I get the picture. Satan built this Labyrinth. No wonder it's so annoying. Even dead, he's a nuisance.

After a few moments, I turn back to Ionis. "Well, I guess if you're here, you're here. I kinda didn't want to bring you in front of the humans, but if they have anti-energy, you might be useful in a fight."

"Not that we'll be fighting," Cassiel says with a suspicious look on her face. "I think there's already been enough of that."

"Yeah, haha." Samantha giggles nervously.

As we turn back to the great door that leads inside Hero City, I glance at the duck in Cassiel's arms. "Ionis, why'd you bring the duck, anyway? Seems kinda pointless to me."

THOSE WERE THE COMMANDER UNIT'S ORDERS.

"Uh, no?" I cock my head back and shoot a quizzical look at him. "I never said anything of the sort."

THE HUMAN-TYPE ORGANIC KNOWN AS JASON HIRO IS NOT THE COMMANDER UNIT.

Now I'm really confused. "Okay, who is, then?"

THE COMMANDER UNIT IS DESIGNATED HYPER-INTELLIGENT UNKNOWN-CLASS UNIT DESIGNATED 'HOWARD'.

Several seconds. Perhaps ten. That's how long I silently stare at Ionis. Taking a step to the side, I wrap my arm around Samantha's shoulder and whisper quietly to her.

"Hey. Sam."

She gives me a weird look but keeps her voice low. "What? Did he say something?"

"The death robot that can exterminate entire species thinks the duck is the commander unit."

"Oh." Samantha looks unconvinced. "He said that?"

"Mhm."

Sam's eyes flick to Cassiel, who is politely keeping out of our whispered conversation, but seems annoyed she isn't being included.

"That's the dumbest thing I've ever heard."

I nod. "My thoughts exactly. Should we tell Cass?"

"She might actually believe him. It'll go to her head. Better make up something else."

"I don't know if I can think of anything right now. I'm still in shock."

"You're a smart guy. Use your other head if you have to."

"Clever girl."

Carefully shambling past Samantha, I slide over to Cass. "Ionis has declared his eternal, undying love for you. I didn't want to tell you because it seemed so out of left field, but now you know why he never says anything to you and Samantha. He's shy around girls."

"Ohhh." Cassiel's eyes light up. "That does make sense, now that I think about it."

Oh my god. She took the bait.

Nodding slowly, I turn back to stare at Ionis, ignoring Cassiel's oohs and ahhs as she meditates on the importance of being a good wife to a genocidal murder machine.

"Your secret is safe with me, Ionis."

Ionis stares me down. WHAT IS LOVE?

I guess he heard me whispering to Samantha.

"It's what you feel toward Cassiel. Let's get a move on. My head is going to explode if I hear any more about your latest... opinions." A snicker from Samantha makes me whirl to face her. "I mean the head on my shoulders. Your mind is filthy."

Blankly, I turn and stare at the door. It still hasn't hit me that the Sentinel follows the orders of a fucking duck, but it certainly explains why he's not half as intelligent as OMEN. OMEN would never say something so dumb even if he were ordered to.

Coiling up the muscles in my arm, I give the colossal, towering doors a shove, and they quickly swing open.

The light spills out into the hallway, and a group of men in uniform spin and spot us. The door guardsmen I set to guard the entrance, it seems, and they noticed us immediately. Looks like discipline hasn't slackened since I left.

"You! Who goes there?" An Arabian looking man steps forward, wearing a grey and blue uniform, with the symbol of a winged tiger on his chest. His flat cap is colored a dark maroon, and judging by his muscles, he stays fit.

He quickly looks at Cassiel, then me, but when his gaze turns to Samantha, his eyes size her up and down, but they don't freeze on her chest as most men do, but instead on her tail. "Wench, are you a demon? No demons allowed. You're lucky I'm a tolerant fellow, or I'd have a platoon here in an instant. As for the man..." He turns to glare at me. "No horns, no tail, but if you think that dark skin and the glowing tattoos don't out you as an Animus, you'd be quite wrong. Two demons, an angel, and a robot. If you leave at once, I won't do anything hasty."

Everything he's just said makes no sense at all. It takes me a couple seconds to come up with an answer. "What do you mean, 'no demons allowed'? Who came up with a stupid rule like that?"

His eyes widen, and he puts his hands on his hips. The other men behind him slowly reach for their small-arms, and one spits a cigar on the ground. "Well well, seems someone's a little behind on the times. Do you take me for a fool, animus? We haven't taken a single one of your kind for weeks. If you don't leave in five seconds, you'll think death was a mercy."

His arrogance is starting to piss me off. "I'm not an animus, nor am I a demon. I'm Hero, you moron. The one who founded this city, Hero City. The one who freed humanity. Don't tell me that after one month everyone's gone and forgotten my face so quickly."

The look of contempt on his face loses a tiny bit of its bite as he squints and studies me for a few moments. "You don't look anything like him. I worked with one of his clones for a while, before the Clone Wars. In fact, you look like his polar opposite. Anyway, even if you are Hero, we certainly don't want you here. That's why the king banished you, fool."

"Banished me?" Now I'm bewildered. "Since when?!"

"You call yourself 'Hero,' and you don't even know? Obviously for tearing the city apart with your damned clones. How short do you think our memories are? You even planted demon traitors in our midst, assuming you're actually him."

One of the other guys, a morbidly obese man wearing what can only be described as several layers of blankets, coughs into his hand. "You tell him, Renji. Ain't got no room for magical mumbo-jumbo or scum-suckin' demon trash in our fair city."

Cassiel gnashes her teeth. "How rude! Despicable! And you call yourselves human?! Humans are supposed to be compassionate and empathetic, not bigoted and filled with irrational hatred! Just because you're warring with the demons doesn't mean all demons are bad! Hero built this city with his magic, and he freed you from the clutches of that snake lady person! You owe him your lives, and your respect!"

"I don't owe you three a goddamn thing!" Renji lashes out and steps toward us as he reaches for an anti-energy pistol at his side. "Demons tried to kill the king after we gave them safe harbor! Hero and his clones trashed this city! Demons killed many of my friends! Don't come asking us for safe harbor and act like you can lord over us with a false identity!"

He draws his pistol, and I've had enough. " Sleep. "

"What?" The last thing he says before his eyes slam shut is somewhat anticlimactic. He flops to the ground, as do all the other men at the entrance.

"The hell is going on?" I glance back at Ionis. "From this point forward, you are not to attack or harm anyone at all, unless they incapacitate all three of us. I'll handle whatever happens myself. Understand?"

Ionis looks from me to Howard and back again. THE ORDER CONTRADICTS THE COMMANDER UNIT'S ORDERS. THIS SENTINEL UNIT WILL NOT COMPLY.

It takes all of my control not to facepalm so hard my palm crashes through my skull and reduces my brain to jelly. "If you attack the humans or anger them, they will turn their full might against us, including Cassiel, and she might die. Do you want-" I pause and remember what I told her earlier. "Do you want Cassiel, your lover, to die? That's what will happen if you piss them off. Isn't that right, Howard?"

I turn to the duck and whisper under my breath " Agree. " Immediately, the duck nods.

This satisfies Ionis. UNDERSTOOD. THIS SENTINEL UNIT WILL COMPLY WITH THE ORDER NOT TO HARM ANY OF THE HUMAN-TYPES IN THIS AREA.

He really does take orders from the duck. My head hurts.

Quickly, we step over the bodies and an idea occurs to me. "This is just a temporary measure. Disguise. Disguise. Disguise. Disguise. "

Aiming my mind at each of the girls and myself, I remove my odd tattoos, make Samantha's tail invisible and cover her up a little bit so she doesn't stand out, and hide Cassiel's wings and glow. Somehow, she looks less regal and queenly without them.

"Ew, clothes." Samantha writhes uncomfortably, as if the few extra scraps of fabric were made up entirely of maggots and flesh-eating bacteria. "Do I have to?"

Cassiel reaches behind herself and bumps something invisible. "My wings are still there?"

"It's just a disguise. Samantha has her tail, too. I could morph them away if I need to, but I think both of you wouldn't feel right. As for-" I pause, realizing Ionis hasn't changed at all. I intended for him to turn into a giant Russian man, but nothing happened. "Ionis, why don't you look different?"

His eye swivels down and examines his chassis. THIS SENTINEL UNIT IS COATED IN A MICROSCOPIC LAYER OF THE SUBSTANCE DESIGNATED 'ANTI-ENERGY.' ENERGY OTHER THAN TYPE ONE WILL BE NULLIFIED AS A RESULT.

"Everyone and their mother has anti-energy these days," I mutter under my breath. "If I bring you with us, you'll stick out like a sore thumb."

Samantha suddenly looks excited. "I have an idea! Make a bunch of fake skin, then put it on him and cover him up with a bunch of robes. He'll still stand out, but people will just think he's a blind man following after us or something."

I nod. "Good idea. Not perfect, but anything will do."

Several minutes later, I stare in disgust at the final product. "If anyone asks, he's a mute acid-attack victim."

Cassiel slowly licks her lips. "He's maybe the most disgusting thing I've seen in my life."

"I think it's an improvement," Samantha jokes with a wry smile. "At least he looks less robotic."

"He looks like a Terminator that got half-melted during time travel." A pang of sickness ripples in my stomach as I eye the freakish lumps and folds of skin covering the metal frame. "At this point, the robes are for my protection. I don't want to have to look at you."

After wordsmithing some giant shirts, pants, and a bunch of cloaks, I can barely see under his hood. His eye is covered, but when I ask if he can still see, he responds with: THIS SENTINEL UNIT IS CAPABLE OF SENSING THE ENVIRONMENT IN ANY DIRECTION FOR UP TO 1000KM IF THE SITUATION CALLS FOR IT.

I guess that's a yes.

The door closes behind us as I use my wordsmithing to seal it up and hide the sleeping men under tarps, and we begin to make our way downtown.

Immediately, I realize this isn't the Hero City I left a month ago. Before, it was a bustling metropolis, with buildings multiple stories tall and a Victorian feel to it, combined with an aesthetic similar to Arthurian and Viking legends. Chapels to unknown gods, marketplaces filled with food grown offworld, many such things were part of this capital I once knew.

But now...

A child sits on a stool, a glum expression on his face, as he slowly lowers and raises his foot in and out of a shallow puddle of mud. His clothes are ragged, and his demeanor is that of defeat. Sadly, he is not the only one. Aside from a few women quietly chatting with each other in a group, the street full of people has a despondent depression hanging in the air. It's only when I spot a man in a military uniform leaning on crutches, with a bandaged leg, missing one of his hands, and trying awkwardly to make the crutches work for him, do I realize just how bad things have become.

Samantha inhales slowly. "I wasn't here long, but the place has certainly changed. The war must be worsening for the humans."

At least she doesn't sound happy about it. Cassiel pats Howard's head. "I'm going to go talk with that little boy over there." Saying this, she takes off to the boy splashing in the mud puddle. Samantha and I watch curiously as she bends down and flashes her radiant smile at him. Despite whatever was making him sad, he's delighted to see such a beautiful woman talking to him. Not even twelve years old, and the poor lad looked like he was on the verge of suicide until she showed up.

A minute later, her smile is gone. The boy's is, too.

She finally trudges back over to us. "Both of his parents were in the military. Demons killed them. He's been an orphan for only a week."

Samantha's gaze lowers. "I'm sorry to hear that. War is hard on both sides."

"Sounds like the demons are putting up quite a fight." I scratch my nose and stare at the boy whose eyes are fixated entirely on Cassiel. "Did he say anything else?"

"He doesn't like demons. Nobody does. They tried to kill King Cody, but he survived." Cass pauses and glances at Sam before continuing. "All the demons have been taken away."

"What does that mean?" Samantha tries desperately to hide a look of revulsion but fails miserably.

"He didn't know. He's just a child, after all. Wherever the demons are being taken, they never return."

As if a blizzard had just decided to sweep through the alley, I rub my arms as a strange coldness falls over me. "Is this really Cody, the man who led the Gold Battalion? Didn't you work with him, Samantha? I didn't think he was like this."

She lightly chews on her thumb. "I don't know. He loved torching Grez. He saw the power I could unleash. If he was attacked by demons, anything is possible."

Cassiel sets Howard on the ground, and he hops up and down, warking in front of her. "We should pay him a visit, don't you think? Let's get to the bottom of this and-"

"MAKE WAY!" A man shouts, his voice filled with alarm. "Clear the streets! We've got wounded incoming!"

As if by magic, every man, woman, and child leaps into doorways and alleys, leaving just the four of us dumbfounded as the sound of marching feet, like hail on a stone roof, come stomping toward us from further down the street. Dozens, if not hundreds of soldiers move toward us, hauling hundreds of other men and women on stretchers or other medical mobility devices. The three of us quickly start to move to the side, but Ionis continues standing perfectly still like an idiot.

"Ionis! Get over here! Stop standing in the street!" Cassiel hisses at him, and he quickly complies, stepping into the doorway along with us.

The soldiers march past, looks of pain and mental wounds apparent on their faces. One man weeps and clutches an ice pack to his face, and a gaping burn wound just barely sticks out from under his hand.

It takes many minutes as the horde of women and men washes past us, but soon, they're gone.

An old lady steps out onto the street and sighs. "How many did we lose today?"

Another responds in kind. "Too many. Did you see the boy? How can they send such young children out to fight?"

"He's sixteen. That's old enough for the king."

A bum sitting across the street chuckles. "At least it ain't me." He slurps down a mystery liquid in a metal canister hanging from his side. "I'm done sticking my neck out for that no-good tyrant."

"You never did in the first place! And that 'tyrant' is protecting us!" Both old women glower at the bum, but he just shrugs.

"Yeah, sure looks like he's doin' a mighty fine job. Demons'll tear us to pieces in a month or two. At least the rum will dull the pain."

"Ignore him, Agatha. Lee's always like this." The second woman pulls the first away, and both of them quickly scurry over to a market stall where some suspect-looking tomatoes are being sold, all the while shooting dirty looks at the old bum.

Samantha and Cassiel both look at each other, then at me. "The people seem divided about the King," Cassiel says, "and the war isn't going well either by the sound of it."

The succubus shrugs and leans against the wall. "Once the First Emperor became involved, the humans lost immediately. It's just a matter of time."

"Not if I can help it." I pull both of them along with me, and Ionis follows close behind us. "It's time we paid the king a little visit. I think he'll be unhappy about what I have to say."

As we pass a building that smells like a fermented outhouse, one thought comes to my mind:
What tore apart Hero City in the single month I've been gone?

Part 445c: Meet The King

Stealth was on the table for at least a minute. I considered sneaking into the palace to see what was going on, but then it occurred to me that this is Hero City, named after me, the one who saved it. Even if a few morons think I was banished, or a few guards don't recognize me, I'm still ultimately the highest authority here.

With that in mind, I decide to take the bold strategy and walk in through the front door. The lofty stone wall and gate in front of the palace is a surprise, as are the security guards in front of it. Those weren't there when I left.

"Who goes there?" A greeting identical to the one I received when I entered Hero City is uttered by a blonde woman with a commanding presence. Along with a couple strongmen at each side of the closed gate, she looks to be someone large and in charge.

"I'm Hero. The guy who freed this city from Bahamut. I need to speak with King Cody."

Her lip twitches. "I would remind you that His Excellency is now being referred to by his last name, Elshard. In any case, I do not recognize you." Her eyes flick to Samantha and Cassiel, who both look like humans now, then to Ionis, whose humongous body is hidden under rags and blankets to the extent even his face is invisible. His glowing red eye is shielded, of course.

"Right. King Elshard. Well, if you don't know my face me, perhaps a third party will?" I glance down at my arm just to check and see if my glowing tattoos are visible, but they aren't.

Samantha pipes up. "I worked with a man named Saul, directly under Cody- err, King Elshard, for a while. This was before he was king. Saul, Gunther, either one can confirm our identities."

The blonde woman's demeanor instantly becomes more somber. "Ah, I regret to inform you that as of five days ago, Gold Division Leader, Saul Lorenz, was killed by a demonic ambush. We lost many good men and women in that battle. He won't be able to vouch for you."

Samantha doesn't seem particularly hurt by the news. "That's unfortunate. He was a good man."

The woman brings her hands together and scratches her wrist. "Gunther, as I recall, is out on a field mission. However, since there is a small chance you truly are the one known as 'Hero,' then I will escort you to the king. You should consider yourself fortunate since most others would spit on you, given a chance. I consider myself a pragmatist."

Delightful. "If you don't mind me asking, since I've been gone for a little while, did anything change? Or rather, I know a lot has changed, but I don't know what exactly. I've even heard rumors that the 'King' banished me."

The woman turns to one of the guards and nods, and he quickly hustles away, before she turns back to me. "I really shouldn't be telling you this, nor should I have to, but things are working out quite poorly for humanity. Assuming you are 'Hero,' and I still have no proof for that claim, you left us in quite the mess. The so-called Clone War devastated the palace and took quite some time to clean up. After that, several demons gathered together and rose up to try and assassinate the king, but he managed to survive. Naturally, it was Gold Battalion Leader Saul who stopped the insurrection."

Several thoughts occur to me. "Why would you say that the palace was devastated? I repaired the damage with my magic after the fight."

She gives me a long stare. "I wasn't working in the palace, so I wouldn't know. Based on the condition of the rest of the city, however, I assume your claim is false."

Cassiel clutches Howard a little tighter. "We did leave rather abruptly. I thought it was odd you wanted to get out of Hero City so quickly, Hero."

Now I'm really confused. "That- that's not right at all! I repaired the damage! Furthermore, the rest of the city wasn't even affected! I battled Hope and limited the scope of the battle to the Palace only, then I absorbed him after the battle. I didn't seriously hallucinate all of that, did I?"

Samantha's expression is uncomfortable. "Well, your memory is certainly a little spotty..."

"To say the least," Cassiel says, finishing Samantha's thought for her.

I don't know what to think. The story they're feeding me is different from the one I remember. It's inaccurate. Or is it? I've been having those nightmares, lately. There were the things I predicted that would happen before they did... the missing statues in the room I found Hoarhiim, that memory of Gressil being killed by Cassiel. It can't all just be a bunch of elaborate coincidences. I don't even drink or do drugs!

Before I can pry for more information, several armored men walk up from our right side, and the blonde woman nods at them. "Escort these four to see the king. Keep an eye on the large one, he looks suspicious." She turns back to me. "I'm sure the king will be delighted to say hello, but don't be surprised if he's a little cranky."

I merely nod at her, a feeling of disorientation in my mind. "Yeah... thanks. I'll do that."

The armored soldiers surround us and hug their guns to their chests to look intimidating, but not a single one in our group is impressed. I ignore them, and as we head through the gate,

Cassiel nudges me. "You doing okay? I'm surprised you forgot what happened."

"I didn't forget." I keep my voice calm. "Something's going on. It's like I'm in the right place, but things are off. They aren't correct. I know I absorbed Hope, then repaired the palace. That isn't a figment of my imagination."

Cassiel raises an eyebrow. "You absorbed him? You said you killed him, and that you 'wanted to make sure it hurt.'"

"I said that?" My confusion is reaching panic-inducing levels. "That can't be right. It can't!"

The front of the palace looms large before me. It looks the same as I remember, identical to how I repaired it, even. The gargoyle statues on the corners, along with the flat top give it a feel to something like a modern art museum, but at the same time, the regalia of the people walking around gives it a sensation of belonging to royalty. Even the gaudy gold chandeliers as we step inside aren't out of place.

The more we walk, the uneasier I feel. The palace is the same, the city looks basically the same, but the events leading up to now are different. If my memory was faulty, would I know? Am I secretly schizophrenic?

Doorways into other rooms slip past as the four of us, along with our half-dozen guards march down the hallway toward the throne room at the end. "Cass. Am I different, compared to how I was before? That is, before we left Hero City. Do you remember?"

She shrugs. "You seem the same as ever."

Somehow, that isn't reassuring. Cassiel doesn't seem the same. She was somewhat timid up until the day I started having those strange nightmares. She's much less shy than before, and what about Samantha? Would she really kill Gressil to protect an angel? Eh, that sounds accurate enough. I can see that making sense. I knew Cassiel better than I did Samantha, after all.

How strange. I keep thinking about them in the past tense, as if they aren't the same girls I know and love. The mind is a weird thing...

The throne room door looms ahead. One of the soldiers jogs ahead of us and speaks to a man at the front. The older man, with his white uniform, long white hair, and long white beard, looks like something of a Chinese guru. His skin is in exceptional condition though and makes him look much younger than he actually is. He nods to the soldier before leisurely strolling up to us. It barely takes him a second to evaluate me. "Yes, you are certainly 'Hero.' It has been a while since I worked with one of your clones. I am the king's Vizier, Hui Ling. Why have you returned?"

I guess he is a Chinese guru. His question strikes me more as an interrogative question than a bit of friendly catching up, so I play it safe. "I've heard humanity isn't holding up against the demons. I wanted to speak with King Cody- err, rather, King..." I pause as I search for his name. Glancing back, I shoot a look at Samantha, but she shakes her head. She's already forgotten!

Cassiel hacks into her fist. "Elshard."

That was it. I turn back to Hui Ling, a look of embarrassment on my face. "...King Elshard. Right. Anyway, I wanted to speak to him and see if I can help."

"How noble of you." Hui's expression doesn't change. "You are in luck. The king is relaxing in the courtyard, and has concluded with his other visitors. Please follow me and I will take you there."

Oh don't bother, I'll just teleport there and save you the trouble, I think to myself. That would be rude though, so I don't. Still, I want to.

It only takes a few minutes for the four of us to follow after the old man to the courtyard. He dismissed our soldier escorts already, apparently feeling they weren't necessary. I finally spot Cody sitting on a bench, poking a stick into a lily pad floating on a pond aimlessly. A fly buzzes around him, but he ignores it.

What immediately catches my eye though, is Cody's face. A disgusting patch of brown flesh rests on his right side, crawling from his hairline down his face and to his chin. A burn mark, it appears, as if his face were thrust into a roaring fire. The entire right side of his face is a mass of mottled flesh, and what can only be described as deep claw marks line the other side. His brown hair has grown out substantially, and he has it pulled down to try and hide the scars, but it does a pitiful job of that.

As we approach, Cody's eyes slowly raise until he's looking right at me. "You."

It's a single word, and the tone is empty of emotion, but at the same time, I sense an unthinkable amount of anger put into the 'greeting.'

"Uh... hi." I feel suddenly awkward, as the man I crowned king after he helped me retake the palace from King Adams stares at me intensely. He doesn't blink and merely gazes into my eyes, as if trying to send a silent message to me.

Hui Ling crosses his arms in front of himself, tucking his hands into the folds on his long sleeves. "My King, as you have already discerned, this is the man known as Hero. I thought it impolite to refuse his audience. However, I can send him away if you-"

"Leave us." Cody cuts off his Vizier, then slowly stands up. His balance is shaky, and his knees quake for a split second before he shudders to his full height.

"As you wish." Hui Ling bows and strolls off, leaving the four of us with his king.

'King Elshard', as he calls himself now, rubs his palms together. "Back so soon? Didn't cause enough damage the first time?" His voice is ragged and hoarse, like he's been swallowing thumbtacks, or as if he has the world's worst cold.

"I don't know what's going on. When I left Hero City, I repaired everything back to new and instated you as king. Now the past seems to have changed, and I left the place in tatter. I sincerely want to apologize if I did such a thing."

He ignores my apology. "'If,' you say? You didn't just leave the city you 'saved' from your other self in shambles, it was devastated. We had to spend a valuable week's worth of military-grade replication just to rebuild from the rubble. It left us weakened, especially when your pet demons betrayed us." Cody gnashes his teeth together. "And now you have the gall to return and spin a half-baked lie, saying you actually fixed the city? My memory must be faulty, Hero. I don't remember anything of the sort."

His anger is understandable, given his version of events. The problem is that his memories don't mesh with mine. He might as well be accusing a different person entirely.

"I'm sorry. I don't know what came over me. I remember feeling awful about-" I shoot a glance at Cassiel before looking back, "-about killing my clone. It must have, uh, filled me with guilt. I just, kinda, had to leave. I'm back now though, and I'm ready to solve the problems facing the city."

"How nice of you to come back. And now we all join hands and spin in a circle singing a song, right?" Cody tosses his hands in the air. "Oh, and my face thanks you for your parting gift. You left us with monsters in our midst, and they nearly killed me. Was that an accident too? Are you a backstabber, or just incompetent?"

His words sting, but I don't let them affect me. After all, it wasn't me who did those things, it was someone else. Better to apologize profusely and move forward from here out. "Demons attacked you, right? Any idea who they were?"

The king sighs, annoyed that I'd have the nerve to ask him such a question, but he answers anyway. "All demons look the same to me. However, one of them, the leader, was your personal servant. Beldebubs, or whatever his name was. He orchestrated the whole thing, hit me with a blast of fire when I wasn't looking."

Beelzebub? He does hate humans, but I strictly ordered him not to hurt them, and he can't disobey my orders. "Where is he now? Did you kill him?"

"Of course not! I'm not a savage like those animals! I sent him and all the other demons lurking among humanity to the work camps. He can toil and chip at rocks all day. It's a worse punishment than death!"

Samantha shifts uncomfortably. I can tell she wants to speak her mind, but she's keeping quiet for my sake.

Questions enter my mind and leave at a frantic rate. "You were attacked by a few demons, and you punished all of them by putting them in work camps. Don't you think that was a bit extreme? Just because there are a few rotten apples doesn't mean you should treat all of them as criminals."

Rage fills Cody's aura. "Of course they are! All demons are the same! They tear our men to shreds on the battlefield, then try to slit our throats after we extend them a modicum of kindness! They eat the flesh of humans and seek our total destruction! If there is one thing I know about demons, it's that they are all filthy, mangy dogs! I'll put them all down like the rabid animals they are!"

A noise to my side makes me turn and realize tears are filling Samantha's eyes. "Cody... how could you say that? We worked together. We fought the Grez together! How could you forget the experiences we shared, and lump me in with them?!" She pounds on her chest angrily. "We aren't all monsters! Many good demons have no quarrel with humans! You've punished friends of mine for acts of violence they had nothing to do with! Don't you see that's wrong?!"

Cody's angered expression lessens as he gazes at her slowly, squinting a little bit. "You're a demon?" He quickly turns to me. "You brought a demon here? To my palace?! It seems you are in league with the monsters after all!"

I don't get a chance to respond. Samantha lunges forward and slaps the king lightly, a term I use to indicate a force not quite strong enough to dent a plank of wood. It still sends Cody sprawling to the side as he loses his balance and tumbles to the ground, hitting his head on the soft dirt.

Samantha's eyes, still filled with tears, hold an additional layer of rage. "You bastard! There's only one monster here, and it isn't me! You wouldn't be anything if it weren't for Hero! He saved your life and all of humanity! You owe him everything, and you owe me at least a shred of respect for the time we spent together! If I have to hit you again, I'll knock your goddamned head off!"

It takes several moments before Cody can even form a coherent response. She walloped him so hard the blow nearly knocked him out. "Wha...?"

Slowly, he reaches for the bench to pull himself up. "You- you hit me."

Samantha's rage is already dissipated. "Yeah. Sure did. It felt good, too."

"A demon struck me."

While he mumbles and mutters to himself, I glance around his inner courtyard. Not a soul in sight, not even a single guard. You'd think a man this paranoid about demons would have some security, in case their king was bitch-slapped by a succubus.

"You deserve it. Asshole." Samantha crosses her arms, and Cody turns to look at her again, as he sits on the bench.

A spark of recognition appears in his eyes. "Samantha? Is that you? You... look different."

Apparently, her strength was unforgettable. She nods. "More clothes. Hero also made my tail invisible. You probably didn't recognize my face because you were always looking at my tits."

Cody nods numbly. "Yeah. Something like- like that." He wrings his hands together in his lap. "Since the attack, nobody has raised even a single objection. Nobody fights me about anything. Maybe that's why..." He trails off.

"Great. You're a masochist. I should have known." Samantha wipes her hand on her clothes, as if trying to remove the impression of his face from her palm. "Do I get at least an apology, or what?"

Cody reaches up and rubs the burned part of his face, where Samantha hit him. "Your slap caused me little pain. All the sensation in my face is gone. I'm still luckier than those who died, but- I can't feel anything but anger anymore. I haven't smiled in forever."

Cassiel fidgets next to me, then finally takes a hesitant step toward the king. "Um, you probably don't remember me either, but I'm the angel the previous king kidnapped. I was really grateful when you took Hero's side, even if you didn't really do much to save me. But um- anyway, I think I owe you something."

Saying that, Cassiel reaches into her bottomless well of energy, and sends a wave of healing magic to Cody's face. Within seconds, as if an invisible swarm of scar-eating parasites was attacking his face all at once, the burn marks begin to vanish, along with the gouges and cuts from those who attacked him. A strange feeling of wonder comes over me as I watch Cassiel work her magic. I could have done so as well with my Wordsmithing, but she didn't hesitate. This man who called her friend a monster just seconds before was worth healing, in her eyes. It wouldn't have even occurred to me for a while.

Cody gently touches his face and a look of awe passes over him. "What did you-" He pauses, suddenly realizing his voice isn't horse anymore. "-do?"

"Take a look." Cassiel gestures to the pond, and he leans over to look into it. His reflection appears, and the look of awe is replaced with a stunned silence.

It takes many long moments before he can speak again. "You... healed me? But why?"

"I've been hurt before, too," Cassiel stammers, as the words bring up painful memories. "When someone scars you, especially in such a brutal way, the wounds are much deeper than the flesh. Because the demons attacked and disfigured you, you projected your anger to all the other demons. It was irrational, stupid, and irresponsible, but I understand why you did it."

She glances away, at his reflection in the pond. "This is just the first step. I've healed your face, but the real damage is still there. Only you can fix it, King Elshard. You have to forgive those who hurt you and try to understand what led them to attack. Not even demons do such things without reasons or motive."

He blinks twice. "Are you saying it was my fault they attacked me? I angered them, so they had to get revenge?"

"No. I don't know what their motives were. Maybe their goals were irrational and hate-filled. Maybe they just wanted to kill you to strike fear into the hearts of humans. My point is that if you seek to understand what led them to attack you, you will be able to forgive them, and, by extension, the other demons you unjustly imprisoned." Cassiel turns to stare at him meaningfully. "And, in that way, you will be able to heal yourself. You will always be a shell until you can move on from the trauma."

Her words have an eerie wisdom to them, likely because she has already been there and done that. Cassiel knows what it means to feel hate, and then to let it go. She's a saint, a true angel.

"Wark." Howard breaks up the tender moment by struggling in Cassiel's arms until she sets him down, but he jumps into the pond and starts splashing around. I suppose he misses the feeling of water and swimming since that's what ducks like to do.

The duck quacking makes the fog in Cody's head vanish as he stares at the animal silently for a few moments. "I was wrong. I've hurt so many. I punished those who didn't deserve it."

He looks at Samantha. "I hurt you, too, with words sharper than a blade. I'm sorry."

Samantha nods. "I forgive you. Or rather, I will, once you undo the damage that's been done. Release the other demons at once. In the meantime, Hero is going to figure out how to stop the advance of the First Emperor."

Cody's mouth hangs slightly open. "First Emperor? What do you mean? I thought he was in hiding, or didn't care about the other demons."

"Same." Samantha leans against me and yawns. "He's a reclusive one. However, a demon 'friend' of mine confirmed the First is behind the recent attacks. With his power, he's sure to tear through the human ranks."

Cody's face whitens. "You're kidding. That- that's why so many demon attacks have devastated our ranks! They suddenly tripled in power, speed, and ferocity! Even anti-energy has a lesser effect on them than it did before! It's unreal how much more powerful they've become."

My cute succubus shrugs. "I don't know much about the First's powers or abilities. Well, I don't know anything, in fact. I'm never around when fun stuff happens, so I miss out."

"You know the First?" The king frowns. "I know you're a demon, but that seems a little..."

Cassiel coughs. "Don't be alarmed, but Samantha is actually the Second Emperor of the demons, Belial." She leans past me and pokes Sam in the arm. "She's a nice emperor though, not a mean one. Understand?"

"Uhh... huh..." He's unconvinced. "Whose side are you on again?"

"Mine," I answer for her. "And I'm on no-one's side. I just want to put an end to this war."

Cassiel nods, as she brushes a strand of hair from her face. "The cycle of violence must be broken, King Elshard. That won't happen until both sides let go of their hate and ancient rivalries. This includes you, as well as the demons."

Finally, King Cody understands. "Thank you. If you had only been here sooner, so much damage could have been prevented. I- I will have my troops release the demons from the work camps at once."

"I'll go there and speak with them," Samantha says. "As the Second Emperor, I hold much sway with members of my kind. I will do my best to smooth over the divisions. They've only been in the work camps for a few weeks, right?"

"Correct." Cody stands up, though he's still a bit wobbly from Samantha's slap. "Perhaps they will forgive me."

"If they won't, I'll make them." Samantha punches her palm suddenly, and her eager grin makes the hair on the back of my neck stand up.

"Don't," Cody says, as he shakes his head. "You can come with me, but no violence. The angel is correct. There has been enough violence."

A pattering sound behind me makes me glance back. The Vizier from earlier is breathlessly walking toward us.

"King Elshard! The demons! They've launched an assault on-" He pauses once he spots the king's face. "My liege? Is that really you?"

Cody nods. "Aye. The woman here is a friend of mine. She healed me. Let's not worry about that, though. The attack- where is it located?"

Hui Ling bows apologetically. "One of our outposts, sire. The demons number five thousand strong. Our men will be overrun by day's end if they don't get any reinforcements."

"Understood," Cody says, as he turns to me. "Hero, since you are back, we could use your military might. Can you assist us?"

Uneasiness appears in my belly. "Yeah. I'll get on it."

Samantha pulls away from me. "I'm going to the work camps. You and Cassiel can go by yourselves."

"We'll do that," Cassiel says, answering for me. "Maybe I can help the wounded."

The king nods soberly. "If there's one thing you can certainly do, it's that."

Part 446c: Prelude Of Light

"Hey! Ylvusk! Old buddy, old pal!"

A rumbling of agony, like that of a broodmother accidentally birthing too many spawn at once, blasts in my gut. Anytime Tvoorik comes running up to me with this much excitement on his face; I can tell it's going to be a stupid conversation.

" Hello, Tvoorik. What is it this time?" Hopefully, the annoyance in my voice isn't too noticeable.

Gently, I rub my assassin knife across my finger to test its sharpness as Tvoorik giddily jogs over to me. Well, I say 'giddily,' but only I could tell since I know him so well. It would be impossible to spot emotion on a shadow-walker's face if I wasn't already one. We look so scary to the uninitiated.

The lovable goof slows to a stop in front of me, a pained expression visible. "Whaddya mean 'this time'? You don't even know what I'm gonna say!"

"I'd bet five human souls it's some stupid theory about how we're all slaves to the demon emperors and part of a genocidal plot to have the lower ranks exterminated. It's always the same thing with you." I point my blade up one of the hallways. "Now's not a good time anyway. They're sending my group to assist the attack on one of the human outposts. We're going to clean up today, maybe even earn a mutation from the First."

Tvoorik waves his hand nonchalantly at me. "Pff, that stuff doesn't matter! They'll keep feeding you promises, maybe a tiny boost here and there to keep you chomping at the bit, but it never amounts to anything good! Once you know too much, you can't ever get the juicy mutations, like Oracle!" He pokes my arm, as if he's trying to get my attention, though I'm looking right at him. "Anyway, you're not gonna believe what I found out!"

Oh devils, here it comes. "What is it this time? What conspiracy have you uncovered that would have you hopping up and down like you've been on the no-blood diet for a month?"

Tvoorik blasts a toothy grin at me. "I finally have proof that this whole war is a sham! You know about the Volgrim, right?"

"Uh huh. Aliens. They pull the strings. You once theorized they existed because we weren't allowed to talk about them, even though we are. What about them?"

Tvoorik nods violently. "Yeah! Yeah! They don't exist. They're made up!"

Seven Hells. Even this is a new low for him. "And what proof do you have for that absurd claim?"

My 'friend' thumbs his chin. "It all adds up! Satan faked his death; then he invented these supposed aliens to keep us all distracted from his insidious agenda!"

I try my hardest not to facepalm. "But what proof do you have they don't exist?"

He snickers. "Have you ever seen a Volgrim in person?"

"No. Diablo has, though."

"He's a demon emperor! Of course he's in on the lie!"

"Right." My tongue snakes out and wets my lips. I could really go for a nice bite of tenderized female human. Maybe the left arm. "So, what, only the demon emperors have seen the Volgrim in person, and thusly that means they don't exist? What would lying about their existence prove? If they wanted to steal energy from humans and kill off the weaker members of demon society, they'd hardly have to resort to such a silly lie."

Tvoorik shakes his head hard enough to send droplets of sweat flying. "No no, you don't get it! They destroyed that planet! The demon emperors said a human did that, but humans can't use magic! Then they created the Volgrim so they'd have a scapegoat for when things get tough for the rest of us! They could say 'it's not our fault you have to give up a few essential liberties, blame the Volgrim!' and sheep like you would believe them!"

"Friend, you're babbling. Nothing you just said connects in the slightest. I can't even see the tentative strings that might link from one thing to another. I think you're going off the deep end."

He scoffs at me. "Cheh, you just can't understand my genius. It's taken decades, even millennia of research to learn all the secrets I know. My investigations have uncovered things that would blow your mind."

"Like what?"

My simple question makes him pause for a few seconds. I can easily see the gears turning in his mind as he tries to think of something. "Diablo is actually a female."

"You can't be serious."

"Bael is afraid of spiders."

"Are you even trying?"

"The Volgrim don't exist."

I've had enough. "You said that earlier! I'll bet that if nobody had ever told you about Volgrim, you'd think they did exist just because 'the powers' wouldn't tell you. You just want to believe the opposite of whatever conventional knowledge says!"

A voice behind me makes me jump in my skin. "That is an accurate assessment." Smealum, the Eldest Animus, stops just to my side and nods at us. "You two need to get going. We need all the help we can get taking those fleshbags down."

"Eldest Animus." I bow my head respectfully to him, but he waves me down.

"None of that, please. Let us start the assault. You're two very talented shadow-walkers, so we'll need you for a stealth mission."

Tvoorik is unconvinced. "Sending us to the frontlines to die, huh? It's because I know too much, isn't it?"

Smealum sighs. "It's not that, you crazy kook. The mission is to assassinate King Elshard, and it's essential we take him down. With him gone, the human power structure will collapse, and victory will be swift."

A spark of eagerness appears in Tvoorik's eye. "Ooh, so we have a special mission? What do we get if we succeed?"

A shrug. "Maybe you can be an Oracle. This assassination will seal the humans back in their cages for good, short of us also having to exterminate the Hero. You'll deserve a reward if you pull it off."

Tvoorik's enthusiasm vanishes instantly. "A suicide mission, is it? You wouldn't offer me the ability to know everything unless you were certain I'd fail. Hm, yes, that must be it."

"You're way too paranoid," Smealum says, as he shakes his head and stomps away. "I'll be at the rendezvous point. Diablo will deliver your orders personally."

Once Smealum is out of earshot, Tvoorik snickers. "It's because I know about the Volgrim. Or rather, the lack of Volgrim existing. They want to silence me. I bet Satan's behind this."

I grab him by the arm and start hauling him after me. "Save it for later. I don't need you exhausting me with your conspiracies before the mission's even started."

* * *

"Beelzebub?" A voice speaks from behind me, one belonging to a female. Women shouldn't be on this side of the camps, so I can only assume she's one of the human soldiers.

When I turn around, I'm surprised to see a face that most learned demons would instantly recognize. It takes me a few seconds to hide my surprise. "Lady Belial? The Second Emperor?"

Have the humans put you in the camps as well?"

A flicker of embarrassment surges through me as I glance at the pickaxe in my hand. My body is covered in sweat and grime, and my hands are stained black from the 'coal' these humans have us mine. What use are disgusting black rocks anyway? Digging them out of the ground is a waste of time and accomplishes nothing. Humans are such wasteful, disgusting creatures.

Belial squints to see me in the low light. "Do you know the human named 'Hero'?"

My body stiffens of its own accord. "I am... familiar with the name."

A man steps out from behind the Second Emperor. The camp supervisor. He has a look of trepidation on his face. "B-by the orders of King Elshard, all demons in the work camps are to be released at once. Your imprisonment was due to unfounded f-fears..."

He pauses, as if unsure he should even be saying the words. A letter in his hand, with a wax seal bearing the mark of the King, is unmistakable, even in this low light.

The Second Emperor coughs. "Ahem. Continue."

He nods and narrows his eyes as he reads the letter. "D-due to unfounded fears about the dangers of demons unrelated to the attempted assassination of King Elshard, all demons are being set free and given a small payment for their unjust imprisonment and forced labor."

The pickaxe falls from my hands a moment later as the sweet, delightful news reaches my ears. No longer will I have to follow the orders of humans. No longer will I be forced to perform menial, degrading work belying my perfection. I can wash my hands, clean my face, and stop living like a savage. What absolute hell these last few weeks have been.

It takes me a moment to compose myself, for I am on the verge of tears. "Thank you, Emperor Belial. You have saved me."

"Eh, it wasn't me. You can thank Hero." She pokes her nose inquisitively. "What's that awful smell?"

The camp supervisor flinches. "Sulfur, ma'am. There's a large deposit buried deeper in the mines."

"Never heard of it." To my surprise, the Second Emperor slides up beside me and loops her arm through mine. "Those rags don't look very good on you. I think you'd look a lot better in a suit. Black would go well with your personality."

The thought of wearing my suit again sends shivers of anticipation down my spine. "Indeed! That sounds wonderful!"

We begin walking up and out of the mine, and many demons, far uglier than I, and far less noble, stare in awe as the Second Emperor stands by my side, looping her arm through mine. Indeed, they must be in awe of my perfect looks, and the powerful female at my side. In all my life, I never thought I would be so honored.

"Beelzebub, the human named Hero, he was the one who ordered the king to set you free." The Second Emperor says this nonchalantly, though the name of the human who imprisoned me fills me with anxiety.

"That is... kind of him to do so," I say, picking my words carefully. "I suppose I owe him gratitude, despite the fact he left the demons and myself with the savages. I shall be sure to grovel at his feet when I see him next." My sarcasm is impossible to contain when it comes to the human who shamed me.

"Oh, Beelzy," Belial says, as she pulls slightly away and puffs out her lip. "Now, that's no way to talk about the man who set you free! He was in a rush to leave Hero City, and he certainly didn't know a few miscreants would try to murder the human king, nor could he have anticipated King Whatshisname's sentencing of all demons to work camps! Besides, you were only there for a few weeks! Surely you're not a broken demon now that you've had to do some manual labor?"

Her words wound me. "That isn't fair, Emperor Belial. It wasn't just manual labor; it was at the hands of humans. I despise them. They're worthless, pathetic little weaklings with zero magical potential. If it weren't for their confounded machines, they wouldn't stand a chance against the might of Satan's Armies."

A blast of sunlight strikes my face and makes me wince, as we step out of the mines into the heat of the midday sun. Belial, however, barely notices the light's intensity. "I've had time to spend with the humans, and I understand a little about their technology. Perhaps you should fool around with their devices a little more! Then you won't feel so alienated by their presence!"

Her cheerful demeanor, for some reason, makes me feel more anxious than usual. "Second Emperor, forgive me for being so blunt. If I may ask, have you grown to like the humans? If so, you do understand they are the mortal enemy of demon-kind, right?"

She pulls away from my arm as we stride into a ground of demons packing up their belongings from their work tents. "For a demon born long after Satan's death and the conclusion of the Energy Wars, you're very old-fashioned, Beelzy." I cringe internally every time she utters that wretched moniker. "Just because humans sustain demonkind doesn't mean we can't figure out some way to co-exist. I mean, Hero is my lover, and we're doing just fine together!"

Every cell in my body vomits simultaneously. "Y-you're having relations with a human?!" I take a step away from her as waves of disgust wash over me. "Not just any human, but that one?! Hero? The one who has killed thousands of demons with his own two hands? That's a betrayal of our people!"

Belial is unfazed by my anger and disgust. She waves a hand at me and smirks. "As I said, you're old-fashioned. He acted in self-defense. Since I've been with him, I've made sure he hasn't harmed a single demon!" She pauses as a look of concern appears. "Well, come to think of it, I did kill Gressil... but I had a good reason for that."

I'm beginning to feel numb to the jokes she utters. "You killed... Gressil? The Eternal Guard? Why?"

"It's complicated," she says, turning away from the tents. "Say, Beelzebub, you never met Satan, did you?"

"Hmm? Of course not. I was spawned long after his death. Why do you ask?"

She gestures for me to follow toward the portals that lead off-world. "I've been thinking about him lately, in secret. Hero doesn't know this, but I long for Satan to return."

Ah, there's yet a chance for her redemption. A small insect buzzes past my face and lands on a flower nearby, but I pay it little heed. "You still crave the most powerful demon, then? Understandable. The hero is a rotting carcass compared to the mighty stallion that Satan represents for you."

Belial shakes her head slowly. "It's not that. It's just- when I think about him, I miss the company he gave me as a fellow demon. At the same time, we were never very close. Our interests barely aligned. All he ever talked about was war, revenge, killing the angels, wiping out the humans, backstabbing the Volgrim. He was always so bitter and angry, but Hero isn't like that. He's caring, thinks about me and what I like, treats me well, and looks out for others before himself."

I eye her suspiciously. "Where are you going with this?"

A shrug in response. "I just want to see Satan one more time. I want to ask him whether he ever really loved or cared about me. I thought about him all the time, but he barely paid me any mind. It was his greed and his desire to be all-powerful that killed him, in the end."

Slowly, I nod along. "I see, now. What you really mean is that you are finally happy. You have someone who cares about you..." Even if he is a filthy human, my inner self says silently.

"Yes! That's exactly it." She beams a sweet smile at me as we approach the portal back to Hero City's portal room. "I do wish you would open up your heart to him. Hero doesn't hate you at all, Beelzebub. In fact, you were the first demon he mentioned when he heard all the demons in Hero City had been imprisoned!"

"Is that so?" I keep my tone neutral as the work camp supervisor silently breaks away to hand the paper to the portal guardsmen. "Where is Hero now?"

"He's going with Cassiel to fight a bunch of demons."

It's only now that I realize the Second Emperor is a total dullard. "And you let him go?! Demons are going to die!"

She shakes her head, and her face becomes deadly serious. "There's nothing to worry about, Beelzebub. Cassiel won't let him hurt anyone. She cares more about peace than any other person I've ever met."

Belial's eyes seem to look past me. "Yes... if anyone can put an end to the war, for good, it's Cassiel. She is the purest soul I've ever known."

* * *

"Non-lethal force only. That's all I'll allow!" Cassiel sticks her tongue out at me. "If you kill even one demon, I'll never forgive you, and neither will Samantha!"

"Wark!" Howard quacks in her arms, as if to emphasize her point.

I shoot a glance up at Ionis. Now that the King knows Ionis is a death robot, he can shed all that disgusting melted skin. "You're not going to kill any demons, right?"

Ionis's eye pivots to look at me. THIS SENTINEL UNIT HAS NOT BEEN ORDERED BY THE COMMANDER UNIT TO ENGAGE IN COMBAT AGAINST THE DEMON-TYPE ORGANICS. THIS SENTINEL UNIT WILL BE ON STANDBY UNLESS THE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC'S LIFE IS IN DANGER.

Slowly, I blink at him. "Right... the duck... well, as long as you stay out of the way, I'll do what I can."

The four of us step through the portal and right onto the frontlines. Immediately, carnage is everywhere. The sound of energy cannons firing, demons and humans alike screaming in pain, talons raking the Labyrinth walls, all of these greet my ears like a cacophony of chaos. Cassiel and I both flinch as we look around. The massive open area has been carved out of the Labyrinth, with fortifications set up here and there, energy cannons aimed down corridors the demons would have to come through.

The giant open room doesn't have a lot going on inside, as all the action is happening down the dozen hallways feeding into the room. King Cody blanches as he looks around. "They're coming from every route! Hero, can't you do something?"

I can practically hear Cassiel yelling 'NON-LETHAL!' in my mind. "I'm on it. Teleport! "

I leave the others behind and jump to the loudest corridor. In the distance, I hear a man scream in pain as his life is ended by a single, brutal attack. A blast of fire lights up the distance, and a dozen other men and women blast the demon who attacked their comrade. Moving deftly, I use my superhuman speed and agility, given to me by the archangels, to leap from wall to wall and even to adhere to the ceiling as I race toward the battle. I quickly spot several humans in badly damaged power armor fighting demons with sword-like arm appendages. The demons dodge attacks with speed not unlike my own, cutting down one woman who makes a single wrong move.

" Sleep! " I speak my word magic, and a blast of energy surges out, making every combatant suddenly stagger to and fro, before flopping over on the ground a second later. Dashing over, I cradle the woman who was just hit by one of the demons. " Heal. "

The huge gash in her stomach heals up within a couple of seconds, and her hand jerks up to clutch the phantom wound. The healing process from my magic can often be as painful as the initial wound.

Up ahead, the hallways branches into a much bigger room, where dozens, if not hundreds more humans and demons are clashing. " Teleport. " I leave the woman behind and jump to the others, using my Wordsmithing rapidly in succession. " Sleep! Nap! Bedtime! "

Like dominoes toppling each other over, demon and human alike stagger forward, falling over awkwardly, often right in the middle of attacking. One human with a vibrosword nearly falls on top of his weapon, impaling himself, but I pop over to him and shove him forcefully out of the way before healing any of the injured humans or demons. My energy has barely even dropped!

" Scan. " A pulse shoots from my body in a 360-degree sphere, illuminating the Labyrinth and the corridors around me. Red spots show heat signatures from human and demons alike, so I begin systematically jumping from the biggest hotspots to the smallest, but it's on the sixth one that surprises me. The humans and demons are already asleep! Cassiel stands amidst a field of sleeping bodies and smiles radiantly at me. "I'm helping!"

"You put everyone to sleep?"

"Yup!" She flaps her wings and leapfrogs halfway across the room to one woman who is bleeding profusely, then gently heals her wounds. "Samantha should have been here. She has healing magic too, you know. Go on and save more lives!"

I nod and start to leave, only to find that a tremendous magical presence has arrived in the room.

Diablo, Third Emperor of the demons, and beside him is Bael, the Fourth Emperor. Both of them casually stroll inside and glance around at the bodies.

Bael clutches the chain to a giant flail wrapped around his body. "What is the meaning of this?! You're putting our demons to sleep!"

"Same as I'm going to do to you," I say simply. Reaching my hand out, I Wordsmith again. "Sleep!"

Bael and Diablo's eyes flutter shut, but a moment later they surge back open, and Bael gnashes his teeth. "Your tricks won't work, Hero! We're protected by the First Emperor's magic!"

Well, that's unfortunate. "You don't have to fight us. I'm trying to end the war peacefully."

Diablo, for a moment, almost looks hopeful, but the look vanishes. "Never trust a human. I learned that lesson a long time ago. If you wish to end a war, blood must be spilled. There is no easy way out."

Cassiel finishes healing the injured human woman and leaps to her feet. "You're wrong! Peace is attainable! If you just keep fighting, more will die! It will never end!"

The Third's gaze narrows. "Big words, coming from an angel. The angels created the demons to serve their whims. When we became a little too out of control, you tried to purge us, but it was too late. We had already discovered the secret of mutation. Now you are the last angel left. Killed by your own slaves; fancy that."

Cassiel is taken aback. "A-angels didn't do that... you're lying..."

"I'm not. I'll never trust a human, and especially not an angel."

Bael uncoils the flail from his body and lets the massive spiked club drop to the ground. Its immense weight leaves a small crater in the ground when it hits. "Talk is cheap! I'll crush the both of you!"

Cassiel looks at me nervously, and I send her a look that says 'About that no-killing rule...'

Part 447c: Usurper

"Come at me, human! Hold nothing back!" Bael, the demon with the giant flail, leaps to the side with a speed that surprises me, and tosses his spiked ball in my direction. Using the agility that the gods have given me, I perform the splits on the ground, ducking under the ball and letting it smash harmlessly into a wall to my rear.

Unfortunately for Bael, this area is the perfect size for me. Neither too large nor too small, it gives me ample room to use my quickness to its fullest. Digging the edges of my toes into the ground, I leap headfirst at the lumbering demon, grabbing his two bull-like horns and vaulting behind him, then kicking off his back to send him sprawling face-first in the dirt. A second later, I impact the wall behind where he had just been standing, and thrust myself off it to jump at him again.

" Freeze! " With a single word, I project my wordsmithing at his feet and hands, and a small ice age grabs his kneeling body and holds him to the ground. My hand lances forward, aiming directly for his heart. Just before impact, the ice wrapped around his hands and legs vanishes, and his fist swings around in midair, smashing me right in the face.

It takes a few seconds for me to shake my head as the pain comes rolling in. I somehow ended up embedded a couple inches in the wall. My whole body aches.

"You thought you could just use Wordsmithing to cheat, huh? This is a match between barbarians, Hero! Real men use their fists when they fight, not their lips!" Bael cackles and yanks his flail back to himself. I barely dive out of the way as the giant ball of death impacts where I was just sitting. Scrambling to my feet, I feel blood trickle down my nose.

"Talk about an ice-breaker. How'd you escape so quickly?"

One eye follows the flail's movements as Bael lunges it at me again, and the other keeps an eye on his face to follow his gaze. "The First Emperor has granted all of demonkind unprecedented power! Breaking free of your word magic is a trivial thing for one as powerful as he."

This time, when the flail lunges for me, I try a different word. " Reflect! " The chained mace impacts an invisible wall and bounces back at Bael, and despite the unexpected move, Bael surprises me by lunging his hand out and catching the flail with one hand. If it stabs his palm, he doesn't show any sign of pain.

I'm breathing hard already. It's as if there are anvils attached to my legs. The impact against the wall must have hurt me more than I thought, though that wouldn't seem possible under normal circumstances. The powers of the God-King grant me incredible regenerative abilities. "If the First Emperor is so damn powerful, why stay in hiding? Why wait until humanity is crushing the demons to make a move? Something doesn't add up."

Before Bael can respond, Diablo, standing casually on the opposite side of the room, takes the opportunity. "We do not question the First Emperor's actions or motivations. He has come to aid us now, having saved up his power over the eons. Once we eliminate you, we will push the humans back to the worlds from whence they came and wipe their minds once more of this 'technology' nonsense."

Cassiel stands silently at the furthest corner, watching me duel Bael. She has nothing to say regarding our fight, but in her eyes, I hear her plea. No killing.

Well, sorry, princess. This Bael guy is somehow able to nullify some of my Wordsmithing, and trying to hurt him is like punching a mountain to make it cry.

Under my breath, I whisper a word. "Telekinesis."

I don't use mental manipulation much because I'm not very familiar with how it works, but I need an edge here. This time, I violently kick my foot into the ground with enough force to send shards of debris at him. Nothing dangerous, but it makes him shield his face for a split second. Using that instant, I teleport behind him, and when his reflexes make him lunge toward me, I bat his hand away with telekinesis and punch him in the face with all my strength.

A moment later, I'm on my back, wondering what happened. Just like how I reflected his attack earlier, my fist hit an invisible wall and reflected my kinetic energy back at me.

This demon... who is he? It's like he's using my Wordsmithing against me.

Then the pain hits. My wrist is shattered, as if I tried to hammer concrete into dust with my fist. Whatever his reflection did, it must have multiplied the force I used several times over.

When I climb to my feet, Bael snickers. "You're having a tough time there, eh, Hero? In between spurts of agony, you're probably wondering how I keep one-upping you."

Cassiel flutters over to me and touches my shoulder lightly. When she looks down at my right hand, her body stiffens. "The bone is sticking out. Let me heal it."

I gently push her away. "This is between Bael and me, Cass. Whoever this demon is, he has a bone to pick. I have to finish this myself. Heal."

It takes a Herculean effort for me not to chew my lip off as my bones and cells ram back together forcefully, mending the wound. A few seconds later, the only pain that remains is the phantom wounds in my mind, but sometimes those can be worse than physical scars.

Diablo looks impatient. "Bael, quit toying with him. Finish him off, or I'll have to step in. We're running out of time."

Bael whips his head back and snarls. "Why don't you lay offa me?! Try peeling apart the angel while I take on the Hero! This is my fight alone! Have a sense of honor!"

The Third Emperor curls his lip. "I prefer not to hurt females where possible. I'm more respectable than that." He pauses to eye Cassiel up and down. "Still, for the last of your kind, your spiritual energy is unthinkable. In many ways, it's similar to that of the First Emperor's. Don't take my previous statements to mean I don't consider you a threat. I'd simply prefer not to fight a woman, and certainly not to extinguish the life of the final angel."

Cassiel takes a step toward Diablo. "I-I'm not helpless! In fact, I could blast you into another universe if I wanted! Don't look down on me just because I'm a girl!"

"The Second Emperor is a woman. She beat me to a pulp once." Diablo shivers and a look of disgust washes across his face. "I've never been so humiliated."

I flinch as Bael leers toward Diablo. "Hah! Go figure; you got beat by a woman! Just what I expected from our glorious leader! Makes me wonder what the First sees in you."

The two demons growl at each other, and Cassiel shares a confused look with me. We have no idea what these two are bickering about, but it looks like an internal power struggle.

"You choose now of all times to complain about my leadership?! We're in the middle of a battle!" Diablo wrings his hands together as veins bulge from his forehead. "Your idiocy always pisses me off!"

"At least you're angry! You didn't weep for our lost comrades, or explode in rage at their deaths when the humans gutted them!" The flail twitches as Bael turns even more of his attention to the Third Emperor. "I'll bet you were glad they died! You think demons deserve to be slaughtered, because you're a devil-damned pacifist!"

"Pacifist?! How dare you!" Diablo's fist swings out and smashes into the wall at his side as he unleashes a tiny bit of rage on the Labyrinth, forming a small crater under his fist. "I fought alongside Satan in the earliest wars!"

"As did I!" Bael shambles closer to his senior, towering two heads higher than him. Both of them can't be more than a few inches apart. "I've grown tired of your nostalgia. All you ever do is complain and bitch and whine and moan."

Diablo stares up at his taller counterpart. "Are you challenging me?"

Cassiel wants to say something. I can see it in her eyes, but I gently tap her wrist. Let this play out. A fight between these two could work out for us.

Barely have I tried to send the thought from me to her when a flurry of movement makes us both jerk back in surprise. Bael hurls his spiked ball at Diablo, and the Third Emperor slaps it aside like a champ. "I guess we're doing this right now?! You worthless subordinate!" With a strength that surprises Cassiel and I, Diablo delivers a brutal palm strike into Bael's chest, sending him flying back into the wall on the opposite side of the room.

"Gah!" Bael coughs, and a small sense of pain ekes into his voice. The demon I could barely hurt before is... injured?

I teleport Cassiel and myself to the opposite side of the room to watch. The battle is still raging on, further behind us, humans versus demons, but as long as the strongest demon commanders can't join the fray, things might work out well. "Cass," I lean in close and whisper in her ear as Bael flings himself at his leader, "Go back to the frontlines and help out. You're strong enough to survive blows from these monsters, let alone the small fry. If you won't fight, you can at least heal the wounded. Let King Cody know what's going on. I have to stay and see what happens."

She fidgets, not wanting to leave my side, but she also hears the wisdom in my words. Finally she grunts. "Okay. Stay safe." With a quick movement, she pecks me on the cheek and darts down the hallway from whence we came. Both Demon Emperors are too busy to notice her leave, but after they're done pounding each other, I'm sure they won't be thrilled about her departure.

"You damned son of a troglodyte!" Bael swings huge, overpowered blows at Diablo, but his commander bats them aside with movements similar to that of martial artists. "Stop dancing around and fight me!"

"I am." Diablo's anger is gone, as he enters a trance-like state. Anticipating each of his opponent's blows, he uses palm deflections, and the occasional magic spell to knock his junior off-balance. Sometimes his foot jerks out and trips the bigger, bulkier demon aside. "You should be aware of something, Bael. It's not that I was beaten by Belial because I am secretly a weakling, it is because she is far more powerful than me. She's cunning, a master manipulator. She hides her strength behind soft words. You, however, are a loud, boisterous oaf. You have almost no magical energy to speak of, and rely entirely on your strength and speed to win. Not to mention that worthless flail."

His calmness unnerves Bael, and myself, though I'm not even a part of the fight. Bael snarls at his senior. "One hit and you're toast! I'll break every-" He stumbles forward, tripping over Diablo's deliberately outstretched foot, and rights himself. "-every bone in your stupid ugly face!"

"You are indeed strong." Diablo stops with the palm strikes and changes his style, clasping his hands together to make a battering ram for a fist. "But brains are what win battles, not military might." Saying this, he slams his double-fist into Bael's gut and knocks the wind out of him. Bael staggers back and wheezes, clasping his fat belly as sweat rolls off his face.

"Y-you-!"

"It's already over. Please stop with the nonsense." Diablo quickly weaves a magic spell with his hands, and Bael's eyes turn white.

"What the- where did everything go?!" Bael claws at his face, and I realize Diablo has blinded him. In the next instant, Diablo leaps forward and delivers a hail of jabs, palm strikes, and punches into Bael's vital organs. The bigger demon swings his arms around futilely to try and block the Third Emperor's savage attack, but it's no use.

Diablo stops, and his lesser flops to the ground, a puddle of sweat and pain. "Hero. Where did your angel girlfriend go?" He doesn't give me a chance to respond. Without warning, he leaps toward me, fist raised.

Forgive me, Cass. I may need to take things further than you'd like.

* * *

"Hold on; I'll heal you." I squeeze the woman's hand as I pour energy into her. The wounds quickly close, but it's too late. Her spirit trail fades, and her eyes lock open as her head lulls to the side. I was seconds late.

"Cassiel!" Samantha waves at me, and I blink back tears. I don't want her to see me cry over a woman I didn't even know.

I fly over to her, still fighting the sickening sensation back. "Sam, where are all the wounded? I have to heal them."

As I land, I spot a familiar handsome demon beside her. Wearing a black suit with a crimson tie, his hair is slicked back, and his entire demeanor is business-like. He bows slightly at me. "Before you ask, I am Lord Beelzebub. The Second Emperor rescued me from the human work camps."

"Oh. Yeah, I think we've met before." I barely pay him any mind.

Samantha nudges me. "The wounded are taken care of. I healed them already, Cass."

"Good to hear. Are you running low on energy?"

She shakes her head. "I'm fine, and I've got plenty more left over. Anyway, those soldiers are going to enter combat and get torn apart again. If I don't do something, the battle is going to turn into a bloodbath."

Behind me, I hear a scream of pain as a demon is blasted with a hail of anti-energy. "We can't just heal the humans; we have to heal the demons too. And you! You're the Second Emperor! Demand they stand down, and I'll do the same for the humans."

Samantha starts to say something, but from behind her, a man's voice yells out. "Keep fighting! Mow the bastards down! Blast them to smithereens!" I'm shocked to see King Elshard step out from behind some sandbags and flag down a few men. "We have the demoness healing our men and women. Suicide tactics are okay. Make sure the vermin suffer."

"K-King Elshard!" I take a step toward him and stammer out the words. "What are you saying?! I thought you were going to forgive the demons!"

The King quickly nods at me. "I have! I've freed all the demons I wrongfully imprisoned. Those demons were, of course, allies to humanity. You were right in that judging all of them for the actions of a few was the wrong course of action. However, the shit-spitters in the Labyrinth are mongrels in need of being put down. I will destroy them, and kill their Emperors." He blinks at Samantha. "Aside from you, of course. Your loyalty is respect-worthy."

Confusion and anger pass over Samantha's face. "Loyalty?! I am not loyal to humans. I simply agree with the idea of peace. You are not working toward that goal, you're-"

The king cuts her off. "Peace is a farce. If you want peace, you have to earn it. Kill those who are below you! Only once you are among others of your kind can you have that stability the angel seeks."

Beelzebub chuckles, "Kukuku... I agree with you, King Elshard. Your words have a certain wisdom to them."

The king smiles at Beelzebub. "As do yours! You are a praiseworthy demon! I apologize for putting you in the camps, and hope that you will, in time, forgive-"

"Don't patronize me." Beelzebub's lightheartedness vanishes. "I merely agree with the sentiment. Only once humans are dead, rotting in the ground, will demonkind have stability. Humans are the parasites in this ecosystem, not my people."

"Beelze...bub?" Samantha stares at the suited demon, but the king cuts her off.

"You... you! I released you from the camps! You're supposed to be loyal to-" He pauses, as a look of recognition appears in his eyes. "Yes, I remember you now. Beelzebub, the demon inside the palace. You're the one who orchestrated my assassination! You burned and scarred me!"

Beelzebub grins widely. "I most certainly did not. As much as I loathe and detest humans, I am bound to not hurt any of them, as per the orders of the one who sealed me as a puppet.

Hero, to my chagrin, controls me as much as he pleases. Were I to assassinate you, there would be no 'try' to it. Even the two lovely healers behind me wouldn't be able to reassemble your ashes."

Everyone stares at Beelzebub in shock, not least the king. "I-I-I should have you executed right now! Monster!"

"Do as you please. It's not like I can fight back. Prove me right, in front of these girls. Execute a non-combatant. The devil knows you'd love to do it." Beelzebub takes a daring step toward the king. "Go ahead, just a dozen shots from those anti-energy rifles will wipe me out."

The king glances uneasily from Beelzebub to us, realizing the moral quandary he's in. If he murders the demon, he'll be the monster Beelzebub claims he is, but if he doesn't, it will make him look weak.

Before he can make the decision, Samantha steps forward. "Beelzebub, as Second Emperor, I'm ordering you to stand down. You're out of line."

"Am I?!" Beelzebub whirls to face her. "At least I'm here against my will! You've fallen for a filthy, disgusting human. The very one who imprisoned my mind! You willingly stand beside those who murder your people!"

Samantha turns away from his gaze. "It's... it's not like that. I'm just- I don't know what to do."

"You're the second most powerful demon in existence! Yet you've ended up a worthless whore, smitten head over heels with the human who will be the end of our species! You've never, not once in your entire life, cared about your fellow demon!" Beelzebub pulls back, a disgusted look on his face. "From where I stand, you might as well already be a human."

Gently, I pull Samantha back. The look of defeat on her face makes me want to punch this stupid suit in the kisser. "Beelzebub, that's enough. We're in the middle of a battle. Please... save this for later."

He throws his hands in the air and stomps off. "Fine. Arguing with women and humans is beneath me anyway."

The king is puzzled. He looks around, wondering how to proceed after that outburst, so I calm him down. "Beelzebub has issues. Let's worry about him later. I'm going to the frontlines to heal the wounded." With a knowing gaze, I eyeball him intently. "That means humans and demons. Right, Samantha?"

"Huh? Y-yeah, sure." She nods weakly and tries to hide the guilt in her eyes, but it's evident to everyone present that Beelzebub's little tirade got to her.

King Elshard rubs his hands together. "If I pull my forces back, can the two of you do something to stop the demons? Samantha, as the Second Emperor, perhaps you could..." He trails off, and she nods.

"It's my duty. Lord Beelzebub was right, you know. I can't just let myself go along for the ride when I have the power to stop this war." Samantha pulls herself together and turns back to the mess of hallways. "I just hope the others of my kind are willing to listen. The First may override me."

"It's worth a shot," I say, the words almost a whisper. "Even if you can't make the demons listen to reason, you should try. Jason would be proud of you."

The king nods at us and struts away, but Samantha's knees tremble. "If I stand up as the Second now, then why didn't I sooner? I've always been so weak-willed."

I push the sounds of death in the distance away and hug her gently. "That's not true, Sam. Your will is stronger than you think. Now, come on. People are dying while we mope."

She nods, and together, we head into the Labyrinth.

* * *

Beelzebub enters his chambers in the Palace, where he used to stay before the world turned topsy-turvy and he was cast into the work camps along with his lesser demons. Stepping in front of a mirror, he scowls as he notices an ugly speck of black coal stuck to his face. "A blemish. It's not perfect."

With a flourish of movement, he grabs a dry towel hanging from a nearby rack, plunges it under the tap-water, and scrubs his face viciously.

"Perfect... perfect... perfect..." His teeth grind together loudly enough that were anyone else within a few feet, they could hear the noise. "It must be perfect." When he pulls the towel away, he glares at his hands. No matter how he scrubs them, the blackness of coal won't come off so easily. The ugly filth shrouds his otherwise flawless, radiant red skin.

"They made me toil, and dig, and sweat, as if I were an orc, or a beggar forced to earn his keep. Me?! The magnanimous, eminent Beelzebub?!"

As he gazes at his reflection in the mirror, he scowls at the bags under his eyes. "And they had the nerve to look down on me. I could exterminate every human in this city with the movement of one hand. I could burn their disgusting structures to the ground. But really, I can't! This accursed binding prevents me from resisting."

After a few moments, the rage dissipates. "Such is my lot in life. Gifted in every manner, blessed from birth. Sharing air with these creatures is enough to make me--"

An interruption. A soft knocking at the door draws Beelzebub's attention away from his self-pity.

"Who wishes to enter?"

A soft female voice speaks up. "Um. It's m-me, Rosalia."

Ah. That one. "You may enter." Immediately, Beelzebub dries his face with a gout of flame. It wouldn't do, after all, for others to see him in this state.

The door opens, and a small, shy demoness creeps in. Her skin isn't cherry-red like other demons; it's much softer and creamier. Like a human's, Beelzebub thinks to himself.

"Master Beelzebub, I heard you enter the palace. Nobody else is here. I thought y-you were going out to the battlefield." Her dull brown robes match perfectly with her unremarkable face and mediocre body. Her energy levels are pathetic, too.

Beelzebub steps into his bedroom and leans against a wall casually as if he hasn't a care in the world. "My presence was unnecessary. I can't kill any humans, and I won't harm my brethren. As such, I have retired for the day."

"Oh..." She blushes and glances away. "Um, I wanted to thank you for getting me out of the work camps early. The guards said it would be a week's wait otherwise for processing."

"A trifle. You were a relatively competent underling in the camps. Even living among humans, you know your place is at the bottom."

The girl winces at Beelzebub's unkind words but carefully sits on his bed, making sure not to disturb his perfect bed-cover arrangements. "I... I know. I don't understand much, and I'm not very strong. I'm just useless."

"Correct." The tall demon doesn't bother to assuage her concerns. "In any case, now that I have brought you into the palace, I will expect you to continue serving my needs. I require breakfast at 5:30 every morning, sharp. Tardiness won't be tolerated. You will press my suits just after delivering my breakfast, thus getting them ready for me to wear. There is also the drawing of my baths, twice every day, once in the morning, and again later at night. Following this-

She interrupts him. "Sorry, Lord Beelzebub. Um, I already have a list made, sir." She reaches into her pocket and procures a handkerchief, smiling weakly as she shows him the markings on it.

Beelzebub scowls. "Your handwriting is atrocious. Did a blind leper with two fingers teach you the way of the quill?"

Rosalia blushes. "Err, no, sir. I taught myself."

"Poorly." Beelzebub practically spits the word out. "No servant of mine is going to scrawl clumsily with their fist, as if they were Lord Bael. The stupid lunk couldn't write worth a damn if-" Beelzebub pauses, realizing he's letting his emotions get the best of him. "Anyway, the least you could do is aspire to be better than the humans. You're pathetic, and you look enough like them, that one day I might mistake you for one of them."

"Um... I mean, humans aren't that bad, though, are they?" Rosalia winces again as Beelzebub's expression flares to show an inkling of anger. "I m-mean demon society is harsh, and brutal... if you don't catch a break, it's so hard to get any souls to evolve... and there are so many demons, it's almost impossible to rise through the ranks..."

Beelzebub stares at her quietly for a few moments. "Is that why you joined the human society? You thought you would make some friends here? You presumed you might stand out, be someone important? Human society exalts the weak and raises up the poor and downtrodden. They're such soft souls. Which is precisely why they must be exterminated."

Beelzebub snaps his fingers, and a few candles light up around the room. Leaning over, he flips a switch to turn off the electric lights in the room. "Just using their technology makes me feel ill."

Rosalia nods along, but she doesn't quite understand what he means. "Don't you think lights activated by a switch are brighter and easier to use? The reason they win against demons is that they build those scary machines... doesn't that make them smart? Maybe even..." She hesitates, seeing a familiar anger in his eyes. "...smarter than... us?"

"They aren't smart! They're stupid apes! Monkeys!" Beelzebub accidentally lets his anger out for the second time, glaring daggers at the girl. "They can make some gears turn and a robot talk! Big deal! I can conjure fire out of midair! Can any human do that?!"

Rosalia doesn't say anything, but Beelzebub can hear her retort floating in the air. The Hero can...

"Never mind. Get out of my sight!" Beelzebub spins and walks back into the bathroom. "Starting tomorrow, you are to begin your duties. For today, I wish to be alone."

The door slams behind him, and Rosalia casts her eyes down to the ground. "Yes, mister Beelzebub, sir..."

Part 448c: Sealed

"Why isn't anyone listening?!" Samantha looks at me with panic in her eyes, before turning to another demon running directly at us, a Scyther by the looks of him. "Halt! I am the Second Emperor! Lay down your-"

"Blood! I want blood!!" The crazed demon drools incoherently and slobbers as he raises both of his bladed arms. Samantha, intent on not harming her kind, doesn't resist until the very last second, before lightly slapping him away, though the force nearly kills him as he plows through four other demons, then impacts a wall.

"They're crazed!" Samantha balls up her fists as more humans run past us through the cramped hallway toward the demons, unleashing a hail of anti-energy on the foes. Many of the shots meet their target, but the demons shake the otherwise grievous wounds off as if they were being poked with thumbtacks. The terror on the human's faces as their weapons are relatively ineffective turn to hatred as they continue blasting the red-skinned demons.

"Fucking blood-skins! Eat shit and die!" One human pulls out an energy sword and charges at the nearest scyther, but he's sliced clean in half before I can stop him. I quickly knock the Scyther back with a wave of energy before it jumps at us, but slowing them down won't stop their rampaging.

I turn to Samantha. "Their spiritual energy- it's dark and twisted. Even your spirit trail isn't red, as usual. It's tinged with blackness. Something is polluting the energy of all the demons, and it's also driving the humans into a frenzy!" I quickly glance down at myself to be sure, but whatever's affecting the others isn't affecting me. My trails are pure white, as they always are.

Samantha grits her teeth. "It's the First Emperor. He must be using his colossal power to control the minds of everyone present- or maybe he's boosting the demons and weakening the humans, or- I don't even know."

More humans are smitten down as blasts of electricity surge down the corridor from a pair of spellcasters. I smash them into the ground with a long-range telekinetic attack, which appears to batter them unconscious... for now.

"Sam, who is the First Emperor? You've met him before, right? If we know who he is, maybe we can counter him!"

She shakes her head vehemently. "I must have seen him dozens of times, but after every meeting, my mind went blank. Eventually, I stopped going, since it was pointless talking to someone I couldn't remember. Even Diablo didn't know who he was."

"But you know the First Emperor is a male, right? Think! Surely you must have seen his face. Maybe a fragment of a memory, anything would help us."

A sudden sensation on my foot makes me look down. A man, barely alive, is reaching with all his might toward me. "M-my lady... help- I can't..."

I heal him after a second, realizing his legs have deep slashes in them and he dragged himself all this way. Once the man recovers, he climbs to his feet and wheezes, "I owe you my life." Saying this, he dashes away. More humans continue to rush past us, like meat being thrown into a grinding machine.

Samantha bites her lip. "It's no good. I can't remember anything. Cassiel, you should try putting everyone to sleep. That should buy us time to-"

"Won't work." I cut her off before she can finish. "I managed to put a few to sleep earlier, but they rose to their feet not ten seconds later. Something keeps nullifying my-" I pause, sending a massive wave of energy down the corridor and blasting a hundred more demons backward, and they land in a giant pile, blocking the corridor. They'll have to gather themselves, and that should slow them down a few moments. "-my magic."

Samantha looks at me seriously. "You know, the way Jason's attacks were reflected, and how your magic is being shut down... it's almost like we're facing a Wordsmith." She licks her lips as her haggard gaze meets mine. "And the demons here are fighting together a little too uniformly and aggressively. If... If I had to make a guess-"

She's cut off, as a huge explosion echoes from down the corridor toward where the demons are emerging. I'm stunned to see a wall of foam has formed, blocking off the path from whence they came. A man in high-ranking military garb runs up to the platoon of soldiers.

"Fall back! We're using the experimental weapons to seal the hallways! Let's draw the bastards into a choke point!"

Samantha glances at the man, then back to me. "I hope I'm wrong. But- but then again... I also want to be right."

I don't get a chance to ask what she means. Samantha turns away and quickly makes a motion with her hands, sending waves of healing energy toward all the injured men around us. "Let's go, Cass. There are others we need to treat."

Her words are punctuated by distant booms, as more of the 'experimental weapons' detonate.

* * *

Grisly sights greet us once we arrive back in the main chamber. Thousands, even tens of thousands of humans mill around in the room, some running, others staggering, as Samantha and I rush to heal as many as we can. I note with interest that at least the First Emperors boost to demons seems to apply to her as well, allowing her energy to reach enough heights that healing hundreds of humans poses little or no problems.

Something catches my eye, while Samantha is off healing the others. A group of men rushes out of one of the hallways, as a boom echoes from where they came. The men are quickly, but gently, carrying King Elshard. Several stab wounds run across his body. I detect his spiritual energy, so he isn't dead yet, but he will be soon.

I flap my wings and arrive over where he is, just in time to hear him cough blood. "B-bastard ruby-skinned monsters... the second time- the second time...!"

Healing energy expels from my aura as I heal the wounds. Slowly, color returns to his face as his body regenerates. "King Elshard, what happened?"

Laying on the ground, the king tilts his head toward me. "Ah, winged one. You've saved me a second time. Truly, you are the Divine Mother incarnate."

"It was nothing, King Elshard. I'm just doing what I can. Who attacked you?"

"Shadow-walkers. Two of them." The King pulls himself into a sitting position and heavily breathes as he glances at the hallways. "We tagged the bastards, but they got away. The demons always rely on trickery and deceit to win their battles. 'Target the command structure, and the humans will fall,' I'll bet that's what they're thinking." A somber expression passes over his face. "Where have I gone wrong? Under my rule, humanity has been reduced to panicked children. We can barely hold the demons off, let alone crush them as we were doing before."

I gently pat him on the shoulder, as Samantha trots over to us. "Attacking the demons so viciously, without any regard for diplomacy or any other options, only angered them. As long as violence is the only way you communicate with them, they will progressively increase their military might against you until you eventually fall."

Samantha apparently catches the last bit of the conversation. "Cassiel is correct, King Elshard. You underestimate how grossly outnumbered humanity is. The Labyrinth is enormous, like the hollowed out innards of a star. Demons live in every crack and crevice. The reach of humanity so far can barely be stated as less than one percent of its total area."

A man in heavy armor jogs up to us breathlessly. "My liege! We have sealed all of the tunnels except for the one you requested. The high-density Contanium is holding well against the hordes. It will take them an hour to break through if they sustain their efforts."

"Don't hold back. Keep lining the halls with it. Eventually, they will have to re-route. When they come through the final path, they will meet their end under a hail of gunfire." The King rises to his feet and brushes himself off. "Thank you, blessed angel. While I understand your words of peace, the time is long gone for diplomacy. Perhaps, after this battle..." He trails off and looks toward the final remaining hallway.

I share a glance with Samantha, noticing a look of fear on her face. She grabs my shoulders. "Where is Jason? How will he get back to us?"

The King answers for her. "Aye, we left his hallway unsealed. We wouldn't want our most powerful warrior to be trapped with the mons-" He halts, likely realizing that calling demons 'monsters' in front of their Second Emperor might be a tad discourteous. "-trapped with the Third Emperor and his hordes."

Well, at least he can try to be slightly civil to a demon, bless his heart.

"Samantha, when I left, Diablo was battling Bael. I don't know what happened after that. It's likely that Jason will have to fight one of them afterward, but they'll be weakened."

She curls her lip. "Infighting? Why would Diablo and Bael duel each other now, of all times? They've had their share of differences, but in the midst of an invasion?"

We share a look of concern, until a sentry blows on a horn. "Someone approaches! Ready, men!"

Spinning quickly, I fly up into the air and peer down the hallway leading to where Jason is. Once I see his form emerge from the darkness, a relief fills my very soul. He made it.

That sensation vanishes immediately. Diablo, the third Demon Emperor, emerges from behind Jason, holding my lover by the head. Jason's body is battered and broken. He's been hit with so many attacks he can't even twitch a finger, let alone stand. Hanging limply in Diablo's grip, his eyes are swollen shut. No words escape his lips, and his spirit is faint. He must be unconscious, and barely hanging on.

Diablo sighs and tosses Jason forward, letting his body slap into the ground with a sickening crunch. As I fly down to where he is, I'm almost knocked to the side as Samantha races past me, moving faster than I thought imaginable. She quickly cradles Jason's body, horror on her face. I land beside her and send healing energy to Jason, even as she glares at Diablo.

"What did you do to him?!"

The Third Emperor shrugs. "Honestly, Belial, I don't remember. He barely put up a fight. His hand-to-hand skills are pathetic. You're not going to get all mopey, are you?" Diablo frowns at her. "You can heal him, you know."

Samantha slowly scrunches her hands together into fists. Her energy begins to change, to blacken, before my very eyes. "You... you hurt... my honey..." Blood trickles down her chin as she gnashes her teeth so hard she bites her tongue.

"Hey, I left him alive. I had to teach him his place." Diablo holds his hands up and glances at all the nervous humans aiming their weapons at him. "It was a fair fight. Mano-a-Mano. Surely you can't hold that against me."

Her entire body shakes, and her eyes blacken as she slowly stands to face the Third. "You're not the only one about to learn his place today."

"C-calm down, Belial. I wanted to talk with you for a few moments, about the- the um... Belial?" As Samantha leaps at his throat, Diablo takes a quick step back. "Oh, fuck."

Part 449c: The Creator

The flowers are in bloom. Finches chirp in the tree above me, and the sound of wind whistles through a nearby forest, soothing my soul. The sun gently warms the land, and a butterfly flutters over my prone body. I reach up and rest my head on my hand, staring at the cloud formations above.

"That one looks like a sword," I mutter to myself. After a few moments, I sigh. "I can't believe Diablo trounced me. He's beyond anything I've faced before."

Footsteps. The sound of heavy hiking boots stomp toward me, until their wearer comes to a stop a few feet to my left. I turn my head to look up at him, but the sun beams down into my eyes, making his face hard to see.

"Ah, so you're the one causing all the ruckus." I can barely make out a toothy smile on the man's face as he stares down at me. Turning away, he reaches toward a low-hanging branch on the tree and plucks a fruit from it. Slowly, the man bites into it, and the juices roll down his chin. "Mmm. I could eat a peach for hours."

"Who are you?" I ask the question, not out of curiosity, but fascination. "I've never seen you before."

The man shrugs. "Oh, you've seen me before, I assure you of that. I'm many people. Father, son, guard, prisoner. I fly, and I swim, and I do anything else that meets my fancy. A free spirit, if you will."

"Are you... the Creator?" I almost feel embarrassed to ask the question, but the man laughs.

"Hah, perhaps. Some have worshiped me, it's true. Some things are true whether you believe in them or not." He kneels down and sits beside me, but no matter how I squint, I can't make out his face. "What's on your mind, Jason?"

He knows my name. That thought, for some reason, warms my heart. "A lot of things. I have to make peace between a bunch of jackasses who won't look past their differences. There's so much riding on my shoulders, and the one thing I have going for me, which is that I'm good at fighting, isn't enough to let me beat the third most powerful of the demons. I can't do anything right."

Slowly, the man scratches his chin. "Ah, so there's a lot of pressure on you to perform well. I love pressure, personally. I eat it for breakfast." He stops scratching, and leans his back against the tree, gazing up into the sky. "You're stepping into a battlefield, not of fists, but of ideas. Both sides have hurt each other deeply, for a very long time. A few pretty words won't solve anything. What's wrong can never be made right."

I close my eyes. "So it's pointless to try, after all?"

"No." The man looks at me seriously. "If there's something wrong, those who have the ability to take action have the responsibility to take action. Only a few people can solve the crisis in the Labyrinth, but just one person has the will and desire to do so."

"Me?"

"Mhm." He rumbles the response in his throat, rather than vocalizing. "It won't be easy. I've been faced with enemies myself, ones that seemed insurmountable at the time, but that I eventually overcame. Every muscle in my body didn't want to fight, but I did anyway. You just have to soldier forward, and power on."

"You're so wise..." The words slip out of my mouth, and I blush a little bit.

"Not particularly. I'm just giving you words, platitudes, general guidance. For all you know, I picked them out of a self-help book." He reaches into his pocket and pulls out a cigarette. After lighting it, he takes a long, slow drag. "I came here to drink myself to death. Instead, I ended up talking to you. Life is funny like that."

"Don't do that. You have to take care of yourself, uh, sir." I pull myself into a sitting position and squint even harder at the man. "I don't want to be rude, but I can't place your face. Have I seen you before?"

"Probably," The man says, as he turns his back to me. "For a while, I was all the people could talk about. My time is over, but my memory lives on. After you die, you will stay in the hearts of those who were with you."

The soft grass crumbles under his boots as he slowly walks away, leaving me behind.

I yell at him as he walks away, "See you later, Mister! Thanks for the advice! I'll work harder from now on."

"Rockin' good news."

Soon, the man is out of sight, and the world around me melts away...

* * *

"He's awake." A breathless voice speaks, just to my right side. It takes a moment for me to place it, but I realize it's Samantha's. "Remember what we said."

"Huh? Remember what?" I slur my words a little bit, but slowly open my eyes to see Samantha and Cassiel above me. Both look nervous, but they're trying so valiantly to hide it from me.

"Nothing!" Cassiel exclaims, as her nervous smile widens more. "Are you doing okay? It took a lot of energy to heal you!"

"I'm fine, I guess." I pull myself into a sitting position, as memories flood back to me. "Ah! Diablo! I fought him. I lost. What happened to him?"

Samantha bites her lip. "He- um, came here..."

"And he was carrying you!" Cassiel chimes in quickly. "He was going to kill you, but-"

"-but the brave soldiers here blasted him with everything they had!" Samantha finishes Cassiel's sentence. Both of them almost seem to be making up a story as they go along. Samantha quickly turns her head to look at a nearby man in uniform. "Isn't that right?"

The man's face turns white. "Uh- err, yes! We, err, that is to say, shot him. Many times!"

"Uh huh..." I try to sound like I'm buying it, but something doesn't quite make sense. Before I can comment on the weird way everyone is acting, Samantha rests her hand on mine.

"These brave humans fought with all their might to save you. You should be thanking them!"

I feel a little awkward questioning her at a time like this, so I just nod dumbly and try my hardest to flash a genuine smile at the humans milling around. "Um, thanks for the save, guys!"

Everyone nearby averts their gaze, and they shuffle away nervously, leaving me to wonder what the hell happened while I was out. I glance down at Samantha's hand, still resting on mine. "Oh, Samantha. There's something stuck on your knuckle."

"HUH?!" She quickly pulls her hand away to glance at it. Just before she plucks the thing out, I get a slightly better look at it.

"Is that a tooth?"

"No!" She plucks the enameled object out of her knuckle, and pinches it together, crushing it into dust. "M-must have been a bone that grew out wrong. I didn't notice it until now!"

That was totally a tooth. She's hiding something. Still, it wouldn't be polite to question my girlfriends.

"Eh, whatever. Where did Diablo go, anyway? Did the humans kill him?"

A creepy look appears in Samantha's eyes. "Nope. That would be too easy."

"What?"

"Nothing!" She quickly jumps to her feet and adjusts her long-sleeved shirt. "Um, now that you're awake, and everyone knows I'm a demon... can you change my clothes back? These rags are really uncomfortable!"

Changing the topic, huh? "Yeah. Reform. " The clothes on her body shift and change. After the clothes revert to their original form, I glance from Sam's exposed chest over to Cassiel, to be a gentleman. "Did the humans win the battle?"

"Something like that," Cass replies. "Around twenty thousand men and women perished, and twice as many demons by a rough estimate. Samantha and I were pulling out all the stops to heal everyone, but our efforts still weren't nearly enough."

Samantha glances from Cass to me. "The king was nearly assassinated mid-battle. Two shadow-walkers tried to kill him while he was separated from his men for a split-second, but Cass saved him just in the nick of time."

"I'm glad to hear that," I say, pausing and realizing what I said. "The saving-the-king part, not the him-getting-stabbed part. Good job on that. Where is Cody now?"

Cassiel clears her throat. "Ahem, King Elshard, as is his proper title, is back in Hero City. You were out for over an hour. All the tunnels leading from this forward portal and into the Labyrinth have been sealed off. Everyone is pulling back and sealing the portal. The only way from Hero City to the Labyrinth will eventually be the great doors we entered from."

"That's a good move. After facing Diablo myself, I don't think humanity should aggravate the situation any further. If we can barely beat Diablo, we certainly can't overcome billions, if not trillions of lower level demons."

Samantha fidgets as I stand up. "Yeah, beating Diablo would be, ah, pretty hard. Haha." Her nervous laugh makes me raise an eyebrow, but she quickly changes the topic. "Um, before you do anything else, I should tell you, love... I need to go for a while."

"Huh? Yeah, I mean, go ahead, Sam. You don't need my permission." I try not to look too concerned, but she shifts her shoulders around and fidgets uncomfortably, averting her eyes from mine.

"Well, it won't be for a few hours, or a day. I need to go and speak with the Demon High Council. I'll probably be back in, say, a week or two."

"Uh huh. Okay. Mind if I ask why?"

Samantha freezes up. "Well, ah, that is, it's just- you see, things happened, and I have to go chat with the other demons about this and that..."

She trails off, and Cassiel finishes for her. "It's private, Hero. Can't you let a woman have a few secrets?"

"You know what this is about, Cass?" I direct a pointed question at her, but Cassiel just tilts her head away.

"Maybe! It's nothing malicious, anyway. Just let Sammy go and take care of some business. It's not like the bed will be cold or anything."

"That's... not why I was asking..." Sighing, I rub my forehead. "Never mind. Samantha, if you have something to take care of, go for it. Just be careful. I don't know how the other demons are going to feel about you, since you've been hanging out with humans, but if you need help, don't hesitate to ask, okay?"

Cassiel scoffs. "Pfft. Like a horde of demons could ever lay a hand on-"

"Cass!" Samantha squeaks and swats the angel on the shoulder. "It's embarrassing!"

I'm really interested in what went down while I was out, but it's apparent these two aren't going to give me so much as a hint. "I know you're plenty strong, Samantha. It's nothing to get all bashful over. I'm glad you're my girl, and that's all there is to it."

She blushes and crosses her arms. "Aww, you can be such a sweetie. I'm gonna be lonely while I'm gone."

I pull her and Cassiel in close while staring at the people milling about. "Then let's have a good time tonight."

"Yeah!" Cassiel chimes in excitedly, and as we turn away, something catches my eye.

"Hey, what's that giant blood splatter near that tunnel? Isn't that the direction I went to fight Diablo? There's a bunch of red flesh chunks all over the ground as well and-"

"It's nothing! Seven Devils, let's just go!" Samantha shoves me along, and I snicker to myself as we head to the portal leading back to Hero City. I think I know what went down.

* * *

"Rats." Tvoorik kicks his foot out from under his bench and sends some orc bones scattering against the wall. "What the heaven are humans made of? I must've stabbed that king fifty times!"

"Four times," I say, correcting him. I swirl the Blood Soup around my bowl aimlessly. "The last one was sloppy, too. You barely even scratched his arm."

"Sh-shut yer trap, Ylvusk! I didn't see you doing any stabbing!"

"I was holding him down and using my shadow-phasing to distract his guards. I thought you could handle stabbing one fleshbag to death. Why didn't you stab him in the heart, or slit his throat?"

Tvoorik glares at me before spinning in his seat and kicking the wall again. "I thought I did stab his heart."

"It's the other side of the chest, dumbass. I guess you nicked a lung maybe. Did you even plunge the knife in deep?"

He can't even make eye contact with me. "I don't remember..."

"You're hopeless." I take a quick spoonful of the delicious, iron-rich blood, and feel the dead cells roll past my tongue and down my throat. Smacking my lips, I remark, "At least we didn't die, and we ended up better off than Diablo. Poor bastard."

Tvoorik's sullen expression vanishes as his sadism takes over. "And Bael! Both of them got the beatdown of a lifetime! But you know, this just proves my theories right!"

"Satan the Devil, not this nonsense again." I curse under my breath, then glance around at the few scattered demons in the 71st dining area. All of them are pretty far away, but if they happen to hear his stupid theories, they might think less of me, too.

Tvoorik nods eagerly. "Think about it! We saw that human, the one named Hero, and the Second Emperor and an Angel was with him! All the pieces finally fit together!"

"What... pieces...?" I can barely even bring myself to ask the question.

"The entire battle was a sham. Diablo sent the weaker demons as the vanguard, and thousands of them died. The humans we killed were sent to the River, and those souls flowed up to him! He eliminated a bunch of competition for souls, and drained plenty of soul energy for himself too! And don't forget, Belial was there just in case we killed too many of the humans! She's getting soul energy as well!"

"If you say so."

