"Just one last signature to confirm, Jason." Rebecca, one of the scientists in the room, smiles at me and tugs on her long, curly black hair.

She hands me a clipboard with a legal form clamped onto it. I barely glance at the paper before writing my name down. My body feels a little numb; it's hard to believe I'm finally committing.

"You'll be awake in less than the snap of a finger!" She smiles cheerfully, then steps back and presses a button on the side of my cryopod. A hatch closes in front of me, and a large glass window slides down, barring me from the outside world. It's my last chance to quit, back out, and leave... but I won't. I'm not going anywhere.

I stare out the transparent plexiglass around me as the pod closes. Nine other pods are here; their lids clamp down simultaneously. Each of their occupants' faces has a range of emotions, from nervousness, to fear, to even a bit of curiosity. The general atmosphere is intense, as this is only the third clinical trial the doctors have performed.

I feel different, compared to the others. A calmness overtakes me, making me feel as if I'm about to land softly in a field of butterflies. My eyes lazily take in the scene around me. When I next wake up, it will be a hundred thousand years in the future. Humanity won't look anything like they do now. They'll probably all be transformed into sci-fi robots, or they'll live in a massive virtual reality simulation, spinning around the sun in a Dyson sphere.

Gas hisses into the small enclosed space around me. First I'll be put to sleep, then I'll be frozen, and later the auto-warmup routine will run, waking me up. This machine is supposed to have enough power attached to its battery that it won't run out before the designated time, and it will still wake me up if the battery runs low early.

If it fails... I don't even care. Maybe I'll die, frozen like an icicle. My eyes suddenly felt a need to shut. I'm so sleepy... it's time to have no regrets...

An instant passes.

OH SHIT! I'M AWAKE, my thoughts scream in my mind, like a drunken man in a bar. I jerk up, bashing my face on the plexiglass. Didn't the gas knock me out? I was so calm a second ago, but now I'm a bucket of nerves. My hands are shaking, what the fuck just happened? The glass is fogged up already. My body is stiff; did I even go to sleep? Goddamn, Rebecca wasn't joking. That was insanely fast. I don't remember dreaming. Or maybe I'm still asleep?

I pinch my thigh, noticing my grip is almost nonexistent. I'm weaker than a wet piece of paper, but my sense of touch is present, even though most of my body is numb. Small victories, Jason.

Small victories.

Another hissing sound. Is that more sleeping gas? No wait, the hatch is opening. I can't see anything, the glass is still fogged up, and there's no room for my hands to move so I can wipe the fog away. Might as well just wait.

The hatch starts moving slowly. Very slowly. It must be crawling at a fraction of an inch per minute. Why is it so sluggish? By the time it's moved several inches, I'm about ready to kill myself out of boredom. The room is pitch black, aside from the blue light of my pod. I can only see past the cracks of the hatch as it lifts up, but there's no mistake, the room is shrouded in dense darkness.

A shiver goes down my spine as the glass slowly inches away from my face. I can't see more than a foot forward, not even to the floor. The light is very dim, and it seems to be getting fainter. Is the battery failing? Not good. It better have enough juice to at least release me.

Luckily it does. After the door stops moving raises fully, the light brightens dramatically. It must have dimmed since the light and door share the same power source.

The problem is what I see next. My skin crawls at the sight. There are no other pods here. The shiny metallic floor that I remember, the towering roof, all of it is gone. I'm not in the same location anymore. Hell, maybe I am and a hundred thousand years has done a number on the place.

No, that can't be the case, my mind warns me. I cautiously stagger forward, using the door frame to prop my body up. I reach my first bare foot out, and as it touches the floor, I feel a curious sensation. My foot is still very numb, but there's no mistaking it, the ground is warm. And it's smooth. The land is earthen, but it isn't a layer of dirt covering the floor of the Cryotek facility.

I take in the room around me. Everything including the walls, floor, ceiling, and four mysterious pillars in the middle of the room are made of dirt, and just as smooth as the floor. The walls are much closer than I remember. The entrance to the room is on the opposite side from what I remember as well. Perhaps my pod was moved. What are the pillars? They don't seem to reach the ceiling; they stand only ten feet tall or so.

Wait, are those markings? I stumble toward the pillars and fall on the floor. My knees groan in pain, but I crawl closer to the four columns since I can't stand properly without support, and the floor is so smooth that I can drag myself across it effortlessly anyway.

There are markings, repeated, endlessly, all over each pillar. They appear to be Japanese.

Perhaps Chinese, but I'm no linguist, and moonspeak all looks the same to me.

死が来ます

死が来ます

死が来ます

The markings cover every possible edge and nook and cranny, but I have no idea what they mean. They give me the creeps, so I decide not to dwell on their significance.

The door, right, I need to get out of this room. The cryo-preserved storage cases the scientists left me with aren't here, and I'm weak with hunger. God, what if I'm not even in the future? What if I've woken up ten days later and this is all some elaborate prank? The researchers could have set up all kinds of crazy experiments, and I wouldn't know. I should have read the small print!

The thought this is all a prank is comforting but unlikely, given what I know about CryoTek. I don't think this is a prank... an accident must have happened.

I finally reach the door. It's massive, standing nearly the full height of the wall. It appears to be a double door, with the center being what I must push on to open it. Curiously though, even though I'm now many feet from the pod and the light is dim, I again see more repeating characters covering the entirety of the door. These look different though.

決して離れません

決して離れません

What do they mean? No matter. I'll find the answers later.

I push with all my might, and hear a hissing sound as the door slowly opens. It's almost like when Indiana Jones opens the sarcophagus, and the oxygen is sucked in. Suddenly, I feel strength returning to my body, and realize I had been taking shallow breaths until just now. The room was nearly devoid of fresh air, so I'm lucky I didn't pass out and die.

With a new surge of energy, I heave the door open.

Part 002:

I don't know what I expected.

The door opens, and I see nothing. There's a room somewhere in the darkness, but my eyes are useless at piercing the veil of shadow. Maybe if I could cast magic missile, that would change. Why can't humanity of the year One Hundred Thousand pay the goddamn electric bill, or whatever? They probably use cosmic space energy or something.

A humming noise fills the room around me. My bones rattle under my skin, though the sensation is faint and indistinct. It's everywhere, yet nowhere. The humming is as if the air itself is quivering in fear.

Oh, damn, maybe being frozen for a hundred thousand years made me evolve ESP or something. That would be awesome, but unlikely. My hopes are dashed against the rocks. Let's be realistic about this, and consider what I know.

The floor is comfortably warm, like sitting a few feet away from a fire, while also covered in smooth dirt. Weird moonspeak is etched into the doors and those pillars. The air itself is trembling in fear. Everyone I've ever known and loved is probably dead.

I'm at least somewhat sure that I'm not in the original CryoTek lab where I started out, and I may have evolved a functional spider-sense.

Yeah, this isn't helping. The year 100,000 A.D. makes no sense at all.

I wander back over to the pod. What once required a small feat of endurance is now just a few light steps away. It's amazing how my life can change so quickly!

Examining the pod, I find a small hatch on its rear. When I pop it out, a little compartment appears, with some items inside.

There's a ten-foot nylon rope, a badly rusted handgun of some sort, a knife that's corroded and flaking apart, and what I assume is a flashlight. Also a few cans of... food? The cans aren't labeled, and while food preservation might be a fine art, I'm terrified of what the contents will reveal. Let's skip the chow for right now.

I pull the stuff out of the compartment and find a small knapsack made from nylon at the bottom, with straps for wearing it like a backpack.

Well, that's handy. At least I have some... tools. I don't think a rusted dull knife will be much use, the flashlight might not work, the gun is toast, and god only knows what Lucifer himself put in the cans of food, but at least I have supplies, meager though they be.

I stick everything into the knapsack and click the flashlight. Nothing happens. Great, that's just wonderful. I figured this was a waste of time! But wait, there's some kind of... crank? Oh, that's right, this looks like one of those flashlights from the as-seen-on-TV ads, where you can crank the bottom to power it. Surely it won't work, right?

It does. Hallelujah, I'm saved! I crank it with all my strength and get a dim light that shines forward ten or so feet. The illumination is weak at best, but at least I won't be falling into any bottomless chasms or spike pits now that I have a light source.

Walking towards the still-open door, I crank the flashlight and light up the next room.

A statue. In the middle of the floor, there's a goddamn terrifying statue there. My knees shake, and teeth chatter as I walk toward it. If I had to describe the thing, I'd call it a- well, a monster, I suppose. I don't see any other way to describe it.

Long beak, with hundreds of tiny teeth creeping out the sides. Three 'arms,' with the third protruding from its chest. Each arm has several razor-sharp talons. The creature's eyes are small and beady, and they appear to follow me as I move around the room, while the tall and imposing body (easily twice my height) dwarfs me with its intimidating presence. A spiny, curved tail sticks out behind it, with a mace-like club attached to the end. In the ancient times, didn't a few types of dinosaurs have clubs on the end of their tails? That's what this statue resembles.

My eyes pan over the freak abomination's body, and as I look down towards its feet, something catches my eye. The floor. The floor is covered in that goddamn writing again.

プロテクター

プロテクター

But that's not all. The walls are also covered in writing, but the symbols are different from the ones on the floor.

デストロイヤー

What do they mean? If I'd known reading Japanese would have been necessary at any point in my life, I'd have tried learning it from my father before he passed away. Curse my lack of foresight!

But more importantly, what's up with this freak? Why is it facing my door, like a warning or a threat to me when I exit it? I swear, if this is some elaborate ruse to screw with me, I'm going to murder whoever did it. I'd also rather it be a prank at this point because this unease is making my life expectancy drop by several years.

Part 003:

Carefully, I shimmy my way past the statue. On the opposite side of the room is yet another door, though this one blends into the wall seamlessly. Its surface is bare, without any writing like the first one I stepped through.

A thought occurs to me as I start to push it open. How am I breathing oxygen? Pulling away, I glance upward, above the statue. A small, square hole, barely big enough for a cat to fit through, catches my eye. I shine my flashlight up at it and sigh, realizing there's no point trying to climb up inside of it. Not only wouldn't I fit, but I'd also have to climb on top of the statue to reach, and no way is that happening, no sir.

Turning my attention back to the door, I start shoving it with all my might, but I'm surprised when the massive slab of stone easily flings open as if it were gliding on ice. I trip and fall forward, slamming on the ground and dropping my flashlight. In a panic, I grab my only source of light and shine it back at the statue, but the thing is in the same place as it was before. Damn my irrational paranoia.

Cautiously, I pull myself to my feet and aim the light into the new room. Well, it isn't actually a room, it's a hallway. The walls expand outward, widening dramatically to almost three times the width of the chamber I'm in now, and the ceiling is so high that the flashlight's beam can't reach it.

Slowing my breath to abnormal levels, I mutter to nobody in particular, "No need to be afraid. There's nothing here but your nerves, Jason," and slowly I tiptoe out into the corridor, glancing around nervously as I patter forward.

Darkness stretches out all around me. I can just barely see the walls on each side, and cranking the light doesn't give it much more juice. "H-hello?" My words are but a whisper, and the ether sucks them from my lips, absorbing them into the faint humming of the background noise that permeates this place.

No response greets me, as I walk further into the darkness. All at once, I feel a faint breeze on my back, and my body stiffens. Before I can spin around, a thunderous BOOM from behind nearly makes me piss myself in terror.

The door from the Cryopod room. It just closed.

Oh my god, oh my god...

It's no big deal! The door must have had a spring on it or something!

My mind screams irrationally at me at me as I slowly turn around and shine my flashlight at the source of the noise.

What I see next chills me to my very core.

The statue. It's gone.

Part 004:

For a moment, I lose the ability to control my body. My legs give out, and I fall to the floor as I stare at the spot where that goddamned statue was just standing. I don't feel like a human right now, as my eyes leap from one crevice of the room anywhere else. My mind invents a thousand possibilities for where the statue went, even thinking of crazy shit, like maybe it's just invisible to the human eye suddenly, haha!

No matter where I look, one thing is certain: the room that once held the statue is now empty.

It's hard to think rationally. My hands shake as I carefully pull myself off the ground. I take a few steps back, as one very obvious thought crosses my mind. What if that wasn't a statue after all?

Everything about this creepy, dark dungeon makes my skin crawl. If someone is trying to pull a practical joke on me, it isn't funny.

Jesus Christ! What if the statue monster is sitting behind the door, waiting for me to turn my back so it can pounce at me and devour my insides?! I'm actually thinking of opening the door for some dumb reason but that would be suicidal haha why would anyone do that?!

Quickly, and stealthily, I rush over to the door, push it shut as quietly as possible, then break into a dead run in the opposite direction, making sure to only run on my tiptoes. You bet your sweet ass I don't want that thing to hear me! Please tell me the freakazoid isn't hungry. Please!

Even as I run for minutes, putting distance between me and where I came from, my breath starts to come in ragged gasps and I have to slow to a stop, doubling over and wheezing as sweat pours off my brow. I was never a particularly athletic young man in school, and I sat around playing video games and Chess to pass the time before my appointment with Cryotek came up. I'm surprised I managed to run for as long as I just did.

To make matter worse, I have no food or water. If the abomination doesn't eat me, I'll die of hunger and dehydration. I need to catch a break!

As I plop down on the ground, finally deciding to catch my breath, my heart slams against my chest. I hear something, something from very far behind me in the direction I came from.

Footsteps. Distinct, loud, and very very slow.

Thud. 1, 2, 3... Thud... 1, 2, 3... thud.

Oh god. It's coming.

Part 005:

My eyes nearly pop out of my skull, and my knees rattle in terror as I stare into the darkness behind me. The monster is in the distance, and it's coming this way. I'm going to die. I can hear the bells tolling in the back of my mind.

This is no time to rest, you lazy sack of shit, get your ass up and MOVE, my conscience and inner ego scream at me. My body creaks but I somehow manage to leap to my feet thanks to a surge of adrenaline.

I don't have the strength to run, but if that thing is coming as slowly as it sounds like it is, a power-walk will hopefully keep me ahead of it.

Ahead of it? The realization that a monster is coming to eat me makes me quicken my pace. What is going on? What kind of purgatory am I in? Did I die? Am I in Hell? Yeah Lucifer, you're hilarious, you goddamn piece of garbage! Just throw everything you've got at me all at once!

I do my best to walk-jog and stay ahead of the plodding footsteps behind me, but I pause for a moment and listen intently. Something is off about their tempo.

Thud... 1, 2, Thud... 1, 2, Thud.

The monster is quickening its pace. It's speeding up, and I'm still thoroughly exhausted. At this rate, I'm going to die from my heart imploding before the damn thing can catch me. What if the statue monster is toying with me? Maybe it's like a bird teaching its babies to feed.

Hold on... babies? Haha, that's- NO! What about the hole in the ceiling? That can't be- nope, I must purge the thought.

Just as I turn around and start jogging, a new sight greets my eyes. The opposite wall. I've finally reached it.

A colossal double-door looms before me, stretching all the way up to the ceiling. I can't see the top of it with my flashlight, but one thing is for sure: it's much too big for me to open. I'm trapped.

Wait, no! On both sides of it, to the left and right, much smaller doors sit. Each one is about the same size as the stone slabs from before, and once again those goddamn markings are spread across each one.

On the left door:

And on the right:

If only I had learned Japanese! I never thought it was going to be useful in my life, so I squandered my studies.

The footsteps that once sounded distant are growing steadily closer. Not much longer and that fucking dinosaur reject is going to emerge from the darkness and tear me to ribbons. Which way do I go?!

My gut tells me 'left is right,' so without any reason whatsoever, I charge into it, shoving with all my might until it groans open. Quickly, I slam the door behind me and lean against it, breathing like my lungs are on fire. Before me is a narrow hallway that curves slightly to the side. Wherever this leads, I have to follow it.

I'm not going back out there.

As I rush down the hallway, one thought enters my mind. Life has a way of ruining my plans.

Part 006:

The adrenaline rush as my body trembles in terror eventually winds down, once I realize the footsteps are no longer audible behind me. Slowing to a tentative walk, I stare ahead into the corridor, always shining my flashlight forward, aside from when I check behind myself for jump-scares.

The first thing I begin to realize is that I'm very subtly descending downward. Indeed, conventional logic would imply that to escape this place, I must head upward, to the outside sky, but I don't have much of a choice in the matter. In fact, not only is the floor gently sloping down, but it's also curving to the left, though I wasn't sure at first as the change was somewhat gradual.

After I gather my bearings, I continue walking down the sloping corridor, wondering all the while if I will ever see anything besides these dark, earthen walls. I pause eventually, as I notice that the humming sound has grown more noticeable, but I still don't hear the monster following me.

My flashlight sputters slightly, and I sigh as I reach for the crank. Just as it goes out, I pause, noticing a faint light up ahead. Squinting, I take a few steps forward and confirm that yes, in fact, there is a light somewhere at the end of this damned corridor. This realization fills me with hope, as well as dread. One does not merely create light in a place like this without belonging to some ancient horror.