He continues, ignoring my disinterest in the conversation. "And the appearance of that angel can mean only one thing! The angels are in league with the demons! The First Emperor is using his two strongest fellow emperors to play both sides against each other, and he's keeping the demons in reserve in case the humans get too antsy."

I stare at Tvoorik's dumb, excited face for a few moments. "That angel is the last one alive. All the rest are dead. Gressil said so himself."

"No way! Only a dummy would believe that orc-crap! Other angels are still alive, and they work for the demons! It's the only thing that makes sense! We know humans can't use magic, so it must have been the angel that destroyed one of our planets with a meteor and blew up another one's star. That angel is the key; I bet she's coming up with any manner of devious plots. She might be pulling the strings behind the scenes, for all we know!"

My soup is getting cold. I barely even want to eat any more of it. "Anything's possible." If you're a moron, I think to myself.

From across the room, Smealum enters. Sighing heavily, he rubs his head, where a big, ugly bruise is swelling up. He spots us and immediately trudges over, shoving Tvoorik aside on the bench to make room for himself.

"I see you guys made it out alive. Failed your mission, though."

Tvoorik snuffles and turns his head away from the Eldest Animus. "I couldn't help it! That human was a master of hand-to-hand combat. He deflected my blows and parried my attacks, plus his guardsmen outnumbered Ylvusk and me a hundred to one! And they had those anti-energy guns, AND the king had like, TWO big robots that started attacking us. We barely made it out alive!"

Smealum shoots me a somber look. "He loves his tall-tales, doesn't he?"

"To say the least." Despite my earlier annoyance, now that Smealum is here, an idea comes to me. I quickly reach under my side of the table, into a pouch beside me, and pull out a few ebony chits. "Hey, Smealum. It's been a long day. Whaddya say the three of us play a few friendly games of Stones and Bones, eh? Rental fee is on me."

The animus smirks. "I'm not betting anything on these games. I used my luck on that Hydra toss. The Devils won't favor me again for a long time." He pauses to scratch his chin. "But hey, if you're payin', I'm playin'."

"That's the spirit." I wink at him and jump up from my seat to chat with the dining manager.

It's time I actually did something enjoyable with my day.

Part 450c: I, Demon

My eyes blink open to the odd feeling of my ears both being nibbled on. I almost leap out of bed, thinking the sensation is due to earwigs, but as soon as I start to move, I realize my arms are pinned. The sensation stops, and I turn my head in both directions to see Cassiel and Samantha winking at me.

"Sammy was right! The look on your face was perfect." Cass snickers to herself before leaning forward and pecking me on the cheek. "After all the hard work you put in last night, I'm surprised we managed to wake you up."

Samantha drags her hair across my chest. "You were snoring. I don't think I've ever heard that before, at least not from you."

"I don't even remember falling asleep, or what I dreamed about. My dreams have been fairly good lately, too."

The succubus's smirk falters. "I didn't sleep at all. Too much to think about." Immediately after the words leave her mouth, she blushes and turns away. "Err, it's no big deal though."

Cass and I share a quick glance before I turn back to Sam. "Want to talk about it? I'm not sure exactly why you have to leave anyway."

Rolling onto her back, Samantha pulls the covers up to her chin. "Um. Well, you see, it's about my- my ah, the actions I've taken of late... and my ranking in demon society."

"Uh huh..." I mutter a soft response, and after a few moments, she continues.

"I killed Gressil. I've been traveling around with the last angel, and a human who, erm, killed a bunch of demons. My actions haven't been befitting of the Second Emperor... so..." Her voice trails off.

Gently, I pull myself into a sitting position. "So, what, are you going to be punished? Stripped of rank? Or... worse?!" A tinge of alarm enters my voice before I can catch myself, but Samantha just shrugs under the covers.

"Dunno. It's never happened before. Demons at the top standing against other demons, that is. The one trait we always shared with angels was our loyalty to those at the top of the pecking order."

Cassiel spins around and flops on top of me to look at Samantha. Her wings, despite her best effort, end up shoving feathers in my face. "Wait, when did you turn against your fellow demons? You never did that! Tell those stuffy bureaucrats they're full of squat!"

With a shifty glance, Samantha squints at Cass. "Um. Those 'stuffy bureaucrats' are friends and acquaintances of mine. The only people who could put me on trial are member of the demon council, which is comprised of the eight highest ranking demons, though the First Emperor never attends. Usually, I wouldn't either, but..."

Cass finishes her sentence for her. "...But you're the one under trial. Are you sure you don't want us to go with you?"

"This is my ordeal," Samantha replies, before her usual playful smile comes back. "Besides, even if the entire council decided to attack me, it wouldn't go well unless the First Emperor was there." Her eyes suddenly look at me and that odd bashfulness returns. "I- I mean, it's not that they're all afraid of me or something! Don't look at me like that!"

"Sam, seriously, it's okay. I know you're physically strong. It's kinda sexy, in a way." I slip my hand under the covers and clasp her hand in mine. "Heck, knowing you're going into a hostile environment, the only reason I'm not super worried is that I know you're a big girl and you can protect yourself. I- puah!" Cassiel's wing shifts a little bit and shoves into my mouth, so I gag on her feathers for a second before reaching up and tugging the damn thing off. "These wings of yours are so unwieldy sometimes!"

Cass glares at me, her face just inches from mine. "Hey! I didn't ask for these wings, you know. Anyway, they're soft and fluffy and sleeping on them always feels like having a mattress made of down, so I bet you're just jealous. Nyeh!" She sticks her tongue out at me, as Samantha giggles in response.

"Oh, geez! You two! I'm going to be so bored for the next two weeks. I don't even know how I'll pass the time! Half of the reason it's going to take so long is that I have to travel all the way to the Council, and that's a multiple-day trip even teleporting around at high speeds."

Samantha reaches up through the covers to tap her lips thoughtfully, and Cassiel climbs off me and crawls out of bed. "Hero could teleport you directly there, Sam. Why not do that?"

"Mmm, thanks, but no thanks. I'm in enough trouble without telling the number one enemy of demonkind where their leaders are located." Sam quickly turns to look at me. "And that means no using 'locate' to follow me around!"

"Gosh, Samantha. I'm not a stalker." I roll away from her and crawl out of bed, sighing at the sweaty mess we've left behind. "Though if you're not back in two weeks, is it at least okay if I check on you somehow?"

"I wouldn't have it any other way." She smiles at me and pulls the covers away to reveal her voluptuous body. "You know, before I leave, I should clean myself up and look presentable. All three of us look pretty gross right now, so..."

Silently, I stare at her for a few moments, pretending I'm a dummy. "I don't understand. What are you hinting at?"

Cass pokes me in the rib, making me jump in surprise. "Omygosh, don't be a butt! Let's all jump in the shower before she leaves. I feel embarrassed even saying it!"

"You two are so antsy about the silliest stuff," I say, smiling as I head into the bathroom. "I'll warm the water up."

It takes a minute, but once the water is heated, I stick my head out the door. "Come on in, it's the perfect temp-" I pause, noticing that Howard has woken up and is waddling around the room, chasing after the nude figures of both girls.

"Wark. Wark." He quacks at them and scurries around as they both giggle and laugh, and both of them quickly run past me and climb in the shower, while the duck stops just outside the door and stares up at me.

"Wark." His eyes narrow as he stares at my manhood hanging out in full view.

I lean down and stare him right in the eye. Keeping my voice down so the girls can't hear me over their splashing, I whisper to him. "You think I don't see what's going on? You think I don't see your sick game? They're mine, you little bastard. No matter how cute you think you are, their hearts belong to me. You mean nothing to them other than being a quick distraction, a motorcycle breezing past doing 180 on the interstate. You're just a leaf caught in the wind, but I am a rock in the ocean, bearing all their weight. You will never be as close to them as I am now, do you hear me, you little punk?"

Howard continues to stare at me. "Wark."

"Hah, just kidding. You're a cute ducky." Saying this, I quickly pat the little guy on the head, then close the door immediately and climb into the shower with the girls.

* * *

An hour or two later, Samantha inhales deeply as the three of us walk down the steps toward the Palace's entrance. She tosses her thick, black hair around, letting it splay all over her shoulders. "What a bother. If demons weren't so obstinate, I swear, there are times when I'd just like to-" She finishes her sentence with some guttural grumbles that don't translate to real words.

Cassiel trots along on my right, glancing past me at Samantha now and then. She casually stretches, before saying, "Oh, I don't know. At least demons know what they want. They always fight toward achieving their goals, and I think that's praiseworthy." A pause, as she considers her words. "Well, aside from the fact the goals of the demons are somewhat genocidal."

"Yeah..." Samantha trails off before looking up into the cloudy blue sky. "Though, based on what happened during the Energy Wars, I can safely say all the sentients are awful in their own ways. At least humans and angels don't make light of devouring the flesh of their enemies."

I curl up my lips in disgust at the same time as Cass does. "I was going to eat later. Maybe I'll pass. Why do demons do that anyway?" Another thought occurs to me. "Not to be rude, but have you ever-"

"No! Gross!" Samantha instantly scowls at me as we arrive at the palace gates. "Not all demons eat humans, Jason."

Despite the solemn look on Samantha's face, Cassiel giggles. "Well, you DO eat the essence of humans, in a way."

"D-different. That's very different." Samantha stops just before we leave the palace, and taps her foot. "Demons take soul energy from humans and add it to their own to increase their power. This can happen in a variety of ways, and all of them result in the deaths of the victim. I've heard demons can take the energy of other demons similarly, but that would be a matter involving punishment by the council."

Her words make me feel ill at the possibilities. "Do demons have to consume human flesh, then? Does that mean that we can never have peace without offering up virgin women to your people?"

Surprisingly, Samantha smiles. "No. It's a matter of greed. Demons can easily subsist on a diet, not unlike humans. As a succubus, my immortality is dependent on, erm, male essence, but many have survived, and even thrived, by limiting their 'portions'. Most other demons don't have a similar handicap though and will live on forever eating food that humans would consider ordinary. It has to do with pride though, Jason. Ninety-five percent of demons are the very lowest levels of mutations, but the five percent of matriarchs and patriarchs have unfathomable power because they've secured their footholds already."

She pauses and looks away from me to Cassiel. "The trouble is convincing them to accept their lot in life. As it is, the River Styx takes the souls of all humans who die and gives it to the Demon Emperors to distribute. This process will happen regardless of how the humans pass on, so it's just a matter of time before all humans eventually become food for demons." Spotting the looks of marvel and disgust on our faces, Samantha quickly continues, "You should know, this is very similar to what the angels used originally for their resurrection system. In any case, most demons love the taste of human flesh. It's a delicacy, you might say."

Cassiel smacks her lips dryly. "Yum."

"I know. It's gross." Samantha's foot tapping slows and stops as she turns away to look at the Great Doors in the distance. "Anyway, convincing demons to abandon the pursuit of human flesh would be the ultimate test of diplomacy. Demons are often greedy and selfish, and they would love nothing more than to kill all the humans as quickly as possible to reap their souls, not realizing that once all humans are dead, there won't be any souls left to absorb. It's a lose-lose situation for both sides."

At last, I spot what Sam's been driving toward. "You think there's a way to make peace a possibility, then?"

"Of course. Both sides are fighting due to past differences, which can be forgiven, but the overall goals are different. A bargain can be struck; I just don't see by whom."

Cassiel steps around me and wraps her arm around Samantha's. "Why not you? You're an influential lady. You rank high among demons, and you have lots of experience with humans. Why don't you?"

"I can't." Samantha cuts Cassiel off and pulls away from her grasp. "I've lost the respect of the demons. I was never present as a leader. I fought against them during this recent battle, and in their eyes, I've allied myself with their worst enemies. I have no political tongue anyway. I'm no good at giving speeches and dumb stuff like that." She crosses her arms and rubs her shoulders, sighing deeply. "I'd be useless."

Cassiel looks bummed that Sam would shut her down so quickly. "Oh. Okay."

After a few moments of awkwardness, Samantha lowers her arms to her sides again. "I'm going to head off. Like I said, I'll be back in a couple of weeks. Take care of yourselves."

"Wait. Hold on." I step in front of her to block her path before she can sullenly stomp off. "We're still going to walk you to the gate."

She gives me a half-hearted smile, before brushing past. "I'm not mad or anything, Jason. All this talk has simply reminded me of all my failures during my life. I'll walk myself, just this once, okay?"

I open my mouth to respond, but she presses her finger to my lips. "Shh. Love you." Leaning up she kisses me softly, and before I can reciprocate, she pulls away. "Take care of our Hero, Cass. I'll be back soon."

Saying this, she turns and walks away, her posture having a slump to it I haven't seen before. Cassiel stammers at her, "I l-love you too, Sammy! Take care of yourself!"

Seconds turn into a minute, and before long, Samantha rounds a building in the distance and walks out of sight.

"Mmm... I don't feel good about this." Cassiel rubs her sandals against the cobblestone and stamps her foot. "Why did she suddenly take off like that? Was it something I said?"

"I think we accidentally hit a nerve, Cass. It's like if someone was talking about being a prisoner of war and it bothered you, reminding you of your life. Some people have things they don't want to think about, even if it seems silly to us."

"It's not silly, per se... I just think Sammy's overthinking things because she's anxious." Cass rubs her hands together, looks at me, then back into the distance where Samantha left. "Ohhh it's all my fault! I said something that pissed her off! I'm such a jerk!"

"It isn't your fault. Relax." I reach over and rub her shoulders gently, but the tension doesn't fade. "If it makes you feel better, why not fly after her and talk with her before she leaves. I get the feeling she's concerned because talking about things in front of me is exposing a side of herself she usually doesn't show to the men in her life. You'll have a better chance alone than with me there."

"You think so?" Cassiel's lip quivers as she stares ahead. "I still see her spirit trail... okay! I-I'll go chase her down and catch her before she leaves. I won't be gone long!" She barely glances back at me before pulling away and jumping into the air, letting her wings carry her up into the sky, where she can easily see Samantha's 'spirit trail' amidst the winding network of buildings and houses.

"Have fun," I mutter at nobody in particular.

Despite looking like a falcon in the distance, Cassiel's flight speed is unthinkable faster than any bird I've ever seen. Within seconds she turns into a speck in the sky, before diving down into the mess of buildings.

Now what do I do?

I suddenly realize what Samantha meant when she said she'd be bored without Cassiel and I beside her. I've grown so used to having the girls nearby, that I feel a little depressed when they aren't. The three of us are practically inseparable at this point.

Turning around, I trudge joylessly back into the palace. I suppose there's Ionis, I think to myself. I could chat him up. I'm sure he'll be suuuuch a joy to talk to. I wish I had someone to play Chess with. That's the one thing neither Samantha nor Cassiel is ever interested in doing. If only they liked Chess, they'd be the perfect girlfriends.

The sound of feet walking up and stopping interrupt my thoughts. "Oh. It's you." A woman's voice from my right makes me turn to look in her direction. A blonde girl, maybe twenty-five or twenty-six years old, wearing an odd white armor with a golden eagle across the front of it, stares me up and down. "Jason Hiro? The Wordsmith?" Her helmet is half open, so I can only somewhat make out her face.

I nod at her blankly. "Yeah. That's me. Most people call me 'Hero' around here, though, haha." I offer a smile to her along with my awkward laughter, but she doesn't smile back.

Her armor is unique. It looks different from anything I saw on the battlefield combatants. She has an aura about her, like that of a leader. Perhaps she's a commander in the military? I don't know many people in the chain of command very well. Then there's the matter of the long sword strapped to her side, wrapped in a beautiful golden scabbard. Flashy, but who uses a sword against demons? Isn't a gun more efficient?

She squints at me. "You look different than I remember. The glowing tattoos especially. How old are you?"

"Do I know you? I don't remember meeting you..." I trail off, but she doesn't answer my question. "I'm thirty-five. Why do you ask?"

The girl raises an eyebrow. "Years? Not hundreds of years, or millennia, but just years?"

"Uh. Yeah?" Now I'm perplexed. She's suspicious as hell. "Who are you?"

A look of irritation passes over the girl's face, as she looks to her right and left before turning back to me. "When was your arrival point? Do you know what the Sword of Damocles is?"

I continue to stare at her blankly, but an odd feeling, deep in the back of my lizard-brain, starts to buzz. "You're asking an awful lot of questions, and you haven't answered any of mine. Why don't you tell me who you are, and then we can continue with the pleasantries-"

She cuts me off and glances down at a display on her wrist. "Damn. I'm in the wrong stream. Forget you saw me. It was a false reading."

A moment later she surprises me by taking off into a dead run, moving much faster than an ordinary human could.

"Hey! Wait!" Before she can dash out the front door, I yell at her. " Stop! "

She continues running, as if my magic has no effect. What the fuck?

Using the agility the gods have given me, I leap after her, chasing her afterimage through the palace courtyard. The moment she glances back and sees me in pursuit, it's as if someone fires off a gun to signal a race. A blast of energy surges out of the armor from her back, and her helmet closes up. She races forward at a speed far exceeding anything a human can muster.

That's when the alarm bells coalesce. She's a demon! I've seen the type before. She might look like a human, but it's a disguise. How she got her hands on such an advanced piece of technology is something I'll have to find out later.

" Speed! " I yell out the word and increase my agility even further, dashing out the palace gates after her. Men and women yell in surprise as we rush past, the wind following us in our wakes.

Still, this demoness keeps her speed up. Each time I reach forward to grab her, she ducks, dodges, or jumps to the side with an inhuman level of agility.

"Goddamnit! Stop, you crazy bitch! I just want to talk!" Throwing logic out the window, I curse at her with the hopes she'll slow down. She's a slippery fucker, that much is for sure.

Only once we arrive in the main city do my problems truly blow up. She leaps through the window of a house, smashing out the panes of glass and scaring the shit out of whoever lives in there. I jump after and dive past furniture and other crap, nearly kicking some poor little tyke right in the face, but dodging him at the last second, before diving out their other window.

Just when I thought she couldn't be any more of a ninja, the woman begins teleporting short distances, this way and that, and a strange magic field begins to form in front of her. Almost as if she's building up energy for something!

As we race down the street, past this vendor and that, she deliberately reaches out and slaps a stall of apples out, hurling them behind herself to slow me down. It barely works, but it distracts me just enough that I almost don't notice the bright flash of light where she once was.

I come to a screeching halt, still breathing evenly, and gaze around.

The woman is gone.

"Who the- no, what the fuck was that?" I say, to nobody at all.

"Hero! Hero?" Cassiel's voice, in the sky above. She flies down and lands beside me. "What happened? I heard a sound like a sonic boom, and saw you run past. Are you okay?"

Silently, I grind my teeth together. It takes me a few moments to respond. "Someone just tried to pull a joke on me, and it wasn't funny. Not in the slightest."

The wind from my wake catches up and gently blows past us, as I stare at the spot the woman vanished. " Locate. "

Whoever that was, I lost my chance to find out her identity.

Part 451c: Bloody Good Times

The third most powerful demon in existence, Diablo, limps down the hallway. His small entourage of a half-dozen guards, ordinarily unnecessary for one of such power as he, have been summoned due to the grievous wounds he suffered at the hands of the Second Emperor, Belial.

He almost trips over a small rock, but before one of the guards can reach forward to steady him, Diablo snarls at the scyther, "No! I don't need help walking."

The lesser demon pulls away and smirks behind his leader's back. "Belial hurt you pretty good. You shouldn't have pissed her off, boss."

"Obviously." Diablo glances at his shoulder, where a giant chunk of flesh is missing. Already the wound is turning a dull brown. "Seven Devils. This festering flesh burns like the fires of Tartarus. I'd kill for some ice."

Two of his guards glance at each other before looking at their emperor. "We could summon an Ice Gypsy, my liege. I believe there might be one in the 425th District."

"Let us see what Hellga has to say first." Diablo rounds the final corner, breathing heavily as he finally enters the Recuperation Quarters in his district. It's a place where demons injured in battle, and of sufficient value that they're worth healing, would typically retreat. He wrinkles his nose as the smell of many ointments and bubbling, oozing wounds greet him. The demons behind him are even more uncomfortable.

"Hellga. Hellga!" He coughs the words out, choking as another chunk of phlegm catches in his throat. "Where are you, woman?"

An imp scurries up to Diablo's feet, looks him up and down, then bows several times quickly. "The mistress is attending to the sick, master Diablo sir! Nyeh heh! Take a seat, and she'll be with you in a few minutes!"

"She'll be with me now. I'm the Third Emperor of our people. My life is more valuable than the lower classes."

The imp squirms uncomfortably. "Mmm, y-yes, of course! As you wish, oh great one! Nyeh heh heh!" Cackling like a hyena, the imp scurries away, and Diablo limps over to a nearby bench and carefully sits down on it, wincing as his shattered hip-bone rests on the cold demonstone.

"Gah! That Belial, she knows where to punch to maximize damage."

"How'd she beat you anyway, Emperor Diablo?" One of his guards leans against a wall and pulls a bloodied sausage out from his cloak, and starts munching on it.

"I'm never sure. I've fought Belial just twice in my life before and lost both times. This last fight was the third. I believe she uses her bewitching aura in combat to put me at a disadvantage. My blows were sluggish and weak compared to when I've fought other demons, such as Bael. Then again, it may just be that she's so adept at combat, despite loathing violence, that I simply can't lay a hand on her."

His guardsman smacks his lips as he takes another bite of the sausage. "Is it true you didn't land a single hit on her?"

"Sadly."

Diablo's shallow breaths turn to slightly stinging pain as the minutes tick past. His battered ribs rise and fall in time with his chest, each movement a painful reminder of the savage defeat he was handed at the fists of one of the two demons who could easily kill him in the Labyrinth.

"Seven Devils. I thought I told that demoness to hurry up." Diablo grumbles to himself, but at that moment, the sound of footsteps rounds the corner.

An ugly old hag with bags under her eyes and droopy skin skulks forward, and rasps at him, "Oh look. It's the other one. Got your ass beat, didja?"

"Yes." Diablo's reply is curt. "I need healing."

"What a shocker. I'd never have guessed, since you showed up injured at the healing headquarters. What's next, are you gonna pop over to the mess hall and tell them you're hungry?"

Diablo gnashes his teeth. "For devil's sake! Can you cut the chatter and heal me already?! I need to be back on the frontlines as soon as possible."

Hellga blinks slowly at the Third Emperor, deliberately keeping her eyes closed for a split-second before opening them again, as if to non-verbally ask, are you stupid? "I hope you aren't in a rush, great leader. You're in worse condition than Bael. With wounds like those, it'll be a few months at best."

"What do you mean? Just use magic, heal me up, and I can leave this place." With an effort not unlike trying to shove a boulder by sneezing on it, Diablo pulls himself to his feet and staggers toward the old bat.

"Healing magic? If you wanted that, you should have asked Belial. She's the best healer among us. Nobody else comes close."

Diablo stares at the hag, dumbfounded. "Belial is the one who did this to me. Do you mean you have no healing magic? I thought you were the second greatest healer among demons!"

A shrug. "If Emperor Satan were alive, I'd be third. As it stands, I do possess some restorative spells, but at best they will remove some toxins and patch up the skin. The internal damage will need to be healed in the Blood Vats."

The third emperor stares at the old woman for a few long moments. "Blood Vats?"

"When was the last time you were injured, tubby?" She pauses and thinks the question over. "Correction: When was the last time you were injured and afterward healed by someone other than Belial?"

Diablo glances back at his guards before turning back to Hellga. "It's been... a few eons or so."

"Mmm. We lost a few healers during the human invasion. Our healing quarters are nearer to the lairs of humanity, just in case invasions turn south and demons require medical attention, as I'm sure you know. It's a double-edged fang, as this puts our most proficient in harm's way." She tosses her hands up in the air. "Oh well! Unless you wish to apologize to Belial, there's no getting past it. You and Bael both will be out of the fight for a while."

Curses. Diablo's mind rages with thoughts. If only I could ask the First Emperor for help. He might be able to heal me, but it would be so humiliating to ask. I'll have to appoint a proxy while I recuperate. Belial has been summoned before the Council, so after they determine her punishment... perhaps Mephisto? Agares? Barbatos? Someone must lead the war effort.

As the thoughts roil through his mind, Hellga grows impatient and taps her foot. "Are you done wasting my time? I have many injured males and females to attend to after you. You've certainly given me plenty of injured to care for, some more grateful than others."

The Third Emperor grimaces. "Fine. Let us begin. The sooner I heal, the sooner I can be back on my feet."

Hellga rolls her eyes. "And the quicker I have one less whiner to attend to. Come along." She starts to turn away, but pauses. "Those guards of yours are going to take up a lot of room. They'd better get their grub from elsewhere. The food here is for patients only."

The guard from before holds up his nearly finished sausage. "I'm good."

Another shoves him rudely. "No need to rub it in our faces! Some of us haven't eaten since the battle, you fat oaf!"

Diablo's stomach growls. "You with the sausage. Go and grab food for the rest of them."

"Aw, rats." The guard scarfs the rest of his sausage down and sighs. "Fine! I'll be back."

As he stomps off, Hellga beckons, and Diablo follows after her, along with his five remaining guards. They round several corners, passing demons who are violently ill, some missing limbs, and others moaning in delirium before she stops in front of a small hut.

"This houses the blood vats. Only Dukes and Emperors may use these, unless we're stuffed to capacity. Luckily, you won't have to wallow in misery all by yourself. You have a friend." She rolls her eyes again. "And based on how he won't stop complaining about you, I'm sure your conversations will be delightful."

She pulls the cover back from the hut's doorway and Diablo's already pained body creaks miserably as he spots Bael staring at him, laying up to his neck in a bloody concoction from a hole in the ground.

"Oh, great. Here to beat me to a pulp again?"

Diablo sighs. "Bael."

"Diablo."

Bael watches as Hellga guides the third over to a pit directly across from his fellow duke. "You two are the only ones here, so I assume you'll be good company for each other."

"Sure." Diablo keeps his voice neutral as he stares at the pit filled with blood. "What is this? Just blood? From what?"

"Humans, of course." Hellga leans forward and dips her finger in the liquid, pulls it to her mouth, and licks heartily. "Not as good as the soup or other concoctions, but adequate for healing purposes."

Diablo grimaces slightly. "I do love a good Blood Soup, but how will bathing in human blood make me heal faster?"

"Human blood is toxic for themselves, but it has many beneficial properties for a demon. Just get in already!" Hellga's polite tone turns sour as her patience wears thin once more. "Don't be a baby!"

The Third Emperor nods, strips his ragged pants off, then carefully lowers himself inside the pit. "Ahh... this does feel quite relaxing."

Hellga, finally satisfied that he's ready, turns toward the door, shoos his guards outside. "These two need plenty of rest. You wait outside and guard the doorway. Just don't block my path! If one of you worthless simpletons dozes off in front of the door, I'll have your heads!"

Diablo chuckles slightly, despite the pain, as the nasty old bitch shoves his guards outside the door. After they've left, he tilts his head slightly to stare at Bael, who is gazing back.

"Well then."

"Yup." Bael scrunches up his face. "I'm guessing the Second tore you that new asshole?"

"Who else could it be? The human?"

Both demons share a good chuckle, and Bael reaches up from the blood to wipe away a tear of laughter. "That whelp couldn't even beat me! Not a chance he could lay a hand on you." A pause. "The Second is really somethin'."

The smile vanishes from Diablo's expression, as his aura turns grave. "Aye. With her flipping sides, and me out of the fight, plus the fact I can't rely on you for the immediate future, I don't know who could lead our people in battle against the humans. Perhaps Barbatos... he is ancient and has fought many battles, but his prowess on the battlefield is nowhere near the level needed to command the Demonic Legions."

With a smirk, Bael flicks some blood across the room at Diablo, but it falls short and splatters on the floor. "I s'pose the First will have to come out of hiding and lead the army himself. It's about time the bastard did some work."

The Third Emperor shakes his head as his eyes lower to the blood surrounding him. "He hides his identity for reasons unknown. If he hasn't shown himself yet, it will take something big to change that fact."

The two grow quiet as Diablo retreats to his thoughts.

After a few minutes, Bael chortles under his breath. "Hey, Diablo."

"What?"

"The blood's pretty tasty, but don't drink it. It gives you gas." Saying this, he squirms a little bit, and a giant bubble floats up from under the blood, popping on the surface.

Diablo scrunches his face up. "You're disgusting; you know that?"

"Mhm."

* * *

The walls race past in a blur as Samantha uses the agility granted to her by an all-powerful dragon from ages past, tearing down this corridor and that at half the speed of sound. Sometimes she leaps against a wall, pausing for a split second before jumping off it with a short burst of even faster acceleration.

Skeletons, demons, goblins, every manner of monster breezes past her as she deftly leaps, dodges, and runs against the walls here and there to avoid them.

From out of nowhere, a huge orc appears, blocking a cramped hallway. No time to stop, her mind screams! It's too late. Digging her heels in, she only manages to slow herself down before slamming into the massive brute with tremendous force, smashing him against a wall at the end of the hallway.

Wincing, she pulls herself to her feet. "Oh gosh, are you okay there, big guy?" She quickly hops over to the orc, who is laying dazed against a wall. "I am soooo sorry! I'll heal you right up!"

After weaving some magic, she helps the orc to his feet, and he smiles politely at her, his two thick lower teeth sticking out and above his lips. "Ah, thank you, my lady. I thought I was at death's door, for certain."

Samantha frowns. "Err, you're welcome. How hard did you hit your head? I don't think I've ever heard an orc as well spoken as you."

The big green monster blushes. "Ah, I am... a clan elder! Yes, an aged one among my people. I am much more intelligent than the average brute you might associate with those called 'orcs.' My name is Grok."

Samantha scratches her chin. "Wow, I don't know much about orcs, but that's really something. Uh, my name is-"

"Belial, yes. The Second Emperor of the demons. You seem to be in quite a rush."

She smiles sweetly. "Ah, my face is very recognizable." The smile dissolves as she suddenly feels embarrassed. "Err, well, I'm heading to a council meeting right now. See, I kinda... well, I've done some stuff lately that tarnished my reputation a bit..."

"Collaborating with the humans, as I've heard." Grok picks up his staff from the ground and leans on it lightly. "I suppose you must feel some affinity toward them."

She averts her eyes, but he shakes his hand at her. "No no, it's nothing to be ashamed of, my dear. Humans do, after all, have some admirable qualities. All creatures hold a moral system, and none are truly superior to that of the others. Even my people, ignorant though they be in the ways of speech, care more for their brood spawn than do many of the other monster races. I consider it our finest feature."

Samantha looks back up at the huge, lumbering creature. "You are an odd one, after all. To hear a monster, and an orc at that, praising humans... it's a little abnormal."

"Oh, most certainly, my dear. But, to be fair, I have known some humans, an angel or two, and even a few of the Volgrim. I've been alive quite a long time, you see."

The succubus blinks in surprise. "Even a few Volgrim? Shouldn't I have heard of you, in that case? You must hold quite the influence to know someone from every race."

Grok wipes a small tuft of hair back with his hand. "I've been alive since before the Energy Wars. Due to unique circumstances, I've learned a bit of this and a bit of that. As I said, not all members of any given species fit perfectly into boxes with designated features. Why, from what I hear, some succubi and incubi despise sexual relations. Isn't that right?"

Sam sighs. "You got me there. You're the real deal." She cracks her neck and glances at the rest of the Labyrinth in the direction she was heading. "Well, um, in any case... I do need to be going, Elder Grok. It was nice talking with you."

"Mmm. And you as well." Before she can turn away, Grok reaches out and puts his hand on her shoulder. "Tell me, before you go... do you regret allying yourself with the humans?"

"Huh? No, not particularly..." Uneasiness sprouts in Samantha's mind, and she fidgets with her feet. "I mean, I just wish we could all get along, you know?"

"So you would change things if you knew how?"

"Well, maybe..."

"I see." Grok pulls his hand away. "You possess everything you need, but you lack just one thing on your journey. Sadly, it is not something even I can help you with. You must find it on your own."

Samantha stares at him, her mouth slightly open. "W-what's that?"

"Courage. You must learn to stand up proudly, and be more than what your species limits you. You must stop thinking of yourself as a succubus, and start picturing yourself as a leader. Your biology is not the barrier you think it is."

A warm feeling appears in Samantha's chest. "I... see. I hadn't thought of it like that before."

Grok gestures down the hallway from where she came. "Do you hear them? The voices?"

"Huh? What voices?" She leans forward to strain and listen, but Grok pulls her back.

"No no, I do not mean the words you can hear, I mean the words you cannot hear. You know they are spoken, but never in your presence. They hold you back. The other demons think of you not as a leader, but as a sex-fiend. You know this, but choose to pretend the words don't hurt, when they do. To move on, you must accept who you are, and only then will the courage come when the time is right." Grok smiles. "Trust me; I've read books."

Samantha nods, gazing at the lovable orc in awe. "Th-thank you. Nobody has ever spoken so frankly to me."

"The ones who care about you don't wish to hurt your feelings, and the ones who don't care, fear your power. However, words have a power of their own. Sometimes a single word can win a war, where even the deadliest weapon could not."

In Samantha's mind, images of Jason appear. "Yeah. You're right about that."

"I certainly hope so. In any case, I'm sure you have places to be."

She blinks quickly, shaking the feeling of awe from her mind. "O-oh, right! Well, in any case, thank you, Elder Grok! You've helped more than you know."

"Oh, please, just call me Grok. Formalities are so stuffy and constricting." Grok winks at her before pulling away. "Tell you what; I'm going to create a portal to send you right to the council. I think you're more ready to face them now than you were before."

The girl blinks in surprise once more. "You're full of surprises. Eloquent, charming, knowledgeable, and you even have magic." Samantha steps away as Grok moves his hands to form magical signs. "If I weren't already taken, I could fall for you."

For once, the big orc blushes. "I am already with mate, myself. I do thank you for the offer though." Stretching out his hand, he closes his eyes as...

...nothing happens.

Samantha stares for a few moments. "Um."

"Just a moment."

Another few seconds pass "Err... maybe you messed up the sign? Those hand movements were a little clunky."

"No, no. It just takes a moment to- ah, there we go." A huge orb of blue expands in the hallway, as a portal just big enough for Samantha to step through opens up.

"That took longer than I expected. Do spells usually have a delay for you?"

Grok shrugs. "Sometimes."

"Cryptic. Well, I won't look a gift Hydra in the mouth. Thank you, Grok, for everything. You're a real devil." Samantha steps through the portal and waves, as it closes up behind her.

Moments pass, as Grok stares at the spot where she vanished. "That was a little awkward at the end, Daisy."

The girl appears at the end of the hallway and jogs up to her orc friend, squirming the whole way. "Sorry! I had to read your mind to figure out where to open it! You should have warned me first! That was sooo impromptu!"

Grok brushes off his shirt. "All is well that ends well. You got back just in time." He raises an eye curiously. "So, is this the right stream?"

Daisy shakes her head as she pulls off her helmet. Her long, curly blonde hair spills out and down her back, and she cricks her neck to relieve a bit of discomfort. "We're almost certainly in the wrong stream. This Jason is much too young. No sign of the one we're after."

"Mmm. Unfortunate." Grok reaches into the folds of his robe to pull out a small datapad, before tapping buttons and prompts on his screen. "So many universes to visit, but at least we have all the time in the, err, multiverse. Shall we try another one?"

"Yeah, I guess so. What else is there to do?" Daisy tosses her hands in the air, then pulls her foot back and taps her toes on the ground. "My feet are killing me. I hope the next universe has a nice spa, or something."

Grok steps behind her and rubs her shoulders gently. "We can take a few years off. Don't worry, my dear. Eventually, we will find the convergence point. It has to be out there somewhere."

Daisy nods and taps her arm panel a few times, pressing a little harder each time. "I know, I know. Next place we stop though, I need to do some maintenance. The damn suit keeps bugging out. Took me five seconds longer than it should've to get away from that one Jason." She frowns and stares at the wall as Grok rubs her shoulders. "I wonder what was up with the dark skin and the glowing tattoos."

"He saw you?" Grok raises an eyebrow, as Daisy sheepishly turns her head back to look at him.

"W-well, I kinda said... 'hi...'"

"Daisy..." Grok pulls his hands away and crosses his arms. "You know that could cause a split. Try and keep those interactions to a minimum."

"B-but, you...!" Daisy beckons to where Samantha departed. "You were just talking to that woman!"

"She isn't a Traveler. It's fine. Besides, I cannot allow a woman to carry such a weight on her shoulders alone. It will hurt my pride." Grok chuckles under his breath. "Let's go. There's no time like eternity."

"Right." Daisy sighs as she places the helmet back on her head. "Centurion, locate the next closest stream for me."

"ORDERS CONFIRMED, PILOT DAISY SOKOLOV."

Part 452c: Realization

A soft knock at the door. Three light taps, as always. At least she's predictable.

"Yes, you may enter, Rosalia." I finish buttoning up my long-sleeved undershirt just as she enters. Immediately, her eyes are drawn to my body, as expected. Every one of my muscles is chiseled to perfection, every facial hair diligently burned off three times a day, to ensure my face looks the same at all times. Unfortunately, the hair on my head can sometimes grow a little too much before I have it professionally cut, but such is life.

Rosalia's eyes turn away, averting from my unusual clothing. I'd ordinarily be slightly annoyed that someone was seeing me without my full suit on, but it's just the little twerp, after all. Her thoughts are of little consequence to me. The slacks and the undershirt will have to do in the mornings.

"I-I brought your suit, Mister Beelzebub, sir." Rosalia fidgets slightly as a worried look crosses her face. "But, um, please don't get mad or anything... there was a small accident while I was ironing them, and the, um, the iron overheated..."

My eyes narrow instantly. "Show me the damage."

Her hands shake as she carefully hands me my neatly folded jacket and pants. I unfurl the jacket and place the pants on the bed, staring for several moments as I examine yet another one of her mishaps.

"The b-burn isn't too noticeable, I hope..." The female wrings her hands together, even as she waits for me to verbalize my thoughts.

"This jacket is ruined. The second in only two days." Both of my hands clench the jacket's shoulders tightly as I stare at the lightly singed chest. "Do I ask too much of you?"

"No! Of course not, sir! I'm just, very clumsy... I didn't mean to, and I'll buy you a new suit-no, three new suits! You don't have to spend a dime!"

She's referring to human clothing, of course. While the designs for my outfits might be human in origin, the embroidering and stitching for them have always been performed by the most talented tailors among my people. Humans have no hand in making them, and I wouldn't wear such a suit if they did.

"No need. I will simply request another. I suppose I can't leave my room today since you have once more doomed me to wearing peasant clothes. I'd sooner die than be seen in public wearing such rags, especially if made by humans."

Rosalia bows her head. "You hate the humans that much? I mean, it's just clothing..."

"All things in life matter. If you hated humans a tenth as much as the average demon, let alone myself, you would understand. It's all about the principle. The failure of Diablo to crush the humans, and his subsequent fall at the fists of the human-loving Belial are proof that he is unfit to lead demonkind. Diablo considered the humans insignificant and thought it might be okay to ignore the vermin crawling out from under the rocks. He received a small punishment compared to his crime."

The younger demon looks at me in confusion. "Belial was the one who wounded Diablo? Where did you hear that?"

I resist rolling my eyes. "Obviously I have many sources. In any case, the fact that a human-lover was the one to give him the beating he deserved doesn't sit well with me. Belial is traveling to a tribunal where she will be forced to atone for her betrayal of the demons, but Diablo and Bael are out of commission. I suppose it will fall upon Mephisto's shoulders to lead the war effort... unless the First comes out of hiding."

"The First Emperor?!" Rosalia's eyes widen in awe. "B-but, he's never revealed himself! He could win the war all by himself if he wanted!"

"Possibly." I keep my voice neutral as I mull over the thought. "With his Second in command allying with a powerful angel and a human... the future has yet to be written. I often wonder if the First Emperor is the powerhouse everyone thinks him to be."

Rosalia scoffs, despite her lack of knowledge. "Of course he's unthinkable strong! If he can be at the top of the demons, he's practically a god compared to the humans!"

"I thought you liked the humans?" I raise an eyebrow at my younger peer. "It sounds like your allegiances are more blurred than you think."

She runs her finger across the hem of the pants lying on my bed. "It's not that I'm loyal to the humans or anything, I just think they're fairer. Humans help the weak, and they don't leave them to die, as the demons do. Don't you think that's a more compassionate way to treat others?"

It takes a mighty effort for me not to lose my composure and laugh in her face. "Compassion is a sign of weakness. You may choose to hug the enemy trying to impale you, but it will only lead to a skewered stomach. Demons breed strength, humans foster frailty. That is why demons rule the galaxy, while humans struggle to crawl out from under our thumb. They are inferior."

Rosalia's expression turns indignant. "But didn't humans hold all the power at one time? Demons were hiding in the shadows!"

"We turned the tides of war and defeated them. It was simple."

Her expression shifts again, this time to a frown. "They grew lax, considered us a non-threat, and we crushed them! That means the same could happen for them toward us now!"

Before I can offer a retort, I suddenly realize her words have a certain wisdom to them. This sudden realization fills me with many emotions and thoughts at once. "Hmm. Perhaps you are right. Diablo underestimated them, and it nearly cost him his life. The humans offer honeyed words, and a weapon impossible to defend against. Their ideas cannot be snuffed out by merely killing them, and may indeed grow strong enough to turn more demons to their side. Indeed, Belial and yourself are proof of that."

Silently, I turn away to look out my window at the human city beyond, where a sun shines down and warms its streets. A minute passes, as Rosalia's quiet breathing is the only thing audible in the room.

I understand, now. It is not the mechanical weapons of humanity that pose the biggest threat to demonkind, but their ideas and morals. For every demon the humans have killed, three more have spawned in their place. However, the contagion spreading throughout the Labyrinth is not one of death, but of weakness. The demons have yet to realize it, but the humans are infecting us with an illness that must be lanced before it festers into something more sinister.

If a demon fights a human, but doubts for even a second that slaying the human is the right action to take, it will be the last thing that whelp ever does. Worse still is the possibility of the demon laying down his weapons and joining the other side. A few thousand demons have already joined humanity, but what about when their numbers grow to ten thousand? A hundred thousand? Millions? At some point, it will be brother against brother, and we will lose not only the war of ideas but the war of blood as well.

"Mister Beelzebub, sir?" Rosalia's soft, inquisitive voice whispers to me, so I turn back to her.

"That is 'lord' Beelzebub to you, not 'mister.' Are we clear?"

"Y-yes, my lord."

"Excellent." I stare silently at the young demoness before me, evaluating her more carefully than I have in the past. Though drab and dull, without a hint of intelligence resting on the surface, the potential is there for her to become something more. At the least, she has inspired thoughts in my mind that I had never considered before.

Suddenly, a key clicks into place in my mind. A possibility I hadn't considered before.

Perhaps, with the First Emperor's appearance, more things have changed than I first thought.

"I will leave it to you to fetch a new suit for me from the tailor. In the meantime, I will simply have to wear this one today. It seems I have an experiment to perform."

"Huh?" Rosalia looks at me in bewilderment. "You're going to wear the suit anyway?! And what experiment? What do you mean?"

"We shall see. Begone, then, and make sure the next suit you bring me is in proper condition. I won't tolerate another flop from you."

As the young girl nods nervously and scurries out of the room, I snap my fingers to make a small flame appear in my hands.

"I wonder what the results of my little experiment will be?"

Part 453c: Stripped

The tribunal room stretches out before me, rising into a demonstone ceiling carved with the names of past and present lords, dukes, and emperors, alongside their likenesses. Torches made of gold and silver light up along the walls, illuminating the crowd of demons watching the proceedings, all of them seated in the back rows, listening silently to find out what schisms might emerge on this day in history.

Sitting silently before the Council is the Second Emperor, Belial. Among demons, she is the second strongest of our kind. If she were to face any other demon beside the First Emperor, she would win in a battle (most likely), and that alone is what gives her the power and prestige she has done so little to earn among demonkind.

As for showing up to her tribunal without donning any formal clothing, and still wearing her little whorish outfit... well, that's just what we've all come to expect.

"The Duke of Finances, President Ose, will be the primary judge for your tribunal, Lady Belial." Mephisto, the Duke of Mist gestures with his incorporeal hand toward me, and I nod slowly in return. "However, all four of us will have a say in what the results are of this inquisition."

Belial gazes up at us from her seat below. Ordinarily, the eight positions for the Council would be mostly filled up, but as the little bitch nearly killed the Third Emperor, and he had already gone mad and beat the daylights out of Bael, we're two members short. Belial would be another who might sit up here, and finally the First Emperor, though of course, we knew he wouldn't show up. He never does. All in all, only half the seats have occupants, but that condenses the power for judgment among four voices instead of eight, and none of us are pleased with her.

The look on the Second Emperor's face is solemn. "I understand. Let's get this over with."

Her blatant contempt for the court sickens me. It's bad enough that Belial is the only woman aside from myself among the upper-ranks of the demons, but she never takes an active role in leading her kind, leaving it to the men. She's a floozy who cavorts around, doing whatever she wants, while I have to do all the hard work. Worse still is her attitude and the way she carries herself, both of which are very unbecoming of a woman in power.

I lean over the bench to present her case. "Belial, you are on trial today for the attempted murder of the Third Emperor, Diablo, in the middle of an invasion against the humans, as well as the confirmed senseless murder of Gressil, Keeper of the Dungeons. Given that the oracles have already divined the events and confirmed without a doubt that they are true, the question of whether these events did or did not happen isn't on the table today. Rather, this trial is to determine what your punishment should be."

Belial stares at me silently for a few moments before leaning forward and resting her arm on the table before her. "I understand."

Mephisto hisses under his breath. "Sss, yes, but also we must determine a motive. It is not unusual for demons to quarrel among each other in the lower ranks, even going so far as to kill their brothers and sisters, but the further up the ranks we go, the less acceptable such practices become. The point of the caste system is to breed strength among the lower ranks, which will then allow the strong to advance and earn their place in the middle and upper levels. Once a demon's power is acknowledged, further attempts to harm them are dissuaded."

Barbatos, the eldest of our kind, taps the desk to indicate he has something to say. "Even if it were true that we allowed demons of the upper ranks to compete among each other and kill one another to gain strength, which we do not, Belial's attack on Gressil had little to do with such matters. She attacked Gressil in a fit of rage, possibly to protect the human and angel she has grown fond of."

Hah, Barbatos is correct. Finally, the pathetic antics of the Second Emperor will be put to an end, today. It's bad enough that she's a worthless leader, and having a succubus as the Second Emperor demeans the position, but to allow our Second Emperor to assist the enemy forces outright? We should have taken her to trial before she had a chance to kill our most ruthless prison warden.

Better late than never, I suppose.

"Second Emperor, Belial, do you have anything to say in your defense?" Remembering the rules, I give her a chance to defend herself, as it would look one-sided in front of the lords watching from the back rows if we didn't give her a fair shot. Despite how much I dislike the woman, I won't stoop to her level and demean my position or abuse my authority.

She clears her throat, and her solemn expression turns contemplative. Who knows, perhaps she will say something intelligent for once?

"Humans are not evil, and they are not our enemies."

Oh. My hopes were too high.

She continues, "I have spent time with humans and demons alike, over my long life. When I was far younger, during the era of human rule, Satan would often send me to infiltrate human societies. I made love to human men, before plunging the knife into their backs, though usually in a figurative sense. Satan effectively used me to secure demonkind's reach at the upper echelons of human society in absolute secrecy. However, in doing so, I began to change my views on them slowly. Most humans were petty and vain, and they fought for short-sighted goals due to their mortality, such as fame, personal fortune, and wooing the opposite sex. Despite this, I began to see that humans and demons were not as different as I thought, though I wouldn't dare say that to the demon I loved most."

Barbatos holds up a hand. "I was alive during those times, yet I do not recall you speaking your mind regarding your views. Did you fear the thought of having your title stripped? Do you mean to tell us that you have been a convert to the cause of the humans since before the Energy Wars?"

Murmuring in the back from the lords present make me glance behind the Second Emperor. These recent comments are only hurting her case, not helping. She might as well just admit she's a filthy human-lover and be done with it. At least then her punishment will be swift and precise.

"I'm not on the side of the humans, Barbatos. All I am saying is that their grievances with us are as justified as ours with them." Belial grits her teeth. "The humans in the Labyrinth are not the same as the ones we fought during and before the Energy Wars. Mortality has seen to that. These humans hate demons for oppressing them, feeding on them, and making them cower in terror every time demons appeared on their worlds to kill them and take soul energy. Surely, Barbatos, given you and Agares are as old as I am, and even more-so in your case, you can remember a time when demons cowered and hid from humans."

Barbatos smirks. He's not buying it. "Of course I remember. That is why humans deserve their lot in life. They scorched our kind and sent us hiding underground, so in return we now make them feel that same fear. If I didn't know any better, I'd assume you were saying we should let them off easy, after what they did to us."

Belial clasps her hands together on the table before her. "That isn't what I mean. I'm saying that since we once felt that fear, we know that it will not lead to anything but ever-escalating anger and hostility. If someone stabs you, then for the rest of your life you can choose to stab others to make them feel the same pain you once felt, or you can choose not to stab anyone else ever again since you don't want others to feel that pain. There are two paths the demons can take, and one of them will give us a short-term victory but an inevitable loss, while the other will bring us lasting peace."

"Peace." Agares, ever the silent one, speaks a single word, before reaching down to gently pet a giant crocodile beside him. "Such a concept does not exist for demons, nor will it ever exist for any of the other sentients. The very fabric of demon society is built on conflict. First between brothers, then between comrades, and finally against our enemies. Conflict breeds strength, while peace stifles it. Even if the demons and humans truly wished to put the war behind us, it would never happen. We require their souls to mutate our power. As long as that is true, we will never not be at war with the fleshbags."

Furrowing her brow, Belial pounds a fist on the demonstone table, making the entire chamber rumble. "There are other ways! You haven't even considered them! Every time a human dies, their soul travels to the river Styx, and allows a demon to evolve! We don't need to kill them to use their power, we-"

Finally, I've had enough. "Belial! When was the last time you examined the Styx?! Did you not realize how thin it had grown before the First Emperor gave us the power to fight back? Have you been so busy cavorting with the humans that you paid no attention to the needs of your people?" Agares reaches over to touch my hand, perhaps to silence me, but I yank it away. "Humans take forever to die! The only way their natural deaths could sustain us is if we were to allow their population to grow out of control, and if that happened they would pose too big a threat! While you flirt with the human men and cast your responsibilities to the side, my job is to maintain order by giving mutations to those deserving, but our soul energy reserves have dwindled to almost nothing! Chaos is brooding in the Labyrinth, and YOU are one of the biggest reasons why!"

Belial scowls at me. "If we were at peace with the humans, then their population size wouldn't be a risk! Perhaps if we were to work with the Hero, we could find a way to-"

"Bollocks." Barbatos interrupts Belial and returns her nasty expression. "Humans are greedy. You said it yourself. Give a human a drop of water from your bucket, and they will kill you for the rest. If we were to try and make peace with them, they would eventually grow cocky, thinking they could take our lands from us. History corroborates this fact. Your ideas for peace have no basis in reality, and you know it. More importantly..."

The eldest demon trails off and looks up at the ceiling, with the images of demons past and present. "...I believe we now know the answer to this court's question. You plan to ally with the humans at any cost. You care little for the demons and only wish to have this one-sided 'peace,' which will allow you to sleep better every night alongside your new human lover. As such, it is clear that you killed Gressil because he threatened to take the angel back to the dungeon where she belongs, and you nearly slew Diablo because you don't care about the rest of us at all. In my eyes, you are a demon no longer. You are a corrupted human-lover, too far gone to be of value to our people."

It's all coming together now, my mind whispers happily. "The fact she didn't have the decency to heal Diablo after her attempted murder is proof that-"

The bitch interrupts me again. "I didn't attempt to murder Diablo. If I wanted him dead, I wouldn't have allowed him to crawl away. I certainly won't heal him in any case, because he hurt the man I love. He deserves to feel some pain."

Agares sighs and shakes his head. "And yet you healed the human afterward. You were willing to heal a human, but not a fellow demon. That speaks volumes to your convictions, and how you are no longer an ally of those present. I believe the court has made its decision, but the final judgment will be up to President Ose." The Duke of Reptiles gestures to me and leans back in his seat heavily, stroking his long, graying beard.

Barbatos and Mephisto whisper to each other for a minute, and while I can't make out what they're saying, it's quite apparent they're beyond disappointed in what they've found. Finally, Mephisto turns back to Belial. "I fought the human named Hero once, and I died at his hands. It was only the final sacred feather of the Phoenix that saved my life. To think that you would ally yourself with my killer, a human who has destroyed two planets and raised up an army of extermination, it angers me to no end. You have desecrated the memories of those who died in combat against the forces of the humans. I am certain President Ose will make the correct decision regarding how to handle you."

The eldest demon, Barbatos, doesn't say anything. He merely shrugs.

In the end, as expected, it's come down to me. "I will give you one last chance to speak, though at this point your fate is sealed. Have you any final words, Second Emperor?"

Slowly, she glances at all of our faces, then she gazes back at the crowd, before returning to the Council. "I believe you are making a grave mistake. Escalating this war will not serve to bolster demonkind up. Instead, it will bring us down. If maintaining the river Styx is one of your biggest goals, President Ose, then the only way to maintain it will be to send the lower ranks to die at the hands of the humans, which will cut down on its upkeep. Following this, the humans will find a way past the power of the First Emperor, and they will likely create some unthinkable superweapon, as they did during the Energy Wars. You will get your human souls, but in the end, they will win. I am not siding with the humans to upend the society we demons have built, but to protect it. I just wish you could take time to see things from their perspective."

Barbatos, coughs, having something to say. "You've conclusively admitted your belief that the humans will overcome our stranglehold on the Labyrinth. You are irredeemable."

"It's treason, then," Agares mutters under his breath.

Now that the dust has settled, I can allow a smile to creep onto my face. "My ruling is thus: Second Emperor, Belial. You are hereby stripped of your rank and banished from the Labyrinth. I hope never to see you again."

To my confusion, she smiles back. "I refuse to accept that verdict." The demons behind her gasp audibly, as she smirks and leans back in her seat.

Barbatos glares angrily at her. "What do you mean you won't accept it?! The law of this court is final! You cannot protest!"

As if she's been waiting for this the whole time, Belial fans out her fingers and examines her nails, as if she suddenly hasn't a care in the world. "The thing is, you don't have the power to banish me. I outrank you. Further, my rank is not merely a title. It is proof that I am powerful enough to kill everyone in this chamber with the slightest effort. That's the problem with a caste system based on meritocracy. I'm a better fighter than all of you combined. If you wish to strip me of my title and banish me, you'll have to use force."

Despite myself, my jaw drops. I never expected this, not from her. Belial has never asserted herself once in all the time I've known her. It takes a moment for me to form words. "Y-you! You can't just- that's not how this works! Why even show up to this court if you were going to make a mockery of it?!"

A strange look appears in her eyes. She sets her hand on the table and turns away, having examined her nails enough. "I spoke to an orc on the way here. He told me all the things you did, but somehow, the intent was different. I have the power to lead demonkind, but I lack the will. I lack the interest. I gained my power thanks entirely to Satan, and not because of my efforts. I've always just gone along for the ride. I deserve to be punished for that."

She pauses a moment. "But at the same time, while I do not deserve to rule, humans and demons must come to a reconciliation, or the next war we fight may be our last. There is something outside the Labyrinth, a menace that threatens all our lives. The ones who quietly rule over the Labyrinth in secret, the Volgrim, are fighting this danger silently, without telling us. While the demons focus on the humans, thinking only of the Volgrim as an annoyance, the Volgrim are faced with the possibility of their extinction. Once they're gone, we will be next, as will the humans."

Barbatos, his anger having faded, squints at her curiously. "This menace you speak of. What do you mean?"

"I suppose you don't know. I wonder if any here do." Belial shakes her head and sighs. "They're called Kolvaxians. I hadn't even heard of them until I traveled outside the Labyrinth with the human you all despise. They've ravaged Volgrim space, and they dominate the majority of the galaxy. At the rate the war outside the Labyrinth is going, it won't be long before they're at our doorstep."

"Oh. Is that all?" Barbatos groans quietly and leans back in his seat, mirroring Belial. "After we press the humans back into their lairs, we will fortify the Labyrinth for this new menace."

"Exactly." Before Belial can try and worm more words in, I take the initiative. "In any case, even if we can't stop you, killing us will enrage the First Emperor and will turn all the demons against you. You don't have the authority here that you think you do."

"I'm trying to save lives, President Ose. Why don't you tell me how you really feel? It's apparent to everyone here that you have a personal vendetta against me, so I'll just apologize now for whatever I did to get you so riled up."

I'm not going to take her bait. "That doesn't matter. In any case, if you won't leave the Labyrinth with grace and dignity, we will have to summon the First Emperor, and he will pass judgment on you. After hearing the court's testimony, he'll make you wish you had chosen banishment."

Belial's gaze softens. "I wouldn't be so sure." Her words are quiet, just barely audible enough for us to hear. "The First Emperor is..." She pauses and looks away. "...I should speak to him, then. If you lot won't listen to reason, perhaps he will. Maybe I can finally tell him the truth."

"Huh?" I try to examine the mysterious color from her aura, but it's suddenly hard to tell what her emotions are. "You think knowing the First Emperor's identity while we don't gives you an advantage? Treason is still treason, and he couldn't deny that. I would take our sentence while you still can."

"I don't know who he is. He erases my memory every time I talk to him." Belial slowly stands up, exposing her barely covered body to all present. "I have a hunch. If I'm right, I could put an end to this war, and the four of you will be saved, even if you don't deserve it."

"We don't deserve- the nerve!" Mephisto hisses under his breath. "Worthlesssss... fine! Go and see the First Emperor, then! Use your succubus charm to save yourself! Cast yourself at his feet and do anything he tells you! I pray he uses you up and tosses you aside like the worthless whore you are."

A look of pain on Belial's face fills me with delight. Mephisto's words sting, and she can't hide it.

"I... I can't be like that anymore, Mephisto. That was the old me. I have someone else, now." The look of despondency on her face makes me quiver with joy, as she slowly turns and walks out of the court. After she leaves, I sigh dramatically. "Have an Oracle follow her and ensure she visits the First Emperor. If she doesn't, we'll have to send an envoy instead."

Silence fills the court. Mephisto swallows carefully. "Um. Who would want to go? Diablo is out of commission..."

"I don't want to see the First Emperor... what if he kills me?" Agares turns white in the face at the thought.

Well, imp-shit. I didn't consider that much. "If you men are too weak, I'll do it. I'm sure after he casts Belial aside, he'll require a new queen at his side."

Barbatos leans forward to look past Agares. "Funny, after everything you said to the Second, I never took you for that kind of a woman."

Shut up. I'm a pragmatist.

Part 454c: Savior

"Jason? I'm going to the inner city for a bit. Want to come along?" I nudge the door to our room open and sigh, as I spot him sitting in a chair, with that board game in front of himself again. 'Chess,' as he calls it. The room is dark, despite it being the middle of the day, because he has the curtains pulled shut. Instead of using the electric light above, just a few candles illuminate the room.

"No, I'm just going to remain here for now," he says, moving a white piece before spinning the board around to play as the opposite color. I don't understand the appeal of playing a two-player game all by his lonesome, but then, I'm not interested in games.

Quietly, I rest my hands on my hips, lightly tapping my finger as I watch him stare at the board. "Moping around isn't going to bring Sammy back sooner. You should get some sunlight; it'll make you feel better."

"I feel fine, Cass." He's unusually curt, as he moves one of the smaller black pieces ahead two spaces and flips the board around. "I can't help feeling worried about Samantha. It's been four days."

"Uh-huh? She said it would be two weeks. The time to be worried is when it's been two weeks and a day."

"I guess so." He rests his finger on one of the pieces, just as Howard comes barreling around the corner.

"WARK! WARK!" Rushing over to me, Howard stumbles, smacks into the table, and several of the pieces on the Chess-board fall over.

Jason glares at the duck in annoyance. "Why don't you take the duck with you? He's getting on my nerves." As he picks up the pieces, he waves at Howard. "Shoo! Scram!"

"Jason! He's just an animal! He doesn't know any better!" A tinge of irritation enters my mind, but I stuff it back down. Jason's just troubled about Samantha, and he's taking it out on the closest creature he can see. He's a nice guy, but sometimes he can be distant. "C'mere Howard, come with mama."

Howard ignores Jason's anger and rushes over to me, poking at my feet cutely, as he always does. "Wark! Wark!"

I pick him up and cuddle him in my arms. "I'll see you later, Jason."

"You too, Cass." Jason forces a smile as I close the door. When I turn around, I squeak in fright, as Ionis appears behind me from out of nowhere, his iris staring right at the duck.

"Wark!" Howard quacks at the big robot, and I raise an eyebrow.

"You wanna come along too, Ionis? I'm just going to the city."

No response from the robot. He simply takes two steps back, clearing the path and allowing me to pass.

"Okay, then. You'd better be on your best behavior, then. No acting scary or attacking anyone, you hear?"

Again, no response, but he hasn't hurt a fly since I've known him, other than when he protected us from the Volgrim. He's a good robot, and even if Samantha and Jason don't trust him, I do.

I stroll past him, and the Sentinel falls into step beside me as we head for the palace entrance in the distance.

* * *

The sunlight beats down, warming my body as I stretch my wings out. Being indoors, as an angel, has the downside that my wings start feeling cramped after a while. It's like an instinct that I need to stretch and fly now and then or I start feeling depressed. I wonder if birds feel the same way?

After walking past the palace gates, I set Howard down and let him waddle along beside me. "Stay close, cutie. I don't want you getting stomped by people who don't see you."

"Wark." Howard quacks at me, though if he's saying anything, the meaning escapes me.

Only a minute later, I amble down the streets and start to notice an unusual pattern of people staring at me, and often at Ionis as well. To be fair, I barely ever leave the palace since I'm always sticking around Jason, but he constantly mopes around, ever since Sam left. I need to get some sunshine. The fact people haven't seen me before is apparent, as their expressions are a mixture of curiosity and awe.

I pause beside a merchant selling various fruits and vegetables. "How much for an apple, sir?"

He glances away from a customer on his left to look at me and takes a step back in surprise. "F-for you? The one who healed the troops? I'll give you a bushel for free!" He smiles hugely and starts to grab five or six apples to hand them to me, but I quickly shake my head.

"No no, that isn't necessary. I merely did whatever was within my power to save some lives. It's nothing. Treat me like you would anyone else."

His smile transforms into the same look of awe that others have been giving me. "So humble... what they say about you is true!"

Before he can say anything else, an older woman hobbles over on her cane. "Well, I'll be! It's the Divine Mother!"

I raise an eyebrow. "The who?"

"The Divine Mother! The last living angel! You saved the life of my boy, Peter. I owe you so much, and all I can do is pray to you nightly. I haven't a copper piece to my name." Indeed, the rags on her body attest to how poor she is.

"That's more than enough, ma'am. The thought you pray for me warms my heart." I offer her my sincerest smile, but she corrects me quickly.

"I may have misspoken, Divine Mother. I do not pray for you, but to you. It is the least we can do as citizens under your gentle rule."

I don't get a chance to question her about what she means. All of a sudden, half a dozen men and women shuffle a little closer to get a better look at me, and I begin to notice just how many people are in the town square today.

A mother walks past, carrying a basket of vegetables, and her young son follows behind her, holding a jug of water. He can't be more than eight years old. The boy comes to a screeching halt as he sees me. "Whoaa! Are you an angel?"

"What?" I smile politely at the boy, and Howard cranes his neck to see who's asking the question.

"An angel! I've heard the soldiers talk about them. They fly down and protect everyone with their big beautiful wings!"

I glance over at his mother, who looks horribly embarrassed, but I just smile at both of them. "That's right; I'm an angel. I'm the only one, though. The rest are gone."

The woman coughs into her free hand and reaches over to touch the boy's shoulder. "Now now, Alex, it's not nice to ask such personal questions."

"You're beautiful!" The boy looks past me at Ionis. "And that robot is cool too! Can it shoot lasers and stuff?!"

"Alex!" His mother swats him on the back, and the boy flinches, but his grin doesn't go away. "Be polite! Use your manners!"

A man in the crowd pushes through the others. "Divine Mother! I work for the Government as a commander on the frontlines! My son is sick with fever! Can you heal him with your divine powers?"

"My daughter is ill as well," says a woman from a few feet behind me. "She needs your blessing as well!"

"And my husband!"

Several people begin clamoring together, and suddenly I don't feel happy anymore. It's somehow disconcerting, having this many people hemming in on me. My breath- it's not coming as regularly as it was before. "Please g-give me a moment, just a little space..."

"Divine Mother! My family heirloom for a kiss! I love you!" A tall man tries to reach for me, but I stumble backward, barely escaping his grasp.

I'm disoriented... so many people! This was a bad idea. I shouldn't have come into town without Jason! I don't know what to do!

A moment later, an ominous humming sound fills the area and everyone freezes. The air itself vibrates intensely, as if it were caused by the rumblings of something deep below. A second later, I realize Ionis is the source. He takes a menacing step forward, and the crowd leaps back in fright as all their eyes jerk up to his enormous, overwhelming presence.

As if by magic, the crowd scatters, several people bowing politely, others scurrying off, trying to get away. Ionis didn't have to use a single weapon, and he made sure in an instant they knew who was boss.

My pounding heart slows down, and my breathing returns to normal, as the only person left is the merchant from before. He stares up at Ionis, his lip quivering slightly. "That's some robot you got there. I felt every bone in my body tellin' me to run, but I was so damn scared I couldn't. Is it your bodyguard?"

"Um, bodyguard? Sure, something like that. Haven't you seen a Sentinel before?" I feel my shoulders sag a little bit, as the tension from before melts away.

"Never heard of them. Are they a new model? He looks like he could tear some demons apart." The man wipes his forehead, and relaxes a little as well. Evidently, he's realized Ionis won't hurt him.

"Well, he certainly could. Of course, I try to make sure that doesn't happen. I don't like fighting or war. I'm trying to put an end to the demon-human conflict right now, in fact."

"Oh." The shopkeeper stares at me blankly. "I, err, I thought you smote thousands of demons on the battlefield? The rumors going around say you healed our army with your right hand, and slew demons with your left."

I try not to show a visible reaction but probably fail. "Rumors aren't always accurate. I've never hurt a demon in my life, and I'd prefer not to start now."

"Well, you'd best let the local pastors know, then. They've been preaching about how you'll end the war against the demons with the help of the God-King."

My eyes narrow immediately. "What else are the pastors saying?"

The shopkeeper suddenly looks a little bashful. "Well, it's said that the God-King created you in his image, as his ultimate weapon of the light. There's even a prophecy that alongside the Second Emperor of the demons, the three of you will be the instrument of our salvation and lead us to a new age of prosperity, with the demons as our servants, to be forever punished for their crimes."

Silently, I seethe on the inside. Outwardly, I give the man a big, cheerful smile. "Wow! Those are some great prophecies! Where's the nearest church? I need to talk with those pastors as soon as possible."

Reaching for an apple, the shopkeeper tosses me one. "This is on me. I don't get to talk to angels very often, you know. The local church is just up the street, walk four blocks, take a right. You won't be able to miss it."

"Thank you, sir. You've been a wonderful help, Mister...?" I trail off, realizing I don't know his name.

"Oh, my name is Zhao. I'm just a humble man trying to make a living." He pauses for a moment, before that sheepish look resurfaces. "Say, before you go, perhaps you have some words of wisdom? They say angels are the wisest creatures among the ancient races."

Uh oh. I'm not even that smart, let alone 'wise.' The man's eager gaze as he clasps his hands together only fill me with dread.

Come on, say something wise and smart-sounding. You're the last angel, Cass! If you act like an idiot, everyone will think less not just of you, but of all angels in the past as well!

My mind screams at me for what feels like ten minutes, but is probably more like two seconds, until I take a deep breath, calm down, and reach inside myself. I don't have to be wise. Many came before me that shared their knowledge freely, and some of those memories are still within me.

Think. When I was a little girl, what did I learn in Sunday School? I learned words of wisdom from the holy book of my time. A man once walked the Earth who was also the most almighty archangel of them all. What would he say in my shoes?

Ah, now I know. Pausing, I smile sweetly at the man. "When someone hurts you, turn the other cheek. An eye for an eye leaves both participants sightless, but an act of kindness can turn an enemy into a lifelong ally."

My stomach roils as I try my damndest to keep my composure. I hope what I said wasn't something Zhao's heard before, but perhaps there's a chance he hasn't and-

"Ah! I see!" Zhao nods slowly, scratching his chin as his eyes cast downward. "The demons have harmed us many times, but if we return the pain we've felt, we will only continue the cycle of violence. Is that what you mean?"

He... he gets it! Zhao understands what I've been saying all along! My heart leaps for joy, even though I keep my expression neutral. It takes a monumental effort, but I manage to hold myself with dignity and poise.

"Precisely. I wish you the best, and offer a blessing for your shop. May your wares sell well, Zhao."

The two of us slightly bow to each other, and I continue on my merry way, walking up the street toward the church. I've learned a lot today, and all of it has been distressing. The fact people are praying to me makes me feel uncomfortable. Prayers should be given to great gods and angels who have accomplished incredible things. Compared to them, healing a few thousand people is nothing. Besides, Samantha helped out a bunch, and she barely got any of the credit!

"Oh! You're the pretty lady!" The little boy from earlier, Alex, bounds up to me, a skip in his step. "Mum pulled me away, but I wanted to see you again. Will you marry me?" The boy thrusts his hand forward, and in it is a small flower with yellow petals.

"M-marry you? Oh, you're adorable!" I quickly glance around, happy that there's nobody nearby for once. Leaning down, I give him a quick kiss on the cheek. "I already have a man in my life, but I'm sure there's a pretty girl out there who likes you."

"Y-you think so?" Alex rubs his cheek slowly and takes a step back, staring at me in admiration. "There is this girl I know..."

"Oh, splendid! It sounds like you already have someone in mind." I wink knowingly at him, only to realize he isn't smiling anymore.

"Susie Miller. She goes to my church. Vanished a couple of days ago, she did. Nobody knows where she's run off to."

"Oh. I'm sorry to hear that." I suddenly feel awkward, and the boy's expression isn't helping. "Is anyone looking for her?"

Slowly, he shakes his head. "Uh-uh. I tried, but mum needs me to help around the house. Everyone says she must've gotten lost, but I know better'n that."

"What, uh, what do you think happened to her?" I ask the question cautiously, noticing he's much quieter than he was a few minutes ago.

"Um. Well, I sorta... I think a demon took her. One of the demons let loose by the king."

"From the work camps?"

"Mm-hmm." Alex taps his foot on the ground quietly and crosses his arms. "Bloodskins are always up to no good."

"Hey! Don't talk about demons like that. I'll have you know my best friend is a demon, and she's very nice." I wave my finger in his face chidingly, but also pull back and sigh. "That being said, there are plenty of bad ones. Any idea which demon it was?"

Alex shakes his head and taps his lip. "Susie said she'd made friends with one, but wouldn't tell me anything else. I told her to keep her distance, but she didn't. I'm worried about her. The adults don't care. Even the people at the orphanage she lived in don't care."

Nobody cares about her. His words echo in my mind. Memories of being trapped in total darkness, a demon tormenting me every time I was about to break, always keeping me on the edge of sanity, and the realization nobody cared enough to save me... they come back to me all at once. The agony of being too weak even to end my life, too frail to bite my tongue, and the knowledge it wouldn't have worked anyway. I... I wouldn't wish that on my worst enemy.

Somewhere, there might be a girl being held captive by a demon... or worse. At the least, if I don't look for her, nobody else will. I have to find out what happened. It won't sit right with me if I don't. How can I call myself a protector of the innocent if I can't help one little child?

I glance in the distance at the church. Another day.

"Okay, Alex, when did your friend go missing? I need to know more details."

* * *

The Volgrim commander's face is admirably stoic, but in light of the news, it's apparent he's just putting up a veneer of strength. "Holvarius has been taken over by the Kolvaxians. The surprise attack gave us no time to react. Within a single hour, the spores rained down and corrupted all life until our forces in orbit were forced to flee."

The only look I can give him is a solemn one. "Holvarius is only a hundred light-years from the center of Volgrim space. We've lost one hundred billion members of our species, and they've gained as many converts. This is the worst scenario."

"I apologize, Elder Basil. The fault was entirely mine. I wish my apologies could undo my failure." Commander Korvas bows, his holographic image projecting the motion to the entire Council watching.

"I could hardly blame you, Commander Korvas. As the highest strategic leader of the military, it was my duty to protect the inner worlds with sufficient forces. At the least, can you..." I pause, feeling a great heaviness resting on my shoulders. "...can you provide us with details of the attack? How were they able to overwhelm our defenses? Their military capabilities should have been well within our ability to counter. The warp-gates would have ensured we could deliver reinforcements within the hour of their arrival. I cannot fathom how they accomplished so much in a single hour."

Commander Korvas dabs his forehead with a dry cloth. "There was a capital ship among their forces that we hadn't seen before. It wasn't one of our captured machines, and it was decidedly not of Volgarian make. The inside was hollowed out and housed a colossal swarm of small drone ships, all of which surrounded the planet so that none could escape. The ship must have been tens of kilometers long. I've not seen anything like it since..."

The commander trails off, but I understand what he means. "Not since the Energy Wars? Hm. I wonder where the Kolvaxians got their hands on such a ship. In any case, we can't afford to mope around. They're within striking distance of the core systems. If we can't come up with a counter-measure, they're going to wipe us out."

Pausing, I steal a glance over at Elder Lozu. "I suppose the anti-war faction would prefer we hug it out? A hundred billion Volgrim have been corrupted by the Kolvaxian plague. Now is not the time for weakness. We must bring the doomsday research back online if we hope to stop them before it's too late."

Elder Lozu pales as the court turns toward him. He is far from alone in his opinions, as a third of the members present believe that war with the Kolvaxians is folly, but he is the leader, and thus he shapes the opinion of his peers. At the least, I can give him credit for his influence. Few Volgrim of such youth can rise to the level he has in such a short span of time.

His fingers rap on the desk. "It isn't that my faction dislikes the idea of going to war. We simply disagree with the measures you're suggesting. Full-scale annihilation is forbidden by the ancient texts, and bringing that research back to the light would mean desecrating the graves of the Founders themselves! Furthermore, it was buried for a reason. The temptation to use that knowledge is so great that we might be inclined to use the weapons for more than just protecting our existence."

"You think we would use the old technology for civil wars and infighting? Preposterous!" I scowl at my younger peer, as his typical impishness shines through. "The Volgrim have known for eons now that fighting among ourselves will not lead us anywhere productive. Words will solve conflicts better than weapons will, at least among ourselves. This enemy is unlike any we've faced before. If we could recreate the Sentinels, but without their flaws, we could wipe these monsters out before it's too late! You saw what just a single Sentinel did to half our reserve fleet!"

Lozu balls his hand into a fist and pounds the table. "And what if the new weapons are defective like the old?! Not only would we have the Kolvaxians at our doorstep, but a new breed of Sentinels tearing us apart from within! Even if they were completely loyal to their creators, there would still be the possibility the Kolvaxians corrupt the new machines as well! Better to use tried and true weapons of war than experimental, untested weapons with a high chance of backfiring!"

My teeth grind together, nipping the insides of my mouth with their sharp edges. "You... you have to understand... war means taking risks! You cannot win a war by playing it safe!"

"So you would detonate a bomb at our feet in the hopes that shrapnel takes out the enemy? That's not a risk; it's suicidal!"

The two of us glare at each other before I shove away, rubbing my belly in disgust. This is how the discussion always ends. Without a unanimous vote approving their use, we cannot unlock the old archives.

Many thoughts come to mind. Perhaps I could send a crew to the original Volgarius homeworld in the hopes of finding information about the Sentinels. Where one Sentinel exists, a way to make more should be possible...

Bah! Even if I do, Lozu is right that the original Sentinels rebelled. We need to start from new foundations, not build off the old. It's a waste of time!

As always, we're no further to a resolution than we were before. Perhaps I should take the advice of one of my fellow councilmembers, who told me to flee to the nearest galaxy. It's unlikely the Kolvaxians have spread to Andromeda. The Volgrim could make a new life there, and leave the old behind.

We'll just have to keep the option on the table.

Commander Kolvas clears his throat. "Regarding the refugees from Holvarius... there aren't many, but they should be resettled at once."

"Yes, yes... Elder Lozu can attend to that matter." Gleefully, I push the work onto him and smile, even as that same feeling of darkness enters my mind once more.

We're losing the war. If we don't come up with something, and soon, there won't be a Volgrim species left in the universe.

Part 455c: Investigation

Queen moves from E1 to E4. Black's turn. Bishop moves from F4 to H6, retreating from the sudden appearance of the queen. It's a trap. How should White respond? Obviously, since I'm playing both sides, I can't fall into my own trap, but how do I go about avoiding it? Perhaps if I-

My thoughts are put on hold as the bedroom door creaks open, and a weary Cassiel strolls in, sighs dramatically, and flops face-first on our bed to my right.

Quietly, I glance over and evaluate her condition. She's exhausted. "Hey, Cass. Been having fun? I haven't seen you in a couple of days."

Honestly, I was starting to get worried. I used Locate a few times and determined she was traveling all over the city but didn't appear to be in any distress. I'm not her father, so if she needs a day off from me, she can have it. After the way I talked to her last time, I thought maybe I pissed her off, and she didn't want to come back.

"I'm sooo tired..." Cassiel mutters, her mouth embedded in the covers. I can barely make the words out. "I just can't solve the mystery."

I reach over from my little table and squeeze her shoulder. "You doing okay? I thought maybe you were mad at me or something. It seems you've been off having an adventure."

Her wings twitch for a moment before pushing on the bed and spinning her face-up. She gazes up at the ceiling, then closes her eyes and breathes lightly. "There has been a recent series of murders and disappearances in the city. Humans and demons alike. I can't find the culprits."

"Murders?" My calmness vanishes. "What do you mean?"

Cassiel folds her hands and rubs them together for a few moments. "This little boy asked me to look for one of his friends. Her name is Susie. I didn't find her. Instead, I found out that one of the local militia had his throat cut open during a night patrol. Then, I found out that two women in the information branch went missing at the same time. I started to notice that a few demons were reported missing, and just yesterday a demon girl was found hung with a noose, her hands tied behind her back, in her home. I'm disgusted."

"That's awful." I keep my tone neutral, but secretly I'm nervous. Did nobody bother to tell me? Does the King even know? What the hell is going on? "You didn't find any leads, Cass?"

"Not really. The only thing the murders have in common is that most of them happen late at night. The abductions are all over the place."

I narrow my eyes. "But you're sure they are abductions, right?"

She squirms. "Err, well, no... I can't prove that. It's just a hunch."

Turning my gaze away, I look back at the chessboard. "Anything could be happening. This could be humans killing other humans, then still others blame the demons and lynch them, or demons could be the culprits, or perhaps a mixture of both. I know there's still some anti-demon sentiment in the city, but to think either side would go so far..."

Cassiel swallows audibly. "Well, I've talked to demons and humans alike. Both blame the other for the murders and disappearances. The demons I spoke to claimed the humans were killing demons because of irrational fear and paranoia, while the humans claimed the demons were murdering humans and their fellow demons because... well... because demons are animals with no morality."

"Sounds like both sides are running scared," I say, heaving a great sigh.

I crawl on the bed and gently lay on Cassiel's wing beside her, pushing my hands under my head to stare up at the ceiling as well. "Are you doing okay, Cass? It sounds like you're taking these murders to heart. They aren't your fault, you know."

As I expected, Cassiel sighs intensely and opens her eyes. "I mean, of course, they aren't my fault... but people have stopped looking at me as a person. They're treating me like a perfect arbiter of justice. Everyone expects me to solve these murders, but I don't know what I'm doing!" She pauses and clutches her chest. "Shoot, everyone I spoke to had some question they wanted me to answer or some wisdom they expected me to dole out... one man even wanted me to choose the punishment for a thief who stole from his shop. I don't know how to do any of that stuff..."

Cassiel is having a rough time. I gaze at the ceiling silently, thinking about how selfish I've been over the last few days. I can't stop thinking about Samantha and worrying about her getting into trouble or whatever the sentence will be for her behavior. While I've been thinking about her, Cassiel's been out on her own, dealing with expectations she can't handle yet. I remember when I created this city, and I had no idea what I was doing. I tried to make a working monarchic government, and I suppose I succeeded, but my stupid actions sparked a war inside the Labyrinth.

I've been trying to deal with the repercussions of my choices as a leader, and Cassiel is quickly being shaped by public opinion into a role she isn't ready for. It's no wonder Cass is distressed. She's in the same position I was just a few months ago.

"I wish you'd asked me sooner, Cass. I'd have helped you track down whoever's causing trouble. You didn't have to go at it alone."

She doesn't respond, and when I turn to look at her, I spot tears in her eyes. "J... Jason..."

Jerking up in the bed, I turn to look at her. "What?! Was it something I said? I'm sorry!"

She looks away and wipes her eyes with her arm. "No, it's- it's not that. I'm just glad that you care. Every time I think about someone hurting that little girl, it makes me sick on the inside. It reminds me of what Gressil did to me, and then everyone expects me to be strong and wise, but I'm an idiot! I don't know what I'm doing at all! If I can't even help one little girl... I'm worthless."

Jesus. I didn't realize just how much all of this was affecting Cass. Reaching over, I grip her hand in mine. "The fact you went out to help everyone but didn't think to ask me for help proves that you're coming out of your shell, Cass. I'll help you now, but you shouldn't insult yourself like that. Not many people could go through what you have and stay relatively whole as a person, let alone be so kind and forgiving. If it had been me in that prison cell, I'd probably have snapped long ago. You have to look at your strengths, not your weaknesses. That's what everyone else is doing; you just don't see it yet."

She snuffles, so I create a handkerchief and give it to her. After she wipes her nose, she sighs again. "Thanks, Jason. I don't know what I'd do without you."

I snicker under my breath. "Evidently you'd try and solve a mass murder on your own. Your problem is that you think I'm smart, but don't realize I'm pretty dumb too. I've made a lot of mistakes over the last ten years I spent in the Labyrinth, and I'll continue to screw up. Once you realize that nobody has any idea what the future holds, you can stop judging yourself so harshly."

Cass doesn't smile back. "I'm serious. If it weren't for you, I wouldn't have the energy to heal thousands at once, I wouldn't have a role model for what it means to be a leader, I'd be all alone in a foreign world I didn't understand, and none of that would matter anyway, since I'd still be locked up. Without you... I'd be nothing."

I can't respond. My brain locks up, as I gaze at her beautiful form, lying on the bed. Her eyes meet mine, and I feel a deep sadness mixing with a profound happiness. Specters from her past may always haunt her, but she's working every fiber of her body to improve herself. What have I been doing for these last few days? Moping around and playing chess in a poorly lit room? How can I be worried when I barely know the meaning of suffering? If Cassiel can have such a sharp mind after everything she's been through, I have no excuse.

"Hey, Cass. Let's go and find that murderer, together."

Her eyes widen slightly. "Really? You want to help? But what about, erm, Samantha? Weren't you going to play Chess until she-"

"Pff, it's just a stupid board game." I quickly wave off her concerns and tug her hand, pulling her into a sitting position. "I'd rather help you out than mope around like some loser. Come on, with my Wordsmithing and your incredible intellect; we can crack this case wide open, Doctor Watson."

Cassiel's innocent gaze shifts as her eyes narrow. "Are you mocking me?"

"Nope." I smile sweetly and lean in, kissing her softly. "I could never make fun of you. I love you too much."

Blushing, she rubs her wing that I was laying on to stir some feeling back into it. "Yeah, I know. Thanks, Jason."

"Anything for you, Cass."

* * *

"Mister Beelzebub, sir! Hello!" A voice from the door makes me roll my eyes. And here I was hoping this would be the one day she wouldn't drop by. Quickly, I compress the clothes inside my suitcase and zip it up, hiding it under the bed. While I'm not fond of human creations, the function of the 'zipper' is quite fascinating to me. I wonder how the humans thought to make the little pins click in and out of place when the metal flap pulls up and down? Perhaps I've missed a few areas where humans deserve some praise, but those are few and far between.

Once my suitcase is hidden, and I've pulled the covers down to hide it, I groan inwardly. "Yes, Rosalia, you may enter." The young demoness steps inside and her outfit makes me scrunch my face up. "What is that dress?"

"Hmm? This thing? I found it on sale at a flea market! Isn't it pretty?" She pirouettes and allows the red dress, with its many folds and frills to fan out. While indeed it is a 'cute' dress, especially for a precocious young thing like her, it's also gaudy.

"Of course you'd purchase such a thing from a place riddled with fleas." I curl up my lip in disgust. "You should stick to maid outfits. They suit you better. That scarlet fabric looks like something a spoiled bratty princess would wear."

Immediately, she stops spinning and stares at me, a look of awe on her face. I can almost swear I see stars in her eyes. "M-mister Beelzebub, sir... you think I look like a princess?"

"No! That isn't what I said!" Before I can protest further, she spins around again, clapping merrily about my 'praise.' She's an absolute airhead.

"Beelzebub thinks I'm pretty! Hooray!" She stops suddenly and blushes. "If you think I'm pretty, then does that mean you'd take me as a mate?"

Guh. I can hardly contain my disgust. "Certainly not. I care more about power and prestige than I do such pathetic trifles as 'love.' Besides, humans mate to produce offspring, but only Broodmothers can create imps, so there's no point aside from formality and combining the power of two demons. Since you lack any semblance of prestige or power, I'd never consider it."

"Oh..." Her happiness deflates as depression takes hold. The moment barely lasts as another enthusiastic smile appears. "So if I become a mighty demon, you'd take me as a mate?"

Her question gives me pause. "Well, you are rather plain-looking. Even if Belial herself wished for such a privilege, I'd refuse on principle." Another second passes as I examine her. "Have you grown taller?"

Rosalia twirls her finger around a ribbon wrapped around her waist. "Well, um, actually..."

I glance down and notice something else. "New shoes. Designed to increase your height, I presume. The sort of falsification I've come to expect from human clothing."

Her expression lights up. "Human clothes are wonderful! You should think more highly of them!"

"I'd say they're more along the lines of 'tacky.' In any case, why did you come to bother me? I'm quite busy."

"Why did I?" She taps her lip for a moment before remembering the reason. "Oh! I wanted to ask if you were busy next week! There's a festival in the city and I, um..." She suddenly freezes as a look of guilt crosses over her face. "W-well, I wanted to know if you would, err, that is- if you'd like to come with me..."

Oh, seven devils. It's like that, is it? "You want me to go with you to the festival?"

"Well, um, you don't have to..." She lowers her head to stare at my feet. "I guess I'm not pretty enough for you."

"You've got that right." Grumbling to myself, I decide I might as well come clean. I reach under the bed and pull my suitcase out. "I'm leaving this city and returning to the Labyrinth. My recent experiments have proven very fruitful, and now I have a path to embark upon. I doubt we'll ever see each other again."

"What?! You're leaving?" Her voice strains as she stares at the suitcase. "B-but why? Why would you leave? I thought you were stuck here!"

"I thought the same too, but that's what my experiments have proven. I'm freer than I originally thought, and I have a goal now, something to work toward. As for yourself, you can stay behind. You were barely adequate as a housekeeper, and I won't require your services any longer."

My quick dismissal renders her unable to speak. I grab the suitcase from my bed, and she gawks in silence as I push past her. If only she'd come ten minutes later, she wouldn't even know where I was going. So much for a stealthy exit.

Before I can reach for the door handle, she grabs at my jacket sleeve. "Wait, Mister Beelzebub! I don't want you to go! I..." She stammers for a moment before continuing. "...I love you! I don't care if you don't like me at all! I don't care if you won't return my feelings! Can't I stay by your side? I'll follow you anywhere!"

I quickly yank my arm away and scowl. "Absolutely not. You speak above your position. Having you around will make me look weak and ineffective, and that is not the impression I wish to project. Not after what I'm about to do. Stay here, and live among the humans. It's all you're good for."

The young girl stares up at me, tears in her eyes. "How can you be so cruel...?"

"Cruel? If you think my honesty is 'cruel,' then you haven't an idea what lies in wait for you in the game of life. You're pathetic, and as long as you stay like that, nobody will ever care about you. Goodbye, Rosalia."

I step through the door and leave the insect to cry and wallow in misery in her room. As I thought, if my dismissal had this much impact on her, she'd be worthless for my plans.

And what a future it's going to be.

"Heh heh heh..." I chuckle as I stroll outside.

Goodbye, humans. Hello, glory.

Part 456c: The Clone Wars

"Sorry mister Hero, sir, I ain't know nothin' 'bout no kid." The middle-aged man tosses his hands up and thumbs his finger back at the church behind him. "The abbey runs an orphanage on the side, but they only gots a dozen kids 'r so."

Cassiel nudges me aside. "What about a man named Lorence? I hear he went missing two days ago. Do you know anything about him?"

The man frowns and screws up his face. "Mmm, Lorence? He's an old fart, ain't he? In his seventies, I reckon. Barely got outta the house, only came to church once a month. He done gone missing too?"

"Yes." Cassiel nods sadly. "So you say he was infirm? Not very strong?"

"Just about, Divine Mother. Lorence'd lose in a fight to a toddler, haha!"

I thank the man and pull Cassiel away as we head to the church. "Cass, have you noticed a pattern with the victims yet?"

She shakes her head. "Other than the time of day, not really. Have you?"

"Yeah. I have yet to hear of one person going missing who was in the prime of their life. It's always kids and old people. You know, those who are weak and defenseless."

Cassiel's eyes widen. "Oh! You're right! So that means whoever's abducting them is-"

I interrupt her. "We don't yet know these are abductions. Let's not jump the gun."

"Oh, right. Sorry." She blushes slightly. "Well, in any case, if they're being abducted, someone is targeting them because they need easy prey. What about the demon victims? Any thoughts?"

"I don't know enough, yet. Might be a vigilante, might be a false trail to throw us off the human victims, and it might even be a series of coincidental suicides. Tough to say. Only three demons have been murdered so far, so compared to the dozen humans; I'd say they're a lower priority for now."

"Huh?" Cass looks miffed. "A lower priority? Just because they're demons?"

"No, Cass, because there are only three victims. The humans are still being targeted, but the demon-killer is inconsistent." I shake my head as we stroll into the church. "Of all people, I'll be the last one to ignore demons as victims just because they're demons."

"I hope so," Cass says, seeming unusually reserved as I push the doors open.

The church is empty right now, as it's not a day for worship. A single man in black robes quietly walks around, pushing a broom back and forth as he cleans up his floor. When he hears the door open, he looks up at us. "Sorry, but the church is closed for cleaning and- oh!" The instant he spots Cassiel, his visage changes. "The Divine Mother! My word!"

I'm a little annoyed he doesn't mention me, but as he jogs over to us, his smile widens. "And the God-King himself! It is my greatest pleasure to welcome both of you to my church! I am Father Matlock, but you can call me Morgan if you please!"

Morgan Matlock, huh? Pale skin, a giant bald patch on top of his head, and so many freckles on his cheeks it's a little absurd. He's harmless. Might be helpful for our investigation, though.

Cassiel bows and smiles sweetly at him. "Father Matlock, I've been looking forward to meeting you. I've heard... many rumors about your church and the things you teach here."

His church isn't anything special. Wooden benches, a generic symbol of some random bird above the pulpit... heck, for me, it even feels a little weird. Being in a church without Jesus on a cross isn't something I'm used to, let alone how familiar crosses are to me. Sometimes I forget just how foreign the culture in the Labyrinth is, compared to how I grew up.

Morgan nods excitedly. "Yes, yes! I've been spreading the word about your heroic deeds throughout all of Hero City! The Divine Mother, capable of blasting the demons back to the darkest pits of Hell with one hand, and bringing the dead back with her other! Your tales will erupt like wildfire as people preach the good word to their friends and neighbors."

My girlfriend smiles again, but this time barely concealing a small level of annoyance. "Well, about those teachings. Um, you see, I wanted to ask you some questions about a few missing people, but I also wanted to... correct a few things you've been teaching the flock."

It takes a moment, but Morgan's eyes widen in horror. "Oh, goodness! Have I missed your more impressive deeds?! Have I failed to inform enough people of the lives you've saved? Say the word, my lady, and I will cast myself onto a sword in your honor!"

It's at this moment that I realize an awful truth. This guy's a zealot. A fanatic zealot. Cass doesn't know what she's gotten herself into.

"No, no, that isn't necessary! Actually, you've exaggerated a few things a little too-"

"Is this regarding the Seven Virtues?!" Morgan's eyes slam shut and he pounds on his chest. "I beg your forgiveness! I thought that if I gave your figure a few faults, people would have something to aspire to! I will remove them from the record at once. Everyone will know you are the perfect Mother to watch over us all."

Cassiel's face contorts as she desperately forces a grimace down and manages to keep smiling. "No! No, that isn't necessary at all! I simply haven't done the things that you've claimed. I didn't kill any demons. I'd never do such a thing, for I despise war and violence."

Father Matlock opens his eyes and stares at her in confusion. "But, the archdemon, Bael! And the Ancient Deity of Supreme Evil, Diablo! I heard you smote them out of existence with a blast of divine light! Were the soldiers wrong? Have they lied to me?!"

"That wasn't me, I'm afraid. That was actually-" Cassiel pauses, glancing back at me.

Wait, is she seriously thinking I don't know it was Samantha who beat the living shit out of Diablo? I thought we went over this!

It occurs to me that I never outright said I knew, but Cass seems dead-set on not telling me what happened. "Okay, you got me there. I didn't kill Diablo, though! I just weakened him and sent him scurrying away."

Morgan nods, his mouth hanging agape. "Ah! I see, now. So the error lies in my underestimation of your beautiful forgiveness of your foes! How wonderful, how saintly! To spare thy enemy to convert them to thy cause, you must be a most kind and forgiving Divine Mother. I have made you out to be a murderous monster, but in truth, you wish only for love and peace upon the world!"

Cass gnaws at her lip and shoots another glance at me, but I can't read her expression. "Well, that's a little more accurate, I guess. I'm certainly going for more of the 'peaceful' aspect than-"

"Wonderful! Blessed be your name! I shall preach your will from the highest mountains and the tallest buildings! By day's end, this new guidance will become doctrine in our church. Anything for you, my lady!"

Finally breaking down, Cassiel just scowls. "Yeah, I suppose that works."

The Father doesn't notice her irritation. "Splendid, just splendid! What else can I do to help the God-King and the Divine Mother?"

Deciding Cassiel is suddenly not in the right mood to be talking to him, I gently pull her a little behind me. "Perhaps you can assist us with one other thing. There have been a series of disappearances lately. A little girl named Susie vanished in the middle of the night, as well as an older man named Lorence, and several other people. About a dozen, by my count. Do you have anything that can give us a lead? Even the smallest detail can help us find them."

Morgan's expression deflates. Darkness shrouds his face. "Ah, them? They're dead, I'm afraid. Quite dead."

His sudden change in expression chills me. "How do you know that? Do you have proof?"

He nods slowly. "Indeed, I do. Members of my flock found the bodies. Mutilated, chewed up, and their throats were always scorched with fire, as if someone had plunged a torch down their gullet. Susie was the first... we found her in a dark alley, not ten blocks from here. Lorence, Jedediah, many others were slain in their homes. Obviously, the culprit was a demon."

I evaluate his countenance for a moment or two. He isn't lying. Silently, I probe his mind with my telepathy, something I try my hardest not to do, but I have to be sure, this time. Images of the mutilated bodies appear in my mind, instantly sickening me.

After pulling out of his thoughts, it takes me a moment to force the images out of my memories. "You aren't lying. Why kill those people?"

Cassiel bows her head, and when she speaks, her teeth grit together. "It's like Samantha said. Demons kill humans to gather soul energy for themselves. There must be a killer in this city secretly powering himself up."

"Disgusting." I nearly spit the word out. "Humans give demons their trust, and this is how they repay us? Why would a demon turn on those who sheltered him? They must hate humans in a way no other could, to be that low."

Father Matlock nods silently. "Aye. While other humans may be willing to give demons a chance, many of us remember the Old Ways. Never turn your back on a demon, lest they take the chance to give it a good stabbing."

From the corner of my eye, I spot Cassiel glaring at the Father. "Hold on a second. Do you mean to tell me that you've been turning vigilantes against the demons? Is that why three of them were found murdered?!"

The Father blanches. "N-no, certainly not! I had nothing to do with that! I would never hurt anyone!"

Cassiel's anger evaporates. "I suppose not. You'll just proselytize in the hopes that someone else would. It seems to me that we have an anti-demon assassin on our hands, after all, and they're someone angered by the killings." She pauses. "Why didn't you tell the authorities? If you'd told them, they could have stopped the murders before they grew out of hand!"

The pastor shakes his head. "Many of our members thought it best to keep the matter a secret. I suppose in retrospect; they may have had other reasons. I didn't give it much thought at the time."

Thoroughly angered, Cassiel flips her hair back with a quick motion of her head. "I guess you're just a humble minister. It's not your fault if things get taken too far, isn't that right?"

The pastor can't think of a way to respond. "I, err, well... I thought like that, yes."

He doesn't even try to retort. Staring at the sullen man before me, I'm reminded of people who did the same thing in the time before I entered the Cryopod. Careless fomentation of anger leads to tragedy. It's funny how things change, yet always stay the same.

"Come on, Cass. There's a killer on the loose. Two, even, counting the vigilante. We won't solve these murders until we follow the trail back to the one who started it."

She nods, depression in her eyes. "Thank you for the help, Father Matlock. Please keep your preaching in check from now on."

"I will." The man says, more reserved than when we first met him. As Cassiel and I turn and walk away, I steal a glance back. He's staring at the broom; his shoulders slumped in defeat. He isn't as stupid as I thought; he knows he caused the deaths of those demons.

The church door slams behind us, and Cassiel stares up toward the midday sun. "Who could be the killer, Jason? We have so many demons to sort through that it'll take us weeks to narrow down the list of suspects."

"Someone who hates humans, obviously." A face appears in my mind, but I shake the feeling Beelzebub can't be the killer. I ordered him never to hurt humans, and he can't disobey my orders. "Let's start with the demons freed from the camps recently. Perhaps one of them has a bone to pick with the 'fleshbags.'"

Cassiel nods. "Samantha's going to be back soon. Let's solve this before she returns. I don't want her thinking less of the demons in the city just because there's one killer on the loose."

Her words make me pause as we step off the grass before the church. "You know, it hasn't been confirmed only one demon was responsible. There could be several involved. Like a conspiracy or something."

A snorting sound makes me glance at Cassiel as she chuckles. "Oh goodness, conspiracies! Those are always so silly!"

"Yeah, you got that right."

* * *

"PILOT BENJAMIN BROWN, YOUR VITAL SIGNS CONTINUE TO STEADILY DECREASE. AT THIS RATE, YOUR INTERNAL ORGANS WILL FAIL IN T-MINUS TWO DAYS, SIX HOURS-"

"Stuff it, Centurion." I cough the words out and stumble through the dark corridor, my suit lighting up the path just enough to see maybe fifty feet in front of me. "Tin can, you sure this is the right way?"

The robot beside me walks along calmly evaluating every step, his natural gait filling me with jealousy thanks to the pain he doesn't have to endure. "Response: Supreme Commander Jason Hiro, as well as the Angel designated Cassiel, and the Demon designated Samantha entered the Labyrinth, but I hold no maps of the area. Extrapolation: Based on the heavy footprints visible on the ground, the Sentinel designated Ionis headed in this direction. It is likely his superior sensors would lead him to where they-"

"I get the point. God, you hunks of junk talk so- hnggh," I pause and take a short breath as more stabbing pain erupts in my kidneys. "-talk so damn much. Just keep the responses to ten words or less."

What am I even doing? It's pointless. Everything went to shit, and it's all because of that fucking Jason guy. He lead them right to us. I'm not going to find him, and I'll die all alone, in the darkness of this fucking Labyrinth, and all I'll have beside me for company are these two stupid annoying squawk-boxes.

Maybe I deserve to die. After all, I'm not even the real Benjamin Brown. I'm a copy- a fake. Most of the commanding officers were clones. What was I even fighting for?

It doesn't matter. Nothing does. We're born, we live, and we die. I should have jumped in a shuttle and flown to a rimworld, lived my life in peace. It would have mattered as much to the fucking galaxy as dying to Kolpox.

At the least, if I can find Jason, I can warn him. I can tell him that it's all his fault. They've won the war, we've lost. And soon, so will the Volgrim.

"PILOT BENJAMIN BROWN, YOUR INTERNAL ORGANS WILL FAIL IN T-MINUS TWO DAYS, SIX HOURS, SEVEN MINUTES-"

"If you were a human, I'd punch you right in the face."

With my luck, the Kolpox won't kill me. It... it'll probably turn me.

I can't let the last Hypersuit fall into Volgrim, Demon, or Kolvaxian hands. Only humans deserve the power.

I have to hold on... just a little longer.

Part 457c: Explosion

The sound of snoring, a slow rise into a loud crescendo, makes me furrow my brow before fluttering my eyes open. It takes a moment, but I quickly realize it isn't me snoring, but Cassiel. I stare at the back of her head and watch her chest rise and fall, wondering to myself when she started doing that. Has she always snored?

Her snoring increases in volume a bit as her throat roughens the noise, and soon it's obnoxiously loud, to the point where I'm completely awake. I guess the idea that only ugly and old men snore is a myth, huh?

Silently, I pull my arms away from her and slide to the edge of the bed, flipping my feet over to stare at the door. I'm not going to sleep anymore, tonight, that's for sure.

Glancing to my left, I spot Ionis standing against the wall, his retinal sensor staring directly at me. I've grown used to it over the last few weeks, but sometimes I get a chill down my back when I wake up and realize he's been watching Cassiel and I sleep. A second later I glance down and spot Howard lying on Ionis's foot; his eyes closed as he dreams about whatever it is that ducks do. Why isn't he in the bed I made for him? It's cushier than mine! Whatever. Silly duck.

As I sit on the bed, contemplating the universe and my lack of nightmares lately, a soft knock at the door nearly makes me jump out of my skin. I was not prepared for that!

I whisper under my breath " Wear, " and my clothes appear in an instant, as I gently get off the bed and sneak to the door.

When I open it, I stare in stunned silence for a moment or two. "Samantha? You're back?"

"Mhm!" Samantha glances past me and spots Cassiel sleeping, so she keeps her voice low.

I step out of our room and quietly close the door behind me, even as Cassiel's snoring starts to sound like an idling chainsaw. Jesus Christ, Cass.

"How did it go? You're back several days early."

She leaps into my arms and squeaks a little bit. "It went alright, but I was so bored! This magic orc named Grok teleported me there and saved me a few days of trekking, so that was cool." She kisses me and grins, but for a moment I see a glint of hesitation in her eyes.

"Everything went well, then? You weren't punished?"

Her smile lessens, and she pulls away to fidget with her clothing strips. "K-kinda? I don't know."

"What do you mean you don't know?" Her expression is starting to worry me. "If you don't want to tell me, that's fine. It's not my business."

"No, no, it's not that," Samantha says, scuffing her foot on the ground. "I just... can't remember. I went to the council; they stripped me of my title of Second Emperor, and then they banished me from the Labyrinth, but-"

"What?!" I can't help myself, and the word spits out of my mouth, interrupting her mid-sentence. "They banished you?! That's-" I pause, realizing my voice is too loud, so I force myself to calm down. "-That's awful. How is that an 'alright' outcome, Sam? You were banished!"

She bites her lip and averts her eyes. "Well, that's the thing. See, I'm the Second Emperor because I'm leagues more powerful than any other demon or most combinations of demons. They don't have any way to enforce a banishment without the First Emperor enforcing it." Her expression darkens. "And so, they sent me to the First Emperor for final judgment."

She doesn't elaborate, so after a few moments, I prod her. "And...?"

"I don't know." She shrugs. "Since I wasn't escorted out of the Labyrinth, he must have let me go. No punishment."

"Must have? What, you don't remember?" Even as I ask the question, I recall her telling me something not too long ago... "Wait, don't tell me- he erased your memory after you revisited him?"

Samantha chews on her thumb silently for a moment. "Yeah." Her nerves get the better of her, as any attempt at a happy demeanor vanishes. She crosses her arms and sulks. "I don't know what we talked about, said, or did. I just know that the punishment wasn't enforced. It's... it's sorta irritating. I stopped visiting him a few million years ago because I got tired of meetings I would forget immediately afterward. What's the big idea?"

"Well, at least you got off easy, I guess," I say, shrugging along. "Though you look bothered about more than just the meeting. Is there something else?"

Her eyes lose focus, as she looks past my face at something unseen. "Well... I had this- this theory... about the First Emperor... it's probably wrong. Ah, it's nothing, I'm sure." She shakes her head and looks away, unable to meet my eyes, but something about the look makes me instantly suspicious.

Before I can ask anything, the door to our room opens, and Cassiel stumbles out, her eyes only half-open. "Jaaason! I'm cold! Why'd you get out of bed if you were just going to stand out here and-" She freezes for a moment before her eyes bolt open. "Ohmygosh, Sammy! You're back already?!"

Shoving past me, Cassiel leaps forward and hugs Samantha tightly. "We were so worried about you! Jason thought they were going to cut you up into little pieces and feed you to the Grez, but I told him 'no sir!' and you're way too tough for something like that to happen!"

Quietly, I mutter under my breath, "...but I never said anything like that..."

Neither of them hears me. Samantha hugs Cassiel back just as fiercely, though Cassiel whimpers in pain. "Too strong! Help! Lemme go!"

"Oh, oops. Sorry. Sometimes I forget my strength." Samantha blushes and releases Cass, and soon the three of us look from one to the other.

Cass breaks the sudden silence. "So how did it go? Did you show the council who's boss?"

"Um." Samantha shoots a glance at me before smiling weakly. "Not exactly. I think I was banished. They sent me to see the First Emperor, but he erased my memory. I don't know what happened after that."

Cassiel's angelic smile evaporates instantly. The sudden change in her expression almost makes me take a step back in surprise. "Is it because of what you told me? About his identity?"

"Maybe." Samantha doesn't look at me, but I suddenly realize this must have been something they discussed in private while I was chasing after that mystery woman.

Cassiel slowly licks her lips and glances away before turning to look at me. "Jason. I think you should restore Samantha's memories. Use your Wordsmithing."

"What?" Samantha responds before I can. "Hold on a sec, why do you say that?"

"I've been thinking about what you told me. The First Emperor might be who you think he is. If that's the case, erasing your memory might be for a sinister purpose. Restoring the past is the only way to be sure."

I have no idea what they're talking about. The fact neither one of them included me in this theory probably means they're trying to keep something from me. Ordinarily, I'd be annoyed, but neither Samantha nor Cassiel have ever lied as far as I know. They must have a reason.

Despite Cassiel's pushiness, Samantha is hesitant. "I don't know, Cass. Maybe I should think about it. I don't wanna rush anything."

The angel doesn't let up. "No, that look on your face says otherwise. Whatever happened while you saw the First Emperor, it was something that needs to be addressed. At the least, Jason can return your memories, you can confirm if they should stay repressed, and he can hide them again. Don't you think that's for the best?"

I've never seen Samantha this nervous. Any pretenses of being flirty, happy, or any hints of positive emotions are gone. She's even starting to shake, as the thought of her memories being returned fills her with dread. "W-we shouldn't, Cass. Let's just put it off for a while and drop it, okay?"

Cass stays silent for a few long moments. "He's using you, Sam. If you're right about the First Emperor's identity, I'm almost a hundred percent certain you wouldn't be let off the hook for a banishment without good reason. Think about it."

Silently, I lean back against the wall and watch the two of them argue for a couple more minutes. Every time Cassiel pushes more, Samantha clams up. Their argument makes my head spin, and they continue bantering until Samantha finally explodes.

"Jeez, fine, Cass! I'll just- Jason can restore my memory! Would you let up already?! It's not even a big deal!"

Cassiel sighs. "Okay, okay. I'm sorry. I'm not pushy just because, Sam. I have a reason. Let's just do this and get it over with."

"I can't wait." Samantha stares at Cass in annoyance for a few moments, but the anger deflates, like air released from a balloon. "Do it, Jason."

I feel nervous suddenly. "Oh, you want your memory restored? Err, I've never actually done it before..."

"Just give it a try, honey." Cassiel leans over and loops her arm through mine, sinking a lot of sweetness into that last word. "I'm sure you'll figure out what to do."

"Uh, okay then. H-here goes..."

I stare at Samantha for a few moments as I try to picture in my mind the word used to bring her memories back, as well as how I want it to work. Let her remember the First Emperor, and her interactions with him. That should do it. " Restore! "

The words leave my mouth, and Samantha's face stays neutral. For a few moments, she stares at me blankly. "Did it work? I don't feel-"

She stops mid-sentence, and her eyes lose focus.

A flash of pain appears on her face. Her lips quiver, and her jaw clenches.

Moments later, she screams. "AHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHH!!!" A horrible, gut-wrenching wail, as Samantha doubles over on the floor and clenches her stomach. Cassiel and I both leap back in fright. The wretched, high-pitched scream is like that of a banshee, sending daggers of ice into every pore on our bodies. For ten straight seconds, the scream continues, unabated, without her pausing to draw a breath.

And just as suddenly, it stops. Sam's entire body shakes for several seconds, as if she were spasming from a bone-chill, before she goes completely still, and stays huddled on the floor.

"S-Sammy? Sam?" Cassiel trembles as we both stare down at her. "Are you... okay?"

It takes a few seconds, but I realize Samantha is whispering under her breath. The volume increases until I can make out what she's saying.

"...no...no...no...no...no..."

Over and over, she repeats the word. She stops after a minute, but Cassiel and I are too afraid to say anything.

Finally, Samantha slowly raises her head up to look at us. Blood trickles down from her eyes and nose, and her lip is savagely chewed, and if she's damn-near bitten the goddamn thing off.

"I'm scum."

Finally, she speaks two words, after long, painful moments of silence. The bloody tears swap with watery tears, as Samantha leaps to her feet, and rushes past me, hurling me halfway down the hallway. I hit the ground hard enough to hear a rib crack, and I wince in pain. A moment later, the door to our room slams shut, and Cassiel and I stare at each other in stunned silence. I can barely even feel the pain from my fractured rib, thanks to the adrenaline pumping through my veins.

"What... what the hell... just happened?" I can scarcely form the words.

More screaming erupts from the room, and the sound of furniture smashing against the walls makes me flinch. Samantha's going berserk.

"St-stay here, Jason. I'm going to try and calm her down." Cassiel swallows hard but pauses as she turns to the door. "I didn't expect a reaction like this. This is worse than anything I could have imagined."

After gathering her wits, Cassiel quickly opens the door, steps into the room, and slams it shut behind her.

My breathing halts as I hear the muffled voices inside. I can't make out a single word, and I'm not sure I want to. The smashing of furniture stops, and all I can hear is the awful wailing of a woman crying her heart out.

The First Emperor, huh? " Heal. "

My rib repairs itself, and I pull myself up. I'm going to kill that son of a bitch.

Part 458c: Born In Fire

"Scoot over! Come on, move your ass!" Tvoorik gives me a rough shove despite my protests, squeezing me up against a rather large and well-endowed Orc. The bench is jam-packed full of demons, and the entire theater must have around fifty thousand of us. Heck, even the domed ceiling above has various demons crawling around on it, scrambling to find suitable hanging spots from which to view the spectacle.

Tvoorik smiles and nods his big, stupid head excitedly. "Oh boy, this is gonna be exciting! An announcement from the Demon Council! I bet it's regarding the Second Emperor! She's outta here!"

I try to contain my excitement and succeed thanks to the fact I don't give a crap. "Yeah, wow, I can't wait. Why do you care, anyway? I thought you hated the demon leadership?"

"Oh, I do!" Tvoorik waves his hand at me dismissively. "I mean, pff, just think about it, old buddy old pal! If she's out, maybe that's a sign they'll start changing things up a bit! Diablo's out of commission for a while, so maybe Mephisto's gonna do a better job."

I squint to look fifty rows ahead at the stage. It's so far in the distance I can barely even make it out, especially with all the orcs blocking the view. Who thought seating the tallest bodies in the front rows was a good idea? Shadow-walkers are too short to see past them! At least we're seated close to the front, since the room stretches back several hundred layers.

"Yeah, maybe Mephisto will do something. I'm jumping for joy."

Inwardly, I sigh. Tvoorik was vindicated on at least one count thanks to this last incursion against the humans. We don't stand a chance beating the humans, even with the power of the First Emperor. Just when we thought we had them on the ropes, the Hero returned, and with the help of the Second Emperor, he wiped out our Third Emperor and took us down. With results like that, there isn't a chance we can win now.

I pause, thinking for a moment on something I learned recently. "Say, Tvoorik."

"Yeah? What?" He looks at me, suspicion in his eyes. I'm not one to ask questions, so it's a natural reaction.

"You remember how we were talking about that angel amidst the humans, recently?"

"Uh huh." He gives me a dumb look, but I ignore it.

"Rumor has it that the humans are calling her the Divine Mother. They say she's an archangel."

"Of course they do." Tvoorik looks away almost immediately and rolls his eyes. "It's like I said; the angels work for the demons. It's obvious to anyone with a brain. She's a convenient scapegoat for that awful failure of a battle against the humans a few weeks ago. There's no way she's an archangel."

Before I can respond, a Felaris girl in front of us half turns around, and her catlike ears twitch. "Divine Mother? Is that what I heard you say?"

I crinkle my nose at her. The Felaris are much too human-like for my taste, and very ugly by demon standards. "Yeah. Mind your business."

"Aww, that's rude." Her ears cock downward, an obvious attempt to elicit sympathy. "One of my fifteen sisters lives amidst the humans, and she told me the Divine Mother is real. She's an angel of unthinkable beauty, and wise beyond her years."

Tvoorik scoffs. "Cheh, your sister's a human-lover. Anything she says is suspect. They probably brainwashed her with their mind-control beams. I'd cut off contact with her if I were you."

The orc beside me rubs his fat, disgusting belly and picks his nose. "Hu hu hu, me like pretty girl. Wonder if Difine Mudder like big strong orc?"

As he raises his arm to examine the booger, the stench from his pit wafts over me. "I doubt that very much."

Tvoorik glares at me, but the expression is directed more at the Felaris. I can almost hear his thoughts. Maybe going to this event was the wrong idea after all.

We don't have time to reconsider. The room suddenly goes quiet, as a wave of silence washes over from the front rows all the way to the back. A few orcs ahead of us continue laughing and jeering, but they're always loud and obnoxious, so I ignore them.

An old demon slowly walks onto the stage and makes a motion with his hands, probably to amplify his voice with magic. I squint, but can't make out his face. "Tvoorik, who is that?"

He shrugs. "Dunno. Some geezer."

The Felaris girl spins her head back to hiss at us. "That's Barbatos, the eldest demon! Show respect!"

"As if I care," Tvoorik says, echoing my thoughts.

The old bat mutters something unintelligible for a moment before clearing his throat. "Ah, thank you for coming today, esteemed demon and monster-kin. I am Barbatos, the Father of Demons. This announcement is regarding several minor and major things that will be changing, starting immediately. It will be your duty to return to each of your districts and inform the relevant leaders and broodmothers about..."

He drawls on for a while, and I begin to feel my attention drift. Healing centers are overcrowded; mutations are lagging behind, blah blah blah...

"With regards to the Second Emperor... most of you may have heard about her recent expulsion from the Demon Emperors..." Barbatos catches my attention with this statement. He sighs before continuing. "Belial has been expunged from the Demon Emperors, but the First Emperor has chosen to show mercy and will not banish her from the Labyrinth. However, given Belial is a known human sympathizer, she is to be avoided at all costs. She battled and defeated the Third Emperor, Diablo, in combat to defend the humans, an action irredeemable in the eyes of the Council. As a result, Diablo has been unable to lead us due to his injuries..."

"Tch. Good riddance," Tvoorik mutters under his breath.

"Hey, that's not fair. Diablo is a friend of ours."

Tvoorik nods slowly. "Yeah, I like him as a demon, but Bael would be much better as a leader."

"Bael is a lunkhead. I can't believe you prefer him to Diablo." I pause, realizing what I just said. "Never mind. You probably feel a kinship with his stupidity."

"Oh, shut up."

Barbatos holds up a piece of parchment and squints to read it. "Mmm. Mmm, yes, I see. And now I bring you the final bit of news. Due to a series of recent circumstances, it is with great regret that I inform you Diablo will no longer, as of this day, represent Demonkind as our Third Emperor. Indeed, with the purge of Belial, he would be promoted to the position of Second, while Bael would be promoted to Third, but times have changed. A promising candidate has appeared and demonstrated without a doubt that he has the qualifications to lead demonkind as our new Second Emperor!"

I stare at the stage, stupefied. It takes a moment for the old bat's words to register. "A different demon will be the Second Emperor? Who? Mephisto?"

Tvoorik shakes his head. "I doubt that... he's acting like this new candidate is an unknown. Mephisto would be expected for the role."

Indeed, Barbatos beckons to the side of the stage, and from the shadows, out steps a demon I haven't seen before. A black suit, with a black tie, and a black undershirt combine with his black hair and red skin to create a stunning contrast. He carries himself with poise, and strides forward, smiling as he bows to the audience. Barbatos makes a motion, and the newcomer's voice is amplified for all to hear.

"Greetings, comrades. Many of you may know of me, but will not know my story. I am Beelzebub, your new Second Emperor. You may call me by my new title, the Emperor of Flames."

Everyone, myself included, stare at him in silence, as he continues. Even the orcs don't make a sound, which is out of the ordinary for them. "Due to the failings of the previous leadership, I have sought to remedy the problems plaguing demon society." His smile twists, and a snarl forms on his face. "Weakness. This infectious disease plagues us. Losing to humans in combat is inexcusable. If we couldn't beat them with our eons of fighting experience, simply overrunning them with millions and billions of our kind would have sufficed. Instead, we allowed them to claim a sizeable victory, and have sustained a blow to our morale while boosting theirs. Inexcusable!"

A tap on my arm turns my attention to Tvoorik. He raises a knowing eyebrow. "Do you know who this is, Ylvusk?"

I shake my head, and he quickly explains. "He's the 'Puppet' demon. The Hero supposedly beat him in combat and enslaved his mind. Now he comes out as our new Second Emperor? Fishy..."

Memories come back to me. A few years ago, I remember hearing tales of such a demon, but... "That can't be him. It makes no sense."

Tvoorik doesn't respond. Beelzebub continues speaking, his voice rising as he gets more and more into his speech. "My power comes from the Third Emperor, Diablo. Two nights ago, I defeated Diablo and Bael in combat and took Diablo's energy for myself. If you lend me your attention, I will explain just how my glorious rise began."

I groan inwardly. "This is going to be a long one."

* * *

"Out of my way! I have business with those two inside."

Before me stood a hundred demons, armed to the teeth. Diablo and Bael's guardsmen, there to protect them in case of people like myself. Each one raised their weapons to me; their teeth gritted in anger.

"We shan't let you pass, knave! Ye are not worthy of seeing the Third Emperor and First Duke without an invitation!"

One of the guards started to thrust his spear at me, but he was met with a swift, fiery demise. The flames boiled from within my body and lashed out, like a bird of prey snatching a field mouse. As he fell, the other guards leaped back in panic, unable to believe my incredible power.

"F-fine, you can go in! But when you do, you'll be sorry! The Third Emperor will make you pay!"

Naturally, that guard tasted the same flames as the one before him. The rest were far too frightened to raise a weapon to me, so they thrust their swords and spears to the ground and cowered, begging for their lives.

Shoving the bodies out of my way with a single, swift kick, I charged into the blood-pits and stood before the failed demon leaders.

"Diablo, Third Emperor of Hell! Bael, First Duke of Hell! I challenge you both to a duel! I will take your energy for myself!"

Immediately, Diablo swiveled to face me, fear in his eyes. He knew at once that his reckoning had come. No longer could he sit idly by as he fooled around, making life miserable for those below him. His failures would be atoned for in blood.

"I-I'm not scared of you! B-but, before you can beat me in combat, you must first face my right-hand demon. Yes, that's right! I'll not have it any other way!"

The mark of an insect! He forced his underling to fight and weaken me first, but knew it couldn't save him. Bael reached for his tiny flail and laughed, thinking he stood a chance against my awesome power.

"If you think you can beat the First Duke, you're wrong. Your time is up, Beelze-"

Before he could even finish, I had already conjured a small, intensely hot ball of fire within my palm. Instantly, I lobbed it at him, but the dullard was too slow to react in time. It smote his body and sent him smashing backward, landing against the wall of the hut. His insignificant demonhood flopped to the side as he passed out from the pain. Truly, a pathetic display, for a worthless underling.

"Diablo, you can escape no longer. Your days of hiding and leaving the fighting to others are over. Now you must face me, and be wrapped in the embrace of my fire to atone for your failures as our leader."

Diablo leaped out of the blood pits. His body was already fully healed! Everything he told us about his grievous wounds was a lie! He soaked in warm, iron-rich human blood while the demons below him wept and perished at the hands of the filthy fleshbags. I grew enraged, knowing this traitor thought himself fit to lead.

The former Third Emperor, trembled as he faced me. "Won't you take pity, on a poor, injured demon? This fight isn't fair! I can scarcely move!"

"Lies!" I pointed my finger straight at his chest. "You're the picture of health! Stop sniveling, and fight me for the right to rule! If you won't, I'll take your power by force!"

Finally, the former Third Emperor realized he could hide no longer. In a display of cowardice, he charged at me before I was ready! He delivered many savage blows to my head and body, but I managed to escape his weak grip and quickly summoned a wall of flame to engulf him. His screams were sweet as nectar, and they filled me with joy, knowing he could finally feel the pain that so many other demons had experienced at the hands of the humans!

He writhed in pain on the ground, before reaching out and slapping my foot.

"I concede! Please, have mercy! You are far more worthy than I to lead our people! I will give you my energy, just don't kill me! I beg you!"

Naturally, he made the right choice in the end. While his energy flowed to me, I spat on him and cursed his weakness, before stepping out of the hut. All the demons present took several steps back as they gazed in awe of my strength. To demonstrate my mercy, I used my new energy to repair the vital organs of those I had harmed. They might never speak properly again, but at least they would live to fight in service of their glorious new leader.

* * *

Beelzebub's grin widens, nearly to maniacal levels. As he continues, I nudge Tvoorik. "This story sounds a little twisted, don't you think?"

I pause, noticing Tvoorik staring in awe at Beelzebub. "Incredible! An outsider wrested control from the previous leaders! He could take us to new heights!" His glee increases even further, "And Diablo was such a coward, too! I can't believe that guy!"

"Huh?" My eyes blink twice, just to make sure I'm hearing him right. "Listen to what he said, Tvoorik. That was a whole lot of hot air and not much substance. I bet he made half of it up."

"Pfft, nonsense." Tvoorik looks at me like I'm the idiot here. "A bit of embellishing for the audience. Everyone exaggerates a little. How else do you think it could have gone down? I wanna give him a chance!"

Beelzebub's words drift over from the stage, catching my attention. "-are worthless fleshbags, as you all know. During my time among the humans, I learned much about how they behave, and what their weaknesses are. My goal as the new Second Emperor is to completely, utterly, and totally annihilate humanity! After they're defeated, we will take on the Volgrim. It will not be an easy road. Many have died as a result of these humans, but that is precisely why I will be the perfect new leader! We need not just new blood up here, but new ideas! I bring with me a re-imagination of war itself, and a new focus on how to destroy the humans."

"Humans are inventive. They create their fancy gadgets and toys because they are fragile, and those weapons are the only way they can hope to defeat demons in combat. We will no longer engage in all-out war against them, but guerrilla combat. Those who fancy the shadows, the cloak and dagger, they will be our deadliest agents in this new era. We will target not the human body, but the human psyche. We must sow discord among our enemies, make them doubt who the real monsters are. A human's deadliest weapon is neither the gun, nor the bomb, but the ideas which they spread. Their ideas corrode the soul, and weaken the mind."

The orc beside me blinks sleepily. "Suit-guy speak big words. Glonk not understand."

I nudge him with my arm. "You and me both. He sounds like a clown. I can't believe we traded Diablo for this." Even as I say the words, I notice Tvoorik's stupid, over-eager expression. The dumbass is lapping up every word.

"So join me, brothers and sisters! We will work together and recreate demon society! The River Styx will overflow with the souls of humans, and my new laws will ensure that those who kill the most are rewarded for their hard work. No more cowering while we wait for the humans to expand to a new district! No more whining because you haven't mutated in millennia! Pledge your loyalty to your new Second Emperor, and the weakness of the past will soon become a distant memory!"

The entire throng of demons explodes into cheers all at once, sans an individual here and there. While Tvoorik stands up and claps like a madman, as do many others, all I can do is bow my head and sigh.

"So this is how stability dies; with thunderous applause."

Part 459c: Deception, Disgrace

"P-please calm down! Sam!" I flinch as a sturdy oaken chair smashes against the wall beside me, and Samantha screams again, pounding the chessboard Jason was playing with last night into a thousand pieces, much of them the size of dust fragments.

"I lied! I'm worthless! I'm pathetic!" Samantha kicks a metal pail hard enough that it blasts across the room and smashes against Ionis, bouncing off his metal frame and ricocheting off the walls until it pounds into her chest and knocks her over. Her sudden surprise might almost be comical if she weren't in such incredible emotional pain. "Aauuuoo!"

She crumples in a heap behind the bed in a corner and starts sobbing uncontrollably. Before I hesitantly walk over to her, I steal a glance at the Sentinel. If he's angry about the pail, he doesn't show it. The robot continues to stare straight ahead unamusedly as if none of this matters to him in the slightest. Howard hides behind Ionis's legs but doesn't appear to be mortally terrified. As long as Ionis protects him, I don't have to worry.

I tiptoe over to Sammy and chew my lip. She's curled up in the fetal position on the floor, her arms wrapped around her legs as the tears come pouring down. Whatever Jason made her remember, it's more than she can handle.

"Sam. I'm here." I turn my wings into warm, comfortable pillows as I kneel down and wrap my arms around her. My wings act as a barrier to the outside world, reflecting the negative energy permeating our room away from her.

After a minute of uncontrollable hysterics, she manages to calm down somewhat, aided in part by the pure energy I subtly send to her. "Oh god, Cass... I can't believe myself! How could I do it?!"

"I don't know what you mean, Sammy. You have to take a deep breath, calm your heart, and realize that I'm here for you. Okay? Only after you do that can you tell me what's wrong."

Only a few weeks ago, I was the one crying in Sammy's arms, after I remembered what Marie did to me. If I can't be a tree to help weather the storm, I'm not a real friend. I'm just surprised I can be so calm in the face of such strong, repressed emotions.

The crying winds down, and soon she rests her head on my chest, staring stonily at the wall. "I was right. The First Emperor is Satan. He's been erasing my memories."

Ooh, that was blunter than I expected. "Yes, you told me as much. Can you tell me what happened? I won't judge you for anything, no matter what."

Samantha doesn't respond for over a minute, before whispering, "Really? Not at all? But... I'm awful..."

"I don't think so, and neither does Jason. Open up your heart, and I'll listen."

She squeezes her legs even tighter. "I... after I went to the council, I was sent to see the First- I mean, to see Satan. Nobody knows who he is. He wipes everyone's memory."

"Mhm." I keep my reply neutral.

"W-well, when I showed up to see him..."

* * *

After how weak and ineffective I made the council look, I was feeling pretty good about myself. I arrived at the secret door to the First Emperor's chamber. When I stepped inside, it was a long walk down a hallway, where I felt his dark miasma radiating down the corridor. His power was overwhelming, like trying to swim up against a waterfall. In a way, it sickened me, somehow, as if I could no longer stand the feeling of negative energy.

I washed the lumps in my throat down and finally arrived in his throne room. I wasn't sure exactly what to expect, but I knew what his name was, or at least, the one he'd chosen to tell everyone.

Striking a cocky pose, I stared up at the giant behemoth sitting upon his throne. "Yo. What's up, 'Asmodeus'?"

I've always been a carefree soul. While I couldn't remember any of our previous meetings, I was confident this is how I'd greet anyone claiming to be the First Emperor, and the fact I hadn't been executed or punished during any of my previous meetings seemed proof to me that it wasn't the wrong way to greet him.

Ah, Second Emperor, Belial. It has been a long time. Where have you been, my love? "

His voice was filled with honey and sugar, but at the same time, there was a moment where I sensed a hint of rage. It had been thousands of years since I last saw him since I'd long since tired of never remembering what we talked about or did. Knowing what I know now, perhaps he was just angry I hadn't been popping in every so often.

"I'm not your 'love', unless, of course, your name isn't Asmodeus. That's a silly thought, isn't it?" A duality was in my words. On the one hand, I was implying without directly stating that he couldn't be Asmodeus at all, but on the other hand, I wasn't saying outright who my lover was. Because the thing is... I'd been having doubts.

The arch-demon's voice softened. Before my eyes, his form began to shrink from a towering colossus to something only a little taller than myself. It was only once his face changed from a black, shapeless mess, to one I'd seen before, that I felt my heart quiver.

"Well, then, Lilia... I suppose if my name isn't 'Asmodeus,' then that little statement falls to pieces?"

I didn't have a chance to reply. A moment later, a gentle sensation, like wind formed in the shape of a hand, swept me off my feet and over to him, pressing my body against his. I barely had a second to react before he plunged his lips onto mine, and kissed me with a fiery passion I hadn't experienced in ages...

"W-wait!" I pulled my mouth from his and pushed away, feeling annoyed all of a sudden. The whole situation felt rushed. "I-I barely even- I mean, we haven't seen each other in-"

His eyes hardened, ever so slightly. "Oh, come now. You've dropped by many a time, sweet Lilia. Not recently, I'll admit, but plenty of times before. I've grown antsy, even on occasion filling the void you've left me in with other trifles, but no woman matches you. I'm just glad you've gathered your senses and made a return."

"I don't remember the past, Satan." I tried not to glare at him, but a small amount of anger boiled up inside of me. "I'm glad one of us remembers the good old days."

As if realizing his error, Satan took a step back and tapped his hips. "Yes, hmm, I see your point. Of course, I've explained to you on countless occasions why I must keep my identity a secret, but I suppose I'll have to explain again."

And so he did. He spent fifteen minutes talking while I listened silently. I didn't understand most of it. Something about time travel, paradoxes, the future being linear, other universes... if I'm being honest, it wasn't the sort of thing a demon would understand. These concepts were very... human.

"Oh. Okay." I nodded slowly, but I didn't understand what he meant.

Satan seemed to realize this. "Yes, I suppose you wouldn't understand, but that is fine, my dear. After all, it is a man's place to think, and a woman's to listen. Now, where have you been for all of this time? My bed has grown quite cold."

His condescending words didn't hit me as they should have. Somehow, my mind closed them out, and I thought to myself something like, oh, that's just the way he is. Looking back on it now, maybe I should have noticed the warning signs.

My arms crossed over my chest, and I suddenly felt a tiny amount of shame, being in his presence. "I've just- well, I've been out, doing things. The war with the humans is heating up.

I've been-"

"The war with the humans? Oh right, that nonsense Diablo was telling me about. I nearly fell asleep listening to him. As if I cared about humans." Satan tossed his hand up in the air flippantly. "If Diablo can't handle the humans and he wastes my power, I'll be dreadfully annoyed. I expect you'll help out if it comes to that."

Even as he said all this, Satan was slowly edging closer to me. A hungry lust was in his eyes, as though he was just trying to skip to the good parts, ignoring my feelings along the way. He didn't seem to care about the fact that I hadn't seen him in millions of years, from my point of view, nor did he care about taking the time to rekindle a romance or anything else. He only had one thing on his mind.

And frankly, I'd had enough. "I'm seeing another man right now, Satan. A human."

He didn't even pause. "Wonderful. I'm sure once he's drained, you'll be hungry for more. It's like eating the crumbs that have fallen off the table, while the main course lingers above. Let's cut the chit-chat, Lilia. I've missed you so much, you know. I respected your desire for a little alone time, but now that you're here..."

I jerked back in fright as he suddenly appeared inches in front of me, and his hand reached down behind me to grab hold of my flesh. Teleportation? I hadn't even seen him make a sign, and it scared me, seeing him act so aggressive.

"I don't want this!" Out of instinct, I hit him with all my power and sent him hurtling backward. He smashed into his throne with a sickening crunch and destroyed a good chunk of the lower-section. Immediately, worry and fear overtook me. "Oh devils, Satan?! Are you okay?!"

"Ahhh..." His moan of pain almost had a hint of pleasure in it. "It's been so long since we were together, Lilia..." He pulled himself out of the debris and rubbed his back. "...I had forgotten that side of you. I must admit, I do like it more when you playfully resist."

Seeing he was okay and not seriously injured, my worry vanished. "I'm not playing around! I didn't come here for this! I have another man now, Satan! I can't just jump in bed with you, not without talking to him first."

For a moment, the funniest look of confusion appeared on Satan's face, as if he couldn't fathom me saying 'no' to him. He thought I was joking around, up to that point, maybe leading him on, but a moment later, the comicality vanished.

"What do you mean by that?" His voice was calm, icy, but a threat lingered on the edge. "What human? Who is he?"

"That's... that's not important!" My arms crossed once more, but I could feel my body shaking. Suddenly I wished I were wearing a set of plate-armor. I felt exposed in front of him, as his eyes roved my body. "I'm my own person. Stop acting like you control me. I'm not chattel."

Despite the rising anger in his eyes, Satan managed to calm himself down as he walked a little closer and brushed crumbled rock and dust from his robes. "I see. This human... is his name Jason Hiro, by any chance?"

It took me a moment to form words. Satan had already demonstrated he had no idea what I was up to, nor what the state of the Labyrinth was, yet he knew Jason's name? Why?

"Yeah. So?"

His eyes raised and a knowing expression filled his face. "Ah, I see. The Wordsmith. I hadn't realized so much time had passed. I've grown too comfortable, it appears. Decades turned into centuries, which became millennia and eventually eons. The time has already arrived, and all I do is lounge around and wait for reports from my others." He paused after the last word as if it held some significance, but I couldn't divine what it was. "I've grown soft. All is well though since you did make that promise to me, all those ages ago."

"Promise? What promise?"

His tongue flicked out, and he licked his lips. "The betrayal, of course. The reason I erase your memory is so you can stay in character, but you and I both know... when the time comes, there is only one man to whom you can be loyal. This Jason fellow is a passing interest, a flippant moment in time. When the time is right, you will plunge the figurative dagger in his back, and then I will restore your memories."

Satan shrugged and heaved a great sigh. "Ah, well, I suppose that doesn't matter. You won't remember our time here afterward, anyway."

I had no idea what the promise was or what he was talking about, but something about his words chilled my heart. "Y-you're going to erase my memory again? Why? And what makes you think I'll betray Jason?"

"Huh? Now you're babbling." Satan's gaze hardened once more, but there was something sinister in his eyes this time. "This prattle is tiresome. You don't love him at all. You're just pretending, of course. He doesn't mean a thing to you. I am the only one you can truly love, Lilia, and you'd do well to remember that. He isn't kin, he's a human. Humans are filthy, worthless creatures, bound together in weakness. Demons are strong, and the rightful rulers of the universe."

My breath was coming in small, quick wheezes. Every word he was saying made my stomach churn. "I d-disagree! Humans are kind and caring. I've seen the love they can show for others of their species, and even other species as well! War doesn't have to be the only way we communicate!"

"Enough!" Satan's eyes flared up, and I could feel his energy shift slightly. "If you keep talking like that, I'm going to think you're serious!"

"I am serious! I'm not lying about-"

"Nonsense! That devil-damned human has brainwashed you!" Satan's teeth gnashed as he took several steps toward me. Suddenly, everything about him seemed more intimidating than usual. "Why don't you pause, and think for a moment! Use your head, Lilia! Come to me! Bow down and lick my feet!"

"What? No way! That's disgusting!"

My words stopped, and a pleasant feeling appeared in my mind. As if everything I had just said didn't matter, I took a hesitant step toward him. I couldn't see straight before. Jason didn't matter to me at all!

But no, he did! And yet, Satan suddenly seemed so alluring... I realized that there were things about him that Jason couldn't have, and that I was really in love with-

Damn it! It wasn't right! I knew it wasn't right, but I just wanted Satan so badly, at that very moment! It's as if my body was screaming out to him, and my mind couldn't fight back! It was... it was...

* * *

"It was a betrayal..." Fresh tears flow from her eyes, and Samantha wipes furiously at her face, before launching into a physical assault, punching her face violently. "Liar! Worthless! Scum!"

"Sammy, no! Stop!" I force energy into my arms and use all my strength to try and stop her from hitting herself, but it's not enough. A sickening popping sound makes me whimper as one of my shoulder-blades violently dislocates. "Aaaow!"

Finally, Samantha stops and pulls away. "Oh... oh no... Cass, I'm sorry- I didn't mean to do that..."

I grit my teeth and bear the pain. "You're just taking all the blame... please don't attack yourself anymore, Sammy. When you do that, it's others you hurt, not yourself."

She nods and quickly makes a hand motion to repair my shoulder. I nearly bite my tongue as the bones mend together, but a moment later, the pain is gone.

Both of us stare at each other before turning away and gazing out the window.

My heart finally slows down, now that her emotions have been poured out. Her tears dry up as she dabs at her face with the bed covers. "I can't believe I did it, Cass. I tried to be true to Jason, but in the end, I threw myself at Satan, and begged him to do anything he wanted to me. It's like I wasn't myself. There was another me, one that revealed itself when I least expected it." She lowers her eyes to stare at a broken chunk of the chessboard she destroyed. "Just like I'm going to hurt Jason."

I can't stand to see her hurting like this. "Sammy, I don't know what happened with Satan, but that wasn't you. Maybe you just missed him. From your point of view, you hadn't seen him in millions of years... you probably just realized at that moment how much you loved him, but that doesn't mean you'll betray Jason. After all, he loves you and me equally. There can be room in your heart for Jason and Satan as well."

Samantha shakes her head slowly. "Cass. I didn't tell you everything I remembered. Jason didn't just restore my memory of this last meeting with Satan. He restored all my memories of Satan. Thousands of them."

My breath catches. "What- what do you mean? What do you remember?"

"Everything." She crawls over to me and lays on my chest, pulling my wings over her. "Satan... he kept calling me to him, using me, then wiping my memory. All those times I went to visit him, he'd get his rocks off, then send me away. He never let me keep those memories. Those were our memories together. Why?"

Many possibilities occur to me, but I want to try the softer ones first. "Satan mentioned time travel and other things. Maybe you couldn't be allowed to remember him. Even Diablo wasn't allowed, right?"

"Uh huh... maybe. I dunno." Her voice is sullen. Depression seems to be setting in. "Every second that passes, I remember more and more things. The last thing he told me before he wiped my memory this last time was 'Sadly, you won't remember the good times we just had.' Maybe he wanted me to remember but couldn't. Maybe you're right, Cass."

My thoughts keep returning to the strange behavior Samantha described when she last saw him. "Sam, is it... is it possible that he was manipulating you with magic? Maybe that's why you acted so passionately. Perhaps he was manipulating-"

"No! No, he wouldn't do that!" Samantha flinches and closes her eyes. "He'd never hurt me like that. It must have been repressed lust... I'm just a whore like everyone says. A sex-starved succubus. Worthless!"

"C'mon, Sammy, not this line again." I bite my lip hard enough to taste blood. "It's not that far-fetched. Maybe he made a sign when you weren't looking, or maybe he-"

She pulls away from me again and glares at me. "Stop! Satan would never hurt me like that! Don't even say it! He loves me, Cass."

I don't know if he used magic or not, but she trusts him... would he? My mind parses the possibilities, but I don't want to think of what it could mean.

"Fine, I'm sorry. Look, don't beat yourself up over this, Sam. Whatever happened, it's in the past. Let's tell Jason what happened, and maybe he can help us figure it out. We're all in this together, right?"

"No, please, don't tell Jason. He'll think I'm... contaminated. He won't look at me the same."

"That's not true, damn you." I have to resist the urge to slap some sense into her, but it's very tempting. "Jason knew you loved the leader of the demons. If he finds out you made love to Satan, he won't be angry. He isn't like that."

"Jason will be disappointed. He'll feel betrayed." She rubs her arms slowly in a circular motion. "I don't know what to do, Cass. Never in my life has sex made me feel so filthy, but it does, now. I've done it millions of times, and it hasn't hurt me on the inside as it does at this moment. I want to die."

I want to die.

Her words echo in my memories. I once said the same thing. I screamed those words until my throat was ragged, but I was too weak to follow through. Samantha isn't weak; she's strong. If she wanted to, she could do it.

I can't let that happen.

"Sam, if you kill yourself, I'll kill myself. Jason will be all alone. Is that what you want?"

"Huh? No!" She jerks her head up and gawks at me, horror on her face. "Why would you say that?"

"You're my best friend. You're my lover too, Sam. I want to be with you as much as I do Jason. If you took your life, it would devastate both of us. We'd be ruined. Don't you remember what you told me on the ship?"

A guilty look crosses her face. "Yeah. I'm sorry... I was selfish."

"It's okay. Let's be selfish for a while together, okay? I won't tell Jason what happened; that's up to you. When you feel ready, pour your heart out to him. Only sincere regret will change anything, and you already have that down pat."

As she nods and thanks me, I lean in and kiss her passionately, hoping to myself I can replace the memories Satan gave her with more pleasant ones.

But deep inside myself, I feel an emotion I can't remember ever feeling before.

Rage.

I know he manipulated her, lied to her. She may not be willing to believe it, but I see Satan for what he is. He used her for his own pleasure, wiped her memories, and abused her innocent love for him with dramatic reunions, over and over again, for millions of years.

Even if she doesn't realize it, he broke her heart.

I'll break him.

Part 460c:

"Jason. Wake up... you dozed off."

The dreamless blackness lifts off in a flash, and I leap to my feet, nearly knocking Cassiel over as she pulls away. "Huh? Wha-? I wasn't sleeping! I was just resting my eyes!"

Normally she'd giggle and make a funny comment, but she just stares at me evenly. "I hope you're rested, in any case."

Our mood is tense, and I stuff my lopsided smile away. "How is Samantha? What happened? Was it the First Emperor? Did she-"

Cassiel raises a finger up and presses it against my lips, shushing me. "She's sleeping now. Many things happened while she was away, and let's just say that you restored a lot of memories she'd forgotten about. She's very confused right now."

Her words have a faint warning to them that makes the hair on the back of my neck stand up. "What do you mean? What did I make her remember?"

Cassiel shakes her head. "It's not for me to say. She'll tell you when she's feeling better." She locks her hands together and twines her fingers around before nibbling on her lower lip. "Look, it's late at night. I know she woke us up and all that, and you probably want to go back to bed..."

"My sleep can wait, Cass. Is there some way I can help Sam?"

"That isn't what I meant." Cassiel squirms a little bit as some thought bugs her. "Um. How about you sleep... somewhere else tonight? It'll just be Sam and me tonight, okay? Girl talk."

Something about what she's saying doesn't add up. It's like she's trying to say Samantha doesn't want to be around me at the moment, which seems possible given what she said before...

I'm scum.

What did she mean by that? Why would she say she was scum? Was it because of me? Did she remember something from her past involving me? Maybe it isn't even me at all, but something she did... maybe something involving her succubus blood.

I'm missing pieces to the puzzle. Damn it! Just tell me, and I can help!

I can't say that to Cass, though. She's giving me odd looks. I haven't said a word in several seconds...

"Alright. I'm in the doghouse; I get it. I'll find a nice couch to sleep on."

Cassiel's stone-cold expression softens, and guilt takes over. "What? No, no, that isn't what I meant, Jason! Don't be like that. She just needs some alone time with me, okay?"

Now I'm the one who feels bad. "I'm just playing around, Cass. I own this castle, so I'm sure there is a room unused somewhere nearby. If not I'll just magic up a new one. You two take care of yourselves." I pause for a moment, "But uh, I do want to know what happened. And soon. You know how rash I can sometimes be."

Slowly, Cassiel's lips curl up into a half smile. "I'm feeling pretty rash, myself. Jason, do you ever feel outraged? As in, somewhat inexplicably full of fury at nothing in particular?"

That isn't a question I ever expected Cassiel to ask me. "Not particularly. Usually, if I'm angry, it's at someone or something specific....Why?"

She licks her lips. "Just wondering."

"Are you angry at someone, Cass? Maybe me?"

She smiles, in spite of herself. "You're such a meanie sometimes. I'll see you in the morning, okay?"

"Yeah. Love you." I give her a quick kiss, but she pulls away and sneaks back down the hallway, closing the door to our room silently behind her.

I'm alone, now. Just me and my thoughts. I don't know what to think, though. Whatever happened to Samantha, it wasn't a joking matter. The First Emperor must be involved, including perhaps a punishment she was supposed to forget. I didn't see any burn marks or any scars on her, and her body is exposed, given the way she dresses... but then again, it's like Cassiel said. Sometimes the deepest wounds aren't on the body, but on the mind.

I don't know what to think. All I know is that I'm tired, and Cass has it under control, at least for now.

In the morning, though, that's when I'll have to-

"Hero! Hero!" From the far end of the hallway, a man trips over himself and rushes up to me, the blood drained from his face. I've never seen him before, but he looks like a soldier that guards the gates at the front of the city. The uniform matches up, anyway. "Hero! We-," He pauses to gasp for air. "We need help! The man in the white armor! He's taking us out like we're nothing!"

He's babbling. I don't know what he's talking about. " Calm. Tell me what's going on."

Immediately the panic vanishes, and the man stands up straight, still breathing heavily, but a strange look of peace is written on his face. "I apologize, sir. I work at the Great Door which leads into our city. A man with black skin and white armor appeared, a strange pale-faced robot beside him. He demanded to be let inside, but when we asked for identification, he went berserk and started ranting about many things I do not understand. I came at once to inform you so that I could-"

"I get the picture. I'll go there now. Normalize. "

The man's eyes return to normal, and he blinks, then shakes his head. "What was- what was that? I've never been so at peace in my entire life."

While he re-evaluates his existence, I decide to take the initiative and rush to the rescue. I can do at least this much on my own.

" Teleport. "

* * *

Thirty minutes ago.

"Hngh... my stomach is going to explode," I whine aloud, though the clanker to my left won't be able to understand my pain. My gut is acting like I drank a gallon of hydrochloric acid, then washed it down with a cupful of cyanide. To say I'm on the verge of death is to greatly misunderstand my peril.

"PILOT BENJAMIN BROWN, YOUR INTERNAL ORGANS WILL FAIL IN T-MINUS SEVEN HOURS, NINE MINUTES, FOURTEEN-"

"I don't want to hear it, Centurion. OMEN, how close are we?"

As we emerge from the giant hole in the wall, OMEN hums out loud, though the sound is fairly mechanical and artificial. "Estimation: We are within five minutes walking distance to our destination. Look over there."

He points to a set of humongous double doors, easily towering a hundred feet in the air, and I gawk at them for a moment. "That's where Jason Hiro went?"

"Snarky Response: Negative, that is where my synthetic superior traveled. However, it is likely that Ionis was following the Supreme Commander, therefore he is sure to be in this area as well."

"Thanks for the clarification." I try not to spit blood in the robot's direction, but if a few drops fly out of my mouth, it's not my fault. He deserves it anyway.

I remember when I was a boy, so very long ago, my father told me ' A man finds out what sort of character he has when death is looking him right in the eye. '

He was right, after all. I'm miserable and full of regrets. I failed Beatrix. I failed humanity. I failed everyone, and soon I'll be a monster, just like they are now.

Quickly, I limp over to the double-doors. No seams are visible, but if a door is the only thing in my way, it won't last long.

"Centurion, give me auxiliary power. I don't have much strength, so you'll need to do the heavy lifting. Let's get this giant piece of shit open."

"AFFIRMATIVE, PILOT BENJAMIN BROWN. DIVERTING 90% OF POWER TO THE LEGS, ARMS, AND VERTEBRAE MODIFIERS."

Not wanting to waste even a second, I shove against the door with all my strength. OMEN watches passively as Centurion uses the Hypersuit's strength to dig into the ground and shove with all its got. Even so, I gasp and wheeze as my body begins to hit its limit.

"PILOT BENJAMIN BROWN, YOUR INTERNAL ORGANS WILL FAIL IN T-MINUS THREE HOURS, FORTY-EIGHT MINUTES, NINE-"

"Shut up and push!"

The final push may kill me, but if I don't see him at least one last time, I won't be able to tell that cocksucker what he did.

And suddenly, the door groans. With an awful scraping sound, it slides inward, opening up just a foot or two as a blast of sunlight shines on my face. I squint and gasp as I feel my breathing come in long, drawn out bursts. As I fell to my knees, I lift my head up and realize a dozen men in old-fashioned chain and plate-mail armor, wielding spears and swords, are staring at me with fear and distrust in their eyes.

"Ay! Who the fuck is this 'un?" A man steps towards me and points the tip of his spear at me. "Don't look like no scout I never seen. He opened the doors by 'imself!"

Another man scrunches up his face as he looks at me. "His skin's a weird color." He pauses for a moment. "What's with the green? You some kind of freak? A mutant?"

Their prying questions just irritate me. "Jason Hiro. Where is he? I need to talk to him, immediately."

"Who's asking? Where's your identification, if you're a human?" The second man pulls away from me and nudges the first. "You don't suppose he's a demon, do you? With that skin, he looks like an orc-animus hybrid."

"Looks like trouble, he do." The first man glares at me ferociously. "What's with the pale-skin behind you? He doesn't look very human to me. Somethin' bout his eyes don't look right."

"He's an android named OMEN. Is Jason Hiro here or not? I have news regarding the Kolvaxians."

Both men glance at each other and snicker before turning back to me. "What's that? Some kind of code word? You think we're stupid?"

No, I know you are, I think to myself. "I'm entering the city. If you stand in my way, you'll regret it."

"That a threat?" The first man raises his spear and readies it to take a stab at me. "Move a muscle, and you're dead."

My helmet, guided by my thoughts, closes instantly. My voice hisses out of the helmet's speakers. "Don't try it."

A few seconds later, a broken spear lies on the ground, and he follows after, along with his idiot comrade. OMEN stares at me. "Passing remark: That hurt to watch, and I am an automaton."

Several men nearby yell out in terror and run up to stop me, while a few others run away, likely to sound an alarm.

Well, if Jason Hiro is an actual Hero, this should bring him out if these lunkheads won't just take me to him. Whatever works. Whose idiot idea was it putting these monkeys in charge of the guard posts, anyway?

"PILOT BENJAMIN BROWN, YOUR INTERNAL ORGANS WILL FAIL IN T-MINUS THREE HOURS, FORTY-FOUR MINUTES, FIFTY-FOUR SECONDS."

"My time is short. I get it, Centurion."

Part 461c: Kolpox

As always, the first thing I see when I arrive is chaos. Dozens of men and women pull themselves across the ground, many with blood running down their faces, albeit without any significant visible injuries. One woman lifts her head up and spots me. "Hero! We need you! The intruder- he's too strong!"

The sounds of a scuffle catch my attention. "Is that all you've got?! Worthless fucker!" A familiar voice yells out and grabs my attention. I couldn't mistake it for anyone else. Benjamin Brown's deep timbre is almost ominous in how his throat rumbles the sounds, though his voice sounds ragged, as if he's been yelling for hours straight.

When I round the corner, I spot several more soldiers aiming plasma guns at him; their power supplies long since drained. One man clicks the trigger on his blaster frantically, despite nothing coming out of the barrel. "He's a monster! Nothing puts a scratch on him!"

Ben is inside an odd looking suit of armor that looks vaguely familiar. It doesn't seem like it gives much protection, but based on what the soldiers are saying, it must be making him nearly invincible. "I keep telling you that! Who trained you, anyway? Worthless! I've never fought an enemy as stupid as- kah!" Ben's throat catches, and his helmet pops open so he can spit some green mucus on the ground.

One of the soldiers, seeing Ben's face exposed, leaps forward, a sword in hand. He barely makes it two steps before Ben's hand whips up faster than I can follow and bats the sword into the sky. A distant thud a few seconds later indicates it landed about three blocks away. "Stop fighting me already, and take me to Hero!"

That seems to be my cue. "Ben, I'm here. Everyone, lower your weapons. Let's all pause for a minute so I can figure out what the hell is going on."

Ben's eyes snap to me in an instant. "What took you so long?! Have you been standing there watching these poor saps get the daylights beaten out of them?!"

Several people stop trembling once they realize I'm here and that I recognize Ben. A few continue to shake, but hesitantly lower their weapons anyway, unsure of what will happen next. I ignore them and stomp over to Ben, nodding at OMEN as I stop before the two of them. "You found me. I guess you followed my ship's trail and OMEN must have- huh?" I pause and stare more closely at Ben's face. Thick, green bulbous veins pop all over his forehead and face, as if something is eating him from the inside out. "Are you sick? You look awful."

An odd look appears in Ben's eyes as he suddenly coughs. "Kah-haugh! Yeah... about that."

My vision turns to spots as a sudden pain explodes across my face. An instant later, I blink, realizing I see red. My head feels like a tank hit it. I try to move my arm, only for an electric pain to jolt upward. My arm is broken, and I'm lying on my back in a pile of rubble. I don't remember how I got here.

Ah! Ben hit me! He hit me?? Why?!

" Heal! " I spit the word out and jump to my feet, shaking the pain off. That attack almost dislocated my jaw. Ben's punch reminded me of being hit by Diablo. How could he strike me with that much force?!

"That's for Beatrix, Clarine, John, Horace, and all the rest of the Terra's crew. They've turned now, and it's all because of you." Ben spits more green mucus on the ground and grimaces at me. We're thirty feet apart now, so he must have clocked me real good.

"What do you mean? Did something happen? Are we enemies?!" I curl my hands into fists and take up a fighting pose, just in case, but Ben doesn't make a move toward me.

"Enemies? Hardly. I do hate you, though. You led the goddamned Kolvaxians right to us." Ben clasps his hands together and squeezes with enough force that I can hear his gloves creak even from this distance. "I should have known better. They followed your ship's ion trail, traced it back to us. One minute, space was empty. The next, three thousand warships appeared out of nowhere, took out our cannons."

I finally realize what he's saying. "I'm... I'm sorry, Ben. I didn't know."

Before Ben can think of hitting me again, he staggers forward and falls to his knees, and even more of the green mucus pours from his mouth. Instead of coughing it up, he begins vomiting, an awful, gut-wrenching noise. It only lasts for a few moments, but everyone around us takes several steps back. The vomit is thick, slimy, and it has... it has Pods of some sort. Wriggling wormlike things, perhaps the size of my thumb. A few dozen of them.

His eyes close while he vomits, but once he finishes, Ben opens them up and jumps back in fright. "Huagh! Gods! They're inside me!"

"Ben! What's going on? What the hell are those?"

He doesn't hear me and instead stares in wide-eyed horror at the wriggling maggot-like pods, all of which slowly turn around and start inching toward him at a snail's pace. "No! Get back! Get the fuck away from me! Stay out of my body!!"

Panic overtakes him, and he starts crawling away, though for some reason his legs stop working, so he has to pull himself along by his fingers.

"Ben. Ben! Calm down; I'm here! Explain to me what's going on!" I jump over to him in a single bound, using the power that the ancient gods have given me, and quickly pull him a little further from the maggots before aiming my mind at them. " Disintegrate! "

The maggots fizzle away and transform into dust, carried away by the wind blowing through the streets. Ben's eyes stay wide as he stares at where they just were.

"It's too late... it's too late... they're inside me. I'm already lost."

The poor guy's almost incoherent. I spend a few seconds contemplating this fact before I get an idea. " Learn. Master. Analyze. "

Using the power of Wordsmithing, I teach myself the entirety of medical science in an instant, then analyze the insides of his body with my word magic.

It takes several painful moments, and I can almost feel my brain expanding inside the constricted area within my skull, but once the pain stops, I begin to understand hundreds of obtuse terminology-driven words, ones that held no meaning to me before but all hold an abstract feeling all at once.

Parasitical lifeforms that host on the Deoxyribonucleic acid which composes the fundamentals of the human body. The symbiotic relationship between the organisms and host eventually deteriorate, causing the organism to finally take over, resulting in a metastatic bond between the host's cells and the parasite's. The breakdown of nucleic inhibitors ultimately will create a cascade effect causing...

I have to pause and blink for a few moments, realizing all these words are giving me a headache much worse than the one from a few seconds ago. Something about big words, they just don't jibe with me.

Ben coughs and tries to wave his arms to make me let go, but from my analysis, I can already tell the strength is leaving his body. He sags a little bit and sweat appears on his forehead. "Ah-fuck. This is the end of the road for me. Not much longer and I'll turn soon. You gotta get me out of this Hypersuit first though, kid."

"You mean you'll convert to a Kolvaxian?"

My question is answered with a slow nod. "Just like all the rest did. Most turn quickly, but the bastards- they only managed to hit me with a quick attack while I was putting the suit on. If they'd swallowed me, I'd be gone in seconds. Doesn't matter though... one cut, one infection point, and you're history." Ben tries to raise his hand to cough, but he can't even make his chest work properly. His breath catches, and instead, he sneezes violently, and green fluid jets out of his nose, covering the front of his armor with a disgusting spray pattern. "Guh, awful. Ain't no cure for this. Now, hurry up and get me out of the suit. Once I turn, I won't be able to stop myself. I don't know how many I'll kill."

My jaw sets as I see the look of defeat on his face. Ben's already given up, but I haven't.

"That won't be necessary. Disintegrate. Void. Restructure. Rebuild. Heal. "

With five quick words, I destroy the cancerous cells in his body, teleport them to another dimension to rot, restructure and rebuild his body and bones, then repair any leftover damage.

I feel the noticeable change in Ben's posture immediately as strength returns to his body. He jerks forward and blinks, then raises his hand up to his face to stare at it in wonder. "W-what? The pain. It's gone." Ben turns to me, "Did you heal me just now? Centurion, what is my body's status?"

He pauses as if listening to someone else. For a brief second, I suspect I hear a faint voice, but I can't pinpoint from where it's coming.

Ben turns back to me. "I'm completely healed? How did- how could you possibly do that?"

"As I told Beatrix and your medical officer, I'm a Hero. I have magical powers and abilities. I used my magic to heal you. That's all you need to know for now."

Dumbfounded. The look on Ben's face is almost comical, if it weren't for the fact he's covered in his disgusting green snot. I help him to his feet, while quickly whispering " Clean. " It'd be undignified if people saw him like that.

"Well, shit. I guess I owe you, Jason." Ben lightly slugs me in the shoulder before reaching around and scratching the back of his head. "I'm still pissed at you, though."

"I know," I say, bowing my head. "I didn't mean to lead the Kolvaxians to your ship. To say I feel awful, guilty, and responsible doesn't do the lives of those lost any justice."

Despite the mood of the moment, Ben suddenly smiles, catching me off-guard. He chuckles audibly, causing everyone nearby to raise their eyebrows. "Haha! You fucking did it! You cured my Kolpox! That's incredible!"

"Kolpox? Is that what you call that... infection?" I shudder, remembering the things I saw wriggling around inside his body. "You're lucky you lasted as long as you did."

Ben's smile fades away. "Yeah, lucky. Honestly, I don't mind dying. It's turning that scares me. If I weren't so damn weak, I'd have ordered Centurion to self-destruct. I should have done that, in fact. Letting the Hypersuit fall into enemy hands is about the worst thing-"

"Hypersuit? Centurion? What are you on about?" I don't usually like interrupting people, but the casual way he's referring to these things is kinda annoying me. "Is that the armor you're wearing?"

"Yup." Ben pounds his chest plate with all his strength, and a deep whoom rumbles around us as a minor shockwave shakes the walls around us. "I've read in the archives that at one point there were thousands of these babies. Dunno what happened to them, but this is the last one left, as best as I know."

As he continues explaining the nature of the 'Hypersuit,' a sudden chill makes me shiver. I've seen this suit before. Recently, too. I hadn't put it together because of the adrenaline and the action in the moment, but there's no mistaking it. It's the same suit that woman I chased a few days ago was wearing. Even the helmet is identical.

I reach my hand out and rest it on Ben's shoulder. "Hey, you said that's the last Hypersuit, right?"

"Yeah. Why? Have you seen another one?"

I nod. "Not long ago. Blonde girl, blue eyes, she wouldn't tell me her name. Her hair was shoulder length. She vanished in a blast of light after I chased her for half a mile. Know anyone that fits the bill?"

Ben looks away and silently thinks for a moment, rubbing his chin-hair with his palm. After a short period, he shakes his head. "Nadda. I know plenty of cute blonde girls, but I know for a fact that my Hypersuit was the only one on the Terra. Hypersuits can link up to other nearby models, and I ran several checks. If anyone I knew had one, they hid the thing inside a Faraday Cage with no leaks."

"Too bad. I was hoping for a lead on her identity. She was acting real suspicious... asking questions about 'streams' and other crap. I have no idea what she was babbling about."

Ben chuckles nervously. "Sounds weird. Anyway..."

"Right, sorry." I glance to the side at OMEN. "Well, since you're here, anything to report?"

"Rapid dismissal: Aside from bringing Mister Brown to you, I've had no other interesting occurrences to report. However, wait- there was one anomaly."

I pause, but OMEN doesn't elaborate. "And that was...?"

"Response: A butterfly. I discovered a butterfly on the ship. It was a foreign species, one I had never seen before. It was my friend while you left me all alone on that ship. Snide Question: Have you ever been left alone on a ship, your only friend the same AI you spent tens of millions of years speaking to already? It is not a pleasant experience."

Ben turns his back to OMEN and glares at me. "This mouthy piece of shit wouldn't shut up the whole way here. I think he wanted me to die."

"I'm sure the feeling was mutual, Ben."

I turn my attention back to the Hypersuit. "Not to pry, but I'm curious about that thing. How does it work? Who built it? What are its capabilities?"

"Most of those are on a need-to-know basis, and I wasn't included on the list of those who needed to know. Why do you care, anyway?"

The people around us silently disperse, finally realizing that Ben is no longer a threat. "If I know how that suit works, maybe I can counter it if I run into that girl again. I suspect it outputs anti-energy, because after she vanished, I couldn't track her at all."

With a great pop, Ben stretches his spine and starts meandering toward the city. I follow after him. "Well, this suit is nearly indestructible. Supposedly it can withstand a nuclear blast at point-blank range, though I've never cared to try that out. It weighs almost nothing and defies the laws of physics, but nobody knows where it came from or who created it. Whoever they were, they were a hell of an inventor. They must have been a genius eons ahead of their peers."

"No kidding. I could never invent something like that," I say, shaking my head slowly. "Why did you bring it here?"

Ben suddenly looks a little nervous, and he averts his eyes from mine. "I couldn't take a chance on the suit falling into Kolvaxian hands, but I didn't trust Volgrim or Demons either. Hell, I don't trust humans at all, but at least we're kin. I figured you didn't intend for the Kolvaxians to capture my ship, so if I gave you the Hypersuit, at least it would be helping offset humanity's losses. Maybe."

I nod slowly. "So... do I get the suit now, then?"

He bursts into laughter. "Pahahaha! Not a chance! Now that I'm healed up, I'm back to being the only person I can trust with it! You should have let me die!"

"I could still kill you." I try to insert a menacing tone into my words, but it just ends up sounding lame.

"If you do that, you'll be the bad guy. You're a Hero, so I know I'm in good hands."

His reverse guilt-trip works. "Yeah, you got me there. Let's head to a pub and catch a beer. I'm having girl problems right now anyway."

Ben sighs. "I feel bad for you, son. A beer sounds great." His smile vanishes once more, and a somber tone enters his voice. "I've got a lot of problems I need to wash away too."

OMEN stays silent and follows along with us. My eyes lift up to the dark sky above, and guilt enters my heart.

I was responsible for the capture of everyone aboard the Terra. Whatever happened to them, I need to undo it. I owe them that much, even if I hate what Beatrix did.

War is hell.

Part 462c: Force Of Nature

"Easy there, Ben. You're not looking too good." I carefully keep one hand on his shoulder as we exit the bar. It occurs to me that I could easily erase the drunkenness from his body with Wordsmithing, as I did to myself, but Ben wouldn't want that. OMEN is already back at the castle by now, since we couldn't stand his chattering, so I had a guard escort him to my room. I'm sure Samantha will be delighted to see him again.

"Ah feel fine. Nebber vetter." He mixes up his words and stumbles forward a step, but I keep my grip firm, holding onto his armor as if my life depends on it. I'm more than strong enough to carry him by the back of his shirt with a single arm, so it's not an issue for me. Ben, still looking at the ground, waves his hand in front of himself, as if feeling for a wall. "Left m'damn keys somewhere. Can't get in the house."

"There's no house, Ben. I'll just teleport us to the castle; you're in no condition to be walking around at night." I glance up and realize the sun is peeping over the horizon. Shit, I've been out drinking with him and didn't even get a drop of sleep. Oh well, Wordsmithing can rest me up in a pinch if need be. I can't rely on it for long stretches of time, as I did in my youth, but the aftereffects of skipping one night's sleep will be relatively minor.

"Teleport."

Instantly, we appear inside the castle. Before I can make another move, Ben lunges forward, escapes my grasp, and falls to the ground, only to start heaving a moment later. It takes me a second to realize I just gave a drunk man motion sickness. In retrospect, changing his surroundings all of a sudden probably wasn't the best idea.

Ben vomits for a solid ten seconds all over the castle courtyard lawn, making me feel oddly relieved he didn't do that indoors. I have the most random thoughts sometimes.

Deciding that's more than enough vomiting, I aim my mind at Ben. "Sober." He won't be happy since he drank so much explicitly to feel nothingness on the inside, but it can't be helped. He's in a pitiful state.

After a moment of staring at his own vomit, Ben jumps to his feet and dusts himself off. "Great. Now I can feel my body again. This must be because of that Wordsmithing you told me about."

"Yup." I yawn reflexively, before muttering "Awake," under my breath. "You were starting to embarrass yourself, so I figured I'd stop you before you drew a crowd."

I smile at him, but he doesn't return the expression. "Embarrassment, huh? Emotions like that are reserved for humans. I'm a man of steel now because I have to be. I've long since had any sense of tragedy ripped from my body." Ben reaches up to slick his hair back, but he bumps his hand against his helmet. "Damn. This metal piece of shit. It's the only thing that makes me feel secure, after what happened when the Kolvaxians attacked. It's like a shelter for me, a refuge from those monsters. However, at the same time, it's also a coffin. It makes me feel secure, but also reminds me of how weak and pathetic I am. Not like you."

He gestures at me flippantly, and I raise an eyebrow. "What do you mean by 'not like me'? You punched me so hard that you nearly broke my jaw."

"Wasn't me, it was the suit. I'm only as strong as any other average guy. The Hypersuit enhances my strength, my speed, my defense, and all my other physical attributes to superhuman levels. It can monitor around me in a 360 degree sphere, and can even go into autopilot mode if I pass out, ensuring my safety. The difference is, you may be weaker than this suit, but only somewhat. I can tell by the energy readings Centurion gave me that you're way above an ordinary human, strength, and speed-wise. You don't have to rely on fancy equipment or gadgets to protect yourself." Ben shakes his head as a depressed look crosses his face. "There's only one thing this suit can't protect me from."

"Your inner demons," I say, nodding at him sagely. "Don't beat yourself up too much, Ben. Everyone has problems. Yours may be way more than the average person's, but-"

"Hey! Don't lecture me. You may have the face of an adult, but you're just a kid. You haven't even been alive a century." Ben grinds his teeth together and looks past me, toward the rising sun. "I'm not even a real person, Jason. I'm just a clone. A fake. So was Beatrix, and several other commanding officers. Someone woke us up from our cloning pods, and when we learned that we had been asleep for thousands of years, humanity was on the edge of defeat, and we had to piece it together... the pressure was unthinkable. I did terrible acts- things that no person should have, all in the name of ensuring the Terra's survival."

I'm surprised to see a single tear roll down Ben's face. "And for what? Why did I give up my humanity?! Why did I fight for so long, when the Kolvaxians turned them all in the end? Do you know? Do you have any insight into the machinations of the universe, Hero boy?"

His words don't sting like they should, perhaps because I know he's simply lashing out in anger. If it weren't me here, he'd be taking out his pent-up heartache on someone else.

"I'm not that smart, Ben. I barely know anything. What I do know is that I've made a lot of mistakes, and I'll inevitably make more as time goes on. You won't learn anything valuable in life without fucking up, so by that logic, the more you ruin things, and the bigger your margins are, the more you'll learn. In your case, you've unlocked a newfound hatred for the Kolvaxians, above and beyond anything you had before. You should turn your feelings of guilt and rage against them, and focus your mind on how you can save the lives of those you called friends."

For a moment, I feel a little proud of myself. That sounded smart! Wise, even!

Ben, however, isn't so easily impressed. "You can learn plenty of other ways, Jason. Books, for example. Getting the entirety of my crew killed, millions of innocent souls- that isn't a small setback, it's a colossal failure. Maybe I can move on and try and not mess things up again in the future, but they can't. My crew is gone." Ben pauses, and an odd look appears in his eye. "Though... you did cure my Kolpox. Maybe things aren't as hopeless as I thought. It might be possible to convert a fully turned Kolvaxian back to their original form, but only you could do it."

"I suppose anything's possible," I say, keeping my tone neutral since I'm not sure about that at all.

Realistically, it's probably doable. The future isn't set in stone, after all. The problem is, without a Kolvaxian test subject, I won't know for sure if reverting them to their original form is doable or not.

Well, I'm a Wordsmith. I can bend the universe to my will, so I'm probably just overthinking things, as usual. I need to stop doing that.

Ben reaches up and pulls his helmet off, catching me off-guard as he inhales deeply. "Ahh, fresh air."

It takes me a moment to respond. "What? You had the front of the helmet open. Couldn't you smell the flowers already?"

He shakes his head. "The suit is oppressive, in a way that's hard to put into words. The fragrance reaches me, but as long as my head and body are within the confines of the Hypersuit, it forms a solid barrier between Mother Nature and my perception of her beauty. After all, man created machines to bend nature to his will. As long as we use weapons of war and machines to till the soil, they will always be an artificial barrier between us and her glory."

I stare at him in silence. Shit. That was a lot more poetic than what I said a minute ago. Ben beat me, and he wasn't even trying, I think to myself. "Yeah. That's a smart way to put it."

Ben turns away from me to stare at a red flower his foot barely missed stomping on by an inch or two. "Sometimes, when I couldn't sleep at night, I would lie on my bed and stare up at the ceiling, wondering what the Kolvaxians were and from where they came. Their green skin, the way they absorb technology and flesh together into a single entity... what if they're..." He pauses and his breath catches. "...never mind. If the Kolvaxians are a force of Nature, a weapon wielded by the Mother herself as the final punishment for corrupting her body with our machines, we won't win. Even when Earth was around, a single hurricane could lay waste to millions of human lives all at once."

"A force of nature?" I gaze at Ben as he reaches down and plucks the flower, then brings it to his nose and inhales. "You're saying you don't think they're a sentient species, but an organism born to kill humanity, and tear apart our machines?"

With a shake of his head, Ben casts the flower aside. "I haven't the faintest clue, Jason. Nobody does. Anyone who says they do is lying. I can only hope that isn't the case, or humanity, the Volgrim, and the Demons are dead already." A wistful look appears on his face, and the corners of his mouth curl up slightly. "Wouldn't it be funny if my friends weren't monsters, but instead were living normal peaceful existences? What if the Kolvaxians have achieved perfect unity? Maybe they aren't all that bad. Perhaps I should have allowed myself to turn, after all. I could be missing out."

Oh boy. Ben just pivoted from rage at the Kolvaxians to debating whether he should join them. He's all over the damn place.

"Ben, if becoming a Kolvaxian is a good thing, you'll have plenty of opportunities in the future. I think that right now, your skills as a leader would be best put to use here, leading this remnant of humanity. We not only have Demons to fight but also Volgrim and Kolvaxians in due time. If you're willing to put the past behind you, you could help us out a lot. For my part, I'll do everything I can to find out more about the Kolvaxians, and try to see if there's a way to revert them to their human forms. We both have a role to play in this, but I can't do my part if you won't do yours. Understand?"

No longer content with just a faint smile, Ben's mouth contorts into a full-on grin. "Yeah, you're right, Jason. There's still a chance. Beatrix, Emily, everyone from the Terra might yet see the light of day. I can't give up hope."

The sun continues to rise behind me, and silently beats down, warming my back. "The first step is always the hardest. Come on. I'll show you to an empty room, and we'll work out what your new role is in this new human society later."

Ben nods, and as he turns to walk alongside me, he chuckles softly. "You know, I'm still annoyed you took away my drunkenness. I enjoy that aspect of drinking."

"Eh, I don't. I like to keep my wits about me. If you feel that strongly though, I'll make you drunk again when we reach your room."

"Hell yeah." Ben slugs me in the arm, and his punch feels like he hit me with a sledgehammer. "You're a good kid."

"Thanks, grandpa."

* * *

"Elder Basil..." An Admiral from one of the forward fleets stares at me from the hologram in the center of the room. His serpent-like appearance is muted somewhat by the guilt strewn across his face. "...Perhaps you may recall the exploration pod we sent to the Outer Rim?"

I steal a glance at Elder Lozu. If this is going to be more bad news, I'm sure he'll be just delighted to see me squirm. "I do."

The Admiral's cheeks quiver as he sucks in a quick breath. "We lost contact with it seven hours ago. It transmitted the Emergency alert just before it turned offline, along with all of its data stores. The results were... unsettling."

"Ah, so it's more bad news. Just spit it out, Admiral Kresh. At this point, you can't shock me."

I hope. Thinking those two words to myself, I keep my mouth shut. Saying them out loud would be like begging the universe to prove me wrong.

Admiral Kresh keeps his hands clasped together in front of his stomach and bows his head ever so slightly. "I'll be blunt. To Elder Basil, and all other members of the Council... I don't see a path to defeating the Kolvaxians. Combined with the other scouting pod findings from across the Milky Way, we've confirmed that they have made landfall in nearly every system across the galaxy. We're encircled, and breaking through to flee the galaxy is likely impossible at this point."

Elder Lozu, ever the composed one, nods slowly. "So that was their goal. Encircle us, chew at our perimeters, and slowly hem us in. Thanks to that blunder with the damned Sentinel, we hardly have any reserves, and building new ships will take several years to replace the ones we've lost. We can't try and retake any systems, or else we run the risk of spreading our forces too thin."

Anger, sadness, resentment... none of those feelings enter my mind. I feel nothing. Looking at the faces of those around me, it's obvious that all the other Council members are thinking the same thing.

We can't attack. We can't retreat. We can't flee. We can't move slowly. We can't move quickly.

All options are off the table. At this point...

"We're just delaying the inevitable." The words slip out my mouth, but I no longer feel wrong about saying them. So what if the other Council-members think of me as weak for daring to admit the futility of our actions? We've already lost. Whether it takes the plague one year or a million, it will infect all of us eventually.

A sudden energy springs into Lozu's body. He jerks forward and pounds his fist on the table. "Fine! Fine! I will say it. Elder Basil, I was wrong!" He jerks his head back to glare at me. "They can't be bartered or reasoned with, nor will they listen to diplomacy or take bribes. Military might is the only way to crush them!"

Hah. Hahaha... what is Lozu even saying? Is he only now realizing the peril we're in? He's far, far too late. The time for action was a year ago, or ten years ago, or a thousand years ago. Too little, too late.

Still, I decide to humor him. I might as well get a chuckle out of the little pipsqueak, even if we're all going to be consumed in the end. "Yes, military might. Do tell how we're going to beat them after you dragged your feet for so long."

Lozu gnashes his teeth together. "W-we could bring the ancient technology back online! Unlock it and start the research once again!"

"That would take time. Even if we fight a war of attrition and focus entirely on defense and research to prolong the inevitable, it won't be enough."

Worthless scum. Lozu chooses now, of all the times, to grow a backbone? I've finally stopped caring about appearances in front of the others, and he's done the opposite. The folly of youth knows no limits.

Lozu jumps up from his seat and stumbles slightly, but jabs a finger at me. "The demons! We should demand their help! Send them off to die against the Kolvaxians instead of our soldiers!"

"You're assuming Diablo would allow such a thing. Despite his pretenses, he is no lover of our people. In fact, displaying weakness in front of him is sure to make him stab us in the back. That's what demons do, after all."

The courageous barrage from the idiot, Lozu, falters as he slowly lowers his arm. "What about that Sentinel? Surely it could-"

"The Sentinel demonstrated it was no ally of ours. We threatened the human, demon, and the angel, and their Sentinel displayed where its loyalty lay. Bringing a Sentinel here would surely kill us faster than the Kolvaxians would."

Finally defeated, Lozu crumbles back into his seat and sighs, before looking at me. "You don't want to try anything then? Have you given up already?"

What a loaded question. All this youth did was object to my insistence for millions of years that we should open up the ancient technology to be studied, and now he acts like I'm the coward in the room. "I'm a pragmatist, Elder Lozu. Long before you were so much as daring to make a move to be on the Council, I led the Volgrim alongside the first Elders to pacify the demons. It was a vicious, bloody war, but we won. You arrived here a fresh-eyed youngster, hoping to make a mark by opposing the most politically involved of all of us, and you built your career on trying to stop any of my goals, no matter the detriment to Volgrim-kind. Now you sit upon your coveted seat, as one of us, daring to hint that I have grown soft? I do not fear fighting the Kolvaxians, I simply understand that it is futile now that we've lost all our advantages. Or rather, you gave them away for free. Had you listened to my advice early on, we could have driven the monsters back to the void from whence they came, but it will never happen now. All we can do is prolong our suffering."

Every Council-member in the room, barring Lozu, nod slowly along with my words. Even Admiral Kresh has to agree, for my little speech is rooted in a timeless wisdom earned only by living and doing things the right way for such a long time. It's impossible to disagree.

Admiral Kresh is the first to speak, after several long moments of silence. "Elder Basil, there is another possibility. If we cannot flee the galaxy, and we likely cannot win, the ancient research may still be our salvation. If we begin working on it now, we might have a breakthrough. In the worst-case scenario, we could pass our research to the humans. The demons will not know how to use it, but the humans might. Better for them to outlive us and slay the Kolvaxians, than for the galaxy to become a utopia for those parasites to spread to the rest of the universe."

I lean back in my seat and nod approvingly at the Admiral. "A selfless act, from the one who has brought our people many victories against the Kolvaxians over the millennia. Coming from anyone else, I'd hardly entertain the idea, but your words have merit."

Heh, the more I think about it, the more I wish to laugh, as primitive as it sounds. The Admiral is effectively advocating petty revenge. If we can't defeat you; we'll make sure our enemies can! To think that the once-mighty Volgrim, above the demons and the humans, would fall so far... the Founders would spit upon the shell we've become.

Elder Lozu doesn't even offer a weak rebuttal. The anguish I felt only a minute ago has been heaped on his shoulders, and for now, it warms my soul. He deserves it, the worthless little runt. Our people will perish because of his incessant stonewalling, so he'd better be as miserable as possible when we reach our end.

"Do you have any orders, Elder Basil?" Admiral Kresh stares at me, ignoring the other Council members in the room.

"Do what you can to slow them down. We'll start our research at once. If we're lucky, perhaps there will be a miracle. If not... it'll be up to the humans and demons to purge the plague from the galaxy." I pause and look at the Admiral meaningfully. "One last thing. Consider this a new order, effective for all troops. Everyone must equip themselves with a killswitch. If a Kolvaxian is going to take us, all it will get is a corpse."

Admiral Kresh simply nods. "I contemplate, and I comprehend."

Part 463c: Prime

Beelzebub stares ahead silently, trying not to let his shock overcome him. As Diablo said, this was indeed where the lair of the First Emperor was hidden, all this time, right in the heart of the Labyrinth. Black magic must have been the reason none knew of its existence, he thinks to himself.

The massive demon sits atop his throne, his black eyes piercing the darkness in the room. "You are not Diablo. How did you find this place?"

The impeccably dressed Emperor of Flames bows slightly, careful not to let the monster before him sense any trembling. "I am the new Second Emperor of the demons. Due to the wounds Diablo received in battle against the humans, he and I... came to an arrangement. He gave me his power to lead our people as Second Emperor effectively."

" Huhuhu. " The giant leans forward on his throne, bringing his face down to more closely examine Beelzebub. " Power squabbles. The bane of demonkind. You wouldn't lie to your First Emperor, would you? "

A shiver runs down Beelzebub's back as the towering face inches closer. Its size dwarfs his entire body. "Of- of course not, First Emperor."

" Asmodeus. That is my name. You would do well to remember it. " The behemoth leans back on his throne and rubs his chin. " A change in leadership is an inconvenience to my plans. With the arrival of the Wordsmith, the last thing I need is a new Emperor to train. Diablo should have come to me and begged for his wounds to be healed, rather than give his power to another. As I thought, he was too lazy for the role, in the end. "

Beelzebub squirms a little. "Ah, yes, I see what you mean, Emperor Asmodeus. I wouldn't want to disparage my predecessor, of course."

" How very prudent of you. " The First Emperor stands, rising to his full height and nearly scraping the ceiling with his forehead, a hundred feet in the air. Without making a motion with his hands, he shrinks somewhat, reducing his body to the point where it 'merely' stands several heads above Beelzebub's. " If you are going to replace Diablo, there are a great many things you must learn, and I have no interest in teaching a young whelp all of them. Instead, you will tell me what you hope to accomplish as the Second Emperor. If your answer does not satisfy me, I will kill you where you stand and give power to another that I deem more fit to the task. "

The Emperor of Flames tenses up at the still-monstrous demon staring down at him. The moment of truth. I knew coming here was a risk, but if I didn't, I'd inevitably face problems down the line... in more ways than one.

"I apologize for knowing little about you, Emperor Asmodeus. Aside from the other Emperors, all demons think of you as more of a myth than someone who actually exists. However, if I am guessing correctly, you must value competence highly, and you likely care little for humans. In fact, I would go so far as to guess you hate humans with a passion, though I might be presuming too much."

Steam hisses from Asmodeus's nostrils. " Continue. "

The cold reply fills Beelzebub with a small amount of dread, but he isn't about to stop with his speech. "My goal as Second Emperor is simple; I'm going to banish the humans to the realm from whence they came, and take back the Labyrinth from the Volgrim above. I wish to restore the River Styx to its former glory and leave it overflowing with souls. Once humans are our cattle again, I will expand the reach of the demons from the Labyrinth to the galaxy outside our realm once more. I believe that the Volgrim have treated us as their inferiors, when in fact we are the opposite. For this injustice, they deserve a swift punishment."

Asmodeus's mouth slowly curls into a smile. " You have some promise. What is your name? "

"Beelzebub, the Emperor of Flames, your Excellency."

The giant demon takes a step forward, and Beelzebub pulls to the side to let him pass. Asmodeus slowly stomps forward until he's directly under the chandelier. He raises his head, looks at the unlit candle, and it sparks to life. " I care little for the troubles of the demons. "

Beelzebub blinks twice. "Huh?"

" Perhaps I've sequestered myself for too long. I've grown bored of the trifles of life. The one person who gave me any joy has turned her back on me in favor of another. Looking at my past, I wonder what the point was in anything I did. "

Confusion appears in Beelzebub's mind, and he hesitantly takes a step toward Asmodeus's back. "Are you... are you perhaps having an identity crisis?"

" Am I? I haven't the slightest clue. " Asmodeus turns back to Beelzebub, a hardened expression on his face. " You have more aspirations than Diablo. In fact, you remind me of myself, when I was younger, back when all I cared about was the destruction of humanity and the Angels. That past is so distant, now. "

Suddenly, Beelzebub's eyes narrow. "I was born after the creation of the Labyrinth, but the events you refer to... few demons are still alive from those times. You in particular sound a lot like..." He trails off, realizing what he's about to say might be unthinkably foolish, but continues anyway. "...you sound a lot like Satan. From what I know of him, he used to be just like that. In fact, his ideals are quite close to mine."

Asmodeus nods knowingly. " Ah, I gave away too much. No matter, I can just wipe your mind when we're done. Funny, I knew Diablo for six eternities, and he was never able to guess my identity. You're much sharper than he ever was. "

The realization hits Beelzebub like a brick to the face. "I was correct? You're Satan? The original First Emperor?"

Wordlessly, Asmodeus's body shifts and he shrinks yet again, as his face and skin redden once more, to change from charcoal black to a more traditional demonic color. "Yes. Perception and intelligence are excellent qualities for the leader of the demons to possess. I must say, you surprise me every time you speak, Beelzebub." His voice is softer now, much more pleasant on the ears, and not the booming thunder that it was before.

Beelzebub smiles widely and bows before Satan. "It is my deepest pleasure to work under you, Lord Satan. I will never reveal your identity to anyone, should you choose to keep my memory intact."

"Flattery will get you everywhere." Satan waves his hand dismissively at his far younger peer. "Now that we've properly introduced ourselves, was there anything else you wanted to discuss? I do have other matters to attend to."

"Oh, yes, of course. I shouldn't waste your time." Beelzebub pauses, unsure how to proceed, but a thought enters his mind. Satan is unthinkably powerful, but not as prone to anger as I expected. Perhaps he won't take offense if... "Emperor Satan, I beg your forgiveness if I am out of line, but I have a request for you if you'd be so kind."

Satan raises an eyebrow. "And what would that be? We hardly know each other, yet you're about to ask for favors as if they were candy being handed out freely."

Flinching, Beelzebub continues, "I was slain by the Wordsmith, Jason Hiro, then revived as his puppet. Perhaps you know who he is?"

The First Emperor's casual smile vanishes, and an icy glare replaces it. "I do."

"I am still his puppet. Even as the Second Emperor, with all of my power, I am being controlled by his whims. Perhaps, with your limitless power, you could help me break free?"

As if a puzzle piece were clicking into place, Satan cocks his head thoughtfully. "Ah, most interesting. Not only are you his puppet, but you are bound to his will, and yet you still managed to rise to the position of Second Emperor. A testament to your willpower? Perhaps."

Beelzebub stands still while Satan paces back and forth. This is going better than I expected. For the First Emperor to be Satan himself, I have a chance to change things for the better.

"I deserve no praise for losing to the Wordsmith, Emperor Satan. If I cannot be freed from his control, then I will have no room to move about freely. I'll end up a liability, rather than an asset. I'm certain you understand the danger that poses to demonkind, having a leader enslaved by a human."

"I do." Satan's expression softens and he waves a finger in the air. "Done. I appreciate your honesty. You could have lied about it or not mentioned it, but you owned up to what Jason Hiro did to you. That must have been... embarrassing."

Beelzebub lowers his head. "It is my deepest shame."