Despite the lack of light around me, I press on, creeping forward slowly. My flashlight would probably reveal my presence if there's something up ahead. I'd prefer not to expose myself to a different monster, even as I escape the first.

The light grows brighter as I carefully tiptoe down the hallway, and soon it's bright enough that I can easily see all around myself. My body is coated in fluid from the cryo-chamber, but it's begun to dry and harden into millions of sticky white flakes. I'll be lucky if I ever feel clean again.

The room where the light is pouring from is just through the doorway up ahead. I lean around the corner and peek with one eye, and what I see takes my breath away.

Three colossal statues, standing at least a hundred feet tall, tower over everything else in the room. I almost cry when I realize they aren't chiseled into the likenesses of monsters, but into figures of human men.

Each statue is against a different wall, and all three of them are unique, holding different poses.

The first is a man with a long beard. A crown rests atop his head, and while the crown may be the same drab grey as the person it rests upon, bumps and dots line it, indicating it was a crown with many jewels studded inside. The man wears many layers of robes, each piled atop the other, and a long staff with a jewel is in his grasp, held proudly, as if he were going to cast a spell with it. To describe him, I would say he was a wise leader, someone who was fair and just. No evil escaped his gaze, but no righteousness went unrewarded either.

The next statue is of a man holding a mighty sword, both hands grasping its handle, the sword pointed out from his body, as if at any moment he could leap into action and cut his foes down. His expression is grim. He has seen many battles in his lifetime, and I can tell from the way the statue was carved that he was a feared warrior among his people. Some kings order their men from the rear flanks, while others lead the charge.

The final person is different. His arms hang limply at his sides, and his head is bowed, eyes closed. Tears, or perhaps drops of blood, roll down his cheeks. This man gave everything he had and fought to the end, but it wasn't enough. A closer glance reveals a necklace hanging from one of his hands, barely wrapped around one of his fingers. He died before his time was right, and now his likeness is frozen forever in memory of his final thoughts, I wish I had done more.

The statues aren't the only thing in the room. Gold coins are piled in the center of the room, mounds and heaps as far as I can see. If I weren't in a dark, festering hell, I might be tempted to call it the wealth of El Dorado. Amidst the gold, I spot weapons, armor, and even jewels.

But despite the incredible sights to behold, all of it pales in comparison to the final object that catches my gaze. The incredibly brilliant source of light that illuminates the entire room.

An orb rests atop a small, nondescript alter. A light not unlike that of the sun shines forth from it, reflecting off the gold and creating a dazzling display to draw my eyes to it.

The light isn't a static thing, like a lightbulb, but alive, coursing with energy. The humming that I've been feeling, without a doubt, emanates from it.

Slowly, I step toward it, my eyes darting around, looking for enemies and threats. None appear. As I approach, I spot, of all things, a wooden sign erected before the orb. That moonspeak is written on it as well, but this time, there is only one set of characters, written a single time.

パワ—

What do they mean? Are they a warning? A threat? Perhaps even an invitation?

As I stare at the orb, a sudden chill rushes down my back. Behind me, just around the bend I came from, a scratching sound, like a foot scuffing pavement, makes my breath catch in my throat.

Something did follow me.

Is this where I die?

Part 007:

I am not trembling in terror; I am not shaking in terror; I am spasming in terror. My bones click together violently as I hear the thing creeping around the bend behind me. You're dead! It's going to eat you, my mind screams in alarm. Tears pour down my face, but I dare not wipe them away. I don't have time.

Suddenly my shaking stops. An idea forms in my mind. Instinct takes over. That orb. I need it. I must have it!

I go from a shaking mess about to be devoured, to an animal fleeing to the only possible refuge, the one thing in this room that I know must mean something. As I rush toward the glowing orb of spirituality, a sudden scrambling noise behind me makes my skin crawl as the thing races around the corner after me. The last thing I hear before I grab the orb is a terrifying, unearthly scream, like that of a woman being torn apart by an abomination.

Serenity. Peace.

My hand rests on the orb, and the panic in my body melts away. There's nothing to be afraid of now, someone unknown says to me. Perhaps it's my mind playing tricks.

Calmly, I look back over my shoulder. The statue monster isn't there, but something else is. A shadow. I don't mean the sort of shadow made when something blocks the light, but a creature comprised entirely of blackness. I can barely even see it thanks to the brilliance of the orb and how it illuminates every corner of the room all at once, but it's there.

For a moment, it seems that the Shadow isn't moving, but after a few seconds of staring, I realize it is. Time has slowed to a crawl. It's as if I'm in the Matrix, and touching the orb has transformed me into an awakened Neo. I cock my head and stare at the creature for a moment, realizing that I'm not panicking, and yet I should be. My mind warns me that the monster is dangerous, but my body hasn't a care in the world. A sensation of power flows through my body, making me feel as if I could crush a rock with my mind.

How strange. Perhaps it isn't that time has slowed down, but that I have sped up. I'm no longer exhausted, and in fact, I could run a triathlon this very instant. Why am I so full of energy? Before, my breath was ragged and my legs scarcely even worked, but now, my body is as ready for action as if I had napped for a year straight.

After gazing at the Shadow for a moment, my eye catches the glint of something behind it. This may sound strange, but an object is glowing in the distance, and it isn't in my room.

Instead, I will my eyes pierce through the walls, spotting a sword in an entirely different room. In another direction, a crown glows, as if it's a beacon designed to draw my attention.

I begin to notice even more glowing objects. A set of chest armor, a shin-guard, a paladin's shield, and many other such things, all of them drawing my eyes like a moth to a flame.

When I lower my eyes to look below me, my happiness fades. Something roils in the deep, frightening and disturbing, and the longer I gaze at it, the more my newfound calmness transforms into abject horror.

A glowing sea of red, rapidly flowing from east to west, but inside the water is-

No. I don't- I can't believe it. This is too much! I don't want to be here anymore! I want to go back to the past!!

The river is filled with humans, or rather, the souls of humans. Bubbling up from the deep, millions, perhaps billions of faces rise and fall, screaming in pain and agony. They rise out of the hellish river, their skin begins to grow back, but they fall back in, only for that cycle to continuously repeat, over and over again. Their eternal suffering won't end, for they are cursed to wallow in misery, until the end of time.

This can't be the future. I must have died and gone to Hell.

Part 008:

Something is bothering me. That might sound asinine, given the literal river of souls under my feet, but the river isn't what I'm referring to. I'm being watched. Somewhere, in this hell, another presence gazes at me, evaluates me, and registers me as a threat. I can't pinpoint where this feeling of mine comes from, but it permeates every cell of my body. My stomach tightens as I flick my gaze around, trying to find the source of my anxiety.

Turning back to the Shadow, I narrow my eyes. Instinctively, I raise my palm up and spread my fingers out in a 'stop' gesture. The Shadow, unable to halt its snail-worthy momentum, continues to leap at me, but a single word escapes my lips. "Light."

A ray of energy shoots out of my hand, enveloping the Shadow's entire side of the room in a luminous warmth, almost as bright as gazing at the sun during the heat of the midday. The shadow opens its mouth, but no sound comes out, as it melts away, devoured by the power of a single word.

Odd. Why did I do that? How and why did I know that I could shoot magical light rays out of my hand? Am I in some form of virtual reality? Of course not, that would be ludicrous! Besides, the floor beneath me still feels quite warm, and my sensation of touch can't be as easily fooled as my eyes and ears can.

But then, if I were in the future, especially a hundred thousand years or so, perhaps virtual reality has evolved? Who knows what a futuristic humanity could come up with. This might be well beyond anything a primitive like myself could even imagine.

Time returns to normal, and the orb dulls somewhat, no longer acting like a miniature sun in the palm of my hands. While it doesn't illuminate as much of the room, my eyes hurt much less, so it's an improvement compared to before.

In any case, I'm not going to figure out where I am or understand my predicament by randomly guessing. This orb has given me the ability to shoot holy rays of light, so it's a suitable weapon. I'm useless with a sword, and the armor laying around is way too big for me, so I doubt I'll need anything else. I'd better just get out of here.

Sloshing my way through the piles of gold, I almost trip a few times, but manage to keep myself together. I consider taking some of the gold with me, but I doubt it'll be any use. Hell, it'll probably just slow me down. I can probably come back later if I find a use for it.

After wading through the gold, I evaluate the three statues. To the right of each one, on all three walls opposite the door I entered from, there are passages leading to various other hallways. Unlike every other instance up to this point, the moonspeak that lead me here isn't anywhere to be seen. I can go right, left, or forward, and there are no indicators which way is the correct path to take. Hell, with my luck, they're all the wrong path.

I don't know where the passages lead, but one thing is for certain: I do not want to head down. It may be miles and miles below, but that river of souls is the last place I want to be.

When I was fleeing the statue monster, I used the left door, and it paid off for me. Since the left passage seems to head back up, in the opposite direction as the river of souls, I trudge past the piles of coin and step inside the hallway, and am pleasantly surprised to see rocks embedded in the walls, every ten feet or so, that glow. While they don't illuminate much, they don't need to, either. That's what my new orb is for, after all!

With a pep in my step, I force the thoughts of the statue monster to the back of my mind and head down the passage, praying to whatever gods may still exist to watch over me.

As the puny human leaves the room, the Three Great Kings turn their heads to look at one another.

The Knowledge-Seeker: Is that boy a candidate?

The One Who Weeps: Difficult to say. I saw no rejection. Anything is possible.

The Greatest Sinner: He is part of the great cycle. In the direst times of need, a champion will rise. The time is right.

The One Who Weeps: It doesn't matter. The boy cannot redeem our failures. All hope is lost.

The Greatest Sinner: As long as one draws breath, there is always hope. You have forgotten the ancient struggles.

The Knowledge Seeker: You speak the truth, Arthur. As long as the boy has the Power of the Kings, he can right the wrongs we've wrought.

The One Who Weeps: He will break, just as we did, just as all heroes do. Man cannot overcome his weakness.

The Knowledge Seeker: Ye of little faith. That is why you fail.

Part 009:

The orb illuminates the hallway around me, though it probably wouldn't be very necessary given that the glowing rocks embedded in the wall are doing a fine job of that.

The hallway is surprisingly short, maybe a walk of two city blocks, when I arrive at a small, unimposing door. Naturally, the weird writing is covering the door again.

ホームベース

ホームベース

It could mean anything. Maybe it's another warning? Perhaps it's telling me to turn back? I don't know, but I feel the need to enter.

The door glides open without making a sound. The next sight I see is jarring.

Wood. The next room is made of wood, almost like I'm in a well built home from my own era. There's a... fireplace? With no fire going. There's a dining room table, chairs, a small quaint kitchen area, and other normal looking doors that presumably lead to rooms such as a bedroom and a bathroom.

Strange. That word keeps repeating in my head. Everything I keep finding only makes more questions appear. Nothing has answered any questions yet.

Despite the newfound strength I gained from the orb, my mind is fatigued, and I am hungry, so hungry. So thirsty. Walking to the kitchen area, I spy a sink. A plain old regular everyday sink. There's no way it works, right? I turn the nozzle, and... something comes out. It's certainly a liquid, but that is not... water. That is not the color of water, it's all... green and stuff.

At this point if it's poison, I'll take it just to end myself. Death might just be better than the agony of living in this psychopathic labyrinth. I dab my finger under the flow and hesitantly bring it to my lips. Stretching out my tongue, I lightly lick my finger slightly to get a taste of the green substance.

I process the taste and stare numbly at the liquid flowing out. You must be joking. This tastes like fucking Gatorade. Is this a joke? Someone is having a good laugh at my expense right now, I guarantee it. This is definitely Gatorade.

It's probably poisoned but fuck it, I'm thirsty. I cup my hands under it and bring many handfuls repeatedly to my mouth. It tastes not too sweet and not too salty. I have confirmed this is definitely Gatorade and hopefully it's poisoned so I will be dying soon. It'd be great if it was a quick death.

After I shut off the faucet, I look to my right, and notice the wall has a faintly glowing... button? I probably shouldn't press that.

I press it. Nearby the button, the wall slides down to reveal a small illuminated hatch, roughly the size of a microwave. In it, cold air pours out. And inside it sits... you're kidding. The surprises never end.

I pull out the chilled food. This may be the year One Hundred Million, but at least we still have chicken.

Part 010:

The food was hearty and filling. It was also icy cold and hard at first, but apparently I can create fire out of my palm. Interesting, I'm a wizard now, apparently. If only my name was Harry.

After checking the other three doors in this room, I confirmed they all led to other perfectly normal rooms and the only way out of this labyrinthine hell would be to leave out the original door I came in from, so I first barricade it with the furniture in the dining room (Not necessarily to stop things from entering, but to make noise and give me warning while I sleep) and then I head back into the bedroom, which has a big beautiful bed there with elaborate quilted blankets and all sorts of strange designs on them, with creatures that resemble dragons and monsters from old fairy tales.

What I find curious though, is the decorations in all 4 rooms of this small house-like structure. The first room is decidedly "modern" based on the amenities it provides, reminding me of the things that existed in the year I left from, though the wooden walls remind me of a somewhat older building.

The bathroom however, resembles an old Japanese style toilet, where you squat over it to do your business.

The bedroom is Victorian in nature. Very old, with a big beautiful mirror made of oak and glass on the wall, and the big bed with its four tall wooden pillars that extend up towards the ceiling.

The last room though... it blows my mind. It's a small armory. It's packed to the brim with weapons, armor, all of it highly advanced, far beyond anything I've ever imagined. The problem? I can't figure out how to use any of it. Most of the things I see are clearly weapons, yet they have no triggers or anything that would imply they could fire projectiles. Maybe they read your brain to fire or something, but even stranger is that they're all very big and heavy, shaped in a way that is definitely not human-size.

And the armor is unwearable. It's not human sized, or shaped. As cool as all of this looks, it seems to be useless to me. Oh well, I can shoot fire and light out of my hands, what use do I have for weapons anyway?

I'm going to sleep now, tomorrow, I shall begin my exploration of the labyrinth in full.

Part 011:

I wake up quickly. I slept all "night" (If such a thing exists in this place) with the orb buried under several layers of mattress so that the light wouldn't keep me awake. Waking up, I notice the room is very dark, though the light is still so bright that it slightly gives the room a dull glow.

Pulling the orb out from under the covers slowly, I wince as the brightness flows into my eyes. But given a few minutes, my eyes adjust and I stare at it. The orb is definitely not a normal thing. Nothing here is, but this orb seems very special. It gives me abilities that are beyond human. It lets me see things I shouldn't be able to see. As long as it's in my possession I can do things no human should be able to do.

Looking at it more closely, I note that there seems to be little... things moving around inside the orb. Almost like little worms made of light, rapidly zipping around, back and forth.

As I stare at the orb, I get a feeling in my body, a strange buzzing feeling, like a gnat right beside my ear. I swat at it, but the feeling stays.

"...you?"

A voice seems to whisper in my ear.

"...are you?"

It's becoming more distinct.

"Who are you?" It suddenly clears up and speaks to me, right in my mind. It's telepathically communicating to me, but it almost feels like someone is whispering loudly in my ear.

"Me? I'm just... a time traveler, I guess." I figure maybe it's the orb speaking to me. Can't be that farfetched now, can it?

The orb however, grows silent, perhaps satisfied with my answer. It no longer speaks to me. Okay, well, I guess it just wanted to know who had the audacity to touch it, maybe?

Getting off the bed, I go back into the kitchen hub room and walk to the refrigerator-type utility in the wall. I had eaten all the chicken that was there and it probably has nothing left. Pressing the button, I'm stunned to see that there is more food in there, this time, an amazing looking delicious cake. It's chocolate, with black frosting covering the entire thing, and cherries on top, and in the center is a single candle.

As I reach for it, and pull it out, I'm dumbfounded to see that the moment I touch it and pull it out of the fridge, it becomes another chicken.

"The cake is a lie..." I whisper.

Eating the chicken after carefully cooking it, I head out the door, with my trusty orb in hand, and walk out to the main hallway and the room of El-Dorado's treasure hoard, as I have now coined it.

Walking around the room, I decide to head down another door that is directly across from the safe room I just left. Inside it, I notice many things immediately.

-We're back to a total lack of illumination, the hallway is completely dark.

-The floor is no longer smooth dirt, it's roughed up, and beaten up, with potholes here and there, clumps of dirt tossed here and there, the whole thing looks completely messy compared to the floors I've walked on since arriving here.

-The ceiling is still made of smooth dirt, as are the walls.

And as I walk down the hallway, I notice many doors on the right and then the left, and then the right again. 9 doors in total. They alternate, one on the right, one on the left, one on the right, and so on.

When I get to the end of the hallway, I spot another door, this one of a size comparable to most doors I've entered before. I decide not to go through it yet though, I want to see what's going on among these smaller side doors first.

Walking back to the entrance of this hallway, I hesitantly push on the first door.

It doesn't budge.

Odd, every door I've tried to enter so far has been little or no resistance. This door is firmly stuck on something. I pause to weigh the options. What if it's stuck on something I don't want to know about? What if there's a monster behind the door?

These don't really matter. If this place wanted me dead, it had many opportunities already. I shove the door, putting all my strength into it.

"Orb, if you have any power, now would be a great time to use it!"

My muscles suddenly surge as I put my all into it, and the door, pushing past whatever was obstructing it, suddenly flies open and I stumble into a small room and fall on the floor.

The floor is smooth.

Oh no.

There are four pillars.

Oh god.

There's writing on the pillars.

死が来ます

死が来ます

死が来ます

And at the back side of the room. There's a broken down cryopod, torn to pieces.

The walls are covered in blood.

Part 012:

The smell is sickening. How long has this room been here? I stifle my gag reflex and use all my willpower to force chunks of chicken back down my throat. I don't ever want to eat meat again after seeing this sight.

The smell of death is thick here, though definitely not fresh. The blood on the walls is hardened and crusty, and brown, like it has been here for an eon or two.

There is a corpse in the room, scattered here and there. Whoever it was, presumably the previous cryopod's occupant, they're unrecognizable, desiccated to a point where a DNA scientist would be hard pressed to identify the remains, and torn to pieces. I quickly bow my head and say a quick prayer before bowing out of the room and pulling the door shut behind me.

I'm much more hesitant to check the next room, but I still do it anyway. After the previous room, this one doesn't shock me. It's the same scene, blood everywhere, a corpse torn to pieces, a cryopod destroyed completely and scattered all over the room, pieces of skin and bone stuck to bit of metal and glass here and there. Since I'm not wearing any shoes, I decide not to walk too far in the room.

Rooms 3, 4, and 5 are all the same with varying degrees of family unfriendly content. Room 6 however, is different.

The cryopod in this room is still intact, though opened. There's a journal on the floor, placed directly in the center of the room, laying in such a way that anyone walking in the room would see it immediately, and it's facing them so they'd know to pick it up.

Curious, I walk over to it and pick it up. There's only writing on the first page, so I begin to read it.

Date: Unknown. Location: Unknown. Mental state: Hopeless.

I've been here for a week. I haven't eaten anything. Why are all the other nearby rooms filled with death and violence?! What happened to Anya and Faraday? I met them before entering the cryopod, and I wouldn't forget them since it felt like only an instant before I woke up in this hell. I'm all alone, everyone else is dead.

_No matter what I do, I can hear the drums. The drums keep beating. They come from below. Sometimes I hear screaming. Sometimes I scream. The worst noise is the scratching. I hear the thing walking up and down the corridor, I dare not leave this room or it will get me.

What the hell is going on? I don't want to be here anymore. I miss my husband. Why did I abandon him on a whim? Is this my punishment? Perhaps this is the judgement of God himself. Perhaps that... that monster is what I deserve to have end me.

I pause after reading this. Is that the statue monster I first saw? The rest of the page is just rambling with nothing notable.

The next pages all simply say one thing.

It watches.

Over and over again, those two words, on the center of each page, for hundreds of pages, then the journal ends.

I set it down on the floor and say another prayer. I don't know what happened to that woman, but I certainly hope she found peace.

But those words. "It watches." I've felt something watching me since I got here. The eyes follow me everywhere I go. There is no refuge. I leave the 6th room, closing it gently behind me.

The next three rooms hold no surprises. All their occupants are torn to shreds and their cryopods eviscerated. Prayers for all of them, of course.

Walking down the hall, I reach the final door, the one at the end wall. This door is directly opposite from where I first entered the hallway, and it seems to be significant. There's writing on this door as well.

救世主

救世主

I didn't notice it the first time I came through here. Could that be significant? Had it simply appeared since the last time I came through here?

Ignoring this, I take a deep breath and press my hand against the door. Unlike the others, it slides open easily. As the door opens. Something takes hold of me.

Confusion. Terror. Panic. These fill my mind. The room has four pillars and a completely intact cryopod in it. But there were only ten cryopods to start with. And curiously, the cryopod is to my right, with another door to the left.

I walk up to the cryopod and notice that there's a small hatch opened on the back of it. The hatch is empty. My hands start shaking. This isn't... no, it can't be...

I walk to the door in this room. There are markings on the door. I've seen these markings before.

決して離れません

決して離れません

決して離れません

This room. This is my original Cryopod room. But the door that I just entered through was not here before.

I have two choices now.

Somehow, I have looped back around to my original starting location. There is probably a statue monster in this area. But the door that got me here did not exist before.

This place defies the laws of known physics. Somehow, and this sounds absurd, the structure of this place must have changed. The door that got me in this room was not here originally, I'm somewhat sure of that. And the writing on the door was also not there when I first saw it.

This place changes. That has to be the answer. It doesn't make any sense, but neither does shooting light and fire out of my hands. And if it's changing, then I have three logical options.

I don't like options 2 and 3. There's probably a fucking statue monster waiting to eat me, and I'm not sure the extent of my abilities would save me as I currently am. So I decide to try out the first option.

Walking back down the corridor towards the El-Dorado room, I step into it and find...

It has changed. This is not the El-Dorado room. This is something else.

A great fountain is in the middle of this room. I step into the room and walk towards the fountain. My breath catches as I see that the fountain is not bubbling up water in great torrents, but liquid gold. Flowing liquid gold spouts up through the top of the fountain, and is recycled up and through the bottom of it to come out the top again.

The fountain itself though, that is what is truly interesting. It's a fountain of a lovely lady, clothed in only her skin. Her right palm is stretched upwards, like she's trying to rest it on the ceiling, 50 feet above her. The water bubbles up and out of her hand, trickling down her body and coming to rest in a pool surrounding her feet.

And in her left hand, there is a glowing black orb clasped firmly. It looks to be exactly the opposite color of my orb. My orb projects a strong light, but hers projects a strong darkness, the two energies of our orbs fighting amongst each other for dominance of the room.

The floor, interestingly, is covered in grass. Actual grass, with flowers here and there. Everywhere her darkness touches, the grass and flowers are dead, and if I move closer, the light from my orb heals them and bring the grass and flowers to life.

Above her sits a golden chandelier with hundreds of unlit candles. A mighty golden door, 20 feet tall, sits on the opposite side of the room from me.

I'm so tired of doors. I'd give anything to never see another door again.

"Do you desire it?"

A voice speaks to me, in the back of my mind. Who was that?

"Do I desire... what?"

The voice... smiles. It somehow grins evilly inside my mind. "Do you desire the power to rule life and death?"

"No." I say flatly. "I desire pizza."

Part 014:

The voice falters. "Are... you denying me?"

"Yeah." I say plainly. "You can piss off. I want to go back home, go to sleep, eat pizza, and never think about this place ever again."

The voice fills with contempt. "You are a fool. All have accepted my offer and ended up in positions of power and fame. Why would you think you are too good for me?"

"It's not that I'm too good for you." I say this to the void, still having no idea where this voice is coming from. I suspect it's the pitch black orb clasped in the statue's hand, but I can't honestly tell. "It's that I don't trust any weird monster voice speaking in my head."

"Yet you seem to trust Hoarhiim, my counterpart." The voice somehow mentally licks its lips. How am I receiving such weird mental images. "You are not just a fool, you are a hypocritical fool. You desire power but fail to admit this to yourself. You're blinded by naivety."

I frown, physically and mentally. "Are you that orb over there? The black one? Are you talking about my bright orb over here? I still have no idea what is going on."

"INSOLENCE!" The voice booms in my mind. "How DARE you call me a black orb, I am Blaarjiim, the mighty Lord of Darkness! Have respect for your elders or I will strike you down where you stand!"

"That won't be possible." Another voice appears in my mind. It's a soft one, this time decidedly the same as the voice I felt earlier in the bedroom. It must be coming from Hoarhiim, the orb of light in my hand. "As long as this one is under my protection, you have no power over this one unless you can get them to purposefully accept your power."

"Hoarhiim... you meddling little..." Blaarjiim trails off.

"Why do you want to give me power anyway?" I ask Blaarjiim. "Seems like a raw deal for you. Are you just lonely?"

"L-LONELY?! Again with the insolence and disrespect! Hoarhiim, now I see why you picked this one, you would do anything to take a shot at me!" Blaarjiim's voice is quivering with rage.

I pause to consider the weird scene I am in. Two sentient orbs of spiritual energy unheard of except in stories and movies are having a heated argument over me, a lowly insolent human. One of them apparently likes me enough to turn me into a wizard, the other one wants to kill me but can't, because I'm a wizard or something.

"Listen, if you promise not to misbehave, I can take you along with me and Hoarhiim and we can have a little adventure together." I say this pointedly at the black orb and the mental face in my mind actually seems to consider this, then it grins evilly again.

"So... you do admit to desiring my power. A wise choice, one you will soon come to love." Blaarjiim grinned, pleased with himself. He'd truly outwitted the lowly mortal once again, as he always had done. Every poor fool fell for the trick. Luckily, Hoarhiim never interfered or warned the idiot saps, since he was a non-interventionist.

"I think you're getting the wrong idea." I said flatly. "I'm not going to take any of your power or anything, I just figured you might want to come along with us and check out the place. Get a load of the sights or something. You know, get out and stretch a bit."

There was a very long pause. Uncomfortably long.

"Surely... you jest. You just want me to come along without taking even a fraction of my infinite power?"

"Yeah."

"No ulterior motives? No plots to have Hoarhiim strip me of my spiritual energy? No dropping me in the pits of Sheol?"

"Uh, no." I frowned. Pits of Sheol? Was that the actual place of torture and agony I could see roiling around directly below me? They called it fucking Sheol?

"I... I've never had someone deny my power before. You are a... curious one. VERY WELL, mortal! I will accept your offer!" I nodded and walked over towards the black orb, pausing for a second before I reached for Blaarjiim. "Hey Hoarhiim, he's not gonna try anything if I touch him, right?"

Hoarhiim shook his head in my mind. "No, if you refuse his power, he has no ability to harm you, especially if I am here."

"Fantastic." I say, and I quickly pluck Blaarjiim out of the statue's hand with my other free hand.

Suddenly I felt an incredible shaking as an earthquake started happening. Blaarjiim beamed an image of a deep broad grin into my mind. "I may not hurt you, but that doesn't mean they can't."

Part 015:

From behind me, only somewhat distant, came a sound. A sound of thousands of screams, cries, and moans. A sound like a million warhorses charging down the corridor.

"Uh, uh, Hoarhiim? W-what the hell is that?"

"Oh, hm. That would be the riders, I suppose."

"Come again? The Riders?"

"Yes, Child of Gaia. The Riders of Sheol."

From far down the passage I had entered this room from, I heard their horses whinnying now, along with screams of anger and agony. I couldn't see them yet, but in moments I certainly would.

"ALRIGHT FUCK IT, OFF WE GO!" I screamed, whipping open my knapsack on my back, tossing Blaarjiim in (Much to his rage) and then darting past the fountain towards the great golden door.

That door was one heavy son of a bitch. It weighed a metric fuckton, no joke. I probably couldn't have moved it an inch if it weren't for the power that Hoarhiim gave me deep inside the core of my body. With a powerful heave, I shoved the door slightly open, barely enough to squeeze through. As I slipped through, a quick glance behind me made my blood run cold and my pace quicken. Down the corridor behind me, the screaming was getting much louder as the first Hell Horse and its Rider came into view. A skeleton atop a dark horse, the skeleton wearing black armor and wielding a long scimitar in its right hand, came charging out with multiple other horses directly behind it and I even caught a glimpse of a massive army of undead skeletons without horses wielding a large variety of weapons. Needless to say, I only got a glimpse and that glimpse made me quickly slip through the door and heave it shut with all my adrenaline at once.

My body was shaking in terror once again. "What do I do what do I do what do I do???"

"Calm down, Child of Gaia." Hoarhiim said soothingly in my mind. "That door is impossible for nearly any being but a gate troll or one blessed by me to open. Even if a hundred skeletons put their bodies against it, it would not budge."

"Oh god, please tell me you're not joking." I begged him. Hoarhiim nodded in my mind.

Thank god. I slumped to the ground at the base of the great door. I could hear banging, they were pounding incessantly on the door and it was making my nerves even more jittery, but I managed to keep it together without going totally mental.

"Where am I? Hoarhiim, Blaarjiim, can you tell me what the hell is going on now?!"

An annoyed face appeared in my mind. Blaarjiim sneered at me. "Puny child, you're here in the domain of the Great Kings and you know nothing of whence you came? I will not answer the questions of a buffoon who... who... stuffs me in a knapsack like a piece of refuse!"

I grimaced. "Sorry, I was in a rush." I pulled Blaarjiim out of my knapsack and held him in my left hand. "Alright, a simpler question then. What are you two? Are you like, brothers, or something?"

Hoarhiim mentally gave me a look of sickness. "Brothers? The thought repulses me."

Blaarjiim nodded sagely. "For once we agree on something, old rival."

I blinked twice. "Rival? Are you guys enemies?"

"No!" both of them responded in unison, making me wince. "We both have the same goal, which is total dominion of the world. We wish to overtake The Great One at the very top and become ruler of this world." Hoarhiim explained this matter of factly, as if taking over the world was such a perfectly natural thing to desire.

"Quiet, idiot! Do not mention The Great One openly ever again! Would you have us sentenced to death?" Blaarjiim chided Hoarhiim, who somehow blushed mentally. Thought-speak was truly interesting.

"My apologies. I spoke too rashly. However, if the Child of Gaia does not know of the existence of... that one, then surely this would be disadvantageous for us, who travel along with them?"

I cut off the inevitable response. "Hold on, Hoarhiim. You keep calling me 'the Child of Gaia'. What does that even mean?"

Blaarjiim raised his eyebrow. "You do not know of the existence of Gaia?"

"Well, I mean yeah, that's another word for 'Earth', right?" I asked this quizzically, but there was a long uncomfortable silence, as Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim both stared at me and then quickly look at each other, quietly communicating with each other in a way I could not listen to.

After several uncomfortable minutes, Blaarjiim mentally turned to me. "This farce has gone on long enough. Who are you, and how do you know of the word 'Earth'?"

I stared at Hoarhiim's orb blankly. "What do you mean? Isn't this Earth?"

Hoarhiim started to say something but Blaarjiim cut him off. "We're not allowed to tell you that. Tell us how you know of that word!"

I stared blankly at Blaarjiim. "What are you talking about? I'm from Earth, and isn't this place Earth? I traveled through time to get here."

Hoarhiim rolled his eyes. "Oh yes, now I remember you saying that before when we had first spoken."

Blaarjiim looked aghast. "Time travel? What a bunch of malarkey! You don't expect us to believe that do you?!"

I felt numb. "It's... true. Why are you guys acting so weird? Can't you tell me what's going on?"

"NO! Absolutely not! You naive child, if you think you can lie to us, think again! We'll get to the bottom of this eventually." Blaarjiim sneered once again. He was so adorable when he was angry.

"Right." I rolled my eyes. "Anyway,- oh, this room!"

I suddenly realized that I had gotten into the room barred by the gold doors, but I hadn't looked around me at all.

To my surprise, the room was almost totally empty. It was only 30 feet wide in any square direction, with three doors, one going forward and two going left and right. There was a Red door to the left, a Blue door straight ahead, and a Yellow door to my right. The room was illuminated by four candles sitting on pedestals, in a square formation, with another simple pedestal in the center of them. And on the pedestal there sat a golden crown, with ten spiked pieces pointing up and a massive ruby set in the center.

According to the special vision I had gained from Hoarhiim, this was one of the pieces of armor I had spotted earlier.

"Hoarhiim, I've been meaning to ask you something since I learned you can speak."

Hoarhiim, also examining the room, turned back to me. "Oh? What might that be?"

"Well, it's regarding our relationship. Originally you said that as long as I didn't specifically request it, Blaarjiim could not harm me, but I also could not use his power either, right?"

"That is correct." Hoarjiim nodded lightly while a bored expression crossed over his face and his eyes wandered around.

"Okay, so with that said, why am I able to use your power? I never asked for this."

"Incorrect." Hoarhiim immediately turned and mentally looked me in the eye. "When you were chased by the shadow, you grabbed ahold of me with fierce determination. You did not have to ask for my power out loud, your heart asked for it loudly. However, if you had yelled 'I do not wish to have your power', I would not have given it to you."

I bobbed my head. "So does that mean I can give up your power if I want?"

"No. Once you partake of the power of either one of us, or both, you are bound to us until one of us dies. If you leave me behind anywhere, and I am somehow slain, you will die as well."

I see. So when I grabbed him, because I didn't immediately declare that I had no desire to have his power, he became bound to me. Then that must mean that if I had grabbed ahold of Blaarjiim without saying I didn't want his power, he'd be bound to me as well. Blaarjiim is a troublemaker too, so I had no desire to have him bound to my soul. Plus, I'm not sure of their relationship, but I feel like having the power of both beings inside me would rip me apart, literally and spiritually.