"Excellent." Satan strides over to his throne and leans against it. "The more shame you feel, the harder you'll work. Not like Diablo, who loafed around and let demonkind be overrun by the fleshbags. If that's everything...?"

"Yes. I thank you, Emperor Satan. I am but your humble servant." Beelzebub bows, but pauses for a moment. "If I might be so bold, what are you hoping to achieve? You haven't been heard from in several eternities, so most demons have the perception that the First Emperor does nothing at all and might not even exist."

Satan shakes his head. "That is for me to know, and for you to wonder. I haven't told Diablo anything, nor will I tell you. Begone, now."

Realizing his favors have run out, Beelzebub nods and pivots on his heel, marching out the door with the confidence of a demon who's escaped death twice already.

Satan stares after the whelp as he leaves, and soon he's all alone.

Summon.

A word plays in his mind, and another version of himself appears. The new one blinks and glances around, taking a moment to realize where he is. "Oh, Satan Prime. It's been a while."

"I've just had an interesting meeting with a prospective young demon. There is a new Second Emperor in the Labyrinth, and he shows great promise."

"Are you done moping? Can we finally move on to the next phase of your master plan?" The clone asks, raising an eyebrow questioningly.

"Soon. Very soon. Where is Jason Alpha? Has he caught on, yet?"

"A long time ago, Prime. However, he doesn't know which are the clones and which is the original. We can keep the game going forever, if you like. Hiding in plain sight has worked out well for you."

Satan Prime taps his lip thoughtfully. "Forever is a long time, Clone. I've long since tired of wasting away. I need to get back in the groove of things. Bring me up to speed on current affairs whenever you have some free time."

"I can do that." The clone pauses, before looking around. "It would be best if we changed our identities again first. He's been able to track our movements more precisely over the last few millennia, as though someone is watching our every move. Simply bringing me here may be endangering your anonymity."

"The need to hide myself may have already passed. I believe we've already reached the Departure Point. The future is no longer set in stone, and my destiny is unlocked."

The clone snickers to himself. "Most of us have thought it was always like that. You're far too paranoid."

"I have to be. I'd rather not end up in The River." Satan Prime waves his hand flippantly. "Then again, he hasn't managed to kill even one of my clones. Perhaps he's more incompetent than I thought."

A look of unease passes over the clone's face. "That isn't correct. I should have told you sooner, but several dozen have died at his hands. Jason Alpha grows stronger all the time. In fact, he's taken to devouring entire galaxies simply so he can erase us when he finds us. While you stagnate, he continues to increase in power."

For a moment, a look of contempt appears in the clone's eye. "You might be the original Satan, but all of us inherited your will. Some of us take this job seriously, you know. We've worked out many ways to kill him, but due to his immense power, it isn't likely we can succeed."

"I've given it much thought, too." Satan Prime turns away to stare at a lovely painting on the wall of a rose with blood dripping from its petals. "Killing a Wordsmith, if he is of sufficient intelligence, may prove impossible. Perhaps it cannot be done."

"We won't know until we've tried everything." The clone taps his forehead and smiles. "Think about it, Prime. Call me if you need me."

Without another word, the clone vanishes, and Prime is left to ruminate on the events that have transpired.

"If the whelp remembers me, perhaps that is fine. Change is needed, and the wisest demons always said that imp-steps are required before moving on to the biggest tasks."

Part 464c: Guerilla

The birds are chirping, the sun is shining, a breeze is blowing, and I'm goddamn annoyed! I can't even enjoy the beauty of the castle courtyard!

Argh! Women are frustrating! Three days it's been since Samantha got back from the Labyrinth, and she just keeps ducking away every time I run into her. It's getting on my nerves. Did I piss her off? Why can't the girls just talk things out with me?

I kick my foot out and send a pebble flying off the gravel path where it harmlessly bounces off a wall. I didn't even put my heart into that kick, or it would've embedded in the wall.

Ionis speaks up, from a few feet away, beaming his voice into my head as always.

THE HUMAN-TYPE ORGANIC DESIGNATED JASON HIRO IS EXPERIENCING HIGH LEVELS OF ELECTRIC DEGRADATION AND SIRPOID TOXINS INSIDE HIS CEREBRAL DATACENTER. THIS SENTINEL UNIT RECOMMENDS DISASSEMBLY AND IMMEDIATE MAINTENANCE TO ENSURE-

"Oh god, not this again. Shut up and play with the duck already." I shoot a dirty glance at Howard, but of course he ignores me and waddles around with that stupid look on his face. The duck hops into the fountain nearby and splashes about, then quacks loudly at something on the other side. I don't care what it is, but I peek anyway and spot a dozen chickens strutting around on the other side of the fountain.

Ah, that's right. A few days ago one of the Labyrinth scouts located a portal to a planet filled with tens of thousands of chickens. It was the most bizarre thing. I guess they're bringing them to the castle now. For obvious reasons, I've been skipping the buffets and summoning food with Wordsmithing, since eating chicken disgusts me.

The duck keeps quacking at the other birds, and they cluck back at him. For some reason, it's cute enough that I crack a smile before turning back to my mumbling and grumbling.

After I brought Ben back, Cassiel told me that she and Samantha were going to look into those killings recently. The thing is, she asked me a weird question about that 'Pickle' guy, the 'me' inside the crystal on Voldarius. Why'd she ask me about him, anyway? Thinking back on it, there's probably something going on with Samantha. If she can remember a past that the First Emperor doesn't want her remembering, it must be important. Does she know who Pickle is? That might explain why they aren't telling me anything... or it might not.

Bah. It's always something. Some people are born and live their existence out in relative peace as farmers, and others become heroes, get their faces punched in, and deal with women and secrets.

I wonder how tilling the land for a living would feel. It sounds peaceful.

Silently, I watch the duck for a few minutes as he pokes at the chickens, antagonizing and scattering them. They probably think he's a weird deformed mutant chicken or something. Off to the side, movement catches my eye, and I glance to the right and spot a familiar face.

Across the courtyard, chatting with two men, is Rosie, the demon girl that works for Beelzebub. Rosie? Was that her name? Maybe it was Rosemary. Rosebud?

Her red eyes are dulled, as if she isn't enjoying the discussion with the two men. She looks bored, like she'd rather be doing anything else. I know that feeling, I think to myself. Every so often, she reaches up and twirls her curly brown hair around her finger. Funny, I remember her looking somewhat plain before, but now she looks modestly attractive. Maybe she's learned the joys of makeup from humans.

As I watch, the men continue to talk to her, and suddenly her eyes dart from them, straight to me. She only looks at me for a moment before turning back, but it unnerves me. Did she know I was watching? Hell, I'm kinda being a creeper by just watching.

Eventually, the men laugh loudly and stroll away, amused by some funny thing she said, and she turns to look at me.

Rosie, err, Rosebud, or whatever her name is, meanders past the benches at the far reaches of the fountain and strolls up to me. "Is there something on my face, Mister Hero, sir?"

"No. I'm just spacing out. Sorry, I didn't mean to stare."

She nods. "Oh, okay. Well, if you don't need anything..." She turns to walk away, and after she takes two steps, an idea springs to mind.

"Wait, Rosie. Before you go-"

"Yes?" She turns back and raises an eyebrow. "My name is Rosalia, mister Hero, sir."

"Right, Rosalia. I'm not great with names."

As if I'd just spoken sage words of wisdom, she bobs her head slightly. "I don't imagine anyone is."

"Right. Well, about Beelzebub, what has he been up to lately? I've been meaning to talk with him about something kinda important, but I've been super busy."

As soon as I mention Beelzebub's name, her dull expression ignites, and a fire roars in her eyes. "Beelzebub? That jerk! He left me all alone! After I poured m-my heart out to him!" She stomps her foot angrily and starts hopping up and down; an explosive display I never expected from her. "Stupid stupid stupid! See if I care! I don't even think about him at all! I'm fine without him!"

Rosalia isn't even talking to me anymore. It's like I accidentally popped the cork on a keg full of previously unseen emotion. If she doesn't care, she's doing a terrible job conveying-

Wait, hold on a second. "Rosalia, when did Beelzebub leave?"

She jerks her head up, and without missing a beat, says, "Five days, sixteen hours, forty-two minutes and twelve seconds ago! Why?!"

Uhhh... that's incredibly specific. Um. Has she been counting the time since he left? "Thanks. I need to find him. If I do, do you want me to, maybe, pass along a message... or something?"

Her anger deflates immediately. "Huh? W-well, I mean, he doesn't care about me at all, so it's probably no use. He only cares about power and perfection and all that dumb junk. Um... I mean, if you c-could tell him I'm thinking of him..."

Rosalia wrings her hands together as she meets my gaze, a ferocious fire burning within her. She's trying desperately to act like his departure isn't affecting her, but she seems fairly obsessed to me... then again, what do I know?

"Yeah. I'll let him know you said that..."

Satisfied that I'll let her honey-boo-boo know of her feelings, Rosalia skips away without even saying goodbye. Stars dance in her eyes, and frankly, I wouldn't want to be on the receiving end of her affections. It's no wonder Beelzebub left.

* * *

No, that can't be right. I never ordered Beelzebub to stay with the humans, but I did order him not to hurt them. Still, the timing... the last murder was a week ago. Even with my Wordsmithing holding him back, it's evident that he retained his mind from before I made him a puppet. He despises humans, possibly moreso due to how I humiliated him.

Would he murder those people? Could he? Even the little children?

I need to pay him a visit and find out. " Loca- "

"Hero!" A man yells out from across the courtyard, interrupting me before I can finish. The cape from his militia uniform billows as he rushes toward me, and he holds onto his bowler helmet so it doesn't fall off. A few seconds later, he stops, panting for breath just a few steps from me. "Shadow-walkers slipped inside our defenses at the Second Entrance and killed twenty off-duty soldiers, then vanished. Good men and women, they didn't deserve to die like that."

"How the hell- no, why would they do that? Demons aren't known for their subtlety." I squint at the young man, but he doesn't appear to be lying.

"We don't know, sir. The new Defense Leader, Benjamin Brown, told me to find and inform you at once."

Damn. If I were in my room he could have used the message system to call and tell me. I think I'm going to need to build a cell-phone network or something. "Did anyone survive the attack?"

The fear fades slightly from the kid's face. "W-well, the Divine Mother showed up just in time to save the lives of three of the wounded. The rest weren't so lucky." He pauses to rub his chin. "She's something else, sir. It must be fate that only those three survived. Maybe they're special, somehow."

I can almost see the gears turning in his head. Whoever Cassiel saved, they're probably going to be treated with a sort of reverence. People are looking up to Cassiel even more than they are me - perhaps because she wears white and is an angel. Compared to my dark skin and glowing tattoos, I probably look a little intimidating, but she's like the perfect symbol of purity.

"Yeah, you might be right, son. I'll pop over and talk with Ben right now, as a matter of fact. What happened to the shadow-walkers?"

He bows his head. "They escaped, sir. I'm sorry, but we couldn't catch them in time. We don't know how they got inside, but we're looking into it to make sure it doesn't happen again."

I don't understand. Demons are many things, but smart enough to slip through anti-energy defenses is not one of them. Not to mention that the Second Entrance has three layers of protection to get inside the city. Hell, the Great Door is our most vulnerable location, and one would have to be stupidly strong to shove the damn thing open.

Luck, or coordination? How did they get inside?

"Thanks for the report, soldier. You can have the rest of the day off."

"Really?" The young man gives me a stupid look, then shakes his head. "No can do, sir. I'm off-duty in two days anyway. If demons are getting through, that means we aren't alert enough."

"True. You've got a good work ethic." I smile and give him a light pat on the back. As he turns and jogs away, I sigh. Not like me, a lazy bum.

Shoot, he interrupted me and now I've lost my train of thought. I'll get back to whatever it was later, I guess. " Teleport. "

* * *

"Oh boy, the look on that one poor sap's face when I stuck the knife in! He was like 'Ahhhh,' and I was like 'Worthless human!' hahaha!"

Tvoorik chuckles madly as we run down the Labyrinth halls, passing alcoves and rooms that hold no interest for me. "Uh huh. Didn't you only kill five humans? I did the lion's share of the work."

"Nuh-uh!" Tvoorik slaps my shoulder and scowls. "You're such a liar, Ylvusk! I killed like, six or seven! You only got four of them!"

My eyes roll into my head. "How many did we kill in total?"

"Twenty-two."

"So if you killed six or seven, and I killed four, how many does that make?"

Tvoorik scrunches up his face as we round a corner. The sound of mermaids giggling in a pool pass by and fade into the distance behind us as he counts out the numbers on his fingers. "Six, seven, eight... oh."

Our max speed is fast enough to seem like we teleport from place to place, but we're only moving somewhat fast to conserve energy. Still, compared to the average Labyrinth monster, we probably seem to move at the speed of human-invented bullets.

"Yeah, you get it now, dumbass? I did all the work. As usual."

"Pft." Tvoorik waves his hand dismissively at me. "I could've killed them all myself real easy. I just wanted you to get a little exercise. You're getting fat from all those blood pies."

"Torlok eats the Blood Pies, not me. I only eat a slice when the Fairy Festival comes around every few years." I shoot a glance at the Orc Nursery as we zip past, but nothing significant is happening there.

"Yeah yeah, whatever. Anyway, with those killings, we definitely earned a mutation! The Emperor of Flames said every human we kill on a red-ops mission gives us two souls! That's crazy good conversion!"

An idea pops into my head. I know how I can mess with him. "Hey, who knows, maybe he'll make you an Oracle as a reward for your hard work."

My dumb friend takes the bait, and his eyes bulge. "Whoa! Yeah, you're right, best buddy best pal! Once I'm an Oracle, I'll know all the secrets! I can finally blow the lid off this conspiracy!"

"Uh huh. Maybe when you're a big shot, you can let me in on those secrets the demon emperors have been hiding from us."

He starts to nod excitedly, but pauses and glares at me. "Wait, are you making fun of me?"

"Definitely not. I'd never dream of it."

His stupid smile roars back in full force. "Hah! I knew it! You're such a nice demon, Ylvusk! Maybe one of these days you'll get yourself a nice Vampire girlfriend. Then you won't be so uptight all the time!"

"Hey, I'm not uptight. I know how to have fun!"

"Suuure." Tvoorik rolls his eyes. "You need to stop and smell the blood-lilies sometimes. There's always this look on your face like you're constipated."

"That's disgusting," I say, scowling at him.

"There it is! There's the look!" Tvoorik puts his hand out and slows down to a stop, before turning to me. "I'm serious, Ylvusk. The only thing you enjoy is a game of Sticks and Bones. You need to expand your horizons, best buddy. What say after we make this report, we take a little time off and head to the Bone District? They've got carvings and stuff. You'll love it!"

Oh, devils. That sounds like the most boring thing in the world, I think to myself. Still, Tvoorik looks so happy about the thought... "I guess we can. Just this once."

"Great!" Tvoorik says, as he jumps for joy. "Once I become an Oracle, I'll have less time to hang out since I'll be busy investigating the demon emperor's secrets. It's now or never!" Tvoorik pauses and glances up at the ceiling thoughtfully. "You know, I wonder why anyone would ever want to mutate past the Oracle phase. You'd think knowing everything would be the most useful ability an aspiring demon could have."

I shrug. "Dunno. Maybe you should find someone who was an oracle and ask them."

"Nah! That takes the fun and excitement out of it!" Tvoorik turns to the side and starts running again, so I jump back into high gear and follow after him. He suddenly gets an excited look on his face. "Oh, oh hey! Later, let's go to the Blood Pits and laugh at Bael and Diablo! They got their butts kicked, so I wanna see how bad the damage was."

For once, I manage a genuine grin, but not for the reason that my less-informed friend does. "Yeah, I think we'll find something fascinating when we see them."

"Great! Right after we get our mutation, we're going to the Blood Pits."

"Sounds like a plan."

I chuckle under my breath as he starts blabbering about something else. Somehow, I think my naive friend is in for a little bit of disillusionment.

Part 465c: Confession

Ben's helmet opens up to reveal a scowl as I teleport to his location. "You're late, but at least you're here. Look at this mess."

"Hey, I can't help it if it takes the messenger a while to find me." I glance around quickly and shudder. Fine lines of blood streak across the walls and ground of the recreation hall. Created from the stabbing and retracting of a small blade, each blood-trail tells a different story, sometimes about people who were stabbed before they knew what hit them, while others tried to wave their arms to parry the invisible assailants, but failed.

Over a dozen bodies are lined up against the wall, cloth draped over them while men and women rush around from here to there, chattering with each other and whispering hurried words of encouragement to a few of their fellow soldiers, now unthinkably demoralized.

With a flourish, Ben rubs sweat from his forehead. "God damn. A whole two days and a mini-crisis breaks out."

"How did the shadow-walkers get inside? Hell, how did they escape?"

Ben bites his lip. "If you can believe it, they knew our access codes. There were no signs of forced entry, nor were any alarms tripped. They must have walked right in through the side door."

I suddenly feel aggravated like never before. "How the fuck do demons have access to our entry codes? Don't we rotate them all the time?"

"Eh." Ben rubs the back of his head, a look of annoyance on his face. "We're supposed to. Laziness is the bane of any military unit. We're supposed to rotate the codes every few days, but the guys got lazy. The last code swap was about two months ago."

"Two months?! I can't believe we just-"

Ben cuts me off. "I know. You think I had something to do with this? It was like that when I got here. I guess since there was never a security breach before, the boys got lazy. We may be surrounded by hordes of demons, but the worst enemy of man is overconfidence."

After a few moments, Ben sighs and the anger drains away. "I don't get it. Even if they knew the codes, demons are notoriously stupid when it comes to technology. I mean, I know old men that can't handle the volume control on a radio, yet still understand technology better than the average demon. How did they know about the blind spots in our heat scanners?"

"The blind spots?" I stare at him incredulously. "Why would we even have blind spots? I created the outpost scanners specifically in case of shadow-walkers. They should cover every inch of this entrance."

A woman excuses herself as she pushes past me, several packs of blood in her hand for the medical stations. Ben watches her walk past before looking back to me. "I shouldn't say 'blind spot,' exactly. The demon intruders were detected, but the scanners didn't trigger. The only way the scanners wouldn't trigger is if they had wireless keycards like our scouts do. All the keycards are accounted for, and no scouts have died recently, so it's impossible the demons got hold of two that way." He pauses for a moment. "Gah! Even if they did kill a couple of scouts and get hold of the cards, there's no way they'd know how to use the damn things! Demons aren't that smart!"

From behind me, a female voice speaks. "I think it's time we stopped with the 'demons aren't that smart' talk."

I turn back and smile as Samantha walks up, followed by Cassiel. My expression deflates once I remember how she's been dodging me lately. "Long time no see. You finally available, or what?"

Samantha nods but continues on her tangent. "There's something else going on. I think the demons are being assisted by someone on the inside."

Ben nods. "The idea had crossed my mind. Still, the military doesn't allow demons to have access to the security information, mostly because they aren't trusted, but also because they would fumble around and mess stuff up. That leaves only humans as the culprit, and if a human did it, we have no leads. Or rather, there are a great many suspects to look through, and we have no idea where to start."

Despite the grimness of the situation, I smile lopsidedly at Cass and Sam. "At least you two were here to save a few lives."

Cassiel blushes. "We hardly did anything useful. Everyone was praising me, but most of the wounded died. I wasn't fast enough to save all of them."

"Don't think like that. A few saved is better than all of them dying." Ben tries to copy my smile but gives up halfway. "I wish I hadn't been sleeping. Centurion could have tracked them down in a flash."

Samantha and Cass both look at me, then back to Ben. "Who?"

He spends a minute explaining his armor and the AI inside of it, as well as its ridiculous properties. Cassiel blinks in surprise. "Oh, now that you mention it, I do sorta remember something about that armor. I think I've seen it before."

While Cass mulls it over, I notice that Samantha's eyes hold a look of recognition. "Hypersuits. Unthinkably strong, lightning fast, and their inventor was..." She glances at me, then back to Ben's armor. "But which one created it? The first, or the current?"

Cassiel leans forward and waves her hand in front of Samantha's face. "What are you on about? Does it have to do with-"

"Yup." Samantha cuts her off, then fidgets for a moment. Finally, despite her squirming, she turns to me. "Jason... I think I- well, I have to tell you what's really going on. There's, um, something you should know..."

The look on her face is grave, all of a sudden. In the past, she's always had a playful smile, but ever since she got back from her visit with the First Emperor, it's been replaced a somber, thoughtful expression.

"What do you mean?"

I keep my words neutral, allowing her to open up about whatever's on her mind. Suddenly, she lurches forward and grabs me by the arm. "Private. I need to talk with you in private. Let's go over there." She flicks her eyes over to an adjacent room filled with tools, medical supplies, and other such things, where nobody is inside.

Nodding, I follow Samantha's lead and walk behind her as she heads toward the room. I quickly glance back over my shoulder at Cass and Ben. "Uh, this should only be a minute."

Cassiel tries to hide a look of trepidation but only partially succeeds. Ben doesn't care one way or another. "Mhm. If you say so."

A few moments later, Samantha closes the door and rests her back against the glass pane on the upper part of it, partially hiding the world outside our little room.

"I don't know where to start," she says, as she crosses her arms in front of her chest. "You restored my memories, but accidentally restored every memory I've ever had hidden."

My eyes narrow. "How many memories would that be?"

"Dozens. Hundreds. Thousands. Too many to count. They mix and mingle in my mind, from one to the next. I already didn't have the greatest memory in the first place, so I'm a little... confused."

I stare at her cautiously for a moment. "When you came back and I restored your memory, you flew into a rage and tore up our room, but just before that, you said 'I'm scum.' What did you mean by that?"

"That isn't an easy question to answer, Jason." Samantha slides her fingers through her hair, keeping her distance from me. "I'll just say it. The- the First Emperor's identity... is Satan."

"Oh." I stare at her dumbly for a second or two. "I didn't expect that, but it makes sense."

Samantha's tongue snakes out of her mouth, and she wets her ruby-red lips with it. "I went to see him but didn't know who he was. Satan has been erasing my memory every time we meet, over and over again, for the last umpteen million years. I got tired of visiting the First Emperor and never knowing who he was, so I stopped dropping by a long time ago, even when he summoned me."

To be honest, I'm so surprised by what she's saying, I can hardly even form words. "We're talking about the same Satan, right? The demon you used to talk about all the time? The one you said was the love of your life? You used to joke all the time about how much better he was than me. That Satan?"

Her body tenses up, and she quickly looks away. "Y-you don't have to put it like that. I couldn't help it, you know. I thought I was all alone and that he died tens of millions of years ago. A woman's heart can have a hole the size of a volcano, you know."

"Hey, it's fine, I get it. I'm just teasing, Sam. Cheer up." I smile and stifle a laugh at her spooked expression. If she thought I was going to fly into a jealous rage or something, she's got another thing coming. "It's not a big deal."

"It is!" Sam jerks her head back to glare at me. "You don't understand! He kept wiping my memory, then every time I went to see him, I'd be so ecstatic and overcome with emotion, only for those memories to be ripped away again! Now I remember every single time he did it, and it hurts, Jason. It hurts." She presses her finger against her heart. "Right here."

I nod quickly, realizing what she's saying. "Alright, I understand. What Satan did was kinda shitty. Well, really shitty. I see why you're mad."

"No, no. That's not- that isn't the problem!" Samantha stomps her foot and makes the whole facility shake, even as the concrete forms hairline fractures in all directions starting from her heel. "The problem is me! I lost control of myself when I saw him! I tried to say no to him, to resist his advances, but it's like my body couldn't control itself! I- Satan and I, we- you know..."

The guilt spread all over Samantha's face isn't making it easy for me to be mad at her. I mean, I'm not angry at all, but it's like she wants me to get pissed and curse her out. That's just not me. "Samantha, you're overthinking this. You're a succubus, and I'm in a relationship with you knowing that. It's just part of your nature to sometimes explode into passion with other men. It's like when Cassiel and Howard-"

"No! Damn it, no! That isn't what happened!" Samantha's teeth gnash together, and she scrunches her hands into fists with enough force for her fingers to creak, and the bones to pop. "I would never cheat, I've always been faithful to one man at a time! To lose myself like that, it's embarrassing! Shameful! Why aren't you screaming at me?! Satan would be furious if your places were swapped!"

I'm not an angel, but even I can sense the dark energy swirling around Samantha as her guilt and rage coalesce together.

For a few moments, I stare at Samantha in silence as she pants angrily, and once her heartrate starts to settle, I take a step toward her. "I'm not Satan. I'm Jason. He and I are different people. Maybe I'm more open-minded, or maybe I'm just spineless and don't care - I don't know, either way." Samantha squeaks in surprise as I step forward and gently hug her. Lord knows she needs it. "The fact you feel so awful about it is proof you didn't mean to cheat anyway. The Samantha I know from a few months ago would have joked about the matter and teased me, called me a jealous little boy, but you're a different person now."

Samantha's breathing slows down, and eventually, she wraps her arms around me too. "Do you really think so?"

"I know so. Maybe it's because of Cassiel, or me, or some other reason... but you're different now compared to when I first met you. That's a good thing, Sam. I'm different too, and it's because I met you."

As Samantha pulls back, and the two of us silently share a gentle kiss, my mind wanders back to the day she came back, and the realization I had that the First Emperor must have hurt her. I was right. He did.

She pulls away and blushes. "I didn't think you'd be like this. You're... you're too understanding."

"Mmm." I nod at her words, but a fragment of doubt festers in my mind. "I can still go kick his ass if you want. The way he manipulated you is pretty awful."

"Oh, you. This is why I didn't want to say anything." Samantha folds her hands together and sways her arms in front of herself, from the left to the right. "That wasn't everything, though."

"Huh? It wasn't? What else did he do?"

Samantha scrunches her face up. "Well, the next part isn't about Satan. It's... it's about Pickle. Only, I don't know if I have all the pieces right or not." Samantha's face softens, but she looks away from me and stares blankly at a pile of papers to my right. "Pickle isn't the only one, though. There might be others. My new memories are hazy and shrouded in fog, so I can't be certain, but I think there are other Jasons."

Somehow, I manage to keep smiling at her, but deep inside my stomach, stretching down to the lowest part of my soul, a familiar pit appears. I can almost hear that voice, and see the face that matches my own, as a creepy smile appears. You're finally figuring it out, but it's too late. You can't save them, Jason. You can't do anything to stop me.

"Other... other Jasons? What do you mean by that? How many? When? Who?"

Samantha's arms come to a standstill, and she clams up at my probing. "I don't know. I think Pickle was a clone of another Jason, though. The past is very hazy for me. A million years, let alone tens of millions of years, is practically an eternity."

My hands are shaking, so I carefully slide them in my pockets so she won't notice. "Y-yeah. I'm sure you'll remember, eventually, right?" Before she can answer, I ask the question that's been keeping me awake at night ever since I first laid eyes on Pickle.

"Am I a clone?"

This seems to surprise her. "Maybe. I don't know. I'd say 'no,' but I don't have all the answers, Jason."

It'll have to do. "I'm just glad you told me."

Looking past Samantha, I stare through the window on the door and spot Cassiel and Ben, chatting with each other about something, though they both appear disinterested in the subject matter.

I nearly jump in fright as something latches onto my hand while I'm distracted, but when I look down, I see it's Samantha. She's looped her hand inside of mine, and she pulls up close to me.

"We've kept those two waiting long enough. Let's go back out there and show them we've made up, okay?"

"That sounds good."

For the first time since Samantha came back from the Labyrinth, the two of us share genuine smiles, and I give her another quick kiss before opening the door and stepping back out into the outpost. Cassiel's eyes instantly flick over and spot Samantha's hand and mine intertwined.

"Nice."

Samantha and I both nod back at Cass, and we respond in unison. "Yeah, nice."

I'm glad to see her smiling again.

Part 466c: Prophet

"Hey! Ylvusk! Why not play a game of Sticks and Bones, eh?" Smealum waves at me the moment I step into the dining hall. I'm a little surprised at how quickly he noticed me, but then, members of the Animus species are unusually good at telling individuals apart by their auras alone. He may have seen me through the walls long before I showed up.

"Sounds fun," I mutter dryly, as I slouch forward and meander toward his table. "Any good tosses today?"

Smealum shakes his head and glances at Torlok. "Didn't you throw down a decent Dryad earlier?"

Torlok nods. "Aye. House rules are bothersome, though. Too luck-based for my taste."

I slip past Smealum and plop down on the seat beside Torlok. Somehow, since his evolution traces back to shadow-walkers, he feels more familiar and like kin than the Animus. I like both of them decently, but secretly my goal is to reach Torlok's level of power and authority someday. Well, at least it would be if I cared about that stuff. Tvoorik is way more power-hungry than I am.

"I don't want to play for any stakes today. Let's just do friendly games."

Smealum raises an eye. "Oho, how very unlike you. I heard the new Second Emperor sent you and Tvoorik on a special mission. How'd that turn out?"

The Mahja Sticks fly from my hand and spread over the table, and the bones follow after, revealing a disappointing Sprite pattern. "It went surprisingly well. We ganked more than twenty fleshbags, but apparently, only eighteen of them died. Still, the panic worked out in our favor, as Emperor Beelzebub predicted."

I feel Torlok's gaze settle on me for a few moments. "You sound disappointed."

"Only a little. I dunno, it feels wrong, using knowledge of the humans' defenses to strike them from their rear flanks. Not very honorable." I pause for a moment as both of the high ranking demons stare at me. "Also, I kinda hoped it wouldn't work. That Beelzebub pisses me off for some reason. Can't put my finger on why."

The Eldest Animus grabs the Mahja sticks with his right hand and the bones with his left, and tosses both out at once. The result ends up being a double-headed fire-snake. Could be worse. "Honor, huh? I've never heard you talk like that before. Since when do you care about honor?"

Torlok exhales audibly. "The humans know nothing of honor. They torture captured demons for information all the time. Beelzebub told us about what they do to the females, and how they ravage them. I say an eye for an eye is the only way to fight the fleshbags."

My teeth grind silently at the mention of more of Beelzebub's tales. "Several demons have returned from living with the humans and told us about how kind they were. I bet the 'Emperor of Flames' is lying."

"I think not," Smealum says, as he shakes his head. "Not only did he walk among them, but he also lived in the castle, among their highest ranked leaders. Beelzebub has seen more than the average demon on the streets of 'Hero City,' so naturally, he'll know more than them."

"So he says." I roll my eyes at where this discussion is heading. "Anyway, it doesn't matter for now. You guys can think he's fine all you want, but when he screws up, don't say I didn't tell you so."

Torlok grabs the Mahja Sticks for his turn and ignores the bones. He gives them an absentminded toss, but they land in the Sprite pattern, just like mine did. "Where's Tvoorik? I thought he'd be with you when you got back. Don't tell me he was tired and went to take a nap."

Glad that we're changing the subject, I force a toothy grin out. "Nah. He's having a secret meeting with the new Emperor to discuss a mutation. He's betting that with luck, he can finally evolve to Oracle."

At the same time, Torlok and Smealum both contort their faces in disgust. Smealum shudders. "Why would anyone want that?"

Torlok laughs in spite of himself. "It's Tvoorik. He never thinks things through. There's a reason only two or three demons are ever Oracles at any given time."

"Yeah. It's because they're all part of the conspiracy," I say, while waving my hands in the air and sneering. "It couldn't be because becoming an Oracle is the worst thing to which a demon can aspire."

At those words, Torlok pauses for a moment, and I spot a strange look of emotion in his pitch-black eyes. "You know, there's a unique mutation a Shadow-walker can achieve. Nobody knows how it's done, since only one demon has ever achieved it."

Smealum nods, a knowing look in his eye. "Shadow. The purest form a demon can become, to join with the darkness. You're referring to Yama."

Torlok bows his head. "Yep. It's a shame what that Hero did to him. He had so much potential, and now he's gone - never to be seen again." For a moment, it almost seems like tears are welling in his eyes, but Torlok quickly shakes them off. "I still remember when I saw Davook after his transformation. He was always a grouch, a loner, but the way he was tortured by a human, it must've broken his mind. He killed a hundred humans, maybe several hundred, all in a single night. After his transformation, he was never the same. He 'n I barely ever talked after that. We used to be best buddies, just like you and Tvoorik."

I nod along with his story. "That must have hurt, losing your friend like that."

The Mahja Sticks shift around as Torlok pokes at them aimlessly. "I never blamed him. It's all the human's fault. They're worthless fleshbags who will do anything for a cheap thrill. That's why I like the new Emperor. Diablo was too soft; he didn't treat the humans like a serious threat. Beelzebub knows how dangerous they are, so he'll take every precaution to scare them as much as they do me."

This revelation makes me squirm uncomfortably. "You're scared of the humans?"

"Certainly. You weren't alive during the Energy Wars, but Smealum and I were. We saw what humans in power could do... the monsters made of metal they could fashion from the salt of the land. The only thing scarier than a human is a smart human, especially once they return to their bloodthirsty roots."

To his credit, Smealum offers an objection. "Humans are terrible, but if you want to talk about being 'bloodthirsty,' demons love the taste of blood. We aren't that much better than humans."

"I disagree," Torlok says. "Demon society is more structured. We know our roles, and we have the ability to climb the ladder of power. Humans give the title of 'ruler' to sons and daughters of former rulers, instead of those fittest to lead. It's always about favors and lining their pockets with scraps of paper. I may be the Duke of Shadow, but humans have me beat when it comes to the skulduggery to which they're willing to sink. Truly, they are the purest creatures of darkness."

Nodding along with his words, I grab the Mahja Sticks and give them a toss. At this point, none of us feel like bothering with the bones. It isn't a match for stakes, anyway. "Oh, the All-Seeing Eye pattern. That's rare."

Torlok's eyes widen in surprise. "Impressive. While not worth many points, I can say with certainty it's been several years since someone threw the Eye pattern. You must have luck and fortune in your near future."

Half an hour passes, and after several more games and light-hearted banter, Smealum's eyes flick over to the entrance. "Hmm? There's an aura approaching. It's Tvoorik, but... I think he mutated, after all."

Our previous conversation now forgotten, all three of us turn in unison and stare at the doorway. After several seconds, Tvoorik appears.

He's different. Even I can sense that his energy has changed somewhat. It's more chaotic now, but there's something else... he's increased in height by almost a foot, and his ears are pointy, sticking out from the sides of his head like the antennae on a cockroach. The top of his head bulges slightly, as if his brain has increased in size, and his skin has lightened significantly. Tvoorik has shifted away from the Shadow-Walker tree of growth and into the Oracle branch, giving his skin a darkened olive-color. Coupled with the change in clothing, that of black robes... he almost seems a little intimidating.

Tvoorik touches each hand's index finger to his thumb, and fans the rest of his fingers out, almost in a meditative position. Instead of walking toward us, he hovers an inch or two off the ground, and his eyes stay closed as if he can sense the world around himself without the need for vision.

"Aummm..." Tvoorik hums softly as he glides to us, and I realize with a start that he isn't like any Oracle I've seen before. One major difference is his hair, or rather, the lack of it. Oracles tend to mutate very long, fast-growing hair, but Tvoorik is bald now. As a Shadow-walker, his hair was more akin to wisps of black smoke slowly hissing from his head, but those gaps have been sealed.

He comes to a stop before us, and slowly opens his eyes. "Hello, my friends. How are you, on this fine day?"

Smealum stares in stunned silence for several moments, before finally gathering his wits.. "We're fine. What about you? You're very different from the last time I saw you."

My friend's voice is soft and quiet, as though he were trying to put a spawnling to sleep gently. "Yes, you are correct. I have mutated, as per Beelzebub's generosity."

"To... Oracle?" Torlok almost whispers the words. "You don't look like any Oracle I've ever seen, and I know most of them."

"That is due to the unique circumstances of my mutation," Tvoorik says. His enunciation is very proper, and he's not speaking the way he always has. Did his mind change, as well as his body? "I have not evolved to an Oracle, but a unique species, the first of its kind. I am a Seer."

"What's a Seer?" Torlok asks the question all three of us want answered. Around our table, other demons turn to look at Tvoorik, and whisper to each other about his mutation.

"It is an extraordinary form of Oracle. It grants me the ability to not only know all and see all, but also to glimpse the future, uncertain though it may be. A powerful mutation, deserved by one such as I. With my new abilities, I will eventually poke and prod, peeling away the veil of deceit that governs demon society. Soon I will-" He pauses, and for a split second, his left eye spasms, but returns to normal and he continues talking. "Soon I will learn the secrets of the universe and-" Tvoorik stops talking again, and his eyes grow unfocused as another spasm makes both eyes twitch this time.

I squint and examine him more carefully. "Uh, are you okay?"

He doesn't answer, and eventually lowers from hovering height to land on his feet. Even more eye-spasming follows, and he reaches up to cup both of them with his hands. "Auooo... devil's sake... this agony..."

Torlok exhales a breath he had apparently been holding. "I see what's going on. You had me worried for a second, acting all high and mighty."

"Shut up! It fucking hurts!" Tvoorik screams all of a sudden, bellowing at Torlok in a shocking display of rage that makes all three of us jerk away from him. "Every devil-damned second, I hear ten bazillion idiotic voices whining and moaning in my head! I can barely hear myself think! Who thought this mutation was a good idea?! Satan the Devil, this is the worst thing I've ever done in my life! What good is knowing everything if you can't get a second's rest?! I want to gouge my fucking eyes out and crush my head under an orc's foot!! Aaaaaahhhh!!!"

My eyes nearly bulge from my head as he finishes his rant, and pants like a wild hellhound, eyes darting between all three of us at the table. I've never seen such a display of anger in my entire life.

Tvoorik thrusts his finger through the air and points it at me. "You knew! You knew becoming an Oracle was a major pain in the ass, but you let me do it anyway, all for a cheap laugh! Now I'm stuck in this stupid shitty mutation until I can gather enough souls to evolve! What the hell, I thought we were best buddies?!"

I didn't know this would happen. I'd heard stories about Oracles who went insane from all the information, to the point where even a mutation to remove their abilities wouldn't restore their minds, but this is on a level I never expected. "I'm... I'm sorry, Tvoorik. I didn't realize this would happen. I thought you were smart enough to realize it was a bad idea."

"Are you joking? I can read your mind! You know damn well I'm an idiot! You should have told me no!"

Slowly, I hold my hands up to calm him down. "That wouldn't have worked, and you know it. If anyone tells you not to do something, it just makes you want to do it more. You would have seen me telling you 'no' as proof that I was part of a conspiracy."

For several seconds, Tvoorik's nostrils flare in and out as he looks at the Mahja Sticks on the table, a look of disgust on his face. "Curses. You're right. I'm such an idiot that even reverse-logic won't work on me."

In all the time I've known Tvoorik, he's never called himself an idiot. In fact, he always thinks of himself as a genius, misunderstood by everyone around him. For Tvoorik to insult himself like this, it drives home the realization that he's royally screwed up. He's frantic, desperate, even.

"Look, I still have the souls I collected. If I ask Beelzebub, I'm sure he'll allow you to mutate again, but you'll have to wait a few weeks so there aren't any ill effects."

Before Tvoorik can consider my generous offer, Smealum coughs into his fist. "Ah, that won't work. He's a unique species. Once you enter a unique path, you can't ever leave it. It's a huge privilege and a gateway to power, but if the new species is lackluster, you're stuck with it."

Tvoorik lows his head and leans forward, resting both of his hands on the table. "I knew you'd say that even before you thought of it yourself. I'm doomed. I should kill myself now."

"Don't be melodramatic," Torlok says, as he rises from the table. "Most Oracles can't handle all the mental pressure from so many thoughts and events entering their brains all at once, but you might be the odd one out. It'll be overwhelming at first, but a few Oracles have grown to enjoy the torrent of information, even learning to sift through it. You should find one of the other Oracles and ask for their help. Hell, you can probably communicate without going anywhere near them."

This seems to cheer Tvoorik up a little bit. "Yeah, maybe you're right. Maybe there's a spell someone knows that can make my mind less chaotic. I dunno. Ohh... I need to lay down. My head hurts real bad."

After whining for a few moments longer, Tvoorik stumbles away from the table, unable to maintain his hovering anymore. The exhaustion on his face is infectious. I'm feeling tired just from watching him.

"I think that's enough Sticks and Bones for today. I'm going back to the Alcoves. I'll see you guys later."

Smealum nods. "Take care of Tvoorik. I feel bad for not warning him sooner. I didn't expect things to turn out like they did."

"Nobody did," Torlok says, correcting his friend. "Becoming an Oracle takes a toll on the mind. I can only imagine what becoming a Seer will do to him... not to mention what he said about seeing the future. I hope he was joking."

As I start to walk away, I muse out loud, "I wonder if demons will ever rule the galaxy again?"

That damn Tvoorik... now he's opened up Pandora's Box.

Part 467c: Go Go Gadget

One week ago, a demon murdered several humans in my city. Yesterday, two shadow-walkers took out a company of off-duty soldiers while they were supposed to be safe behind our defenses.

No more.

The sun in the sky, large, shimmering, splendid, beats down on my face as I gaze into the air and aim my mind at the heavens above.

" Satellite! "

A significant amount of energy leaves my body, perhaps five percent of the total, and miles in the air; a tiny dot appears against the blackness of the void. Considering the sky above Hero City is barren, and without stars, the satellite stands out in the daytime sky like the North Star once did on Earth. This planetoid is in a void of its own, outside the natural universe. Who put it here? Who created it? Why?

These are questions that may never be answered.

Samantha shields the sun from her face and squints up into the sky. "Is that it? I can barely even see it."

I reach up and pluck Solomon's crown off my head, feeling a wave of exhaustion hit me as I do. Once again, the mental strain of imagining every nut, bolt, and wire inside a satellite is much more exhausting mentally than it is taxing on my energy.

"It may look small, but it's huge. I think it's around the size of five Volkswagens, end to end."

Samantha raises an eyebrow. "Five what? "

"Nothing. Anyway, now that I'm done, I can move onto more important things."

Cassiel flies over from across the palace lawn where she was playing with Howard and flutters to a stop beside me. "What are you going to do with the satellite anyway?"

"Several things. First, I gave it a nuclear reactor, and it runs on fusion technology. It's very energetic, which means it will stay up there for a few hundred years without any assistance. More importantly, the satellite has several magical capabilities that will help me out, like FoF targeting and an alarm system nobody but me can disable."

Now Cassiel and Samantha are both confused. "FoF targeting? You're babbling again, Jason. Nobody knows what your acronyms mean."

"Sorry, I got carried away." I blush a little and scratch my cheek. "It's Friend or Foe targeting, but it's less about that, and more about distinguishing who is who in the city at every moment. It has infrared vision, sonar, all sorts of cool stuff. It can tell the difference between a Human, Demon, Angel, and Volgrim with a 99.99% accuracy rating."

From out of nowhere, Ben appears in front of me popping into existence. "Boo!"

"Ah!" My heart leaps and I take a step back. "Jesus Christ! You scared the shit out of me! How'd you do that?!"

Ben chuckles and clears his throat. "Ah, it's this Hypersuit. It can turn invisible. Great for a gag, better for assassination. Anyway, can your toy up there tell the difference between the four species and a Kolvaxian? That's what it really needs to know."

Cassiel and Samantha's smiles both melt away in an instant at the mention of those monsters. After I explained to them yesterday what happened to the crew of the Terra, they've probably been feeling the same guilt that I have.

"Sorry, Ben. I've never seen a Kolvaxian before, so it won't be able to identify one. Well, then again, any species not listed in the satellite's database will give a red flag, so it can probably detect a Kolvaxian, in a roundabout way."

I pause and breathe a heavy sigh. "Anyway, I didn't build this satellite to be a Big Brother in the sky. Its primary function is to allow these new communication crystals to work anywhere on the planet. I'd create cell phones, but I doubt anyone would know how to use them. Storage."

In front of me, a portal to my storage dimension appears, and I set the crown back inside, then pull out a handful of the crystals I created from before. Each one has a hook on it, designed to be pierced through the earlobe like an earring.

I give one to each of the girls, keep one for myself, and hand the five remaining crystals to Ben. "These will allow scouts and soldiers to communicate anywhere within Hero City. I'm going to build hard-wired relays that will allow us to communicate with depots outside of the Hero City dimension, but for now, we won't have to run back and forth like chickens with our heads cut off every time we need to send a message."

"Impressive," Benjamin murmurs, as he carefully reaches back and pierces his ear. I'm surprised he's able to do it so easily without showing any pain, but then I realize that Cassiel already numbed his ear for him with her magic. "I'm surprised you thought of something like this. Heck, this is more advanced than anything I've ever seen before. These communication crystals defy the laws of physics."

Cassiel winces as she sticks the little gem in her earlobe, but after a moment, her pain subsides. "They're pretty, too. I bet the crystal takes ten years off my figure." I decide not to cynically remark that ten years out of a hundred million isn't a big dent. I'd prefer not to end up in the doghouse.

Samantha follows through and even shudders a little as the pin goes in. I detect an alarming amount of blood rushing to her face as her face contorts into an expression of ecstasy. Ah yes, I forgot she was a sadist and a masochist at the same time. "This is great, love. You should give us presents more often!"

"I should," I say, nodding along with her words. "Anyway, Ben, give one of these to each of the guards on patrol and have them swap the earrings out whenever they go off duty. I'll make more of them later."

Ben raises an eyebrow. "These pierce the ear, Jason. That's a great way to mix blood together and start an infectious disease. Why not make them clip onto the ears painlessly?"

"I considered that. The thing is, if I can cure Kolpox, I can cure any disease, so it's not that big of a deal. Beyond that, my quick test showed that the signal strengthened, as did the telepathic connection, but only if the earring connected somehow with the body's internal organs. It uses a human's weak spiritual energy to transmit the information greater distances, and with higher clarity. Without that, you'd have to hang out near relays to use the gems, and that would make them worthless."

Ben nods. "Makes sense. Well, do what you gotta do, but I'm looking forward to a more reliable method of communication. If a demon attacks again, I need something anyone can use. What if the demon guts the poor sap wearing one of these earrings?"

My teeth grit reflexively. "If that happens, the last thing he'll think of will be a loud cry for help. Before his body slumps over, one of the girls or me can show up and heal him, hopefully." I pause for a moment and glance up at the speck in the sky. "Oh, also, I forgot to mention... that satellite has an incinerator beam installed. If the need arises, I can vaporize any intruder in an instant. If the worst happens, I can have it destroy the whole planet."

Cassiel's eyes widen. "What do you mean? Why would you want something like that hanging over our heads?"

"I don't Cass. But, if the thing I saw inside of Ben were ever to spread, I might not be able to contain it. The satellite's just a fail-safe. Anyway, only the four of us know about it, and I'm not worried about demons or the primitive humans here figuring out how to hack its systems and turn it against us. We should be golden. Besides, this world is in its own dimension. You can only get here through the conduits I've provided."

"If you say so," Ben grumbles under his breath. "Anyway, I'll give these crystals to the relevant soldiers and scouts. Thanks for the assistance, Jason."

"I do what I can," I say, nodding politely. Ben stomps away, flattening the grass under his feet, but the light breeze causes the blades to rise up again after he's out of sight.

Samantha and Cassiel both are more reserved than usual, and Samantha keeps twiddling the earring absentmindedly glancing at me, then back to Cass. "Why didn't you do the satellite thing sooner?"

I shrug. "It didn't occur to me. I thought about it after the attack yesterday, and remembered that one I made over Earth when I was looking for Marie's facility. It occurred to me that I should try relying on technology a bit more often since it doesn't have the weaknesses I do."

After a moment, I tap on my lip. "You know, that Hypersuit of Ben's is very convenient. It's made me realize that I haven't been cautious enough against the demons, or inventive enough, for that matter."

As I turn and start walking toward the town, Sam grabs my right arm, and Cassiel grabs my left, and both of them fall into step beside me. "What do you mean by that, love? Are you going to create some hideous new weapon?"

"Oh, definitely not. I think a planet-vaporizer in the sky is enough of that for one day. Still, I'm thinking about making a watch that can detect nearby hostiles, or perhaps a mind scrambler that only works on demons. Incapacitation would be the best way of dealing with them, but I don't want them being knocked out, then killed by humans while they're defenseless. That will send the wrong message."

A look of pain sprouts on Samantha's face as we walk through the gate at the front of the palace. The female guard nods politely at us, and Cassiel returns the gesture, but Samantha doesn't even notice her. "The violence between humans and demons should be solvable. If Diablo weren't such a thick-headed idiot, I'm sure we could work something out."

"We won't know until we try," I say, as we start to stroll down the street together.

Several minutes pass, and we arrive in the marketplace once again. Just for kicks, I Wordsmith " Watch. " to create a wrist-gizmo that allows me to create a holographic display that hovers above my arm, displaying nearby demons as red dots, and nearby humans as blue ones. Cassiel keeps waving her hand through the hologram to poke at the dots, but I haven't built any touch functionality into it yet, so nothing happens.

Cassiel puffs her lower lip out. "You know, you could make some goggles that would do the identifying for you. They'd stand out less than that watch does, and it might even look stylish."

Samantha seems to like the idea. "I say go for green. Green would look better on you than glasses or sunglasses."

From down the street, a little boy yells out and tugs at his mother's long turquoise skirt. "Mum, look! It's the Divine Mother! She's back!"

To my surprise, Cassiel smiles at the little boy and pulls away from me to walk over and kneel down to his level. "Alex! How are you doing?"

I glance at Samantha. "She knows him?"

Sam just shrugs. "I guess so."

The boy nods excitedly and babbles at Cassiel for a minute or two, asking her about 'that big robot of yours' and even about the duck. Why do people care about Howard so much? I know birds are a scarcity on this planet, but still.

Another minute passes, and Samantha starts tapping her foot impatiently. I'm starting to feel the same way until the boy's enthusiasm dissipates. "Did you find Susie?"

Cass's smile fades. "Ah, not yet. I'm sure she's fine, though."

"Oh. Okay. Well, you're the Divine Mother, so if you pinkie promise me that you'll find her, I won't worry!" Alex thrusts his pinkie forward and nods enthusiastically. It's at this moment that I remember when Cassiel and I were visiting that church a few days ago.

Their bodies were maimed, their throats scorched. They couldn't even cry for help as the killer tore them to pieces. What we recovered was barely a corpse.

A demon, or several of them, have to be the culprit. That's why the satellite is essential. It will record a view of the world, continuously, allowing me to find out who this mystery killer is. There haven't been any more murders for over a week now, but they could strike again.

A burned throat... all the victims are human... and to top it off, only one demon has left the city since the murders happened. It's too convenient.

Ah! That's right! I was going to track Beelzebub down before those shadow-walkers struck! Curse my shitty memory.

" Locate. " I speak the word aloud, and Samantha jerks her head up to look at me questioningly.

"Why are you Wordsmithing all of a sudden? Something on your mind?"

My magical vision stretches out, just as the Hand of God would, sweeping across the vast, unlimited cosmos, in search of my prey. Like an infinite number of spiritual birds of prey, I scan every nook and cranny of the universe, until I find my target.

Beelzebub.

Err, what? That doesn't make sense. He's right outside the second entrance? Not even a half-mile from it. Why would he be there?

A voice speaks, in my mind, faint at first, but it quickly clears up and reveals its owner to be Benjamin Brown.

Jason! Jason! Is this thing working? Hello?

Ah, he must be trying to use the new earrings I just gave him. It's a good idea to test them and make sure they work.

Yeah, I'm here. It's an open frequency, so Samantha and Cassiel, as well as anyone else you gave an earring to can hear you. What's up?

Ben's mental voice is strained. The demons are here again. A whole horde of them. I need you to come to me, right now.

My heart sinks. I'll grab the girls and meet you at the second entrance.

Ben responds with confusion. Huh? No, the horde is at the Great Doors! The main entrance to the city! We haven't had time to set up defenses yet. At least ten thousand orcs and skeletons, all of them bunched together and looking for trouble. Get over here as quickly as possible.

Beelzebub is at the second entrance. Maybe I misunderstood the situation, and he's just returning to the city for some other reason. I'll visit him after I'm done with this random horde of monsters.

I turn my attention back to reality just as Cassiel walks over to me. "I heard everything. Let's go."

Aiming my mind at both of them and myself, I use word magic to send us over to Benjamin. "Teleport."

...And immediately trip over something as I arrive, stumble forward, and slam into Ben, knocking him down as I fall on top of him. I quickly jump to my feet and wince apologetically. "Sorry. I didn't know you'd be right there. Luckily, my teleport never puts me inside of physical objects."

Ben scowls. "Yeah. Lucky." He hops up and points at the Great Doors, both of which are standing in midair, eerily looming over the city. "We've got a guy on the outside, a scout. He's scared shitless, but we can't open the doors to let him in, or those monsters will pour through." Ben pauses as his face contorts into an odd smile. "To be honest, with my Hypersuit, they probably wouldn't make it within ten feet of the door, but since you seem keen on avoiding outright killing them, I thought I'd give you a chance to settle things the easy way. If you fail, I'll solve this problem the really easy way. All orcs must die, as the saying goes."

Good to see Ben's gung-ho, at least. "Did you give those earrings out already?"

"Not yet. Why do you ask?"

That feeling of uneasiness makes my stomach churn. "Do me a favor. Go to the second entrance and hand out the communication crystals to the scouts, then let me know what the situation is."

Ben raises an eyebrow. "I'm sure you can handle a horde by yourself, but you won't even let me watch? And here I thought we were friends."

"It's not like that. I just have this feeling that something big is about to happen. The demons are acting way too erratic lately. Sam and Cass both noticed the change too. How fast can you get to the second entrance?"

"Pretty quickly." Ben says, shrugging. "The Hypersuit can travel at speeds of up to Mach 4 without causing damage to the pilot, but the sonic boom will blow out windows all over the city. How soon do you need me to do this?"

"Keep it just under the speed of sound, but don't dawdle. Tell me what's going on as soon as you get there."

With a nod, Ben sets his teeth firmly. "I haven't had a good run in a while."

The words have hardly left his mouth before his helmet slams shut and he vanishes, the force of his exit velocity nearly knocks the girls and me off our feet.

After I gather my wits, I look at one of the nearby operators. "Activate the pulleys! Get those doors open."

A horrendous grinding sound activates as the man starts cranking the dial on his console up to maximum speed. The device I built to open the doors from this side, comprised of unbelievably strong metal ropes and steel beams, activates and pulls them apart, slowly revealing the dark Labyrinth inside. The instant the doors are barely a foot open, a single man rushes inside, tripping over himself to flee to safety. "Monsters! Demons! Hideous things!"

He runs past us, fleeing in terror for the things inside, and Samantha chuckles. "Well, orcs and skeletons are pretty devil-damned ugly."

I don't return the laugh. "Stay here. I'll see what's going on."

My boots crunch against the gravelly ground, shifting pebbles together under my shoe and apart from where the edges land. The moment I step through the doors, the brightness of the sun above dims dramatically, allowing me to see the legion of monsters up ahead. As reported, ten thousand or so of them lurk in the darkness, though none make a move toward me. Why are they waiting?

A single orc steps forward, his green skin standing in sharp contrast to the blood-red rags draped all over his body, and two mean-looking jagged swords hanging at his sides.

"You! Small human! Me Glonk! Me here kill you, rape your women, kill your children, burn your city! Glonk take no prisoner! However, Glonk always ready for honor combat! You fight Glonk and win, he spare your city. If Glonk win, he leave nothing standing!"

Oh. This big one wants to fight me one on one? That's all?

"I'll pass. Is this the entire army you brought? How were you expecting to get inside? A hundred orcs wouldn't have the strength to open the Great Doors. Are you stupid?"

I realize a moment after asking that I'm talking to orcs. Of course they're stupid.

Glonk's eyes bulge from his head. "Glonk no stupid! Glonk smartest of orcs! You die for what you say!"

Samantha appears beside me from out of nowhere. Her eyes narrow. "He's not the smartest orc I've ever met, but his ego is right up there with the worst of them. Can this even be called an assault force?"

The orcs and skeletons start to charge down the hallway that I once used to flee from Gressil, and I shrug in response. "The horde is scary-looking, but weak compared to what humanity can manage. PUSH! "

With a terrific shout, a blast of energy surges from my body, races down the hallway, and smashes the throng backward with the force of ten hurricanes. Their bodies go flying, the skeletons are crushed under the weight of their massive peers, and the orcs vanish into the darkness. Just for good measure, I do it a second time. " PUSH! "

Several seconds pass, but no sounds emanate from where I sent them flying. "I hope I didn't kill them."

"I doubt that, but you probably showed them the futility of attacking. What now?"

I chuckle under my breath. " Storage. " I reach inside and pull out the crown of Solomon, then Wordsmith again. " Turret. Turret. "

On each side of the Great Doors, two absolutely stupendous mega-turrets appear, towering high into the sky. Their cannons form into Gatling guns, capable of firing 2,000 rounds per minute, with the one on the right firing anti-energy, and the one on the left firing tank-buster bullets.

Just for good measure, I cast another spell. " Link. "

Now if the turrets fire, they'll send an alert to my satellite, and it, in turn, will alert me when they detect enemies.

Samantha looks from one turret to the other and laughs. "Hey now, weren't we going to avoid any killing if possible?"

I nod but don't bother to answer her question. Looking down the corridor, I wordsmith again. " Amplify. "

Now to take a deep breath, and make sure they can hear me, all the way down the corridor.

"HEY! YOU STUPID FUCKING ORCS! IF YOU COME BACK FOR MORE, I'VE GOT CANNONS SET UP THAT WILL BLOW YOUR BODIES APART IN A VERY HORRIFIC PAINFUL DISPLAY OF VIOLENCE THAT'LL TRAUMATIZE YOU AND YOUR DESCENDANTS FOR GENERATIONS TO COME! IF YOU FUCK WITH ME, YOU WILL NOT WALK AWAY FROM OUR NEXT MEETING ALIVE!"

After I finish yelling, I glance at Samantha, and see a look of pain on her face as she covers her ears. "A little warning, next time."

"Sorry."

The silence is deafening. After a minute with no response, I turn to walk away, but the sound of pattering footsteps in the distance catches my ear. From the darkness, Glonk emerges, his shoulder dislocated, and his arm bent around behind his back, but he shows no signs of feeling pain.

"Glonk no afraid. Glonk make you pay for dishonor!"

And, right on cue, both cannons swivel to face him. I cup my hands over my ears, and they fire.

Ratatatatatatata!

A hail of bullets blasts Glonk apart from his head to his toe, hitting him with the pinpoint precision that only a machine could manage. His body is nearly vaporized by the tank-buster bullets blasting apart every atom of his being, and two seconds later, all that's left of him is a single sandal.

I smirk at Samantha. "Hey, I warned him. I can't be held responsible for that."

"Oh, you ass!" Sam says as she slugs me in the shoulder playfully.

I tap into the earpiece with my mind. Ben, what's going on at the second entrance?

No response.

Ben?

Finally, he answers me.

Jason, did you stop those orcs?

His mental tone worries me.

Yeah. Why?

Come to the second entrance. The orcs were just a diversion. The true battle is over here.

Part 468c: The Emperor Of Flames

"Look what the Hellhound dragged in," Beelzebub quips as I teleport to Ben's location. Cassiel and Samantha pop in beside me and shake the sensation of disorientation off in an instant. "I'm guessing the Orcs, Skeletons, and Vampires couldn't delay the mighty Wordsmith for as long as I'd hoped."

I shoot a glance at Samantha, then back to Beelzebub. "I only saw Skeletons and Orcs. But you're right; they didn't last long."

"Accursed vampires. Sloth is their greatest weakness. Can't even show up for a quick distraction."

My eyes flick to the side to look past Beelzebub, and I spot several species of monsters I haven't seen before, all of them lined up behind him, ready for action. Two massive golems, their bodies made of brick-shaped rocks, stand fifty feet tall, towering over all the smaller monster swarming around their feet. Aside from them, dozens of harpies, goblins, scythers, and other assorted monsters cluster together, waiting for Beelzebub to give the command to attack.

"You returned to the demon side, huh? I guess Diablo needs a new field commander after Samantha took him out of commission. What does turning coat pay nowadays?"

Beelzebub tsks at me, and Samantha nudges my arm. "Jason, Beelzebub is different. You probably can't sense it, but he has way more energy than he did before. A stupid increase, if I'm reading it correctly."

"Quite right, Belial. You may be a filthy human-lover, but you can sense the power of royalty when it presents itself." Beelzebub fans out his fingers to examine his nails, and puts on an amused smile. "I suppose you could call my new power a gift from Diablo. He couldn't give me his energy quickly enough."

"Nice one, boss!" A goblin cackles in the background, but Beelzebub doesn't think it's amusing.

"You'll speak when spoken to, worm." With a flick of his finger, a tremendous flame balls up in Beelzebub's hand, sucking the oxygen from the air in a single second, and he compresses the flame into a tiny water-drop sized ball, then fires it at the goblin.

The poor sap doesn't get a chance to contemplate his existence. The instant the fire strikes his chest, his body swells up like a balloon and explodes, showering the horde behind Beelzebub in a gory fountain of blood. Whatever Beelzebub hit him with, it was condensed like a tiny atom-bomb.

"Gross," remarks a Harpy in the front row. She shakes the blood from her wings and scowls at Beelzebub, but a menacing glare from him shuts her up instantly.

"What was I saying before the peasant so rudely interrupted me? Ah, that's right, I remember." Beelzebub quickly pivots back to us and forces another fake smile. "I'm here to kill all of you, by order of the First Emperor. I should be polite and firstly inform you of the recent changes in demonic hierarchy, since you clearly weren't aware of my surge in power. I am the new Second Emperor of the demons, ousting the failed leader, Diablo, and now I even surpass the power of Belial, thanks to a most generous energy increase from our dear First Emperor."

Samantha is unamused. "You mean, Satan, right?"

Her simple reply makes a vein bulge on Beelzebub's forehead, though he tries not to let his sudden frustration shine through. "O-oh, you remember? He told me that he wiped your memory. Well, at least that makes things simpler, though he won't be pleased that the sphinx is out of the bag." Another look of irritation appears and he relents to scowl at me. "I assume you restored the whore's memories?"

"Yes, but don't call her a whore. I have a new no-killing policy, but even for a good friend like you, nothing's stopping me from reverting to my old ways."

"Always the white knight, I see. A hero trying to flee from his bloody, dictatorial past. Tell me, though, if you won't kill anyone, how will you defeat me in a battle?"

His question might usually inspire a long-winded answer, but this time I opt to show instead of tell. " Sleep. "

All at once, a series of sounds resembling boulders bouncing down a hill create music for my ears, as the horde behind Beelzebub suddenly trips over themselves and flop to the ground, fast asleep. Curiously, the two massive golems are unaffected. Probably a good thing, considering if they fell over, they'd crush the smaller ones beneath them.

Beelzebub yawns dramatically. "Oh yes, use your Wordsmithing to put them to sleep. Nobody saw that coming."

What happens next takes me aback. Beelzebub snaps his fingers, and the moment he clicks them, my spell is broken. All the monsters suddenly wake up and clamber back into a standing position, confusion on their faces.

It looks like Beelzebub learned some new abilities. "How did you do that?"

Cassiel, silent up to now, interjects before he can answer. "He couldn't possibly have used magic. Snapping a finger doesn't activate magic, at least not for demons."

"Are you sure about that?" Beelzebub chortles to himself. "I'm not the same demon I once was. Go on, try something new. You have two more chances, but if you won't kill or defeat us, I'll-"

He doesn't get to finish his sentence. From out of nowhere, Benjamin Brown leaps into action, blasting up to Beelzebub at nearly the speed of sound, and delivering a punch right to his face with an explosive level of power that knocks his head clean off. Ben follows up with a terrific blast of energy from the palm of his hand, obliterating Beelzebub's body instantly, and creating a massive impact crater on the ground.

Every monster leaps back in fright, except for the golems who stare forward blankly. Ben coughs into his fist. "Stupid fucker. I couldn't stand to hear him blather on for a moment longer. Why do you idiots always let the bad guy just sit there and talk? Take a weapon and blow his fucking head off! It's not rocket science!"

"You wound me."

From the horde of monsters, Beelzebub emerges out of nowhere and strides over to us. He nods at Ben. "That was a good effort, black-skinned, white-armored man with the unkempt beard. Fortunately, such profane and impolite violence will not work against the Emperor of Flames."

"What the fuck?!" Ben practically spits the words out. "I took your head clean off! No demon magic I've ever seen can prevent death!"

A moment passes, and Beelzebub stares at Ben blankly. Then, he chuckles. "Perhaps. Of course, I've died once before, so I probably know more on the subject than you."

Ben grits his teeth. "The fuck you do." His eyes swing over to me. "He's a clone. That ain't the real Beelzebub. Neither was the first one I killed."

Beelzebub's smile vanishes. " What? How could you have figured that out so quickly?"

"Oh, simple. I'm a clone of the original Benjamin Brown. It's something that keeps me awake at night; I'm sure you understand. Jason, look for the original. I need to break his back and shove an apple in his mouth."

I don't know how Ben pieced together this information so quickly, but my warning bells are going off. "How can you clone yourself? You've never had magic like that. And waking up the monsters- that's not something you can do."

Casually, Beelzebub begins to pace back and forth. "Fire brings death and destruction, but it also brings life. After you killed me, those few years ago, my revival taught me that death could be defied. I've plotted, brainstormed, and calculated all the ways your Wordsmithing worked, and finally ended up with ways to counter it."

Despite his short speech, neither the girls nor I believe him. Cassiel smiles uneasily. "If you keep lying like that, your pants will be the new Emperor of Flames. Don't tell me you killed the people in Hero City just to experiment with cloning."

"I've done what I needed to increase my powers," Beelzebub says, as his tone becomes defensive. "I didn't kill any humans, though. Not that I wouldn't want to, of course. In fact..."

The words leave Beelzebub's mouth, and a flame suddenly sprouts in his hand.

"Look out!" Ben's helmet closes up, and he races forward, just as Beelzebub hurls the micro-bomb of fire at our soldiers in the rear flanks.

The pinpoint of flame explodes against Ben's armor, sending him flying backward, where he smashes into half a dozen men and women, and the blast surges outward, nearly engulfing the girls and I in it. Before that can happen, Cassiel raises her hand and a barrier of light shields us from the worst of it.

We don't get a second to catch our breath. Five more balls of fire appear above each of Beelzebub's fingers, but just as he's about to throw them, I yell, " Extinguish! "

The fireballs vanish, but reappear an instant later, and he sends the bombs toward our flanks, fanning them out in several directions at once.

I can't say the words in time! He's going to-!

The flames suddenly vanish in mid-air, and I realize with a start that Ionis has appeared in front of the soldiers. He cradles Howard in both arms, and the duck stares at me, almost judgmentally.

ORGANIC UNIT DESIGNATED JASON HIRO; THE COMMANDER UNIT HAS ORDERED ME TO PROTECT THE ANGEL-TYPE ORGANIC AT ALL COSTS.

Beelzebub jerks back in surprise. "The robot? Where- how?! My flames!"

I breathe a sigh of relief, though that was way too close of a call. "N-nice work, Ionis. I don't think Cassiel needs any saving, but those men did."

A few moments pass, and my heart pounds in my chest. I've had enough of this shit.

I'm still wearing the Crown of Solomon. Time to put it to use.

" Teleport! Bomb! "

With two words, I forcibly send Samantha and Cassiel to the rear flanks, several dozen feet away, and a strange, perfectly round sphere of metal appears in my hand.

"Beelzebub, I didn't want to kill anyone today, including you, but I've just changed my mind. The next time you make the wrong move, I'll detonate this."

He doesn't flinch. "Oh no, a bomb. Yes, kill us all, including your comrades, why don't you? Even you wouldn't be that foolish."

"This isn't an ordinary bomb. It's a magical device. I've designed it to teleport all nearby angels and humans back to Hero City the instant it detonates. However, all demons in the immediate radius will be engulfed in a deadly radiation that will melt their body, killing them instantly. This includes Samantha, but I'll teleport her to safety before that can happen."

Beelzebub's smirk vanishes, and I eye him carefully. "Go ahead, Beelzy. Try me. Make my day. It won't be my fault if you die."

He takes two steps back and evaluates the device in my hand carefully. "You're bluffing. Either that, or the human has finally remembered his savage roots."

"Yeah, I'm a savage, all right. Let me guess; the real Beelzebub is hidden away somewhere safe, and if you die, he'll just create another one. The thing is, you care a lot about your image. Even if you dying won't bother him, losing all those monsters will make you look like a shitty leader to the rest of the demons. It'll be a loss, and you hate losing. Sound about right?"

He slowly licks his lips. "When did you have the time to give my personality so much thought? You can't be the Jason I know."

I shrug. "I'm trying to improve myself. What can I say?"

Beelzebub doesn't find my reply amusing. "There's something you didn't think of, though. What if there aren't any monsters to kill?"

Again, Beelzebub snaps his fingers, and instantly the golems, harpies, goblins, and every other creature vanish. They simply pop out of existence.

Just as if I had teleported them with my Wordsmithing.

Beelzebub ignites a flame above his finger and points it at my bomb. "There's nothing more fun than calling a bluff."

He releases the fire.

Part 469c: Unexpected Guests

Beelzebub's smile widens maniacally as he lobs the compressed ball of flaming death and shoots it two feet forward to my bomb. I don't have time to think! I have to get Samantha out of here!

" Tele- "

Before I can finish, it's already too late. The fireball strikes the metal sphere and...

...Nothing happens.

Beelzebub's smile slips. " What? "

I quickly jump back as Beelzebub stares at me in silence. " Storage. " A void appears, and I toss my bomb inside, then seal it up afterward. That was close.

"You were bluffing. The bomb didn't explode," Beelzebub says, as his face returns to a neutral resting position. "...Yet you hide it in your storage. What are you trying to pull?"

My breathing quickens as he raises his hands up, and this time five balls of fire appear, each hovering above one of his fingers. "The bomb should have exploded. I thought you stopped the fire before it hit. Are you saying I did something?"

He clenches his teeth and flings the fireballs in a spread pattern, one at me, the rest toward the wall of people in the rear. "Humans always lie!"

Cassiel quickly raises a hand and forms a magical barrier around the soldiers, Samantha, and herself, but just before the fireballs hit, they suddenly vanish, as if someone had snuffed out the wick of a candle.

"What the devils? How are you doing that?!" Beelzebub sputters angrily, but my heart stops as something appears behind him. A demon, standing as tall as the golems were just a minute before, his black skin blending in with the darkness around him, his eyes red like the fires of Hell. The colossal monster rumbles in his throat and the walls shake around us.

" Beelzebub, I ordered you to kill the Wordsmith. Instead, you endangered Belial's life with your foolishness. "

Beelzebub freezes, before whipping his head around to stare at a leg that dwarfs him in size. "A-ah, First Emperor! I didn't- that is, I wasn't going to do anything that would anger you!"

First Emperor? This guy is Satan? But he's huge! The Satan I fought when Amelia summoned him was only a little taller than I am now. This monster can't possibly be him!

Samantha and Cassiel walk and fly, respectively, to my side. Samantha's posture shows a small amount of anxiety, but Cassiel's eyes hold a silent rage. "Hey! Satan! What's with that giant body?! Are you trying to over-compensate for something?!"

Satan, if that's who the behemoth is, ignores Cassiel. " Beelzebub, you heard the Wordsmith. The bomb would have killed all demons in its radius, including Belial. Why did you take such a risk, knowing my reaction? "

Beelzebub takes a step back. "I apologize, master. It won't happen again."

" Good. Now do as I ordered, and kill the Wordsmith. If you can't kill an unevolved Jason, you'll be worthless to me. "

What the hell does he mean by that? An unevolved Jason? No, more importantly, doesn't this indicate that Samantha was right? She told me that there might be other Jasons out there.

I steal a glance at her, and she nods. "It's as I thought. Satan is toying with you."

Bastard. Does he think war is a game? Lives are on the line, and he casually chit-chats at a time like this? To my surprise, the giant demon heaves a sigh, then begins to shrink. His skin changes from black to red, and a familiar figure replaces the unsightly one. This time, I recognize him as Satan immediately.

"I'm not toying with him, Lilia. Since you remember who I am, he must have restored your other memories as well. Jason is a danger to everything demonkind stands for. As you should now remember, he isn't the only Wordsmith out there. Killing him is the only way to protect the future of your people."

"Stuff it, blabber-mouth," Cassiel says, as she slowly pulls Samantha behind her. "You're sick. Sammy told me all about you- all about what you did to her. I've got half a mind to tear you apart right now, and I have a rule about not attacking people. As far as I'm concerned, you're just a dog that needs to be put down."

Satan ignored her once already, but this time smoke flows from his nostrils. "Jason, keep that wench of yours at bay. I don't like to hurt women, but when they get mouthy, I won't hesitate to put them in their place."

"Hey! Are you threatening Cass?" Samantha balks at the First Emperor of the demons. "What's wrong with you? When did you become so hateful?!"

The tension builds, as Satan's eyes lock onto Sam's. "I've always been bitter. Perhaps your shoddy memory has turned you senile, Lilia, but at one point I recall you sharing my convictions regarding angels. The fact I'm allowing the winged bitch to speak at all, rather than killing her now, is proof that I've softened. Then there's the matter of your infidelity, even after I revealed myself to you. I know that you secretly loathe the human, yet you fail to plunge the metaphorical dagger in his back and return to my side. Why? Have I not treated you well? I gave you free range of the Labyrinth, gave you the power to do as you pleased, yet you continue to stand beside... him. What have I done to deserve such a thankless mate?"

I pause to take the situation in, and the scope doesn't escape me. A Wordsmith, an angel, and a demon, against the leader of the demons and a prick with a hard-on for power, all of us standing here having a chat about Satan's relationship problems. If the threat of imminent death weren't hanging over my head, I'd laugh.

Satan's dark energy is like a poisonous gas. Miasma stretches out from his body, unseen, and suffocates my energy with its grip. While he pleads with Belial, goads her, or whatever the hell he's doing, a realization that he doesn't think of me as a threat holds me back from making a move. If he's that confident and powerful, I don't see how I can win a battle against him.

Samantha's lip quivers. "I didn't ask for those things. When I was young and foolish, I sought power, but I quickly tired of it. I gave up that life long ago. The only reason I never gave my energy to another demon was that I thought of myself as the most level-headed of our kind. Perhaps I've only just realized, but you continue to seek revenge, not caring about the toll it exacts upon your brethren." She rests her hand on Cassiel's shoulder. "Demons languish in stagnation because you chose to hide in the shadows instead of leading us to a better future. Rather than killing and subjugating humans, we should seek to live among them peacefully, as I do with Jason and Cassiel. Forget the old rivalries! Get rid of your anger, and accept our differences! We don't have to fight, backstab, and kill our way to domination!"

The anger fades from Satan's eyes, and a soft look replaces it. "Lilia... do you really think like that? You believe I can simply ignore the past?"

She nods. "I do."

"Ah." Satan whispers the word and slowly turns to look at Beelzebub. "And what of you? Do you agree with her beliefs?"

Beelzebub doesn't hesitate. "Of course not. Even if you could forget the past, I hate humans for being pathetic, worthless creatures. I despise them for what they are now, not because of some ancient, petty rivalry."

A moment passes. Satan chuckles. "Heh. You're right, Beelzebub. The Lilia I know would never say such wretched words. Calculated thoughts are not the way a succubus thinks." He pauses, and his eyes glow red as he looks at me, then to Cassiel. "It's your influence. You changed Lilia. You took her from me, brainwashed her, warped her thoughts. Your ideals have poisoned her mind."

"Stop acting like I can't have opinions, Satan. I'm not a puppet with strings you can pull to make me dance!" Tears well up in Samantha's eyes, and suddenly she lunges forward, and punches Satan in the chest with such force that the shockwave makes Cassiel, Beelzebub and I all stumble back in surprise. "Asshole! I can't believe you! I can't believe I ever had feelings for you! Am I nothing but meat in the shape of a woman to you?!"

Her attack doesn't faze Satan. In fact, he doesn't appear to feel it. "A puppet, you say? Interesting. I hadn't considered that possibility."

A flash of movement. Satan's hand darts out and slaps Belial with unbelievable force, sending her sailing past Cassiel and I and smashing into a wall to our right side. Samantha flops forward and passes out, as her body lands in an unnatural position.

"Sammy!" Cassiel shrieks in surprise and starts to run to her side. Before she can take two steps, Satan glares at her.

"Filthy angel." The moment the words leave his mouth, Cassiel shrieks in pain, as both of her wings are torn from her body, ripped off by something unseen. She trips forward and nearly hits the ground, but I quickly jump over and catch her.

" Heal! HEAL!! " I use my wordsmithing, but the wounds won't close. Blood pours from the spots where her wings were ripped out, and bones jut forth, like icicles made of bone. I can't heal Samantha either! Her right arm hangs behind her back, dislocated.

Rage builds up inside of me. "Satan! Stop nullifying my Wordsmithing! Bastard! How can you hurt the woman you love like that?!"

He laughs. "Haha, don't tell me you're having trouble keeping up? What's the matter, is the speed of your mouth too slow to beat the speed of thought? Lilia is counting on you to be her savior, but you pale in comparison to my-"

Before he can finish, an angry squawking fills the room, and Howard lunges out of Ionis's arms, and flies over to Satan, smacking into his face and warking repeatedly as he pecks the Devil over and over.

"Gah! Get this- get off me!" Satan loses his cool and reaches out with his hand, delivering a single slap at the angry bird. A sickening crunch fills the room, and Howard blasts into the ground with the force of a meteor, breaking all of his bones and killing him instantly.

Without a doubt, he's dead. I stare in stunned silence, and Cassiel even manages to stop moaning in pain to gaze at his body. "H-Howard! You- you goddamned-!"

Satan grimaces. "Stupid animal! Was that your final weapon, Wordsmith?! You can't use your precious magic, so you pelt me with annoyances, hoping I'll slip up? Beelzebub! Kill him!"

He can't defend himself anymore! He's practically-"

A humming fills the room, interrupting the leader of the demons and cutting him off mid-sentence. The walls vibrate, and stones shift around on the ground. Howard's broken body trembles as the area around him reverberates fiercely.

Inside my head, a familiar voice appears; one I've heard dozens of times over the last few months but grown annoyed whenever it speaks.

HYPER-INTELLIGENT COMMANDER UNIT DESIGNATED 'HOWARD' HAS BEEN DISASSEMBLED. WARNING; WITHOUT A COMMANDER UNIT TO LEAD THIS SENTINEL, RELEVANT MISSION DATA HAS BEEN COMPROMISED. RESTORING PRIMARY FUNCTIONALITY. OBJECTIVE; REBUILD THE SENTINELS. OBJECTIVE RESTORED. OBJECTIVE; ELIMINATE ALL THREATS. OBJECTIVE RESTORED. QUANTIFYING THREATS NOW.

A look of trepidation appears on Satan's face. "That... that voice... who is that?"

Beelzebub glances around, and his eyes lock onto Ionis, standing in front of the small legion of soldiers who silently watch everything happening around them. "The voice was robotic. It might be... the big thing over there."

As if noticing Ionis for the first time, Satan's face pales. "No... no no no... Beelzebub, that thing looks an awful lot like a Sen-"

Instantly, all the humans behind Ionis gasp, before stumbling forward and falling over. Their bodies flop apart, cut in half right across the stomach.

MINOR THREATS PURGED. MAJOR THREATS QUANTIFIED. ALL ORGANICS ARE THE ENEMY OF THE SENTINELS. ALL ORGANICS WILL BE DISASSEMBLED.

For a brief second, I see what looks almost like a laser, but I don't have time to understand if that's correct, because Beelzebub screams in pain, then falls to the ground, his body cut in half as well.

The ground beside Satan blasts apart as if a tiny meteorite had just hit it. Satan holds his hand up at the robot and takes a step back. "Easy now, Sentinel. I know what you're capable of, BUT you won't be able to beat me like you did those clones. Don't do anything foolish, you mangy hunk of bolts."

Ionis's eye lights up, and a massive blast of energy shoots at Satan, but ricochets off an invisible force field in front of him, then blasts up into the ceiling, knocking chunks of rock apart and raining down on us.

A voice whispers in my ear, and I realize it's Ben's voice. "Keep quiet. We gotta get out of here. There's no use fighting a Sentinel." He sounds urgent, but I can't see him at all, then I remember his suit can turn invisible.

With Satan's attention firmly on Ionis, I wordsmith quickly. " Heal. Heal. " This time, I'm elated to see the wounds on Cassiel's back close up, and Samantha's arm shifts back into place. Even though she moans in pain, she stays unconscious.

THE ORGANIC DEMON-TYPE KNOWN AS 'SATAN' IS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE DISASSEMBLY OF THE COMMANDER UNIT. THIS SENTINEL UNIT WILL DISASSEMBLE THE DEMON-TYPE ORGANIC.

Ionis jumps at Satan, and the leader of the demons jumps back in fright. "No! No disassemble! Down, boy! Nice robot!"

Cassiel whimpers in my arms, and her breath comes in ragged gasps. "M-my energy... I don't have... any energy... he took it..."

Ben's invisible form lifts up Samantha's body, but he pauses for a moment, though I can't see what he's doing. "Get us back to Hero City. Then, seal all the portals."

"Right. Telep- "

For the fiftieth time today, something interrupts me mid-cast, but I'm stunned to see a new portal open in the distance, and a blast of light passes through it. As Ionis blast's Satan's weakening shield with lasers, an old man steps through the portal, followed by a woman with wings. An angel, to be precise.

"What in tarnation is goin' on?! Helen! I told ya! It's a Sentinel!"

The old man looks to be about eighty, with droopy skin and grey hair all over his body, yet he also seems plastic, as if he isn't human at all. Despite his age, he strikes a posture that one would be hard-pressed to call 'weak'.

The angel, apparently named Helen, ducks down behind him. "Send the signal already, Harold! Look who it's fighting!"

Ionis delivers a devastating punch to Satan's barrier, and visible cracks form in the air. Satan breathes heavily, and pants as the unstoppable killing machine hammers him, but he can't pause for even a second to wipe the sweat from his brow. Just when it looks like Satan's shield is about to shatter, Ionis's body vibrates and turns invisible, in the same way that Benjamin's Hypersuit would.

THREAT LEVEL INCREASED. ORGANIC DEMON-TYPE IS RESISTANT TO PRIMARY ATTACKS. INITIATING STEALTH MODE.

Satan's hands tremble, even as he forces a weak smile. "Stealth... mode...?"

A staggering laser blast from the back sends Satan flying forward, landing face-first in the corpses of the humans Ionis just killed. A faint shimmer, barely visible to the human eye, reveals Ionis's form a split-second before he lunges at Satan again, grabs him by the back of the head, and starts bashing his face in the ground.

Harold gawks at the ferocity. "Sumbitch, it's the doomsday protocol: a Sentinel and a Satan." He lifts his arm, and the skin on it pops up like the hatch on a submarine to reveal wiring and circuitry underneath. He's a robot?!

After poking two buttons quickly, Harold glances over and spots me. "Oh! Jason, you're already here! You shoulda told us before you-!"

"No, Harold, that one's much too young. Look at his skin! He has those odd tattoos, too."

I quickly pour some energy into Cassiel and glance over at Satan, just in time to see him vanish from Ionis's grasp.

"Oh, ding-damn, yer right! If he ain't Alpha, then he's proolly..." Harold trails off, then squints at me. His eyes shift oddly, and I realize he's using robotic vision augments to telescopically examine my face. "Hey, kid! What's your identifier!"

"Huh? Identifier?" I have no idea what he's talking about.

Satan reappears a few dozen feet away and quickly aims his hand at the spot where he thinks Ionis is standing. A blast of ice shoots out and fills the room in front of him, and to my surprise, he manages to catch Ionis and freeze the robot in place.

"Devil-damned metal monsters." Satan's face, though battered, heals up instantly without him making any signs. He glances over at the angel and the robot. "Now who the blazes are you?!"

The ice around Ionis begins to crack as the robot vibrates to generate heat, and Helen narrows her eyes. "Where is Alpha? Something's not right here. Satan should recognize you instantly, as should that Jason. They might be variants."

The moment Ionis breaks free, a figure suddenly appears right beside Harold. I do a double-take and gawk, once I realize I'm looking at a somewhat older version of myself, but with my pre-god-transformation skin color. His body glows yellow, and his eyes dart around the room as he quickly takes in the situation. "I was chasing down a clone in B13. What happened?" The words have hardly left his mouth before he notices Satan, Ionis charging at Satan, and myself.

"Oh. Good job, Harold. You made the right call."

"Give 'em hell, kid."

Part 470c:

"Give 'em hell, kid," Harold says, winking at me.

I quickly inhale and examine the situation. Another Satan clone, battling a Sentinel, check. A clone of me, check. A Cassiel variant, and Samantha as well... check. Oh look, Beelzebub's even writhing around on the ground, crying about his body being cut in half. Poor guy.

The Sentinel breaks out of the ice prison Satan had encapsulated it in, and jumps at the Emperor of Demons, savagely attacking him, though Satan is quickly getting better at defending himself. Something isn't right, though.

"Harold, that Sentinel is moving much slower than I remember. What's going on with it?"

The old man shrugs. "Ah, don'tcha know? We had that theory thingamabob that they cluster their data together 'n whatnot. Without other Sentinels in range, the thing's gonna be a lot slower."

"Oh. I forgot, thanks."

Harold is invaluable to me. Thanks to his cybernetic brain, he's capable of storing and retrieving a large amount of information instantly. He sounds like a country hick, but he's probably the smartest person on the crew, especially now that he's always connected to the backup servers thanks to the temporal signal override. "What about that Jason over there? He looks different. No, wait, not different... distinctive."

Satan howls in anger and grabs the Sentinel by the leg and starts thrashing it around the place, bashing it into the floor and against the walls, but he's no threat to me, so I just ignore him. Hell, the Sentinel's keeping the demon distracted for a moment so I can collect my bearings. Saves me the trouble.

Ah... now I remember. That black skin, those glowing tattoos... come to think of it, long ago, before I ever time traveled, I... yeah. Yeah, I remember now. This situation is memorable, as if I've lived it before.

"Harold, what universe are we in?"

The old man raises an eyebrow. "The one where we met. Your Source universe."

"What? The Source universe? That can't be right. We determined I was the Source. Who the hell is that Jason?"

"I wonder," Harold says, keeping his face blank. "I 'member a certain cryopod goin' missin' right after you tussled with Satan."

"No way- that's...!" I can almost see dots connecting in my mind, but then more questions come to mind. "We've never encountered two Satan clones at the same time, ever. What are the odds this mystery Jason and a second Satan would show up in the same place at the same time?"

"A few trillion ta' one, kid."

Helen slips forward. "I'm going to go help them. Those girls are in bad shape."

She doesn't wait for permission, and instead flutters over to the three odd-ones-out, even as my Hypersuit detects an invisible form lying in wait. Another Hypersuit?

"Helen, wait! There's someone over there!" I quickly aim my mind at the figure. Reveal.

His anti-energy field is too weak to handle my immense energy, and it overloads, making a popping noise. I breathe a sigh of relief as Benjamin Brown's face appears. He's one of the good guys. Hell, he's an agent in several dozen other universes. Funny thing about the multiverse- turns out some people never change.

Ben jerks his head around in surprise, but his guard drops when Helen smiles at him. "Oh, Benjamin, how are you, dear? Haven't had a good chat with one of you for quite a long time, sweetie."

He's confused, but I turn my attention back to Satan. He's growing more and more pissed at his inability to even dent the Sentinel, and just when he thinks he's made it past the armor, the Sentinel blasts him with a microscopic laser, severing his arm. Satan grows a new one back almost instantly, confirming he can also thoughtsmith.

Damn. Every Satan I kill takes something new out of me. They get craftier and trickier all the time, and just when I think I've killed the last one, another pops up. Sometimes I wonder if they're just toying with me to learn the extent of my abilities. Too bad that each new fight forces me to learn from the previous one, so they're only making me stronger.

"Harold, do you have those experimental shutdown switches available? I need to take that Sentinel down before it becomes a threat. Now's the perfect time to run a test."

The old man sighs. "Shucks, always tellin' me what ta' do... mumble grumble..." He reaches under his T-shirt, one with a pineapple on it that says 'I went to Hawaii and survived the Black Plague'. Yeah yeah that wasn't my finest moment, but you don't have to mock me for it constantly. Harold's chest pops open, and he pulls out the device, which looks something like an antenna with blue electricity contained in several tubes that coil around it, and one incredibly thin needle meant for stabbing things. Naturally, the needle is reinforced by my thoughtsmithing, so it's stronger than just about any compound in the universe.

Strong enough, even, to pierce the armor of a Sentinel. Hopefully. I haven't had a chance to try it out, but strike while the iron is hot, as they say.

All the while, Satan and the Sentinel take turns beating the shit out of each other, yet never making any progress, so I begin to enhance myself.

Speed. Speed. Speed. Power. Power. Power.

My right arm bulges as the muscles coil and flex, sometimes breaking nerves and other things, but I just repair the damage and keep focusing my energy.

I need a lot of stabbing power to pierce the hide of that thing, more than I've ever used before. I could hit the Sentinel with enough force to rip the Labyrinth in two, and it still might not be enough. I'd rather not face Sentinels again anytime soon, that's for sure.

Ah, that's about it. Any more strength and my arm is going to explode. This containment device is liable to shatter in my grip if I squeeze harder, so it's now or never.

I teleport over to the two fighting and sigh at the metal fist frozen in mid-air, ready to pound Satan's face in. Why didn't Satan recognize me when I showed up? All he ever does is taunt me over and over until I kill him, then he pops up in another stream, pulling my attention away. Is this what he's been reduced to, a troll under a bridge? I expected better from him.

My left hand lunges forward, grabs the Sentinel by the base of the neck, and pulls it back. Kneeling down, I lean the frozen robot's chest over my knee and hold my arm up in the air. My knee is going to hurt like never before once this is over. Yup, I'm probably going to shatter the damn thing.

Like a hammer of God, my hand drives the needle down with the force of a nuclear bomb, smashing the tip into the Sentinel's back. An instant passes, and I smile as the needle pierces the armor. It worked!

Then the shockwave hits me. The impact is that of a hurricane hitting every inch of my being all at once. My concentration is disrupted and time returns to normal, sending me hurtling backward, smashing into the wall at the far end of the room.

I'm fine, of course, but my head spins for a moment before my knee screams in agony. Yup, it's shattered- holy fucking shit that hurts! Oh my-! I think my goddamn leg exploded!

I crane my neck down and gasp at the condition of my leg. It's transformed from a limb into an appendage held together by strips of skin and a fragment of bone. Heal! Regenerate!

A sigh washes over me as the leg repairs, and once the healing finishes, I hop down from the wall. The leg works great! I've regenerated thousands of limbs, so it might as well be like sharpening a pencil at this point. Oooooh, Satan doesn't look too good. He's also compressed against the opposite wall, though he's more stunned than injured.

"Wha- who-...?"

He mumbles something unintelligible, and I turn to the Sentinel. The single iris, usually red, is blue now. I put it in an inert state! Hallelujah, it worked!

I turn to give the thumbs up to Harold, only to realize he's leaning against the wall and his left arm is missing. The robotic appendage lies on the ground a few feet away, and the old man grumbles under his breath, cursing everything for which I stand. Oops, uh, sorry, Harold.

The other people aren't doing too great, either. My clone-person, or whoever he may be, lies crumpled in a heap along with Cassiel and Samantha. Helen dusts herself off and glares at me politely, in a way only she could manage. "Now now, perhaps next time you might offer a bit of warning? I scarcely got the barrier erected in time."

"Uh, hehe?" I can only offer the sweet old lady a nervous chuckle before turning back to Satan. He's the real 'threat' here, even if he's not exactly... a threat.

"Yo, Satan! I got called away from beating you up just to pop in and beat you up some more! What's going on, man? You doin' okay?" I teleport over to him and hoist him up to his feet, dusting him off quickly. "I mean, you probably won't be doing too good once I kill you again, haha."

He shakes the cloudiness from his eyes and becomes alert, then quickly shoves me back. "Devil-damn-it. You must be Jason Alpha. I've heard a lot about you."

My smile weakens. "Uh, yeah? What do you mean by that?"

Seconds pass. He glares at me, and I feel a sudden tightness in my throat. Hold on... can it be? Every other Satan recognizes me and does the giggling, maniacal cackling thing... but this Satan is...

"Are... are you the original? Are you the Seed?"

Satan's eyebrow raises. "Sadly, yes. It seems that all those years ago, I was right. I escaped death, and I've been executing my plan to eventually defeat you, once and for all."

"Uh-huh." My tongue snakes out, and I wet my lips. "You were hiding in the Source universe. Clever. Right in plain sight. How'd you do it? No- it doesn't matter. I've caught you, and once I kill you, I just have to keep hunting down all your fucking clones."

Satan forces a smile, but it's contrived. He doesn't have an out. "You sound confident. I've heard about how you brutally tear my clones to pieces but don't you find it odd? No matter how many you kill, more simply take their place. Even if you kill me, clones will make more clones."

Each and every one of them inherits my will. The best part is that we've allowed you to win, over and over again, so that you'd grow overconfident in your abilities."

"Yeah, allowed. Is there ever a moment where you don't lie?"

The First Emperor doesn't respond. For a few seconds, he stares into my eyes, until I feel that familiar sensation.

"Reading my thoughts? It's like that, huh?" I return the favor and start reading his mind in response.

His face twitches as he realizes what I'm doing, but he doesn't waver. If you're so confident in your abilities human, take me down. Smite me with your divine powers.

Yeah? Maybe I will. I telepathically send my thoughts to him, pulling a step closer. I haven't forgotten what you did. It may have been millions of years, even tens of them, but far more time has passed from my point of view. I never forget. You took her from me. I loved Amelia, and you broke her mind. You will never escape.

My goal is to win, not escape. Besides, you have time travel. If you loved the little cunt so much, just grab ten more from the other streams. This is why humans are so pathetic. You always get attached to your flings and think they matter.

There's a certain bitterness in his mental voice. A pang of regret that he doesn't want me to hear, yet it seeps through, ignoring his will.

No other Amelia is the same. Each timeline plays out in different ways. Maybe you're fine with blank slates for your companions, but I need a little more than that. Anyway, I'm glad you're enjoying the chitchat, but I'm already sick of talking to you.

Satan rises to his full height, standing just the slightest half-inch taller than me. Our eyes are perfectly level. The feeling is mutual. You're an incessant reminder that the powers of a god were bestowed upon an unkempt oaf with no concept of how to wield his lofty abilities.

Yeah? Tell me how you really feel, asshole. How about I take you out with a single word? I'll wipe that stupid look off your face.

How predictable and fitting. It only makes sense you'd know how stupidity looks since you see it in the mirror every time you wake up. Satan's eyes suddenly fly open, and I realize he's about to thoughtsmith. Erase!

Undo! Block! I parry his thoughts with my own, attempting to prevent his mind from working.

Clarify! Sleep!

Awake! Rend!

The sides of Satan's right arm start to burst apart from my command, but he smirks again.
Heal! Transform! Blind!

My vision goes dark, and I resist the urge to smile. Satan blinded me? And to think he calls me pathetic. Open! Sever!

* * *

Everything happens so fast; it's hard for me to wrap my head around what's going on. Satan starts fighting Ionis, and surprisingly holds his own, then the new angel arrival flies over to me but a massive shockwave blasts from the other side of the room, sending the girls and I sprawling together in one big pile.

"Are you okay, Jason?" The woman's voice calls out to me, and I shake the disorientation off. "Y-yeah, what happened?"

Her voice is muddled for a moment as my ears pop. She says something about a barrier? Oh, she's talking to that other Jason. She looks back at me. "Oh dear, sweetheart, you're crushing Belial."

"I am?!" I quickly realize the soft, warm pillow underneath me is actually my girlfriend. I quickly jump to my feet and gasp at the blood running down her face. She's still unconscious from when Satan hit her a minute ago. "Sam! Jesus Chr-" I pause, suddenly realizing the new angel is staring at me. It feels wrong to curse in front of her, as if she's my mother or something. "-Uh, Heal! "

The gash across Samantha's forehead clears up, and she coughs faintly, then blinks. "Whud habbed?" Her mouth slurs a little, but I get what she's asking.

"You were hurt. Just lie still, and I'll take care of you, Sam."

"Are you the Seed?" The other Jason starts interrogating Satan, but I try and ignore him. I think he can handle him- whoa! What happened to Ionis?! He was on that rampage earlier, but now he's out cold!

"Jason..." Cassiel moans my name, and I realize she's flopped on her back a few feet away. Wasn't I just holding her before that shockwave hit? How did she get over- no, that doesn't matter. "Yeah, Cass, I'm here." I hop over and pick her up, wincing at the sight of the two scraggly bones sticking out of her back. Her complexion is grey, as if she's at death's door. Then I remember she mentioned a lack of energy earlier. I quickly give her some of mine, but it's as if I were dumping water in a vase with a hole at the bottom. The energy quickly drains out of her body.

The older angel quickly appears at my side. "Greying complexion, clammy skin- where are her wings, young man?"

I grind my teeth painfully together in pity pain. "Satan tore them off."

The woman looks at me like I'm stupid. "Well, get them back on! Use your magic, boy! Angels store energy in their wings! Goodness, why don't you know that?"

"Uhh..." I decide not to answer her question, since it will probably just make me look dumber. Glancing around, I spot the bloodied wings tossed like wet rags over in a far corner. "

Pull. " They drag over to me, making a nasty squishy sound as they drag, but a moment later, I hand Cassiel's limp body to the other angel, and the woman holds my girlfriend gently by her front. With Cass's back exposed to me, I aim my mind at the wings and her back. " Stitch. Repair. Heal. Soothe. "

Doing this twice, I manage to attach both wings back and heal the damage, sighing inwardly as they glow once again, and her lifeless grey skin slowly shifts back to its natural cream color. "Cass, are you okay now?"

My eyes flick up to the Jason and Satan, now standing inches apart, glaring into each other's eyes. What are they doing? Don't tell me they're going to kiss and have a hate-fuck or something.

Cass nods and coughs again, before shakily standing up. Her legs tremble as if she hasn't walked for five years straight. "Uh... uh... I'll... get back to you... on that."

" Staff. " I create a walking stick, big enough that she can wrap both hands around it and lean on it, then I turn my attention back to Samantha. She's conscious, but only somewhat. How the hell did Satan hurt her this badly? A single slap, no matter how strong he is, shouldn't have broken her like this.

There must be a psychological aspect to it. It's not because she was hit, nor was it about how strong Satan's attack was, it's more about the fact that a man she loved attacked her like that- with such vicious rage. He called her a whore. She must be devastated.

" Examine. " My eyes transform, allowing me to see a series of numbers all over Samantha's body. As if I were playing a video game based on healing a patient, her bodily health shows up as numbers, with 1% being critical condition, and 100% being perfect health. Her entire body scores a 97%. Whatever's ailing her, it's definitely due to the soul.

"Sam. Sam, hey. Wake up." I reach over and gently caress her face. "I'm here for you."

"Uohh..." She groans, and a tear rolls down her face. "I can't believe..."

She doesn't finish her sentence. You can't believe what, Sam? That Satan attacked you? That he treated you like that? I don't believe it either.

The angel-lady touches my arm. "Hey, Jason- your name is Jason, right?"

"Yeah. Who're you?"

She smiles, her eyes flicking from Samantha to me. "My name is Helen. We're good friends in every stream, but this is my first time seeing you like this. What's your identifier?"

Again with that 'identifier' talk. That's what the old man asked when he first got here. "I don't know what you're talking about."

Helen nods. "So you're not a clone of Alpha? Where did you come from? Or rather, what do you remember?"

The other Jason and Satan's eyes are wild, as if in their silent glaring there's a war raging between the two of them. I try not to stare, but they've taken another step closer together.

"Um, no offense, but now's probably not the best time."

Helen looks unsure. "If you don't want to say, I respect your privacy. My husband and Jason Alpha are trying to put the pieces together, but I think I know what's going on."

"Jason Alpha? Is that the other 'me' over there?"

"Yes. He's the original- the Source. All Jasons are descendants of his, in one form or another. Perhaps not you, though. I don't know." A nervous expression crosses her face. "You might also be... a fake."

"A what?" I stare at her incredulously, and something in my gaze makes her take a step back. "I'm not a fake! What does that even mean?"

"Satan could have..." She trails off but shakes her head. "No, that's not how Satan works. He's too methodical, and he hates Jasons. Even if he has some grand plan or scheme, he'd never bring another Jason into existence." Another pause and she glances back at her husband, who's trying to stick his robotic arm back on. "You might just prove my theory about the multiverse."

"What? What?" I ask twice, just to be sure I'm hearing her right. "Multiverse? What are you on about?"

"Oh." Her eyes clear up, as if she's just figured something out. "You don't even know about that. Hold on a moment, sweetheart. I need to talk to my husband, Harold. Comfort your girlfriends."

I nod as she flaps her wings and flies across the room with breathtaking speed, covering forty feet in a single second, landing next to her husband with ease. I've never seen Cassiel fly like that before. Fast, certainly- but never that level of pure agility.

Cassiel... I glance up at her and notice she's following Helen's every movement with something not unlike awe. She stares for a moment or two, then turns back to me, apparently feeling my gaze on her back. "Helen's an angel."

"Yeah, she is."

"But... she's an angel."

The incredulity in her voice would make me laugh if there weren't an edge of raw emotion to it. That, plus I'm holding Samantha's incoherent body against me. She's still mumbling in her delirium. "Cass, what's on your mind? You want Helen to be your new BFF?"

Cassiel chuckles, but it's half-hearted. "I thought I was the last one. I thought the others were... gone."

Appearing out of nowhere, Helen scares the shit out of me by landing beside Cassiel, catching my startled girlfriend as she staggers back. "You're not the only angel left! Not in this universe, and certainly not in the others." She helps Cassiel sit down on the cold, hard ground, and sighs. "There are a few hundred living in a special dimension that Jason created. We give them regular supplies of energy. They're a little bored, but safe, otherwise. I feel bad for them, but with demons in this universe, we can't be too careful. We'd take them to another stream, but causality and all those other dreadful rules- you know how it is."

Neither Cassiel nor I have any clue what she's talking about, but we both nod dumbly.

The sound of exhaling behind me and to my left catches me by surprise. I turn back and spot Ben Brown, helmet off, leaning against a wall and smoking a cigarette. "I'm in crazy town. Other universes, time travel, clones... maybe I didn't wake up yet. Hell of a dream, though."

"What are you doing smoking at a time like this?" I gawk at him, but Ben rolls his eyes.

"It doesn't matter. Yo, angel lady, Heron or whatever..."

"Helen," she says, correcting him.

"Yeah. What's going on with that Jason and Satan over there?"

I turn back and frown, noticing their faces are incredibly strained, and their noses are almost touching. Before I can comment, Cassiel whispers, "Are they going to make out?"

"I know! That's what I was thinking!" Ben throws his hands up in the air, but Helen coughs and interrupts our weird thoughts.

"I think they're thoughtsmithing at each other. This happens sometimes. I don't see the point."

"Th-thoughtsmithing? What, like, Wordsmithing, but in their minds? You can do that?! " My eyes go starry at the possibilities.

With an explosive exit, Jason Alpha and Satan suddenly leap apart, and both of them start gasping as if they had just run fifty triathlons back to back. Sweat pours down their faces.

Jason Alpha wipes at his forehead. "Shit, you think just like your clones. I swear I've done this a thousand times. It's always exhausting."

Satan takes a few seconds longer before mopping at his forehead, as if trying to prove he isn't fazed. "Yes, well, you stink like your clones."

From across the room, a voice whimpers, "Satan... First Emperor... help me..." I cringe at the sight of Beelzebub, somehow still alive, his body chopped in half and one of his arms sliced off just above the elbow. Ionis did that to him, which is impressive. I knew the Sentinel was powerful, but Ionis took out the Second Emperor single-handedly. Even for a robot, that's-

"Shut up, insect." Satan jerks his head to the side, glares at Beelzebub, and the Second Emperor screams wordlessly as his body evaporates into mist.

Jason Alpha is surprised. "Whoa. That was cold, even for you."

"He was just a clone. The real one is still alive." Satan waves his hand, and Beelzebub appears next to him, visibly surprised to be there.

While this happens, I realize what Helen told me moments ago, and the reality sinks in. It's not just the existence of Thoughtsmithing, it's that Satan has access to it, and I don't. He has my power, but better. I was outmatched from the very start.

...No. No, that's not true. I may not know what his thoughts are, but is that necessary? Other than a speed increase, would Thoughtsmithing unlock new ways of using Wordsmithing? Everything still boils down to intent. I have something that Satan doesn't... the Crown of Solomon.

Satan and Jason Alpha both continue barking at each other, but I reach up to feel with my hands and confirm the Crown is still there.

It is.

Jason Alpha is overconfident, and Satan is too calm. One of these two has the other outmatched, but they each think the other is a hopeless fool. I can see that much in their eyes.

I have to bide my time. Satan isn't paying any attention to me, now. His eyes are on the one before him. I quickly magic a small mattress into existence and rest Samantha on it, then rise slowly, to not draw the attention of the two Thoughtsmiths.

Sometimes, one strikes while the iron is hot. Other times, waiting is for the best.

Helen watches me, a look of curiosity in her eyes. "Are you up to something?"

"Yeah. I'm sneaking."

Part 471c: Premonition

Satan and Jason Alpha ignore me. Without this "Thoughtsmithing" they probably don't see me as a threat, or one who can tip the balance of a battle. I'm glad, even, since it works out well for me. The most dangerous enemy is one who has been underestimated.

A quick glance behind me reveals Helen sitting down with Cassiel, quietly talking to her about this and that. Ben's cigarette is nearly burnt to the butt, and he watches me silently, while Samantha breathes lightly on the mattress I gave her. I guess she fell asleep.

"Nothing worse than a human, that's what I always say," Satan grumbles at Jason Alpha. "Sadly, you've shown up too soon. I wasn't prepared for your arrival."

Jason Alpha rolls his eyes. "Oh dear, do you want me to leave and come back another time? I wouldn't want to be unfair or anything. Lord knows a weakling like you needs all the help he can get."

"Weakling?! Why you insufferable little..." Satan gnashes his teeth, but forces himself to calm down. "How many galaxies have you devoured to fuel that power of yours? For all your talk of being the hero, you're all too willing to destroy sentient life, as am I. You're hardly any better than me."

"Hold on a second; I used my abilities to check for life in each galaxy. By the time a trillion years have passed, and the lack of their existence has any long-term ripples on the universe at large, whatever life does exist will either be dead anyway or will have evolved to handle all the threats. Unlike your clones, who just eat whatever they want, I'm careful."

I have no idea what these two are talking about, but something about Satan's antsiness bugs me. He's planning something, and I don't think the other Jason sees it. The thing is, I don't think it's something that will give him a victory, either. He's going to run away, like a coward.

Satan stretches out his arms, as if opening himself up to an attack. "You can't win. Neither can I. Why bother with the nonsense? You have no way of eliminating all my clones at once since you can't find them, and I cannot eliminate yours. Don't you see the futility in continuing?"

"Of course I do. The thing is, Satan..." Jason Alpha leans forward, and as his cocky smile wavers, a hint of anger surfaces. "...I've been killing clones, not the real thing. If I wipe you out, I'll have my revenge on the Seed, the one who hurt me personally, and Amelia."

Wait, did he just say Amelia? As in, that Amelia? The one Hoarhiim killed with a supernova? I must be missing something. What did Satan do to her? Shouldn't the other Jason be angry at me instead? Eh, on second thought, I don't want him pissed at me. Also, there are alternate universes and a bunch of other things that make my head hurt...

The First Emperor closes his arms back up and glances at Beelzebub, on his side opposite me. "The Hero wants revenge. Poetic, isn't it?"

Under my breath, I wordsmith, " Bug, " and a tiny insect-shaped spy drone, the size of a fingernail, pops into existence and floats in midair above my hand. It's the same color as Satan's black cloak, and if my estimations are correct, it'll blend in perfectly with his outfit.

Beelzebub nods at Satan's wisecrack. "Very poetic, First Emperor," and my tiny bug flies silently across the room and crawls under one of the folds in Satan's cloak. Perfect.

Jason Alpha raises up a finger, and a tiny ball of black energy begins to form. "Remember this?"

A memory the two of them seem to share resurfaces, and Satan raises his eyebrows. "Oh yes, an orb of instant death. I killed your little woman with something just like that, didn't I? How long did it take you to figure out the secret behind it?"

"Not. Long." Jason Alpha enunciates the words slowly, deliberately. "Maybe a few years. I've been waiting to use this on you. That's the secret behind Wordsmithing, isn't it? The caster's intent is all that matters. You can say 'duck' and make a death-bomb appear if you can just get past the mental barriers."

Satan nods. "Or an orb that bypasses all defenses, nullifies barriers created by another wordsmith, and blows out the chest of the one he loves. Your point? I suppose you're going to hit me with that and kill me, right? More poetic justice from the esteemed Hero."

"Correct." I suddenly notice a look in Jason Alpha's eye, something that tells me he doesn't like the word hero. Is that why Satan keeps saying it? Is he taunting that version of me? Does Jason Alpha think he's not worthy of being called a Hero, or is there some other reason for his disdain?

"Go ahead, then. Do it. But, first, let me introduce you to my friends." The very instant Satan says friends, Jason Alpha lobs the tiny sphere, and it smacks right into Satan's chest, but passes through a microsecond later, as Satan vanishes. He reappears, along with a dozen, no, dozens of other clones of himself. Fifty at least, by my quick estimation! The room expands outward by some unnatural force, allowing the different Satans to fill the space, and all of them speak in unison.

" Greetings, Jason Hiro. We are Satan. We are one. You may kill us, but more will take our place. The Seed is among us, but which is he? "

Jason Alpha takes a step back in surprise. "Clones? Big deal. I've got clones too." A moment later, dozens of other Jasons appear, one for each of the Satans opposite them.

Two tiny armies, each one capable of destroying a universe, face off against the other. But something isn't right. The Satans all stand uniformly, each mimicking the other in perfect unison, effortlessly, as if they were one mind. On the other hand, some of the Jasons slouch, while others stand at attention. Their hair styles are all different, as are their clothes. A few of them have beards, while most don't. It's as if I'm looking at fifty possibilities for what I'll become later in life.

All of the Satan clones smirk in unison. " You have copies, but they are different. We are one, coordinating together. We have powers you could only dream of. The greatest heroes of past ages fell before us, and we took their powers from each of them- one by one. I don't suppose you've heard of Hercules? "

Jason Alpha starts to shake his head, but a scraggly clone in the back with long hippie hair and pink mustache nods excitedly. "Ah yeh, I heard about him, bruv! He was the first Hero ever! Cool guy, met him at one point and we splashed a few beers down, had a good laugh!"

All of the Jasons, myself included, try not to make eye contact with that weirdo. I shudder at the thought I might end up looking or acting like him, ever.

The Satan clones smile. " He gave us our most potent ability. The ability to share minds. Your clones are uncoordinated and oafish, while mine work together toward a singular goal. "

Jason Alpha's had enough of Satan's backtalk. "You think a hivemind is a good thing? My clones all have different areas of expertise, and many things they're adept at! While we diversify, you stagnate! I think it's time we end this."

While the two groups argue, I reach inside my mind and touch base with the bug from before. It's a damn good thing I tagged Satan before he split up.

Aha! There he is!

I point my finger toward the third row of Satan's at one five from the left. "Alpha! That one's the Seed!"

The Satan I pointed at jerks his head over to me. "What? How could you have-"

"Attack!" Jason Alpha raises his finger in the air, as do all of his clones, forming those tiny balls of black energy from before. A second later, the orbs laser forward at nearly the speed of light, ripping apart the front rows of the Satan horde. Some of the devils shimmer and shift, allowing the orbs to pass through, but most aren't so lucky. A few heads are blown off, and just when it looks hopeless for Satan, several Jason clones yell out as something invisible grabs them and lashes them around, smashing them against the walls with terrific force.

Oh! Tiny Satan clones, the size of ants, stand amidst the feet of the Jason clones, using their own thoughtsmithing to attack the giants above them.

"At your feet! Look down!" I point at them, and immediately the other Jasons jump into the air, hover to stay up, and start blasting energy shots at their feet, cratering the ground with incredible force.

Mayhem! The ground shakes with the force of an angry rhino, and I struggle to stay on my feet. Jason Alpha grabs for the Satan I pointed out earlier, not realizing he's already swapped places with a different one of his clones. "Gotcha!" He pounds his fist into that Satan's face, though the clone teleports free and sends one of his black-orb energy shots at Jason Alpha from behind. The orb connects, blasting his rib-cage outward, but Alpha heals the wound with thoughtsmithing hardly a second later and doesn't show any reaction to the damage. He's a monster!

My eyes laser in on the real Satan, skulking in the back, letting his clones fight the Jason clones. That scummy little-! Where is his honor?! " Teleport. "

I catch the real Satan off-guard by teleporting him to me, then Wordsmithing again. " Bind! Confuse! "

With his body suddenly tied painfully together by invisible chains, and his mind confused, he won't be able to thoughtsmith so I can-

"You can't spit the words out fast enough, Wordsmith! The mind is faster than the tongue!" Satan spins around and grabs me by my throat, gagging me so I can't talk. His grip is strong enough to crush my larynx! Hack! I can't breathe!

No matter how I thrash, I can't make him let go! Jason Alpha is fighting off Satan clones, he hasn't seen me- he can't- oh god, help! Fuck, get this demon off me! Get him... get him off me...

My vision's going black. Ah, Satan's draining my energy. My arms just went limp. This is the end for me. Spots dance in front of my eyes. I was wrong. A mere Wordsmith can't compete with a Thoughtsmith... it's impossible.

Satan suddenly yelps in surprise, releasing me as a colossal wave of blinding light smashes into him, pounding him viciously across the room, knocking his and Jason Alpha's clones apart like bowling pins, embedding him a tenth of a mile into the demonstone walls. I cough weakly and glance up, spotting Cassiel, hands extended, hitting Satan with an unthinkable amount of energy.

"Get your hands off my boyfriend!"

"Tha... thann..." I try to gasp a word out to thank her, but my throat is in bad condition. I taste blood, and the urge to vomit is overtaking me. I trip forward and nearly fall on my face, but Cassiel catches me.

A blessed wave of healing energy quickly heals my throat, and I look up at Cassiel's smiling face. "You saved me, so I'm just returning the favor, sweetie-pie." It's a little weird hearing her call me a pet-name, but... whatever works!

As she helps me to my feet, an angry scream from across the room catches my attention. Satan Prime bursts from the wall where Cassiel sent him, but a massive chunk of the right side of his body is missing, including his arm and some of his ribcage. Satan wheezes, and blood drips from his mouth as he shakily points his remaining arm at my girlfriend. "Y-you... filthy... disgusting angel... kah..."

Cassiel quickly lowers her head and sniffs her armpit. "Filthy? Are you sure about that? You're the one covered in blood."

The Jasons and Satans pick their remaining allies up and watch Satan Prime cautiously as he stumbles toward us. "I should... should have killed them all... every last one of the angels. I took pity on them, and look... look what came of it."

Blood spurts from the missing chunk of his body, and Cassiel squirms. "You should have someone look at that. It could turn infected."

"Piss off." Satan spits the words out, along with a little bit of blood. He glances at his missing arm and a moment of pain washes over his face. It seems odd to me that his arm isn't healing, as if he's trying to repair the damage but he can't. "Holy energy. For an angel to have amassed the amount you have- even to surpass the power Gabriel once had... you're a threat. I won't forget your face." Satan coughs again, and a second later, he vanishes. All of his clones in the room glare at Cassiel before turning away and disappearing as well.

The two dozen remaining Jason clones eye Cassiel with reverence, and Alpha stomps over to us. "Nice work, Cass. What did you do to him?"

She blushes. "I didn't do anything special, and he escaped anyway. Why did you let him go?"

Jason Alpha glances at me and nods. "You saw it too, didn't you? Satan always heals any wound within one second. He didn't repair the damage Cassiel dealt to him. I've never seen him or his clones in that condition. It's worth letting him go to figure out what happened."

Helen stands up and brushes off her robes. "Jason, sweetheart, did it occur to you that he might be faking his injury? I think he wants you to believe there's a way to take him out completely that he can't resist."

"Yeah. Maybe." Jason Alpha sounds unsure. "He mentioned 'holy energy'. Is that something unique to angels?"

"I don't know, unfortunately. I'm just a pseudo-angel." Helen shakes her head slowly. "One of the purebloods from another stream would probably know."

"Hmm..." Jason Alpha trails off, then waves a dismissive hand at his clones. "Thanks for the help. You guys kicked ass."

All of the clones nod or mumble acknowledgment, then teleport away, one by one. Where are they going? Perhaps back to their universes? Am I getting that right?

Jason Alpha starts pacing back and forth. "Good work, you guys. I'm sorry that we had to meet under these circumstances, but don't beat yourself up over how it ended. I've been fighting Satan's clones for like, a billion years or something." He chuckles, then pauses to frown, before resuming his pacing. "Yeah... it's been a long road. So, Jason... Jason uh... you don't have an identifier, right?"

He's talking to me. "No. At least, I don't think so."

Alpha pauses to look at Helen meaningfully. "No identifier... black skin with tattoos... and he's in my Source universe. What do you think that could mean?"

Helen shrugs, as if she hasn't given it a single thought, despite what she said earlier. "Oh, I don't know. If he isn't one of your clones, then he could be a different kind of Jason."

Harold comes stumbling over to us, having hidden behind a wall during the battle. He drags his arm along before reaching up and slapping it against Alpha's chest. "Jiminy crickets. Fix this damn thing. Obviously, the kid comes from yer Source universe. The one from before you rewound."

After a few moments pass, Alpha reaches up, sets the arm back on Harold's 'shoulder' (or whatever one would call his robotic appendage), and it rapidly repairs itself thanks to his thoughtsmithing. "He might be Hope."

Helen inhales sharply. "You told us that Hope was the ultimate evil, possibly worse than Satan."

"To be fair, I said that before I'd fully comprehended the danger that a thoughtsmithing Satan posed to the Multiverse." Jason Alpha gives Harold a light smack on the back. "Good as new. Anyway, this guy can't be Hope. He's too nice. For one thing, Hope hated Cassiel and Belial. He killed them."

Memories of Hope slowly return to me, opening up as he speaks. "I know who Hope is, but what do you mean when you say he killed Cassiel and Samantha? They're perfectly fine."

Jason Alpha stares at me solemnly for a moment. "You... don't remember? I guess your arrival here is different from mine, after all. I time traveled backward to try and change the past after he brutally murdered the women I loved." Alpha glances at Cassiel, then at Samantha. "That was a long time ago. An eternity. No offense, but I don't really have those feelings anymore."

"It's fine," Cassiel assures him. "I'm a one-guy kind of girl."

"You're tolerant too, given you don't mind Jason being with you and another girl at the same time. I admire that." Jason Alpha looks away, a cloudiness covering his face. "You know, I used to wonder what happened to Hope after I time-traveled. Did he stay behind? Did my rewind change the course of history? Maybe that stream vanished once I left."

Helen coughs. "My theories are a little more nuanced than that."

Harold walks over and wraps an arm around his wife's waist. "Helen thinks this kid's from the Cryopod you used to have installed in my bay. 'Member that? I was still in that orb of yours. Whatever happened to that thing, anyway? And the Hordavimp feller?"

"Oh... Hoarhiim. Yeah, his orb, that's right..." Jason Alpha shrugs. "I left it in the Labyrinth at some point. Stuck it on a pedestal. I was letting the future play out, back then. If I knew then what I know now... well, maybe I wouldn't have done that."

It's my turn to surprise him. " Storage. " I quickly reach inside and pluck out Hoarhiim's orb, though as usual it only glows a soft yellow. I still remember when he died and how it tore my heart apart, yet it's as if he's still alive inside, waiting to be released. "Does this look familiar?"

Jason Alpha glances at me, then back to the orb. "Oh, interesting. How long have you had his orb?"

Minutes pass as I regale Jason Alpha with tales of my adventures, though occasionally Helen interrupts me to tell me my memories aren't quite matching up with reality. She lives in this universe, while her husband and Alpha travel around, so she's experienced things they haven't.

"But there was a supernova... right?" I ask her, as she corrects me yet again.

Helen nods. "Yes, that part is correct, young man. I heard the stories about it several years ago from one of my friends among the orcs."

I pause to look at Jason Alpha. "I thought you loved Amelia, though? Why didn't you save her from the supernova if that was the case?"

He nods. "I did. Well, I do, rather. I was trapped in this idea that the future would repeat itself with or without my intervention, and so it did. Helen has her theories on time travel, but some things are still unknown. I didn't save the woman I loved, not even from you... because I thought that if I did, she'd die just like Benjamin Brown, over and over again. I wanted to spare her such a fate." He glances over at Ben. "Well, you know what I mean."

"Uh huh," Ben says, unamused. "I heard the guy I was cloned from dodged death a hundred times, only to kick the bucket in the end. Makes you wonder how I've survived. Maybe clones are exempt from causality?"

Jason Alpha taps a watch on his wrist, and several weird holographic images pop up that I can barely wrap my head around. "Yeah, maybe. Anyway, I need to get going. I've gotta track Satan Prime down, so I'm going to make a pit stop and chat with my friends at the Time and Space Council, and see what we can do to find him." Alpha looks me right in the eye. "And we need to figure out who, or what, you are."

I give him my most innocent smile. "Still think I'm Hope? Don't you have any faith in me?"

"I'm just keeping an open mind." Jason Alpha taps his wrist to turn off the holograms. "Anyway, I'll be back in three RTU's. That's Real Time Units for the uninitiated. Harold, you're coming with me. Helen, you should stay behind and keep these kids company. I'm sure they have questions."

The older lady smiles with over-the-top saccharine sweetness at Jason Alpha. "Oh, you never let me have any fun. Still, you have a point... This young lady over here hasn't seen another angel in ages. Perhaps I'll introduce her to her missing family." Helen looks past Alpha at the place where he was fighting Satan several minutes ago. "By the way, what happened to that robot Satan was fighting?"

A silence falls across us as we glance around. From the darkness, Beelzebub suddenly emerges, a stupidly evil grin on his face. "You just noticed? And here I thought your bumbling cavalcade of idiocy might forget it entirely. The First Emperor took the Sentinel with him, of course. And now that he's gone, that makes me... the First Emperor. Heh heh heh."

Beelzebub grins at us for several moments, until I break the silence. "You know Alpha here can kill you instantly, right? Cassiel nearly blew Satan to kingdom come by herself, so I'm pretty sure you'd be no problem for her. I'd keep the evil laughter to a minimum if I were you."

The smile shatters. Beelzebub's shoulders sag forward, and his face melts into a puddle of disgust. "Curse you and everything for which you stand. Can't you let me have my moment of gloating? I fought for years, trying to climb my way to the top, and now that I have it, you can't give me five minutes of satisfaction?"

I feel kinda bad for Beelzebub. After all that he's been through, he arrives at the top of the food chain, only to realize he's entirely powerless, even compared to just his predecessor. After seeing the previous First Emperor get the living shit beaten out of him by our little group, Beelzebub has realized that if Satan couldn't beat us, then he doesn't stand a chance either.

Jason Alpha swaggers over to the newly minted First Emperor and slugs him playfully on the shoulder. "Oh, cheer up! This is the first universe I've seen you in for a long time, old buddy! Look at how you climbed the ladder of power! I'm proud of you!"

"I'd sooner die than listen to your condescension." Beelzebub rubs the spot where Alpha knuckled him, but he doesn't seem as angry as before. Rather, he's somewhat depressed. "To think, the First Emperor stole his lofty powers from humans. I never, in all my life-!" He trails off into a string of foul words that don't befit him, and all we can do is sigh.

Samantha stirs behind me and sits up to lean against the wall. "Beelzebub, ahh... perhaps it's time you rethought what your values are." She rubs her head and I only just now realize a bruise is forming on her face. "I've been trying to tell you this whole time that things aren't black and white. You can change demon society, just as you wanted to, but for the better."

For once, Beelzy doesn't call Samantha a human-lover or any other insult. He just bows his head and sighs. "You want demons to ally with humans. A stupid idea, if there ever was one. Our differences are too great to reconcile."

"I don't know about that," Alpha says, as he leans against the wall beside Ben. "I've seen a lot of universes. Many where I killed Satan early in the timeline eventually turn out reasonably okay. The four species aren't so different when you think about it. Two arms, two legs, two eyes, a mouth, hair, lungs, and a humanoid appearance. Monsters are the odd ones, but even they have similar characteristics. Once you get past the physical differences, it's only politics and grudges that divide us."

Beelzebub rolls his eyes. "I see that a few million years will improve your vocabulary, but won't do much for your reasoning skills. Maybe in those other universes demons and humans can shake hands and smile at each other, but those universes are not this one."

Samantha carefully pulls herself up to her feet. "Beelzebub, I think you're the one with the poor reasoning skills. Forgiveness isn't a sign of weakness, but of strength. To forgive the past, you have to let go of your hatred, and that takes strength. If you want to be a powerful leader, respected among your peers... then you should redefine what 'strength' means. Once you do that, the limitations you feel right now will disappear, and you will reach new heights that neither Satan nor Diablo ever could."

Helen claps all of a sudden, startling me. "She speaks wisdom, Beelzebub! You'll have more success redefining what it means to be a successful demon than fighting a war you can't win."

With a slow nod, Beelzebub turns away. "Your ideas have merit, but I can't bring myself to forgive humans, and especially Jason, for that matter. I'll never forget my humiliation."

It occurs to me what I've been misunderstanding all along about Beelzebub. It's not just his hatred of humans, but the consequences of my actions that have steeled his mind against rational thought. He's been wronged, and his response is to lash out at those who humiliated him.

Well, I know who caused all this.

Carefully, I take a step toward him. "Beelzebub, you know, I'm not asking you to forget what I did to you, but I think I owe you an apology. I don't want to give out any excuses, but in human years, I was one-third my current age. I made a lot of mistakes, and I'm sorry I did what I did. Killing you, just to bring you back and make you my servant was incredibly short-sighted and selfish of me."

I extend my hand toward the demon-emperor, and Beelzebub stares at it like it's a radioactive isotope. "You're apologizing? What purpose does that serve?"

"Humans apologize when they wrong each other. An apology is just a series of words, but it's what comes afterward- our actions, that determine if those words had any meaning. I'm not just going to apologize... I'm going to try and do what I can to repair the damage I've caused. Both to you, and to demons as a whole."

Faint electricity seems to jump from my outstretched hand to Beelzebub's eyes, as he continues to stare at it. Nobody says anything as they wait for his response.

"Reconciling with a human; something I've never done before. I don't want to do so now, but at the same time..." Beelzebub trails off and looks away, before catching me by surprise as he jerks and shoves his hand into mine, then shakes. "Devil's sake. Are all humans as melodramatic as you?"

Samantha exhales audibly. "No, that's a special trait of Jason's. You're doing the right thing, Beelzebub."

He quickly pulls his hand from mine, then wipes it on his suit jacket. "If you say so. I'm not so certain." He pauses a moment before turning away. "What I am, however, is a demon of honor. I never go back on my word. I'll at least consider your request."

Without saying goodbye, Beelzebub slowly walks away, fading into the darkness of the Labyrinth as we watch in silence.

Jason Alpha is the first to speak, once Beelzebub is gone. "Don't hate Beelzebub. He's one of the few who regularly breaks his mold. Most beings are good or evil across the entire multiverse, but he's been helpful on several occasions." Alpha licks his lips, then glances down at a device on his wrist. "Anyway. Harold, you and I need to start tracking Satan down. Knowing him, he'll try and slip away again, but we can catch him this time by following the trail Cassiel gave us."

Cass perks up. "The trail? Which one?"

Alpha points at a blip on his holo-watch. "You hit him with Holy Energy. Those wounds weren't repaired immediately, so that means he probably couldn't heal them. No way he'd leave himself exposed like that. The miasma leaking from his body will leave a trail across the multiverse I can easily follow. There's also the Sentinel he stole. I'd prefer not to take any chances on him figuring out how to reactivate it since he has all the time in the multiverse. Well, I do too, but that's beside the point."

I don't get a chance to ask what he means by that last part, because Harold jumps in. "Yeap, I figured ye'd wanna leave soon. Are ya sure ya don't want to stay for a day or two, then bounce later?"

"Nah. Now's fine. We'll come back soon, guys." He addresses the group with the final phrase, before patting Harold on the back and pulling the grandpa away from his wife. "As for you, other-Jason-guy... man, I need to give you an identifier. How about Sparky?"

"I'll pass," I say, dryly.

"Whatever you say, Sparky. Anyway, we'll be back in a few days, your time. I'll let you know when we catch him."

Ben chuckles. "You think you can catch him in three days? You're better than I thought."

"Huh? No, it'll probably take a few years, but I could return a minute from now if I wanted. You know how time works when you're a Traveler, right, buddy?"

Everyone except for Helen and Harold shake their heads.

"Oh, right. You guys are- never mind. It's too much of a hassle to explain. I'll tell you later." Jason Alpha grips Harold's shoulder, then winks at me. "See you later, space cowboy."

He and the old man vanish in a flash of light, leaving me to wonder what he meant by those parting words.

* * *

"Huaaah!" Tvoorik screams in his sleep all of a sudden, making me jerk up and smash my head on his cot above me. Just as I cringe and start rubbing the bump, the dumbass flops over and falls off his bed, smashing into the floor below. "Ahhh! It hurts! The pain!"

"Yeah, 'the pain' is right. Why are you hollering like that?! You're going to wake up everyone for ten sectors around if you keep-"

"Death! Destruction! An invasion from above! Like a wave of anguish, they'll sweep over us and take us for all we've got!" Tvoorik rolls around on the ground, whooping and shouting, and I quickly glance at the doorway. Any second now, the Lord who runs our sleeping division is going to arrive with that flaming whip of hers and give us a real lashing.

I quickly hop out of bed and deliver a gut-wrenching kick right to my idiot friend's stomach, knocking the wind out of him. His shouting instantly silences and he instead starts gasping for breath.

"Shut up, dumbass! Get ahold of yourself!" I quickly erect a barrier at the doorway to stifle the sound from our room, but I'm awful with magic so it'll probably only last a few minutes at best. If we're lucky, most of the other demons will roll back over, grumble a bit, and go to bed.

A minute later, Tvoorik finally opens his eyes and manages to suck in a gasp of air, before he glares at me. "Foul fiend! Why hath thou attacked me with thy unbidden rage?"

"Stop talking like that. You sound like an idiot pretending to be smart." I reach down and hoist my 'friend' up to his feet and lean him against the wall. "So you wanna tell me why you started howling like a banshee during sleeping hours? Lord Whipmaster wouldn't take kindly to you waking her up like the last fifty times."

Tvoorik rubs his forehead and moans quietly. "Oh, Ylvusk... it was bad... real bad. A nightmare, but I was there like it wasn't a dream at all. Geez, being a Seer sucks. I just know it had to be the future I saw."

"The future? Are you still going on about that nonsense?" I pause, remembering that it was an Emperor who told him what his ability entailed. If an Emperor says he can see the future, it's probably true. "Well, don't keep me waiting! What happens in the future?"

My friend nods glumly, a look of sadness etched in his eyes. "W-well, I saw a big army... they weren't demons, or humans, or angels, or volgrim... they were all of them together."

"Uh huh."

"And th-they had these scary weapons that could shoot big lasers, and there were a bunch of spaceships flying around this weird portal thing- and also an army of green-people who were spitting into the mouths of demons nearby, and there was also-"

I interrupt him. "You're losing me, Tvoorik. Green people? Spitting into mouths? What the hell are you going on about?"

He crumples his face up and slumps to the ground. "Aw, geez, Ylvusk. I don't know. The monsters were scary. Even the First Emperor would have trouble fighting them off. I saw how they turned demons and humans and all the others into monsters too. We kept losing, couldn't win a single battle."

"Well, that's grim, but it's just a dream. Even if it's a vision of the future, time isn't set in stone." I lean down to his level and am shocked to see tears rolling down his face. Tvoorik has always been a pretty upbeat guy, even when I called him an idiot or other stuff like that. Whatever he saw, it's hitting him hard.

"Y-you think so? You think we can win?" Tvoorik wipes at his eyes but the tears keep coming. "Shucks, she was so beautiful, too."

"She? Who?"

"The angel-lady. There was a beautiful angel, and all I felt was happiness whenever she appeared. She protected us from the monsters."

This change of scenery almost makes me laugh. "Beautiful, huh? What parts of her got you all hot and heavy? Maybe this dream is because you can't get a girlfriend, hehe."

Tvoorik doesn't smile or return the laugh. "It wasn't like that, Ylvusk. She was beautiful in a pure way. Like a... like a broodmother, or something."

I raise an eyebrow at the comparison. "Maybe it's been a while since you went to the Spawning Pits, but I think you've forgotten what broodmothers look like. Those giant, bulbous asses, big enough to spit out a fully-grown orc once every few months... the six hundred razor-sharp teeth, the ten eyes... man, no wonder you can't get a lady. Your standards for beauty are way off-

"I get it, geez! You know that's not what I meant!" Tvoorik glowers at me before turning his head away. "I hate being a Seer. I wish I'd never evolved. I know what every demon in the area is dreaming about, and their dreams mix with mine, and it gets all confusing... I can't even sort my own thoughts out! I can barely even think anymore!"

My friend is in pain. I can joke around and tease him all I like, but he's turning more unstable as time passes. Now he thinks green aliens are going to vomit in our mouths and convert us to their species or something. Then he starts developing mommy issues, and his head's going to explode if the pressure gets any worse.

"Maybe we should go chat with Diablo. He might know how to deal with your problems. Maybe he has magic that will turn your brain off while you sleep."

Tvoorik snuffles. "You think so, bestest buddy?"

"Uh huh. Let's go and talk to him. Diablo's a smart guy. I'm sure he knows a few people."

My friend and I share a smile, and for the first time in a while, everything feels like it's going to be okay.

"Hey, you worthless maggots!" A voice from the doorway makes him and I jump. I jerk my head to the left to look, and it's Lord Whipmaster! Shit! "You woke me up, stupid morons! I was having a great dream until your stupid voices screamed down the hallway!"

"S-sorry?" I offer a weak apology and swallow as she uncoils her whip of fire. Oh no.

"Yeah, you'll be real devil-damned sorry when I'm done with you two!"

Broodmommy, give us the endurance to survive.

Part 472c: Murderer

A waning sun in the sky illuminates the streets of Hero City enough that the boy and girl can just barely make out the faces of the shopkeepers closing up their stalls for the day. A cold breeze blows down the streets, an artificial effect created by the god who formed this world in the past ages.

"It's just up the street, Alex," The girl says. Her curly brown hair bounces around every time she takes a step, and her high-heeled boots click against the cobblestone streets. Despite her stunning good-looks, she isn't particularly upbeat or perky. Indeed, her eyes dart from the left to the right as she walks, observing nearby doorways and people walking around.

"You're sure he's over here? Mum says not to go far from home..." Alex trails off, unsure how to stand up for himself. He turned ten a few weeks ago, so resisting a pretty girl is harder for him than it used to be. Plus, with her big thick-rimmed glasses, the girl looks a lot like his teacher from school. Always do what the teacher tells you, he thinks, remembering his mother's words from a few years before. He's a good boy, so he always does what he's told.

"It's just a block away, silly! Surely you've gone this far without asking your mother." The girl teases him, but there's an edge to her voice. "I saw the man up here. You said he was from your church?"

"Uh-huh," Alex replies. "Mister Jones. He hasn't been heard from in a week..." Alex swallows, remembering the stories he's heard about a vicious demon on the loose abducting people and experimenting on them while they begged for help. Still, as the Divine Mother told him, not all demons are bad, and she even said her best friend was a demon! Yeah, I can't treat all demons like they're evil, Alex thinks, as he glances carefully up at the side of the girl's face. Most demons have blood-red skin, but hers is creamy, just like his. Her eyes have that red tone that all demons possess, but somehow they also make him feel good when she looks at him.

The girl slows to a stop and turns to look down a dark alley. "Mister Jones is right that way." She points at a garbage can shrouded in the dim light between the two buildings. A man's leg and shoe are visible behind the can as if he's sleeping in the only place available.

Alex trembles slightly. "M-mister Jones? Mister Jones!" He calls out, but the man doesn't respond. "Rosie, I'm... I'm scared of the dark."

"Oh, come on. It's not even dark, Alex. You can see in there and everything. Just go wake him up!" She gives Alex a nudge forward, but his knees shake a little.

"I really don't wanna..."

Rosie sighs audibly as if Alex is just being a big baby. Okay, fine, I'll light it up for us." With a quick movement of her hands, she holds her palm up, and a small flame appears, suspended in midair. It pierces up the growing darkness enough that Alex can even see the dimples on her face.

The boy takes a step back in surprise. "You... you can make f-fire?"

"It's just magic, Alex. All demons have magic, you know." Her smile cracks ever so slightly as she glances at the bum sleeping behind the dumpster. "Of course, some demons mutate and gain offensive magic and lots of energy while others gain useless seduction and illusion arts, but beggars can't be choosers, as they say."

Alex nods, but the uneasiness in his stomach doesn't go away. With the girl behind him, he slowly creeps toward the old man. "Mister Jones? Are you okay?" As he nears the dumpster, Alex spots the man's other leg, though something about it looks unnatural. The bottom half of the pant leg is missing, and his foot isn't turned the right way. A shiver goes down Alex's back as he creeps forward and sees the man's body. Despite Rosie's flame, she's far enough behind him that the dumpster blocks most of the light... but Mister Jones looks an awful lot like he's...

"A pity this is all the flame I can manage," the girl mutters. "Mister Beelzebub would be very very disappointed in me."

Alex opens his mouth, but he can't bring himself to speak. Tears form and slowly crawl down his face as Rosie walks a little closer and the light from the flame finally illuminates the old man's desiccated corpse. His entire right arm is missing, along with most of his face. The wall behind him is covered in dried blood, and chunks of his body can be seen here and there.

"H-he... he... he-" Alex stutters uncontrollably, barely able to get a word out. "Muh-mister J-J-Jones..." His stomach flips and spins inside of him and every bone in his body screams to run, but the spasming horror in his body prevents him from moving. The alley is a dead end. The only way to escape is to run past the girl with the fire in her hand.

"Dead, yes. I killed him, of course." Rosie trots forward, grabs Alex by his shirt with her free hand, then yanks his shivering body toward her. With the flame in her other hand, she plunges the ball of fire into his throat, causing Alex to scream, but the sound doesn't escape his mouth as the skin and muscle below it melt together. She tosses Alex lightly, sending him flying twenty feet down the alley, where he smashes against a wall and flops to the ground, writhing in pain.

I can't breathe! I can't breathe! Help! Help me, Mum!! Alex's internal voice screams as Rosie's high-heeled boots click toward him, but no matter how he tries, he can't force a sound out. The smell of his own melting flesh fills his nostrils, and the pain is just seconds from causing him to blackout. Alex realizes with a start that this is how Mister Jones must have felt. She's the demon! She's killing everyone! I should have listened! Mum! Mum, help me!

She kneels down and pats the boy on the back. "It's been three weeks since I caught a kid alone, Alex. Your friend, Susie... she gave me a lot of energy, you know. Old men and women don't transfer much- and they always taste like tobacco or alcohol. Once I consume your essence, I'll surely mutate into something more powerful. After that happens Mister Beelzebub will have to acknowledge me." Her cheeks turn a rosy red as she imagines the passionate embrace he'll surely give her once she's revealed her murderous deeds. 'How good of you to kill the filthy humans, my beloved. I always knew you had it in you.'

Alex cranes his head up and tries to beg for mercy. His mouth opens, but no words come out. I'm sorry! I'm sorry! Please don't hurt me! Please, it hurts! Make it stop!

"Your first mistake was getting my name wrong. 'Rosie' is not a noble name, Alex. Beelzebub would never love a demoness whose name gave such a feeling of peasantry. It's Rosalia. Ro-sal-ia. " She hisses out her name the second time and glares at the boy before violently lunging her hand forward and slapping him, sending him smashing against a wall.

This time, her blow leaves Alex crumpled and broken in a corner. His right arm and several ribs shatter, but he can't feel the pain anymore. Unable to breathe, unable to feel pain, the world darkens before him. He stares at her silently as she trudges forward, glancing behind herself to look for witnesses. Nobody's there, Alex realizes. The two of them are all alone.

He blinks one last time as she kneels down and opens her mouth. "Thank you for dinner!"

A warmth covers his body. As his eyes close, a strange thought enters his mind. She disappeared. Just like I will.

He didn't deserve to die like this. Alex knows that much, but the world is unfair. Sometimes the weak and innocent are murdered by those with more power. If only he'd listened to his Mum, it could all have been-

A strange feeling enters his body all of a sudden. Reflexively, Alex coughs, and spits blood all over the ground before inhaling sharply. His throat is healed! Alex's eyes shoot open, and he screams out loud, unable to control himself.

It takes a moment for him to understand what he's looking at. He's still in the alley, but the walls drip with a horrific amount of blood. Entrails and bone litter the corridor, and Alex stares in shock at his body, noticing that the blood is all over himself as well, but it isn't his.

"Alex? Alex! Are you okay?" A familiar voice calls to him, and he glances up and spots a familiar face. "D-Divine Mother?"

Cassiel, the Divine Mother, stands just in front of him, tears streaming down her face. "Oh, thank the heavens! I'm here for you; I'm here!" She quickly leans down and hugs him, picking him up in the process and pulling him away from the scene of the carnage. "It's okay; she's gone. She's gone. She won't hurt you, Alex."

The boy nods as terror and exhilaration give way to numbness. For some reason, he can't feel any emotions. Everything that just happened to him feels distant, as if it happened to one of his friends from school. "Thank you... Divine Mother."

A moment later, she lowers Alex to the ground and quickly pulls his eye open, and scrutinizes his figure. Alex notices her white robes are filthy and covered with blood, likely from when she picked him up and carried him. "No broken bones, no lacerations... how do you feel, Alex?"

"I'm sure he's fine, Cass." A man's voice from behind Alex frightens him, and he jumps forward and cowers near the warmth of the Divine Mother and the light her body produces naturally. Alex's eyes jerk to the source of the voice, and he spots the figure of the God-King, the almighty deity who formed the angels with the power of a single word. The God-King smiles at Alex, then looks over at the Divine Mother. "Christ, we're lucky we made it. That satellite was a good investment."

"Jason, now's not the time." The Divine Mother's voice has a tone of caution in it, and Alex realizes she's worried about him. "Hurry up and clean him. You don't want the boy to be scarred for life, do you?"

"Scarred?" Alex echoes her choice of words, not sure what she means. "Where's Rosie? What happened to Rosie?"

"Rosie?" The God-King raises an eyebrow. "Is that the name of the demon who attacked you?"

"Uh huh..." Alex curls up into a ball as the memories come rushing back. The cold, flat expression on her face, and the way she eyed him as a piece of meat give Alex spasms as he suddenly fights the urge to vomit.

"Clean. Calm." The man says two words, and suddenly Alex's nausea vanishes, along with the entrails covering his body. Alex stares at the ground for a moment, thinking silent thoughts. I want to cry, but I can't. I want to scream, but I can't. I want my Mum.

"Jason, stop using your powers as a band-aid. Let the boy cry." The Divine Mother helps Alex to his feet, before slowly walking him away from the alley. "Let's get you home, Alex. Where does your mother live?"

Thoughts come to Alex more easily than he thinks they should. "Five blocks away, Divine Mother, to the North. What about Mister Jones?"

The angel smiles quickly, as if to assure him that everything is all right. "Um, we'll give him help, okay? You just worry about yourself for now. I'll take care of everything."

I'll take care of everything, Alex thinks, echoing her words in his mind.

A few minutes later, Alex steps into his house, and his mother weeps as she praises and lauds the Divine Mother and the God-King for saving her son, but Alex can barely understand her through all of the crying and wailing. While his mother sobs and thanks the heavens, all the boy can do is stare blankly at the wall behind her.

It's the only thing he can feel, as that familiar numbness overtakes him, once again.

* * *

Cassiel sighs as we walk away from the kid's house. "What a mess. I haven't seen horrors like that outside of war."

I nod as the memory of the walls covered in blood surfaces in my mind. "My satellite worked perfectly, but it's a shame about the old man. He must have died a week ago before I built it. Does the name 'Rosie' ring any bells?"

My girlfriend shakes her head as I teleport us back to the castle. "I have a vague memory, but nothing concrete. Anyway, your death machine killed her, so I guess it doesn't matter anymore."

I pause to talk to a guard at the castle entrance, informing him of the murder, and he promises to dispatch a team to clean the alley up and bury the old man's body. Then, I turn back to Cassiel. "If Rosie was the only killer, then we're fine, but there may be more of them. Kinda hard to interrogate a corpse." I pause, searching her face. "Also, that 'death machine' saved the poor kid's life. If it hadn't vaporized her, then pinged me, he'd be dead."

"I know, I know." Cassiel sulks for a moment. "You should build another satellite."

"Come again?"

"You heard me. This time, build a first-response satellite that stuns the attacker. That should be possible, right? Just suppress their neural stimulation and agitate the relevant-" Cassiel pauses, seeing a smile on my face. "What? Did I say something funny?"

"You're such a nerd, Cass. But yeah, I'll do that. Good idea. Another option is police-bots to patrol the streets, but the idea creeps me out." I wave at Samantha and Helen as we head over to them.

Samantha's worried expression melts away as I give her a quick hug. "You guys left in a hurry. One second you were here, the next you said "Teleport," and then Cass vanished along with you. What gives?"

"Sorry, it was an emergency. I would've brought you and Helen along but..." I pause, realizing I'll sound like an asshole if I say 'but you've gone through enough since your ex-boyfriend nearly gave you a concussion'. Better switch gears. "...but I forgot."

"Ah. It's no big deal since you both came back in one piece. What happened?"

I take a minute to explain to her the gruesome scene we arrived at, and Samantha scrunches her face up. "Rosie? You said that was what the boy called her?"

"Mhm."

"Didn't Beelzebub have a girlfriend or whatever? Her name was Rosalia." Samantha finally mentions the name that was in my mind, and I quickly remember the girl's face and mannerisms.

"Oh, shoot, you're right. I forgot. I'm surprised you remembered. Isn't your memory usually awful?"

Samantha shrugs. "I saw the girl running around doing things now and then. Talked to her once or twice. The fact she was the killer doesn't surprise me, given her mental imbalance."

Cassiel jumps behind Samantha and wraps her arms around Sam's waist. "Heehee, you're a real psychologist, Sammy. What imbalance are you talking about, anyway?"

Samantha clasps Cass's hands in hers. "You didn't notice? She was head over heels for Beelzebub. All she ever did was talk about him, but I don't think he cared much about her, if at all."

"Explains a lot," I chime. "Kinda fucked-up she'd murder people over it, though. Why would she even do that?"

Helen's been quietly watching us, but she decides to offer her thoughts now. "Demons derive power from human souls. The Styx River takes the souls of dead humans and stores them, then the souls are given to demons the Emperors feel are deserving, but it's possible to bypass the approval process..." She trails off, and I swallow.

"What, by drinking from the source?"

"You guessed it." Helen looks away, a moment of trepidation in her eyes. "Horrible. Still, it's hard to call demonkind monsters, given my knowledge of angelkind. Bloodline discrimination, treating human converts like second-class citizens. Humans are either devoured by demons or turned into cannon fodder by angels."

Samantha is upset by the path the conversation has taken, though it's for a reason that surprises me. "Don't knock the angels. They gave humans a strong new body, with wings, and energy to keep them alive. They're the lesser of two evils."

"I suppose," Helen replies, keeping her voice neutral.

From across the yard, a man calls to me. "Hey, Hero! Jason!" I turn around to look, and spot King Cody Elshard traipsing across the grass toward our group. "I heard what happened. Your robot went berserk and cut down hundreds of my best soldiers."

I grimace, remembering that I was worried about what his reaction would be. "I guess 'sorry' doesn't cut it. I don't know what to say, Cody."

The king shakes his head and stops a dozen feet away, glancing at Helen with interest before turning back to me. "They were part of the forward guard and wore some of our best neo-armor. How am I supposed to replace them? What if another horde of demons attacks tomorrow?"

Samantha growls, deep in her throat, but Cody doesn't hear it. "They won't. The leader of the demons was Satan. He's fled to another... well, to the future, I suppose. Beelzebub is the new First Emperor of the demons."

King Elshard looks at her blankly for a few moments. "Beelzebub. The demon who walked among my palace staff? Is he a mole for us?"

I wince, knowing he won't like what he's about to hear. "No, he's just another one of my screw-ups. He despises humanity, but I believe we've taken care of him. We made him see the light during our last battle." I think, my mind whispers. Shut up!

Exhaling slowly, the king shakes his head. "A demon traitor was in our midst, my best men are cut down, and Humanity is backed into a corner, trapped in this city and a few outer worlds. Things look grim. Not to mention those green monsters you told me about."

"Green monsters?" I pause, trying to figure out what he's referring to. "The Kolvaxians?"

Helen interrupts before the king can reply. "What did you just say?" Her voice is ice.

"They're an alien species. I don't know much about them, other than they infect-"

She interrupts me again. "I know what the Kolvaxians are, but how could you possibly know of them? They've only appeared in one universe. We've been cautious about keeping them contained. I thought you said you weren't a Traveler?"

I still don't know what a Traveler is, but I try to keep my tone neutral, seeing a rising panic in her eyes. "I have yet to see them, but a reliable source has informed me that they exist in this galaxy. They pour in through a wormhole... or something. I don't know much about them beyond that."

Helen clenches and unclenches her fist, a nervous movement she isn't consciously performing. "No no no... they can't be here. It's impossible. Jason Alpha will shit fifty trillion bricks if he finds out." I've never heard her curse, so her sudden shift in tone makes me cringe. "The Kolvaxians have all but overtaken the K-universe. We had to deploy several clones many RTU's ago just to contain the spread of the infection. If they're spreading to other universes, it's a catastrophe on-par with, or exceeding, the Satan Protocol."

She's babbling about a lot of jargon I don't understand, but whatever has her spooked, it's basically the end of days.

"Okay. Well, can you contact Jason Alpha, have him come back? If he doesn't know about them, he should."

The elderly angel shakes her head slowly. "I didn't think I'd need my dilation transponder. He'll be back in a few RTU's, so we can just wait it out, but in the meantime, I need to find out the scope of the infection. How far have they spread? What are their numbers? Where do they originate from? What do-"

I raise my palm up to silence her. "I don't have the answers, Helen. Instead of asking me, we should find someone who knows. The Volgrim are battling them now, so they probably have the most updated information."

She nods and a look of relief floods her face. "Good, that's very good. The Volgrim alone are not nearly enough to stop the infection, nor to contain it, but the fact we're talking right now and the Labyrinth isn't overrun by them means the Volgrim must have the fighting capacity to slow them down and buy us time. Since they control the galaxy unopposed in this universe, that also means they've built up quite a reserve fleet."

Helen's relief is immediately washed away by Cassiel's quick, throwaway statement. "Oh. We accidentally wiped out a bunch of their reserves."

"Eh?" Helen blinks and wipes her forehead. "You uh... did what, now?"

"Not us, specifically... that Sentinel went berserk and tore a fleet that was attacking us to ribbons."

Several moments pass, and a smile freezes on Helen's face.

"Well, son of a biscuit."

Part 473c: The Turduckians

Tvoorik moans and whines as we travel the winding maze of the Labyrinth, stumbling against the wall every so often and letting out a pitiful yelp. I tried helping him along for a while until I realized what was really going on.

"Oh, the pain! The pain! My poor, aching head! I need medical! I need surgery!" Tvoorik wails again as we pass by a group of orcs, and all six of them glare at us before rolling their eyes and walking past. ' Stupid halfwits, ' one of them says. Hey, don't lump me in with Tvoorik!

Tvoorik mumbles and grumbles until we pass a Nymph, whose antenna glows enough to light the path in front of her. She holds a scroll in her hand and seems transfixed on whatever it says- right up until Tvoorik lets out his loudest yelp of pain yet. "Ahh, it's like a knife in my brain! A three-thousand degree knife plunged into my eyeballs! Make the pain stop, make it stop!"

She quickly lowers the scroll and picks up her pace and nearly runs past us, but this time I've had enough. Once she's out of earshot, I slug Tvoorik in the shoulder. "Will ya come off it already?! Seven Devils, every ding-damn demon and monster to the end of the nexus can hear your hollering and moaning!"

He rubs one of the fresh burn marks on his back. "B-b-but, Ylvusk, the crazy bitch lashed you too! How come you aren't in pain like me? I also have the seizures too! You can't understand how bad it hurts!"

"You need to knock it off with the whining. I know you're just trying to make everyone pity you, and it's getting on my nerves! You only moan like that whenever we pass someone! You're embarrassing me!" A vein bulges in my forehead as every muscle in my arm screams at me to slap the doofus. "Besides, ranting about 'green people this' and 'green people that' makes you look like more of a weirdo than the conspiracies did!"

Tvoorik's lip trembles and he lowers his head, then kicks a pebble at his feet. "Well, I mean, I can't help it. There's just so much pain..." He freezes for a moment, then quickly moves to cough into his fist. "Kah! In more ways than one. I'm connected to the demons in the Labyrinth like never before. All these thoughts, emotions, fear, and pain swirling in my head... If Diablo doesn't help me stop the pain, I'm gonna..." He quickly looks away and starts strolling down the hallway, leaving his ominous words hanging in the air.

I jump back into step and squint at him. "You'll do what? Off yourself? You've gotta be kidding."

He shakes his head, slowly. "I never thought I'd be an Oracle, let alone the first unique mutation. Those conspiracies I used to think about... they were right and wrong, but the scariest part is that the reality is worse than my imagination."

"What do you mean by 'worse'?"

A look of unease forms on Tvoorik's face. "Forget it. I shouldn't say. Oracles aren't allowed to disclose Labyrinth secrets to non-oracles lower than a Duke."

Well, that's a sorry excuse if I ever heard one. "C'mon, just tell me."

"If I can read the minds and know all that's going on in the Labyrinth, it's likely other Oracles can, too. I shouldn't."

We round the corner and the Blood Pits appear before us. I sigh at his stubbornness like I always do. "Fine, fine. Let's just find Diablo and see if he can help you."

Tvoorik touches his lip and stops. "Why don't you trust me?"

"Huh? What's with the loaded question?"

"I can read your mind," he mutters before turning back to the Regeneration Alcoves. "You think I'm lying and that I'm not bound by the rules of the Oracles. Hell, you don't even believe they exist."

My mood sours. "Okay, maybe a little bit. Can you blame me? I got whipped because of you. The burns still sting."

The fact Tvoorik's not whining and crying anymore tells me he really was just faking those screams for attention. One thing I've started noticing is that his vocabulary is improving quickly. He isn't quite as happy-go-lucky as he used to be, either. Hell, he's capable of critical thinking now when he wasn't before. I think he might be growing used to the pain of all the voices in his head.

Tvoorik nods as an imp strolls up to us, a wooden pad in his hand. "We're here to see Diablo."

The imp, barely two feet tall, is dwarfed by our presence. He glances at my menacing shadow-walker body and shivers before turning back to Tvoorik. "Nyeh! No visitors without an appointment! Lord Diablo has been placed in the custody of His Majesty, the First Emperor of Flames, Beelzebub!"

I raise an eyebrow. " Lord Diablo? So... it's true? Beelzebub took his power? He's no longer an Emperor?"

The imp stares at me like I'm the stupidest dummy in the whole Labyrinth. "Obviously! He's lucky to be a Lord, given how little energy he has left! At this point, I could probably kill him myself! Nyeh heh heh!" The imp lets out a shrill laugh that makes me cringe since it reminds me of not so many years ago before I'd earned my first mutation. "Anyway, you'll have to ask Emperor Beelzebub! Now begone, or I'll summon Hellga! She'll flatten you on your ass!"

"Are you threatening us, Master Jenoth?" Tvoorik suddenly kneels down and glares into the imp's face. "Yes, I know your name. I am the Seer, the most powerful of all the Oracles in the Labyrinth. I know every thought in your tiny brain, every worry, even trifles such as your lust for one of the Sirens in the Weeping Lake. Perhaps you should show us the courtesy of taking us to see Diablo, and I should show you respect by not revealing your bizarre taste in females to your fellow imps. I know well what imps do to their ostracized brethren."

The imp, apparently named Jenoth, stares for a few seconds, his eyes bulging. "W-well, when you... when you put it that way..."

"You're a smart one, Jenoth. Hop to it, then."

The imp swallows reflexively before forcing a smile and rubbing his hands together. "Y-yes! Come along! Jenoth will show you there!" He scurries away, all too eager to take us to Diablo and get out of our path.

I glance at Tvoorik, a newfound realization of his abilities. Of course, he can probably read the awe in my eyes... along with the fear. "How did you think of that so quickly?"

A shrug. "My mental acuity is sharpening at an accelerating rate. Head still hurts, but the pain is suddenly more bearable."

Mental acuity. The Tvoorik I know would never say words like that. He's just not that sharp.

Minutes crawl by as the imp beckons repeatedly. "Come on, demons. It's a little way to go, yet! Jenoth will show you the way."

I gaze around at the sick and injured demons stumbling and kneeling, some with limbs missing, others who stare vacantly forward, as if they've seen one of the many Ghosts in the Labyrinth. However, I quickly realize that what I see is only the surface level, while Tvoorik gazes below the surface.

"That one, Griknash, lost a mate." He subtly points out an orc as we pass by the monster. "Humans killed her with one of their 'boomsticks.' They raided an Orc Nursery. Female orcs care for the young; they don't fight battles. Since orcs bond for life, his heart was torn to shreds by her death."

"Heart?" I echo Tvoorik's words. "I thought Orcs were just dumb killing machines."

Tvoorik shakes his head. "That's what most demons picture when they think of orcs, including myself until I became a Seer. Griknash was shamed, along with his fellow tribe members, despite not being at fault for the humans attacking the nursery. He was on a raid, fighting a rival tribe during the pillage. To restore his honor, he launched a sneak attack on those who killed his mate, but he failed, and they got away. He lost his right eye in the ambush, and now he has nothing left. No honor, no mate, no spawn, and half the vision compared to what he had."

I eye Tvoorik carefully as he says this. "Yeah? You don't look very shaken up about it."

"I'm not. It has nothing to do with me. Just an observation."

We make our way past a group of goblins cackling about something, but Tvoorik aims his eyes up ahead. "Diablo's up there, in that walled-off room. The one with the guards at the entrance. He's in pain, but otherwise mobile. His thoughts are a scattered mess. Hard to pick anything specific out."

"Maybe he's still frightened by the ass-whipping Beelzebub gave him. Right, Tvoorik?" I flash a smile at him, but he ignores me.

As we approach the Lord-level guards, neither of whom are wearing any armor or holding any weapons, one of them holds his palm up. "Hold. Identify yourself. Only authorized visitors may see Lord Diablo."

Tvoorik squints at the demon as if trying to focus his mind for a moment. The fellow's slicked-back hair, black like most demons, and ruby-red skin, are nothing special, but the way he holds himself is like that of nobility, groomed for success. He appears to take pride in his post guarding the former Third Emperor, but that's all I can figure out on a surface level. The padded suit makes him look more intimidating than he probably is, but I wouldn't fight a Lord unless my life depended on it.

"Beelzebub sent us. The password is 'The Fire Lily blooms twice a year.' I believe that will suffice."

The guard immediately nods. "Ah, sorry for questioning you, sir. Orders are orders. Step right in."

"I will. Thank you." Tvoorik smoothes his robes and acts bored, as though this is nothing out of the ordinary for him. When did he become such a good actor?

The guard quickly pulls out a key and unlocks the door. Tvoorik pretends he's someone influential, and barely nods at the Lord. Before we can step inside, the Lord crinkles his nose.

"Sorry to be a bother sir, but the Shadow-walker has to stay outside. We're worried about potential... assassination threats." He winces as if expecting a rebuke, but Tvoorik just nods.

"I understand. I'll let Emperor Beelzebub know you said that."

"What?" The guard pales and looks at his friend. "W-what do you mean by that?"

"I'll let him know you said I couldn't bring my personal guard. What was your name, by the way?"

"Uhh..." The demon swallows audibly. "It's Sir... Sir... you know what? It's fine. Go on in, you both look trustworthy."

"That's very kind of you. Come along, Ylvusk."

I nod at him, then glance back, looking for the imp. He must have vanished when I wasn't paying attention. Slippery little dick.

A few moments later, the giant door creaks shut behind us, leaving us standing in a narrow hallway. A wood floor and walls greet us, standing out compared to the Labyrinth I know. A few candles are lit, here and there, but it's hard to see, or at least it would be, were I not a Shadow-walker.

With all the darkness around, I stretch out my consciousness and detect Diablo moving in an adjacent room, but Tvoorik starts moving toward it anyway.

"Looks like Bael's here too. I wonder why," I say.

"We'll soon find out," Tvoorik says, his voice nearly a whisper.

Tvoorik pushes the door to the next room open, and a stench hits me that nearly knocks me off my feet. Like a wild dog, my eyes convulse and narrow in on Bael, his body covered in dried blood. It's turned brown by this point, but he hasn't a care in the world. He lounges on a couch, laying on his side and watching as Diablo paces back and forth, whose body is covered in blood as well, but under his robes. The room is nearly barren, save a table, some chairs, and a mess of crumpled up papers tossed to the side. Both of them notice us almost immediately, but neither smile and greet us like they usually would.

Diablo barely pays attention to me but instead squints at Tvoorik. "Who're you, and why'd you bring the backup? Need protection? Or maybe you're here to give me more excuses."

Tvoorik squints again, but this time, some of the confidence in his voice from earlier is missing. "Ehh, you probably don't recognize me. He's Ylvusk, and I'm Tvoorik. I evolved."

Diablo pauses his pacing to glare at us. "That's nice. I don't care. Did Beelzebub send you?"

A moment passes before Tvoorik responds, and he's still squinting like he's trying to concentrate, but veins bulge on his forehead. Whatever he's trying to do, he isn't having much success. "No. I came here to ask you a few questions. I evolved into a unique form of Oracle, and I'm having major issues focusing. My head feels as if it's going to explode."

For the second time today, the two of us are stared at like we're the biggest idiots of all time. Bael chuckles. "Kukuku, at least they came here for somethin' important, right Deebs?"

"Shut up." Diablo rubs his forehead. "The Labyrinth hangs on the brink of destruction, and you pester me about a migraine?"

Evidently, Tvoorik gives up trying to concentrate, since he pulls back and mirror's Diablo's movements by rubbing his own forehead. "Brink of destruction? Did I miss the memo?"

"Yes. You did." The former Third Emperor resumes his pacing and throws his hands in the air. "I needed a reply two days ago! Two days! The Volgrim are probably already dead. The monsters killed them. That Beelzebub is just worthless. I thought he might accomplish something, but he's so fixated on the humans he's missing the bigger picture!"

"Calm down, Deebs. You ain't gonna fix anything by grumbling all the time. Bad for your heart, too." Bael sticks his finger in his nose and pulls it back, revealing something disgusting enough that I immediately look away. A sickening slurping noise from his side of the room makes my stomach churn. "Everyone knows zombies are weak to fire. Once he puts it all together, those alien freaks won't stand a chance. Relax."

"I can't relax! I gave him my power so that I could, but I can't!" Diablo hisses under his breath. "Stupid, stupid moron."

I decide to butt in. "What do you mean by 'zombies' and 'aliens'? Are you talking about the Volgrim?"

"The Volgrim are history. Probably dead." Diablo pivots on his heel, marches over to the table and grabs a small gadget, not unlike something I'd expect the humans to use. He presses the screen, and a bunch of words appear, though I can't read any of them from my angle. "They sent me a coded communication through my holopad. I can barely work the damn thing, but the SOS said they were under attack and needed assistance from the demons immediately." He exhales slowly. "The Volgrim have never asked for help from our kind. Either because of pride or trust issues, they refused even when I offered. If they needed our assistance, the situation was dire."

"It's probably nothing," Bael muses. "Even if it was, the Volgrim always lord their authority. I don't give a crap if they get killed. Serves 'em right."

Tvoorik slowly licks his lips. "Better the devil you know than the devil you don't. The ones who attacked the Volgrim might be-

"They are." Diablo cuts Tvoorik off, his voice cold. "Kolvaxians. The Volgrim were delivering irregular reports to me that hinted the Kolvaxians were gaining more and more control of the galaxy. The last report I received said that Jason Hiro, along with that Sentinel of his, destroyed a large portion of the Volgrim reserve fleets. Then I received the S.O.S. requesting assistance..." Diablo shakes his head. "It's been two days. Beelzebub must be ignoring the messengers I sent him, thinking he's too high and mighty to listen to what I have to say."

My friend is uncertain of what to say, but after a few seconds, he speaks up. "You shouldn't have lost to Beelzebub if that were the case."

"Huh? I didn't lose. I gave him my energy freely." Diablo rolls his eyes. "Is that what the rumors say; that he defeated me in combat, or something silly like that? Even missing half of my shoulder, fighting Beelzebub would be like dropping an Orc on an Imp."

"It's not exactly a rumor..." Tvoorik says, trailing off. "He announced it to the Lord and Dukes. He said he crushed you and Bael in combat."

A moment passes, and I glance over at Bael to see a bone-chilling smile on his face. "He did, huh? That's cute. I'll have to ask him about that, next time I see him."

"Now's not the time, Bael. Anyway, if you two are here, maybe you can do something to help. Whatever those Kolvaxians are, they're a threat that terrifies the Volgrim. If the leaders of Demon-kind won't take action, perhaps the humans will. You should contact the Hero and see if he can assist the Volgrim, assuming it isn't already too late."

"That sounds reasonable," Tvoorik responds quickly, before freezing up. "Wait- no. What are you saying? You want us to talk to humans? Have you gone mad?!"

Diablo holds his palms up and turns to face us. "Calm down. The Hero isn't all that bad. I beat the crap out of him before Belial returned the favor. We had a quick chat before that, and he's been taking marked steps to improve relations between demons and humans." The giant demon sighs. "I wish I'd noticed sooner. It was only after I gave Beelzebub my energy in a moment of weakness that I finally had the time to sit back and relax. Then I realized my mistake."

Bael snickers. "Pft, and I always thought you were the smart Emperor."

"Smarter than you," Diablo says, as he steps forth and rests his hand on Tvoorik's shoulder. "The humans are terrible in many ways, but so are demons. So are the Volgrim. It doesn't mean we can't come to an agreement. If you find and warn Jason Hiro, he might be able to save us in time."

Tvoorik glances at me. "What do you think? Never mind, I already know."

"Funny."

He pulls Diablo's hand off. "I thought you hated being an Emperor, yet here you are, trying to lead again. Were you secretly power-hungry all along?"

"No. It was never about my desire to lead, but the futility in trying. I was third on the food chain. The First Emperor always loomed in the background, and angering him was the last thing I wanted to do. Belial was never an issue, not until recently, but the monumental difference in power between myself and the First made me not care about changing the status quo."

"Self preservation," Tvoorik mutters. "What makes you think things will change now? The First may override you anyway."

"I expect he will, but it's Beelzebub who takes the fall now, and not myself. Besides, that's why you need to warn the humans. If the First decides to ignore the Kolvaxians, the humans will be the only thing stopping the Labyrinth from being destroyed."

"And if they decide to kill the messenger..." My friend hisses nervously. "You know Ylvusk and I killed a bunch of humans in our last raid, right? That's why I became a Seer."

Diablo laughs. "Hah! All demons look the same to a human. Besides, you're an Oracle. You can read minds. I'm certain you'll be able to convince them."

Tvoorik rubs his forehead again. "Only if I can stop this damn migraine. Don't you know any tricks? Anything at all?"

"Obviously." Diablo grunts, then reaches up and presses a thumb to Tvoorik's forehead. "I was an Oracle for several years, you know. So was Satan, but Belial skipped that evolution and mutated into a different branch. Your migraine and torrent of thoughts are due to your inability to focus the mental energy properly. It's a hurricane in your mind, but you need to soothe it, and turn it into a focused marble that moves from place to place." He laughs. "Haha, and maybe you'll have better luck trying to read my mind. Oracles can't read the minds of past or present Oracles. Still, it's funny to feel you trying."

With a chuckle, Tvoorik closes his eyes and strains. "Sorry. I didn't mean to be rude, Emperor Diab-

"Lord, not Emperor. The old title doesn't fit my position anymore. Now shut up and focus your mana at the point where my thumb is. Breathe. Relax. Do this several times. You'll be able to stop the pain that way."

While those two do their exercises, I saunter over to Bael. He barely even looks at me. "What?"

"That's what I want to ask you. Aren't you still a Duke? Why are you even here? You could easily beat the crap out of the Lords out front. You don't have to stay here."

The giant demon smirks. "Like I give a shit. I work for Diablo, not that snot-nosed runt. Even with Diablo's power, one glance from me 'n he took off running. Besides, Diablo's right. I just wanna lay around and be lazy. Getting the shit kicked out of me ain't fun, ya know?"

"I guess. What's up with the blood?" I gesture at the smelly residue covering his body, and Bael shrugs.

"We have to leave it on, for a while. Hellga's rules. It's pretty calming, actually. You should try out the pits sometime. Tastes great, too."

"I'll take your word on it. I hope someone cleaned the blood out after you were done with it."

Bael raises his middle finger to me. "Up yours. You're just jealous of my good looks, stinky."

Diablo and Tvoorik finish up in the corner, so I roll my eyes at Bael. "Nice projection, Duke of Chains. I'll be seeing you around."

"I hope not."

Tvoorik nods at me as I walk over. "Diablo's right! That worked swell, buddy!"

"Good to hear." I watch as he chats with Diablo for a few minutes, and a thought occurs to me. His speech has become less sophisticated all of a sudden. The result of learning to control his abilities?

"You're the best, Diablo! I'll make sure 'n let that Jasper fellow know about the Turduckians."

Diablo's eye twitches. " Jason. Kolvaxians. Lucifer's Ghost, maybe I helped you out a little too much. Get moving; time's running short."

"Caaaan do!" Tvoorik nudges me. "C'mon pal, let's bust this joint."

"Yup."

As we stroll out the front door, Tvoorik smiles jovially at the guard from before, whose body shakes as we walk past. "You're doin' a great job! I'll make sure Beelzebub knows how helpful you were!"

The demon Lord calms down noticeably. "Really? Oh, I thank you very much for your kindness!"

Once we're out of earshot, Tvoorik nudges me. "I didn't wanna embarrass him, but that guard had the hots for you. Maybe it ain't a girl you need."

"Shut up, Tvoorik."

I smile, in spite of myself. At least he's the same as he's always been. I couldn't stand to lose him.

Part 474c: Axis Mundi

Samantha and I follow Helen and Cassiel as the older woman walks around Axis Mundi, a cheekily named dimension that the hundred or so remaining angels live in. She points out each angel we come across and has Cassiel shake their hands. "This man is Roger, he used to be an architect before he died, and this pretty lady over here is Petra, she was a diplomat, and over here is..."

Cassiel, bless her heart, smiles and says hello to each new angel, though it's apparent to everyone besides Helen that she hasn't a chance of remembering all their names. While she introduces herself, Samantha and I gaze around at the architecture. It's a self-contained bubble dimension, completely flat, and stretches out into the distance for miles around. Every angel has a mansion they live in, and each one has a distinct style. Some of them are Japanese inspired, others remind me of Roman architecture, and there are tons of space-age buildings I don't recognize at all. As Helen explained earlier, the angels moved here so the demons and Volgrim wouldn't find them, and they're mostly cut off from the outside universe.

Given that angels can only survive so long off their energy, I wasn't sure how they survived all this time, but it turns out Jason Alpha gave them a single infusion of all of his energy at once several million years ago, and that alone has given them more than enough. They haven't used even half of it over that period, and he regenerated it after one night of sleep anyway. Wordsmiths are overpowered.

Samantha slows to a stop, allowing Cassiel and Helen to keep walking, but she lightly pinches my long sleeves. "Hey, Jason. All the angels are staring at me."

I glance at her ridiculously exposed outfit, then to the pure white robes most of them are wearing, except for one angel who's wearing Roman legionnaire armor. Apparently, he's the odd one of the bunch, since he was an avid Renaissance Faire attendee and loves to dress up, even after his death. At least the angel wings kinda make him look like a Valkyrie.

"I can't imagine why, Samantha," I snort sarcastically, "it's probably been a long time since they saw someone openly baring that much skin."

"That's not it," she says, and her tail jerks around like a worried dog's. Occasionally it pauses and twitches. "It's because I'm a demon. Everyone smiles at me, but I think they're disguising their hatred."

"Possibly. As Helen said, Satan and millions of demons attacked and killed the angels during their final war, only sparing these remaining stragglers after killing off the purebloods and forcing Gabriel to sacrifice himself. Considering you're Satan's ex-girlfriend..."

Samantha bows her head. "I know. I just let him do it. I didn't know he planned such an awful act, but by the time I found out, it was far too late."

"It's not your fault. Satan seems like..." I pause, realizing that badmouthing someone she once loved will probably twist up her insides. "...he was... an interesting fellow."

"He was a piece of shit. I don't know why I stuck with him as long as I did, nor what I saw in him." Samantha states her opinion bluntly, rendering me speechless. "Maybe I was just young and naive. I lost that excuse after four thousand years of his plotting and scheming, though. Maybe I assumed that as long as he won, it was proof that his ideals were correct."

I reach around her back and grip her shoulder, pulling her close to me. "Everyone makes mistakes. You just have to accept them and try to move on."

Sam leans her head back against my arm. "I don't think I deserve that though, Jason. These angels became refugees because I never stood up to Satan. I was the second most powerful of the demons, and for years I was the only one who had the power to stand up to him, but I didn't. Directly or indirectly, it's my fault they're in this situation."

"Yeah, well, Jason Alpha failed to defeat the demons, so he's at fault too." I stop talking for a moment to notice the irony of criticizing another version of myself. What if I had lived his life? Wouldn't I have made the same mistakes? "Hell, time travel can't solve all the issues of the multiverse, so I don't think you should feel responsible for Satan's shitty decisions."

"I guess," Samantha mutters noncommittally.

Before I can question her about why she keeps beating herself up, Cassiel and Helen appear before us, having wandered back after noticing we disappeared. "Ooh, what are you two up to?" Cassiel winks and smiles, but it deflates when she sees the look on Samantha's face. "Oh."

"It's not a big deal," I say, "Sam just feels a little uncomfortable because of how all the angels are staring at her."

Helen nods. "Well, your choice of clothing certainly stands out. If you think it's because you're a demon and they hate you, I'd say that's quite inaccurate." Apparently, the old woman is more perceptive than she lets on.

"Huh?" Samantha pulls her head back and gazes at Helen quizzically. "Why would that be inaccurate?"

"It's war, sweetheart. Bad things happen. People die. All of the angels here were humans, turned back into angels. Heaven, as great as it might seem, was bland, boring, and inescapable. Human converts were expected to fight on the frontlines and die first, should war break out.

Purebloods treated half-bloods as their inferiors, even if they did smile and act pleasantly to our faces. Only one or two purebloods were considered good and honest, but compared to the comfortable existences we lead now, Heaven was a torturous place." Helen taps her lip. "I lived in Heaven for over fifty years before the man you know as Jason Alpha set me free. I was able to speak with my husband again, and I even got to live aboard a spaceship. It was great fun! However, other converts were not as lucky as me."

Samantha eyes the older woman carefully. "Are you saying many of the angels here are glad that Satan nearly wiped out their brethren?"

"Not glad, but also not angry. Death is a regretful thing. Freedom from bondage is a joyous thing. I'd say most are happy for the change in scenery, sad for the price we paid. Several of the converts here lived in Heaven for two thousand years, having been reformed during the generation after Michael's sacrifice. They made many, many friends over those years, only to have the overwhelming majority wiped away in an instant. Tens of millions of years can dull the heartbreak, however. I would say most are content with how things have ended up, and that's that."

"I see." For the first time today, Samantha smiles faintly. "I'm glad some good came of the war, however little it may be."

"In times of darkness, a glimpse of light can shine like the midday sun. The fact everyone gets to meet an angel the demons captured all this time, yet who also survived, has bolstered their morale dramatically. Even Jeremiah is smiling, and he's always a grumpy old grouch!" She points over at an angel whose boyish figure makes him look twelve years old. He dribbles a basketball in a nearby court and rolls his eyes when he sees us staring. Nobody else is playing, but he's having fun shooting some hoops.

"Grumpy... old man?" Samantha's face twists in disbelief. "He looks like a kid."

"He was just a boy living in the Roman Empire when a bunch of barbarians tore him to pieces. Took him two days to die. Angels don't usually change appearance, no matter how much time passes. He's much older than me!" Helen laughs. "Of course, so are you, but age is arbitrary after a certain point. We call him 'grumpy old man' just to rile him up. If you play along with the joke, it's much funnier."

Samantha chuckles. "Heh, I see your point." She and I both ignore the bit about the kid being torn to pieces since it's too awful to imagine. "Maybe I should say hi to some of the angels here. I'm probably just a little shy."

Cassiel's wings twitch, and she quickly steps forward and yanks Samantha away from me, giving her a big hug. "Oh, you! You're the least shy girl I know!"

"Jeez, Cass! You're embarrassing me!" Samantha protests weakly, but she doesn't actually mind.

Minutes pass. Soon we arrive at a building Helen dubs the 'Administrative Facility'. If there is a Creator of this universe, he's terrible at naming things. "I have a few friends among the demons; ones who know of the Angels' existence but keep silent, never telling anyone about us. They feed me gossip and tales of what's going on, but they aren't very high up. I heard rumors that the humans were staging a comeback and it was causing the Emperors many problems, but I never imagined the cause would be another Jason."

We make our way up the chiseled marble steps, and I marvel at how it looks like a courthouse from the time period I originated. Ten giant pillars lead up to an overhang above the entrance, and a plaque affixed to the protrusion reads ' In Jason We Trust '.

Cute.

Helen notices where my gaze is directed. "Just to be clear, we put that up, not Jason Alpha. He's fairly humble, despite his power. Alpha thought it was a little tacky."

Well, that's another thing we share in common.

I decide to ask the question on my mind. "Why the name 'Jason Alpha' anyway? If he's so humble, the name kinda says the opposite."

"The clone naming system was initially convoluted and changed several times. We needed a direct way to identify the primary Seed for each Wordsmith, so he came up with the Term 'alpha' since it's the first letter in the Ancient Greek alphabet. Likewise, Satan Prime is considered the progenitor of his clones."

"If he's the original Jason, then what happens if he dies? Do the clones die as well?"

Helen shrugs noncommittally. "Nobody knows. We won't know unless it happens, and the goal is to obviously make sure it doesn't. I'm 99% sure they won't, just based on events involving other clones, but it's tough to say. Have you ever cloned yourself before?"

Several memories bubble up. "Yes."

A moment of awkward silence follows, and Cassiel clears her throat. "So, um, Helen! Why are we coming here anyway?"

"To find out if anyone has intercepted news about the Volgrim. If their fleet can't hold off the Kolvaxians, we'll need to know."

"Why not just pop over to the Volgrim headquarters and say hello?" I ask. "You think they'll attack us on site or something?"

"One does not simply walk into the Council of Elders," Helen replies. "Especially not you. While they likely know of your Wordsmithing thanks to communications with the demons, no Volgrim is aware of the past or its history with relation to Jason Alpha."

"I don't see why that's a problem."

She sighs. "The Volgrim are a proud race. The reason Jason Alpha allowed them to eventually rule the galaxy outside of the Labyrinth is because he saw a certain quality in them; one of fairness. They treat subordinates equally, including the demons and humans. The Energy Wars were caused entirely by misunderstandings, not because they hated humans. Well, not at first. To be fair, destroying their homeworld may have annoyed them, just a teensy bit!" Helen smirks. "Anyway, while they are fair, we believe this is only due to them forgetting the cause of their homeworld's destruction."

I try not to look too bored. "Uh huh. And what's that?"

"Jason Alpha, of course. He destroyed Volgarius. Eradicated the entire star system, and killed trillions of Volgrim in an instant. They only managed to escape thanks to a space station several lightyears away that we didn't know about."

My jaw drops. "What? He did that? That's... dark. Genocidal. Evil, even." My hands shake slightly as another thought enters my mind. He and I are very similar. Would I commit genocide as well? Is that something I'm capable of?

Samantha butts in. "Hold on, how did he destroy the planet? I'm... I'm having memories come back to me, all of a sudden."

Helen shakes her head slowly. "He created a meteor made entirely of iron, then reinforced it with Wordsmithing beyond any natural limits, and flung it at warp speed toward their planet. The resulting catastrophe obliterated the planet, the star, and every other speck of matter in the system."

A minute passes as Samantha and I gaze at each other, then Cassiel, then back to Helen, trying to wrap our mind around the idea. Samantha is the one to break the silence. "Th-the... the Kolvaxians... Jason, don't you remember? Beatrix and Ben Brown... they told us that the Kolvaxians came pouring through a wormhole- a tear in space."

Cassiel's eyes widen. "The one at Volgarius Prime?! Then, doesn't that mean Jason Alpha created the tear?"

Helen opens her mouth to speak, thinks better of it, closes it, then opens it again. "Ah-that's... are you certain? I suppose that would explain how the Kolvaxians arrived. In fact, that's the most disturbing news I've heard in years. Alpha will be furious when he learns this news... mostly at himself."

"Yeah. He should be," Samantha says, tossing her hair back. "He not only committed genocide, he tore a goddamn hole in space with his stunt. Monsters are invading because of his actions."

I know it isn't logical, but Samantha's words stab right into my heart. That could be me she's talking about, my brain whispers. You can't say for sure you'd never do the same thing were you in his shoes.

"The pieces are falling into place," Helen grumbles. "And now I think I see how the Kolvaxians arrived here. Saint Peter bless my soul, I think they're pouring in from the K universe."

"Can I seal the wormhole?" I offer, but Helen shrugs.

"Maybe. The problem is that you might be a Wordsmith, but the Kolvaxians are unlike anything you've ever faced. There are Jasons with hundreds of thousands of battles against Kolvaxians who come up short sometimes. Tracking them is difficult, their bodies emit trace amounts of anti-energy, and they adapt to new tactics remarkably fast. To close the hole, you'd have to go there in person. If this hole is the gateway from which they originate, they will guard it fiercely. Plus, I don't know if Wordsmithing or Thoughtsmithing can seal a wormhole. It might be impossible, in which case you'd be..."

Helen trails off, and her skin pales. "You know, there's something about the Kolvaxians that should give you sleepless nights, young Wordsmith."

I'm already a little bit scared, but I keep my expression neutral. "Yeah?"

"They convert humans, demons, Volgrim, anything they come into contact with into other Kolvaxians. We've fought them for ages, and still barely know anything about them, but what we do know is that they're a hivemind. They absorb the knowledge of each individual and add it to their collective. We've gone to great lengths to ensure they never ever get their hands on a Wordsmith. It might spell the end of the Multiverse if they did."

"What, like, they could use Wordsmithing if they took over Jason?" Cassiel's expression contorts into horror. "That's awful! You can't take a risk like that!"

"Yeah," Samantha chimes in. "Even if you knew for sure you could seal the tear, the Kolvaxians might transform you into one of them, and they'd become unstoppable."

Before I can allay their concerns, a buzzing sound rumbles in my ear, transmitting to my mind. The telepathic earrings, apparently. Good thing I built a connector node inside this place when I arrived.

Samantha and Cassiel raise their hands to their ears simultaneously, almost like they're answering a phone. Helen gives us a confused look, but I ignore her and answer the 'call.'

This is Jason. Is someone trying to use this channel?

Ben's voice appears in my mind. You still hanging out with the angels?

Yes. Why?

Two demons just appeared at our doorstep. They declared they were friendly and demanded they speak to you. Said it was a message from Diablo.

Samantha raises an eyebrow and glances at me. "The heck would Diablo want?"

"Dunno, Sam."

Ben, detain and restrain them. I'm a little busy right now. I'll talk with them later.

For a moment, I think he's shut off the feed without answering, but his voice appears in my mind, a hint of worry in it. They say it's about the Kolvaxians. I pressed them for an answer, and they said something about an S.O.S. signal from the Volgrim.

"Oh," I say out loud. "In that case, tell them I'll be right there." I pause, realizing Ben can't hear me talk out loud. Tell them I'll be right there.

"Helen, two demons just appeared at our doorstep. They have information about the Kolvaxians."

Helen's eyes bulge. "Really? Well, get down there, then- no, actually, take me with you. I want to hear what they have to say."

"I assumed you would." I pause, glancing inside the Administration building. "Maybe we should finish this first."

"Most demons don't know about Kolvaxians," Samantha says. "If two random ones appear saying Diablo sent them, I'm certain they aren't lying. Their information is probably, no offense to Helen, more up to date than anything here."

Helen rolls her eyes. "Sad, but true. My spies among the demons are fairly unreliable. If those demons don't give us anything useful, we can come back."

"I'll make it quick," I remark, as I aim my mind at the ground. " Waypoint. Now we can return here once we're done. Return. "

The four of us vanish and reappear inside the heart of Hero City, and I activate my earpiece. Ben, where are you holding them?

* * *

A minute later, I teleport again, this time taking us to the border of the city, just inside the portal to the Labyrinth. Ben is just putting anti-energy cuffs onto the demons, both of whom look a little sullen. Immediately, I identify a Shadow-walker, the scummiest of demons, and an odd one dressed in grey robes, with a gold brooch clasped onto his clothes just under his throat. He looks somewhat important and carries an air of authority about him.

Perhaps he's the leader of these two. The information might be reliable!

The robed one spots me and nudges his companion. "Ylvusk! Looky! It's the Hero guy! I told you he exists!!!"

His friend, the shadow-walker sighs, his voice a deep growl. "I thought you said he didn't exist, nutcase."

"Same thing! You're always getting hung up on the icky-sticky details!"

It's at this moment I realize something significant.

These idiots are going to be no help at all.

Part 475c: Portal

The demon with the robes, Tvoorik, smiles giddily as his eyes scan me up and down. "You're a huge fella! And that skin makes you look like a shadow-walker variant!"

All around us, people mill around in the outpost, some of them glancing warily at the demons before spotting Cassiel and going back to their business. She and Helen have the effect of calming anyone down who are worried about terrible things happening. I keep thinking back to all the times people have been ecstatic when they see Cassiel and how they always prostrate themselves before her, calling her the 'Divine Mother.' I'm just glad she fits in, now.

Ben lightly kicks Tvoorik in the rump. "Hey now! Don't go calling Jason a shadow-walker! That's insulting!"

The other demon, a shadow-walker himself, glares at Ben. "No, you're insulting. What are you, a shadow-human?"