"Hoarhiim." I said, as I approached the pedestal holding the crown. "When I had you in my hand, I gained the ability to shoot light and fire from my hands. Do I have more abilities?"

"You may, or you may not. It all depends on your own power. Blaarjiim and I are only a manifestation of spiritual power that a being may themselves possess. We do not grant power, only amplify latent power. I have given many power, as has Blaarjiim, and every one of them was different."

"I see." I said, as I used a few fingers of the hand holding Blaarjiim to grasp ahold of the golden crown and raise it to the top of my head. "What about the fact that I can see mysterious pieces of armor all over the place, including this one?"

Hoarhiim was silent.

"You can see their locations? Through the walls?" Blaarjiim sounded skeptical.

"Yes. There's a sword, a set of armor, a mighty shield, leg guards, and other such things."

Blaarjiim looked incredulous. "That's not possible. Those are... the lost treasures of the ancient kings. The one in your hand now is worth a million fortunes. To be able to simply see them, you'd have to be... you'd have to... be..." He trailed off again and lowered his eyes.

Hoarhiim nodded quietly. "Maybe you are the one they spoke of."

Part 017: The Crown

I felt fire in my veins.

The instant the crown touched my head, everything became chaotic. All my senses exploded. I was able to smell a hundred times more clearly than a bloodhound. My eyes surged with power, the darkness could hide nothing from my vision. My perception of movement increased tenfold. My body strength was the same as before, but I had never realized just how much latent power Hoarhiim had unlocked inside me. With the Crown on my head, I was suddenly able to comprehend so many more things. Infinite wisdom, too much wisdom for a single mind flooded inside me.

But something strange happened. This power could certainly be called strange, but the instant my mind was able to somewhat adjust to this incredible new flow of information, two words played in my head.

"Solomon's Crown."

Solomon? That's not possible. The one spoken of in the bible? I had never been a big bible reader, but most people knew the story of King Solomon. Said to be favored by God as one of his most trusted servants, he was granted peerless wisdom, allowing him to rule over a vast kingdom with the knowledge befitting a powerful King of Old.

This crown, if this was truly his crown, might it have his knowledge locked inside it? Might I have uncovered an item of horrifying power?

Nevertheless, this new mental prowess astounded me. I could hear things I had not heard before. The lake of acid and fire below me was perceived even more vividly now, I could make out individual faces of people, rising out of the acid, their skin growing back, and then the people falling back into it, melting and burning in agony, a neverending torment.

On top of that, a new mental ability seemingly unlocked itself. "Mental Map", the ability to visualize the world around me as a 3D map, hovering transparently in front of my vision, solidifying only if I wished it.

I could see the maze in its entirety now. I was dead in the center of it. Around me, the maze twisted and bent, walls moving around, hallways shifting to move towards other hallways. Without this crown, I could now see there was no hope of ever escaping this hell. But with it, could anything be possible?

"Solomon's Crown." I said aloud, to nobody in general. Looking to Hoarhiim and then back to Blaarjiim in each of my hands, I stood there stunned. "This cannot truly be the Crown possessed by a king of old, can it?"

"What do you think the answer is?" Asked Hoarhiim. "I may have before seemed a timeless wise ancient deity, but with that crown on your head, you now exceed even my intellect."

It was true. I remember struggling, back in college, to pass a math class. I failed it twice and was going to try one last time, but the teacher had told me: Stop wasting your money, you are not suited for this.

But now, that math was children's play. Concepts alien to my mind before began to take shape. Creating dark matter? Simple. Expanding or contracting a black hole? Child's play. King Solomon was limited by the technology of his era, but I was not. My universe had gone far beyond what he could do. Perhaps, had he lived long enough and not fallen to the charms of women, he could have advanced humanity to a new plane of existence with this knowledge.

"Does God exist?" I asked.

"Of course." Replied Hoarhiim. "There's no point hiding it now, you'll soon know it yourself anyway. Soon you'll know everything."

I thought deeply for a while, sitting down on the ground in a meditative position. Suddenly, a thought so humorous came to my mind that I laughed aloud. "Haha, Hoarhiim! You little devil! You knew I could have beaten those monsters with your power, didn't you?"

"The small swarm outside the golden door? Of course. They are of the dark, I am a powerful entity of the light, they would have fallen before me." Hoarhiim sniffled. "I'm sad it took the wisdom of a god to make you realize that."

Now it made sense. He didn't seem worried about them at all. He seemed bored by their appearance. Heck, even I feel bored by them now.

Looking around, I glanced at the other three doors in the room. According to my mental map, they all led to dead ends or deadly traps. Given time, one of them would likely open up to a normal pathway, but I was feeling antsy.

"You know what? Let's take the fun way out."

Part 018:

I walked calmly up to the golden door. The sounds of banging and scratching, neighing and blood-curdling screaming could all be heard. If I didn't know better, I'd say they were planning a party for my arrival.

I smirked at the thought of what was to come next. But then I faltered. Looking at the big door, I realized it only opened inwards, and it had no handles.

I sat down to think about how to approach this.

Some time passed as I thought about how to proceed. I could just wait for the next rooms to line up. Pulling up my Mental Map, I examined it closely. The maze was as wide as it was tall. It went up above me for several hundred miles, and below me for another few hundred. There were several exits to the outer world, whatever it may look like, but getting there would take forever.

The locations of the King Class items were scattered all over, a few somewhat nearby, some very far away, but none of them were going to be gained today.

Setting both orbs on the ground in front of me, I turned to Hoarhiim. "Hey, this is a strange question, but do I need to be touching you to use your power?"

Hoarhiim shrugged in my mind. "I dunno, what do you think the answer is?"

I shrugged too. Raising my hand towards the door, I spoke. " Light. "

Well, I may have Solomon's crown, but I'm not used to his wisdom yet apparently. The light reflected off the golden door and blasted back into my eyes. "OW! FUCK! SON OF A BITCH!" I howled in pain as my super-sensitive eyesight made me recoil in agony.

After rolling around on the ground for a few minutes in pain, I pulled myself up, blinking profusely.

"Alright Hoarhiim, I'm beginning to see why you like this one." said Blaarjiim with a chuckle. "Certainly provides much amusement."

"Shut up, asshole." I said, snarling at the black orb. "It was an honest mistake."

"Yeah, but it didn't take a super genius to see that coming from a mile away." Smirked Hoarhiim. "I guess it's true what they say, you have to learn from your mistakes."

After some time passed I stood up, wrapping Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim inside of fabric torn from my knapsack. Depositing its original contents on the ground, I look them over. I still don't know or want to know what's inside those cans, the flashlight is no longer needed, and none of the other stuff is really all that useful to me. Using the rusty knife to slowly hack away at the knapsack's nylon cords, I end up wrapping that rope I had saved from the Cryopod around my waist and letting Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim dangle on either side of me inside their new hanging pouch.

"Alright guys, sorry for closing you off like this, but you can see through my eyes anyway, right Hoarhiim?"

Hoarhiim nodded.

"Hey! What about me! I'm not bound to you! I can't see anything inside this prison you've put me in! I need air!" Blaarjiim started ranting about his poor living conditions. I sighed.

"Alright, I'll cut a little slit so you can see, just be careful and let me know if you fall. I would hate to, uh, 'accidentally' leave you behind."

Blaarjiim murmured and grumbled but finally accepted that a slit was the best he'd get.

Despite being in a pouch, Hoarhiim's light was still very bright as the thin nylon did little to block his radiance. He was like having a very bright sun attached to my 'belt' loop.

"Alright guys, I have a plan. And it starts with killing a whole lot of undead nightmares." I grinned. This was gonna be good.

Part 019: Revenge

I had this silly idea in my mind, and well, it probably won't work, but it can't hurt to try.

Standing about 15 feet away from the door, I raise my palm up and aim it at the door. A word begins to form in my mind.

"Push."

A wave of energy spreads out of my body and surges towards the door, hitting it, causing it to groan a tiny bit, and then it all stops.

"Damn. It didn't work." I grimace. "Maybe I need more power."

Rooting myself firmly in my spot with a solid stance, I speak the word again this time, but with more force.

" Push. "

A much stronger wave blasts out of my body, hitting the door, causing it to noticeably rattle. The incessant pounding, wailing, and screaming that I had heard up to now from the other side of the door suddenly stops. The air becomes perfectly still.

"This time, it will work." I say aloud, as Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim look on in interest.

Rooting myself firmly in place, I gather a colossal amount of air in my lungs, and belt the word out again.

"PUUUUUUSH!"

An absolutely stupendous amount of energy blasts out of my body. I was standing far too close to the door. The blast sends me flying backwards, smashing into the 5 pillars behind me, crushing them into dust when they hit the ground thanks to the power of my impact.

As bad as I was, the door was far worse. It blasted outwards, smashing away all the monsters directly in its path and crushing many more as it flew off its hinges and careened across the room. It crushed several Skeleton Commanders (I knew their names thanks to the Crown) and sent the rest of the enemy who weren't instantly killed running away, shrieking in terror.

It's a good thing too. I was beaten up pretty badly. "Holy... fucking shit...." I said, unceremoniously. "Oh god, everything hurts."

Blaarjiim burst out laughing. "GWAHAHAHA! THAT WAS THE FUNNIEST THING I'VE EVER SEEN!" I could just imagine him slapping his knees repeatedly as he rocked back and forth in a rocking chair. "You went flying like a little birdie straight into those pillars! That was easily the best thing you've done yet!"

Hoarhiim was laughing too, though to a lesser extent, more of a quiet giggle. "You sure showed those monsters who's boss. But be glad none of them saw you or you'd be-"

Suddenly Hoarhiim stopped laughing and his face stiffened. "Wait. They aren't all gone yet. One approaches."

I jerked my head up to look at the doorway. In the doorway was a little girl, just a small child.

"Hello there. What's your name?"

Part 020: Amelia

"I'm Amelia!" said the little girl cheerfully. She came running over to me crumpled among the pillars. My mind was racing and I was panicking. My body was almost destroyed and I had no way to fight back. What is a little girl doing running around this hellish maze? She's definitely some kind of soul sucking Chucky Doll.

"G-get back!" I yell as one of my arms flails for a second and then drops down. I have literally no ability to move right now. I'm totally helpless.

"Blaarjiim, is that you?" asked the little girl quizzically as she totally ignores my presence, staring at the orb inside the pouch affixed to my rope belt. How can you even see in there? Did this mean person kidnap you and do bad things to you?" She stuck her tongue out at me. "Bleehhh! What a meanie head!"

A... meanie head? What is up with this girl? How does she know Blaarjiim?

"Ah Amelia, so good to see you in your real body again. How have you been?" Blaarjiim greeted the child cheerfully. I guess he knows her.

"Amelia! Splendid! It's been a long time!" Hoarhiim also chimed in. I guess they both know her, huh?

"Uh, you guys know her?" I asked weakly.

"Duh! We're like the bestest friends ever!" said Amelia, as she hunched over me and reached for Blaarjiim. But then she paused. "Hold on a second, Hoarhiim, you're linked to this person, but Blaarjiim, you aren't?"

Blaarjiim nodded angrily. "Yes! That's right! I was denied! The Child of Gaia refused to accept my power and bound me inside this prison, only allowing me to see but a small part of the world!" Blaarjiim let out clearly fake sobbing noises. Nobody could possibly fall for this lame act.

"Oh gosh, Blaarjiim, that's terrible! I must rescue you at once!"

She fell for it.

Quickly undoing his strands, Amelia grabbed hold of Blaarjiim and cupped him tightly to her chest. "Oh Blaarjiim, we're not going to be separated ever again! I accept your power!"

A huge surge of energy swept from Blaarjiim into Amelia as she giggled and danced around with the orb in her hands. It was kind of cute in a weird way.

Then she stopped dancing and her smile evaporated. Her face and body went totally cold as she looked at me. "So, what person dares hurt my eternal lover?"

Part 21 Oh god, please don't suck my soul, crazy little demon girl. That kept replaying in my head as the suddenly very evil looking little girl slowly walked towards me, a look of a serial killer on her face with a glint of bloodlust mixed in.

"N-now now! I think there has maybe been a small mix-up?" My legs shifted as I tried to pull myself up to get away from her but my body was still in bad condition.

"Amelia, calm down." Said Blaarjiim. "I was just joking, my dear. The Child of Gaia is not our enemy."

Instantly, the look of Satan left her face and a cheerful smile spread across it. "Okay! If you say so Blaarjiim! Teehee!" She smiled happily and danced over towards me, coming to a sitting position right in front of my splayed out body. "By the way, you look like you're in a lot of pain. Does that, uh, hurt?"

"Yes." I groaned, eager to change the subject. "I can't move anything. I think I broke every bone in my body. I'm probably going to die here."

There was yet another uncomfortable silence as both orbs and the little girl narrowed their eyes and stared at me. I didn't like the feeling. "W-what? Did I say something stupid?"

"Yes..." Hoarhiim replied. "You have the infinite power of a supreme being inside your body and the wisdom of an ancient king pouring through your mind, but you're still surprisingly stupid sometimes."

I blushed, feeling slightly embarrassed, and then realized what he meant.

"Oh, uh, right." Carefully raising my right wrist, I aimed my palm slowly towards my body.

" Heal ".

I instantly felt 30% better. My broken bones weren't fixed much, but the pain eased and I was able to take a much deeper breath. Steeling myself again, I tried again, this time with more force.

" HEAL! "

The shock of the healing was actually more painful than the initial impact into the pillars. My bones violently mended themselves, jamming together at a maniacally fast pace, my cuts and bruises instantly disappearing. I jumped to my feet and suddenly felt very weak, falling forward and missing Amelia by inches.

"Ahh... what the hell... why am I so... weak? I can't move at all even though I'm healed." Looking up at Amelia I noticed she was rolling her eyes.

"Duh, stupid. If you use all your spiritual energy to heal yourself, you'll be lucky if you don't die immediately afterwards. You're very brash."

A thought crossed my mind. "Wait, spiritual energy? That's really what that is?"

Hoarhiim nodded. "That is correct. You have a most interesting way of using my power. You're the first being to have gained my abilities that uses words to formulate magical concepts. Most others reach inside the Thought Energy to pull out their desired attack. You even somehow make the force of your words somehow amplify the effect. Whatever it is that you're doing though, it seems to have some serious side effects."

Blaarjiim looked my exhausted body up and down. "It's interesting, this one doesn't tap inside the limitless power of thought energy, but instead pulls from within themselves. It allows for a more explosive amount of power, but the amount of energy available is much smaller and more finite, and it seems to drain from the Child of Gaia's own body."

"I concur." said Hoarhiim in the affirmative. "A very unique ability, with more power able to be used at once, but also much more risk to their life. Such an interesting child."

Their words didn't escape me. Mentally, I was perfectly fine. Despite having practically no energy or ability to move inside my body, my mind was fully awake and seemingly boundless in energy. It would seem that I was in some fantastical place where the laws of physics were either nonexistent, or significantly different. Nevertheless, the concept of energy conservation seemed to exist. To give to one thing, you must take from another.

"Say, this thought energy you guys keep mentioning, what is it? How do I tap into it?"

Amelia smiled. "You can't!"

Helpful. Thanks a lot for that truly detailed and concise answer. "I can't? Why not?"

"We're not sure." said Blaarjiim. "You appear to be an aberration. Most beings pull from the Thought Energy almost instinctually, you completely bypass it. You would appear to be cut off from it."

I grimaced. Unlimited power was not within my grasp. Still though... "But you said my power was more explosive? So that means I have a much higher possible amount of power, but also a much lower minimum?"

"Yes, your power is more wild. It's hard to get a good grasp on. You are an interesting creature, to be sure." Blaarjiim projected a mental image of stroking his chin.

We chatted for a few minutes more and after Amelia propped my numb body up against the wall, an obvious question crossed my mind. "Hey, Amelia, I just realized that I have no idea where you came from. Were you mixed in with those monsters from earlier?"

Amelia shook her head and cracked a big smile. "Nope! I was trapped inside the statue, but you freed me when you destroyed my container!"

I looked past her and out the gaping door. The statue was in pieces on the ground, shattered into a thousand fragments by the impact of the massive golden doors.

What the hell? She was inside a statue? What the fuck is up with this place and statues? Why are they all so freaky? Next statue I see, I'm going to talk to it like it's a real person.

Looking my own body up and down, I turned my head towards Hoarhiim. "Well... what do we do now then?"

Hoarhiim raised his head to the ceiling thoughtfully. "I have an idea."

Part 022: Conviction

Hoarhiim nodded thoughtfully. "What you need to do is get stronger. With your destruction of the Riders of Sheol and causing an embarrassment to the Lord of the Undead, she won't forget this slight easily. She's probably going to send more at you. As you are right now, you will surely die."