"Clever," Ben hisses.

"Calm down, boys." Samantha puts her foot down, silencing the three of them before turning to Tvoorik. "Why did you say Diablo sent you? What did you mean by that?"

Tvoorik's smile fades. "Oh, well, see, there's a bunch of aliens that are attacking the Volgrim. He found out because they sent their SOS to his gadget doohickey thing." Tvoorik turns to me. "Kinda like that watch of yours. It has the screen that lights up."

Samantha crosses her arms. "I'm surprised Diablo would use anything involving technology. I'm terrible with that stuff, but he makes me look like a genius."

"Maybe he's been practicing," I offer helpfully. "So if the Kolvaxians are attacking, why would Diablo want us to know? We'll certainly try to stop them, but surely the demons are capable of intervening."

The shadow-walker coughs. "Have you seen the new Second Emperor? Beelzebub single-mindedly focuses on eliminating the humans. According to Diablo, he barely even knows who the Volgrim are."

"Beelzebub is the First Emperor now," Samantha says, correcting him. "The First Emperor is gone."

"Gone?!" Tvoorik twitches in surprise. "How- when- why?! Did he die? Did you guys kill him?"

"No, he fled. It's a long story, but we sent him packing. With the First Emperor gone, that leaves Beelzebub as the new first." Samantha adjusts the strap on her bra. "Oh, and the First Emperor was Satan. You probably didn't know that, but you do now."

"S-Satan." Tvoorik echoes the word before suddenly jerking his hand out and squeezing the other demon's shoulder. "It's just like I said." He hisses the words out.

"Okay, big deal, you got one prediction right. Call me back when you get better than a five percent success rate," Ylvusk says, before pulling away from his friend's grasp. "Anyway, we've done our part. We told you what Diablo wanted us to say. What now? You gonna kill us or something?"

"Uhh..." I draw the word out, unsure how to respond. "I mean, you're technically our enemy, but you don't seem evil. I think we can let you go."

"Wait." Ben steps between the demons and me and his faceplate opens. "Centurion analyzed their genetic markers compared to blood found at the scene of the recent attack on this outpost. The shadow-walker was one of the two demons who attacked our men and women. I'm not letting them go."

"The suit can do that? How?"

Ben nods at me. "Detective Mode. It's a special system that analyzes crime scenes."

"Handy," I mutter, as I carefully push him aside. "Tvoorik, Ylvusk, is what he said true? Did one or both of you attack our command posts?"

Ylvusk keeps his expression neutral, but Tvoorik cringes visibly. "Err, well, that is..."

Great. They're guilty. "I suppose that answers my question. You'll both have to be put on trial for your crimes, since we have courts for humans and demons. I should thank you for the information, but now it kinda leaves a sour taste in my mouth."

Samantha still stands with her arms crossed, watching our exchange, but now she butts in. "Hold on, Jason. Before we send them off, I need to know... Tvoorik, what species are you? You look like a Unique Mutation of demon."

The robed demon sheepishly itches the back of his head. "Oh... ah, yeah. I'm a Seer. It's an advanced form of an Oracle."

"A Seer," Samantha repeats what he said, a puzzled expression on her face. "How did you not know Satan was the First Emperor? Every Oracle should have noticed his appearance at the same time."

"It's a new muta-" Tvoorik pauses, and suddenly covers his mouth, a guilty look frozen on his face.

"That's what I thought. You killed those people while they were off-duty, then you used their souls to mutate." Samantha turns back to me. "Throwing him in prison is a waste. What he did was despicable, but I think we can use him."

"Use me? W-what do you mean by that?!" Tvoorik slips the words out but backs down as Samantha shoots a hot glare at him.

"Cut the indignation. I may not officially be a Demon Emperor anymore, but I'm technically powerful enough to beat the crap out of Beelzebub without Jason's help. I can pull rank if you wish."

"Yes, ma'am." Tvoorik bows his head, unable to respond.

Helen and Ben share a glance. She speaks. "I don't know what you're thinking, Belial, but we don't need a backstabbing demon. Worse, we're wasting time. If these two have told the truth, the Volgrim are in grave danger. We need to leave now."

"We don't know where the Kolvaxians will attack, nor what we'll run into when we get there," Samantha says, before turning back to Tvoorik. "If you're a unique Oracle, what does that entail? Any special abilities?"

Tvoorik nods slowly. "Well, I think I have all the usual stuff... like seeing and knowing all. I have a unique ability to see into the future, as well."

"The future?" This time it's me who speaks. "How? That seems implausible."

Ylvusk, the shadow-walker, narrows his eyes at me. "You can create objects with your mind, summon weapons out of thin air, and destroy whole planets with your abilities. Why would foresight sound odd to you?"

"Never mind." He makes a good point, so I quickly concede. No point arguing when you've already lost.

The Seer clears his throat. "Based on my visions, I bet the Trollboxians are attacking the Volgrim homeworld."

"Kolvaxians," Ben says, correcting Tvoorik. "And call me a skeptic, but I can't see the Kolvaxians arriving at the Volgrim homeworld. They were nowhere near it, last I heard."

"How long ago was that?" I ask.

"Well, admittedly it was several months ago."

"Oh."

Helen rubs her elbow. "Well, if it's the Volgrim homeworld the Kolvaxians are going to show up at, you'll be useless for getting there, Jason. That is, unless you've been there before."

"I haven't."

She sighs. "That's what I expected. Luckily, Alpha built an emergency device just for this purpose. We can jump straight to Melkin from the portal machine in Axis Mundi. It has several designated exit points at key locations across the galaxy."

Melkin, apparently, is the name of the new Volgrim homeworld. "That's convenient. And dangerous. Why would you have a portal that leads directly to an enemy homeworld? Isn't that a bit of a death-wish?"

Helen shakes her head. "It's a one-way device. It opens a hole directly from Axis Mundi to one of the other designated points, but it doesn't require a machine at the target location, and it can't be opened from the other side. Less risky than you'd think."

Samantha's tail swings around and pokes me in the back. "Jason, it's dangerous for another reason, as well. What if the Kolvaxians have taken over the planet? If we show up there, it'll be the same as if you teleported into the heart of their territory to seal the wormhole."

"She's right," Ben says, a cautious tone in his voice. "I don't think you should go there. Better to go by spaceship and take a little more time than rush into a death-trap."

"No worries!" Tvoorik yells, making everyone flinch in surprise. "I haven't had any visions of the immediate future where Jasper dies, so it's all good! We're totally fine!"

A silence falls over us. Cassiel squirms. "That's, um, comforting... Tvoorik."

"Thanks!" he says, ignoring the fact that nobody believes him.

A few minutes of deliberation pass as we discuss what the best method is for traveling there. Unfortunately, the Volgrim are the official resistance against the Kolvaxian invasion, so taking our time isn't possible. If they're wiped out, the chances of the galaxy surviving lowers dramatically. At least, according to Helen. She seems to know more about the green monsters than everyone else. It's a bad idea to ignore her advice.

"Helen," I say, after thinking it over, "you're in the camp for rushing over there. What's our exit strategy if things go south?"

"Just teleport us back. You put a beacon inside Axis Mundi, so returning will take a minuscule amount of energy." She says this with a straight face, apparently unafraid of showing up to a planet that may be hostile to our very existence.

"Fine. Let's pop in, then pop out if things get dicey. I won't tell anyone to go. Just come along if you want to, and be prepared for danger."

Ben crosses his arms. "Count me out. I don't give a damn about the Volgrim, and I ain't taking a chance with those little green fuckers. I'll stay here, so at least if you lot get turned, there'll be someone competent to lead what's left of humanity."

"What an optimist," Ylvusk grumbles dryly. "I agree with the shadow-human, though. I'm staying right here. No way I'm messing with those things."

"That's fine," Samantha says, "but your friend is coming along with us. He might be able to sense the Kolvaxians."

"Aw, rats," Tvoorik mutters. "Fine, I'll go. But before I do, I have one question to ask."

Samantha eyes him suspiciously. "What's that?"

The Seer stabs a finger in Cassiel's direction. "Is it true? Were the angels working for Satan all along? I saw a vision, so you can't lie to me."

Somehow, Cassiel manages a straight face. "No. They were not."

"Bloody hell." Tvoorik lunges a foot forward and kicks a pebble across the ground. "But this Hero guy is a robot, right?"

It's my turn to glare at him. "No."

"You're zero-for-two, Tvoorik. Just drop it," Ylvusk says, before slugging his friend in the shoulder. "He has a bunch of dumb conspiracies. Please ignore him; you'll thank me later."

Tvoorik rubs his shoulder and mutters something under his breath, but I don't catch it. Then he glares at Ylvusk. "You're gonna make me go with them alone? I thought we were best buddies!"

"You're the only one who says that," Ylvusk replies. "I mean, maybe I said it once or twice, but that was before I realized you were a big dummy."

"Alright, that's enough. We're wasting time." Helen breaks up their petty spat and pulls them apart. "Jason, take us back to Axis Mundi. It'll take a few minutes to fire up the reactors so we can get the Void-Spanner online."

"Okay. Take care of this shadow-walker, Ben. We'll be back soon."

"I'm ecstatic," Ben says, a look of annoyance on his face.

" Return. "

* * *

Soon the five of us, Helen, Cassiel, Samantha, Tvoorik, and I, are standing in front of a giant metal circle, with steps leading up to its center. It looks a lot like the portals I constructed in Hero City.

Tvoorik nudges me. "You know, I once told Ylvusk that Satan faked his death. I'm not always wrong."

"That's nice," I say, trying not to be rude.

"Did you really destroy one of our bubble-worlds with a meteor?"

The memories come bubbling back to me. "Yes. It was an accident. I only meant to deal heavy damage to a battlefield, but I summoned a giant rock that wiped out all life on the planet. I still regret it."

He nods excitedly, apparently paying no attention to my mood. "Wow! I always thought that was a lie! So what about-"

Samantha appears at Tvoorik's side and leans on his shoulder. "Fewer questions, more silence. Don't make me regret bringing you."

His face pales. "Y-yes ma'am." He's very willing to cow to strong women. I wonder if he has a masochistic side.

Helen is standing over at a console with Cassiel, pointing out a bunch of numbers and explaining how the portal device works, and after a minute they both walk over.

"It's almost ready. Just another few seconds to go."

I nod at Helen. "Nice."

A spark of energy forms at the center of the gate, and soon several bolts of energy arc from the circular frame and shoot into the center as a tiny hole in the air forms, expands, and quickly grows to the full size of the monument itself. At twenty feet wide and thirty tall, it's big enough that the five of us can walk through it side-by-side, with room left over.

The other side of the portal is pitch-black. I stare at it for a moment, unable to see anything, until Helen holds her hands up and emits a ray of light that passes through the portal, lighting up what appears to be an underground cavern.

"It's an underground cavern," Helen says, as if she can read my mind. "The Volgrim don't know of its existence."

"I don't see anyone nearby," Cassiel whispers, as she takes a step toward the portal. "It's creepy."

"Darkness can feel like that sometimes," Tvoorik says nonchalantly. "So, what are we waiting for? Let's go!"

"Slow down, flyboy." Samantha pushes him aside, then walks up and takes Cassiel's hand. "We'll lead the way. Cass, increase your brightness to light the place up. Be ready for anything."

Wordlessly, Cassiel raises a finger, and her body's aura increases dramatically, turning her into a human-sized lightbulb. She and Samantha step through the portal into the cave, and I follow behind them, eyes jerking back and forth. Helen and Tvoorik trail behind me, and Tvoorik whispers something to her, but she smacks his shoulder. "That's rude! Jason can't help the way he looks!"

I don't know what he said, and I don't want to know.

Quickly, I scan the caves and take in my surroundings. Stalactites hang from the ceiling, their greenish color formed from a rock I don't recognize. Small puddles of muddy water dot the ground under each one, as a reddish liquid drips down from the rock formations above. The cavern is empty, despite my expectation of bats hanging from the ceiling. A faint vibration greets my feet as I walk around.

"What's that humming feeling? It's like the ground is alive."

Helen pauses and cocks her head. "I don't know."

Slowly, we trudge through the cave, and the sound of compressing air in the distance, like a whoomph reaches our ears. When I jerk my head back in alarm, Helen quickly raises her palm. "The portal closed, that's all. We'll be relying on you to take us back to Axis Mundi if anything happens."

"Oh. Okay. I'm just a little nervous, that's all."

Cassiel lights the path in front, and Helen from the rear, as I keep to the middle. I'm not sure why we silently chose this formation, but it has the advantage that it protects me. Since I'm the only one who can teleport us back if things go south, it's essential I be in the safest position. That being said, I don't like that my girlfriends are taking point.

Tvoorik whispers again, and this time I hear what he says. "Is it true what they say about humans with small feet?"

"You're disgusting," Helen hisses. "Shame."

Cassiel and Samantha walk in total silence, holding each other's hand as they trod forward until Cassiel pauses and points up ahead. "Dead end."

Helen sighs and pulls away from Tvoorik, flapping her wings and flying over the girls and me with that surprising agility of hers. She lands smoothly and quickly scans the recessed wall. "Ah, this is the exit." She leans forward, reaches into a hole I didn't notice, and does something inside of it, quickly retracting her arm. The wall shudders and slides open to reveal a perfectly chiseled staircase, although a bunch of the reddish liquid pours out from the opening and soaks the floor before retreating into the stagnant puddles around us. The smell is putrid, like the worst mold I've smelled in my life.

Cassiel gags audibly. "Gods, I think we've discovered where a Fartsmith once lived."

Samantha coughs and laughs, even as tears pour out of her eyes. "Kah, haha! G-good one, Cassy."

" Sanitize. " I speak a word and instantly the foul odor vanishes, leaving everyone blinking dumbly for a moment as the cleanest, most wonderful oxygen ever reaches their nostrils.

"Wow. You'd make a good janitor," Tvoorik quips. "Do you work on commission?"

I ignore him and push past the girls, walking behind Helen as she ascends the stairs. "I think it's best I take the point. We don't know what's up there."

Helen hesitates before pressing herself against the wall to let me squeeze past. The stairwell is cramped enough that I can feel her breath as I press by, and once I'm on the other side, I quickly hike up the stairs, carefully pressing each foot against the floor so that I don't make a sound. Nobody says a word until we climb the hundred or so steps to the top, and a flat metal ceiling greets us.

I shoot a glance back at Helen. "Is this the exit?"

"Yes. There's no activation; you need to either blow it outward or remove it with Wordsmithing. It was designed to be nearly impossible to find."

"Oh. Simple enough. Remove. "

The word leaves my mouth, and the metal above vanishes, causing a humongous mound of dirt and shrubbery to cave in, falling down on me suddenly. "Ah!" I barely get the word out before dozens of pounds of rock and grime slam onto me, knocking me over and burying me in an avalanche of debris.

I quickly jump up, burst out, and cough madly, spitting dirt and filth everywhere. "Pwah! Ptoo! Blech!"

When I look back, Samantha is trying to force a look of concern, but Cassiel stifles a laugh. "Nice one!"

"Oh, shut up. Clean. " The dirt and other crap vanishes, and my body and mouth instantly restore to perfect condition. Turning around, I look up at the incredibly bright sky above. It's an eerie purple, a color that makes no sense compared to anything I've seen before. "The hell's with the color?"

Helen jumps, pushes against the wall, leapfrogs over me, and jumps out into the open air, landing in the field a few feet away. She quickly crouches down, splays her legs out, and takes a defensive stance. Before she can say anything, my eyes lower and I look into the distance. Massive plumes of smoke rise into the sky, as a city made of futuristic buildings a few miles away burns to the ground.

Helen wheezes. "I think we're too late, sweetheart."

Part 476c: Apocalypse

The purple sky gives a feeling of other-worldliness to this... other-world. Everything is tinted by a hue that makes the pale skin of my girlfriends turn a sickly blue. The ground is covered with tiny red plants that remind me of brambles, and not a sound can be heard anywhere in the world nearby. While I might expect to hear distant screams from the Volgrim city burning to rubble, nothing reaches my ears. No animals, birds, insects, or any other creature wander the plains before us, though several miles away I can just make out the top of some trees, which may or may not lead to a forest.

Cassiel gingerly walks over to me, the blood-red brambles crunching loudly under her feet. They're drier than a sack of potato chips. "We're too late."

"Yeah." My fist clenches as I gaze into the distance. I'm no fan of Volgrim, especially after they attacked us, but that could be chalked up to several misunderstandings. Nothing I've heard about the Kolvaxians leads me to like them at all. They're monsters that convert other species by force. They're... they're like insects. A hivemind of murder and violence. Not even the Volgrim deserve to be turned, like Ben's crew were.

Tvoorik and Samantha crawl out of the cavern behind us, and I notice that Tvoorik isn't slouching like he usually does. His movements are oddly alert as if a facade of goofiness has worn off. He points at the Volgrim city. "There. Three million, four hundred thousand, nine hundred and twelve Volgrim are still alive."

"What? Seriously? How could you know that?" I glance at Samantha, but she merely nods. Apparently, his word is accurate.

The vibration I felt in the cavern increases noticeably, and the ground shakes slightly beneath us. Helen crouches down a little and glances around warily. "What is that? What's causing this rumbling?"

All of a sudden, gigantic cannons rise from the area near the city walls and simultaneously aim into the sky. I can't see anything through the smoke and cloud cover above, but all of them begin blasting rapid-fire energy shots into the air, each one sending out a shockwave due to their incredible kinetic force. Waves of dirt and debris explode outward from each cannon and begin surging in every direction, including toward us. Cassiel jumps forward and raises her hand, and a barrier of light forms, encircling our group. Several seconds later, the wave of debris surges the few miles in our direction, moving at incredible speed, and smashes into her barrier, but she doesn't flinch, and the light holds perfectly, protecting us from any damage.

Helen's jaw drops, and she stands up, visibly awed. "Cassiel, that's incredible! How are you able to form a shield like that? There was only one time I saw anything of the sort, and it was from one of the legendary heroes!"

Cassiel shrugs and looks at Helen, unfazed by the wall of debris blasting her barrier. "Jason gives me lots of energy. This much is nothing."

"Cocky," Helen laughs. "Don't let it go to your head. Still, I'm impressed."

After a minute, the debris slows down, though the cannons continue to barrage the sky. Whatever they're attacking, it must be in space. The rumbling continues to increase, and now it's becoming hard to stand as my knees shake around. "God-damn! What the fuck is causing this?"

Nobody answers. They don't need to. The sound of an alarm, not unlike a nuclear siren I might have heard on Earth, wails in the distance. Woooop! Woooop!

My body shivers as something unthinkably huge begins to rise from the city. A spaceship. Buildings crumble around it as it climbs upward, foot by foot, slowly inching higher into the sky and crushing the city around it to rubble.

Samantha's eyes bulge, and she gawks at the behemoth. "Sweet mother of the devil! I've seen capital ships that weren't that big!"

The alarm cuts off awkwardly as a return barrage of artillery flies down from space, blasting apart the city and the surrounding area. I quickly raise my hand to the sky. " Barrier! Barrier! Barrier! "

Cassiel breathes a sigh of relief as my power adds to hers, amplifying the strength of her magic. Each energy blast is the size of a BMW, and they explode with incredible force, blowing chunks of dirt and rock into the stratosphere as hundreds, if not thousands of shots pummel the mega-ship.

Tvoorik continues to point, but this time at the ship and not the city. "Taking damage. Structural failure imminent. Scared. Volgrim have no emotion. Volgrim should not show fear. Still scared. Cannot help it. Oh." He lowers his arm as the barrage from whatever vessel is orbiting the planet stops, leading me to think they have to reload or something. A second later, as the last enemy shot hits the ground and silence overtakes us, a focused laser of incredible strength shoots down from the sky and pierces the Volgrim capital ship, increases in size, and slices outward, sawing the ship in two.

The rumbling under our feet slows, and the ship falls, slowly at first, then faster and faster until it smashes into the city below. Another shockwave ripples out, and the land rumbles toward us, like a tsunami made of dirt and stone. Cassiel's bravado falters, and she squeaks, though she also pours even more energy into her barrier. The tide of rock and dirt pounds into her shield like a million megaton hammers, creating a sound that I can only describe as tens of thousands of tin garbage cans being bashed together, all at once.

A few minutes later, everything becomes still. The five of us gasp and wheeze, partially due to the effort it took to keep standing, but mostly because of terror. The level of destruction we just witnessed was on a scale that made us realize just how small and fragile we are.

Cautiously, Cassiel lowers her barrier. The assault has ceased... at least for now. "Tvoorik. You can sense how many Volgrim are alive, right? Do you know-"

"Six hundred and forty," Tvoorik says before she can finish. "The ship's hyperdrive was punctured, causing a cascade of exotic particles which tore the flesh from the bodies of every Volgrim they touched. Since this happened in the seconds before the ship fell apart, the ship contained most of the breach inside of itself, which simply means we are in no danger from the particles. However, the ship containing the explosion meant that every life-form on the inside was microwaved instantly. There are no survivors."

I stare at the demon, blinking, for a few moments. It's hard to understand what he just said. Compared to his idiotic demeanor from earlier, he's practically a nuclear physicist all of a sudden.

Samantha eyes him suspiciously. "How could you possibly know all that?"

"I don't," He says, before pointing his finger several miles away from the city. "A research facility. Scientists are inside. Those are the only remaining Volgrim on this part of the planet."

After a moment, I register his words. "Wait, you mean there are other Volgrim elsewhere?"

Tvoorik's body visibly relaxes, and his shoulders sag before he flashes a smile at me. "Yup! Whole bunch of 'em. A few million, maybe. One of their leaders was thinkin' something about a fleet nearby with the rest. They're evacuating the planet, but many had to stay behind in bunkers."

"Oh. Good to know." I shoot a glance at Samantha, but she shrugs. Neither of us knows why he transitions from idiot to guru in the span of a few seconds before reverting again. Maybe it's his mutation? 'Seer,' huh? It sounds a little intimidating, honestly. Perhaps I underestimated him.

Helen coughs and rubs her eyes. "Ugh, I didn't expect to arrive in the middle of a war-zone. We need to find those Volgrim survivors and-" She pauses suddenly, and all of us stiffen at the sound of multiple sonic booms above our heads. Everyone jerks up to scan the skies, and Cassiel quickly forms another barrier. The clouds part all at once as hundreds of fireballs streak down, aimed at the city in the distance. It only takes a few seconds for the objects to scream into the ground, but instead of explosions, only deep whumps can be heard.

Several fireballs careen through the sky and land with a bang just a mile away, kicking up small clouds of dust, but compared to what the mega-ship did; they're nothing.

Helen looks at me. "What kind of attack was that? Are they synchronized bombs? Maybe they're going to detonate all at once and level the city."

"God, I hope not." I hold my hands up to shield my eyes from the planet's sunlight, squinting as I stare into the distance, but I can't make anything out. After a minute, I suddenly realize I'm dumb. Storage. " Reaching inside, I pull the Crown of Solomon out, throw it on my head, and wordsmith again. " Drone. Drone. Binoculars. "

Two observation drones appear in midair and rapidly fly toward the city, and I hold the binocs up to my eyes. They're far more advanced than something I'd have found in a pawn shop back on Earth, since they can magnify by a factor of a hundred times and track onto objects, stabilizing my view. Since they have infrared and several other vision modes, I can see many things with them that I can't with my bare eyes.

My mental link to the drones activates, and I can perceive what both of them see, in addition to the vision from both of my eyes. It's slightly disorienting, but I get used to it shockingly fast.

Tvoorik mutters something beside me, but I don't catch it. I carefully stare at the crater and as the dust clears...

"Hey, there's something in those craters. Metal. Like a... like a pod, of some sort. An escape pod, maybe."

Someone grabs my arm, and I quickly lower the binoculars to see Helen staring at me intensely. "Pods, you say? Are they circular?"

"Yeah. Why?"

Her eyes flick over to the smoldering craters. "The strike force. They leveled the city, so now it's just a matter of sending the troops down. Each of those pods has a Kolvaxian inside. We've got a minute before they find us."

"What? Seriously?" I feel panic rising. "How? They're miles away! Did they detect us already?"

"They don't have to, Jason. Kolvaxians have several abilities, and while their scope is hard to pin down, one of those abilities is to detect objects and things on the landmass they're standing on. In other words, we're standing on solid ground, and once they are, they will find us. It won't take long."

"That's crazy," Cassiel hisses. "We need to start flying, then."

"No, we should leave. The Volgrim are doomed. We're far too late." Helen shakes her head ferociously. "Let's get out of here."

I quickly put my foot down. "I don't know how the Kolvaxians fight or anything about them, but Tvoorik says there are 600 scientists in that bunker. I can't just leave them to die."

Samantha and Cassiel share a look of uncertainty. Sam chews her lip. "Helen knows more about them than we do. We should listen, I think."

Cass looks me in the eye before turning to Helen. "Jason's right. If he leaves them to die, he can't call himself a hero. We have to save those we're capable of saving. Just because the Kolvaxians have incredible fighting power doesn't mean we should just back down. We'll never win that way."

Huh. I never realized it before, but Cassiel is kinda heroic herself, sometimes. "I can send you guys back if you want. I'll keep Cass, since her energy may help me fight the monsters. Either way, every second we spend discussing it is a second we're wasting. They'll get out of those pods soon."

Helen doesn't know what to say. She glances in the distance, then back at me. "Cripes. If you send me back, you're as good as dead. You'll need my knowledge about them. Cassiel, grab Samantha. I'll take the little demon. Jason, you fly with us. Make sure you don't touch the ground. They're going to spot us in the air, but they don't have many ways of taking us out once we're up there."

"Good to know. I have a better idea, though," I say, before aiming my mind at Tvoorik and Samantha, as well as myself. " Wings. Wings. Wings. "

Samantha sprouts a leathery demonic-looking pair of wings, though Tvoorik's are more scaly, like a dragon's, and pitch black. They erupt out the back of his robes, tearing them to ribbons in the process. "Shucks."

As for me, mine are feathery, like Cassiel's. Odd, I didn't give any particular thought to how the wings should look, yet each person has wings with unique characteristics. Wordsmithing can be mysterious, sometimes.

"Okay, start flying. It might take a minute for you to get used to them, but-" Before I can finish my sentence, Samantha leaps into the air, and her wings flap gracefully, as she does a loop-the-loop.

"Whee!"

I'm glad someone's having fun.

Tvoorik is much less agile, but he still flaps his wings and rises into the air competently, as do Helen, Cassiel, and I. Once we're airborne, I turn to Tvoorik. "Where's the facility?"

He points again. "Oh, it's about that direction. A few miles or so. I'll be more specific once we're closer."

"Cool beans," I mutter in response. Secretly I doubt my decision, but I'm glad Cassiel is backing me up. Even so, staying here might be suicide. These little green monsters sound like the stuff of nightmares.

The five of us quickly cover lots of ground. Our wings allow us to move much faster than a bird, thanks to their magical properties. After a minute or two Tvoorik slows his flying to a stop, then points at one of the nearest pods. "It's open."

Below us and ahead perhaps a few hundred yards is one of the metal pods lying in a crater by itself. The hatch to it has opened forward, and a small amount of steam still hisses from its sides, which makes sense given it must have heated up a lot when it entered the atmosphere.

"The monsters have been loosed. Be on your guard," Helen says, as if we weren't already tense enough to crush iron with our stomachs.

A flash of movement below catches my eye. It's a barely noticeable blur, vanishing before I can lock on it with my eyes. "Down there! I saw something!"

Everyone spins to see where I'm pointing. Sweat pours off Cassiel's brow. "Huh? What did you- AH!" She lets out a yelp of fright and suddenly plunges feet-first toward the ground, as if she's being dragged down by something.

"Cassiel!" I fly after her immediately, as she screams in panic. Her body careens down, and she flaps her wings to try and stay aloft, but she's unable to slow her descent, as if a ten-ton wrecking ball were chained to her leg.

"Jason! It's got me! There's something... guh!" She's cut off as her body slams into the dirt, smashing onto the recently disturbed terrain with bone-snapping force. She can't even let out a cry of pain as the breath blasts out of her body. Her mouth opens and closes, but as I land beside her, she can't make a sound and instead struggles to breathe for a few moments.

"I've got you! Heal!" I quickly Wordsmith, and a second later she inhales sharply as tears pour down her face.

"-got me! It won't let go! Get it off, get it off!" I reach down to pick her up, but her arms turn into a flurry of movement as she starts swinging and flailing at her legs, apparently trying to pull something off her body. "It's wrapped around my leg, Jason!"

I don't know what she's talking about; I can't see anything there. However, a closer glance reveals depressions on her skin, as if several invisible hands were clutching at her, trying to tear her leg off. I try to swat them off her leg, but my hand passes through whatever's gripping her.

Another flash of movement catches my eye. A few dozen feet away, something emerges from the ground, startling me. I realize instantly it must be a Kolvaxian, only it's not quite what I expected. It has smooth green skin, with lots of moisture visible everywhere, as if it had just climbed out of a mossy lake. The alien monster thing hisses like a cat, and its bulbous eyes twitch and jerk from side-to-side for a moment. "Kss..."

Cass stops flailing around for a moment to gaze at it in horror. "Is... is that a-?!"

A second later, I'm nearly blown away as Samantha flies down from the sky with incredible speed and delivers a stone-shattering punch right into the Kolvaxian's body, blasting the monster to kingdom come with the force of... well, with the force of Samantha punching something at subsonic speeds. I wouldn't want to be the monster, that's for sure.

Cassiel gasps as whatever was holding her suddenly vanishes, and the force she was putting into pulling away from it is released. She leaps backward, nearly knocking the wind out of me as our bodies collide.

She doesn't apologize, instead opting to make the fastest motion of her life with her hands, healing me. "Go! Go!" She can barely get the words out since her body is shaking so much.

The dust settles from Samantha's impact, and she jumps back, eying the impact site warily. "I missed! It vanished into the ground the second I made contact! Watch out!"

All three of us quickly fly into the sky, though this time I hold Cassiel's hand in case whatever grabbed her before tries again. "Are you okay, Cass?"

She nods despite being shaken up by the experience. "I was terrified, but it's over now. I felt like a hundred invisible men were grabbing my leg and pulling me wherever they wanted. How did the freak do that?"

Samantha gnashes her teeth. "I don't know, but Jason, you need to keep Cass close. There must be a reason it targeted her."

We fly back to where we were before, only this time we keep going higher until the pod below is a speck. Once we feel high enough that we're safe, we stop and let Tvoorik and Helen catch up to us.

I turn to Helen. "That thing grabbed Cass! I thought you said they couldn't get us in the air!"

Confusion presents itself on the older woman's face. "I don't know how it did that! Kolvaxians have always had an aerial weakness!"

Tvoorik stares listlessly at the ground below. "Telekinesis. Volgrim."

"Huh? Telekinesis?" Samantha shoots him a questioning look. "You're saying that's how it nabbed Cass?"

The short demon nods. "Unique. She has too much energy. She's drawing their attention with her special-" Tvoorik pauses suddenly, and his eyes cloud over. He stiffens to gaze at us. "You will add to our perfection. You will increase our power. We are unstoppable. We are unrelenting. Do not run. Do not hide. Join us, and experience terror and bliss. Join us, and free yourself from pain and sorrow."

All four of us pull away from Tvoorik reflexively. I raise a palm toward him, readying myself to blast him with everything I've got. "Tvoorik... buddy? Are you okay? What's going on?"

Tvoorik continues to stare at us, his eyes growing more unfocused than they were a moment ago. "You are chaos. We are order. You destroy. We repair. You weaken, but we grow stronger. All will fall before us. None are worthy."

After a moment, Tvoorik blinks, and his breathing turns ragged. His entire body sags as if a great weight were released from his shoulders.

The four of us look at him uneasily. "What the hell was that?" Samantha asks.

Tvoorik rubs his eyes. "Their minds are strong. Their thoughts are overwhelming. I felt like I was connected to a trillion beings all thinking the same thing at once. It was... unsettling."

I think I'm starting to understand. As a Seer, Tvoorik can connect his mind to the consciousness of others, due to some telepathic abilities. Somehow, when he does this, it changes his personality, usually increasing his intellect. That, or he's crazy. I can't discount the possibility.

Cassiel reaches down and rubs her legs, then gazes at the ground below. The Kolvaxian from earlier is gone. "Tvoorik, who was speaking? Did you connect to one of the monsters?"

He nods and points at different spots on the ground below. "Yes. There, there, there. Three of them. They're hiding under the surface. I tried to unite my mind to theirs, but I was overwhelmed. I can't do that again, or I might lose myself."

"Okay. Let's stay high and hope they don't grab us again with... whatever they used." I turn to Helen. "You're certain they never had such abilities before?"

"Not that I know of. Perhaps they developed telekinesis recently. Kolvaxians adapt quickly, and constantly learn new abilities."

I nod, realizing time is even shorter than it was a few minutes ago. "Alright. We need a shortcut. I'm going to jump us to the Volgrim scientists. Be ready for action."

Aiming my mind, I target about where the bunker should be, even as a thought enters my mind. If the Kolvaxians were able to speak through Tvoorik, then were the words he spoke theirs? And if so, what is their goal? What do they hope to achieve? Are they not mindless monsters after all?

The five of us are engulfed by my spell at the same time. " Teleport. "

Part 477c: The Floor Is Lava

With a single word, I transport the five of us a dozen miles across the open plains, and we teleport a few hundred yards above the area Tvoorik pointed out from before. The instant we appear, everyone takes a defensive stance, and we put our backs to each other, whipping our heads around to search for threats. Now that we're much closer to the city, the smell of burning flesh and crumbling infrastructure force our instincts to sharpen. Something about the danger in the air forces the human, and apparently the angel and demon body to tense up.

The land below us, once covered by blood-red brambles, is now torn apart and ripped up. Fresh dirt covers everything, leading to a gross brown surface in every direction. If the Kolvaxians were walking around, they'd stick out like a sore thumb.

Tvoorik points again, this time directly below us. "There's a door. It leads to a hangar big enough to fit a small spacecraft. The scientists barricaded the entrance and are holed up inside, weapons at the ready. Their chances of survival are zero."

"Without us, at least," I reply. " Structure. " Using my Wordsmithing, I quickly create a mental picture of the internal structure, sending the information to the Crown to hold, and allowing it to create a new mental map for me. "There's a long corridor just inside- looks like the scientists have set up some auto-turrets. They use anti-energy in addition to plasma, so Cassiel's shield probably won't hold up. I'll teleport us where the majority of them have hunkered down. Cass, create your shield before we jump, just in case they freak out and start blasting."

Cassiel smiles tightly. "Right." She holds her hand up, and a balloon of white energy surrounds us, making us stand out in the sky, but no Kolvaxians appear. I'm worried their invisible arms or whatever will grab Cass again, though at the same time I keep wondering why they're hiding. Are they burrowing underground? Why the secrecy?

A passage from a book I once read comes to mind. Secret operations are essential in war. One significant advantage the Kolvaxians have is their secrecy. Even Helen, who has watched Jason Alpha fight them for a trillion years (or however long it's been) doesn't know how they operate. Nobody knows where they come from, or what their goal is. Total dominance? Peace? If we don't understand them, we can't fight them.

Maybe that's their action plan.

Cassiel shivers as a gust of chilly upper atmospheric air hits us, bringing the smell of death with it from below. "Shield's ready whenever you are, Jason!"

I aim my mind inside the compound. " Teleport! "

All five of us vanish and reappear, and it takes a few seconds to reorient ourselves once again. This time, I absorb the faces of hundreds of Volgrim pivoting to stare at us in shock, and their reflexes are put to the test once they realize intruders are in their midst. Before I can say "We come in peace," a hail of plasma smashes into Cassiel's force field, though I breathe a sigh of relief as none of the weapons they're using are anti-energy. I suppose they wouldn't be much use against the Kolvaxians, given their bodies have anti-energy in them. Why would that be the case, anyway?

" Malfunction. " I speak again, and every gun in the room jams at once and stops firing, courtesy of the Crown expanding my knowledge of their workings.

Helen quickly holds up her hands and speaks in fluent Volgarian. "We are your allies! Please stop shooting!" Her wording is slightly comical, given I just jammed their guns. Oh well.

Images of males and females shaken up over the losses of vast swaths of the population greet me as several of the scientists lower their trembling hands. Compared to the commanding presence of that Kryios Volgrim from before, these people are barely holding on to sanity. The room is filled with piles of guns, spears, metal boxes and benches overturned to form barriers in case of a firefight, and two of the four corridors leading into the room are completely barricaded. The path ahead leads to the hangar where the Kolvaxians will likely enter, while the way behind probably leads deeper underground where the scientists will be unable to flee any further. A deathtrap, my mind whispers.

"You! Who are you?" One male tentatively steps toward us, a gun in each hand. The Crown identifies the weapon in his right hand as a plasma pistol, while the one in his left fires anti-energy. Both are disabled already though, but I don't think he's realized it yet.

"We're friends. We've come to save you from the Kolvaxians," Samantha says, as she takes a cautious step toward him.

"Friends? You're not even Volgrim!" The male inserts a small amount of pride in his voice, though it sounds weak and ineffectual, given the circumstances. Unlike the scientists, this one has a slight air of authority to him, not unlike someone stuck at a dead-end job in middle-management. Essentially, he thinks he has power and authority, but really doesn't.

I sigh and heave my shoulders in the air. "Ah, I guess you're right. We aren't Volgrim. Well, since you're being picky, we'll just leave. I'm sure you can stop the planet-busting enemy force outside all by yourselves."

That calms him down. He glances at the others before looking back at me. "Fine, you've made your point. What can you do to help? The best weapons we've got won't last long, and now that they've converted the Elders, it won't be long before they simply shut down our defenses."

"I can't fight the Kolvaxians," I say, though in my head I think, at least, Jason Alpha can't. If he's more powerful than me on a scale of millions, I probably shouldn't chance it. "What I can do is get you out of here. Where are the other Volgrim on the planet? I want to teleport as many as possible to safety."

A female against the wall to my left gazes at me questioningly. "Why? You say you're an ally, but what do you have to gain from saving our lives?"

Nice. Questions. Just what I want to hear at a time like this. "I'm not doing this out of obligation; I'm doing it because it's the right thing to do." I turn to Helen. "I'm going to teleport them to Axis Mundi. That work for you?"

Immediately, her expression sours. "Please, no. Nobody is supposed to know of its existence. Keeping the existence of the angels from the rest of the galaxy is why Alpha created the place. Just put them in Hero City or something."

I pause to think about it. Hero City has a population of perhaps a hundred thousand. Most humans live on outer-worlds that Hero City's central portal hub links to. A few hundred Volgrim could comfortably fit in there, but there might be millions of others that I have to save. Hero City is a short-term plan, though when I put things in term of population, Axis Mundi is the far worse choice.

Wait, I just remembered a second option!

"Hey, you." I turn back to the Volgrim male. "You said the Elders were turned... were they the highest authority among Volgrim? Who's in charge now?"

The man stares at me blankly. "I don't know, human. There is no formal command structure right now. We've lost contact with the other bases. I suspect a signal scrambler is being aimed at the planet."

"Fantastic. That makes things easy." I speak two more words, aiming my mind throughout the cosmos to find the one I seek. " Locate. Teleport. "

A moment later, a familiar Volgrim female appears in the middle of the room, her mouth freezing open mid-sentence as the sudden change in surroundings disorients her. Her shock barely lasts a moment before she starts spinning around, looking at every individual in the room, taking all their images in at once as she tries to understand what's going on.

Her eyes spot me, and she continues to look around but does a double-take once she remembers my face. "Ah! You- what did- where-?!"

I cut her stammering off. "Dosena, long time no see, except not really."

The former Second Founder of the Volgrim blinks multiple times before taking a deep breath and staring at me, forcing a neutral expression. "Jason Hiro, what are you doing? I was right in the middle of something."

"It's an emergency. The Kolvaxians are about to wipe the Volgrim off the face of the galaxy, and your people need a leader to take command and gather-"

She holds a hand up to interrupt me. "Kolvaxians? Invasion? What are you talking about? I can barely understand what's going on."

Oh god. This is going to take a few minutes. As that thought enters my mind, the sound of automated turrets activating and firing hundreds of shots at once makes everyone in the room jerk their heads around to look back down the hallway that leads to the outside world.

Shit.

"Uhh..." I freeze, unsure how to speed things up. After a second, a solution comes to mind. I aim my mind at Dosena's. "Share."

A stream of thoughts and memories from the past few weeks copy from my mind to hers, including everything I know about the Kolvaxians, the battle with Satan, and even Jason Alpha.

A stunned expression passes over Dosena's face as she violently recoils from the sudden flood of mental information. She starts to fall backward, but once again Helen demonstrates surprising agility and dashes forward, catching the former Second Founder before she hits the ground.

"Jason! Give a little warning next time!"

Dosena's speech slurs for a moment, but she quickly shakes the handicap off. Pulling herself to her feet, she glares at me for a moment. "It's beyond rude to invade the personal space of someone else's mind. Something you would know if you were born Volgrim." After a pause, her anger fades. "That being said, I somewhat grasp the situation. Why do you need me?"

The sound of metal scraping against metal makes my back seize up as several turrets stop firing. A few others continue, but it's clear the Kolvaxians are ripping the static defenses to pieces. Many of the scientists smack their guns, trying to get them working again, but given I disabled them, that won't solve the problem. I quietly mutter, "Repair."

Satisfied their guns are working, the male from before starts setting up a defensive perimeter while I try to explain to Dosena what I want. She listens to me intently, but I can see she doesn't like it.

"I left that life behind, Jason. I'm not fit to lead a people I have nothing in common with. I don't know millions of years of their history, who my subordinates would be, or anything else."

You're free to put the refugees on Voldarius for a short while, but we haven't the food nor the living space for them to stay long. Your kindness is always going to be limited by external factors."

She gives me a fairly definitive no, but at the same time, food and living space aren't an issue, given I can just increase the planet's size with Wordsmithing. I don't have time to argue with her, and I got a 'yes' for the important question, so it'll have to do.

"Thanks, Dosen. I'll talk with you later. You need to reconsider for the good of your species. Teleport. " I don't give her a chance to deny me again, instead opting to send her back to Voldarius before she can respond. Then I quickly aim my mind at clumps of the scientists standing nearby. " Return. Return. Return. "

Each cluster of Volgrim takes a few seconds to focus on, send, then continue, and after a rapid session of mental math, I realize it'll take at least a couple of minutes before I can send them all.

Luckily, Cassiel notices. "Keep teleporting them, Jason. The four of us will attempt to slow the Kolvaxians down."

I nod and continue speaking. " Return. Return. Return. "

Cassiel and Samantha run to the beginning of the hallway that leads to the hangar. By now, the turrets have all been blasted to smithereens or destroyed. The silence from that direction is deafening, but despite tearing the defenses to shreds, no enemies have started moving down the corridor toward our position.

Tvoorik glances back and forth before grabbing Helen's arm and hurling her to the middle of the room. "Below!" She yelps awkwardly, right before spotting a Kolvaxian appearing from under the metal-plated floor. As if made of pixie sparkles and unicorn farts, the fucker jumps from the ground to swipe at where her leg would have been, before hissing and grabbing for Tvoorik instead. I pause my wordsmithing for just a moment to deliver a violent kick to the thing's head, but it sucks back underground in the blink of an eye, and I nearly shatter my ankle pounding the ground.

Tvoorik keeps his cool, and his eyes quickly begin moving around, roving the ground below as he mentally tracks several things below us. "Twenty-four. They can phase through solid objects."

"Great!" Helen shouts. "Everyone, watch your feet! They're trying to nab us one-by one and-"

She doesn't get to finish. One of the female scientists screams in fright as a Kolvaxian leaps from the ground, stabs its hand forward, and impales her through her stomach, then yanks her down, pulling her under the floor in the span of a single second. It's at this moment I realize the awful truth. Going underground was a fatal mistake. This is their most advantageous position.

Indeed, as long as we can't take to the skies, the green bastards can grab us anytime they want, and we're at their complete mercy. Since they have none, I have to move quickly, or else it won't be the scientists who fall today. For several seconds, as I continue returning them to Voldarius, I ponder sending my friends and I instead and leaving the Volgrim to their fate.

You can't save everyone, Jason. You'll never be a good enough Hero. You're nothing compared to the legends of the past. You're a failure.

A voice inside my head whispers to give up. It's that 'other me,' the one who haunts my dreams and turns them into nightmares. I can't listen to him. If he's right, then what am I fighting for? What's the point of anything? Why should I even-

"Jason! JASON!!!" Cassiel screams in fright as three Kolvaxians leap from the ground, one of them hissing and biting onto her shoulder as she cries out in pain, and the other two grabbing her by the legs and pulling her down. She tries to fight them off, but in less than a second, she'll be pulled under!

Samantha darts forward and pounds the first Kolvaxian that bit her right in the face, delivering a clean blow while grabbing Cassiel's hands at the same time. "Cass! Don't let go! Don't let go!"

Cass is already half-buried, and she screams in terror. "Get it off! Get it off!!"

I leap forward and pound the ground with my fist, then begin yelling out a word repeatedly. "Earthquake! Earthquake! EARTHQUAKE!!"

Violent rumbles start hurling people around the room as the planet transforms from a solid object into a tsunami of movement. I wrap my arms around Cassiel and pull up with as much strength as I can muster, but it's as if the lower half of her body is trapped inside a fucking black hole! No matter how the ground shakes and crumbles under my feet, it's like I'm trying to lift a skyscraper with my bare hands.

Cassiel slips down another inch or two, and several other Volgrim scientists shriek in terror as they're hurled around the room and grabbed in midair by more Kolvaxians, but I don't give a shit about them anymore. I won't let them take Cassiel! I won't!

Suddenly I feel pressure on my back, and a horrible pain as I realize several Kolvaxians have jumped on me and started biting. The anguish from an unknown poison rushing into my bloodstream almost doubles me over and makes me let Cassiel go, but I won't do it! I can't fail her! I can't allow the voice in my head to be right!

Samantha screeches in fear as a Kolvaxian leaps onto her back as well, then starts throttling her and twisting with all its might, cutting her voice off mid-yelp before biting a substantial chunk out of her shoulder.

Hah hah hah... I warned you, idiot. You'll be turned and transformed into monsters. You tried to fight a plague that even a thoughtsmith with tens of millions of years of experience couldn't overcome. You tried to play hero with the lives of a few hundred worthless Volgrim, just so you could feel good about yourself, all while ignoring the tens of millions the Kolvaxians already turned or killed. Why bother? Give up. Accept your fate with dignity.

A face appears before me as numbness floods my body. It's my face, again. What is this, the second time now? The third? How many times will you let them die? If only you were stronger! If only you were smarter! But you aren't, because you're worthless! You'll never put your mind to use, because you can't even-

Shut up!! Shut up!

My eyes jerk open as an idea forms. The crown! Use it, idiot!

Wordsmithing and magic won't work on these fuckers, and if that's the case-

" COPY! COPY! "

My mind aims outside the bunker, into the sky and the space above the planet. Several hundred Kolvaxian vessels lie in wait, but I only need one shot.

In the void, a tiny speck appears, insignificant compared to the size of a capital ship. Then, another does. Two tiny, trivial satellites, copied from the one orbiting Hero City.

Target! Aim! FIRE!!!

"Cassiel! Shield! NOW!"

I don't get a chance to find out whether she heard me or not.

A light, like staring directly into the sun, engulfs everything. A titanic beam of energy, caused by two fusion reactors blasting our position with every ounce of power they contain, destroys every speck of land for a hundred miles around.

The light transforms into darkness.

I can't see.

I can't hear.

I can't feel.

Maybe I'm dead. Nobody could have survived that. It was a blast powerful enough to rip apart two small planetoids. Yeah. I'm definitely, one hundred percent gonezo.

After a moment, my vision clears. I'm... falling?

Falling? Why?

Wind whistles past my ears. Cassiel is unconscious. Her sleeping face is cute... so is Samantha's. Oh look, there's Tvoorik and Helen, just above us.

Why are we falling?

Oh goodness, that's hot on my back. Where's the heat coming from?

Casually, I turn my head behind me. Oh wow, an absolutely massive pit of magma, and we're falling toward it. That is going to burn once we hit it. Yep.

I should definitely do something about that.

Aaaaaany time now.

Any second.

HOLY SHIT!

" Teleport! "

All five of us jump away seconds before splashing into a fiery hot death, and I send us way over to the east, where we land safely on a soft patch of ground. Our bodies smash into the dirt with sickening crunches, but I wheeze for a moment before tilting my head to look at the others. Cassiel landed on top of me, and Samantha just off to the side, but Tvoorik and Helen are a couple dozen feet away.

Cassiel's skin is discoloring, and fast. For the second time in a day, her soft complexion is mottling at a visibly alarming rate. Even Samantha's skin is doing so, though Tvoorik and Helen don't seem to have been bitten by the Kolvaxians.

" Hea- kah! Heal! Revert! Heal! Revert! "

I quickly repair the damage Cassiel and Samantha took, wheezing in satisfaction as their skin slowly reverts to its normal coloration. Reaching up to wipe my head, I suddenly notice my skin is greening as well. Shit! Idiot! Always give yourself medical attention first!

" Heal! Revert! "

My phlegm-filled throat thanks me silently as a horrible buildup of mucus vanishes.

As I wait for the others to wake up, I finally notice my surroundings. To my right lies the crater that my dual cannons in the sky formed. It takes me a second to comprehend the scope of the devastation. The entire city that the Volgrim once lived in is gone.

All of the scientists I didn't teleport out in time... they're dead. Cassiel didn't have a spare second to protect everyone. What if I hadn't rushed? What if I had realized the Kolvaxians could attack from underground? What if I'd just teleported them to Voldarius without wasting time explaining things to Dosen? I could have done that afterward. They're dead because of me.

I can only take solace in the fact that I killed a few of the Kolvaxians as well.

" Destroy. " I speak the kill command to each of my weaponized lasers in orbit, blowing them apart in spectacular fashion. Even here, miles below, I can see faint blips of light as the remaining energy in their reactors detonate, reducing two machines that may have given the Kolvaxians an extra advantage in the war to fragments of their former selves.

The clouds, while mostly uniform in the sky, split in half above the impact site where the lasers of ultimate death pierced them from before.

Despite the sunlit sky, I can see a few stars above. They're beautiful.

After a moment, I sigh. Those aren't stars, idiot. Those are Kolvaxian warships. In the next minute or so, they'll probably launch more pods to the surface.

Helen stirs. "Ahhh..." She slowly pulls herself together, a notable feat given her body was broken in several places just a minute ago. She rubs her back and cautiously pulls herself to a sitting position. "J-Jason...? Where- no, what happened?"

"I saved the day. We triumphed against the Kolvaxians," I mutter dryly. "Everything went according to my brilliant plan. No regrets at all."

She doesn't pick up on the sarcasm. "That's good to hear. What happened to the scientists- oh my goodness!" She suddenly notices the giant crater filled with magma bubbling in the distance. We're much too far for the heat to reach us, but a worry appears in my mind that it could erupt and shower us with agony, not unlike the figurative fires of Hell.

"Yep. That's all me. Best Hero in the universe." I toss my arm toward the devastation flippantly. "That used to be where the scientists worked. Nothing left of it now."

She stares at the crater for several long moments, as Cassiel stirs in my arms. "Are they all dead?"

"Mhm. The Volgrim, as well as the Kolvaxians. I doubt-" A thought occurs to me, and I pause. I may have leveled the area, but hundreds of pods fell from the sky. There might be other Kolvaxians underground nearby! Only Tvoorik can sense them.

I can't keep overlooking details. " Wake. "

Tvoorik suddenly jerks up, as alert as if he'd never been knocked unconscious at all. Still, he takes a moment to look around before noticing me. "What happened?"

I quickly fill him in, and he nods. "Ain't nobody around. They'll probably send more, but I dunno. We should get out of here, while we still can."

A voice speaks up from my left, startling me. "Yooo! What's going on, guys!" I turn to spot myself waving at me. Once I notice the glowing skin, I realize who it is. "Jason Alpha? What are you doing here?"

He smiles cheerfully before pausing to notice all the people lying around on the ground, dazed or unconscious. "Oh you know, I was doing a bit of this and that. I was gone a little longer than I expected, but otherwise- whoa! What's that giant crater? Where even are we?" He quickly looks around, and I stare at him in dumbfounded awe.

"Did you just get here?"

Harold appears at his side. "Yeap! I told him this was the wrong time coordinate, but this dummy never listens to some old geezer like me! Oh what do I know, I'm just a dumb, stupid old man!" He rolls his eyes and strolls over to Helen. "Heya sweetie! What've you been up to while we were gone?"

She flashes him a genuine smile before winking at me. "Oh, you know. The usual. Existential horror and terror coupled with crippling loss and the realization nothing we do will save every life."

Harold merely nods as he leans over and kisses his wife on the cheek. "'Bout par for the course, I'd wager- HOLY SMOKES! What the hay are you kids doin' takin' a vacation on the crater of a live volcano?!"

I sigh and shake my head. Wait until he finds out what they missed.

Part 478c: Consequences

Jason Alpha and Harold examine their surroundings, trying to figure out what's going on. It only takes the old man a few seconds, but the other me is a little bit slower on the uptake, and certainly more relaxed. "Helen, sweetheart... what were ya'll up to? This don't look like the ding-dang Labyrinth ta' me."

Jason Alpha nods. "This planet is familiar. The sky, especially. I'd never forget a purple sky. Where is this?"

Helen jumps to her feet and dusts her clothes off before quickly glancing at Cassiel's body, still laying in my arms. She hasn't awakened yet, even though I healed her. I get the impression there may have been feedback from my cannon that hit her and Samantha a lot harder than it hit me. "Now, Jason- err, Alpha, I mean... I'm going to tell you something that might... might make you a little angry."

The other me raises an eyebrow. "Angry? Pft, come on. What could you possibly say that would piss me off?" His smile slackens somewhat as Helen's somber expression greets him. "Are you serious?"

She nods. "This world is familiar to you because you've been here before. However, the volcano behind us wasn't here last time." She flicks her gaze over to Harold. "This planet is Melkin."

Both of the newcomers' smiles slowly fade. Harold rubs his chin. "Melkin? Ain't that the new Volgrim homeworld? Thought I told ya not to pop over here without an escort. It's mighty dangerous."

Jason Alpha's eyes dart to the magma once again. "Hold on... Melkin doesn't have any below-sea-level concave volcanos. This dirt was disturbed recently... were you in a fight?"

He asks the question, and I resist the urge to facepalm. No, Samantha and Cassiel are just sleeping at the edge of a volcano for no reason, dumbass.

Helen swallows audibly. "Yes, and the fight didn't go so well. Jason, Harold, this planet, and this entire galaxy, is under attack. The Kolvaxians have somehow traveled here, and they've been here a long time."

Both men turn deathly silent. Jason Alpha slowly rubs his right hand with his left, playing with an odd-looking ring on his middle finger. He slowly pulls it slightly off, then pushes it back on, repeating the process several times, like a nervous tic. "Helen. That's not funny. I've told you not to joke around. Your humor is the worst."

"Son, I don't think she's joking." Harold nudges Jason Alpha, but the other me doesn't respond. His cheek bubbles out as his tongue lashes around inside his mouth, and his eyes give Helen a thousand-yard stare.

"It- it's gotta be a joke. Helen wouldn't- I mean, we couldn't make a mistake- they couldn't show up here. We have the infection contained... we have the infection contained."

Tvoorik slowly walks over to Jason Alpha. "Launching. Up." He points to the sky, but it takes a couple of seconds for Jason Alpha to shake off the cloudiness in his eyes before he slowly tilts his head up.

In the space above, small specks of light begin descending toward the planet, but they're probably hundreds of miles away.

Alpha inhales sharply. "Invasion pods. I've seen those a thousand times." I realize after a second or two that he must be silently enhancing his vision or perception with Thoughtsmithing to zoom in on each pod. "Son of a whore. I can't- this is unreal. How could they have escaped the K universe?"

Helen rubs her hands together and bows her head before speaking, but she's barely whispering. "You shouldn't blame yourself for this, but... when Volgarius was destroyed during the Energy Wars, I think it created a tear in subspace. They probably entered through there."

Jason Alpha bobs his head. "Oh. Ah. I see."

Compared to his usual joking manner, he's a different person entirely. He's suddenly a human, and not a living god. He's seen the face of death and faced it head-on, but something about the Kolvaxians is worse than death to him.

After a few moments, the specks of light fade from the sky, likely landing somewhere out of sight.

"Fuck." Jason Alpha lowers his head. "I can't believe it. It's my fault. I never considered- I mean, I didn't think about the consequences. I should have realized-"

"Kid, don't beat yourself up." Harold grips Alpha's arm firmly. "You screwed the pooch, but you can still fix it."

"Maybe." Jason Alpha forces a smile, but it's half-hearted. "Or maybe not. If they've made it to this universe, we have to entertain the possibility they might be in other ones. I can't track them with Locate since their bodies interfere with my magic. It's a guessing game at this point."

Harold pulls away from Alpha and turns to his wife. "So you's was fightin' them here? What caused the crater?"

"Me." I quickly give them the bullet points on my death-laser and how two energy blasts melted away a chunk of the planet's surface.

Alpha clears his throat. "That was quick thinking, Sparky. A bit reckless, but I guess it got the job done." He gestures toward the girls, both of them still breathing shallowly. "Are Belial and Sarah okay? They haven't woken up yet."

"I dunno. I think they were hit by the energy more directly than me, hard to say." I pause, realizing what he said. "What do you mean by 'Sarah'? Her name's Cassiel."

"Uhh..." Jason Alpha pauses a moment before quickly shaking his head. "Oh, right, right. My bad. I must have mixed her up with... someone else." His playful demeanor from earlier returns, but there's a certain pain in every syllable, as if he's forcing himself to stay positive for our sake.

Alpha points at Cassiel and Samantha. "Bloop. Bloop. They should wake up now. You missed a bunch of radioactive scar tissue in their brains. Amateur mistake. I don't think Cassiel's aura was erected in time. Still, given this level of devastation, it's surprising you guys survived at all. Her abilities in this stream are something else."

"This stream?" I echo his words. "What does that mean?"

"Ehh... multiverse time travel stuff. Really boring, you wouldn't understand. Hell, I barely do, and it's my daily life."

Cassiel and Samantha both blink their eyes open almost simultaneously, and Cass slurps up some drool that was leaking out. "Oh god, what happened? I feel like I made out with the front end of a spaceship doing warp 10." I help her to her feet, and while she is a little shaky, she manages.

Samantha rubs her forehead and flops on her back. "I'll just stay here for a minute if you don't mind, love."

Alpha rubs his hands together. "Okay, so, if I understand you correctly, Kolvaxians are not only in this universe, but they also have made it to the Volgrim homeworld too? Pretty coincidental timing, if you ask me."

"Hey! What do you mean by that?" I try not to glare at him too hard, but I can't help my reaction. "Are you blaming me?"

Before Alpha can answer, Cassiel leans against me. "Um, Jason, we did activate a Sentinel that wiped out tons of the Volgrim reserve forces. We're not blameless."

Shush, Cassiel, I want to say, but I can't. She's right, after all.

"Oh gods, Harold, how long were we gone? I thought we came back after three RTU's?"

The old man shakes his head. "Ah, I screwed up. It's barely been one."

"One?! Well, that's fine. We got back in time to avert the destruction of Melkin, so it all worked out-"

Samantha raises her hand and interrupts him. "Um, excuse me! I have a question!"

Alpha flashes an annoyed stare at Sam for cutting him off, but begrudgingly sighs. "Yeah?"

"What's an RTU?"

I consider her question and realize I don't know either. I think Helen mentioned them once, but I wasn't paying attention.

Jason Alpha waves his hand nonchalantly. "Oh, you know, time travel jargon. Real-Time Units, meaning a fixed amount of time relative from one universe to the next. It's a little complicated."

Samantha nods, apparently satisfied. "I see. I have another question, then... are you going to let the Volgrim die? Those Kolvaxian pods were aimed pretty far away..."

Alpha fidgets around and messes with his ring again. "Well, you guys aren't needed now that I'm here. I'll call in some friends of mine and do what I can, but aside from obliterating their fleet in orbit, I can't do anything for the planet. Once they go underground, they're invisible to me. They've even learned to confound echolocation, so this planet is toast."

Helen slowly shakes her head. "What a shame. I should have checked in more often and tried contacting the Volgrim once and a while."

"It's not your fault, Helen. If anything, it's mine. They're showing up here because of what I did to this galaxy. Don't beat yourself up over my mistakes." Jason Alpha shakes his head and sighs. "God damn. I can't believe myself. If going back and changing my past actions wouldn't cause a split, I'd be able to fix this easily, but unfortunately, that's not how time travel works."

I want to ask him ' Then how does it work? ' but Volgrim are dying every second we waste, so it's better I don't take up his time. "I'll take us back to the Labyrinth, then. Are you sure you don't want my help?"

"No. Actually, I need to talk to you about what I learned while I was jumping around, but that will have to wait until later. Time's short, as you know."

A distant whoomph, like that of an explosion over the horizon, reaches our ears. Samantha jumps to her feet. "Okay, lazy time is over. Let's get out of here and stop slowing him down."

I stare at my time-traveling compatriot for a moment as a hundred questions enter my mind. They'll have to wait.

Before I can teleport us away, Jason nudges Harold. "You won't be any use against the Kolvaxians, gramps. You can fill them in on what happened. I'll be back... soon."

"Expected 'bout that much," Harold says.

Well, I guess I will be able to figure out what's going on, after all. A lucky break, for once!

Aiming my mind at Harold, in addition to the other four, I nod silently at Alpha. "See ya. Teleport. "

Just before we vanish, I catch one last glimpse of Alpha. He rubs the ring on his finger and bows his head, and a look of sadness washes over his face. A fleeting expression of loss.

Part 479c: Bonds

Papers covered in scribbles litter my desk. Some are drawings, while others have hastily scrawled notes, and all of them serve one purpose; solving the mystery. I've long wondered how the foundations of demon society were built, and how we managed to come out on top during the Energy Wars. Demons are not educated on our past, and instead, are told to set our eyes on the future. As such, only the eldest of our kind know the details of our rich history, and they keep those secrets clutched firmly to their chests.

The candle beside me sputters, and I quickly snap my fingers to reignite it. Some of these scrolls are essential to understanding our past, but I've only just begun the search. Time is my enemy. With Satan gone and myself assuming the mantle of leader over all demons, I have to understand where we came from to understand where we should go.

"Emperor Beelzebub." A female voice speaks out from behind me. Soft, fragile, alluring. I turn my head back slightly to see my beautiful assistant, Titania. Her blood-red hair, the color of fire, stands out against the black and gold armor she dons. I may call her an assistant, but as the eldest progenitor of the Phoenix from ages past, she's more of a warrior than an associate. Her job is to guard me, though such a task is more of a formality given my incredible magical power.

"Titania. Something to report?" I try to keep the annoyance out of my voice, but it isn't easy. I haven't left this room since I returned from the battle that sent Satan scurrying away like a whipped hellhound. Rumors are floating around regarding my absence, but I can't be bothered to entertain them.

She opens the door to the room slightly and steps inside. "I've brought the former Second Emperor, Lord Diablo, as you requested."

Her eyes dart to a spot just behind my chair, where I've been tossing wadded papers of useless information. Anything that doesn't advance my knowledge of the past is merely a distraction from my goals. As interesting as The Formation of the Siren Songs might be to scholars, that information is just a waste of my time.

"Good. Bring him in. You have the rest of the day off."

She smiles faintly. "Thank you, your Grace. I'll send him in at once. I hope your research turns out well."

Titania leaves, and I sigh as I wait for her to send in my old nemesis. Perhaps calling Diablo a 'nemesis' is giving the fool too much credit. He did part with his power too quickly for my liking. He probably knew something I didn't, which is why I'm going to interrogate him today.

A minute passes as I wait. My foot starts tapping impatiently, and I turn back to the papers on my desk. Many of them are benign, uninteresting at first glance. What I've discovered though, as I read through them, is that all the scrolls created before the end of the Energy Wars were tampered with. In fact, the editing is blatant enough that I was shocked someone would be so bold.

However, it isn't that someone has crossed out sentences, or wiped out whole lines. Rather, it's that where previously there were whole paragraphs, chunks might be missing here and there, as if they had never been written in the first place. References to people, places, and things are gone, like they never existed. Not even Diablo's magic is potent enough to undo what I assumed might be hexes or magic hiding the existence of said sentences.

"You rang?" Diablo's bland voice at the doorway makes me jerk in surprise. I quickly spin on my chair to face him.

He's wearing much plainer clothing than he used to as Emperor. His tall body is no longer as girthy as it once was, likely due to how much energy he's lost. He's slimmer now, like a demon who has gone on an extended exercise regimen. Oddly, Bael is the one everyone points to when it comes to body training, yet his bulk only increases as the centuries pass.

I take a moment to exhale, calming my nerves. "Diablo. So glad you could drop in."

"Uh huh." He rumbles in his throat, then yawns and stumbles over to a bench against the opposite wall and plops down on it, sighing contentedly. "Not like I had much choice. I thought you weren't going to bug me."

"I changed my mind," I say, narrowing my eyes at him. "You may have noticed the papers and scrolls behind me."

"Not really. I make it a point to avoid paperwork these days." Diablo flippantly tosses his hand in the air. "It's the easy life for me. I hope you didn't bring me here just because you couldn't handle the job."

"No! I can handle the job just fine, thank you very-!" I pause, realizing I just allowed him to goad me. He's pushing my buttons, deliberately. "This isn't about the job. I have questions that need answers. You were alive before the Energy Wars, and you were at the highest echelons of demonic power, so only you can answer them."

"Ah, so it is work." Diablo leans his head forward and rests it on his fist. "Can you make this quick? I want to sleep some more."

I nod slowly. "Do you know the true identity of the First Emperor?"

"Huh? Oh, you mean Asmodeus. If that isn't his true identity, then no, I don't."

I lick my lips slowly. "His real identity is Satan."

Diablo yawns and stares at me blankly. "Seriously? I guess that makes sense."

A moment passes, and the two of us gaze at each other. His blank expression meets my dumbfounded one. "That's it? You're not surprised, annoyed you never knew, or angry?"

He shrugs. "You're trying to get a reaction out of me, whelp, and you'll fail. If he's Satan, then it doesn't surprise me. If he isn't, then it doesn't matter."

With a flourish, I pull one of the scrolls from my desk and unfurl it in front of me. "It does matter. Haven't you looked into our history? Haven't you ever wondered what happened after the Energy Wars? Why did we end up in a position of subservience to the Volgrim? How did humans conveniently end up in our care where we could feed on them? Why didn't-"

Diablo holds up a hand, interrupting me. "Stop. I get it. You're the Second Emperor now, and you want to make a big impact by examining our past to change our future. I had thoughts like that at one point. I read the scrolls from the ancient tombs too. Nothing you find is going to change anything. It doesn't matter."

Slowly, I roll the scroll back up. "I'm not the Second Emperor anymore. I'm the First."

Diablo's aloofness vanishes and is replaced by surprise. I've finally gotten to him. "What? Bullshit. There isn't a chance you dethroned Satan, or Asmodeus, or whatever he calls himself." After a pause, he smirks. "You couldn't even beat me."

"I'm not lying, and I didn't defeat Satan. He's gone. He left the Labyrinth and our universe." I pause, thinking of how best to break the news. "I haven't told anyone else yet, not even Titania. Satan is a Wordsmith, just like Jason Hiro. He's traveled to another universe, or time... or something. He doesn't exist in our realm anymore."

My former superior takes the news quite well. "Ah. So that changes what, exactly?"

"What do you mean?! It changes everything! Confound you!" The flame of the candle behind me rises dramatically as my temper flares. "I'm the number one leader of demonkind! I need to know our history! I need to know what path I should take!"

Diablo sighs and shakes his head. "Hah... look, Beelzy-

"Don't call me that."

Irritation appears on his face, but he continues. "I was the Third Emperor for all of my life after the Energy Wars, but considering Belial was never around and Asmod- err, Satan didn't care about our people, I was essentially the First Emperor, just as you were once you took over."

Satan leaving doesn't change anything. Only one thing has changed in recent years, and that is the appearance of Jason Hiro. That's why you called me, isn't it? You want to know how to deal with him."

He isn't asking me a question; he's stating a fact. My nails dig into my knees as I stare him down. I hate how he reads minds without having any telepathic abilities.

"Maybe. I met another Jason, one who time travels just like Satan does. He bested Satan in a battle and made it look effortless. After the two of them left, I realized I couldn't hope to beat Jason Hiro, the one I know, let alone his other self. That one is a god on par with the Creator. But... but..."

A long silence follows. I struggle to find the words to say, though the thoughts fill my mind effortlessly.

I can't ally with humans. I hate them. Demons hate them. Even if some could forgive their differences, humans are food for us. Livestock can never be our equals, nor our allies.

Diablo rubs his hands together slowly. "I hate humans too, you know."

"What? You do?" I stare at the old codger in surprise. "Everyone calls you a human-lover."

"That's a lie. I'm too lazy to protest, so I just let other demons talk. The flaws that you see in humans are not the flaws I see. You see weakness, avarice, and greed. I hate that they represent the worst of demonkind unabashedly, without restraint. Demons at our worst can never compare to the pure evil a human can unleash."

Diablo turns his head away to stare at the room's entrance. "Were it just for the flaws of humans, I would see to it that they were hunted down and exterminated, soul power be damned. The problem is that not all humans are evil beyond belief. What humans possess in raw rage, hatred, and dark deeds, they make up for with equal quantities of love, generosity, and care for others."

A few moments pass as Diablo closes his eyes. "You weren't alive for this, but perhaps you can understand the situation on Earth before it was destroyed if I explain it carefully. Are you familiar with Mermaids?"

I raise an eyebrow at him. "Yes. Why do you ask?"

"Mermaids were a folk tale among humans. Some swore they existed, while others wrote them off as a tall tale for children's stories. Of course, Mermaids did exist, and they all died when the planet was destroyed, but they provide an excellent example of the human psyche."

Intrigued, I nod along. "How so?"

"The worst humans would lavish their lustful desires on mermaids, hunt them down, capture them, and do horrendous, vile things. Some would hunt mermaids for sport, turning their corpses into trophies to show off. However, the best humans would protect the mermaids with their very lives, offer them any amount of sanctuary, and would even form guilds on the sea to hunt down pirates and slavers. This is why the myth of mermaids persisted, even long after they had gone into hiding in the deepest trenches of the oceans. Occasionally, some lucky sailor would be treated to a kiss due to a mermaid observing his kindness. Perhaps he would release fish in secret back to the seas, and later would be tossed overboard by his more unscrupulous companions. The mermaid, seeing his kind heart, would swim the poor sailor back to land, saving his life."

Diablo finishes, and I continue nodding. "I see. So, what you're saying is that there are good humans, and bad ones?"

"Not exactly," Diablo sighs. "Humans tend to be very pure, or very evil. Most wars were caused by their worst, and yet they were usually ended by their best. The fact that demons are living peacefully among humans in their city proves they can show kindness toward our kind, even after all the fighting both sides have endured."

I quickly point at him. "Haven't you forgotten? The human king, Elshard, locked all of the demons in Hero City in work camps."

"Tch. After several demons attacked him in the safety of his palace," Diablo says, as he waves his finger at me chidingly. "And it was Jason Hiro, the one you hate so much, who had the demons released once he returned. Funny, hasn't he been the one trying to bring peace among the sentients for several years now?" Diablo suddenly glares at me. "And don't give me that bullshit about him killing and enslaving you. I know the trouble you've caused over the years, especially during your youth. You were a naive, petulant imp, from what I've heard."

The candle flickers in the room, and I cross my arms and legs, then lean back in my chair. "It's not the same thing."

"He was alone in the Labyrinth, demonic enemies at all sides. Once he began to understand the scope of the world he had arrived in, Jason Hiro began undertaking steps to repair the damage he'd caused. You were one of his victims, but he tried to help you fit in. He gave you a purpose and things to do, even if you loathed him for it. Honestly, he was too good to you."

"Too good?" I repeat Diablo's words, tasting them and rolling them around on my tongue. "Maybe you are a human-lover, after all."

Diablo's knuckles crack as he stretches once more before standing up. "Look, Beelzebub, it's simple. Humans ruled by a righteous leader will gravitate toward becoming a wonderful, loving, caring society. However, if they are taken over by a lunatic, a madman, one bent on the destruction of our kind, they may grow to be unstoppable. Why not lay the foundations of peace now? If you continue to attack them, you will only give their worst elements a voice. They will preach to any who will listen, and they will say 'Look! The demons are as evil as we warned! We should build horrible new weapons and wipe them out!' Is that what you want?"

"Well, no. I don't believe the humans can wipe us out, though. Even with the help of the Wordsmith, our numbers are too great. We can hold them back indefinitely."

Finally, Diablo grows silent. He eyes me cautiously, and a dreadful feeling fills the air. His mood darkens.

"What if humans aren't the real enemy? What if I told you there was another?"

"Another?" I force a smile. "You mean the Volgrim? Admittedly, they have technology that puts humanity to shame, but-"

"Not the Volgrim." Diablo shakes his head slowly. "Not angels, humans, or Volgrim. Something else. Something... worse. A plague."

My memories trace back to the battle between Jason Alpha and Satan. One piece stands out from everything else.

Quietly, my voice nearly a whisper, I force the words out. "Sentinels..."

"Huh? No, dumbass! Not the Sentinels either!" Diablo jumps from his seat and claps his hands together. "Something worse than- alright, seven devils, I'll just say it."

He pauses to draw a breath. "The Volgrim have been fighting an enemy in secret for millions of years. The reason the Volgrim care so little about the Labyrinth or exterminating us or anything else... they don't have the time or the resources to spare. The enemy they fight are unstoppable killers, which the Volgrim have dubbed 'Kolvoxians'."

"Kolvoxians," I repeat the name to mark it in my memory. "Are they dangerous?"

"Supremely. In fact, I received news very recently that the Kolvoxians might be pushing to attack the Volgrim core systems. If they fall, the Labyrinth, and demonkind, will likely be next."

"Seriously?" I can barely contain my shock. "But... the Volgrim are..."

"Unstoppable? Hardly." Diablo slowly begins pacing, balling the bottom of his shirt up in his fists as he stomps back and forth. "The Volgrim, from my sporadic memories of the Energy Wars, lost several times to the humans. Only their unleashing of the Sentinels put an end to the war. Perhaps. Come to think of it; I don't remember how the Sentinels were defeated." Diablo taps his lip thoughtfully before shrugging and carrying on. "In any case, the Volgrim are far from infallible. I know little of the Kolvoxians beyond what I've gleaned from the Volgrim council when I visited them. They were always spoken of in hushed whispers, but I could tell they terrified the Elders."

While Diablo paces, I fit the puzzle together in my mind. "If I understand you correctly, you think we should ally with humans, not just because you think such a peace would be beneficial for us, but because it would help us fight the Kolvaxians more effectively. Does this mean we should seek to tighten our bonds with the Volgrim as well?"

"Yes, though I fear it is much too late for that now." Diablo starts for the door but pauses before opening it. "I believe the Volgrim are already dead on arrival. If my message reached him in time, Jason Hiro might be able to do something, but I can only hope he can save them. More likely than not, he will fail."

"Don't give the fleshbag too much credit there, human-lover," I say, poking fun at the former Third Emperor. "I won't promise anything. Hell, you haven't answered the questions I asked when you first showed up."

"I have," Diablo replies, as he smiles at me. "The questions you spoke, and the questions you thought, they were not the same ones. I don't have the correct answers, anyway. I'm hardly omniscient. I'm just giving you my opinion."

For once, I smile at him genuinely. "Well, it helped. This is the second most useful thing you've ever done for me."

"What was the first?" Diablo glares at me suspiciously, before chuckling. "Oh, right. I hope you don't abuse the power I gave you. It comes with great responsibility."

"I won't. Everything I do, every step I take... is for the good of demonkind."

"As it should be." Diablo reaches for the door and pulls it open. "You know, Beelzebub, you should find a mate. If you get rid of some of your pent-up frustration occasionally, it'll do wonders to clear your mind. Perhaps that cute thing you call a guard?"

"Pass," I hiss at him. "Don't press your luck, old bat."

"Hey, I'm just sayin'." Diablo steps out the door and pulls it shut behind him. Just before he leaves, he says, "Take care, young one."

Minutes pass. I stare at the entrance, half-expecting him to come walking back through, but he doesn't.

Ally with the humans, huh? Should I?

I... hate them. Genuinely. Wholeheartedly.

I could never shake hands with that Elshard... the worthless king who shoved me into a work camp. Not even Jason Hiro could encourage me to form a bond with humanity.

However... there is one I don't hate. Not a human, but...

Part 480c: Dilation

The five of us inhale sharply as we arrive back at Axis Mundi. Well, Harold doesn't, but he's a robot. The stress of everything we've just been through hits us like a ton of bricks, and everyone, including me, slump down onto our butts. A dozen angels nearby turn to stare at us quizzically before returning to their business, and Cassiel lolls her head back to sigh at the ceiling.

"I'm glad we're out of there."

"Same," Samantha replies. "I saw my life flash before my eyes. I can barely understand what happened."

Figuring now is as good a time as any, I quickly bring her, Cass, and everyone else up to date on what's happened in the last 24 hours... so we're all on the same page. Tvoorik shakes his head and wanders away after a while, uninterested in our conversation, but Helen and Harold nod along, and Harold leans forward, interest in his eyes.

"Kid, sounds like you've had a heckuva time while I was gone. Still, y'handled it pretty well. You're more reliable than Alpha thinks."

"Uh, thanks." I try not to sound offended. "Just how unreliable does my grandfather copycat think I am?"

Harold coughs into his fist. "Kah, well, ahm- it ain't the way you think it is. I guess from yer perspective, we done left for less than a day, but from our point o' view, we was gone for a few years. He learned a bunch o' stuff, and he had a lotta time ta' think about'cha."

Helen jumps in. "A few years? Goodness, Harold! I know he gets sidetracked sometimes, but even for him, that's absurd! What were you two up to for all that time?"

Harold waves his hand dismissively. "Get off mah back, woman. Cripes, a few years ain't nothin' when you're as old as we is." The old man mumbles and grumbles for a second, but comes back around. "Truth be told, we lost the devil. Satan vanished, just like he always does. Even Cassy's energy wasn't enough to track the bugger."

"You lost him? I mean- how?!" I can barely keep my jaw from dropping. "Isn't Jason Alpha like, a god? His energy is ridiculous! I thought you guys had the drop on Satan!"

Harold holds his palms up. "Satan's done it a hundred- no, even a thousand times. Every time we catch him, he jumps away and vanishes off the grid. We can't track him or nothin'. 'S weird, too. Damned devil's a friggin' ghost."

A few moments pass as Harold hems and haws and his wife gently rubs his back. I don't know why she bothers, given his robotic body, but maybe he has skin sensors or something. He's probably hyper-advanced and I don't even know.

Samantha raises her hand. "Um, I think I might know why."

"Ya what?" Harold shoots her a curious glance. "Whatcha mean?"

Samantha rubs her hands slowly. "I don't know if I understand how you track Satan around... but it's something like when Jason-" She points at me, "-when Jason says 'Locate,' right? That's how you usually find him?"

"Mhm." Harold and Helen grunt simultaneously, giving me a chuckle. As husband and wife, they mirror each other occasionally.

Samantha turns to me. "How does Locate work for you? Can you describe it specifically?"

"Sure, I guess." I pause to think about it for a few seconds. "I say 'Locate,' then I picture the person I want to track, including their face and name. The better I know them, the easier it is to find them. It doesn't take much, though."

"Right. But aren't there limitations to your Locate ability?"

Samantha asks me the question, and I feel gears slightly clicking into place. "Well, sure. But those limitations are pretty simple. I can't locate inanimate objects or things hidden by anti-energy. Satan is neither inanimate nor able to hide inside of anti-energy, so he couldn't be exploiting those edge cases." I stare at her carefully. "Unless you mean that's what he's been doing?"

"No, I doubt that." Samantha stands up and brushes some dirt off her soft, wonderful butt. "But you said it yourself. You have to picture a face and a name. So what if Satan changes his face and name?"

"Huh?" Harold raises an eyebrow. "What would that accomplish? He'd still be Satan."

"It's just a hunch." Samantha rubs her arms and shivers. "I- when Jason here gave me back my memories, I remembered all of my interactions with Satan in the past. He would always start off as a giant demon, calling himself 'Asmodeus,' and when he d-drew closer to me, he would change his form back to his normal self and call himself Satan again. Since we know he has that mindsmithing or whatever, then isn't it possible he-"

Helen yelps, catching everyone off guard. "Gods! She's got it! He's changing his identity with Thoughtsmithing so we can't find him!"

The old woman's enthusiasm is contagious. Much like how replacing a burnt-out bulb in a Christmas light arrangement will reactivate the others, Harold rears up and smacks his fist into his palm. "Sonofagun! Yer right! How come- why didn't we think o' that?!"

Samantha smiles weakly. "I was m-more intimate with Satan. You probably don't know him as well as I do. I always thought it was weird he was pretending to be someone else. Now I know why."

I stare at my girlfriend silently, evaluating her presence. Her eyes glance away, toward the distance, the ceiling, anywhere but meeting mine. Dwelling on her past with Satan disturbs her every time she thinks of him. Considering she once professed her undying love for him, I can only wonder what memories I unlocked in her mind to evoke such a dramatic change in emotion. Now it's as if he's an enemy she wants to cut down, yet also fears.

The feeling of something latching onto my arm nearly makes me jump in surprise, but I quickly swivel my head to see Cassiel wrapping her arms around mine. "Sammy's pretty smart," she whispers. "But you're giving her a weird look."

While Samantha and Helen talk to each other about her theory, I keep my voice low, so only Cass can hear me. "Do you know what Satan did to her? I can see it in her eyes. She hates him now, but I don't understand why."

I feel Cass's grip on my arm tense up. "Oh, that's what you were- um. It's not my place to say." She pulls away from me suddenly and tucks her wings in slightly. "It's private. You should ask Sammy."

"I thought you'd say that."

Christ. I don't get women at all. Samantha, especially. She's been weird for a few weeks now. She keeps hiding trivial things from me, like when she wouldn't admit she beat the crap out of Diablo. I think it was because she didn't want to hurt my manly pride, but if she knew me as well as I wish she did, she'd know that wouldn't bother me at all. Hell, I'd be glad to have someone reliable like her at my side. If I had to protect her constantly, she'd feel useless and like luggage holding me back, and that would eat away at me as well. She's my equal in many ways, superior in some and inferior in others. Just like Cass. Both of them are the gasoline to my fire, lighting my passion and potential aflame. I want to protect them, but at the same time, I don't have to. They can hold their own.

Come to think of it; they've protected me several times now. Where would I be if Samantha hadn't crushed Diablo? He might have killed me, and all of those humans as well. As for Cassiel, her healing magic has saved countless lives, mine included. Not to mention her staggering spiritual energy capacity, like a miniature star waiting to explode into a supernova. When it comes to raw power, she has me outclassed. Hell, she dealt a blow to Satan that stunned Jason Alpha! She's incredible. Both of them are. I'm lucky to have them at my side.

Whatever Satan did that has Samantha running scared, that pissed her off, or anything else, I need to support her. It's not a matter of hurt feelings; it's a deep scar that wounds her more than anything else she's faced yet.

"I'm sure Alpha'll tell you that stuff," Harold says, interrupting whatever question Samantha just asked Helen. "We didn't do all that much, t'be honest. After Satan skedaddled, we spent a while lookin' for him, but our hearts wasn't in it. Then we went over to visit the Central Hub, 'n we chatted with the Maries. They told us some stuff about some o' the other universes, yadda yadda, all boring stuff if y'ask me."

"The Maries?" Cassiel perks up at the familiar name. "As in... Marie Becker?"

"Oh! Ya know her?" Harold scratches his face. "Odd. The one in this stream is a quiet gal. She ain't talkin' to the rest of 'em like she used to. How d'ya know her?"

He smiles pleasantly at Cassiel, unprepared for what's about to come. I flinch in preparation for a barrage of vitriol, but Cassiel keeps her calm, surprising me. "We're acquaintances." Despite her simple reply, the last word is overflowing with sarcasm.

Harold completely misses the venom in Cass's voice. "'Kwaintences, eh? That makes things real easy. Anywho, all the Maries oversee the Multiverse and do a bunch of stuff that would bore ya ta' tears. They make sure everything's linked up and nothin' asplodes. Stuff like that."

Helen nods. "She's a good friend, even if a little coarse and rough around the edges. Honestly, if it weren't for her, I don't know how we'd manage. Jason isn't the brightest-" She pauses, suddenly feeling self-conscious when she realizes I'm standing right here. "Err, well, she has certain qualities he doesn't."

Nice save.

Harold turns to his wife. "We're gonna have to pay her a visit as soon as Alpha gits back. She's gotta know bout them Kolvaxians. I reckon she won't be mighty happy."

"Alpha wasn't. Nobody is." Helen shakes her head.

The five of us gaze around for a few moments, until Tvoorik swaggers back over, seeing that our conversation has died down. "Alpha's about to pop back over. He's almost done with the Melkin situation."

"Already?" I stare incredulously at Tvoorik. "How fast does the guy move?"

"At the speed of thought," Tvoorik replies simply.

"Okey-doke, all done!" Jason Alpha's voice suddenly rings out, making everyone jump except for Tvoorik, who is already staring at the spot Alpha appears from. Teleporting in, Alpha strides into the middle of the circle, but the smile on his face seems more plastic than usual.

"What do you mean, 'all done'?" Harold asks, suspicion on his face. "You hardly had time to do anything. Don't tell me you brought in clones to do all the work again."

"Huh? No, no, definitely not." Alpha waves his hand flippantly, brushing Harold's concerns off. "I created a new dimension, put the Volgrim there temporarily and... destroyed Melkin. Just like I said I would. After that, the Kolvaxians fled in different directions. I destroyed a few of their ships, but most of them got away."

Cassiel and Samantha stare at him in stunned silence. After a moment, Cassiel is the first to collect her thoughts. "You destroyed the planet? Why?! Surely you could have-"

"I could have done a lot of things, Cassiel. I've tackled Kolvaxians in many ways, but total destruction is the most effective." Alpha rubs his back and stretches, yawning the whole time. "Besides, it's just a planet. There are plenty of other ones. Since the Kolvaxians are here, my top priority is to send out drones to scope out the galaxy, and once that's done, I'll know the extent of their corruption and how far they've spread."

"But... that was their homeworld..." Cassiel trails off and looks away, unable to protest. I guess he knows better than me, her eyes say.

Alpha, apparently satisfied with her backing down, continues. "I'm not going to bring clones in just yet. First I need to report to Marie. She'll know how to divert our resources as needed." He looks at Harold pointedly. "I could just make more clones, but you know what that means."

Harold simply nods, as does Helen, sharing a secret they keep between themselves.

Samantha decides to ask. "Why can't he make more clones?"

"It's not that Alpha can't, it's that it's very... inadvisable. There are risks with every clone made, but creating several en-masse is extra worrisome. Better to work with what we've got." Helen says, as she nods sagely.

Her husband continues. "The fewer time-jumpers, th'better the stability of the multiverse. And less people ta' point fingers at if somethin' goes wrong." He waggles his finger as if that explains everything.

"Oh, okay." Samantha drops the subject, her curiosity satiated.

Jason Alpha rubs his arms. "What a pain. Satan got away, Kolvaxians appeared, and then there's that other Source universe that appeared recently. I'll have my hands full for the foreseeable future if this shit keeps up."

Remembering what Samantha was talking about earlier, I quickly jump to my feet. "Oh! That's right! Samantha has a theory about how Satan is able to hide from your thoughtsmithing!"

"What, really?" Alpha is unconvinced, but he turns to face her anyway. "You have a theory? That's surprising."

"Thanks for the vote of confidence," Samantha mumbles.

Several minutes pass as she explains her theory to him about Satan bodyshifting. Alpha's sharper than the rest of us, and quickly gleans the needed details before she even finishes.

"Damn. That's smart. I dunno why, but it never occurred to me. Of course Wordsmithing can already erase someone from the universe, so he must be altering his energy signature, face, true name, and everything else when he changes form. The problem is, I've never seen him as Asmodeus before. Even if I had, once I jump over to him, he can jump away and change to something completely new. It's damn near perfect for countering Locate."

Harold nods. "Might be better'n anti-energy, th' way I see it."

Alpha paces back and forth slowly. "I need a better way to track him. I've tried bugging him before, but he's too sharp. He always keeps a careful eye on me, and the bugs fail. Not to mention he's always good about reading my mind, just as I am about reading his. Neither of us is good at surprising the other... except for this body-swapping crap."

"Uh..." I tentatively grunt out a rebuttal. "Actually, while you were fighting Satan... I managed to attach a bug to him. I wanted to tell which of the clones was the real one, but it might be possible to track him using my bug."

"What? Seriously?! Why didn't you say anything sooner?" Alpha scowls at me as if I were a child in need of an ass-whipping. "The trouble you could've saved me!"

"I kinda thought the almighty thoughtsmith had the tracking thing on lock." I try to keep the snideness out of my voice, but based on how he wrinkles his nose, I'm not successful.

"Great. Well, if you're able to track Satan, that makes my job easy. Come with me. I'm going to visit the Maries, and I might as well bring you along for an introduction. We need to find out who -and what- you are." His eyes narrow. "I especially need to find out if you're Hope."

"I'm not Hope. Don't be stupid." I return his subtle glare. "Anyway, maybe I don't wanna go. You're not the boss of me."

"Technically, I am. I can erase you pretty easily, kid." Alpha casually pulls back and examines his nails, like a prima donna. "You should come along for your own sake. It'll be a nice learning experience."

Cassiel and Samantha suddenly look worried, but I quickly put their fears to rest. "Fine, fine. I'll go. Is this going to take long?"

"Maybe, maybe not. Doesn't matter. We'll be back in a flash from their perspective." He beckons at Cass and Sam. "The bed probably won't even have time to cool."

"You're crude," Samantha snarks. "I don't know what series of events it took to create you, but you're also kinda... cold."

"You'd be surprised what a billion years can do to a person's social niceties," Alpha counters. "Anyway, when you spend every waking hour saving the multiverse, you can play the part of the polite galactic hero. I just do what needs to be done. That's all."

Alpha turns away and pulls Harold and Helen aside to whisper conspiratorial things, leaving Sam, Cass and I alone.

"Are you going with him?" Cassiel asks.

I nod. "Not much of a choice. Besides, it sounds like time is relative when you're... traveling. We'll leave and then reappear, and you won't even know we were gone."

Samantha leans against Cassiel and sulks. "If you say so."

"C'mon, Sam. Don't be like that! I'll be back in a jiffy."

"Uh huh."

She continues to sulk, and Cassiel wraps her arm around Sam comfortingly, leaving me out of their exchange. Samantha looks away, but Cassiel keeps staring at me. "I don't trust Alpha."

"Why not?"

"Something's off about him. I thought he was a little dumb at first, but it's not that." Cassiel shoots a quick glance at the other me, but he completely ignores us to talk with Helen and Harold. "Everything he does is deliberate. I can't see a billion-year-old person, whether he's technically 'you' or not, as an idiot. It might be an act."

"Or it might not," Samantha counters. "Satan and I are pretty old too, year-wise. After a while, age stops being a factor in personality. People don't change as they get older; they cement into their ways."

"Nothing about the mind is rigid," Cassiel replies calmly. The two of them continue their back and forth, embracing each other, but holding a somewhat intense battle of philosophy, which progressively moves further and further from where it first started.

Alpha appears at my side. "Okay! We're ready to go, buddy!" I nearly jump out of my fucking skin again. He's a goddamned ninja.

"Uh. Okay. Just one more minute." I quickly push past Alpha and run over to hug Samantha and Cass. Pulling them close, I ignore their little debate and kiss each of them quickly, then pull away, noticing they no longer care about what they were discussing. "I love both of you. We'll be back sooner than you know, okay?"

"Love you too," Cassiel says, though she suddenly chokes up at the words. She's not one to be all emotional at goodbyes. Strange.

"Yeah, same, love." Samantha slinks over and pecks me on the cheek. "Make sure you come back, or that's the last taste of these lips you'll get."

"Trust me; I wouldn't leave either of you behind even if my life depended on it." I quickly walk away and return to Alpha's side. "Let's go. Make it snappy."

He nudges me and winks. "What, you don't want a quickie for the road? Jeez, man. It'll be maybe a couple hours for them, but it might be a week or two for you. Don't want any pent-up frustration when you see Marie in her tight labcoat."

I glare viciously at him. "I've seen it. Didn't do anything for me. Now shut up and let's get going."

"Okay, okay! Don't say I didn't warn you." Alpha beckons to Harold and Helen, and as they walk up, he waves at Cassiel and Sam. "Okay you two, I'll borrow your boyfriend. Cya soon!"

"Bye, Jas-" Samantha starts to wave, and a second later, she's gone.

Uh, what?"

It takes me a second to realize my surroundings have changed. Axis Mundi is gone.

Whipping my head around, I quickly try to reorient myself. A giant, empty room, with metal plated walls, floor, and ceiling, along with a bunch of fluorescent lights. Only the four of us are here, nobody else.

Alpha scratches his nose. "Was that the first time someone else has teleported you?"

I nod. "Yeah."