Lord of the undead huh? That sounded ominous. I'm getting a bad feeling about this. "Well, for now, I need to rest my body. If only there was a safe room somewhere nearby."

Amelia smiled. "Ha! There's no such thing as a safe room! There is always danger inside the Labyrinth!" Saying that, she grabbed my hand, jumped to her feet, and with her other hand, made some strange symbols in the air.

Wait, what the hell? Suddenly I was inside a room with a bed, a large Victorian-Style bed, to be precise. Was this the safe room from earlier?

"Uh, uh, how did we get here? I'm confused." I looked around in bewilderment. It had happened so fast! I was leaning against the wall in the room with the pillars and then suddenly I was here.

"It's teleportation, obviously," Amelia replied, mocking me condescendingly. "Sheesh, for a person with such power and wisdom, you truly are a buffoon."

"Yes, I'm always amazed at the sheer stupidity I witness constantly." Blaarjiim nodded in the affirmative. Shut up, asshole.

"Teleportation huh? This place has less limits than I thought." I thought about it for a minute. If we could teleport, then all bets were off. Did I even need to actually travel the maze? Why not just teleport to each of the legendary treasures? I knew where they were all located. If I could figure out how to use it, teleporting should be pretty easy.

Hoarhiim, apparently reading my mind thanks to our linked energy, shook his head. "Bad idea, Child. If you go teleporting around, you'll be dead in seconds. Not only does danger lurk at every turn in this Labyrinth, it takes a vast amount of energy to move even a small distance. Furthermore, most legendary treasures are hidden inside a Thought Sphere, protecting them from magical interference. This is also why it baffles me that you can see their locations. It shouldn't be possible."

Amelia smiled. "Unlike you, I have access to thought energy, and my dear Blaarjiim would never let me get hurt so I'm not worried about it! Plus I'm not a weakling like you." She made a weird motion with her hands to her face like she was imitating me. I'd rather not describe it. How rude.

Alright already. I think I have an idea of what needs to be done. I need to find more pieces of that armor. This should make me very formidable. The only question is, what piece should I target next? Looking at the rooms in my Mental Map, I searched around carefully. The Chestplate and the Leg Bracers seem to be the closest, with the latter being the absolute closer of them, but if this twisty maze is any indication, that could change over the course of a few days if my luck doesn't hold out.

However, there's also the matter of my accidentally enraging the Lord of the Undead. I guess whoever she is, she's different from being the Lord of Darkness, like Blaarjiim? How many lords are there? Do they have different abilities? How can I protect myself against them? How can I defeat them or avoid them, or even just make peace with them?

An idea forms in my mind. When I entered here, I was hopeless. Death awaited around every corner, but now, I feel more than just hope. I may just have a goal. Not just to escape this hell, but barring that, to rule over this labyrinth. What if I were to defeat and subjugate all the lords around me? What if by becoming ruler I could gain a power that would allow me to return to my own time or world, wherever that may be.

Would I even want to do that? My life was dull. It was boring. Before I came here, I was so tired of my world that I was willing to put myself inside a cryopod and send myself into a fantastically distant future, caring nothing for anyone I'd leave behind.

Yes, it's true. I don't miss my old world at all. The only reason I wanted to return was due to my cowardice. Since this crown has effectively removed my cowardice, I can think more clearly and formulate strategy more effectively.

I look Amelia right in the eye. "Amelia, I have an idea for a game we can play."

Part 023:

Goddamn, I am sick to fucking death of chicken.

I took a full three days to recuperate in the bed, so badly had I exhausted myself. Every so often, Amelia would bounce into the room and give me a plate of chicken to eat. I'm beyond being sick of chicken. I'd rather eat the bones of a skeleton at this point.

Amelia seems to take a perverse delight in my suffering. Every time she hears me complain about all the chicken, she gets a wide grin on her face and tries to stuff more in my face.

Nevertheless, as awful as it is, by the third day, I'm back to my usual cheerful boundless self. Just kidding, I'm never cheerful.

"Alright, Amelia. Let's head out."

Gathering Hoarhiim and tying him around myself as I had before, Amelia and I step out of the front door and walk down the hallway. I'm now wearing some shoes Amelia made for me, along with a light tunic made out of fabric she stripped from the bed sheets. It's not exactly fashionable but I'll deal with it. I even got a nice bath after Amelia showed me how to make said bath appear in our bathroom. I am clean and wearing 'new' clothes. It's time for action.

When we exit the room and walk down the hallway, we end up in the El-Dorado room from before. I get an idea and decide to inquire about it. "Hoarhiim, when I first arrived here, there was a terrifying statue that was outside my door. I returned later and it was gone, and I'm just wondering if it was alive."

"It's hard to say." said Hoarhiim, mentally shrugging. Statues are created by the Lords of this labyrinth. Typically they were used in the Elder Ages to encase their foes in an inescapable prison, but recently they've been used for surveillance, security, and even defense. The real problem comes from a statue's spiritual power."

"Oh, are they strong?" The thought made me shudder.

"Strong? They're incredibly strong. Once transformed into a statue, reinforcement magic is many times more powerful, both for offense and defense. Their bodies can be nigh indestructible." Hoarhiim wagged his mental finger at me.

I glanced at Amelia. "But wasn't she a statue as well? How did she escape?"

Hoarhiim looked at me meaningfully. "You possess an explosive power. That much should be apparent. Just... don't get cocky."

I nodded aggressively. Right, so I have the power to destroy the indestructible. Good to know.

Looking around the El-Dorado room and comparing it with my Mental Map, I had a silly idea. It definitely wouldn't work.

"Detect."

I said this word and looked around me. I knew that my power came from single words, any more than one word and the spell always failed. Unfortunately, this made it difficult for me to come up with more advanced concepts.

It seemed to work, just not in the way I expected. I could see little dots moving around, all well past the walls. There was a lot of them, some dots concentrated, some dots all alone. They appeared to almost be an illusion. I can't tell what they are, but since they're moving, they might be monsters. The biggest problem I have is that the dots give no idea of their distance. They could be right around the corner or hundreds of miles away.

"Cancel."

Formulating the word in my mind, and directing the energy towards my previous request, the dots disappear. I can vaguely control how things happen with my mind, but the concept is fairly abstract right now. Plenty of experimentation during my three days of sleep helped expand my knowledge of my abilities, but I'm still a novice playing with very dangerous fire.

"It's settled then. I want to answer a certain question that's been nagging me." With that, I spun around and walked out the hall of El-Dorado, up a long hallway that was sure to lead me to my old nemesis. Amelia bounced along behind me, with Blaarjiim cupped in her hands.

Once I end this fear, I can move on to greater things.

Part 024:

We exited the El-Dorado room, leaving behind mountains of gold and jewels, and headed up the long hallway. It no longer curved, now it was straight. Exiting it, we found ourselves outside that same familiar colossal door I had first seen what felt like an eternity ago. The door was covered in moonspeak now, which had changed since the last time I came through here. However, thanks to Solomon's Crown, I was able to read them.

None shall enter.

Strange. Did this crown give me knowledge of languages as well? That would be fortunate if it did. This crown was like a cheat code, it gave me too much mental prowess.

We continued walking away from the doors. None shall enter, huh? I'll have to come back to that room in the future for sure.

Walking down the hallway, Amelia was happily chatting with Blaarjiim as if I didn't even exist. "It was so boring being locked up inside that statue! I'm glad you stayed with me though, and I was never bored since we could talk all day long!"

"True, but being able to get out and stretch must have felt a great deal better." Blaarjiim seemed cheerful. Odd, when I first met him, he was always mad, always going on about being the Lord of Darkness, but now that Amelia was here, he was pretty chill. He seemed like a nice enough deity, or whatever he was.

At the end of the hall we reached the door that looked like the one I came from. It was hard to tell with the shifting halls, but this was probably it. However, the door was shut, and it opened inwards, towards me. It also had no handles.

"Should I just break it down again?" I asked nobody in particular. I instantly decided that was a horrible idea. Then I had a new idea.

Putting my palm outwards, I aimed it at the door.

" Pull. "

Instead of blasting out of me, energy was sucked in from all around me, making the door rattle and then pull outwards. It also pulled in many other things around me, including Amelia, who was lifted up off the ground and flew at me.

"Ahhh!" she let out a little yelp and smacked me square in the body, knocking both of us on the ground in a heap. "A little WARNING next time!"

I grimaced. "Sorry. I'm not used to this yet."

"Yeah! No kidding." Getting up, she brushed herself off, wiping her skirt down and fanning it to look more modest.

Then we turned to look inside the room I'd just opened.

It was empty.

I felt disappointed. Perhaps the scary statue monster from before wasn't here. We entered the room, looking around. Amelia pointed at the ceiling. "Look. A hole." I jerked my head up. It was the same square hole I remembered seeing when I came here. This was the same room.

The floor was no longer covered in moonspeak though. Neither were the walls. Why were they gone? What made them come and go? Was it my presence? We walked further into the room and examined the door leading to -what I presumed was- my original Cryopod room.

I put my hand up to cast the 'pull' magic again.

At that moment, the door behind us slammed shut with incredible force.

" So. You've returned. "

Part 025: Monster

There was no statue monster behind me. Instead, there was an old man, standing up straight. The old man was at least 7 feet tall, a good head taller than me and significantly taller than Amelia. He was wearing a pure black suit with a pure black tie. It was hard to tell details apart, it all kind of blended together with the rest of his outfit.

What was terrifying, however, was his eyes. The man's eyes glowed a fiery red. "Beelzebub. You may refer to me as Beelzebub."

He's a goddamn demon? I started to pipe up but Hoarhiim instantly interrupted me. "Ah, Lord of Fire, great Beelzebub! So great to see you! Allow me to introduce this one, his name is the Child of Gaia."

That wasn't actually my name but at this point, I might as well just stick with it. Nobody cared about my original name, it was too boring and plain in a world of demons and monsters anyway.

"Yes, I know of this person. We all do. You've caused quite the ruckus, child. Have anything to say for yourself?" His glowing red eyes betrayed no emotion. His voice was cold as ice, despite being the Lord of Fire.

"Ah, well, I did a bit of this, and that, and I just sort of... ended up here!" I said, nervously chattering my teeth as his cold unending gaze directed itself into my soul. "I kind of did some uh, stuff, and well I got a little bit of this and that, you know?"

"Hm. Yes. Gressil was the first one to note your arrival. You were weak and pathetic. And yet here you stand, with a legendary treasure worn as if it is but a trifle." Beelzebub glared at the crown on my head. "It disgusts me that a mere... human... would wear such a powerful artifact as Solomon's Crown, but once you've put it on, it cannot be removed by anyone other than you, except in death."

He really didn't seem to like me. I feel like my existence was an affront to his very nature. Also, that name, Gressil...

"Gressil? Is that... that couldn't be the statue I witnessed when I first entered, could it?" I don't know why I was asking a question at a time like this. I shouldn't make this demon mad. I knew that in my heart.

"Yes... Gressil is the... statue, you first saw." Beelzebub tucked up the corner of his mouth, almost in a smile. "Be glad that it was me you found. Do not seek out Gressil if you value your life. You can only ever see him once. If you see him again, you are cursed to die."

I gulped audibly. I nearly committed a grave mistake coming here.

"Heyyyy Beelzebub! How are you~ ♪!" Amelia leaned forwards and waved energetically at him. That girl was afraid of nothing. Who was she anyway? "Long time no see! How is the missus?!"

Beelzebub visibly cringed. I couldn't tell if it was because of the question or if it was just that Beelzebub hated Amelia. "Ah... Lady Amelia, Lord of Flies. Always a... pleasure to see you." This was clearly not a pleasure for him. There's no way she'll fall for it.

"Aww, thank you! You're always so sweet to me!" She fell for it.

"Lord Beelzebub, why have you come here?" Hoarhiim had not yet joined the conversation but now he felt he had something worth asking.

"To deliver a warning. She is looking for you. I find that this child will provide some amusement and if the child dies too soon, it will be boring once again."

Hoarhiim nodded slowly. "You Lords are always trying to either rise to the position of King or fight amongst each other."

Beelzebub shifted his position and adjusted his tie. "You're one to speak. You and Hoarhiim sealed yourselves inside those accursed orbs to condense your power and play games with adventurers. Now you can't even walk normally among the land of the living."

"It was a smart choice." Blaarjiim chimed in. "Our power is magnified a hundred-fold. We now far outclass even you."

"Yes, but you can only use your power through a vessel, and you have no ability to control said vessel. Not even the brains to make them mind controlled. So stupid." Beelzebub sneered.

"Hey! Don't call my lover stupid! YOU'RE STUPID! Bleehehhh!" Amelia stuck her tongue out at him. Is she really trying to pick a fight with a demon?

"Well, I've done my duty. You stand corrected and now know to tread lightly. Don't die too quickly or my fun will end." Beelzebub gave a small bow. He had totally ignored Amelia.

It felt odd, having a demon with fiery eyes bow to me. I bowed awkwardly too, and Amelia curtsied. "Have a great day, Beelzebub!" she shouted cheerfully, apparently already over his insult towards Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim.

What happened next made me doubt reality. One second, Beelzebub was there, and the next instant, he was gone. He just popped out of existence. No chanting of a spell, no movement of his hands, he simply instantly teleported, and didn't even leave behind a trail of smoke or anything else.

And then I heard something. The sound of feet. Lots of feet.

Part 026: Feet In The Deep

From that tiny hole in the roof there came a noise of many small pitter-pattering feet.

"What could that be?" I found myself wondering out loud. It was a small hole, only a foot wide, and it was square. With such a small hole, nothing threatening could really come out of it.

And just as I had that thought, out came a small army of lizardmen, really tiny little guys, sticking to the ceiling like geckos. They started funneling out of the hole and spreading out in every which direction. Soon the entire room was filled with them, along with the ceiling and walls and both doors. They were really tiny, a little under a foot tall, about the size of small housecats. They all had tiny swords and shovels and axes and by gosh they were just the cutest little things, even though they had mean looks on their faces.

I heard a voice near my feet squeak and hiss at me. "You there! Fleshbag!" I looked down. Most of the lizardmen were green, but a few off-colored ones were at my feet. The one speaking was a purple one, and he wore a little teeny tiny crown and a royal raiment of some sort. He was definitely the leader.

"I am King Ghidorah! Speak your name!" Ghidorah spoke to me. That's odd, up until now everyone I've met has either had demonic names, odd names that are hard to pronounce, or in the case of Amelia, perfectly normal names. But this was the first time I'd heard a name from a popular Japanese movie series. Though... considering the moonspeak around here... it did make sense...

"I am Gaia's Child." I said, trying to sound reverent and respectful towards the itty bitty lizard at my feet. A pleasure to meet you, though I do wonder if you're here to attack me?"

The lizard suddenly shook in fright. "Attack you?! Attack the great and holy Child of Gaia who will overturn the balance of the labyrinth?! No way! It could never happen! We are the Children of Marie, and we are here to serve all who come from the magic containers! They shall be our salvation!" He seemed genuinely scared of me. A quick glance at the nearby lizards made me realize that they were all in some form of a position involving head bowing.

"Oh gosh, he's soooo adorable! Can we keep him? Can we?" Amelia jumped in the conversation, ignoring me. "I've never seen the Children of Marie before, they're so reclusive and only live in the shadows! But now that I see you I just want to gobble you up!"

The lizardmen near her suddenly leaped in near the king. "Ah, my lord! She wishes to attack and devour us! Your commands?"

The other lizardmen in the cave suddenly went on high alert. Amelia's vocabulary had made an odd situation tense. "Ah, no, I think she was using a euphemism for..." "I paused for a second to find a good word, any word. "...kissing! Yes, she loves kissing lizards."

Turning my head quickly to Amelia, grinning hard and nodding my head vigorously while looking for a quick agreement, I saw a face of pure and utter disgust aimed at me. Please don't say anything that might offend them. Please don't upset this conversation. I mentally sent images of a man begging at her, but she didn't receive them.

"Um, no, I don't want to kiss lizards. Ewwww! I do want to pet and play with them though!" She brightened up and smiled big at that last statement. The lizardmen around her visibly relaxed. Somehow she had cleared the air.

Directing my attention back to the King, I spoke again. "Great King Ghidorah, you say that you are the Child of Marie, but who is this Marie that you speak of?"

He smiled a toothy reptile grin and beamed solemn happiness at me. "Ah, Marie! She is the great goddess, the first fleshbag to show kindness to us! Where before the others showed us only fear and hate, she treated us as equals and stopped the infighting amongst our clans! She was one of the later occupants of a magic container!" The king nodded excitedly.

A sudden thought crossed my mind. It couldn't be. "Magic Container? You mean a cryopod? She was someone who came from a cryopod?"

"Yes! That was what she called it! She emerged and we gave her protection, now she benevolently rules over us, from somewhere in the labyrinth!"

I suddenly felt chills roll down my spine. Someone from a Cryopod was still here? I was not alone?