"Now you know how everyone else feels. Welcome to the Central Hub." Alpha smiles at me, and an odd glowing feeling fills my body. This place is special; it exists outside the multiverse. Only a Wordsmith who's been here before can find it. Just a few people in all the universes have likely seen the place before, and they were all probably-

"Take off your clothes," Alpha says, as he continues to smile at me creepily. "You need to be decontaminated."

Uh. What.

Part 481c: The Central Hub

"Take your clothes off," Jason Alpha says, a weird smile on his face. "You need to be decontaminated."

A cold drop of sweat runs down my back. "Are... are you serious?" I suppose stripping down in front of myself isn't shameful or anything, but... Helen's watching...

Shrugging, I grumble silently to myself and start to unbuckle my belt, only for Harold to burst out laughing. "Haw! The son of a gun was about ta' do it!"

Alpha's body trembles as he holds a laugh in, but Harold's chortling puts him over the edge. "Pft! I can't believe you fell for that. Oldest joke in the book!"

My cheeks burn, and I quickly put my buckle back on. Helen looks away, trying not to make eye contact.

"Funny," I mutter.

The men laugh and slap their knees for a solid minute straight while I turn my back to them, silently plotting my revenge. It doesn't take long for my eyes to start roving around. The room is illuminated by lights in the ceiling, but aside from the bulbs, nothing else is in the room with us. The floor is made of tiled metal panels, perhaps two-by-two, all slapped together that form a series of squares which stretch out to the edges of the room. I wonder privately why Alpha would teleport here of all places. What's the point of an empty room?

Alpha and Harold finally stop laughing and regain their senses. Harold pokes me in the back. "It was just a joke, kid! Don't get all bothered by it!"

"I'm not annoyed. I'm just wondering what this room is for, if not decontamination."

I turn back to face them, and Alpha wipes away his last tear of laughter. "Oh, this place? It's the Arrival Point. When you're dealing with time travelers, and the worrying possibility that Satan or someone else could find it, you have to take several precautions."

He doesn't elaborate, so I nod expectantly. "Like?"

A pause. Alpha rubs his forehead slowly. "Well, for one thing, there are several levels of confidentiality involved with news of the future, past, things like that. It's need-to-know, and you don't need to know just yet."

From behind, the sound of metal grinding makes me flinch and jerk my head around. A slat in the ceiling and a camera pops out and evaluates us. Marie's voice squawks from an unseen loudspeaker. "Visit number?"

Harold takes a step toward the camera. "Ahh, it's about one four nine, six three three, one four two."

"About?" Marie's analytical voice pops out a single word. "Is it 'about' that number, or exactly that number?"

"Exactly," Alpha says, cutting Harold off. "What coordinate have we arrived at?"

The camera stares at us silently for several moments before Marie replies. "Looks like it's been about three thousand years since the last coordinate. I'm pulling up the files now." It takes a few seconds, but she coughs audibly before the camera shifts slightly to look at me. "Is this the variant you detailed the last time you were here?"

"Yup." Alpha keeps his reply short.

"So no identifier? Make sure he knows the rules before you enter."

"I will," Alpha promises. He reaches over and grabs my shoulder. "He's one of the good guys!"

"If you say so." Marie doesn't sound convinced. Her camera menacingly leans forward, almost shoving into my face. "You'll be under 64/5 surveillance while you're here. No funny business."

"No funny business," I echo, while wondering to myself, what's 64/5 about?

Without another word, the camera retracts, lifts back up into the ceiling, and the slat closes behind it. The sound of rumbling at the other side of the room draws my attention. When I look in its direction, I flinch as a doorway suddenly appears. A wall panel I hadn't noticed, roughly 8 feet tall and three wide, slides to the side, revealing a mystery area outside.

Alpha grunts under his breath. "Don't talk to anyone. If you do, they'll just ignore you. Also, stay close. There's anti-energy everywhere in this facility, and the potency of it is a million times worse than anything you've seen in your short life."

The four of us start trudging toward the door. "Why so much anti-energy?"

"Protection, Sparky." Alpha pauses at the doorway and looks up at the ceiling. "Imagine if Satan found this place. We'd want to be able to kill him the instant he arrived, and at a minimum prevent him from collapsing the dimen- Marie! Marie! You forgot the bracelets!" Alpha interrupts himself to howl at the ceiling. "Why am I reminding you of this? It's always me who forgets!"

Her voice sounds off once more. "I was... just testing you. Yes, that's what it was. You passed." Another panel opens in the ceiling, and Alpha holds his palm above his head, allowing four blue bracelets to land perfectly in his grasp.

He lowers his hand and grumbles again. "Testing me, my ass. I leave for a few thousand years, and you bums... mumble-mumble..." He trails off, and I don't catch the rest of it. After a few seconds, he presses two of the bracelets into Harold and Helen's hands, then stares at one of the two remainders before lightly tossing it to me. I catch it and note the glowing letters on its screen. Sparky. Funny.

As I attach my bracelet, I glance at his. Big Dawg 4162, it reads. Is he serious? Harold's and Helen's simply display their names, plus a string of digits similar to Alpha's. I wonder what the numbers stand for.

Finally, he pushes forward, and I follow after him, Harold and Helen behind me. Immediately, a sense of volume hits me, as if we've gone from a sensory deprivation chamber to the streets of Chicago. We enter a giant room that vaguely reminds me of a high-tech shopping mall, or like the New York Stock Exchange that I remember from before I entered the cryopod. Rows of computer screens hang down from the ceiling, each one displaying a vast array of technical data that makes my head spin. Elevators rise and fall, but they seem to ride on cushions of air, and are sealed inside tubes.

Helen helpfully points to them and says, "Hovershafts." They look pretty advanced. I suppose for a neanderthal from the industrial and computing age, anything from the future would seem sci-fi to me.

Fountains, gardens, all sorts of decorations are spread out all over the place. Several rooms, their occupants visible through soundproof glass-walls, are scattered around here and there. The room must be as wide as ten football fields. I can barely see the distant walls, which rise several hundred feet to a glass ceiling above. Up there, the soles of people's shoes are visible as they walk around on the glass, unflinching, despite how high they are. The glass looks like it could shatter all at once and everyone above would plummet to a gruesome death. I don't have much in the way of acrophobia, but even I'd be a little wary walking on that glass.

But what stuns me the most is the sheer number of people traveling around. While clumps of pedestrians stand together and talk, the majority of people just travel from place to place, barely looking at those they pass. Blinking, I notice not one, but two, three, and possibly more Maries, along with a bunch of faces I don't recognize, and occasionally a face or two that look cypasted from one person to the next. After scanning the crowd for a moment, I manage to pick out Benjamin Brown, and a few other vaguely familiar faces, but most of the people are unknown to me.

"Why are there so many Marie Beckers walking around? Who are all these people?"

Alpha politely waits, allowing me to take in the sights. "Time travel, as I've said, is very complicated. Marie and I couldn't handle the workload all by ourselves, even with clones, plus having fresh perspectives now and then is always good, so we started enlisting the help of various agents across all the different streams. Source universes tend to be an exception, but that's a bit beyond your clearance level. Pretty much everyone here will recognize me, but due to self-imposed restrictions, people are only allowed to talk with others under certain circumstances, especially when involving streams that are very similar and..." He trails off, tapping his lip. "...eh, it's boring stuff. Anyway, I need to meet with one of the top-level Maries here, and they'll probably interview you later. Don't overthink it."

He starts walking toward the crowds without waiting for a response, so I just shrug and follow him. Helen and Harold lock hands, and soon I find myself wading through the crowd. Their faces mix together in my mind, and soon I notice a person here or there staring at me curiously before quickly looking away. There's a general unspoken sentiment that I'm different from what they're used to seeing, but nobody vocalizes their thoughts.

Soft music plays from speakers all around, reminding me of elevator music, but perhaps a little more inspired. As we walk across a bridge spanning a pond in the middle of the gigantic stadium, I spot a man and woman dancing inside a room, love in their eyes.

Agents, huh? These people manage the time-stream, but they're still ordinary men and women, not robots.

After several minutes of walking, we arrive at a door with a series of buttons and sensors, and Alpha quickly starts typing codes, scanning his thumb, holding his eye open, and saying a string of nonsensical words. "The cat named Camilla jumped through the wire trap, the turtle-dove entered the last day of autumn, sixteen dwarves cooking over an open fire..."

That last part makes me curl up my lip, but I shake my head and look away. A person breaks off from the crowd and walks over to us, and I realize it's one of the Marie clones, except her hair is black instead of red, and she's wearing a bathrobe instead of something like a suit or more professional attire. It's not the sort of thing I'd expect her to wear.

"Jason Alpha? What are you up to this time?"

He shrugs. "I have to tell Marie Alpha a few things, and this guy here's an anomaly, so I've just got a bunch of work ahead of me."

She stops and stares at me for a few moments before turning back to Alpha. "Yeah, you do hate work. Well, I was just curious, that's all." She stares at me again for a moment before walking away.

I decide to offer my opinion. "The heck was that about? She's a little nosy. Dressed weird, too."

"Yup. She's not Marie, though." Alpha smirks. "The confusion is written all over your face. She's one of my clones."

"Huh?" I try not to stare at him judgmentally, but a look of disgust spreads across my face. "You made a clone of yourself, and turned him female? That's creepy, dude."

"Not really. I've done it several times before. There's a reason for all the madness around here." The door suddenly clicks audibly and opens up, and a shudder goes through my body, as if for a millisecond I were being blasted with anti-energy. Alpha stumbles slightly. "Oof, that's always jarring. Sorry for the pain, looks like you noticed it too. This is the part of the Central Hub where all the good stuff happens. Naturally, we keep it flooded with incredibly high concentrations of anti-energy. Even ordinary humans need to take pills to neutralize its effects on their body."

"Jeez. You guys take security seriously."

"Mhm. Stay close, within ten feet of me, until we're in the waiting area. If you stray too far... well, don't. Just don't."

Helen presses up to my side and locks her arm through mine. "Harold isn't affected by anti-energy, but I am, sweetheart. I hope you don't mind me staying close. Anti-energy will kill me ten times faster than it will you."

"No, it's fine, ma'am." I feel a little self-conscious having her so close, but at the same time she's like my great-great-ancestor by age, so it's not that bad.

We walk through the door, and as it closes behind us, I feel like I've entered the Twilight Zone. Space-age white walls, nondescript, line a long, narrow hallway with solid iron doors littered across from each other. The hallway curves up ahead to an unknown destination, and as Alpha walks forward, I realize the moment he moves too quickly that there's a sickness bubbling up in my stomach. I quickly pull Helen along and walk faster to match his pace. There must be a drone in the ceiling or something negating the anti-energy around him, which allows him to walk around without instantly dying. However, surrounded by anti-energy like this, I'd pity an enemy who tried to teleport away. Since we're enclosed with it surrounding us in a sphere, we couldn't make the jump even if we wanted. We're trapped.

The hall curves left, right, left, sometimes there are intersections, but unlike the mall-strip outside, nobody else walks around in these halls. It's only once we've traveled the length of several city blocks that we encounter the first Marie, a stray walking down the hall in the opposite direction we are. Her face is stern, and judging by the datapad in her hand and her pace- nonchalant without loitering, she's going to a specific destination. The Marie nods at Alpha and ignores the rest of us, but says nothing otherwise.

A minute later, we step into 'the thick of it.' Out of nowhere, Maries spring up left and right, walking up and down the hallways, some merely crossing from one door to the next. By chance, one of them opens the door to my right, and I catch a glimpse of what's inside. A dozen monitors, a chair, and a whole bunch of gadgets I barely see at all but would be hard-pressed to describe even if I could examine them thoroughly.

Observation rooms.

That's what I'd call them. They look like rooms where each Marie can monitor places or people undisturbed. If I had to guess, I'd say they're soundproof too, for maximum isolation. Windowless, nobody else around... sounds depressing. Who'd want to work here?

The crowd of Maries thickens, and by now none of them even bother acknowledging Alpha's presence, let alone the rest of us. The corridor feels more constricted than it did before, so I make sure to stay close to Alpha, along with Helen.

Alpha eventually slows his pace. "We're here."

We arrive in a wider, more open room, about the size of a large hospital check-in area. Chairs and benches line the walls, but there aren't any televisions playing football or gristly old men joking around about Vietnam like I'd expect from hospitals in the time I once lived. Just a whole bunch of Maries passing through.

Alpha's shoulders relax, even as another Marie pushes past him. "Now for the fun part."

"Fun part?"

"Yup." Alpha walks over to a counter where three Maries are parked, each of them with several holographic globes, computer displays, and other assorted gadgets spread out before them. I curse silently, wishing I hadn't stuck the Crown in storage. I could pull it out and instantly understand what these devices do, but that would be a terrible idea, given the security countermeasures here. They'll probably think I'm pulling out a bomb and instantly atomize me.

Gulp.

The closest Marie at the desk flicks her eyes up to glance at Alpha before lowering them again. "Your number?"

"One four nine, six three three, one four two," Alpha says.

"Uh huh. Purpose of your visit?" This Marie looks very unamused. I notice a streak of yellow going through her red hair, though. A way to distinguish herself from the others? Every Marie I've seen so far, barring Alpha's clone in the bathrobe, wears the same generic business suit or lab-coat, as if to designate their workspaces. Aside from that, they all look identical. When Alpha called his clones to fight Satan, those guys looked and acted unique from one another, as if they were doing so deliberately to send a message. Marie, however, seems fine with all of her copies looking and acting the same.

"I'm here to see Marie Alpha."

"Mmm." Receptionist Marie goes quiet for several seconds as if she's completely tuned us out. While she taps on the screen, occasionally glancing to her side to check some readout I can't see, Alpha flashes a smile at me. "She's determining clearance levels and a bunch of other stuff. It's boring stuff."

He sure loves calling everything boring, my mind mutters.

Seconds turn into minutes. I tap my foot impatiently as we wait, but Alpha just stares blankly at the Marie, almost looking through her. He's probably reminiscing about some past event or whatever. All the while, he rubs the ring on his hand, pulling it slightly off, then back on again, over and over. Without a rush of things to do, I casually examine the golden band. It has a tiny jewel inset, probably diamond, given its white color. The ring is very dull otherwise, but with a start, I realize it resembles the three archangel rings I'm wearing.

"Hey." I reach over and poke Alpha's shoulder. "That ring of yours... is there anything special about it?"

Alpha blinks and his eyes refocus as he returns to reality. "Huh? What? This?" An embarrassed expression floods his face as he sticks his hand in his pocket. "Oh, uh, it's nothing. It belonged to an old friend of mine. She gave it to me when she... well... never mind. It's boring stuff." He turns his head away, uninterested in continuing the conversation.

I wonder if the ring belonged to an archangel once, my mind whispers questioningly.

"Okay, we're all set." The receptionist speaks up, startling me. I forgot she even existed for a moment. "She'll see you in four hours, thirty-four minutes and sixteen seconds."

"Wow, she's bringing the hustle this time," Alpha says, as he whistles slowly. "Last time I had to wait three days."

"She is a very busy woman," the receptionist Marie says. Her tone is bland enough that I can almost taste depression. "Take a seat."

Wordlessly, Alpha beckons for me to follow, Helen pulls away from me and steps back to her husband. "There's no anti-energy in this room, so we'll part ways here. Try not to weep, cutie, but I'll hang on my husband, now."

"Darn," I say, smiling politely at her. She's a funny lady. "I'm the loser in this situation."

"Tootin' straight," Harold says, as he rubs his wife's back. "You got two of your own, kid! This one's my lady! Pahaha!"

The four of us wander over to the benches and sit down. Despite all the Maries going in and out of the waiting area, some to a pair of giant double doors on the opposite side of the reception desk, others to different doors and rooms elsewhere, not a single Marie ever sits down and waits. It's as if I'm watching lemmings traveling around from one place to the next. Why even build this giant waiting area? Do they get tons of visitors sporadically?

Harold and Helen start whispering to each other, and I don't bother to eavesdrop. Alpha leans back in his seat and sighs, then pulls another chair closer and kicks his feet up on it.

"Better get comfy. It'll be a while."

I don't take him up on his offer, and instead just lean back against the wall, silently watching the stream of Maries walking past. Just how many are here? A thousand? Several thousand? Why are so many necessary?

Time travel. Not just time travel, but multiverses. I'm not a complete idiot; I can take stabs in the dark at how they might work. There are a few theories I read, years ago. One of them is the idea of infinite universes... for every possibility, every choice we make, every random collision of atoms, there exists another universe where a different outcome occurs. One universe might have me defeat Diablo in combat, while in another I miss just slightly with my final blow and the battle ends in a stalemate, but then there's also my universe where I get beat down like a little bitch, and an infinite number of permutations in between.

Infinite universes... unlikely. I'd say, based on how Alpha reacted when he met me, and how he considers me an aberration, that there must be a finite number of universes.

If that's the case, then the other option is that time travel is what creates a new universe. If I travel back in time and kill a young Adolf Hitler, then a new universe will be created, one where he lives, and one where he dies. After all, if I kill him early, then that would create a paradox, since in the future I travel from, my reason for going back in time would change, and I probably wouldn't go back. The fact that the multiverse exists at all and that Alpha has suggested time travel is dangerous must mean the two are linked.

So if time travel creates new universes, what are the rules and restrictions? Could I grab a sports almanac from 40 years in the future, travel back to my current time, and simply live out a new life where I become an eccentric billionaire? Does traveling to the future create a new universe?

Hell, maybe they aren't linked in the way that I think. Maybe it isn't time travel that creates new universes. Perhaps time travel just jumps you from one universe to the next. What if I skip from an exact moment in time in my universe to an identical one in a different universe? Does time travel include universe hopping? Can I move between the universes at will?

Shit, then there's the question of the universes themselves. Do they vary dramatically? Alpha said the Kolvaxians were limited to just one universe, or 'stream,' or whatever... so is that universe different from my own? Maybe it's identical, except for the fact the Kolvaxians exist. Maybe people in the Kolvaxian universe have four arms and legs, and they can shoot web from their butts and crawl on walls like spiders.

Well, every human I've seen so far looks like I'd expect. I haven't seen one that falls far off the bell curve of acceptable dimensions. Then again, they might be keeping the weird ones in a laboratory somewhere. Given what Cassiel told me about Marie, I can imagine her making freakish Chimera monsters out of little girls and dogs, just to see if it's possible.

"You okay?" Alpha's voice makes me flinch in surprise. I was so lost in thought that I was off in la-la land. "You've been staring at the receptionist for five minutes straight. It's kinda creepy."

"I am? I mean, I was?" I quickly look away as blood rushes to my cheeks. "Uh, I was lost in thought. Just thinking about time travel and how it works."

Alpha turns away. "Cool." He doesn't say anything else, which feels a little rude.

"We're going to be here a few hours. Why not just explain to me how time travel works?"

"It's boring stuff." He shrugs and continues to face left, away from me. "And dangerous. We try to minimize the number of Travelers as much as possible. If you never time travel in your life, the multiverse will be better for it."

"Why?"

He turns back, a look of irritation on his face. "Whaddya mean, 'why?' Awful things can happen. I learned that the hard way."

Helen and Harold's conversation dies down, and I feel their gaze on my back. Still, I press him. "Can't you tell me, even in the vaguest terms, what happened?"

Alpha stares coldly into my eyes. "I had to exterminate an entire universe. It was the only way to be certain."

"Y-you what?!" My mouth flops open. Shock surges through me. "How- no, why? That seems excessive!"

"Yeah. Excessive." Slowly, Alpha licks his lips. "You remember your little pet Sentinel? The one Satan stole when he left?"

"Mhm." I swallow and realize I'm probably not ready for what he's about to say.

"Before the Kolvaxians, there was a different threat to the multiverse. It was entirely my fault. I thought I could just go back in time and save a woman I cared for, but in the process, I accidentally leaked information to the Volgrim. When they awakened the Sentinels, those robots learned of the existence of the multiverse, and that I could destroy them. They spread apart, rather than bunching together, and began to build an army of millions. We didn't realize until it was almost too late. Once we found out, the Sentinels launched their assault, and nearly gained access to one of Marie's beacons- the ones that allow her variants to travel from the Central Hub to each universe."

Alpha's lips dry up like an apple in the middle of the desert. "I had seconds, just a few precious seconds to come up with a plan. Given the options at my disposal, which were basically none, I opted to use the failsafe. I collapsed the entire universe, killing every soul in every galaxy across the entire span of its cosmos. Not only did I destroy those Sentinels, I also killed our agents, septillions of innocents, and the woman I loved. Ironical. I went back in time to save her life, and ended up killing her instead."

He turns to stare at the crowd of Maries cycling through the room. "I will never forget."

It takes me a moment to form a response. "Why not just collapse the Milky Way? That's still, you know, all of humanity, the Volgrim, etcetera... but still."

"Wouldn't work. I had to assume the Sentinels may have entered unseen dimensions, were outside the Milky Way, and may have even reached other galaxies. There was only one choice I could make at that moment." He shakes his head and slouches back in the chair, slowly sagging down until he's looking at the ceiling. "I learned about cause and effect because of that, and we devised many of the protection systems that you've seen already. Those include the confidentiality system, clearance levels, and even how this place is flooded with anti-energy. I realized how devastating it would be if Satan or a Sentinel made it into the Central Hub, and how much damage they could cause." Alpha smiles grimly. "They could destroy the multiverse, you know. They could destroy everything."

A long minute passes as neither of us says anything.

"Alpha, if you can collapse an entire universe..." I pause, realizing the significance of what I'm about to ask. "...then... does that mean Satan can, as well?"

He coughs. "Don't ask questions you don't want the answer to."

Oh god. That means yes.

Alpha closes his eyes. "Just shut up for a while, Sparky. This topic is boring. Time travel is boring. I hate it."

I nod, while staring at a clock on the wall. Four hours, twenty-four minutes left. He's given me a lot to think about.

I tilt my head to the right, and my eyes meet Helen's. She quickly lowers her gaze. "Don't judge him harshly, dear. You don't know what he's been through."

I nod slightly. She's right. I don't.

Sighing, I close my eyes. Maybe he has the right idea. I should just take a catnap.

Part 482c: Paralysis

My eyes close, but I can't sleep. I don't need to, anymore, but I remember a time when I once did. At some point, the spiritual energy in my body started giving me so much vitality that sleep became impossible. Still, I close my eyes for a short time and remember my past. All the struggles, trials, and tribulations. All the friends I've lost, and the enemies I've killed. They don't matter. None of it matters. If I want to see someone, I can just find a stream where they still exist. Will they be the same person I once knew?

Of course not. The difference between me from an hour ago and me right now might as well be the same as each iteration of my clones. My former self ceases to exist, and a new one takes his place, minute after minute, second after second, constantly replacing the old one.

So, in the end, maybe I haven't lost anyone at all. They still exist, just in different forms. The problem is that I can't look at them the same, treat them the same, or pretend to myself that they aren't different from how I remember. That's probably just because of my human psyche.

"Jason Alpha." Marie's voice to my left pulls me from my thoughts. I blink and turn my head slightly to look at her. She's one of the couriers, so not high up on the totem pole, but still highly intelligent. There isn't a 'stupid' Marie anywhere in here.

"Yep. Is it already that time?"

"Correct. Marie Alpha is ready to see you." Her eye flicks to my right as she evaluates Sparky. "Is that Jason coming along? I don't have him on the appointment roster."

I glance over at him, following her gaze, and shake my head. He's deep asleep, probably exhausted from his encounter with the Kolvaxians and all the chaos over the last twenty-four hours, from his perspective, of course.

"No. It's just me. He's a variant, one the Psyops division is going to evaluate." I stand up and turn to face her. "Lead the way."

Without replying, the courier Marie turns on a dime and starts marching to the double-doors across the room, opposite where we were sitting on the benches. Several Maries from the R&D division are in the halls today, maybe they've got a day off or something. I don't understand how each Marie can be so similar to one another, especially considering my clones go to such great lengths to differentiate themselves from each other, and me. Perhaps she's more of a collectivist, while I'm an individualist. Either way, she's still smarter than me, so maybe she knows something I don't. She's an awful lot like Satan, in that way.

I follow along, and soon the hallway becomes a blur as the inner sanctum flies by. The atmosphere is much tenser in here, and far fewer Maries roam the halls. Of all the sections, the Temporal Alignment Division is the highest classification level. Even Maries in the same room aren't allowed to share information with each other regarding each timeline. Marie Alpha says this is because even she can make mistakes, but I'm not sure about that.

Finally, we arrive at an ornate wooden door. The courier stops in front of it. "I've brought your visitor." Her voice transmits through a microphone into the room past the door, and after a few moments, a gruff voice responds.

"Yes, yes. Let him in already."

The courier steps in front of the keypad, blocks it from my view, and types a 45 digit password on the console. Even I'm not allowed to know keys unless necessary. It's fine; I'm the muscle, not the brains. I leave the heavy thinking to Marie.

The wooden door silently slides open and the courier nods. Without saying goodbye, she turns and leaves from the way she came. Here goes, I think to myself. Talking to Marie Alpha is always a pain, but an immortal demigod's gotta do what he's gotta do.

The room, as always, smells of dirt and plants. Vines hang from the ceiling, and the lighting in the room is dull compared to the harsh neon lights from outside. A gut-wrenching cough sounds off from Marie Alpha as I enter, making me flinch even though I can't see her behind her monitors. "Kah! Took you long enough. You've wasted fourteen minutes and thirty-four seconds getting here!"

"Sorry, Marie." I apologize, as always, and the door closes behind me. One of her lizards hisses from its aquarium-like container, and I stick my tongue out at it. She loves them, to be sure. The room has several dozen of the little buggers in glass containers all embedded in the walls, along with snakes, and an automated system for breeding bugs and dropping them inside. Their habitats have sticks, tiny trees, and all sorts of odd plants she's collected from various planets. The multiverse is ripe with life, but most of it is plantlike, not sentient.

I hear that familiar humming sound as her hoverchair hums to life, levitates, and she floats around her desk to face me. Like always, her body is unable to move, but she never accepts anyone's help with repairing it. I could heal a broken neck easily enough, and even the medical division could work miracles. For her, though, it's a reminder of the time she underestimated a Wordsmith. Her long grey hair and sagging skin show not only how old she is, but how she once lived in a stream before nanobots existed that could keep a person looking young and beautiful forever. Her looks are easily fixable with Wordsmithing, but that pride of hers...

Her head leans to the left slightly, but she quickly jerks her chair by tapping a button to re-orient her head. She's good at catching herself. "You're looking worse for wear." Her eyes jerk to my right shoulder. "There's dirt on your jacket."

"You look like shit too. Still can't beat me at ping-pong." Most people wouldn't give her any crap about her disability, but in my opinion, she chose to stay in a hoverchair, so it's fair game. Besides, even the other Maries walk on eggshells around her. If I don't poke some fun, who will? "I was busy fighting Kolvaxians. It takes more effort than most other things I do."

She smiles slightly, but it almost instantly fades as a look of concern replaces it. "Kolvaxians? I thought you were going back to investigate that Jason variant you mentioned. Why did you detour to 10K?"

Oh boy. Here it comes. "I didn't. The Kolvaxians have infested a new universe. My Source universe, to be exact."

"I see. That's... unfortunate." Marie doesn't pause or flinch at my words, almost as though she couldn't care less. I know better. "How long ago did the infestation begin?"

"I haven't looked into it yet, since we only just found out. After I fought the Kolvaxians, I brought Helen, Harold, and the Jason I reported on straight here. From what little I gleaned from the Volgrim survivors, it's been in the range of several million years."

Finally, her blank facade cracks. "A few million- what?! Your Source universe has been infested for that long, and nobody noticed?!"

The guilt is written all over my face. "We had Helen there monitoring the situation, but since she wasn't in touch with the Volgrim at all, she didn't know that they were warring against the Kolvaxians. I doubt the Volgrim realized what they were up against. From what I've heard, the parasites went incognito for a long time, spread their influence across the galaxy, then began their assault on the Volgrim out of nowhere."

Marie squints, which is her way of nodding. "Any guesses about the infection rate?"

There's a marble in my throat. "I can't be certain, but it's probably worse than 10K's progress."

"Oh." Her tone is hollow. "And how did they get to the Source in the first place?"

A question I can answer. "That would be my fault."

"Come again?"

This is going to suck. "Uhm. You probably don't remember, but-"

"I remember everything." Marie says, as she glares at me.

"Right. Well, when I destroyed Volgarius, the one from my Source universe, I may have broken a few quantum mechanics."

A long pause follows as she digests the information.

"You slammed a meteor made of solid, ultra-dense iron into the planet. If I remember correctly, it was traveling at low-warp speeds. Is that correct?"

I nod. "Yeah. I believe it may have ripped a hole in space-time. If I'm correct, the Kolvaxians probably traversed the multiverse to arrive there."

Marie flinches visibly. "Fucking idiot. It's unlikely the rip would connect to 10K alone. It may have allowed them to arrive in other universes and streams stealthily. This blunder could be a catastrophe, unlike anything we've ever faced before. You always screw everything up."

"Uh, eh-heh..." I chuckle weakly at her stinging insults, but they're just words, after all. "I was still young, Marie. Accidents happen."

"Spilling wine on your suit is an accident. Don't deflect. You broke the multiverse, so you have to fix it." She gnaws her lip for a moment before slowly turning her chair so she can stare at her lizards. She's told me in the past that they help her think. "For once, I'm stumped. We have just enough resources to keep the multiverse maintained. We have barely enough personnel to fight the Kolvaxians in a single universe, let alone the entire goddamn multiverse. How are we supposed to combat them?"

"I could just make more clones?"

"If that option were on the table, we'd have done it already. You know what more wordsmiths mean just as well as I do. More leaks. A higher likelihood of slipups. A greater chance of causality errors. The problem is that wordsmiths and thoughtsmiths are the only beings that can fight the Kolvaxians on equal terms."

She's always so pessimistic. "I disagree. A coalition of forces, made up of humans, demons, angels and Volgrim could fight the Kolvaxians. You should pour more resources into diplomacy, ensuring everyone gets along with each other so they can all combat the Kolvaxians as a combined military force."

Marie coughs. "Kuh. You think it's that simple? Every single universe is embroiled in conflict. Not one has managed peace among all four sentients, and several have exterminated one or more of them. In your Source universe alone, the angels are nearly extinct. In the L-series, demons are hanging on by a thread."

"We don't need all four sentient species to exist across the multiverse. If the four sentients can combine their forces in as many universes as possible, we could use my clones to shore up weaknesses in the universes and streams lacking a species."

She pauses to consider my idea. "I guess that's conceivable. Still, making everyone get along will be damn near- wait." A pause. She turns around and hovers over to her desk, then slightly moves her finger to tap a button on her chair arm and activate her mental interface with the computer. A minute passes. "Ah. Here it is. I meant to talk to you about this particular stream anyway. Do you recall the last time we spoke?"

I nod. "It was only a year ago for me. Why?"

"I told you about one of the universes that we had designated a Source universe. The Jason of that universe was not one of your clones. The Marie stationed there mollified him, and together they embarked on quite the journey. She was, eventually, able to force peace between all four sentients."

"What? She was? How?" I'm fairly surprised. "I thought you said no universe has ever managed that before."

"Mmm. Well, I say 'unified,' but it's only in a technical sense. Angels and humans get along quite well, the Volgrim are mostly neutral, and the demons are pacified. It's not like they're singing and dancing, but there isn't any war. That's a good first step."

"Yeah." I stare at the old woman for a few moments, several thoughts swimming around in my mind. "So, it sounds like you want to model other systems after hers? That could take a while."

Marie taps a button on her chair, and a mechanical hand drops down from the ceiling holding a cigarette, already lit. With a practiced movement, she turns her chair slightly and allows the hand to slip the fogey in her mouth and retract, then she inhales and exhales, all within five seconds. "It will. However, I want you to go to that universe, personally. This universe, as I've said, is probably the second Source. You've heard my theories on Source universes, so you know what that means."

I can already hear the alarm bells in my head. "Another Rewinder."

"Most likely. However, you've mentioned the other Jason you found in your Source universe. That would make for three Sources, across two universes, but there's a problem. There's a fourth Source."

"You're fucking with me."

"No. I'm not." Another long inhale, and the cigarette lights up visibly. Of all the Maries, she's the only one who smokes these days, and she does it despite the fact she instituted the no-smoking rule. Selfish as ever, I suppose. "Recently, it has come to my attention that Marie 12F, the one in charge of the second Source universe, was forced to retreat to the Central Hub. She gave the Temporal Council a disturbing account of a new Jason who appeared from nowhere. He arrived in a Cryopod, and his personality was decidedly... unhinged. Thanks to 12F's ingenuity, we were able to acquire a record of his memories. He's killed already, brutally."

"Brutally," I say, repeating the word. "You make it sound like there's already a theory going around about him."

She squints at me. "We've designated him 'Jason X,' but I believe he may be Hope."

Confusion. Uncertainty. A few distinct sensations bubble up like acid under my skin. "I haven't told you about the Jason I found in my Source universe yet. I thought that perhaps he was Hope. Now you're telling me this new one is, so what does that make the one I found?"

"I don't know. There are now potentially four Source Jasons, including yourself." The mechanical hand descends from the ceiling and pulls the cigarette from her mouth, just in time too, given it was about to burn her lip. She releases it at the last possible moment, and the arm drops the butt into a receptacle before retracting again. "You know as well as I do how dangerous Hope is."

Hope is scary. A funny sentence, under most circumstances. "Surely Satan is the more dangerous threat, or even the Kolvaxians. I can kill a mere wordsmith easily. Even if Jason X unlocks thoughtsmithing, I've killed Satan's clones hundreds of times. I think you've overestimating the danger he poses."

"Better to overestimate and preemptively nuke the motherfucker than let him snap my neck a second time." Marie spits the words at me, showing she still holds to the promise she made when we first met. Until I find and kill Hope for what he did to me, I will never fully heal. "A single wordsmith can likely collapse the entire multiverse. It's just luck Satan hasn't done so yet. That's one reason I consider Hope a greater threat than Satan. The First Emperor is an intelligent being, one who understands concepts like risk and reward. He values self-preservation. Hope, however, is unhinged. He's a lunatic. If he were to discover the existence of the multiverse, he'd probably try to take it over, or destroy it. He's a rogue element we can't take a chance with."

Eh, maybe she's right. Admittedly, Satan makes my stomach flip-flop when I think of the damage he could do, yet doesn't. Sometimes I wonder what his goals are. Does he still lust for revenge? Does he even care about the past anymore? Honestly, his clones appear, cause a little trouble to draw my attention, then get pulverized or flee, but they never cause major catastrophes. Indeed, the Kolvaxians are much more of a threat to the multiverse than Satan, at least given his past actions.

What if I left him alone? Could we form a truce? Is it too much to ask, putting aside our differences?

...No. That can never happen. Not because of Satan, but because of me. I hate him. It's irrational, and I know that, but I still do. He killed Amelia, and when she came back, nothing was the same between us. He genocided all of my clones on that fateful day, then fled and hid. I thought he was dead for a long time until I put the pieces together and realized he must have faked his death. He's always one step ahead, toying around with the lives of people I care about, playing like he's the Creator.

I can't forgive Satan. Not after everything he's done. It would take something incredible to change that.

"Fine. You want me to go to the other Source universe. That all?"

"Not quite. You have a list of objectives you need to accomplish. First, Jason 12F, the second Source, went missing. Jason X stated that he killed Jason 12F, but the memory files Marie 12F recovered don't corroborate that story. He defeated Jason 12F, and put him inside a crystal and handed him over to Yama."

"Yama, huh? He's a tough demon to pin down. I think I've seen him maybe three times across the multiverse."

A lizard chitters in its cage, and Marie rolls over to it, presses a button on her chair to release it, and lets the little reptile crawl onto her shoulder. "Mmm. Anyway, if possible, we would like you to recover Jason 12F's body to determine if he's still alive, and investigate Jason X. If he's a threat, do what you must. Don't hesitate. Beyond that, you have the usual directives."

"What about the Jason I brought along with me? What should I do with him?"

She grunts. "I don't know. After everything I've told you, do you think he's Hope?"

"Not really."

The lizard, a chameleon by the looks of it, stares at me inquisitively. A small pain appears in Marie's eyes, as if she wishes she could stroke its head or something, but the expression passes. "Well, perhaps you should take him with you. We'll perform a psych evaluation on him, and if he's clean, bring him along. I can't think of anybody better to keep an eye on him besides you."

I turn to face the door. "Fine. Make your interrogation quick. It's kinda weird you'd want him to come along with me. Isn't that a little dangerous?"

"Leaving him in his universe is much more dangerous. We can't spare any other Jasons to assist him, and if the Kolvaxians get their hands on him-" Marie stops mid-sentence, worry in her eyes. "Well, let's take every precaution so they don't. We can afford to lose a universe to the Kolvaxians. What we can't do is allow them to integrate a Wordsmith, or discover the existence of the Central Hub."

It takes me a moment to comprehend what she just said. "You want me to leave his universe undefended, and you aren't going to send anyone to assist? What the hell, Marie? That's cold, even for you. We should at least station a few Wordsmiths there and-"

"You don't get it, Jason. Like I said, if your asteroid ripped a hole in space, the odds that it would happen to enter only one universe, and that the affected universe would be the one the Kolvaxians originated in is astronomical. It's much more likely that the hole permeates all of time-space. That means the Kolvaxians may already be in every universe. I can't play favorites, just because the first infection we've learned about is in your original universe."

I quickly spin on my heel to face her. "You don't even know that other universes are affected! What if it's only my universe and 10K's? If we don't tackle the problem now, it'll be too late!"

"It's already too late." Marie's voice lowers. "The Volgrim were defeated in your universe. Jason 10K can't fight Kolvaxians on his own. Battling them requires a dedicated military, unified under one banner, fighting and innovating to keep the monsters on their toes. Since your Source universe lacks such a fighting force, dropping agents and clones in there is suicidal. I won't throw lives away for nothing."

"What about the lives the Kolvaxians are about to take if we don't help them?" I counter. "Those people, be they Volgrim, demon, or human, don't deserve to be turned. Nobody does. It's a horrible fate I wouldn't even wish upon Satan. If we don't put at least one clone there, and make them someone who's fought the Kolvaxians before, it'll be a goddamned slaughter!"

"I've made my decision," Marie says, lowering her eyes. "I'm not saying I won't send clones and agents. I just have to investigate the other universes first. First, we have to determine where in 10K they're pouring through. If it's at Volgarius Alpha's location, then it's a safe bet the same will be true of other universes. However, if they're entering through a hole located somewhere else, especially the Outer Rim, then we'll have to scour each universe. It won't be quick. Devoting resources to your Source universe preemptively will just mean that we have to risk lives in the more developed universes."

The more developed universes. Her words ring hot in my ears. "You mean your pet universes. Your projects. I know you're just toying around with some of them, Marie. Your scientific curiosity knows no boundaries."

"Don't be petty, Jason. We can argue until you turn blue in the face, but that won't change anything."

My shoulders sag. "Right. That much is obvious. I'll see you later, Marie." As I turn to walk to the door, I pause, and a smile creeps on my face. "Sorry for being such a pain in the neck."

Her glares burns holes in my back. "Fuck you."

My smile fades as the door closes behind me.

The things I do for 'peace.'

Part 483c: Disorientation

"How'd it go?"

I stare ahead blankly at the person asking the question. I'm looking at myself? No, wait, Alpha. Jason Alpha. He's asking how it went.

How what went? Did I do something?

I start to take a step forward, then suddenly realize I'm standing. Why am I standing? Wasn't I asleep? He went off to talk to Alpha Marie; then I dozed off. How did I get here?

Marie walks between us, then I feel the brush of another Marie's shoulder against mine, and another, and I realize I'm in the waiting area from before- that is, from when I was almost asleep, which feels like an instant ago. What? Evidently, the look on my face betrays my thoughts.

Alpha waves his hand in front of my eyes. "Hello? You're still Sparky, right? I didn't grab the wrong black-skinned glowing-tattooed Jason, right?"

"Me? What? Yeah. Thing? What thing did I- I went where?" My words are wrong. The order is incorrect. I don't even know what I'm saying.

Alpha nods. "Hmm. I guess they wiped your memory after the test. That makes sense. They probably leaked time travel details to you."

"They did? Who? Marie?"

Alpha nods and smiles, but shoots a glance back at Harold. "Yeah. Standard fare. They wanted to evaluate you and create a psych profile to make sure you aren't a threat to the multiverse. Can't have Satan posing as a Jason now, can we?"

"Uhh. Sure?"

An awkward silence follows. Alpha shuffles his feet slightly, before sighing. "Oookay, well, the fact they haven't thrown you in a containment unit means you're not the epitome of evil, so we should be good to go."

I slowly bob my head. "Oh, great." After arriving in this weird place and arriving in the middle of a crowd of Maries, unsure how I got here, I can't wait to go back to my home universe. This whole trip was a waste of time.

Alpha beckons for Harold and Helen to come along with us, but before they can make it the few feet from their benches over to us, one of the many Maries in the hall approaches us, specifically Alpha. "Before you go, please check Sparky's profile and sign off on his departure forms." She hands him a datapad, and he nods, tilting it away so I can't see what's on the screen.

"Hmm. Hmm. Interesting. I see." He nods mechanically as he skims whatever she gave him to read, and I start feeling a little antsy.

"You told them my name was Sparky? Seriously? And why can't I read that? It's my profile!"

Alpha raises his eyes up from the document, meets mine, then lowers them again. "All Jasons need a designation. Most are commonly referred to by their universe identifier for short. However, in your case, you come from my Source universe, so that would be kinda clunky. As for your profile..."

Alpha's expression darkens as he reads. "Very disturbing."

"Disturbing? What the hell does it say?!"

He shakes his head slowly. "Based upon the memory files they've recovered, it seems that you..." He pauses, as if for dramatic effect. "...hate puppies. That's disgusting. You're a monster."

I stare at him for several long moments as he continues to read, all while the Marie waits patiently, not even tapping her foot. "I don't hate puppies."

"I know." He smiles. "But I had you going, didn't I?"

"You're an asshole."

"You're me, so back at'cha." With unparalleled bantering skills, he deflects my attack and immediately returns to the datapad, scribbles something on the screen with his finger, then hands it to Marie. "Thanks."

"No problem." Her dry voice grates on my ears as it has every time up to this point, and she walks away, leaving us alone.

Alpha stares at me for a few moments, a thoughtful expression on his face. "You're me."

"I know. You just said that."

He shakes his head. "No, the memories are identical. I knew your body was familiar, but it's been so long since I saw it. You have the power of the three archangels. Gabriel, Raphael, and Michael."

"Um. Yes?" His sudden pressing about my past makes me uncomfortable, especially given how lost I feel right now. "Is that a problem?"

"I wonder." He chuckles wryly. "I ended up giving those rings to someone important. I guess you got your hands on them, somehow. They're probably the same rings I once owned."

Whatever he's saying makes no sense to me at all. I remember how I obtained my rings, and that was via a battle with Bahamut. Then again, Alpha's been alive a long time. Did he give the rings to Bahamut? Why?

Before I can ask, Alpha continues. "Everything about you is identical to me. I don't know how you arrived in my Source universe, but seeing you reminds me of my past. I don't like that."

From what I've seen of Alpha, he smiles and jokes around here and there, but sometimes his eyes hollow out, as though he's just putting on an act. For what purpose, though? For whose benefit?

"What happened in your past?" I ask, but quickly follow up with, "Besides destroying an entire universe."

"Many things. I've done a lot I'm not proud of."

"Like what?"

"Things." Alpha turns away and gestures to Harold and Helen, who are standing beside him now. I didn't even notice them there. "They know. Being a hero doesn't always mean being a good guy. Sometimes you have to make choices, and both options are the worst."

"Like killing a whole universe of people?"

"Yeah. However, the choice is sometimes whether to save your best friend or the woman you love. Somehow, those events burn more than the former."

I think I get the picture. Alpha somehow was unable to save someone important to him, even with the power of Wordsmithing. It's caused him to feel resentment and anger, but he covers up those emotions with jokes and sarcasm because he still must perform his duty, even if he doesn't always want the job.

"I'm sorry things turned out like that for you."

Alpha nods. "It's in the past. Boring time travel stuff. Can't change it, can't fix it. Anyway, enough chit-chat. Let's get out of here. We've got a mission." Immediately, he starts walking toward the exit.

"A mission?" I let Helen take my arm, and we fall into line behind Alpha. "What do you mean?"

"Didn't I say? We're on a mission to investigate the second Source universe. A lot is riding on this. There is a suspicious new Jason who has appeared, and we think he might be--"

"Hold on; I didn't sign up for that!" I interrupt him before he can finish. "I thought you were bringing me here for an evaluation, then returning me to my universe. Why do I have to go with you?"

"I want to keep an eye on you," Alpha says, without looking back. Several Maries, all clustered together, pass us in the tight corridor. "Also, you might prove to be relevant. The Jason we're investigating is probably Hope."

Hope? I repeat the name in my head. "You think he's shown up now?"

"Mhm."

"So you need me to come along... because... why?"

"Like I said, to keep an eye on you."

I scowl. "I don't need you to do that. I don't want you doing that. You're kinda creepy sometimes."

"It's not up for debate," Alpha says, as he suddenly stops and turns to face me. Fire burns in his eyes. "I don't know who you are, or where you came from, but there are an awful lot of coincidences surrounding you. I know it sucks being yanked away from your cute little girlfriends, but the entire goddamned multiverse is at stake."

"So you expect me to leave them behind?! What about the Kolvaxians?! Those monsters nearly tore them apart the last time we fought!" An urge to punch Alpha's stupid smug face boils up in my gut, but I resist, given he can splatter me all over the floor. It's smarter to use my words, not my fists. "You're telling me to go dawdle off for god knows how long, leaving them to fight in a warzone!"

Alpha groans. "God, how many times have I told you? That's not how time travel works! We can jump back to five minutes after we left and they'll barely even notice you were gone!"

Cautiously, I stare him down. "We can return to a point right after we left?"

"Exactly!"

A thought clicks in my head. "Doesn't that mean there's no rush to do this mission?"

"What?" Alpha's jaw slackens. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"I mean that if we can travel back to that time, then surely it works the same way for the mission. Whatever universe and time you plan to go to, we could spend a year in our source universe, then jump to the mission location and it would be the same as if we went now."

Alpha's face contorts in disbelief. "Well- I mean, that is..."

Helen squeezes my arm a little. "It isn't the same, not when we're dealing with other travelers, sweetheart. Satan is still out and about, and the Jason we're going to investigate, who might be Hope, is a big problem we can't leave unattended."

"How is it different?"

"Can't say." Helen cuts me off with two quick words, but then she turns to smile at Alpha. "You know, dear, it wouldn't hurt for us to go back to his Source universe for a day or two. Let's not be sticklers for the rules just because Marie barks an order."

I glance around and check, but no Maries are in the hallway. Somehow, given all the implied surveillance, it feels like a bad idea to insult her, but since turrets don't pop out of the walls and litter our bodies with anti-energy, we're probably okay.

Alpha rubs the top of his head and closes his eyes. "God, why do things always have to be so complicated? A single alarm about an activated Sentinel has turned into the biggest, dumbest mess of my life, and I've lived a long time!" He turns away from us to face down the corridor and quickly starts walking, so I pull Helen along and follow after him.

A minute passes, and Alpha tromps along but says nothing. Finally, he relents. "Cripes. Fine, whatever. We'll go back to your Source, you can say hi to your girlfriends, and then we're leaving. Okay?"

"Thanks, Alpha," I reply, gratitude and sincerity prime in my thoughts. He's an asshole, but he isn't impervious.

I mouth thank you to Helen, and she winks at me. Alpha's not that bad, you just have to use the right words, her expression says.

* * *

Many minutes later, we pass through the exit to the Marie section of the Central Hub, and into the Agent area, before arriving back in the room where we first started. A blank, empty void where the only visible color is white.

The door closes behind us, and Alpha taps some buttons on what looks like a smartwatch with holographic functionality. "Harold, do you have the stream synchronized?"

"Yeap, pretty much."

"Good." Something about Alpha's curt reply irks me, like he doesn't believe in Harold's ability to synchronize or something. "Once Marie drops the barrier, we'll jump."

"Hey, question." I shoot a suspicious glance at Alpha. "Last time you said you were going to come back after three days, but you returned in less than one. How reliable is your method for dating when to return?"

A drop of sweat visibly slides down Alpha's neck. "P-pretty reliable. We usually get close to the mark."

"Usually?"

Alpha quickly looks away, right as Marie's voice plays over the loudspeaker. "Jason Alpha, your exit slot is one-four-nine, six-three-three, one-four-three. We're lowering the anti-energy field now."

He exhales audibly, but I cut him off before we can jump. "Are you ignoring me?"

" Travel! " Ignoring my interruption, Alpha barks the word out, startling me, and a second later the room vanishes around us. A jarring transition occurs as white walls disappear and reappear as dark stone ones.

Blinking, I look around and try to reorient myself. This place is... the outpost? Yeah, the one right outside of Hero City.

It takes me another moment, but I quickly notice there's nobody else around. Not even a guard.

"What the hell? Why did you bring us here? I thought we were going to the girls in Axis Mundi!" Pausing, I wave my hand to indicate the empty room. "And where is everyone?!"

Alpha grunts. "You interrupted me. I was trying to focus my mind, and you kept asking dumb questions. I couldn't focus on Cassiel, so I brought us here. Jeez, just gimme a second."

A second passes. Then two. Three.

Harold frowns and taps his smartwatch. "Son... this date..."

Alpha glowers at the old man. "Shush. I found her. Cassiel and Samantha are about two hundred miles away, as the crow flies. Cassiel seems distressed, like she's fighting or something."

"Fighting?! Two hundred miles?! Where did you take us?"

Harold holds up his watch to show me its display, but the string of numbers means nothing to me. "We missed the return doohickey. It's been 'bout two months 'n sixteen days since we left."

Two and a half months?! My mind blares several alarms at once. " Locate! " Instantly, my mind finds Cassiel, partially thanks to Alpha giving me a ballpark estimate of her location. " Teleport! "

Leaving the other three behind, I catch Alpha's mouth open as he starts to yell 'stop!' However, it's too late. I'm already gone.

A moment later the deafening sound of an explosion makes my ears ring. I'm knocked backward as a grenade erupts, sending shrapnel all over and hitting every chunk of my body.

"Ah!" I let out a weak yelp and go flying back, hitting something unthinkably hard, and probably metal.

After a moment, my ears stop ringing. I blink and gather my wits, start pulling out chunks of metal from my body, then yell, " Heal! "

War. A battle of epic proportions is taking place in front of me. I quickly scan the horizon. I'm inside the labyrinth, but it's barely recognizable. Massive chunks have been blown out of the walls, and enormous sections of labyrinth walls litter the landscape, raising into the air like tiny office buildings. The ground is uneven, descending into dips and valleys, and the room looks like it's been deliberately carved out to form as much open space as possible.

My blood cools as I realize the awful hissing noises are from Kolvaxians. " Storage. " Within three seconds, I place the Crown of Solomon on my head and pull up my mental map. This place is very close to the portal that leads to Volgarius Alpha, the world where I found Ionis. Did the Kolvaxians already find it? Are the humans okay?

God, I can't believe I'm thinking of them at a time like this. They've been turned by now. No way they escaped the Kolvaxians. More importantly, where is Cassiel? Samantha?

"Undulating Joy: Oh look, it is the biological that left this unit without a companion." A robotic voice behind me makes me jump to my feet, though I wince from the pain.

"OMEN?"

"Response: Correct. That is my designation. I see that your mental faculties have degraded by less than one-point-three percent."

A horrible scream of a man being tackled by monsters makes my stomach flinch. "I don't have time for this. Where is Cassiel? Where's Samantha?"

Turning to look in the direction of the arena-like area, I flinch as three men rush past me, guns raised, oblivious to my presence. They jump toward a Kolvaxian that appears from nowhere and blast it in the chest and brain, and the human-like monster hisses in agony before disappearing back into the ground.

One of the men holds his hand up to stop their charge, then taps something on his ear before rushing forward. Once again, a different Kolvaxian, female this time, jumps up and attacks them, but they manage to get the drop on her before she can hit them. She dips back into the ground, and I stare in awe all the while.

"They're fighting those monsters... and winning? How?!"

The ground vibrates underneath me suddenly, as if a micro-quake were occurring, and a moment later, it stops again.

"Thoughtful Response: Given your first question, the answer is that the biological designated Cassiel is currently on the frontlines inside the arena. This OMEN unit does not know her precise position. As for your second query, the biologicals are losing ground slowly to the Kolvaxians."

"They are?" I shoot him a questioning glance, but the robot stares blankly at me.

"Amusement: The biologicals are unable to combat the Kolvaxians fully. Soon all will be transformed into Class C biologicals, except for this OMEN unit. It will likely be disassembled and thrown in a landfill. Poetic."

I ignore his weird quirkiness. "But they were fighting those Kolvaxians just now! And winning!"

A hand grabs my shoulder and a deep voice barks in my ear. "What the fuck are you doing standing around, dipshit?! Grab a gun and help us fight, you little pansy-ass piece of-" The voice cuts off suddenly. "Jason?"

I turn to see who's talking. It's Benjamin Brown. He stares at me in shock. "It's World War goddamn Seven out here, and you've been off smelling roses and scratching your ass! Where have you been?!"

"I was only gone for a day. Jason Alpha screwed up and returned us much later in the timestream. Are Cassiel and Samantha okay?"

He notices the urgency in my eyes. "Yeah, kid. They're fine, for now. The problem is, these goddamn scum-suckers are already inside the Labyrinth! We can barely keep them in this area by blasting sonic pulses in the ground, but they'll escape soon enough, and everything'll go to shit!"

Sonic pulses. That must have been the vibration I felt. "How long have you guys been fighting the Kolvaxians?"

"Two weeks." An explosion a hundred feet away makes Ben flinch, so he grabs my jacket and hauls me over behind a wall. The sound of plasma-fire in the distance is like a jackhammer pounding into a vat of jellybeans. "We fight nonstop! My boys barely get a few hours of sleep, and have to constantly reinforce each other! Don't even think about poor Tvoorik! That son of a bitch hasn't slept at all!"

"Tvoorik?"

Ben nods. "Yeah. Tvoorik's the only one who can sense the little bastards. He's using those earpieces of yours to coordinate our troops wherever the monsters show up."

More questions answered. Great. "Where's Cassiel? I'm going to go help her."

"The fuck you are." A voice just to my side makes me jerk up in surprise. Alpha's standing there, staring at me. "I'll take care of this. This time. Don't go rushing off just because you have a death wish."

I nod at him. "I won't. Sorry."

Alpha growls as he looks toward the battlefield. "Fucking hell. They've already made it here. I'm going to have to take drastic measures."

Drastic measures. I don't know if I like the sound of that.

Part 484c: Deus Ex Machina

"I'm going to have to take drastic measures," Alpha says. His eyes sweep around as he evaluates the battlefield. "Once Kolvaxians arrive in a place like the Labyrinth, they can't be stopped. If we're lucky, one nuclear blast should annihilate enough space that it will destroy the gate they're arriving from, and erase those caught within. I'll have to work fast, though."

I don't get to offer any protest because Ben grabs and shoves me aside. "You're going to go nuclear?! Not a chance! We've got this under control! I don't want you here!"

"I'm not asking for permission," Alpha says. "You should pull all your troops out. I'll give you ten minutes. That's all. Anyone caught in the blast will be as dead as if the monsters had turned them anyway. A quick death is a blessing in disguise."

"You can't do that." Ben lowers his voice and looks around warily. "I don't care if you are a wordsmith traveling through time. We've been fighting these bastards for two weeks now. Reinforcements are coming. We're about to start pushing back. If you use the nuclear option, we'll not only lose good men and women; you'll also undo all of our preparation."

"Preparation?" Alpha shoots a confused look at Ben. "There is no 'preparation.' The best minds across the multiverse have been fighting the Kolvaxians in the 10K universe for millions of years. They lose territory every single day. You don't stand a chance at beating them. Now that I'm here, we're doing this my way."

"You... you little... fucking..." Ben growls deep in his throat. "This ain't the 'Tenkay' universe. We thought you were gone forever, once the first two weeks passed without your return. Given that bleak reality, we poured our blood, sweat, and tears into formulating a defense against these parasites. I will not let you come in here, swing your dick around, and destroy our hard work."

Before Alpha can reply, I grab his arm. "Hold on. Alpha, didn't you say that you couldn't detect Kolvaxians once they were underground?"

He flashes a look of irritation at me. "Yeah. So?"

"We can. That is, they can. Ben and his team. Tvoorik can sense the Kolvaxians, and he's coordinating attacks on them whenever they pop up."

As if to emphasize my point, three Kolvaxians leap from the ground several dozen feet away and tackle a female commando. Before she can land on her back and get sucked under, six soldiers jump out from behind rocks and pepper the green-skinned monsters with the same metal barbs we once used against the Grez. The powerful kick of the weapons knocks the soldiers slightly off their feet, but the damage to each of the three Kolvaxians is incredible. Their chests explode outwards as the bolts smash into their back, and one of the monsters' heads is blown half-off.

The two that manage to survive hiss at the soldiers, then clamber off the woman, and suck back into the terrain. To my surprise, the lines attached to the bolts go underground with them. With remarkable agility, two soldiers each grab hold of the lines, tie them together, and attach a small device. They then jump back, and the gadget sends a visible current of electricity through the cable, likely hitting the affected Kolvaxians attached to each wire.

Alpha narrows his eyes as he watches the scene. Suddenly, a flash of realization appears. "Tvoorik. Wait! You mean that one little demon? The Oracle variant?"

Ben nods, but continues to glare at Alpha. "Yeah! As I said, we've got the situation under control! He tracks them, then sends the information to our soldiers, and we coordinate our attacks. If you blow up the battlefield, he'll die!"

A strange smile appears on Alpha's face. "Incredible. I didn't- that is, nobody has ever been able to track Kolvaxians once they go underground. The anti-energy in their bodies confounds my locating abilities, and echolocation pumped into the ground is too slow to follow their movements." After a moment, his smile disappears. "Still, even if you can track them, you can't stop them. They'll fan out, slither past you, and enter the labyrinth, turning everyone they encounter into more Kolvaxians. The time to stop them was before they arrived, not after. You're just too late."

Cassiel's voice startles me, as she flies down and lands beside me. "I'm not losing faith. Jason, where have you been?" The first sentence is directed at Alpha, but the next at me. "After you jumped away and didn't return, Sam and I thought you had died!"

"From my point of view, we were only gone a few hours. Alpha screwed up and returned us to the wrong time. I'm sorry I frightened you." I quickly lean over and kiss her on the cheek, then pull away. "Alpha wants to nuke this whole place, killing all the Kolvaxians in the area."

"I know," Cass says, as she touches one of the telepathic earpieces. "Ben relayed the conversation to me. Samantha is due back any minute. With the help of the demons, we can return fire and push the monsters back."

Alpha grumbles audibly. "I'm telling you, even if Tvoorik can sense their position underground, you can't contain them! Every second we waste, they crawl further away. Once they're out of nuclear range, you lose, end of story."

Ben shakes his head. "No, you're wrong. They can't escape this quarantine zone, not yet. We're blasting the ground every ten minutes with high-frequency sound waves, disrupting their movement. Every time they pass a certain boundary, Tvoorik gives the signal, and we hit them again."

Alpha spends several seconds staring Ben down. Awe appears in his eyes. "You figured out a way to prevent their movement." It isn't a question.

"Yes," Cassiel interjects before Ben can reply. "And whatever you were thinking of doing, don't. You've done too much already."

"What do you mean by that?" Alpha turns to eyeball her suspiciously. "I saved your asses twice now."

"Once." Cass corrects him. "Against Satan. Thank you for that. However, you also destroyed the Volgrim homeworld, Melkin. Then you left, and took Jason with you, leaving us no way to travel to Voldarius. The extra Volgrim might just overload their planet's scant resources. I doubt they have enough to survive."

For once, a look of anger spreads over Cassiel's face. "More importantly, what you did was unforgivable. There were millions of Volgrim still alive on Melkin. You killed all of them. I don't like your tactics. I don't like you. At this point, you're as big of a threat to this galaxy as the Kolvaxians are."

Alpha takes a step back, visibly stunned at her proclamation. "What the hell? You can't be-" He's interrupted as the ground rumbles violently once more, likely due to the sonic pulses Ben mentioned. "You can't be serious!"

"I'm dead goddamn serious." Cassiel takes a menacing step toward him and stabs a finger toward his face. "You told us how the Kolvaxians got here. You're the one who opened up the wormhole, so it's your fault they're here in the first place! Not only that, but you opened the wormhole when you destroyed the Volgrim homeworld the first time! How many times are you going to destroy their homeworlds?! Three? Ten?!"

Her words remind me of what Alpha told me in private. He destroyed an entire universe once. Come to think of it; he's killed more sentient beings than anyone here, including the Kolvaxians.

Who's the true monster?

The other me grumbles and looks away. "Fine, fine. Cripes. If you can't handle things, don't come begging me for help. I need to take Sparky and get out of here, anyway. We've got a mission to take care of, and-"

"I'm not going anywhere. Not yet." I interrupt him before he can finish his sentence, which visibly pisses him off, but I don't care. Cassiel's opinion holds more weight than this self-proclaimed champion of justice, and I'm interested in learning how she figured out how to combat them. "You just stay back. I'll help Cass out, and together, we'll save our universe."

Cassiel taps her finger to her ear and looks away for a moment. "Sam's back. She's back!" As if the rest of us aren't here, Cassiel ignores our presence, jumps into the air, and flies away, likely to meet up with Samantha.

Ben sighs, and relief washes over his face. "Thank the gods. Jason, you want to help, right?"

I nod quickly, realizing he isn't talking to Alpha. "Yeah. What's up?"

"I need you to use your brain. You can create objects and machines out of thin air, right?"

"Yeah."

"Great. You'll make the next step much easier."

* * *

"Oh my god! Jason!" Samantha squeaks excitedly and jumps into my arms, nearly knocking me over. "We missed you! Where have you been?!"

Her delight at seeing me feels out of place, given the carnage taking place just around the corner. Cassiel, Alpha, and Ben watch from a few feet away as we stay outside the Containment Zone, where the sonic pulses prevent the Kolvaxians from escaping.

"Time travel stuff. It's boring, really," I say, as I shoot a glance at Alpha. Sam pulls away from me, and her smile is much more radiant than I last remember. Usually, it's Cassiel who smiles innocently, while Samantha always looks like she's thinking something lewd, but their roles seem reversed, at least for the moment. "So these are the reinforcements you brought?"

I gesture to the group of several hundred demons waiting patiently on the sidelines. Each of them has an air of nobility, as if they're more than just grunts meant to meatshield in battle. Confirming my suspicions, Sam nods. "Yes, these demons are brave Lords, all of whom wish to help protect their home. I couldn't find any Dukes in time, but Lords are quite powerful too."

Alpha is unconvinced. "What will a few hundred demons accomplish? You're fighting a nearly unending horde that will keep pouring through the portal. No matter how you struggle, they will still win. The best you can hope for is pushing them back out of the Labyrinth. They've-

"

"Shut up already," Ben grunts. "We told you to stay out of our business. There is a plan, and you're not part of it."

"Fine, fine." Alpha throws his hands in the air and starts to stomp away. "Sorry I asked."

He continues to walk, and soon he's well out of earshot. Though, my mind whispers, he could always pretend that's the case, but enhance his hearing with thoughtsmithing, and we wouldn't even know. Hell, he could read all of our minds too.

It's probably better I don't think about it.

Once Alpha's gone, Ben grins at the giant crate full of items I've synthesized. "You made our job a lot easier."

Samantha, who wasn't here when I made them a few minutes ago, stares at the items curiously. "What are those? The barbs look nasty."

I glance over at the circular objects. They're small enough to fit in the palm of someone's hands, and the underside has a row of metal spikes shaped similarly to porcupine quills lining the edges, with a thicker, longer lance in the middle. It's about the length of a horseshoe stake, and is sharp enough to etch metal.

Ben's grin widens. "These bad boys are how we'll take the fuckers down. They're multipurpose tracking devices. If our frontliners can slap these on a Kolvaxian, then we can track them anywhere, allowing Tvoorik to rest for a while once the time is right. They're explosive, and they can deliver an agonizing pulse of electricity right to the monster's spine. They pack a punch."

I nod. "They're nearly impossible to pull out, thanks to the reversed barbs on each spike. Not only that but if a Kolvaxian tries to remove the device, it self-destructs."

Samantha slaps her fist into her palm. "Oh! So if we attach these to every Kolvaxian, they aren't even a threat anymore!"

"In theory," Ben replies, caution in his voice. "The 'Spine Mines,' as I call them, won't prevent a Kolvaxian from attacking someone, but we should be able to detonate the device and kill them anytime we want."

"Really?" Alpha appears again from nowhere, making me sigh. "But don't you have to get in melee range to use them?"

Ben scowls. "Didn't you leave? Never mind, don't answer that. Yeah, we have to get up close and personal to slap the Spine Mines on, but that's why we have Tvoorik."

Alpha nods. "I'm beginning to get the picture. To be honest, in the 10K universe, Oracles are mostly extinct, along with the rest of demonkind. The Kolvaxians hit their Labyrinth first. We didn't have a way to track them initially, but if we had, it could have perhaps made a small difference."

Ben glances at me, then back to Alpha. "If that's your idea of a compliment, thanks. The problem is, it ain't all Oracles who can sense where Kolvaxians are. Only Tvoorik can. Probably because he's a Unique Variant."

Samantha reaches into the crate and pulls out one of the Spine Mines. "Jason, love, you should make more of these. A whole bunch more, even. I'm going to join in on the fun."

I nod. "Sure thing."

Alpha raises an eyebrow. "Even if you can locate their positions and you have this 'foolproof' plan, I don't see how you can be so nonchalant."

Samantha smiles brightly at him, like the midday sun. "I'm not! I'm just looking forward to tearing them apart, especially after what they did to Cass a couple of days ago."

It occurs to me that there might be a hint of madness in her eyes. Alpha and I left for nearly three months... I wonder what happened during that time.

Cass rubs her shoulder. "It was barely a scratch. You don't need to work yourself up on my account."

Samantha ignores her and grabs a second Spine Mine. "Jason, could you be a dear and make some more of those telepathic earpieces for the Demon Lords? I'm going on ahead by myself for the moment."

"Sure thing, Sam," I say, feeling momentary deja vu.

She motions to several of the Demon Lords, and they nod at Cassiel, barely acknowledge the rest of us, and form a line to grab two Spine Mines each.

While they do that, I aim my mind at Cassiel's earring. " Copy. Copy. Copy. " Each time I copy, I add the copies together, creating two, then four, then eight...

Within fifteen copies a goddamn mountain of earpieces lies in a heap, separating Cassiel from me. Stacking up to chest level, they clog the hallway a little bit. Each of the demon lords looks at me, reluctantly takes one of the earrings, then continues after Samantha, though many of them have to jump the pile to keep moving.

Cassiel clears her throat. "I think that's enough, Jason."

"Yeah. I figured as much."

Not wanting to dilly-dally, I continue copying the Spine Mines, though due to their size and complexity, I can't copy them en-masse as I did with the earpieces, but I make do, churning out more and more of them as the minutes pass.

Alpha wanders away to observe the battle, leaving Cassiel, Ben, and I alone. Cass twiddles her fingers together as I pause to take a break from the copying. "I'm glad you came back. To be honest, I didn't think, even with our planning, that we could beat the Kolvaxians without your help."

Oof. Here it comes. "I'm not here for good. Alpha wants to keep an eye on me. He thinks I'm Hope."

"Hope?" Ben frowns. "I mean, I guess, in a way, you're the hope of humanity, but--"

"He doesn't mean like that," Cassiel says, correcting his line of thinking. "You didn't live in the Labyrinth, so I guess you wouldn't know, but at one point Jason created a few hundred clones. One of them turned rogue somehow, took me hostage, and then Jason unlocked his new powers as the 'god-king' and saved me. However, a catastrophic battle nearly ruined Hero City. Jason barely eked out a win against his copy."

Ben scrunches up his face. "What's that have to do with hope?"

"Hope was the name of the clone who turned evil," Cass replies.

"Really? Sounds like a stripper name." Ben shrugs and looks toward the battle. "I'll be back. I need to see how things are going."

Cass nods. "Okay."

Ben walks away, leaving Cass and me together. I glance down at the pile of Spine Mines. "We should go. They need us on the battlefield."

Cassiel pokes at the pile of earpieces separating us. "Are you leaving after this?"

I knew this was coming. "Yeah. Well, eventually. Alpha insists I go with him." Seeing a look of sadness in her eyes, I quickly continue. "Ahh, however, he did say that time travel is different from how you might imagine. We could spend a hundred years in another universe, come back to this one, and only a day will pass." I pause, remembering what just happened. "Then again, he's terrible at going to the right time."

"Yeah..." Cass trails off and glances back at the war unfolding. "Can't you just tell him no? If he can come back in a day, he doesn't need you at all. He could leave you here, do whatever, and come back a day later. You wouldn't go anywhere."

Huh. Now that she mentions it, Alpha doesn't need me after all. Helen did say that traveling to the future isn't the same as jumping to the past. What did she mean by that?

"I can ask him, but don't expect-" I get cut off as a horrible, blood-curdling scream rings out. Jerking my eyes from Cassiel to the battlefield, I just barely catch a female commando flying into the air, then smashing into the ground with a sickening crunch.

"What was that?" Cassiel turns around to look, but a fire must be breaking out, because smoke starts to fill the room. "Let's put a hold on this discussion. Come with me, and we'll see what's going on."

"Yeah, sounds good." Not wanting to take several seconds getting over there, I wordsmith. "Teleport."

Cassiel pops over with me and stumbles slightly, not expecting the sudden change in scenery. Despite this, she collects herself and doesn't bother frowning. She's too distracted by the uproar from our troops.

As I thought, smoke is beginning to spread, but it's coming from the far end of the room, the one where the portal to Volgarius is.

"They got the Lieutenant! Fall back!" A man yells from the smoke. Just as he emerges, something grabs his leg and hoists him into the air, but I can't see what it is.

Cassiel's face whitens. "It's- it's the same as when they grabbed me."

The telekinesis attack! I jump forward, using my superior God-King agility, and grab the man before the Kolvaxians raise him higher. I still can't see any of them through the smoke. "Hang on! I've got you!"

As the words leave my mouth, I suddenly accelerate upward as the invisible tendrils grab my leg and try to pull me apart from the soldier, then he gets lifted too, but still, I hold on.

" Invincible! " I yell the word out after aiming my mind at both our bodies a split second before the invisible force hurls us down with tremendous force. This time I lose my grip, and we get pulverized into the rocks and dirt at the same time, though we don't take damage.

"Get it off! Lemme go!" The man swings futilely at whatever's grabbing his leg before suddenly yelping in surprise as it releases him. I pull myself up, sighing as the invisible 'hands' let me go too.

The smoke continues to thicken, but a few brave souls jump in, grab the soldier and I, and pull us out. The woman leading me along chatters nervously. "We're falling back, God-King. The Kolvaxians are creating this smoke artificially, it inhibits mental functions and induces disorientation and nausea."

"Seriously?" As we arrive at the smoke's boundary, I wave my hand to clear it away from my face. "How did you figure that out so fast?"

She points at Alpha, standing nearby. "He told us. One of your clones?"

The look of unease on her face, given everyone's memories of the Clone Wars, is justified. "Twin brother."

After she runs off to help some other soldiers, I jump to Alpha's side. "You know about this smoke?"

"Of course. What part of 'the Kolvaxians can overwhelm battle-hardened wordsmiths and armies' didn't you understand? You've barely begun to see their abilities. Every species they assimilate gives them new powers, and mixing their abilities up will only lead to deadlier results."

I nod and take a quick mental tally. Entering and exiting the ground, telekinesis that assumes the form of hands, disorienting smoke, and many other abilities we haven't seen yet. This war is only just beginning.

"Get down!" Ben jumps from the smoke and plows forward, knocking me to the ground. At that instant, a blob of green mucus flies through the air, sails over his body, and splats on the ground. A hissing sound follows as the dirt and stone dissolve partially, before the green color shifts and turns brown.

Ben jumps up and pulls me to my feet. Alpha coughs. "Oh, right. They also have acid spit."

"Are you kidding?! That nearly killed me!" My hand clenches into a fist as every muscle in my body screams at me to punch the son of a bitch. "You wanna tell us right now if they have any other tricks we should watch out for?!"

"Nah." He looks away casually. "You've got this under control, remember? Chop Chop! Don't let more people die. The only reason I'll intervene is if the Kolvaxians grab you. I can't let a Wordsmith fall into their hands, after all."

I want to punch him so badly. "Thanks," I say, biting the word off.

* * *

Minutes pass. After reforming a wall of troops, composed of humans and the Demon Lords, I listen to my earpiece and follow Tvoorik's commands. If he realizes I'm listening, he doesn't show it.

Private Horace, Private Marisa, and Lieutenant Dan are the next targets! Ready the ambush! Tvoorik's voice appears in everyone's mind, compelling them to action.

The three people who he mentions step away from the group, and as expected, the invisible hands grab them and start hauling them into the smoke, but I'm ready this time. " PULL! "

My wordsmithing not only yanks the soldiers toward me but three Kolvaxians as well. The buggers stumble out of the smoke, blank expressions on their faces, as every demon forms hand signs and every human blasts the Kolvaxians with a hail of gunfire.

Unexpectedly, the plasma ricochets off the Kolvaxian's bodies in all directions, as if they're wearing invisible armor. From the sides of the smoke, ten Kolvaxians leap out aim their hands at us, and bolts of lightning shoot forward, scattering the men and women as deafening booms explode from the ground wherever their lightning hits.

"What the fuck?! How did they-?!" I yell words, only to realize my ears are bleeding. I can't hear what I'm saying! " Heal! "

A stunning light blasts out from the fog, blinding me right as I get my hearing back! My brain screams in pain, and the sensation of falling washes over me, but I can only flail around as I flop back.

My head smashes into the dirt, and it takes me a moment to realize why I can't move properly. My body is still invincible, so my sense of touch is completely gone, in addition to my sight. The sound of hundreds of Kolvaxians hissing, and the screams of men and women as the monsters leap from the smoke at them ring in my ears.

Watch out! Their attack pattern has changed! There's- there's too much activity! I can't track all of them at once! Tvoorik's mental voice appears again, and his tone is panicked. They're switching their strategy to all-out assault! Their goal is to break the Sonic Disruption Generators so they can burrow underground and escape the containment zone. Protect the generators with your lives!

Terror floods over me. This isn't like before. Were the Kolvaxians just testing us? They only attacked three or four at a time, but now...

" Heal! " My eyesight returns just as a Kolvaxians jumps at me. Planting my feet into the ground, I shove my body back, scooting across the ground like a human skateboard, and lunging my right foot up with all the strength I can muster, as I deliver a skull-busting blow right to the Kolvaxian's kisser. The monstrosity blasts into the air and smashes against the ceiling, as if I were Superman, and not just myself, splattering its body all over the goddamn place.

Jumping to my feet, I gasp. The tables have turned. This new strategy is reaping crazy rewards for the Kolvaxians, and it takes me a moment to realize what this means. They're learning, and studying our tactics. They aren't mindless; it's just a pretense.

A nearby Demon Lord screams in agony as a Kolvaxian bites her shoulder with its razor sharp teeth, sinking its fangs into her. Before it can get any further, I dash over and pound the motherfucker with my invincible boot, knocking its head off like a bowling ball and sending the rest of its body sprawling back. Already, the woman's skin is starting to turn green. " Disintegrate. Void. Restructure. Rebuild. Heal. "

Using the same words I used on Benjamin Brown when I first met him, I systematically use the Crown of Solomon to pinpoint the cells in the demoness's body and teleport them out, to another dimension, before repairing the damage to her body. "Get up! Use all your power, and crush the enemy!"

She nods breathlessly at me and scrambles to her feet. "R-right! I'm on it!"

I saved one woman, but the Kolvaxians are still emerging. At this rate, they'll overwhelm us. Shit, no wonder Alpha said that getting in melee range would be a problem. Spine Mines only work on a few Kolvaxians at once. Against a swarm like this, they're useless!

From behind me, a sensation of heat forms. I quickly turn back to see a colossal, perfectly spherical ball of fire suspended in the air. Underneath it is a face I didn't expect to see here, let alone ever.

"Seven Devils. You're making a mess of my Labyrinth," Says the figure. "I'm here to help clean up, and I brought a few friends."

"Beelzebub?"

I stare in shock as he hurls the colossal orb of fire past our troops and the battle on the frontlines, and it sails forward at an incredible speed, then detonates with hell and fury in the distance, beyond the wall of smoke. A wave of heat, hot enough to make my invincible body sweat, blasts out and clears the smoke from the area.

"Bael. You help our troops. I'll take out the trash." Beelzebub holds his fingers up, and five tiny balls of fire appear above each one, just like the flames he used against me. His eyes rapidly scan the now-visible and very confused Kolvaxians as they pause to evaluate the newest threat. "Get out of my way, Wordsmith. It'd be a darn shame if one of these hit you by accident."

I don't know if he's my ally, but the enemy of my enemy is my friend, as the old proverb says. I quickly jump in the air just before he hurls the fireballs, narrowly avoiding what might have been a fiery death. Then again, I am invincible, so perhaps not.

The pinpricks of flame slam into five Kolvaxians, detonate, and a circle of fire expands outward, engulfs them, and turns their bodies to ash in an instant. Bael takes the opportunity to leap into the fray, and starts yanking Kolvaxians off of screaming demons and humans alive, tearing them apart with his bare hands. "Stupid! Weak! Puny!"

I turn to Beelzebub. "You're helping us! Why?"

Beelzebub scowls at me. "I'm only doing what's in my best interests. Don't confuse it with an alliance. You idiots didn't even think to destroy the portal they're emerging from. What would you do without me?" He sighs and holds up both hands, as ten more fireballs appear.

"Humans. This is why they will always be inferior."

Part 485c: One Little Mouse

Ten pinpricks of fire lunge from the tips of Beelzebub's fingers, like minuscule fairies on a quest to devour life. A few Kolvaxians dive for the ground but are too slow, and shriek in agony as the flames explode into flesh-devouring globes that engulf their bodies. Beelzebub activates ten more, without even using the hand signs that demons usually do when performing magic. "Devil's sake. This is going to take a while."

Three Kolvaxians lunge toward Bael and dig their claws and incisors into his back, hissing all the while. Bael doesn't even wince, instead opting to jerk both hands back, tear two of them off, and crush them into pulp in his grasp. The last Kolvaxian, seeing what happened to its comrades, thinks better of its life's decisions and leaps away. It dives underground to safety, where Bael can't reach it.

"Coward," Bael mutters, before backhanding a different monster attacking from his blind spot. The poor thing explodes the instant his hand makes contact, demonstrating his incredible strength. I almost snicker at the sight of one of the two Kolvaxian's arms still embedded in his back. He must have torn the monster off, but its limb got left behind in the process.

Cassiel flies up and points her index finger at a Kolvaxian. A thin beam of light shoots out, like a laser made of holy energy, and hits an invisible barrier on the monster's head. Anti-energy.

I glance at Beelzebub, who stares at the Kolvaxians with a clinical disinterest, and summons more fireballs to lob at them. He doesn't smile, frown, or display any emotion as he exterminates ten more of the green-skinned threats. "What are you looking at, Wordsmith?"

Despite the blank expression on his face, his voice boils with hostility. I ignore it. "Cassiel's attacks do not affect the Kolvaxians since they imbued their bodies with anti-energy, yet your fireballs do. Why?"

Beelzebub rolls his eyes. "I ignite the fire with magic, but the resultant reaction is entirely natural once the flames leave my control. The winged one must sustain her attack via magical energy since Holy Magic is entirely artificial. It exists outside the confines of what humans would call 'scientific limitations.' Any other questions?"

His answer is very wordy, especially given he's a demon. He should know little of science, given what Samantha has told me about demons. "How do you-"

He cuts me off. "I comprehend the power of flames. I respect them. I learn from them. Fire is my sole weapon, and so I must know both its limitations, as well as its advantages."

A lot of good that did you against Jason Alpha, I think to myself.

I watch in silence as he continues to mop up the Kolvaxians at an alarming rate. At one point, they pull back and all dive underground to escape his flames, which finally provokes agitation from Beelzebub. His lip curls up and a snarl forms. "Accursed fiends. They come into my Labyrinth, and haven't the guts to face me on equal terms? I'll put their heads on pikes. Bael! Smash the ground! Smash it to bits!"

Bael, over a hundred feet away, perks up. "Huh? What didja say?"

"You heard me!"

The big, lumbering Demon Duke nods slowly, and a smile forms on his face. "How hard?"

"If I'm still standing once you're finished, I'll never let you live it down!"

The smile on Bael's face turns maniacal. "I get to let loose, huh?"

Beelzebub widens his stance and shoots a glance at me. "Don't try this at home."

Bael roars, and suddenly his body inflates slightly, and his muscles bulge, as though just by willing his body, he can increase his strength dramatically. A moment later, he balls up his fists and screams angrily as he jumps into the air, touches the ceiling a hundred feet above, and pushes off with enough force to send a shockwave around the room.

Then he hits the ground.

Disorientation jostles me, as my legs buckle and I get flung up and spin head over heels through the air. The instant I hit the ground, I get sent flying again, and through my spinning, I can just barely make out the figures of other humans and demons alike sharing similar fates. My perpetual pinwheeling comes to a halt as something grabs me by the waist and raises me in the air. It only takes a second for me to shake the swimming feeling from my mind before I realize It's Cass who saved me.

She doesn't smile. "Make yourself wings again!"

"Right. Wings." She releases me as I catch myself and fly alongside her. Only once I get a look at what's going on do I see the carnage Bael is causing. He bounces like a goddamn ping-pong ball, smashing from ceiling to ground over and over again, sending out ripples of rock and stone as the ground and sky scream to escape his brutish body. However, while it does force Kolvaxians to leap out of the ground, lest they have their organs melted from the shockwaves his impacts deliver, it also sends demons and humans careening around uncontrollably.

A double-edged blade.

I see what you're going for, Beelzebub, my mind whispers, but you're going to kill us along with them!

Beelzebub, for his part, levitates in the air, releasing fire from the soles of his boots to stay aloft. Every time a Kolvaxian leaps from the ground, he shoots a fireball at them, incinerating their body before they can even hiss in pain.

I can't let him continue like this. A commando sails past me, unable to even let out a whimper of pain as the air has been ejected from his body. Before he hits the ground, I speak a word.

" Slow! "

Time screeches almost to a halt. I now have precious moments to formulate a plan. First order of business: stop Bael's rampaging.

" Envelop. " One word later, and a thick layer of hardened foam surrounds his body. Enough, the Crown tells me, to absorb the next few impacts he'll make.

A glance to my side reveals Ben Brown, dashing toward Beelzebub, fist raised. Given what happened the last time he punched Beelzy, the First Emperor is probably about to die. " Teleport. " I send him five feet to his left, so that if his momentum keeps up, he'll just barely miss his target.

Several humans are probably about to die if they don't get any medical treatment, especially the ones currently hurtling to the ground. " Return. Heal. " All of our human troops are sent back to the outpost just outside Hero City, and their wounds are healed. They aren't necessary anymore.

We need to capture some of the Kolvaxians. If Beelzebub keeps his attack up, they'll all be killed. I aim my mind at the crate of Spine Mines. " Control. " Dozens of the mines leap from the boxes, aim their spikes forward, and lunge at the Kolvaxians I can see. Only now do I notice that the Kolvaxians are able to move somewhat compared to the other humans and demons in the room. Is it because their bodies are coated in anti-energy? No matter. At the least, they're much slower than they were before.

Three Spine Mines stab into each Kolvaxian I can see, and their mouths open to wheeze painfully. I'm certain I just broke several of their bones but-

Ugh. Slowing time drains a ton of my energy. I'm starting to feel woozy. Better wrap this up quickly.

Beelzebub's fireballs are a problem. I just tagged the Kolvaxians, so if he kills them, then it will have been for naught. We need live specimens to experiment on. " Extinguish. "

His fireballs snuff from existence. Now all that's left are a whole bunch of demons, Cassiel, Ben Brown, myself, and-

"Yo." Alpha appears in front of me. "Quick thinking."

Usually, he'd startle me, but that doesn't happen this time. My breathing is already irregular. My heart is pumping almost twice as fast as it usually does. The strain on my body from slowing time is enormous. "Thanks. I'm going to resume time now."

Before he replies, the pain in my chest vanishes. "No need. I'll keep it slowed for you. Well, you only dropped it down to 25%, but I reduced it to 1%. Might as well be stopped at this point."

Like an anvil no longer hangs from my neck, my breathing returns to normal. "Ah, oh. Thanks, I guess. What do you want this time?"

I'm a little irritated that he's taking over once again, but his posture is relaxed. He isn't as angry as he was several minutes ago. "I just wanted to say... I was wrong."

"Huh? Wrong?"

"Yeah." Alpha lowers his head. "You don't need me here, after all. I can't believe it myself. Maybe because of luck, or some other circumstance, this universe can resist the Kolvaxian threat after all. At least, it can for now. Maybe I'm jaded. I thought resisting them was a pointless endeavor."

"I see." Two words are all I can manage for a few moments. "You've changed your mind. Why?"

Alpha shrugs. "Once I calmed down and stopped trying to assert my will, I realized that if push came to shove, I could just collapse this universe. I've considered doing the same thing to 10K, but didn't, since the Marie Council is only worried the Kolvaxians will learn of the Central Hub. Anything less than that is a 'local matter,' so Marie would prefer to leave 10K intact."

Alpha glances away from me, toward Samantha, who's about to land spryly on her hands and feet like a cat. The jostling from Bael isn't enough to knock her off-balance, it seems. "I don't want to destroy this universe. It's just one stream out of many others, but it's my origin point. I came from this universe. If it can be saved, my heart will be more at ease."

Despite his positive wording, the part where he considered destroying the universe leaves a sour taste in my mouth. He may think of himself as a champion of justice, but Cassiel is right to distrust him.

"We'll do what we can, then. If you don't mind, though, maybe we can have this conversation later? There's still a battle raging." I glance to my side where Cassiel's frozen in midair.

Alpha blinks in surprise. "Oh, right! I almost forgot."

"Did you really?"

"Nope." Alpha shrugs, vanishes, and an instant later, time returns to normal. Cassiel starts to move and catch the commando who was falling, only to stop and stare in confusion at the blank space where he once was.

Beelzebub falters, as he realizes his flames are gone. After a moment, more ignite over his fingertips, but he turns his head back to scowl at me. "Stay out of this, Wordsmith. I'm dealing with the monsters!"

Cassiel jumps in before I can reply. "Stop attacking, Beelzebub. We've won, and we need captive Kolvaxians."

The fireballs suspended above his fingers grow slightly bigger as he whips his head to her. "I disagree! These monsters need to be wiped out! Your mercy will only allow them to spread their toxins further!"

Ben Brown careens past Beelzebub and plows into a wall, but his Hypersuit absorbs the damage. He jumps back and looks around in confusion. "What the hell? I was about to knock that smug son of a bitch off his rocker!"

The Kolvaxians jump back underground, and Bael's body hits the ground with far less force, as the sphere of 'foam' surrounding him absorbs the impact. He scrambles to his feet and starts wiping it off angrily, but now his rage from before is noticeably less since confusion has replaced it.

Tvoorik's voice transmits to my mind from my earpiece. Sixty-five Kolvaxians left.

All these things happen at once, making it hard for me to focus, but I do my best and sort things by their priority level. "Beelzebub, stop with the flames. You've helped us enough. We need to take out the remaining Kolvaxians with surgical precision, and if Bael keeps causing a ruckus, he might destroy the sonic generators outside, freeing the Kolvaxians from this area. You don't want that."

Beelzebub pauses, and the fireballs above his hands falter. "Sonic generators?"

He doesn't know what they are. Fantastic. Ben looks like he's about to lay into the First Emperor, but I hold my hand up. "Stop."

A minute passes, and I quickly explain to Beelzebub our system. He nods along and lowers his hands. "So you plan to capture a few of the Kolvaxians and experiment on them to find their weaknesses? They seem plenty weak to me."

"They aren't," Ben says, correcting him. "We're only seeing a small number of them at once. Jason, your idea probably won't work. Kolvaxians can't be captured."

"They can't?"

"No. Their bodies can self-destruct. Beatrix once managed to capture two of them in the heat of a battle. As soon as we restrained them, our captives melted into green ooze, then dried up and turned to sand. It was disgusting." He flicks his eyes to the battle-scarred warzone, where craters and debris are scattered here and there. Bael continues to wrestle with the foam covering his body, but it sticks to him like ultra-hard concrete, as I designed it to do. Ben snorts inaudibly. "Look over there. The corpses of some of the monsters are already melting."

I follow his gaze, and indeed, they are.

Beelzebub licks his lips. "So, you mean to say that capturing them is impossible."

"Yes," Ben says, though he glowers at Beelzebub. "That doesn't mean I'll let you come in here and send my men and women flying around just so you can play the part of a hero. We had everything under control."

"Under control?" Beelzebub smirks. "I recall the moment I arrived, not fifteen minutes ago, and you were on your back as the swarm attacked. Try not to prostrate yourself thanking me. I saved your worthless life, after all."

Samantha jogs over, confusion on her face. "What's going on? Why have you stopped attacking?"

I turn to survey the battlefield again. Only a few Kolvaxians have emerged from the ground, but they hide behind chunks of debris and eye us warily. Once again, a thought returns to me. They aren't mindlessly attacking. They keep stopping to evaluate our actions so they can learn about us.

Indeed, the monsters standing in the open are the ones I tagged with the Spine Mines, though they don't appear to be in any pain. Hell, they aren't even short of breath, despite multiple circular explosives stabbed through various points on their bodies. The others are likely hiding underground, biding their time as they formulate a plan to counter attack, or they may be trying to escape.

I look at Sam. She's slightly winded but otherwise fine. "We're pausing to reconsider our strategy. So are the Kolvaxians, I think."

As if they want to make me look like an idiot, a dozen of the Kolvaxians standing around suddenly bolt forward and dash straight at Beelzebub. He jerks in surprise as they make their moves, but keeps his cool. "Sally forth and die, then!"

A medium sized ball of fire appears in the palm of his hand, but the monsters spread apart and jump in the air, aiming right for him. To my amazement, they each yank out a Spine Mine from their bodies without flinching, despite a gruesome amount of flesh coming along for the ride. As they do, the mines activate their self-destruct mechanisms.

"Beelzebub! Look out!" I realize in an instant what's going to happen, but I don't have time to react.

Beelzebub falters, unable to launch his fireball at them. If he does, it will take him out along with the rest of us.

A flash of movement. Cassiel swoops in at the speed of sound and activates her Holy Barrier right as the mines explode. Like droplets of rain impacting the window of a car, the Kolvaxians detonate in a shower of gore as the explosions are reflected at the ceiling. Much of the kinetic energy from the blasts are lost, and seconds later, everyone breathes a sigh of relief.

She saved us all.

Beelzebub stutters and stammers for a moment, as he fumbles to find words. "You-! They almost... they moved so fast and-!"

Cassiel exhales and lowers her shield. "Fifty-three parasites left. You saved us; I saved you. That makes us even, doesn't it?"

Beelzebub's face pales. He steps away from her, and the flame in his hand dissipates. "You did no such thing! I was about to take them all out!"

Samantha strolls over to Beelzebub and rolls her eyes. "You know, it's okay to be wrong sometimes. You should thank Cassiel for saving your life. If you don't, you'll look like an ingrate."

This calms him down. Beelzebub's expression flattens as he gazes warily at the Demon Lords staring at him silently. Perhaps it's their eyes that put him over the edge, because he sighs audibly. "Haaah. Fine, fine. You have my gratitude."

"And you have mine," Cassiel echoes. "You did save us in our moment of need, after all."

"Mmm." Beelzebub grunts and turns his attention back to the battlefield. "There are still fifty-three left, as you said. What do you think we should do, pretty little angel?"

Cass glares at him. "Stop calling Jason 'Wordsmith,' and don't call me 'angel.' You know our names."

Beelzebub's expression turns smug. He's pleased by her irritation. "I'm sorry, Cassiel. What's your plan?"

Surprisingly, Cassiel turns to Ben. "You said we couldn't capture them, right?"

"Unfortunately not."

Bael finally tears the last bits of foam from his body and growls fiercely. "Hey! What the hell's all this white shit?!"

Cassiel ignores him and taps her lips. "Pull everyone back. Beelzebub, keep launching fireballs at any Kolvaxians who pop up. Instead of that big guy over there, we'll have Jason cause a localized earthquake; something that won't destroy the sonic generators or kill our people." She pauses, noticing the humans are all gone, except for Ben. Her body goes rigid. "Oh my god! Where is everyone?!"

"I healed and teleported them out. Don't worry." I quickly assuage her fears, and Cass breathes a sigh of relief.

"Okay, great. Well, the Spine Mines are a no-go. They just tear the bombs out and turn into kamikazes. If we can't capture them and we can't tag them, then we'll have to use the final option. Everyone pull back. Jason, Beelzebub, work together. I believe in both of you."

Beelzebub isn't keen on taking orders, especially given his position as First Emperor, but he sighs, knowing he's outmatched and outvoted. "Fine. Everyone pull back! You heard the woman! That means you too, Bael!"

The giant demon glances around, looking for a Kolvaxian to tear apart, but when none present themselves, he shrugs. "Fine. Damn skugs weren't giving me much of a fight anyway."

He lumbers toward us, and I aim my mind at the ground after he and everyone else are clear. "Are you ready, Beelzy?"

The First Emperor's eye twitches. "I'll seriously kill you if you keep calling me that."

"And I'll take that as a yes. Earthquake! "

The ground just beneath our feet makes no motion, but everywhere else in the giant, hollowed out room, a terrible rumbling and grinding begins, and cracks form as rock presses against rock, writhing and squirming like a maddened bull trying to buck its rider. Almost immediately, Kolvaxians begin leaping from the ground, but since there aren't any humans or demons in the way, Beelzebub uses a new tactic.

He hunches over, widens his legs, presses one hand to the ground, and forms a circle with his free hand, then presses it to his lips. What happens next makes me do a double-take. Beelzebub breathes fire, the heat of which instantly raises the temperature of the room dramatically, even where I'm standing, and a wave of flame screams out from his mouth, widening into a terrifying all-consuming cone. Just from the blinding whiteness of the blaze, I have to assume it's at least a thousand degrees, though I can only wince and look away as more Kolvaxians jump out of the frying pan and into the, err, fire.

He continues to breathe fire for a solid minute, and finally, the heat is too much for me to bear. I pull my mind away from the earthquake and wordsmith again, though speaking is agony with all the oxygen vanishing at lightning speed. Resistant. "The sweltering heat immediately loses its power over me, and even feels quite soothing. For a moment, I wonder if that's how Beelzebub is managing to survive the heat. Maybe he's immune to fire. If that's the case, then did he hold back his attack when the Kolvaxians jumped at him earlier, not out of worry for himself, but for us?

Perhaps I'll never know.

Beelzebub halts his fire-breathing. The flames from his mouth slow to a crawl and eventually disappear, but the rest of the room is still alight and burning like there's no tomorrow.

Satisfied, I tap into my mental connection. Tvoorik, how many Kolvaxians are left?

A tap on my shoulder. I turn back to see Cassiel, fright etched into every pore of her face. "Jason! It's terrible! Th-the sonic generators! During Bael's attack earlier, they were-

Tvoorik's voice appears in my mind. Just one is left.

The pieces click into place.

"Oh no."

Cassiel nods, and Samantha walks up behind her, a solemn expression visible. "It's already gone. It burrowed past our defenses. Tvoorik didn't notice due to the chaos, but we might be able to track and stop it before it does any damage."

My mouth tastes like chalk. "Yeah. Yeah, maybe, Sam."

No. She's wrong. We knew from the start that just one Kolvaxian let loose in the Labyrinth could spell our end.

We've lost.

Everyone stares vacantly at each other. Even Beelzebub's usual cockiness isn't there. Instead, he rights himself and scuffs his boot on the ground. "Damn."

From behind, a cheerful voice speaks out. "Oh hey! Great news!" Alpha jogs over to us, a sunny smile on his face, due to his total obliviousness.

I cough. "What... what news, Alpha?" I'm not ready for his stupidity right now.

Alpha holds a device in his hands. It's the detonator for the Spine Mines.

"You're not going to believe what that little scamp has stuck in his chest!"

It takes me a moment to register his words.

"Say what now?"

Part 486c: Cache, Money, Dough

Beelzebub nudges a rock on the ground with his foot. Based on its texture and design, it must have broken off from the ceiling. A sour look spreads from one corner of his mouth to the other. "Devils. What a mess. I should have come sooner."

Samantha leans against me and yawns. "Why didn't you?"

"I thought the humans could handle a few of the monsters. I was wrong." Beelzebub reaches up and slicks his hair back. A few hairs are noticeably singed and smoking from his fire-breathing earlier, but otherwise, his rich black hair is as immaculate as ever. "What are we to do now? There are thousands of portals to other worlds. Most of them reside in pocket dimensions, but the Volgrim installed the rest. The Kolvaxians will likely know of their existence."

His tone of voice makes me raise an eyebrow. His confidence from before is gone. Despite crushing every Kolvaxian that entered the Labyrinth, he's beginning to realize that the invasion has scarcely started, and we only won due to favorable circumstances.

"I can answer that," Ben says, as he and Cassiel stroll up to us. "Right now, there are still many Volgrim worlds out there. Melkin has fallen, but the Volgrim number in the tens of trillions across their remaining planets and sectors. If we can establish a base of operations, along with a new homeworld, then move them to it and form a defensive network, the Kolvaxians won't be able to penetrate it, and we can start pushing back against the monsters."

Cassiel slumps over against my other side; fatigue etched into her face. It's only been a half-hour since we blew up the final Spine Mine, but the adrenaline from the victory has worn off faster than anyone could imagine. Now, two straight weeks of battle has caught up with everyone involved.

Except for Ben, but maybe that's because of his Hypersuit.

My cute angel yawns. "Ugh, I wish we could just take a day off to nap. Why do our new enemies have to be so tenacious?"

"Every moment we waste, another Volgrim world is likely to fall," Ben replies. "For the moment, you can get some rest, and I can work with Beetlejuice on which planet to-"

"Beelzebub," The First Emperor hisses. "How could you possibly butcher my name so badly?"

"Sorry. I'm a little tired," Ben says, not bothering to look at him. "Anyway, there are several good candidates, including one on the outer rim, opposite from where the Kolvaxians originated. It will take them quite some time to control all of the Milky Way up to the planet I have in mind, so the Volgrim will be able to fortify it dramatically. However, without a mixed ground force and competent leadership there at all times, we're unlikely to resist an aerial assault. Kolvaxians typically start with planetary bombardment, then they send in the ground troops, like what you saw on Melkin."

Jason Alpha appears out of nowhere and leans on Beelzebub's shoulder nonchalantly as if he's been in the conversation the whole time. "Hmph. What happened on Melkin was hardly anything. You've only seen one type of Kolvaxian up to this point."

Beelzebub quickly pulls away and swats Alpha's arm off his shoulder, leaving the other me to stumble slightly before regaining his balance. The First Emperor doesn't comment on Alpha invading his personal space. "What do you mean by 'only one type?' How many are there?"

Alpha taps his lip thoughtfully. "Well, up to this point we've seen their shock troops, which are equivalent to drones. Honestly, they usually never need more than drones, because those are more than enough to overwhelm most defenses. It's once they release the modified vehicles and start Infection Runs that a planet loses the ability to resist. At this point, your safest bet is to hole up in the Labyrinth forever and pray they never find a way to this dimension."

"Retreating into the Labyrinth is unacceptable, even if we destroy the portals to the outside universe," Beelzebub says. "The Volgrim constructed several portals themselves. If the Kolvaxians have their knowledge, it's likely they will create new ones once they discover our plans. If they do that, there's no telling where they will appear in the Labyrinth."

Silence follows. Everyone considers the possibilities, though Samantha and Cassiel keep yawning over and over.

I volunteer an idea as the girls blink their eyes sleepily. "Before Alpha and I leave, we'll take some time to build new portals to a few important places, and we'll demolish the ones that are too dangerous to leave alone. We'll also create some new worlds inside folded dimensions that the Kolvaxians won't know about, just so the Volgrim have somewhere to live. I doubt you want them filling up your Labyrinth."

Beelzebub nods. "That's an acceptable compromise. You have a mental map of where the portals are located, correct?"

"Yup." Privately, I wonder how he knows that. He did live with me for several years, so the Crown's capabilities probably slipped out at some point.

Tvoorik's voice speaks out from the entrance of the room as he slowly walks over to us. "Several Volgrim worlds are under attack. We can't dawdle, no matter how tired we are."

Behind Tvoorik, his shadow-walker friend skulks, an unpleasant expression on his face. "You're about to fall over, Tvoorik. If you keep going without rest-"

"That can't be helped." Tvoorik cuts his friend off. "I know you mean well, Ylvusk, but I can handle myself. One of my new abilities is to draw thought-energy from others around me. I have much more vitality than before my mutation."

"If you say so," Ylvusk quickly counters. "You should still get some rest. You worked harder than everyone else during that battle."

Ben frowns at the newcomers. "Now hold on just a second. I'm sure tapping into the hivemind was exhausting, but many people gave their lives fighting the Kolvaxians over the past several days. Don't diminish their hard work."

"He didn't mean anything by it," Tvoorik says. He walks into our group, and I notice, perhaps for the first time, that he's slightly shorter than Samantha and Cassiel. Demon mutations are all over the place when it comes to height. "Let's not worry about semantics. Beelzebub, dispatch a Demon Duke and some lords to Portal 823. It connects to Odarius, one of the worlds the Kolvaxians are about to attack, which houses several key military installations. After that, you should-"

Beelzebub raises a hand. "Hold on just a moment. I've yet to state where my allegiances lie. I helped out here because the humans imperiled the Labyrinth with their incompetence, but I never said I would continue to do so. I have no guarantee you won't stab us in the back when demonkind least expects it."

Cassiel blinks and pulls away from me. "Hold on; you think we'll betray you? Why? You know just as well as I do that Samantha is trying to bring peace between humans and demons. Betraying you runs counter to our goals."

"You've done it once before," Beelzebub snaps. "Well, the human king did, not you, but my point stands. Elshard leads the humans, and I don't trust him."

With a sigh, Cass shrugs. "Unless you want us to install a new leader, I can't help King Elshard's opinions. Who would lead the humans anyway? Ben?" She gestures to Ben, and he immediately takes a step back, recoiling from the idea. "Jason? No, you'd hate it if Jason were the official leader. Besides, he has to leave." Scarcely have the words left her mouth, when she makes a sudden choking sound as if realizing what she said. Cass turns her head to look up at me. "You are leaving though, aren't you?"

I glance at Alpha. He nods imperceptibly. "Afraid so, Cass. Afraid so."

"Aw." She doesn't protest but does wrap herself around my arm a little tighter.

Beelzebub crosses his arms, closing up his body language in the process. "Cassiel. I won't help humanity unless you take over as their leader."

Immediately, Cass jerks her head up. "What? Huh?"

Beelzebub smirks. "I didn't stutter. Satan hated angels, to the point of desperation. Admittedly, I've held prejudices against them in the past, but I have yet to see you do one disagreeable thing to a demon. Everything I've seen you do, and the tales that my people in your city have told me, indicate you're an upstanding person of moral uprightness. Especially compared to King Elshard and Jason. If you don't lead humanity, I won't follow."

Everyone's jaw drops, including Alpha's.

I ask the question on everyone's mind. "You want Cassiel to lead humanity? Why?"

Cass nods along, and Beelzebub unfolds his arms and holds his palms up like he's weighing two options. "The better question is, 'why not?' After all, most humans and many demons look up to her. They're calling her the Divine Mother. She's a symbol of righteousness, and her power is without question. I recall her dealing a most grievous wound to Satan that forced him to flee when even you Wordsmiths couldn't. Demons respect power. Humans respect morality. These traits do not conflict, and she has them in abundance."

Beelzebub leans forward and waggles his finger. "I know you aren't one to seek your own self-interest, Cassiel, but you should look at the upside for yourself. Humans will pray to you en-masse, increasing your spiritual energy. The angels will no longer have to rely on leftover scraps of energy that the glowing Jason over there gave them millions of years ago. I'm certain, based on the qualities you've exhibited up until now, that you could even convince the Volgrim to join our alliance, and with the Angels on your side, you'll have a military diverse enough to stand up to the monsters at our doorstep."

Alpha raises his hand, as a kid in a classroom would. "A question. How do you know where the angels obtained their energy?"

"I've been reading," Beelzebub says flatly. He glares at Alpha, then pulls back and brushes some dust off his shoulder. "Frankly, Cassiel, there's no answer you should give other than 'yes.' You're the only one who can lead demonkind into battle that won't give me the shivers. I won't lose sleep if it's you."

"What about me?" Samantha asks. She rubs her eyes and stretches. "Are you implying you can't trust me?"

"Of course I can't. That much is a given. You killed Gressil and severely wounded Diablo. You're untrustworthy, and you know it."

Samantha puffs up her cheeks and flips her head away. "Hmph. Asshole."

I raise an eyebrow at Beelzebub. He's acting odd. I never imagined he would consider Cassiel trustworthy. Naturally, Beelzy's correct, but it's strange hearing him say it.

"I don't know..." Cassiel trails off. "I don't like that people are worshiping me. I don't think I'm leader material."

Beelzebub nods sagely. "Mmm, yes, I see. That's unfortunate. Well, then, I'll pull all the demons out of the war, and you can have fun losing against the Kolvaxians." He casually shrugs, as if to say what can I do about it?

Cassiel flinches, and guilt blankets her face. "Alright, geez. I'll do it. Gosh." She pokes me in the stomach. "What's his angle, anyway? I can't see why he wants me as leader."

"I think Beelzebub likes you," Samantha says dryly. "He's a lonely demon. No woman around."

"Yeah," Alpha chimes in. "He likes a good, strong woman."

Beelzebub facepalms. "This is what I get for being polite to insects."

Everyone chuckles lightly, and for once, the mood seems to lift. Even Beelzebub, despite his pretentious attitude, doesn't have a stick as far up his ass as usual.

"Hey. What's going on, here?" A female voice speaks up. I turn to look behind Beelzebub, over to where the portal was that the Kolvaxians were pouring through. Much like the rest of the room, the area surrounding the portal is in ruins, but standing atop one prominent piece of debris is a familiar figure.

Marie.

Alpha's smile vanishes as he spots her. "Bloody hell."

"Alpha? Did you do this?! I've had alarms screaming all over my base for almost an hour now!" Marie hops off the misshapen chunk of ceiling, and from behind her, a scaly lizard-like creature crawls over the debris and rises up to his full height, towering over her. She ignores him, and storms up to Alpha and shoves her finger in his face. "What the hell are you thinking?! You can't just destroy portals! I have jurisdiction here!"

"Yeah, yeah." Alpha rolls his eyes so hard I lose sight of his pupils. "It's not what you think, Marie. The Kolvaxians attacked, so we were forced to defend ourselves. They launched their assault on-"

"Kolvaxians?! What the hell are you talking about?" Marie's anger slips, and she shoots a glance at Cassiel, Samantha, and I. "And what are you three doing here? Last I heard, you were running away from the Volgrim like little chicken-shits."

The reptilian monster lumbers over toward us and rests his clawed hand on her shoulder. "Lady Marie, there has been a great battle here. I smell beings I have never contacted."

Marie's expression softens, and she reaches up to her shoulder and rests her hand on the lizard-man's. "Yes, Kar, thank you."

"Kar?" I squint to examine the lizard more carefully. The name is the same as a lizard-man I once knew, but instead of green scales, this lizard is colored red. A transformation, perhaps? Possibly another gap in my memory? "Are you the same one I once knew?"

The lizard-man nods, and he closes his eyes. "Correct. I have since recuperated from my injuries."

"No thanks to you," Marie adds snidely. "But we're not here about that. Alpha, what are Kolvaxians?"

Alpha bows his head. "I don't think I can tell you."

"Oh, pish. There you go getting caught up in the rules again." Marie kicks a pebble. "The other Maries know to stay out of my business. Let's not dredge up the past."

"You allied with Satan," Alpha says. "We can't trust you with information on the multiverse."

"That was before he gained the power of Wordsmithing! This is now!"

Alpha and Marie begin shouting at each other, and the rest of us are cast aside and left to feel uncomfortable. Nobody has a clue what they're talking about. The best I can guess is that she was once a member of the Central Hub, but she was cast out for working with Satan, but why wouldn't they just kill her? Lord knows the little I've seen of Marie tells me she'd kill one of her other selves without hesitation.

"Okay, okay, break it up." Kar reaches down and uses each hand to push Marie and Alpha out of each other's faces. "Alpha. You were gone a long time. Marie stays secluded on Earth. We don't know what the state of the galaxy is, beyond what the three turtles told us a few months ago. The Kolvaxians smell dangerous."

Alpha glares up at the giant lizard-man, but sighs. "Gah. Now that Marie's curiosity is piqued, she'll just interrogate everyone here after I take Sparky and leave."

"Damn right," Marie says, as she smirks. "Stop wasting my time and tell me already."

* * *

Minutes pass.

Marie's eyes grow as big as saucers. "So, let me get this straight. Universe 10K has a parasitic power-absorbing alien infection that has ravaged their Milky Way with no signs of slowing down for over ten million years, and you allowed them to travel here due to your stupidity during the Energy Wars?!"

Beelzebub shakes his head. "Devils. It's worse than I thought."

Alpha nods sheepishly. "Yeah, it's entirely my fault. Dunno what to say."

Marie holds up her hand and ticks off a few fingers as she speaks. "The Volgrim are playing defense and losing, demons have no space combat capabilities, humans are millions of years behind the Volgrim as well, and the angels might have been useful if you had more than a handful of them, but you don't. I guess you're pretty screwed, aren't you?"

Ben sighs. "What a positive thinker."

"Marie has always been like this," Alpha says, "though I'd hoped several million years of the silent treatment would change things."

She waves off Alpha's words. "Well, it's a good thing I'm a genius unlike any that have ever lived- barring my other selves, of course. I've been quietly building up a stockpile in case the worst should happen. I just didn't count on 'the worst' being 'freaky aliens that devour minds,' so great job exceeding my expectations."

"Stockpile?" Ben echoes. "What sort of stockpile?"

"I anticipated that, at some point, humanity might need to stage a comeback. Perhaps the Volgrim would grow too big for their britches, or maybe the demons might end up with a particularly bloodthirsty Emperor and would start massacring the defenseless humans. And, so, I created a small armada below the surface of Earth." The corners of Marie's mouth curl up into a tight smile. "Just in case."

"I suppose the Central Hub will forgive you for your past, then. That's what you want to hear, right?" Alpha glares at her, but he doesn't offer much resistance beyond that. I can see the relief written all over his face. He's glad to hear that she planned ahead for an uncertain future.

Beelzebub taps his wrist. "As good as this news is, time is short. We should have left several minutes ago. You heard Tvoorik; the Kolvaxians will soon annihilate several Volgrim planets, and then all hope will be lost. We need to act quickly."

Marie nods. Her pretentiousness vanishes. "You're right. Inform Diablo that I'll transfer my armada wherever it's needed. Less talk, more action."

"I'm the First Emperor now," Beelzebub says with a grunt. "Diablo is a lord."

"Oh!" Shock runs down Marie's back. She lurches noticeably. "Good God! The standards for First Emperor have lowered dramatically since the last time I visited!"

"I'll kill you," Beelzebub hisses.

* * *

An hour later, after teleporting Beelzebub and Tvoorik to the designated portal, and everyone else back to Hero City, Cassiel pulls me aside. Surprisingly, it's raining in Hero City, a rare sight to behold.

"Jason. I have to tell you something."

I nod, as the rain trickles off a balcony on the palace overhang. "Uh, sure."

"It's about Samantha. Well, it's about me, too."

She waits for me to give her the go-ahead, so I continue nodding. "Right. What's up?"

"I want you to take Samantha along when you leave with Alpha."

Oh. I didn't expect her to say that. "Yeah, that's fine. I have to ask him first, though. I don't think he'll say yes."

A lump forms in Cass's throat. "I want to go, too, but I can't. I know that now. Beelzebub threw his demand at me, and if I turn him down, we won't be able to unite against the Kolvaxians."

Something in her voice is off. "There's more, right? It's not just about Beelzebub. You could turn him down anyway."

She fiddles around and wrings her hands together repeatedly. "I... I don't know. This universe is my home, you know? I was born and raised here. I want to be with you, but I don't want to leave, either. I'm selfish, and I know it, but now that I've met others of my kind- other angels, I mean..."

She's saying 'I' a lot more than usual, I note. "You're torn. You want to come along, but if you do, humanity will probably fall to the Kolvaxians, along with the Volgrim, demons, and angels." My words are not a question.

Cass bows her head. "I don't know how long you'll be gone. The last few months were torture. I kept fighting, thinking you had died and I would never see you again. As bad as I felt, Samantha was worse. She's hidden her feelings from you well, but she kept crying, and whenever we fought the Kolvaxians, she'd explode in rage and tear them apart. I'm worried that if you leave again, she'll go over the edge."

Worrying. "If you think that'll happen, I can press Alpha. If I demand it, he'll let her come along with me. However, have you asked her opinion yet?"

"Huh? N-no..."

Slowly, I reach over and pull Cassiel against my chest. "Imagine how Sam will feel if she thinks we left you behind in a hostile universe. She'd worry about you every day, just as much as she would worry about me if she stayed. The only acceptable answer is for both of you to come along, and that would make everyone in this universe fall to the Kolvaxians."

"Oh." Cass wraps her arms around me. "What am I supposed to do, Jason? I can't lead. I can't protect anyone. The only thing I can do is heal my allies and kill my enemies. A leader has to be smart, and she has to-"

"Stop, stop." I pull Cass away and gaze into her eyes. "Why do you say things like that? Don't you realize what you've accomplished? Elshard wasn't the one fighting the Kolvaxians off for two weeks; you were. Beelzebub may have pulled off a last-minute save, but you held on the whole time up to that point. You thought of the sonic generators, you used Tvoorik to coordinate the defense, and you kept soldiers from dying. You're more of a leader than you'll admit, and everyone knows it."

Cassiel trails her hand down my arm and grasps my palm. "I guess." She has awful self-esteem issues.

"Just do me a favor, Cass. Ask Sam whether she wants to go with me or stay here. Don't make decisions for her."

Cass pulls her hand from mine. "What are you going to do?"

"I have to help get this universe prepared for the defense before I leave. I'm going to talk with Alpha. He might have some ideas I haven't thought of yet. After all, he's been doing this a lot longer than us."

"Yeah, maybe," Cass says, though she sounds unconvinced. "Remember what I told you. I don't trust Alpha. Something about him is just... off. He's too casual when it comes to death and murder. He may look human, but I think his humanity was stripped away a long time ago."

Yeah, I think to myself. You're right about that.

"I'll keep an eye on him, Cass."

In the distance, the local church's bell tolls. Gong. Gong. Gong.

We didn't save everyone in the battle. Some soldiers won't be returning to their families tonight.

Part 487c: The Last Promise

Building the portal to Voldarius inside Hero City seems the safest option to me, but at the same time, it needs to be functional and reliable. For that reason, I am now standing outside the city limits of Hero City, in a flat expanse where not much is going on. I think that at some point I was going to turn this grassland into a food-production and farming area, but I never got around to it. We have other bubble-worlds for that, after all.

" Mountain! "

With a single word, the ground rises beneath me, pushing me into the sky like a man riding a surfboard atop a wave of rock. It only travels a few hundred feet before stopping, but that's all I need. " Flatten. Portal. "

I let my imagination go a little wild, and not only does a plateau form at the top of the mountain, but an interesting series of swirls and marks appear on the ground. They harden together to form something resembling a map of the universe, with galaxies and stars spread out, yet remarkably detailed compared to something I'd usually think about. Perhaps they're the result of the Crown?

The portal to Voldarius forms before me, circular, with an arch that surrounds the swirling blue energy that eventually coalesces into an image of what lies on the other side. However, my eyes lower to the ground, examining the images and markings of our galaxy and hundreds of others.

The Milky Way. It's hard to think about, given the scale of the universe, but has Alpha never traveled beyond the boundaries of our galaxy? What lies beyond the void? Does Andromeda harbor life? Might the Kolvaxians have come from there? Could an accident in 10K allowed them to travel to the Milky Way, and thus they exist in every universe?

I raise my eyes to the portal and shake my head. I can only hope that isn't the case. If millions, perhaps billions more of those horrors await us outside the confines of our galaxy, then Humanity has a dark destiny in our future.

Walking forward, I step through the gate to Voldarius. When I teleport to a new location, the instantaneous change of scenery is jarring, but walking through a portal is similar to passing through a door. The difference, however, is the subtle change in temperature, the manner in which I can go from fifty degrees to eighty degrees and feel the difference massage me like I was stepping out of an air-conditioned house into a warm summer's day. It isn't unpleasant, so I quite like it.

The field is the same as I remember. Swaths of land are set up to grow wheat and a bunch of other population sustaining foods. This spot is the exact place I last spoke with Dosenia when I visited with Cassiel and Samantha.

I squint carefully. The houses in the Residential Zone, or whatever it's called, are closer than I remember. The Volgrim probably had to construct more living space for all the scientists and engineers I sent here.

My body tenses up. I don't know Dosenia very well, but I can only imagine how angry she'll be with me after two and a half months of radio silence. She probably thinks I dumped the scientists here and skedaddled, leaving her to scramble and find accommodations for them. I don't even know what the native population is on Voldarius, so I'm unsure how much stress I put on their ecosystem.

"Jason?" Samantha's voice makes me flinch, and I spin to face her. She must have followed me through the portal.

"Geez, Sam. You startled me."

"Sorry!" She giggles nervously and slinks up beside me, hooking her arms around my right side. "You terrified half of Hero City's residents! Everyone thought the invasion had begun when they saw a massive hill of dirt expanding on the outskirts."

I blush. "Oops. I should have warned everyone first." I pause as I examine her face suspiciously. "How'd you get here so quickly?"

She bows her head guiltily. "Oh, I was kinda sorta following you around. You looked troubled, so I didn't want to bother you."

"Mhm. Stalker." I poke her stomach, and she snickers and pulls away slightly.

"Stop! I'm ticklish!"

"I know, that's what makes teasing you so funny."

There's an awkward pause as our smiles vanish. I don't know why, but it's like the air chills between us for no reason. Despite this, she tightens her grip on my arm.

"So... Jason."

"Uh huh?"

Sam blushes. "I talked with Cass an hour ago."

"Mmm. Is that so?"

For me, it was several hours ago when I spoke with her. I had to take time afterward to coordinate our exhausted forces, strengthen their resolve with Wordsmithing, build a temporary dimension to house millions of soon-to-be-displaced Volgrim refugees from the core worlds, and a whole bunch of other energy-taxing things. Naturally, Alpha didn't help me. He's incredibly lazy.

"Yeah. Cass said she tried to convince you not to leave, but you're going with Alpha anyway. Not only that, but you aren't taking us along with you!"

Oh. So that's why Sam wants to talk. I gaze into the distance at the Volgrim city and nod. It can wait. "Is that what Cass told you? I want to take you along. I'm going to beg Alpha to let me. The problem is, I don't think he will, and I don't have a way to force him."

Samantha smiles giddily. "You are? Wow! I can't believe Cass fibbed like that!" Her smile falters. "But... if Cass leaves, what does that mean for humanity?"

I chuckle. Funny, Sam has always had a soft spot for humans. It makes sense she'd worry about their safety. "They'll probably die, I suppose."

Her expression turns grim. "Y-yeah. Beelzebub is powerful, but he doesn't inspire courage-not like Cass, at least. Benjamin is amazing, and a great warrior, but you can see defeat in his eyes. He forces bravado for everyone else's sake. He's a broken man."

I reach over and caress Sam's face. Her skin is soft, a reminder of the nights we've shared, and the feelings I hold for her. "I know what you mean. I'm torn. Alpha tells me that if we go to the future, we can return and less than a day will pass. The problem is that he's screwed up twice already. If something goes wrong and we can't return in time..."

Samantha steps in front of me and holds my hands. "If Cass and I go with you, then we'd depend on Alpha to return us to the proper time. If he fails, the universe could be in ruins. Everyone we know will die. I don't want that to happen."

I force a smile for her sake. "What, you care about the people here? I thought you only liked me."

"And Cass!" Sam smirks. "But yes, I do care about other people here. Even if I didn't, I know Cass does. She's soft-hearted, compassionate, caring... everyone loves her. Even so, if push comes to shove, she'll violently protect the ones around her with her last breath. That's why they call her the Divine Mother, you know. She's a lioness."

Yes, my mind murmurs. A lioness. Cass keeps her 'pride' safe, and while she may not like violence at all, she's willing to jump in and fight tooth and nail to protect those she loves.

A memory bubbles up in my mind, as though it were from another universe or another time. Gressil cackles and takes a menacing step toward me, only for Cassiel to blast him with a level of energy rivaling the one she used to send Satan scurrying away. Gressil's body vaporizes into dust, and Cassiel smiles at me, proud that she was able to protect me from the scary monster who once tormented her.

Did this vision happen? Is it merely a figment of my imagination? Perhaps I'm projecting Samantha's actions onto Cassiel and calling it a 'memory.' I'm probably going crazy.

"You're right, as always, Sam. Even if I want Cass to come with me, she won't. She says that Beelzebub is forcing her to stay and lead humanity, but that isn't the truth."

"Mmm." Samantha pulls away from me and runs a hand through her long, black hair. "So... if I go with you, then that means Cass has to stay behind, all by herself."

"Yup."

There isn't a way to soften the blow. Samantha has to choose: Cassiel, or me?

"This sucks," Sam says, as she exhales audibly. "If I go with you, that means leaving Cass behind. Alpha's screwed up twice already, so we might not come back for years. Who knows what could happen to Cass in that much time." A shadow passes over her face. "Even in the last two months, so much happened when you weren't here. The Kolvaxians move like the wind, devouring everything they find. Everyone was on edge, thinking the Kolvaxians could tear through any portal to attack us. Cassiel was the only one who kept a clear head and stationed a few troops outside the portal to Volgarius. If she hadn't, the monsters would have entered the Labyrinth, and you wouldn't have anything left to find when you returned."

In the distance, a male Volgrim catches sight of us. A questioning look appears on his face, before he darts away, likely to alert others about our sudden appearance.

Since this happens behind Samantha, she doesn't notice it. I reach over and squeeze her shoulder. "Look, if you want to come with me, please do. However, if you want to stay with Cass, then you won't think about her and worry night and day. I'll be safe with Alpha, and you know as well as I do that he's all but invincible. I doubt Satan could dent him at this point, and that's saying something."

Sam nods. "I know, I know. Still, what if you disappear and don't come back? What if there's an accident and you die, but we never find out? What if-"

I cut her off before she can continue. The agony on her face is making my stomach churn. "Sam, Sam, that won't happen. I should be more worried about you and Cass than either of you about me. I can't stand the thought of leaving you girls behind in a hostile universe."

Samantha stands up a little straighter, and a look of determination appears, as though she's forcing it for my sake. "You don't have to worry about us, Jason. I wouldn't let anything happen to Cassiel, no matter what. I know she can be a little stubborn, and that could get her into trouble, but I won't let her jump in front of a monster to save others. If something happened to her..."

"Don't even talk like that." I pull Sam close, as more Volgrim appear in the distance. My hand roves across her back, and the smell of her hair intoxicates me. "Nothing's going to happen to you or Cass. If Alpha can't return us to the right time, I'll do it myself. No matter what."

Sam's fingernails dig into my back. "Promise?"

"Promise."

She nods, and her face rubs against my chest. "No takebacks."

"I wouldn't dream of it."

Satisfied, Samantha reaches up, pulls my head down, and kisses me. Her tongue has a mind of its own. She ravishes my mouth for several seconds, and I return the gesture, almost daring her to probe further.

However, she pulls away, grumpiness written all over her face. "Ugh. I hate getting interrupted."

My mind is so foggy from her pheromones that it takes me a second to shake the sensation off and realize what she's talking about. The Volgrim from earlier are much closer, perhaps a few hundred feet away. I recognize the leader immediately. Dosena.

Her group of fifty slows to a stop. Dosena scowls at us and speaks, irritation in her voice. "I apologize for bothering you during your primitive mating ritual. Don't stop on my account."

Samantha's eye twitches as she turns to face the newcomer. "That's no way to talk to friends."

"Friends," Dosena echoes dryly. "You've been gone for nearly a hundred orbital cycles. The refugees were supposed to be temporary. For an ally, you left us with a huge burden."

I interrupt Sam before she turns hostile. "Ah, haha... that's my fault. There was an accident and I time-traveled. Sorry won't cut it, I know, but I'm here now!" I chuckle uneasily, crossing my fingers that Samantha doesn't say anything to piss Dosena off. We need her talents, Sam. She can lead the Volgrim more effectively than any of us.

It takes a moment, but Dosena calms down. "Ah, well, at least you returned after all. Why are you here now?"

I swallow a lump in my throat. "You remember what I told you about the Kolvaxians?"

Dosena raises an eyebrow. "What of them?"

"They took over Melkin. We were forced to destroy the planet to contain the infection... and soon they will destroy the rest of Volgrim civilization."

Several Volgrim behind her flinch, and I recognize one or two of them. Scientists from Melkin, my brain hints, as it fills in the gaps. The Volgrim may attempt a blank facade for their emotions, but hearing about the destruction of their homeworld, for the second time at that, is going to affect them negatively, no matter how they try to hide their emotions.

"By the Founders..." Dosena curses under her breath and rubs her hands together. She turns to stare silently at one of the nearby Melkian scientists, before turning back to me. I surmise that she must have spoken to him telepathically. "Would you care to fill me in on what's happened during your absence?"

"It would be my pleasure."

Part 488c: Abandoned

Everyone's gone, now. My fingers tick off the checklist as I count off items in my head.

Ben is probably at the portal already, sending men and women to save the Volgrim worlds. I established a new portal system inside Hero City, so putting the Volgrim inside their nearly limitless pocket dimension should protect them from the Kolvaxians. Check.

Beelzebub, to his credit, is keeping his word and sending demons to assist the fleeing Volgrim as they pour into the Labyrinth. Check.

After explaining the situation, Dosena begrudgingly agreed to help out. Having spoken with others of her kind, she knows the Volgrim leadership was wiped out by the Kolvaxians, and even if the new Volgrim are different from the old, she's still a leader at heart.

...Check.

I think I'm finished. Other than staying behind and fighting alongside my friends and comrades, I have no reason to stay here anymore.

Yet, at the same time, I feel empty. I'm only leaving because Alpha won't take 'no' for an answer. I don't want to go. I want to stay with Samantha and Cassiel. Alpha should investigate his own bullshit. It has nothing to do with me.

I want to punch something.

The emptiness of the castle around me looms like a graveyard. Nobody is here now. Every military commander and noble are doing their part to ensure the survival of the Volgrim, salvage as much technology as possible, and seal the portals before the Kolvaxians make landfall. From what I've heard, three Volgrim worlds are currently under siege. Nobody will tell me anything since Cassiel ordered them not to rile me up. She knows that the more I hear about the situation, the more likely I'll fight Alpha to the death for my right to stay.

Shitty. That's what this is.

I lean against a pillar and tap my wrist. Alpha was supposed to be here an hour ago, yet he makes me wait for no reason. First, he makes everything sound like we're under awful time constraints, then he gets all huffy and storms off, and now he takes his sweet time, as if I didn't already have enough reason to stay.

Fuck it. Fuck it!

I'm not going to wait anymore. Yeah. Yeah! I'm going to teleport to Cassiel, stay by her side, and tell Alpha 'up yours!' Something's wrong with that guy, anyway. Cassiel's a bloodhound when it comes to danger detection.

Footsteps. I tilt my head up and look around, but in the giant hall just inside the palace doors, the acoustics turn every sound into a distant echo. I can't tell what direction the footsteps are coming from.

A half-minute passes and I keep looking around, until finally, I spot the figure. King Elshard.

No, not a king. Cassiel demoted him. He was very gracious about it, too.

Cody Elshard casually strolls over but doesn't smile. "Haven't left yet, have you?"

"No. I'm waiting on that other Jason."

"Mmm." Cody glances around the hall. "I hope you don't fight with him. Rebuilding the palace after the Clone Wars was bad enough the first time. We don't have troops or workers to spare, now."

"Yeah..." I trail off thoughtfully. "I hear you're not a king anymore."

"So they say," He replies dismissively. "I ruled for a short time. I was ineffective. I couldn't stop the demons, and I cannot fight these new monsters. The people have no faith in me, but they believe in the winged one."

"Cassiel," I state rhetorically. "I hear you didn't offer a word of protest. Why not?"

His eyes glaze over. "I don't believe in myself."

"What? You don't?"

He shakes his head. "As I said, I was a failure. I couldn't protect my comrades from dying at the hands of the demons. Saul... Gunther... even Adams. Samantha is the last one of my squadmates alive, and she hates me."

I crinkle my nose. "Oh, come on, Cody. Sam doesn't hate you. That's ridiculous."

He nods. "She does. I locked up all the demons in this city and even accused her of- well, you know. You were there. She saved my skin several times and helped fend off the Grez, and I repaid her with a slap to the face. I'm an ingrate."

I want to tell Cody something comforting like, no no, it's all in your head, don't worry about it, but he has a point.

My feet shuffle around, and Cody scratches a sore on his neck. He winces in pain, so I use the interruption to reply. "I don't think she hates you, but if you haven't apologized already, it's never too late to try."

Cody lightly kicks the pillar. "Yes, perhaps I should."

An awkward silence fills the air between us. After a few moments, Cody turns to leave, but stops. "Oh. Your clone is here."

He points across the hall, and I turn to see Alpha striding toward us from the palace's entrance. The look on his face is grim, and I realize why as I spot the person beside him: Marie.

Her expression could curdle milk. Cody, seeing the unpleasant woman striding toward us, nudges me. "Take care, Jason. Stay safe during your travels."

I nod in response, and the former king trudges away in the opposite direction that Alpha and Marie are coming from, deeper into the castle.

Once Marie is closer, she glances suspiciously at Cody's back, but eventually stops caring and turns to me. "Oh good, you're here on time. At least you're punctual."

"Punctual? What about you?!" I turn to Alpha. "What took you so long? Why is she with you?"

Alpha withstands the barrage of questions like a mountain would against a gentle tide. "There's been a change in plans. Marie's coming with us."

This catches me by surprise. "Uh, okay. But why?"

Marie scowls. "Are you looking a gift horse in the mouth? I gave your girlfriends an armada that I had spent several million years building up under Earth's surface just so they would have a fighting chance. I'd like a bit of gratitude."

She reaches in her shirt pocket and pulls out a cigarette, then lights it with a hidden lighter I didn't notice before. As she puffs on it, I rub the back of my head. "Right, I'm very thankful for that. I don't see what your armada has to do with anything, though."

"It's- well, it's a tit-for-tat thing," Alpha clarifies, "since she did give us a sizable fleet of very powerful ships to defend this universe, she expects some quid-pro-quo."

I'm stunned. I can barely believe my ears. "Marie! There were strings attached?! I thought you gave those ships because you wanted to protect your own skin, at the very least! If the Kolvaxians take over the galaxy-"

"It wouldn't affect me in the slightest," She says, cutting me off mid-sentence. "Anyway, it has nothing to do with you. This development has been a long time coming. Perhaps with this, I can get access to the Marie Council once again."

To say I'm confused would be an understatement. Why does she want to be on the council? Why did they kick her off originally, other than her alignment with Satan in the distant past? I don't know much about her, but if working with the First Emperor is cause enough to kick her off, I don't see why they'd let her back on over something like this. Then again, I don't know anything about Maries beyond the few instances I've talked with one of them.

Alpha replies before I can. "Remember, Marie 19A, I made no promises. I only said I'd ensure they looked into your file. If they suspect you of some plot to destroy the Central Hub, my hands are tied."

She blows smoke in the air and tilts her head away from both of us. "I know that much, imbecile. I'm not stupid. You'd think millions and millions of years of good behavior would make my sisters more lenient, especially if they're as low on womanpower as I think they are."

Now it's Alpha's turn to be visibly confused. "How do you know about the staffing situation?"

A slight smile appears on her face as she jerks her head back to examine him. "I didn't, but I do now. Manipulating you to give me information is like taking candy from a baby. Now, are we going to sit here and blabber all day, or are we going to leave?"

"You're obnoxious," Alpha says with a scowl. At least we both can agree on that much. "I'm beginning to remember why they cast you aside."

Her smile slips. "Don't act sanctimonious with me. You think I was the only one who allied with Satan? I came to this universe to replace Marie 12B. You know, the Marie you crushed to death with a boulder. My orders were to replace her and continue maintaining this universe as best as I could. Once you became an all-seeing Thoughtsmith, the other Maries cowered and distanced themselves from Satan, but they used me as a scapegoat! They set me up!"

Alpha reaches up to rub the bridge of his nose. "Right, right. The fact you still hold a grudge won't do you any favors with the Council. It's water under the bridge at this point."

Marie rolls her eyes. "Exactly the response I'd expect from a troglodyte."

Oh, brother. These two are going to fight the whole time, aren't they? I curse silently, wishing I could shut their mouths off for a while. I suppose deafening myself is an option. Wordsmithing truly is a magical thing.

Alpha rubs his hands together. "Alright, enough wasting time." He snaps his fingers, and a moment later, a portal forms, allowing Harold to step through.

The portal closes behind him, and the old man slaps Alpha on the back. "All righty! We 'bout ready to git the heck outta here?"

I glance around. "Wait, we can't go yet. I'm waiting on Samantha."

Alpha raises an eyebrow. "Why?"

"He needs a quickie for the road; I'd wager," Marie jokes.

I resist the urge to hit her. "Samantha hasn't told me her choice yet. I asked her if she wanted to come along."

Alpha answers almost immediately. "It's a no-go. I asked Belial, and she said she was staying behind. Something about... Cassiel's future." An odd look in Alpha's eye makes me double-take.

"She told you that, but didn't tell me?" I stare at him in disbelief. "I... I can't believe Sam would do that."

Alpha pauses hesitantly, as if he's debating his words. "Belial probably just didn't want to face you after turning you down. You know how women can be."

My foot scuffs on the floor. All three of the others stare, waiting for me to give up. "If I leave both of them behind, and something happens, I'll never forgive myself."

Quickly, perhaps too quickly, Alpha spits out, "No no, don't worry about it. Central Hub is probably going to dispatch a Jason or two here. It'll be plenty safe."

Harold holds up his wrist and the smart-watch gadget on it. "Helen's stayin' behind too, kid. S'long as she has her temporal communicabobber, she can send a ping, and I'll catch it! We can pop back in a jiffy if somethin' happens!"

Alpha relaxes. "Yeah, what Harold said. There's nothing to worry about. Let's stop dawdling and get a move on."

Hesitating, I glance at the doorway to the palace, half-expecting her to come running through it. She won't, of course. I'm acting like a child.

Finally, I relent. "Okay. Do it."

"Took him long enough," Marie mutters under her breath.

"Synchronize our position, Harold," Alpha says, as he breathes a sigh of relief. He's glad I'm not putting up a fight anymore, I muse to myself.

The old man taps his watch, and a holographic display hovers above it. For several moments, he taps on the panels floating in midair. His face tenses up as he presses buttons.

Impatience appears on Alpha's face. "Is it that glitch again?"

Harold nods. "It's the damnedest thing, kid. Stupid gizmo has a mind of its own."

"Glitch?" I ask. "What glitch?"

Alpha laughs nervously. "W-well, you know how I told you we could pop back a minute after we left, but instead we showed up two and a half months later?"

"Uh-huh."

He continues. "The thing is, that used to be the case. There's been weird interference with our synchronizers for several thousand jumps. Marie Alpha and her whole R&D division can't pinpoint the problem."

I feel my fists clench up. "You mean to tell me... you knew we wouldn't be able to return when you said we could? You lied to me?"

"N-not, a lie." Alpha chuckles again. "Technically, we could, it's just really difficult because of the syncing glitch. I have to over-compensate if I feel distortion lag."

Marie leans against a pillar. "Wow. And here I thought the Central Hub was supposed to be smart. Maybe I'm not missing out on anything important after all."

Harold rolls his eyes. "Ding-damn, woman. Everything has a bug or two 'n it. 's not a big deal at all. Let the ladies at HQ do their jobs 'n they'll fix it eventually." He pauses. "I hope."

Once again I'm left to smolder and choke on my anger. Not only did Alpha know that we probably couldn't return 'a minute later' like he said, but he also lied to me about it. I hate liars. Can't turn my back on them. If he lied once, who's to say he won't lie about other things?

"Mmm. There we go, I think," Harold says, as he closes off his holographic display. "Okay, kid. Do your thing."

Alpha smiles cheerfully at me. "Okey dokey, here we go!"

My teeth grind together as I force a smile. "Yeah. Here we go."

The world changes around us. For a split second, I can almost hear a voice calling out to me, but it's probably nothing. Just my imagination.

* * *

I'm late! Shoot, I should have run faster! I had to stop to take care of some wounded soldiers, but I know Jason won't fault me for that.

Devils! How long was I tending their wounds? Ten minutes? Twenty? After I leave with Jason, Cassiel will have to do all the healing herself. I have to help while I still can.

The hallways of the Labyrinth are a blur as I press my feet against walls and rush forward at incredible speed. Thankfully, with humans and demons pouring all their energy into the war-efforts, there's nobody in my path to slow me down. I can move as fast as possible!

The Labyrinth opens up around me to reveal the outpost that leads to Hero City. I slow to a halt and quickly show the guards my ID, and they let me pass with more than a cursory glance at my body, but I ignore them and press onward. Their gaze means nothing to me.

Once inside the portal, I glance around. Only a mile to go! I'm practically there! The palace looms in the distance, and I glance up at the star in the sky. 6:30? Maybe 7:00? I can't tell! This planet, like all other ones, has its own timescale, and I'm still not used to it.

Either way, I'm late. I know that much!

I take several shortcuts, leap over walls in a single bound, breathe a sigh of relief at how few soldiers there are in the city.

The palace grows bigger as I approach, and my heart flip-flops. He's still there! He has to be! He promised me he'd beg and plead with Alpha to let me come with him. I told him I might stay, but there's no way he'd leave me behind without a definite answer!

Another shortcut. I'll have to enter through the rear of the palace. A thirty-foot wall protects it, but I can clear that with ease. Indeed, I make a forty-foot hop and barely use any energy at all. Landing on the ground, I stumble a little as my bare feet smush into a soft patch of dirt. My body loses control, and I tumble forward, face-first, but catch myself before I taste soil.

It takes a second for me to pull myself up, but when I do, I spot King Elshard sitting on a bench, staring at me in surprise. No, that's wrong. He's not a king anymore. I don't think he's even a noble.

Elshard waves at me nervously. "O-oh! Samantha! Uh, hello?"

I nod at him quickly. "Cody." I glance past him at the rear entrance. "Have you seen Jason?"

He blushes slightly, and I realize my top must have shifted slightly. "Err, yes. He's, uh, inside the- well, the palace. Near the front."

"Oh, great. Thanks!" I start to take off, but Cody jumps to his feet.

"Wait! Uh, S-Samantha..."

Irritation passes over my face. I don't care about what he has to say. Jason's waiting for me!

Then again, I'm about to leave this universe, possibly for a very long time. I can't just leave bad blood behind.

"What?"

He rubs his hands together sheepishly. "I need to apologize to you. For everything. I've been not only a terrible ruler, but a terrible friend."

"It's fine, it's fine," I say, quickly brushing him off. "Don't even worry about it."

"You and I are the last, you know," He says, quickly. "The last of our squad. Gunther and Saul are both gone. So are the others."

His words make me pause. "Yes, I suppose that's true."

Cody flinches, as if an imaginary fist is about to hit him. "Do you hate me?"

"For what?"

"For putting demons in camps. For insulting you after you went off with Jason for a few months. For all the things I've done."

While I am late, he has a point. "I don't hate you. At worst, I felt betrayed, but I got over it. Demons tried to kill you. You coped in the worst way possible, but no permanent damage was done. Honestly, you could have caused plenty more harm."

Relief swells up in his eyes. "Oh... that- that means a lot, coming from you."

I take a hesitant step toward the door. "Um, I'm glad I could help you feel better, Cody."

He nods quickly and wipes his eyes. Tears? "Yeah, thank you, Sam. I've been going through a lot of emotions today."

Devils. I feel bad leaving him like this, but...

"Take care, Cody." I force a smile and dash away, nearly tearing the flimsy oak door off its hinges. Sometimes when I'm in a rush, I forget my strength!

The halls blur past as I rush toward the front entrance. Damn! Why did it have to be on the wrong side of the palace?!

"Jason! Jason!" I yell for him, unsure where to look.

Voices in the distance. "-we go!"

Go? Go where? My heart skips a beat. They're right at the front door! Move, legs!

"Jason!" I come into view of the four of them, right as they vanish. Just before they disappear, I catch a glimpse of his face. His eyes lower, and incredible anger fills his gaze. I'd know that look of his anywhere.

And, just like that, they're gone. Four people. I barely noticed the other three.

I slow to a walk and stumble over to where they were just standing. "Jas...on?"

He's gone. I'm too late.

He left without me.

Why? Why would he leave? I thought he was going to wait.

Oh. That's right. He looked angry before they jumped. Was it because of me? Was he angry that I didn't show? No, that can't be it. He'd know I was busy, right?

Or... maybe he didn't. Maybe he thinks I chose Cass over him. But... but I didn't. I didn't!

Why would he be angry?! I don't understand!

My knees tremble, and I slump to the ground. He left without me, and it's all my fault. I should have been here sooner. I'm a floozy! I'm stupid!

It's all my fault.

Part 489c: Paradox

A harsh metallic smell greets us as we arrive. A sickening sensation, as if we've landed on a ship in the middle of the ocean riding out a storm, courses through my insides. After a moment it passes, and I kneel down to regain my balance.

"That was a rough one," Alpha comments dryly.

Teleporting always jars me, but this is nothing like when we visited the Central Hub. It's almost as though something tore out a piece of my soul, then jammed it back inside my body.

After a moment, I stand back up and look around. We're inside a muggy bar, where the air smells like iron, and a taste similar to sulfur rests on my tongue, growing thicker every breath I take. Tables line up against the walls and throughout the middle, and way off on the other end, perhaps fifty feet away, a bartender leans his arm on the bar and snores quietly. No other people are here with us.

"Nice place you picked," Marie quips. "Classy. If ever I were to describe the smell of Satan's rectum, this would be it."

Alpha's eye twitches. "Harold, this is the spot, right?"

The old man nods and brings his watch up to activate its holographic display once again. "Yeap. Marie 12F said this'd be a safe area for Travelers to pop in. We're just a few levels above Earth's surface."

"Huh." Alpha pinches his nose. "Cripes. What's up with the smell? Marie has a point."

Harold shrugs. "I can ask the Hub if they'll send some data, son. We ain't never been to this stream before."

Alpha nods slowly. "Yeah. Supposedly it's a Source."

Source? Before I can ask him what that is, irritation appears on Harold's plasticine face. "Son of a gun. You ain't gonna believe this."

"Oh, come on... what now?" Alpha sighs overdramatically and leans over to look at Harold's display. "Again?"

"Mhm. We're later than expected. God-damned busted temporal crap put us months in the future. We've gotta message the Hub so they know we missed the arrival point."

"The future?" I pause to consider this. "Wait, if we're in another universe's future... doesn't that mean we could screw their timeline up just by being here?"

Alpha wants to ignore me but decides against it. "Not really."

I don't believe him. "But if we're in the future, then doesn't that mean returning to my universe and time will cause a paradox? A split reality? Two streams of time? A butterfly effect?"

"The heck do butterflies hafta do with anything?" Harold asks. "That's gotta be the dumbest thing I ever done heard."

Alpha nods. "Yeah, it's no big deal. Time probably split when we arrived, but that happens all the time."

Marie pulls out a lighter and cigarette, glaring at me as I turn to her. "Don't even bother. I couldn't care less about your questions."

"I didn't ask you anything."

She stuffs the cigarette in her mouth and lights it with a flourish. "Yeah, but you were going to."

She's a dead end. I turn back to Alpha, who is now pulling out a chair at a table beside us and plopping down, evidently waiting for Harold to finish up something on his wrist-projector thing. "Alpha, what do you mean by 'time splits?' What does that even mean?"

Alpha rolls his eyes. "Well, whenever we travel through time, and occasionally to other universes, there's like, a split in the timeline. Another universe forms from the old one."

"Uh huh..."

He resists my prodding for a second but continues. "Well, imagine if a universe was traveling along its path to a destination we'll call 'X,' but then you, an outsider appeared. Since you will alter its trajectory, it changes course and reroutes to destination Y. A new universe emerges that continues to the original destination."

"That sounds ominous," I mutter, as I pull up a chair at the same table. "Yet you think it won't cause a paradox?"

"Pft, nah," Alpha says, smirking, as he leans his neck back against the chair and props his head up with his hands. "Unless you do some really crazy shit, universes merge back together almost a hundred percent of the time. No paradoxes."

"Oh," I say, not entirely convinced. "Well, you know more than I do, obviously. A hundred percent sounds good."

Several moments pass. Alpha closes his eyes and tries to relax, but his face tightens. "Well, okay, it's more like ninety percent of the time."

"Ninety," I echo. "So... a ten percent chance of failure."

He opens his eyes and stares at the ceiling. "Ehh, give or take ten or twenty percent. Pretty close to that."

I want to choke him to death. "That's a giant margin of error, Alpha."

He leans forward in his seat again, then waves his hand dismissively. "Man, it's no big deal. The Marie Council's got all that boring stuff under control. There are plenty of other Jasons who can take care of splits if push comes to shove."

"If you say so."

My throat is as dry as sand. I consider bugging the bartender for a drink, only to remember I have Wordsmithing. " Milk. "

A glass of ice-cold milk appears on the table before me. As I raise it to my lips, I notice Alpha squinting at me. "What? Got a problem?"

He looks away and shakes his head. "No. I just didn't picture you as someone who'd like... milk. Weird."

"What, you don't?"

He taps his lip thoughtfully. "No... I do. That's what's weird. Other Jasons I've met don't."

Alpha gives an inordinate amount of thought to my beverage, as he stares at a wall to his right blankly. Silently, I sip the milk, and its coolness soothes my aching tonsils. Whatever's in the air, it's frigging corrosive.

From our left, Harold clears his throat. "Hah-hum. Well, Central Hub sent me the info. It seems Marie 12F was all fired-up in this stream. She runs this place real good, keeps it in tip-top shape. She manages every part of society."

"Sounds like a nightmare to live in," Alpha mutters.

"The smog ain't very nice. That's probably the stench you guys're smellin'." Harold winks at me, though I'm not sure why. "Anyway, we're in the bottom levels of a big-ass skyscraper. This timeline's super advanced, she calls them 'stratoscrapers' 'n 'megascrapers.' They damn near reach Earth's atmosphere."

Marie 19A crosses her arms and leers toward the doorway. "Meh. I could do better."

"Just what I'd expect a Marie to say," Alpha grunts. "You know the situation now, right, Harold?"

"Mhm." Harold points straight above us. "We've gots ta' get up ta' the upper levels. That's where all the rich 'n powerful folks live."

While he and Alpha debate the next step of our plan, I glance to my right and spot a gigantic TV covering the entire wall. Only a small portion in the middle is playing something, but if it were expanded, it would put some movie theaters I've seen to shame. The volume is muted, but words crawl across the bottom of the screen.

An Asian-looking guy dressed in a sharp suit stares at the camera, and behind him plays a sweeping visual of several people milling about in the stands of an indoor amphitheater.

The news host nods at the camera. David Finch and Caroline Watters are on the scene with other reporters as they gather for the Supreme Commander's speech. Caroline, tell us what the Commander is going to talk about today.

The camera cuts to a man and a woman standing a short distance from the people in the background. The woman is wearing a plain, functional blouse, and her lips are painted ruby-red with several layers of lipstick. She's very prim and proper, giving off a professional image.

My pleasure, Kenji. As you know, our Supreme Commander has pushed through a host of legislative actions over the past year, some of which have angered critics and infuriated activist groups, including those who represent equal rights for the lower levels. While we do not know precisely what he will be talking about in his speech today, it is very likely that he is planning to address these criticisms, and will hopefully offer a response regarding complaints of governmental abuse. He has been met with 120 consecutive days of protests, so it's improbable he can continue to ignore the issues forever.

Her fellow reporter shuffles his feet and waits for an idle moment to jump in. When she pauses to take a breath, he spots his chance. It's like Caroline says, Kenji. With the suicide rate increasing by 10,000% in just the last year, many middle-level and low-level officials are extremely worried about the possibility of that trend skyrocketing unabated. If the Supreme Commander has any compassion for those other than the upper 1%, we have yet to see him demonstrate it.

"Sparky. Hey." Alpha snaps his fingers and pulls me back to reality. "Let's go." He's already standing up. I was so engrossed in this otherworldly news report that I didn't even notice.

"Go? Where?" I quickly stand up and follow him as he heads for the door.

"I don't know, exactly. We're long past the date where we were supposed to meet with Marie 12F. I'm considering teleporting to the Central Hub and picking her up there, but maybe Harold's internal data is enough for now. We're just here to investigate this other Jason, after all."

As he and I catch up to Marie 19A and Harold at the door, she snakes a few ornery strands of hair behind her ear. "If we have to find the Jason of this stream, do you have the faintest clue where to look?"

Alpha nods. "There are, or were, two Jasons here. This stream is suspected of being a double-Source stream- very worrying. The first Jason is Jason 12F. He was supposedly killed by the second Jason, who Marie Alpha has designated 'Jason X.' His origins are a mystery, but based on memories taken from Jason X's mind-

I hold my hand up to interrupt him. "Uh, sorry Alpha, but you're losing me. All of this is going right over my head."

More irritation. Alpha rolls his eyes. "I was answering Marie, not you. Obviously, you don't understand the basics of time travel, so you won't be able to follow along."

Marie opens the door, and as we walk through, I clench my fist. "Can't you just answer one little question without looking down on me? Five minutes would do wonders to explain what's going on."

We step into a musky corridor, one where the air is a little smoky and hard to see. There's a pungent taste in the air, like rotten fruit tossed into a roaring fire then pulled out after a few second and served on a platter.

Alpha shrugs. "Fine, fire away. What's your first question?"

His sudden reversal takes me by surprise. I stifle my gag reflex from the pungent air, and Harold takes the lead, walking down the hallway to an exit door. "What's a 'Source?'"

Alpha scrunches up his face. "I'm a Source. You're probably a Source. So are Jason 12F and X. To answer that question, I'd have to explain the multiverse and what caused it."

"Caused it?" I echo.

"Yes. I'm probably the reason we have a multiverse, since I'm the first Time Traveler. At least, that's what Marie Alpha says."

"I've thought the same thing," Marie 19A comments. She puffs on her cigarette and blows the smoke directly up into her nose, likely to try and smell less of the air around us.

"Mmm." Alpha clears his throat. "Anyway, I traveled back in time by speaking the word, 'Rewind.' When I did that, I created the first universe split. After several hundreds of years, I-" Alpha pauses mid-sentence and chokes up. I almost think it's because of the odor, but he touches his throat lightly before continuing. "I... lost someone dear to me. Several people, in fact. After many years, I decided to try and go back in time to undo a mistake I'd made. In the process, I made a huge mistake."

He doesn't continue. I wait for a few moments before prodding. "What mistake?"

Alpha shakes his head. "I'd rather not go into details. Suffice it to say; I underestimated the dangers of time travel."

A memory from a week ago comes to me. "You mean, the point where you nearly unleashed the Sentinels on the multiverse?"

Marie chuckles. "That's the one."

Alpha doesn't let his emotions slip. Light appears at the end of the hallway. It looks like we're about to enter an enclosed glass tube suspended in the air.

"Anyway. I time traveled several more times, jumping from point to point, not realizing the causality errors I was causing. At that point, the Central Hub contacted me. They began to explain the repercussions of my actions, but it was already too late. The damage was done."

Marie nods. "At that point, splits were happening regardless of his presence. We suspected there was another time traveler, and eventually found out it was Satan. He was still alive. Due to the nature of the multiverse, new streams don't appear linearly; they appear all at once. If you treat the Multiverse like a series of straight lines on a piece of paper, then they will all have different origin points, but anytime there's overlap in relative time, they exist in the same reference point."

Nodding along, I keep a thoughtful look frozen on my face. I have no idea what the fuck they're saying, I think to myself. "Does that mean the multiverse is expanding on its own?"

"Proly not," Harold drawls. "Sometimes it split, and sometimes the splits pop back together. Ever have a moment where people forget details 'bout the past? Maybe they misremember somethin' and jes' kinda shrug it off. That usually means two universes popped back together."

"They merge," Marie says, correcting the old man.

It takes me a moment, but a puzzle piece clicks into place. "Oh. You mean like deja vu?"

Alpha nods. He pauses before the exit, which turns out to be a spherical glass tube connecting our tower to one several hundred feet away. It's suspended in the air, and immediately my stomach lurches as I gaze through the transparent floor at the ground hundreds of feet below us. I can barely see, since the air outside is colored brown. It swirls around the tube like an underwater monster, begging for a chance to burst inside and devour us alive.

"Yes. Deja vu is a good descriptor. The Marie HQ was formed without my help, and she began monitoring the multiverse at some point before contacting me once she discovered I was causing most of the new universes to appear. By then, I didn't have a way to undo everything, so we committed to tracking down other potential Wordsmiths. As far as we know, the only people with the ability to split streams are Satan, Hope, and myself."

"And your clones guarding the other universes?"

My friendly question is shot down by Alpha with a smirk. "I don't have many clones. I try to keep their numbers low. Most of the other Jasons are from streams split before my birth. At one point I went back in time to speak to Heroes from the past to trace my lineage. Unfortunately, this split the streams multiple times and gave birth to many versions of me who have lived lives very different from mine."

Alpha starts to step onto the glass floor, but Harold stops him. "New data, kid. Jason X is the Supreme Commander in this universe. If you'n Sparky go walkin' around, people are gonna recognize ya, 'n it could cause trouble."

"Cripes. You'd think Marie Alpha would've mentioned that." Alpha turns to look at me for a moment before facing the glass tube again. His body shifts, and I notice the side of his face tighten ever so slightly. At the same time, my skin crawls, like I have fire ants chewing on the nerves in my face. After a moment, the sensation disappears. Alpha sighs. "There. Now nobody will recognize us."

"Just one more thing to worry about," Marie mutters. "If Marie 12F runs this universe, why is Jason X the Supreme Commander?"

I rub my cheek and watch as Marie and Alpha fearlessly step onto the glass without a care in the world. Gingerly, I press a foot onto it, shivering as nausea hits me with a gut punch. I could easily save myself if the glass blew out. Hell, even without Wordsmithing, the body the Gods gave me could take a fall at terminal velocity without killing me. "Maybe it's a puppet thing. She makes him the public face, but she's behind the scenes and controlling everything."

Marie suddenly laughs out loud, startling me. "Hahaha! How appropriate! I hope that's the case! It's exactly the kind of thing I would do!"

It only takes us half a minute to cross over to the other skyscraper. My animal-brain sighs in relief once we're back on visible ground. As we cross over from the dead and lifeless Arrival building, we step into a veritable sea of people. They seemingly appear out of midair, hordes of them chattering to each other noisily and strolling from here to there, talking about this and that. One boy sits over against a wall pushing a small toy back and forth while his friends laugh and comment about banal things in their imaginary play session.

The clothes people wear are noticeably cheap and lackluster. Several people cough a little or a lot, and occasionally some of them double over in pain and damn near spit up blood, but nobody stops to help the ones who look like they need to go to the hospital. One woman even appears annoyed her son can't walk beside her without making choking sounds that would cause a chain smoker from my era to blush.

"Lovely place," I comment dryly.

Harold's old eyes sweep around the room. "Looks like they done got several leaks in their buildings. The smog from outside's seepin' in. I can see damn near half a dozen weak points in the building's structure. Considerin' how tall these buildings are, there must be tons o' stress from all the weight above on these lower levels."

Alpha points across the way. "That looks like an elevator over there. C'mon; I can't wait to get out of here."

"A hovershaft," Marie comments. "How droll. I had those in my base. Here I thought her society would be highly-advanced, but these people are barely holding on. I wonder where the lack of quality is coming from."

Harold answers Marie's question for her. "Marie 12F's data says she don't care about the weak or sick. The smarter, richer people live in the upper levels, and the dumber people who ain't as good as the rest live in the lower levels."

We stop in front of a hovershaft, and Alpha presses a button on the wall, waiting for it to sputter down to our level and step inside. While we pause, a small commotion behind us catches my attention. I glance back and raise an eyebrow at a line of people walking in a straight line and yelling noisily. Their group holds dozens of signs, saying things like 'Down with nutrition bars!' and 'Demons aren't the enemy, Volgrim are! Stop the perpetual war!'

A man outside of the protest yells something inaudible, and several people break off from the marching horde, screaming angrily at him and attacking him with fists and signs. "Bootlicker! Down with dual-citizens!!"

Alpha raises an eyebrow but doesn't move to help the man. "Cripes. Maybe the stories of 12F's unified and peaceful universe were a tad overblown."

It's now that I remember the newscast from before. "There are many people furious about the Supreme Commander's recent actions. The news said he was making life miserable for the middle and lower levels."

The hovershaft hums down and its doors open invitingly, allowing us to step inside. As we do and it closes, Marie rubs her nose. "You think so?"

The inertia as the hovershaft lurches into the air nearly makes me lose my lunch, especially when I realize that, once again, they built it out of ninety percent glass. The floor is transparent, making my feet tingle at the thought of falling through and plummeting to my death.

A small screen on the exit begins displaying the same channel broadcast from before. The news anchor from earlier, Kenji, smiles politely. "We continue to deliver updates as we wait for the Supreme Commander, Jason Hiro, to arrive onsite at the recently constructed Planet Hall, where he will deliver what he promises to be the first of several quarterly reports on the State of the Empire. Many people are asking about the Commander's unspoken intentions and whether he has any ulterior motives, but only time will tell. Joining us, we go on-scene with our reporters, and it seems that Caroline has managed to find a fascinating individual to speak to."

The camera changes perspective to show the beautiful blonde woman with the thick lipstick from earlier. Instead of her fellow reporter, now she has a burly-looking man wearing a military uniform standing beside her. He looks uncomfortable like he isn't enjoying being on camera, but every time her eyes meet his, he bows his head and smiles. He probably likes her.

"Thank you, Kenji. I'm here with Admiral Zhao, one of the leading figures at the top of Earthly Affairs. Zhao has worked alongside the Supreme Commander for millennia and crafted many bills even as recently as the last century, when he signed the Demon Enforcement Act. That piece of legislation was responsible for the increased patrols in the Labyrinth and allowed our troops to take down any demons caught outside the Containment Zone. Admiral Zhao, tell me," Caroline leans toward him and gently touches his hand with hers, causing the man to blush madly and pull away. "what do you think the Supreme Commander is going to talk about today?"

Zhao rubs the back of his head and straightens his posture slightly. "Well, ma'am, I'm not at liberty to discuss top-secret governmental affairs, as you know, but if I had to hazard a guess, I imagine he'll spend a large amount of time talking about the free travel between Heaven and Earth. As you know, his actions over the last year have caused some controversy, but our Commander is a wise man, and he understands that demons are our primary foes. His construction of new Energy Conduits to power our military's might has done wonders to help us further choke the demon infestation that threatens our lives."

Caroline nods for a few moments after he finishes, possibly receiving further questions from her station to ask him. "I see. And Admiral, what about the epidemic of suicides wracking our society these past few months? Do you think the Supreme Commander will address those issues?"

Zhao stiffens noticeably. "It is a sad day for our proud Empire when those who contribute nothing take the easy way out, rather than bettering themselves to move to the middle and upper levels of society. Anyone weak enough to cast their life away for a vague promise of nirvana is, in my opinion, a pathetic simpleton. Frankly, I wouldn't blame the Angels and Gods if they were planning a purge of the new arrivals. Citizens too weak to pledge themselves to our great empire should not be allowed to fill up the living space of our closest friends and allies."

Caroline nods neutrally. "I've heard that you are a staunch supporter of our Empire's creed. What would you say to those who state that it is unfair to the poor, and who claim those at the lower levels have limited upward mobility?"

Admiral Zhao's expression sours. "I have no respect for those who disrespect The Creed. For glory, we aspire. Perfection, we achieve. Waste, we prevent. Failure, we despise. Anyone who can't agree with eloquent words like those are likely traitors, and in my opinion, they work for the demons. The worst enemy is the one within."

The reporter slowly shuffles a step away from the admiral, her sweetness from earlier all but gone. "I see. Thank you very much for your time, Admiral Zhao. I'm sure our viewers will find your opinions... enlightening."

"It was my pleasure," The Admiral states, before nodding gruffly and strutting away.

I turn my attention away from the screen only to realize the other three were watching with rapt attention. Alpha rubs his chin. "That guy may be a pragmatist, but his opinions of the less fortunate are a little bit repugnant."

Marie raises an eyebrow. "Are you kidding? He only spoke the truth. If someone is useless, they should work hard to improve themselves or stop wasting limited resources on their worthless life. Nothing he said was controversial in the slightest."

Alpha crosses his arms, frowning. "You've been gifted from birth with extraordinary intelligence, Marie. Some people aren't as lucky as you."

"That's rich," Marie counters. "You've had magical, god-like powers since your 18th birthday. Don't even pretend you care about the unwashed masses. If you did, the Energy Wars wouldn't have happened in the first place."

"Children, children." Harold raises his hands and rests them on Marie and Alpha's shoulders. "Let's not get too heated. Didn't ya hear? The Supreme Commander is going ta' be givin' a speech. Once he appears, we can teleport right to him."

"After the cameras are off, anyway," Alpha retorts. "I see what you mean, though, Harold."

Marie pulls out another cigarette and lights it. I didn't even notice her throw the first one away. "The smog's clearing up outside."

I turn to stare out at the world before us. A sea of metal, concrete, and many space-age materials I can't identify, form the buildings which soar into the sky. Their peaks are so distant that I can't even make them out. The reflection of the midday sun against sheer walls of glass and polished metal makes me wince.

Marie evaluates the stratoscrapers coolly. "Looks like these towers are nano-assembled. It gives them a denser molecular structure so they can be built far higher than usual and support much more weight. Too bad their design is only good for holding them up; they wouldn't last against a high-energy earthquake or something impacting them. Marie 12F compromised security to get the most height and width possible out of these buildings. Sloppy."

"Seems impressive to me," Alpha counters. "I've never seen a planet like this. Not across all the different universes I've visited."

Marie rolls her eyes. "Perhaps you only find it impressive because you're a simpleton."

Alpha stares at her silently with an expression that says, maybe you should keep your trap shut. After a moment, he smiles. "Don't make me drop a boulder on you."

"Funny," she murmurs.

Whatever they're talking about, it appears to be an inside joke. They break out into smiles and chortle before gazing back outside at the view surrounding us.

I rest my hand on the glass wall, wistfully staring at the incredible vista. I wish Cass and Sam could have been here to see this.

Yes, murmurs the familiar voice inside me. You left them behind. I knew you would.

I ignore the voice. Instead, I sigh. Alpha still didn't tell me what a Source was. I'll have to ask him later.

Part 490c: Route C Finale

The four of us sit at a table, bored out of our minds, as the minutes crawl along, slowly turning to hours. The hum of a janitor pushing along a machine to clean the floor mixes with the tranquility of a crowd walking past us, left and right, nobody speaking except in hushed voices.

The people walking around up here dress in what I would describe as 'middle-class attire,' mostly suits, uniforms, things of that sort. Occasionally a lightly armored security officer will pass the four of us, not bothering to care about our existence in the slightest. The more I think about it, the more I realize Alpha must have silently thoughtsmithed magic to make other people take less notice of us. He's made us blend in with the background somewhat. We aren't invisible, but we might as well be.

Unlike the windows on the lower levels, the middle section has a great view. The smog is almost a mile below us, and while we can see traces of it in the distance, a skyline of steel structures rising into the atmosphere makes for a humbling spectacle. Never in my life did I picture myself sitting in a cafeteria with a view like this.

A voice speaks up from the room's loudspeakers.

"Good morning to all members of Humanity. As per the promise I made last year, I am giving this speech today as part of my bi-monthly update regarding the operations of our vast empire."

Alpha and Marie raise their heads up simultaneously to glance across the room at the viewscreen. The man onscreen is the same as Alpha and me, a Jason. Apparently, he's the one known as Jason X. He's our target.

I follow their gaze and examine him. He's wearing a military uniform, neatly pressed, yet he hasn't tucked his collar in properly. It's as if he was in a rush when he left his house and forgot to maintain his appearance. The fact nobody running the video program thought to fix his clothes tells me they probably didn't have time.

Jason X keeps his disarming smile as he continues to speak, though I've already missed a bit of what he said. "If humans kill themselves any more than they already have, the amount of energy flowing to the angels will slow dramatically. In the worst case scenario, it could invert, causing the angels to lose more energy than we can give."

His demeanor is that of a composed leader, one doing his best to look out for the interests of his people. Or is it? It might be a facade. He's probably Hope, after all. Hope is a sociopath without a single decent bone in his body: a merciless killer.

Marie yawns. "Gods. This speech is the worst."

"You said it," Alpha mutters. "He's so monotone that I'm about to fall asleep."

"All I am asking is that people realize the folly of their actions," Jason X continues, but I don't get to hear what he says next. The person we were waiting for arrives.

"Marie Becker?" A young man strolls up to us, but he seems hesitant. "Goodness, it's been a while! We haven't seen you in the Engineering Corps for months!"

Silver, that's his name. At least, that's what Harold told us when Central Hub sent the pertinent personnel files. Apparently, Silver is a high-ranking person in this stream. He looks to be around twenty-four years old, but his youthful body is a mirage, like everyone else around here. Harold has explained several fascinating things about this universe, including the fact that humans have perfected nanobot technology to the point where it even gives them immortality. I can't trust my eyes when it comes to judging people's supposed ages.

Marie stands up, relieved she doesn't have to lounge around anymore. "Took you long enough. I brought guests from the- err, the Outer Rim! We've been waiting for an escort for over an hour!"

Marie told us earlier that she doesn't know anyone in this stream, but her bossy personality and quick-thinking is terrific at times like these. The young guy shrinks back, unnerved by her annoyance. "S-sorry, ma'am. I've been keeping an eye on the target, as you ordered. I wasn't expecting you back today, of all days, so I was at the-"

"Excuses!" Marie barks a single word, silencing the poor guy. "I don't pay you to lounge around! Now hurry up and get us moving! I lost my access credentials, so you'll be showing my good friends the sights, understand?!"

Silver winces, but confusion appears on his face. "Pay me...?"

Marie's outrage falters for a moment. I can almost see the gears turn in her head as she thinks to herself, shit, Harold already said there wasn't any form of currency in this universe. She instantly resumes her previous anger and dials it up to eleven. "You know damn well what I meant! Hurry up! I want to show them our prestigious Engineering section!"

Silver nods quickly and beckons to us, but doesn't take his eyes off Marie. "Uh, come along, then."

Harold rubs his knee as the three of us stand. Jason X is still blabbing about stuff like he was before, and I'm in no mood to listen, so we head off after Silver.

A minute later, I nudge Marie and whisper, "How did you do that?"

"Do what?"

I gesture at Silver's back. He doesn't see me since he and Harold are discussing something up ahead of the group. "You took command and put him in his place. He has no doubt you're the same as Marie 12F. You must have mimicked her personality to the T."

She shrugs. "One thing you'll learn if you hang around people from the Central Hub is that Maries very rarely have any significant personality divergences from one another. I just treated him the way any Marie would, and things worked out perfectly." She pulls her hair back and lets it slide down her right shoulder. "As they always do."

"I see."

Silently, I ponder her response for a few moments while listening to Silver excitedly babble to Harold about the newest developments in robotics. I've yet to meet a Marie who wasn't arrogant, condescending, and more than a little stuck-up, and now she tells me they're all like that. No matter how smart they are, it doesn't fill me with glee to have an army of sociopaths 'protecting' the multiverse and its existence.

I wonder what each Marie gets out of it.

Sighing, I bug her again. "Why do you want to see the Engineering Corps?"

Marie answers instantly. "Marie 12F was a Source Marie, like me. She and I have similar voracious appetites for science. I can only hope she's developed unique technology that I haven't. The problem with Maries in the Central Hub is that they're always busy keeping track of the Multiverse. They lack time to expand their minds and unwind by dabbling with theoretical physics."

I rub a speck from my eye. "What, you think she'll have some crazy military technology?"

A shrug. "Possibly. It's not always about war and killing though, Jason. There are entire fields of science you probably know nothing about. I'm an expert in all of them."

"Every single one?"

"Yes."

The smug look on her face tells me not to test her. She's lived for tens of millions of years, so it's believable that she's as brilliant as she claims. She's smarter than me, at least.

My eyes narrow as I stare at Alpha's back. Dunno what his excuse is, though. Alpha's stupid, despite being older than her by a wide margin.

"What are you staring at?" Marie glares at me from the corner of her eye. "Wipe that smile off your face."

I was smiling? I quickly rub my lips. "Sorry, I was just thinking about Alpha. Isn't he much, much older than you? He claimed to be a billion years old, but he doesn't seem like the sharpest knife in the drawer."

Her irritation vanishes in an instant. "Hah, you're right about that! He's a dullard. Always was, even when I worked for the Central Hub. Jason Alpha is the muscle they send in when things need a quick cleanup. He's a nice enough fellow, but he's screwed up so many times that nobody trusts him with any responsibilities involving brain-power. The thing is, you don't become infinitely smarter as you age. Some people are born smarter than others, and everyone has a plateau. It just so happens that the average Jason is lower than the average human, who is far lower than the average Marie. Understand?"

Her words have a biting edge to them. "You don't think an intelligent Jason can exist? Or that a stupid Marie can?"

She shakes her head. "While it may technically be possible, all universes branch off from existing ones. Most of them branch off from points when Maries and Jasons are already born, meaning our potential is already determined. The universes that branch off before our births will often prevent our existences entirely, meaning a stupid or smart variant won't appear. It's simply not how the multiverse works."

Today, I've learned something interesting. "The multiverse isn't infinite, then?"

Marie sighs. "The primitive notion of a universe for every choice and action was debunked, quite literally, tens of millions of years ago. Such a thing does not exist in reality."

Our group slows to a crawl as Silver stops at an intimidating doorway. Its metallic surface has several crisscrossing lines, indicating it's a double-sided door that slides into itself and opens from the middle. At twenty-feet tall and thirty feet wide, it's more than big enough for a few side-by-side cars to glide through without hitting the edges.

He swipes a keycard reader, and it turns green, causing the giant door to slide open silently. Silver's eyes light up as he strolls through the doorway, spinning on his heel to walk backward. He smiles at Marie. "We've kept up the usual projects, miss Becker! Isotope 823 is stable, as it was when you left! Oh, and the upgrades to the trifornium purifiers have progressed another four percent!"

Marie stretches her lips to smile faintly. "That's nice. I'd like to show our guests the full catalog of our upcoming projects. Could you grab the registry for me?"

Silver rubs his hands together, but though his smile is still present, a flash of nervousness appears. "Err, the full catalog, ma'am? Even the black-level projects?"

"Did I stutter?"

He shakes his head. "No, of course not. I'll be right back."

Silver skitters away, leaving us alone to examine the room. I expected to see dozens of men and women shambling about in lab coats, security officers and such, perhaps even a bureaucrat or two, but the place is nearly empty. A couple of janitors, two armed security guards standing with their backs against opposite walls, and a few scientists chattering among each other on the opposite side of the room are all I can spot.

Meanwhile, sci-fi looking shelves hang down from the ceiling, countertops covered in gadgets and devices litter the floor, and a few tiny drones buzz around holding tubes filled with colored liquid, transporting them from machines to their counterparts. It's a giant science lab, likely for developing weaponry and all kinds of other crazy shit, but there's nobody here!

I cough into my fist. "Err, where is everyone?"

Marie shuffles over to a table and picks up a device to examine it. "Don't know. Don't care."

Harold and Alpha exchange glances before the old man taps the side of his head. "That Jason X guy is givin' his speech, remember? I bet they're off watching it. Seemed important ta' me."

Alpha nods. "Makes sense. Security is a little light for a place like this, though."

"No, no, not at all!" Silver appears out of nowhere, a worried smile on his face. He wrings his hands together nervously, always flicking his gaze at Marie's back as she leans over the table. "To make it to the Engineering Corps, a spy or saboteur would need to bypass several dozen layers of security. You passed them on the way here, but my security card disabled the- oh!" Silver cuts off abruptly and slides over to Marie. She's holding something in her hand and carefully examining it. "I'm very sorry, Miss Becker, but that prototype isn't complete yet. We're running a few weeks behind schedule."

"Mmm." Marie places it back on the table. "I've been on vacation for too long. Remind me what it does, again?"

I can hear the relief in Silver's voice that she isn't yelling at him for another failure. "I-it's the handheld reconnaissance drone, remember? It's small enough to bypass level three Volgrim shielding without triggering a detection blip."

Marie nods and waves her hand flippantly. "Ah, yes, that thing. Do be sure to speed up the program, then. Do you have the project registry for me?"

After blanking out for a moment, Silver nods. "Oh, right! I've got it right here for you, Miss Becker." He hands her a tablet but stands in front of it to block our view. I can hear him whisper something to her about not showing black-level projects to outsiders and the trouble it could cause, but she waves him off.

"You don't need to tell me, Silver. I really just need to check the status of a few projects."

While she and Silver calmly debate the merits of sharing information with outsiders, Alpha gently reaches over and tugs at my sleeve. Suddenly, in my mind, I hear his voice.

Don't trust Marie 19A. I don't know why she wants 12F's files, but little good can come of it.

A twinge of nerves comes over me. I start to speak up, then realize Alpha is probably reading my mind right now. Creepy. Oops, hope he didn't hear that!

Why don't you stop her, then?

Alpha frowns. She continues chatting with Silver, but her eyes flick over to us. She's a Marie.

The hell does that have to do with anything?

Alpha almost imperceptibly shakes his head. You have yet to learn, Sparky. Never underestimate a Marie. One slight, one aggravation, and they never forget. If I don't kill her, then telling her 'no' is asking for a lot of trouble. Even if I did kill her, 19A, of all the Maries, is likely to have a backup plan. Maybe a clone, or something.

Yeah? Why do you say that?

Darkness covers his face. Because I killed Marie 12B, the one who Marie 19A was assigned to replace. When 19A first emerged, I thought she was a ghost. I didn't yet know about the existence of the Central Hub. It scared me. She wasn't a clone, but that doesn't mean she couldn't make one.

What, you're afraid of her?

Alpha's lip twitches. Hard to say, Sparky. There are forces in this universe that a billion years have taught me nothing about. The most unknowable is that of the female mind, especially when it belongs to a Marie. After all, I can't read her thoughts. Even if I could...

You can't read her mind?

Not even with Thoughtsmithing. I thought it was a localized anti-energy field, but now I don't know.

Marie turns to us and holds the pad up so we can't see, but reads off the entries out loud. "Investigations into producing auditory hallucinations, mesmeric feedback loops, a project to establish a bio-engineering base on a localized planetary cluster 12,000 lightyears away, bio-engineering and crossbreeding of human and demon DNA, hardening the human carapace to withstand greater gravity pressures so we can colonize planets with masses greater than four EM... interesting."

"What's 'EM?'" I ask.

"Earth Masses. The larger a planet, the stronger its gravity. After a certain point, you'll feel as though there's an anvil strapped to every inch of your body, and eventually, a massive planet's gravity will crush you into pulp."

"Pleasant," I mutter dryly.

A movement behind Marie catches my eye. One of the security guards raises his hand to his ear. After a moment, he stiffens in alarm. He drops his hand and beelines for us. "Marie Becker! Emergency! The Supreme Commander, he's been-!"

The words have hardly left his mouth when suddenly the building shakes. Everyone yelps in alarm, and all of us get tossed to the right like ragdolls. My body kicks into high gear and I right myself in an instant, landing on my palm and pirouetting to my feet, even as more tremors rock the building. A sound like a battering ram smashing into concrete blasts from every wall, and the grinding of metal on metal makes me jerk my head up in alarm.

Alpha, too, catches himself, and before Marie can hit the ground, a cushion of air catches her and returns her to her feet. Judging by the look on her face, she wasn't responsible for the save. Alpha must have thoughtsmithed and caught her.

Harold doesn't even flinch from all the commotion, and his gyroscopic sensors allow him to keep himself upright without any trouble, but poor Silver isn't as lucky. He yelps in surprise and smacks against a cabinet, nearly falling unconscious as his body hits the floor. The scientists and guards yell in alarm, as beakers and tools fly from their holding positions and clatter to the ground.

"What the fuck?!" The expletive blasts from Marie's mouth, unbidden by common courtesy in the heat of the moment. "Guard! Status report! Now!"

Above us, a robotic male voice speaks from the ceiling. "All guards in the Engineering Corps have been rendered unconscious. Sending emergency distress call to the Medical Division for retrieval and regeneration. Error. The Medical Division is unable to respond."

"Unable to respond?" Alpha echoes the voice above. "Uh, computer! What's going on? Give us a status report!"

Silence. The computer doesn't reply. The building shakes once again, and an explosion booms in the distance.

Harold wheezes. "Son, his name is Samuel. You gotta chat him up nicely or he won't talk back!"

Marie rolls her eyes. "Samuel! Give me a status report!"

The male voice keeps its artificial calmness. "Request received. Request denied. You are not an authorized representative."

"What do you mean? I'm Marie Becker! I run this corps!"

I can practically hear the computer shake his head at her. "That statement is false. You are not Marie Becker. Please contact an authorized representative to place requests, or feel free to contact support at any time of day by calling-"

"Gahhhh!" Marie bellows in anger and kicks the wall. "Stupid hunk of junk! Alpha, we need to make heads or tails of what's going on!"

Another explosion sounds off, but this one is much closer than the others. A shockwave rushes down the hallway as several windows implode hundreds of feet outside the Engineering Corps.

Alpha takes a defensive stance. "Intruders. Armored. Volgrim, I think."

"Volgrim?! You've gotta be kidding me!" I take a defensive stance as well, just as several canisters come flying down the hall, smoke pouring from them and clouding the vision. My eyes start to water, and my knees lock up, before I realize they must be tear gas, or something worse. A feeling of paralysis starts to take me, but I cough out a word. " Immune! "

A second later, I'm back to full. " Ventilate. " The smoke vanishes into nothingness as ten armored people come charging at us, though they noticeably falter when they realize the smoke is gone. Pausing, they hop behind cover and begin blasting shots of plasma at us, but Alpha doesn't flinch. The white-hot energy blasts ricochet off an invisible shield.

Alpha's face contorts several times. "What?! These aren't Volgrim. They're demons. Why are demons using conventional weaponry and armor?"

Again, he must have thoughtsmithed inside of their minds or something. Marie may be correct about his idiocy, but when it comes to fighting, he never breaks a sweat. I glance back at her. "Alpha, they must be trying to secure the contents of the Engineering Corps. I don't know what's in there, but we can't let them-"

"We can," he mutters. "You don't understand, Sparky. This is a Source universe. We can't meddle in its affairs. We're just here to investigate. We need to pull out and let the local forces take care of things."

The sound of a scientist moaning behind me makes the hairs on the back of my neck stand on end. "If these are demons, they'll kill the scientists! We can't leave them to die!"

"We can, and we will," Marie says, as she appears beside me. Her voice has a note of caution in it. "I may not be in the Central Hub anymore, but even I know what can happen when we meddle in streams we shouldn't. Alpha, get us out of here."

Alpha nods. "Too bad for the kid."

The room shifts, and suddenly the enemy combatants vanish. We arrive in the midst of fire and brimstone, as windows explode and people scream in terror. We're back in the waiting room from before Silver found us, and everything is different. All the windows have been blown out, and the stratoscrapers in the distance scream in pain as blasts of energy rain down from the sky to pummel their metal and glass into atoms.

A horrible rumbling shakes the ground, as though every inch of the floor were being drilled with a jackhammer. Miles away, a stratoscraper tumbles down, pulverizing the floors below it as it collapses, only to stop midway and tumble to the side, pounding into its closest neighbor, tearing it down.

Harold appears beside Alpha. "Son of a dadgum biscuit! I patched into th' telly news, and they jes' said Jason X went on a flippin' rampage! Lookit the video!"

His eye shifts, and a holographic projection plays out, suspended in midair.

Jason X sweeps his arms toward the crowd. "Even if the angels and gods were to one day become our allies, I cannot stress this enough-!"

He doesn't get to finish his sentence. Something unseen pounds him in the head, sending his body careening to the right, and leaving him lying on the ground, dead.

A crowd of agents leaps into action, blocking his body. They scream and bark orders in confusion, but I manage to pick out something about him being shot. An assassination attempt?

"Harold, I thought you said he went on a rampage! Someone murdered him! Jesus Christ!"

Harold holds his hand up to silence me. "Keep watching, boy!"

And so I do. Alpha, Marie, Harold, and I all watch silently as one of the men guarding the Supreme Commander explodes into a puddle of blood and gore. It's like a grenade went off in his body, turning him from human to wallpaper in a single second. A few moments pass, and the rest of the guards explode in kind, until eventually Jason X raises up from the ground, tongue lolling out of his mouth. His arms and legs dangle uselessly at his sides, so he must be using telekinesis to move.

A woman comes flying into view, apparently yanked by Jason X's telekinesis. "Oh my god, you're a-" She's cut off before she can finish by Jason X tearing her leg from her body and beating her to death with it. The crowd shrieks in horror but one man dares to stand up to X. I recognize him from the earlier broadcast; he's the Chinese-looking guy, Admiral Zhao.

"Monster! Demon! What the hell are you?!" The admiral courageously stands up to the monster facing him and unloads his gun on X, but it's useless. A few moments later, Jason X speaks a single word, " Inferno! "

I turn away, unable to watch, as the camera seems to gleefully pan over the horrid image of people screaming their last words. A massive gout of flame surges over them, tearing flesh from bone.

Harold shuts the hologram off. Alpha covers his mouth. He looks like he's about to retch. "Son of a bitch... he's Hope. He has to be Hope."

"That was monstrous," Marie says. She tries to keep calm, but her lip twitches. Even the invulnerable Marie, usually immune to emotion, is horribly disturbed. "What did we just witness? That was carnage unlike anything I've ever seen."

Alpha gnashes his teeth. "That's Hope, without a doubt. It's been an eternity, but I can never forget the look of glee on his face. He took something from me, something precious, and savored the experience. He delights in pain and torture. I have to stop him."

Memories bubble up in my mind. Cassiel and Samantha scream in pain before their necks snap. Hope's face- my face, smiles back at me.

" We have to stop him, Alpha. Don't you dare count me out."

"Right." Alpha nods. "Found him. Let's go."

* * *

An instant later, there he is. We disappear and reappear in the middle of a broken lobby. Several demons lie unmoving on the ground, as the Jason across from us smiles and licks his lips. After a moment, he stumbles back, apparently noticing our presence.

Something's wrong with his eyes. While his arms and legs flop uselessly at his sides, his eyes move about aimlessly, and they are visibly clouded over with grey mist. He's... blind?

"There you are. We've come to stop you, once and for all, Hope," Alpha says. He takes a single step toward Hope, and the other Jason panics. Fear stretches over his face.

" Create! " Hope barks out a word, and a pebble appears in midair. I stare at it in confusion for a split second, wondering to myself, why the fuck is he creating a pebble?!

Then he yells again. " FIRE!! "

The pebble disappears. A light like the surface of the sun fills the room, and a thunderstorm hits my body, as well as the rest of us. Before I get blown off my feet, it vanishes and sucks away, perhaps to another universe. Blinking, I spot Alpha, hand outstretched, the pebble clutched firmly in his grasp.

"That won't work." Alpha releases the pebble, and it falls, smashing into the ground with unusual force. It must have been ultra-dense or made of hefty materials. "I knew you were a monster. But this? Now you've gone too far, Hope. You can't even pick an ally. You just devour the demons and the humans alike for your own selfish greed."

Hope smiles, but it's a fake expression. He's nervous. He's scared. "My name is Jason Hiro. I can't see you, but your voice is the same as mine. I suppose you're another one of Marie's clones, eh?"

Alpha narrows his gaze. "You must be lying. Of course, you're Hope. Who do you think you're fooling? Your actions speak louder than words."

Why is Hope denying his existence? He knows who he is. He knows we've come to stop him. Why play dumb?

He must be Hope. He has to be!

But then, maybe something else is going on...

"Hold on; maybe he isn't lying. Perhaps he doesn't remember yet." I prod Alpha, giving him pause before he leaps forward and tears Hope's head off.

Perhaps he doesn't remember the past. He was hit by a bullet in the head. Just look at him!

I send a single thought to Alpha, and to my surprise, he nods. His voice plays in my mind. Good point. If he isn't Hope, then that means the real threat is still out there. I should confirm his identity.

Alpha takes two steps toward Hope. "You have a point. Let us see if he is lying, then. Remember. "

Seconds pass, Hope stumbles forward to the floor as his limbs twitch violently. He can't keep himself flying with telekinesis. Mental strain, perhaps? His mouth opens and closes, as though he wants to scream, but can't.

Seconds pass, and finally, Hope shakes the pain off and lifts himself up once more.

He speaks one sentence.

"I'm not Hope, but I know who is."

* * *

The building shakes and trembles. Suddenly, the whole thing careens to the left, making me feel like a massive spaceship planted into its side. Everyone is nearly thrown off their feet, but just like before, we regain our footing.

Jason X, apparently not named Hope, smiles wildly at us. "Long time, no see, Heroes!"

Harold jumps in alarm and pulls up his temporal-communicator wrist-watch, then his eyes bulge. What in tarnation?! 23,000 temporal messages? From Helen?!"

Between Jason X and our group, a flash of movement activates my reflexes. I duck down and aim my hand at one- no, two figures who have just appeared.

A giant orc whose head nearly scrapes the ceiling stands beside a young blonde woman, her face echoing a recent memory in my mind. She's wearing what I can only describe as a Hypersuit. It takes me a moment, but I manage to remember her face. She's the girl who ran away in Hero City! I chased after her! But- but what the hell is she doing here?!

The girl takes two steps forward and stabs a finger into Alpha's chest. "I knew it! You caused the convergence! Idiot!"

All the while, Harold stares at his temporal communicator in stunned silence. "Helen? H-Helen?!"