Part 027: History

I still know nothing of this world. I know what this world is (A labyrinth) but I don't know where, why, or how. Nothing makes sense. Every time I learn something new, more questions appear.

But now, something earth shattering has happened. I've found out that another cryopod survivor may exist. I'm not alone here. Based on the rooms that I saw, it could only be one person, the room with the journal. Perhaps that is why she left it behind. But there was no name in the journal, so it might not be her. Who am I kidding? It has to be her. There were only ten people put in cryopods, and 8 of them died gruesome deaths.

I pause that thought. Only ten? What if there were more? This labyrinth is massive. More could have been sent after us. Come to think of it, this doesn't feel like the same universe, given the lack of laws of physics. The law of conservation seems to be in effect, but not the law of physics.

And there's the matter of the lake of acid and fire deep below me. Those are decidedly human souls. If there was ever a description of Hell, that would be it. Was this the future? I can't imagine I'm actually in the future. What if the scientists lied to us. What if something else was done and we ended up here? We could have been like the Mayflower to the Americas, just an initial scouting crew.

And if we did not time travel, then this begs the question, why did they lie to us? Surely knowledge of any kind about what we were going to get ourselves into would have spared us many deaths. But maybe they didn't want to spare our lives. Maybe...

I ignore that thought. Nothing good will come of this line of reasoning.

"King Ghidorah." I look down at him, right in his eyes. "Would it be possible for me to meet Marie?"

"No, I am afraid that is not possible." Ghidorah shook his head. "Marie left us, many upon many cycles ago. We have not seen her for an age or two."

I frowned. "But you said she rules over you. Do you mean like, in your hearts she is always with you or something?"

"No no, she still sends us messages through cockroaches and other small insects. Since we live outside the normal part of the labyrinth in our own little crawlways and tunnels, the only way to contact us is through telepathy or bug-mail, and telepathy can only be used at short range." Ghidorah nodded profusely. I guess it made sense. Damn! And I was so close to finding someone who could get me answers.

"Well, surely you must have an idea where your God is located, correct?" I beckoned around the room and out towards the greater part of the labyrinth. "She must be somewhere, or she might be dead too."

The entire group of lizardmen let out a shrill warcry. "Anyone who kills Marie will face our full might! They will rue the day they were born!" I stared at the group of teeny monsters. I'm pretty sure I could kill all of them at once if I used that 'Push' spell I'd used before and they wouldn't know what hit them. I don't think they realized how insignificant they were.

"Well, if she is still alive, then I must find her. I must take my leave." I stood up straight instead of bending over at the back as I had been doing up to now. My back popped. Ahh, it felt good to stand normally once again.

King Ghidorah nodded. "Wait, before you go, we have a gift for you, as a friend of Marie." I nodded slowly. A gift huh? What could it be? Ghidorah let out a shrill scream towards the hole in the ceiling. "Bring out the feast!"

Feast? FOOD? My mouth watered at the thought. A stupid image of ice cream and cake found its way into my mind. There's no way they'd have that.

...They didn't. It was all chicken. A whole bunch of goddamn chicken.

Part 028:

"I will go with you." A lizardman from a small distance behind the king spoke. He was a head taller than the other lizards. Still tiny, but among them he was noticeably large. "I am Kar, the fearsome and great warrior. Among my people, I bear the blood of the Crocodiles from our distant ancestors."

The king nodded vigorously. "Kar is a mighty warrior, he has slain many foes with his powerful spear. None will protect you on your journey as Kar has to our kind." Several nearby lizards reached over and whacked Kar on the back. "Protect the fleshbag! Our protection goes with you!" With the special vision granted me by the Crown of Solomon, I noticed that his energy level was rising. His comrades must have given him some of their energy to infuse his own. They can do that? Good to know.

That was three hours ago. Kar now totters along beside us. I feel sick to my stomach though. I have eaten far too much chicken for far too long. I've been in this Labyrinth for almost three weeks now. Three weeks of nothing but chicken. I'd eat anything else at this point. I eyeball Kar. I wonder how he'd taste roasted? Considering his diet... probably like chicken.

Yet for some reason, Amelia and Kar love it. They devoured the chicken like it was the best food in the world. Amelia said something uncomfortable about how she wished it had a lot more blood in it, but I just pretended not to hear. This place is weird. Everything is weird.

Hoarhiim sighs in my mind. I realized neither he nor Blaarjiim had spoken during the entirety of the confrontation with the lizardmen. "That was lucky. We almost were killed."

Huh? Killed? "What do you mean?" I ask him. "You don't mean the lizardmen do you?" I glance over at Kar who was speaking with Amelia on the subject of being a great warrior, something he was intimately familiar with. She appeared to be bored by the conversation.

"Yes, the lizardmen. One small misstep and you could have gotten us killed." Hoarhiim quietly chided me.

"I lowered my voice so Kar couldn't pick up on my words. "They don't seem that scary. Aren't you being a little wimpy, for a deity Lord of Light?"

Hoarhiim glared in my mind. "You're still a naive child, despite the power you possess. You truly know nothing of this place. The Lizard King is one of the most powerful beings in this labyrinth. He's far above my own level, even with my power condensed like this. If you fought him as you are now, you would lose."

I stared at Hoarhiim blankly. "He's like a foot tall. How could he possibly be a threat to me?"

"Size matters not in this place." Hoarhiim mentally wagged his finger at me. "The moment you underestimate someone here, that is the moment you will die. Don't you know anything about the hierarchy here?"

I paused for a moment. Come to think of it, I didn't. I know there's lords and kings, but that's really all I know. "No, I'm still new to this whole thing."

Hoarhiim sighed again. He was doing that a lot lately. "Listen well. There is a strict hierarchy here, enforced for the last few millennia. First there are monsters, then ruling above those are lord-class monsters, such as me, and above us, there reside Dukes. Above Dukes there are Kings, and the final tier is Emperor, but there only exists three Emperors so that makes them a fairly rare monster. The one you could have enraged is a King class, and the King of Scales possesses many unknown abilities, since his people are reclusive. Furthermore, everyone of his same caliber or lower who has challenged him in fair combat died brutally, as did all of their companions. To top it off, he and his people eat the remains and clean up the battlefield so in the last few thousand years, nobody has had any idea what his abilities even are."

I swallow. This labyrinth is a scary place. I felt mighty before but with this knowledge, I'm dropped down a few pegs. That means most of the monsters I've seen so far, including the one strapped to my waist, were of the bottom two tiers. And I'm only the second tier with my own power as it is now. Except...

"Wait, Hoarhiim. What about Solomon's Crown? Combined with your power, does that make me still just of the Lord tier?"

Hoarhiim nodded. "Yes, and while my power is condensed thanks to my current form, you having a legendary item makes you an upper-tier Lord. You're certainly in the top ten, but don't get too cocky. There are thousands of Lords in this labyrinth. You're nothing special."

I feel crestfallen. Thousands, huh? I have a lot of competition. I wonder where Beelzebub falls in the rankings. He has to be number 1, right? I mean, he's a mythical demon spoken of in the bible. It's silly that he's even just Lord class.

But no matter. We must move on. "Hey, Amelia, Kar, are we ready to go?"

Kar nods vigorously. "Of course, great turtle! We are ready for anything you ask us to do!"

Amelia nods much less vigorously. "Sure, yeah, what he said. Just don't let me get dirty alright? I rather like this dress."

I smiled and nodded. Next stop: That big door at the end of the hallway. Time to get some answers.

Part 029: Error

Looking up that long hallway, I felt irritation. It was still a LONG walk back to the door. It took us half an hour last time. Even at a brisk jog, it was a quarter of an hour.

I was feeling antsy and didn't want to wait that long listening to Amelia and Kar jabber at each other about stupid stuff. So I got an idea in my head.

Raising my hand up and aiming my palm at my body, I tried something new.

"Speed."

I felt nothing. But, hopefully, it boosted my athletic ability, I tried running forward and noticed that Amelia seemed to be following my movement much more slowly, her eyes always lagging a half second behind me. Hm.

Remembering that time I had fought the shadow, I wondered to myself if I had actually slowed time, or if I had simply been moving so fast that my perception of time made the shadow appear to move slowly. Now that I thought about it, seeing Amelia having trouble following my movement, that seemed the likely scenario.

Looking further down the hallway far into the darkness towards the door at the end I currently couldn't see, I raised my palm up and pointed it at my body.

"Speed!"

Again, nothing felt different. Amelia appeared to be frozen, however. Her body was completely unmoving, the movement of the great lake of bodies deep below me was totally still. Yes, this must be the case and this explains what happened to me earlier.

I started to take a step forwards, and instantly an insane amount of pain washed over me, and I felt myself falling, the world spinning, as I blacked out.

I came to, and Amelia was hunched over me, my head in her lap. My entire body was in agony. Glancing over to my right, I saw Kar standing almost eye level to me. He really was short. To my left was the great door. What happened? Did I black out and Amelia carried me all the way here?

"Are you all right??" Amelia looked panicked. "What happened??"

I tried to shake my head but just trying to do so caused me a lot of pain. "I... I tried to speed myself up... and then I passed out... was it too much for my body?"

My head was swimming. Amelia's concern only grew deeper. "One second you were standing there, and the next you ran away! You ran so fast I almost didn't even see you move! You ran towards the great door, and when we got here, your body was lying on the ground in a crumpled mess! You tell ME what happened!"

I couldn't move my head so I had her lift my head so that I could see the state of my body. It was bad. Bones stuck out of various areas. The skin was badly muddled. My nice tunic she had made me was covered in blood.

But I think I know what happened. I only thought my perception had increased with my body's speed. It had not. My body moved insanely fast, far too fast for me to comprehend. I must have raced down the corridor at a speed approaching the speed of sound and smashed into the Great Door. I'm lucky to be alive.

"You're lucky to be alive." said Hoarhiim, once again apparently reading my mind. "That was maybe your greatest display of stupidity yet. As I said before, you're one of the top ten lords in terms of power, but you have no idea how to use any of it so even one of the weakest ones would surely defeat you in combat. And now..."

My body was badly broken. There was no way to heal myself. I couldn't move either of my hands at all, and I could feel my life ebbing away. "Ah... this is it... this is the end..."

I looked up into Amelia's eyes. I don't know why, but I had hoped she'd be crying. Maybe she'd miss me or something. That did not appear to be the case. She certainly looked a little worried, but also a little unconcerned. It made sense I guess, I was just a momentary amusement for her, a small distraction from the boredom of this hell.

"Are you an idiot?" she asked me this flatly. I suddenly felt stupid but didn't know why.

"I mean... maybe?" I don't know why she asked me that.

Raising her hand in the air, she drew some imaginary symbols. I could suddenly feel my strength returning. My bones slowly (But painfully) set themselves back together. My skin mended itself, the crumpled bloody mess that I was slowly became whole again.

An hour later, much longer than it would have taken if I had just patiently walked to the end, my body was whole again. She had even had the foresight to use some cleaning magic to purify my clothes.

"I... didn't know you could use healing magic too..." I eyed Blaarjiim. I guess even the Lord of Darkness wouldn't forgo such useful magic.

"Don't look at Blaarjiim! He had nothing to do with it!" Amelia stood up and crossed her arms smugly. "It was all me! Underestimate the Lord of Flies at your own peril!"

I smiled. "Well, ah, thank you. This was all my fault."

"No kidding." Said Blaarjiim, rolling his eyes. "This could have been hilarious if you'd just had the decency to smash into the wall in front of me. I didn't even get to see anything funny."

That guy, always taking a perverse interest in my suffering.

We finally turned around and examined the door. I decided to try something as a joke.

" Mellon. "

I spoke a single word at the door. Nothing happened. Damn, and here I had hoped we wouldn't have to force our way in.

Steeling my body against the door, I gave a mighty push. It's time to solve this mystery.

Part 030: Throne

I really gave it my all.

Pushing with all my might, I shoved and pushed and shoved and pushed. I even used a moderate "Power" spell to try and boost my strength. It didn't work. I wanted to try and do a full forced "POWER!" but I also didn't want to accidentally kill myself. Have to learn my limits before I go doing things like that. I still have no idea how it all works.

"This isn't working." I draw back and feel sweat pouring down my body. It's hot in here. I never really noticed it before, but the ambient heat from the warm floor can get noticeably hot when you work up a sweat. "Damn. I need much more strength."

This door is at least a hundred times heavier than the Golden Door that led to Solomon's Crown. I'm not even sure if Push at full power would slightly move it. Whoever built this door here, they did not ever want it open.

Kar stared at the great door. "Perhaps I could do it."

I looked down at the tiny little reptile and stifled a laugh. "Uh, I mean, you're free to try."

Kar looked up at me, his face completely flat, no form of emotion visible. "Do you doubt that I can do it?"

I shook my head. "No, no! Of course not! You're a big- I mean a strong crocodile! I'm sure you can, uh, at least do something to that door!"

Kar turned away from me. "I am the mightiest warrior among my people, strong enough that even the King himself respects me. I know what respect feels like, and yet you give none to me. I must rectify this."

Something astounding happened. I never expected to see this. Of all the things I could imagine, this was the most shocking. Kar grew.

He grew BIG too. He started shifting his size slowly, but as I watched he got bigger and bigger until he soon passed even my 5'10" height and surged upwards to a grand finale of... ten feet??? He was one tall son of a bitch.

He looked down at me, with his massive, hulking monstrous body. "Well then, little turtle. Who is the small one now?"

My mouth was apparently gaping open. I suddenly remembered that it would be rude to stare so I quickly averted my gaze from his eyes. "I am..." I mumbled. "I apologize for my lack of respect."

"Good." I could almost feel a reptilian grin forming on the face above me, as I looked at my shuffling feet. "Now then, I want you to strengthen me with your power."

I jerked my head up. "Me? You want my power?"

"Yes. I lack a sufficient supply of spiritual energy and I also lack the ability to tap into the Thought Energy. I lack magical abilities, but I make up for it with superior might!". He pounded his chest and it made a loud CRACK. "Do it! Give me power!"

To be honest, I was scared to give this towering behemoth even more power than he already had, but I was too scared to refuse him, so I did.

Aiming my hand at him, I chanted.

" Power! "

A moment passed. I looked up from his chest to his face. He seemed annoyed. "Was that it? That's all you can give? I barely felt it."

I started to protest, but hey, fuck it. If he wants my full power, I'll let him have it. He'll learn his lesson.

"POOOWERRRR!!!!!"

I felt my energy levels decrease substantially. To make an estimate, my bellowing scream must have lowered my energy by about half. That means I could do that twice in a row, at most, before I was completely exhausted.

However, I was stunned. Kar looked completely untouched. He flexed his muscles. "Hm. It's not much, but it will have to do. Rather disappointing."

This is the difference between my body and his. If I put that much power into myself, I'd probably overload my heart. To him, it was like the breeze under a butterfly's wings. I am still far too weak.

Kar turned to the door. Placing both his hands on it, he turned his head back to look at me.

"Little turtle, you had better step back."

Part 031:

"Can they all do that?"

I spoke to Hoarhiim. Amelia and I were standing back quite a ways from the door, as Kar was about to heave it open with his brutal power.

"Can who do what?" Hoarhiim didn't catch the gist of what I was asking.

"The lizardmen. Can they all grow taller like that at will?" I pointed at Kar. "He's humongous. It doesn't seem physically possible to grow that big from such a small body."

"It's a defense mechanism." Blaarjiim interjected. "All lizardmen can do it, they've been doing it for thousands of years. They made their bodies smaller through magic so that they could live inside much smaller places. They dig into the walls of the Labyrinth and evade the usual routes that the hallways take. Because of this, they are the most reclusive denizens of this place."

Hoarhiim nodded. "Lizardmen also gained the ability to shift between their forms at will. Each form has its own fighting benefits. When they are small, they move extremely fast, and are very hard to hit with an attack. But when they are big, they become much stronger and more resistant to attacks."

I nodded. "I underestimated them. I will try not to do that to any other resident of this Hell ever again."

Kar pushed on the door, digging his feet into the ground. The door shifted noticeably. My heart leaped for joy but then settled back down. While I was excited to see what was in that room, I also worried about it. If there was something terrifying in there that was being sealed for a reason, perhaps I shouldn't let it out.

I glanced downwards, at the souls of the humans floating in the river of acid and fire. This was Hell. It had to be. I must have died in that cryopod, and everything I'm experiencing now will eventually lead to my soul being reaped. I will eventually end up down there with them as well. Perhaps whatever is behind this door is the final judgement for me. Perhaps this is my own Pandora's Box that I am opening up.

The air began shaking. I was confused for a second, then I looked up. Kar was heaving on the door with all his might. His mouth was open, like he was screaming, but I could hear nothing. I could feel the air vibrating, however. A quick glance at Amelia made me realize she was wincing in noticeable pain. "Amelia? Are you okay?" I tried to speak but the words did not come out. Or rather they did, but whatever was making the air vibrate, it was seemingly drowning me out.

Using the intuition gained from Solomon's Crown, I deduced that Kar was screaming a warcry to bolster his strength, and the sound was at an insanely high frequency that I couldn't even hear. I could only vaguely sense it through the vibrations all around me.

Kar heaved with all his might, suddenly, once the outer edge of the right door that he was pressing on cleared the inner edge of the left door, the door swung open and he fell forwards and collapsed on the ground. Amelia and I raced up behind him, and suddenly a chill went down my spine.

This was a mistake. This was a big mistake.

Part 032: Chosen

I've had many regrets in my life.

For example, that time I tried eating a PB&J without the J, that time I ignored an old man who needed help crossing the road, that time I decided my entire life was worth giving up to get inside a cryopod...

But most of them pale compared to the regret I feel over opening that door.

An army of monsters. An absolute metric fuckton of monsters. I remember seeing rock concerts and images of battlefields of war, and I never saw one that had as many beings as what I now looked at.

Skeletons, werebears, dark horseman, bone mages, goblins, orcs, dark elves, gryphons, even a few small lesser drakes, every type of monster I could think of was here. There had to be a million monsters or more. They stretch on and on in this very well lit mega-room for probably miles back, as the room fanned outwards and got bigger and bigger the further it went back. I could not see the back wall, if such a thing existed.

I had no words for what I saw. They all stared at me unblinkingly, as if to ask "Who dares enter our sacred land?"

Yes, unblinkingly, that is the word. I mean, the skeletons don't have the ability to blink, but the other monsters weren't blinking either. I found myself in a cold sweat. What the hell was going on. A very quick glance at Kar showed no look of concern whatsoever. Gwahahaha I'll just defeat them all for I am the mightiest! I bet that's what was going through his head.

However, Amelia also looked unconcerned. And then I realized, all the monsters weren't moving. At first, I thought they were fucking statues again, but they were not. They were simply... waiting for something.

"Are you the chosen one?"

A voice boomed from the back of the room. I could not detect where it came from.

"I... I don't know!" I yelled this in the general direction of the voice that I had heard.

"Only the chosen one may enter."

The voice sounded like it was accusing me of something. It was a very loud voice, like the sound of a not-too-distant erupting volcano.

"And how would I know if I am the chosen one?" I yelled this at the source of the voice.

From the back of the hall, I saw thousands of the monsters in that area suddenly shifting over to the sides of the room. They continued shifting, and the seeming tidal wave of movement made its way forward. That voice was a truly terrifying one. The power contained in it defied explanation. Whatever it was, I did not want to anger it. I reaaaally did not want to anger it.

Once the tidal wave of movement opened up to the front, I was mystified to see a beautiful mermaid, someone gliding across the ground with her tail. Six massive wings sprouted out of her body. Her body had no scales on it, it was simply smooth, soft skin. But her voice, it was decidedly masculine, and very terrifying at this close range.

"If you do not know, you will be tested."

I wondered quietly to myself how a mermaid could command this much awe and respect from all the monsters around her. Of course, given what I had witnessed with Kar, I did not wish to underestimate her at all. Plus, Amelia's mouth was agape.

Amelia stuttered to life and asked a simple, one word question. "B-B-Bahamut?!"

My eyes must have bulged open. I thought Bahamut was like, a great dragon, or some kind of serpent. Not... a mermaid? No. Wait. I had it wrong. She was no mermaid, she was a Siren. This was evident by the mouth full of teeth resembling that of a great white shark.

"If you fail the test, I will strike all of you down."

I figured this was a stupid question, but I had to ask anyway. "Can we just, not take the test, and um... quietly leave?"

In my mind, Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim both facepalmed. Wow guys, thanks for the support.

"Once you enter, only if you are Chosen may you leave."

Part 033: The Test Part 1

I winced. This loud voice was becoming unbearable. Especially at such a close range. "Oh Great Bahamut..." I said this as reverently as I could muster. "Before I take this test, might you honor me with a small request? Just a trifle?"

Bahamut looked amused.

"An army of hell, and a God stands here, yet you would make a request of me!"

I winced more visibly. "Yes, ah, I would just like to ask if you could possibly, ah, tone down your voice. I am far too weak of a being to withstand your incredible power!"

Good move me. Make the request into a compliment. Bitches love it when you do shit like that.

The next thing I heard, I did not actually hear. It was in my head. Bahamut communicated with me telepathically, in a much deeper way than Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim had done so up to this point. The voice was everywhere inside my head.

"As you wish. It is true that my power can be too daunting for any but a Duke or higher so I shall grant your request. But only this one."

"Ah! Thank you, oh great Bahamut! Your, uh, generosity truly knows no limits!" Hell yeah, slick as fuck. I'm laying it on and she's falling for my charms.

"Idiot." whispered Amelia off in the distance away from me. Maybe I was getting too full of myself.

"Now begins the test. It will consist of three trials. To be recognized as the chosen one, you must pass all three of them. Once you have done so, you will be allowed to leave. Since I do not anticipate that happening, make sure you say your last prayers first." Bahamut smirked at me, as she glided away, the sea of minions parting the way in front of her. That bitch, I'll show her who's boss.

My two companions and I followed Bahamut. We arrived within a minute at a massive, raised platform. It was square, about a football field wide in both directions. I'd never seen such a massive flat platform. Raised up a hundred feet in the air, it offered quite the view. I looked around as we climbed the stairs up the platform. I was wrong. There were far more than a million monsters here. I dare say I grossly underestimated the number. Far in the distance, I spotted a massive town, stretching on for the foreseeable distance.

"Incredible." whispered Amelia, as we walked up the steps. I understood where she was coming from. What baffled me however, was the fact that we hadn't seen this platform at all until we were practically on top of it. Did it rise out of the ground when I wasn't paying attention? Maybe there was magical cloaking technology involved.

Arriving at the top, I was stunned. I could still, even this high up, see no end to the monsters. They flowed seemingly forever. They blotted out my view of the river of fire and acid below. Where the hell did all these monsters come from? Was this the factory where nightmares were made?

Arriving at the exact center of the platform, the three of us turned to face Bahamut. Bahamut held up her hand. On it were three rings. "I have never once had anyone pass all three of these tests. In fact, nobody who has entered my domain has ever passed even the first one. I am sorry in advance if your death comes too swiftly for you to process."

Bahamut indicated the three rings on her hand. "These three rings are Legendary class items. For each test you pass, if that is even possible, you may pick one ring and keep it for yourself. It will be bound to you forever."

Amelia gasped audibly. "Three legendary items? Oh wow! Those must be incredibly valuable!"

"Indeed. Back before I killed the Army of Akkad, I had renown for simply possessing these three rings." Bahamut indicated the three rings one by one. "I will only tell you that each ring once belonged to a mighty Pharaoh from the past. Each one will grant you immeasurable power, but together, you will unlock something inside yourself that you never knew existed." I nodded vigorously. This was exciting. I'm probably about to die, but damn if this wasn't worth it, just to see what the power of those rings was.

"And." Bahamut stared directly into my eyes. "If, by some stroke of luck, you should manage to pass all three challenges, I will voluntarily bow to your will and become your loyal servant, until one of us dies."

The crowd around us, the vast unending throng, erupted into cheers and whoops. A great warcry went out, feet began marching in place and stomping in unison. The energy in the place was palpable.

"By the gods, they sound excited." Shit, I could have the power of a living God in my hands, if I could just pass some challenges. It was probably impossible, but this deal was getting better every minute.

"Of course they're excited." Bahamut smiled a gracious, loving smile. "All of them are people that have challenged me for the right to own these rings. All of them failed, and were cursed into their current forms. "

Holy. Shit.

I felt numb. All these poor unfortunate souls had challenged Bahamut... and lost. The gravity of the situation was sinking in on me.

However, something else bothered me too. She had said that her three rings belonged to Pharaohs. Egyptian Pharaohs? Like, from Earth? Then, was this actually, somehow, Earth a hundred million years in the future? Was this a different dimension? Was this place a literal hell for me as I had died inside my cryopod? What did it all mean?

Amelia had stars in her eyes. I remembered that back in the El Dorado room, she had strongly eyeballed all the treasure there. It would seem that she likes shiny things. Her eyes were glued to the rings on Bahamut's hand.

"For the first test..." Bahamut pointed at me. "You must answer a riddle. This riddle has never been answered. Not throughout all of human or demonic history. Failure to answer correctly will result in instant death."

I blinked. A riddle? "Are my companions allowed to help me?"

Bahamut nodded. "Yes, they may speak freely. Nothing they say will be considered an answer. However, you may not speak once I have asked the question. If you do, anything you say will be considered the answer. Do not speak unless you have an answer in mind."

I nodded vigorously. This was intense. My life rode on the answer to this riddle. And then I had two more terrifying tests to undertake after this one. Looking out over the river of monsters, it really hit me in the chest. Millions have tried to pass these tests, and none have even gotten past the first riddle. That means this riddle is so complex that it may be unguessable.

Bahamut reached inside her cloak she had wrapped around her body, and pulled out an hourglass filled with sand. "You will have from the moment I finish speaking the riddle, to the moment this sand runs out, 5 minutes in total, to give your answer. If you do not start speaking your answer before the sand runs out, you and your companion's lives will be forfeit. Do you understand?"

I glanced over at Amelia. Her starry eyes were gone, and she seemed to be trembling in fear. It must have sunk into her mind the gravity of this situation. This was no simple riddle, if we failed, we would be enslaved monsters forever.

I nodded slowly. "Yes, great Bahamut. I understand the conditions for this test."

Bahamut nodded back. " Good. Then we will begin. "

Bahamut cleared her throat with a great thunderous crash, though it hardly seemed needed, given she was communicating telepathically.

Then I realized, she was not going to speak telepathically.

"What walks on four legs in the morning, two legs in the afternoon, three legs in the evening, and no legs at night?"

Bahamut smiled. This was it. The moment she had been waiting for. It had been a long time since some fool had challenged her domain.

She issued her riddle. The Child of Gaia was instantly rendered speechless. She stifled her smile, as it was not polite to mock someone before they gave their terrible answer. The three of them were as good as hers. She drifted off in thought, remembering what led her to choose that riddle.

Long ago, when she was just a young child, living as a slave in Egypt, she had stumbled on the Sphinx. The Sphinx was a mighty looking creature, with the body of a cougar, the wings of an eagle, and the head of a great maned lion.

She had been completely awestruck at the sight of the monster in front of her. Having run away from the Egyptian slavers, she had stumbled upon it purely by accident.

The Sphinx was a timeless monster. Having existed since before the dawn of man, it had knowledge no human could comprehend. It was aging however, and tired of the riddles it had plagued many a traveler with.

Looking down at its feet, the Sphinx spotted a small human child. A little girl. the child was petrified with terror. The child would hardly be a worthwhile snack. She certainly lacked the cognitive abilities to solve his riddle. In short, she was nothing to him at all.

"Begone, little one. I will not harm a defenseless creature. It is unsavory." The Sphinx pawed her away. The child made a mad scramble to hide behind a rock, still staring at him in terror.

Hmm? She did not run from me? She is hiding, but yet seems to be curious.

The sphinx thought about his life. Proud and aged like wine, at its peak the Sphinx had tested the mettle of many adventurers. Any who passed his test were given incredible wealth, power, and influence, at the cost of their memory of the test being wiped. Only one had ever succeeded, and that was Pharaoh Khafre. Originally just a lower classed noble among the house of Egypt, he had managed to answer the Sphinx's riddle. The Sphinx, shocked that any human could guess the answer to his clever wordplay, rewarded the man, first by killing off his direct opponents to the throne's line, and then by giving him favor among the other lands. Khafre never forgot the power the Sphinx gave him, and built a massive monument in his honor.

But that was... many years ago. Khafre was long dead. The Sphinx thought bitterly that now that his riddle was answered, even though the answer had never gotten out, if others in the future answered it, it just wouldn't have the same meaning.

He looked down at the little child hiding behind a rock. "Tell me child, what is your name?"

Bahamut smiled. The Sphinx gave her the knowledge of his riddle, and part of his monstrous power. She had taken over for him, spreading the power of the riddle among the lands. Aside from Pharaoh Khafre, no person had ever successfully answered it, certainly not once she had gained it.

She had amassed an army worthy of a god, legendary items that granted her true godlike powers, and worship devoted to her as a god. There were none in this world of death and decay like Khafre. There were none that could hope to answer her riddle, certainly not within 5 minutes.

Looking back down, her smile disappeared. The Child of Gaia seemed wholly unconcerned. The little girl beside the Child was in a panic. But the Child seemed bored.

"Man."

Bahamut's expression hardened.

What.

I was completely speechless. My mouth gaped open.

I stared at Bahamut numbly. You're kidding. This was the riddle? This was the riddle that had killed millions of warriors, adventurers, and kings? This stupid fucking riddle? Everyone knows the answer to this riddle. It's so easy. I remember accidentally reading it on a Facebook post from one of my few friends a couple years ago. Well, a couple years before I went in the cryotube.

I couldn't believe it. No, it just simply could not be that easy. Everyone knows the answer to this stupid riddle. I looked around at the throng of monsters gathered around the arena. All of these monsters were men who failed to guess the answer to this riddle.

I look over at Kar. His head was bowed. When I looked at him, he shook his head. He had no idea what the answer was, and didn't even want to guess.

Then I looked at Amelia. She was shaking, visibly. She seemed terrified. I heard her whispering something under her breath. " Pleasedon'tkillmeohgodwe'regoingtodieIdon'tknowtheanswerohgodpleaseblessmysoul... " I almost said some words of comfort but then I realized that would count as an answer.

I looked back at Bahamut. The smug bitch, she was staring up at the sky, lost in daydream land. She thinks she has this in the bag. Fucking cunt. I'm still baffled. It can't actually be this easy.

Think, Me. Is there another possible answer? Could it really just be the Sphinx's riddle? Why is a Siren asking the riddle anyway? Were the old legends wrong? If they were wrong about it being the Sphinx, they could possibly be wrong about the answer as well.

No, my answer was correct. It really was that easy. And that smug bitch is looking at me again. Look at her, she thinks she's already won.

I glance at the hourglass sitting on the table. A shockingly small amount of time has passed since she set it there. Maybe 15 seconds. I can't believe it's this easy.

I look back at her. Her face, which once had a grin, is suddenly no longer smiling. She seems to know my answer is coming. Oh well, here goes nothing.

"Man."

Her face freezes, a look of cold terror washes over it. I hear her voice in my mind. " What. " It wasn't a question, she was visibly stunned. That's right, you bitch, I know the answer. You'll regret taking on the Child of Gaia.

"When man is born, he walks on four legs. As he grows older, he walks on two. When he becomes elderly, he walks on three, with a cane being his third. Finally, when he dies, he no longer walks at all."

Bahamut staggers back. The shock is hitting her like a freight train.

"HOW?! HOW DID YOU KNOW THE ANSWER?!"

Her voice booms out loudly, making me wince. Amelia turns and gazes at me in awe, staring past my face and at the Crown of Solomon. "Oh my god... that truly is a legendary treasure!"

Suddenly Bahamut straightens her stance out and staggers back into a mostly normal position befitting a god. " What? A legendary treasure? Wait... it can't be. "

She lunges forwards and grabs at the crown on my head. Unfortunately for her, it will not come off unless I take it off myself. After letting her try for a solid five seconds, I swat her hand away.

" Insolent- " she backs away. " Y-you cheated! You used the Crown of Solomon! You used the infinite wisdom of the king preferred by the highest God! You could never have guessed without it! "

She suddenly regained her composure. " Yes, yes of course, without the Crown of Solomon, you would have been in my grasp. Damn you! "

She paces back and forth for a full minute, cursing many obscenities under her breath, before I politely, and loudly clear my throat.

"AHEM! Bahamut, I believe we had a deal. And you never said I couldn't wear the crown for the test, so that was your own fault." I smile. It's alright if she thinks it was the Crown that gave me the answer. In truth I would have known it before she answered even without the Crown, but she didn't have to know that.

She had seemed to regain her composure. She probably figured that since it was the Crown that knew the answer, and not me personally (wrong) then it didn't have to count and hurt her pride.

"Well, truthfully, the Crown told me everything, but I still get to take one of your rings."

She grimaced, an ugly expression for such a lovely face. The grimace revealed her incredibly numerous and sharp teeth.

" Very well, I will not sully this moment by doing anything dishonorable. You may choose one ring. " She held up her hand towards me and pointed at each finger individually. " The first, the second, or the third? "

I pondered it. I still had no idea what any of the rings even did. She simply said that they would grant me godlike powers.

Shrugging, I pick one at random. "Eeny meeny miney moe..." she looks confused, like she thought I was casting a spell on her hand. Oh well, fuck what she thinks.

Pointing at the second ring I speak to her. "The second one, the middle one. I'll take it."

She looks absolutely defeated. " Very well... he is yours. "

He? He who? I reach my hand out to accept the ring from her. She places it in my hand, and before I put it on my finger, I notice there's writing on it. Thanks to the Crown, I easily deduce that it's Egyptian. But the word on it is actually a name.

Gabriel.

Part 037: Gabriel

It couldn't be just any ordinary name. Gabriel. Only one name of significance immediately leaped to mind. It could be someone else but... only one way to know.

I slipped the ring on my finger. Suddenly everything went white. My ears rang like a bomb had gone off next to my head. My temples pounded. My body felt as if it were falling. Endlessly, falling into a great abyss, made of pure white. The world around me rapidly melted away as I fell. I flailed my arms, but realized they weren't moving. My head swam.

Inside that blinding light a voice spoke to me.

" Are you my new master? "

As I fell, a massive being, the size of... of a planet! Or bigger! He appeared. He dwarfed the horizon. The only thing I could see other than whiteness was him. He had silver armor on. A massive full helm sat atop his head. Unbelievably wide wings sprouted from his back. From the top of one wing to another, it must have been the span of an entire solar system. How my eyes could even comprehend something of this size failed me. My imagination was lost on the size of this being.

In his left hand, he held a massive shield, with a holy cross emblazoned on the front. In his right hand, a Bible was held. Instead of the words "Holy Bible" however, there were different words written on the front.

Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death

I will fear no evil - for thou art with me

The LORD is my strength and my shield

My heart trusts in Him, and through him I am saved.

The archangel has long, flowing golden hair. It goes from his head all the way down to his feet, or at least I assume it does. I cannot see his feet, so vast is his body.

I have been made to feel tiny and insignificant before. But never like this. This being that is in front of me, it is unlike any that I have ever seen. Without a doubt, I am bearing witness to a living god, or at least, a lesser god.

His master? Get real. I have no power over this being.

Again he asks the question.

" Are you my new master? "

I look deep into his eyes. His eyes are timeless. He knows all and sees all. He is an existence far above the whole of humanity and demonkind alike.

"No. I cannot be your master. You only have one master, and He is the one who rules on high."

The Archangel Gabriel does not speak. For many minutes, hours, an eternity. It seems forever that he neglects to respond.

Finally, he seems to change his mind. Raising his voice to a level that dwarfs even the loudest volume that Bahamut had reached, he bellows in a universe-shattering volume:

"Well done! You have passed the first test! I have chosen you!"

Part 038: Hero

I continued falling. I fell for a very long time.

As I fell, I thought of many things. I don't know why I was brought here. I don't know what made me end up in this hellish world. But I knew it wasn't right. This world itself... was not right.

It's been a short time since I arrived, but I have been gaining power and abilities quickly. I never felt satisfied by it though. I do not desire power, I do not desire wealth. Despite my first inclinations, I don't even want to rule this place or anything silly like that.

But when I see that river of souls flowing beneath me, I realize that there is one thing I could do. I could release the denizens trapped in this place. I could do something to alleviate their eternal suffering.

But for right now, I just don't know what.

As I fall, I gradually pick up speed. The whiteness around me starts to fade and my body turns in flight as the ground rushes towards me. Below me sits a familiar room, lost for an eternity in my mind. Yes, that's right, I remember now. I was facing Bahamut here. She had challenged me, and I defeated her with my own knowledge.

As I fell, I realized I was falling towards my own body. I was still standing in the original spot. One hand was slipping that ring on my finger, that ring that had taken me to Gabriel.

Suddenly, I was back to reality.

I jerked my head up with a start. I felt very disoriented, Around me, everything was as it looked before. "Huh? Am I back?"

It was a stupid question. Of course I was back. But I had been gone so long that I had forgotten what reality felt like. Amelia was looking up at me eagerly, then her face turned to disappointment.

"Did anything happen? Come on, you can tell me! I'll keep it a secret!" She jumped up and down excitedly.

"Ah... how long... have I been standing here with this ring on my finger?" I looked around. I couldn't tell at all.

"I don't know, like, 5 seconds? Do you feel stronger or anything??" She kept looking at the ring and back up to my face and back down to the ring again while bounding on her toes lightly.

"Well?? Did that ring do anything legendary?"

So it would appear that it had all happened in the blink of an eye. In the span of only a second or two, I had gone to a heavenly place, spoken with a Supreme Deity, and then returned, but to me it had felt like a few eons. If time flies when you are having fun, then does time crawl when doing something monumental?

I turned back to Bahamut. She was staring at the ground. A look of great sadness on her face. When she realized I was looking at her, she raised her head and stared, not at me, but at the ring on my finger. She spoke now, far more quietly than before, and not in my mind either.

"So... you've returned. Since you aren't dead... you must have passed."

I nodded. "He must have been the Archangel Gabriel. The one spoken of in the book of Daniel. What is the significance of this ring?"

She finally smiled again, though it was a faint, listless smile. "That is for you to find out. When I had put the ring on, an eternity ago... I failed his test. He never spoke to me again. But in the time that I knew of him... it was ecstasy."

Bahamut slumped to the floor in defeat and stared at the ground listlessly.

"There's no more point continuing. You must truly be a fearsome hero of myth. You not only guessed the answer to a riddle that has vexed champions and kings, you did so effortlessly, and then you passed Gabriel's test. There's no point in going on with the other two tests."

I was taken aback. After all that big deal she had made, she was going to just cancel the tests? "You're pathetic." I spat this at her and she jerked her head up angrily. "Giving up after a single failing. If you were truly a god, you should be filled with shame. What I witnessed inside the ring was truly a magnificent specter. Compared to the Archangel, you are weak. You are pitiful."

An idea formed in my head. Turning around suddenly, I began to speak to the throng of people.

"Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord "

Saying this, a powerful image appeared above me. A great phantom. Gabriel himself, in a far smaller, yet still terrifyingly awesome form, appeared. He was hundreds of feet tall, reaching up to the ceiling I could not see above me. He spoke now.

" Ye who have summoned me, I have come to bring forth a cleansing, a removal of the sins of those who were deceived by the one called Satan and the Devil. Repent, those who fell to greed and envy, and ye shall be made whole again. "

The crowd of people became breathlessly still as they gazed at the Archangel in wonder. Falling to their knees, they began bowing and praying, begging for their sins to be cleansed.

One by one, they started changing, slowly at first, and then faster and faster until rapidly, like a reversed plague, they became human again, the entire throng of people around me regaining their original forms. Tears were shed, a people once broken, started to become whole.

They then began to chant, this aimed at me.

"All hail the HERO, the one sent from on high!"

Over and over, they chanted. A mighty battlecry. I turned around and looked back at Bahamut. She was visibly stunned.

This was it. I now knew why I was sent here. I had a purpose.

"Get up. Your time to lie down is long gone."

I pointed my finger at Bahamut.

"I have judged you and found you lacking. You posed as a god, when really you were a devil. You deceived men for your own personal gain. You ruined lives, you ruined countries, you helped bring ruin to the entire world, and in the end you were just a coward."

I felt disgust, just looking at this creature. She was a fraud. She had no real power. All her power came from those rings on her finger, and at least in the case of Gabriel, she hadn't even succeeded in using that power.

I could feel, inside my body, that my own power had risen exponentially. I could visually see the spiritual energy of every person in the room thanks to the power of Solomon's crown. Bahamut certainly had an imposing presence, but her actual spiritual energy was lackluster. Perhaps comparable to me when I had first touched Hoarhiim.

As for me, ever since Gabriel accepted me, I had increased my power tenfold. Rivers of spiritual energy poured off my body invisibly and dissipated when it hit the ground. And, most notably, the color of my energy was white. Pure white. Bahamut's energy was red, indicating bloodlust and blood shed. She was a killer.

But then I noticed something... odd. I happened to glance at Amelia, with my newly awakened vision. She too had a spiritual energy color. It was black, pure unending pitch black. A complete void of any color. And, I came to realize, the energy pouring out of her own body vastly dwarfed mine. It raged out of her body. She was a tiny little girl with a cute smile, but that smile hid a terrifying power.

And if she was a servant of the dark... and I was a servant of the light... would we have to fight someday? I turned away. That would have to wait until the unforeseeable future.

Bahamut sneered at me. "Coward?! Well, look at you. A child started playing with a new toy that got a little cocky. Isn't that... cute." She tried to sound menacing, but without her booming voice granted by stealing what little she could of Gabriel's essence, she sounded weak and minuscule.

I lowered my hand and stopped pointing at her. "We will continue where we left off."

Part 040:

Damn! It had all changed so fast.

First, I was gloating over an easy victory. Then that brat, that little child... somehow managed to defeat my riddle and even solve the condition to awaken Gabriel. You were only granted one chance and if you failed you could never retry.

I had failed, and in return that brat had succeeded. In the instant the ring was put on, I perceived an incredible shift in his power. He must have awakened Gabriel... DAMN! When I failed, I only evaded death because I was already wearing Michael's ring and that granted me protection. That child was truly lucky, for he would have surely been crushed if he failed.

I gnashed my teeth together.

Okay. It's fine if the Child won. I... I can live with this. I still had Raphael and Michael. Gabriel had never given me his power, but Raphael and Michael had.

Gabriel: The Mighty King

Raphael: The Wisdom King

Michael: The Divine King

Each of these archangels had been instrumental to my rise. Without them, I could not have forced an honorable challenge against so many. They would surely have simply left, but once a challenge is issued, the three rings guarantee neither participant can leave until the challenge is completed.

But now I only have two of those rings. My ability to force the challenge is over. The Child of Gaia can leave whenever he wishes.

Wait. The Child does not yet know this. I still may have a chance to regain Gabriel, assuming the child continues the challenges and I win. It's not hopeless yet.

The child and I exchanged words. Even as he stunned me by using the power of Gabriel to free my warriors from my grasp, still... I held on to hope. Even as he issued a declaration of competition from me, I kept my smile buried inside. This child was weaker than he thought.

The throng of citizens I once considered my own people chanted a warcry. "Hero" they called him. No, he was just a child. A Hero would not allow the monster a chance to consolidate its power. His desire for glory and fame would be his undoing. He was no hero, he was simply a greedy child who wanted mommy's attention.

Well, I say... good for you. You got it.

I rose up to my full height, twelve feet tall. I towered over the child and even his rather tall companion.

"Prepare yourself. I will grant you no mercy."

Part 041:

"Well. That was lame."

Amelia laid on her stomach on the bed, twiddling a piece of fabric with her fingers.

"Like, she hardly even put up a fight. Was she really that strong in the first place?" Amelia was greatly disappointed. She blew a piece of hair up and away from her face as it fell in front of her eye.

I shrugged. "There were many great leaders, at least in my human history, who relied more on trickery or deceit rather than raw power to achieve their goals. Bahamut was just... one of those kinds of beings."

I chewed on the meat. I'm just glad it wasn't any more fucking chicken. I'm so tired of chicken.

"I have to say, Roasted Bahamut is actually quite good. A solid texture. Soft enough to eat without silverware, but tough enough to get a real workout for my mouth." Kar mumbled as he stuffed his face. Turns out she tasted a lot like fish.

We were inside the great palace she had created an eon ago. Servants and people greatly thankful for freeing them were bringing us anything we asked for. I was a veritable king at the moment.

As I chewed on a cooked piece of Bahamut, I considered how quickly it had all ended. Thanks to Solomon's Crown, I was able to perceive that some invisible condition had been released when I took the ring, and I no longer had to accept her tests.

She was so weak. And surprisingly stupid. She tried badly to goad me into accepting another challenge, I simply pretended to accept, and then when I got tired of her stalling, I destroyed her in a flash.

Actually, I had the weird feeling that there weren't three challenges in the first place. There was only one challenge, the riddle. The other two were a ruse to con adventurers into challenging her for her rings.

But why? Thanks to the power of the rings, all she had to do was issue the challenge herself. It was considered a spiritually binding contract. Why did she need the adventurers to issue a challenge?

My head hurt. It doesn't matter anyway. Now she's dead and we're all devouring her non-chicken flesh greedily. I of course stuck to the fish-like tail, as did Amelia. The more... human looking parts... we left those to Kar. He's a crocodile, so to him meat is just meat.

I twiddled the two rings in my finger. Michael and Raphael. I hadn't put them on yet. I'm not sure if I was ready for another episode of what happened with Gabriel. Soon though, I will. For now, I have a new mission.

Amelia. She is dangerous. She seems sweet and innocent, but I've witnessed her darker side on more than a few occasions. And thanks to my recent merging with Gabriel, as well as the further enhanced abilities of the Crown, I have noticed many key things.

[if!supportLists]1. Her power far exceeds mine. I have not yet witnessed any other demons with my new vision, but hers is definitely far above me.

[if!supportLists]2. Her aura is a demonic black. I saw auras of many other people at this place. Nobody else is black, or any shade similar. I don't know if this is unique to her or if all creepy little demon girls are like this.

[if!supportLists]3. I'm fairly certain of why her power is so extreme. Beelzebub called her "The Lord of Flies". She also has Blaarjiim's power inside her. That means she has the combined power of two demon lords. Wouldn't that make her... the strongest demon lord? Maybe even a Duke? I don't have enough data on other Lords so I just can't accurately tell how strong she is in the rankings.

Amelia. Who is she? Where does she come from? I must find out.

A bolt of lightning flew past my head. It missed me by inches.

" Barrier! " I yelled this and a magic barrier surrounded Amelia, who was taking the fight head-on. Just in the nick of time too, as a fireball glanced off and melted into the scorched earth, dissipating harmlessly.

Aiming at my body, I yelled again. " Rock! ", instantly my body gained a hardened earthen armor. This would nullify electricity for sure. As the Crown had told me, the laws of physics did indeed apply here, but energy and thought projection were merely twisted in a unique way, allowing one to bend the rules using sheer willpower.

"We need reinforcements!" The enemy cowered behind their massive castle walls.

"Your walls will not avail you!" I aimed a hand at one of their trebuchets. " MISSILE! " An actual missile, created from my imagination, that resembled a Stinger missile from my own world, flew at the trebuchet. The person manning it leaped off the side, just in time as it erupted in a fiery blast.

The enemy was panicking. Amelia licked her lips, as her sword of darkness sliced through yet another foe. "Hero! The time is upon us! Use it!"

I lifted my sword, the mighty Excalibur! Aiming it towards the heavens I shouted again.

"METEOR!!!!"

From the cloudy sky that poured down rain, a massive rock suddenly appeared. Aimed at the castle under siege, it began a rapid descent. The clouds parted and the rain ceased as a beam of sunlight broke through, blinding the defenders.

"You think a puny rock will be the death of me?!" The mighty Devil Emperor, Satan, stood at the top of the castle. "Behold my unholy power!"

Making some admittedly fancy hand motions, he suddenly summoned a massive Earth Golem, towering above the battlefield, built from the stone bricks that made up the castle itself. His troops cheered as the Golem reared back, and punched upwards, just in time to smash into the descending meteor. I smiled. All according to plan.

The power of the impact shattered both of them into a million pieces, the debris rained down on the battlefield, rocks smashing into my troops and Satan's troops alike. Satan looked down and suddenly realized the mistake he'd made. The golem had been formed out of the mighty walls of the Necropolis. Now there gaped a titanic hole for my troops to pour through.

Aiming my hands at my feet, I yelled again. " Agility! " Before Satan could get his bearings, I leaped into the sky, aiming my trajectory right at the Devil himself. "This will be your end, Devil!"

Sheating my sword in midair, I pulled my hands behind my body, and began to chant.

" Kaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaaa-meeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeee... "

Satan shook with fear. "Who is this Hero that he could break through my defenses so easily?!" Many of his demonic generals nearby begin to edge away from him in fear as they realized I was aiming at him.

" HAAAAAAAAA-MEEEEEEEEEEEEEE- "

Satan screamed in terror. "Protect me!!!"

Instead, his troops fled. None could defend against this attack. Many threw themselves from the walls to the grounds below, killing themselves in fright.

"-HAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA!!!!"

I rose out of bed with a start. Damnit. That was a good dream.

Part 043:

I rolled out of bed and gave a slow yawn, glancing out the window at the darkness. "That didn't feel like a dream."

It felt so real. I could have sworn that I was really there, fighting Satan the Devil in the darkest towers of Hell.

It felt so real...

I contemplated the dream. Was it really a dream? I'd never experienced something so vivid. And more interestingly, everything that happened in the dream seemed plausible. Like, it could really happen.

Other parts still bugged me though. Amelia had wielded a massive dark sword. I already knew her aura was pitch black, but the sword itself was so black that it had to have been made or summoned by her aura. It's the only thing that made sense.

And what about my attacks? I felt like all of them were plausible. Except... maybe the missile.

Amelia was sleeping in another room of Bahamut's former castle, so I decided to take some quiet time to myself. I want to test some things.

Walking down the hall, Hoarhiim appeared in my mind. "What are you up to this late at night, Hero?"

He called me Hero. Not the Child of Gaia. Had I gained a new title, or a new name? Was it related to the events of yesterday? The people of the city had cheered loudly that I was a Hero, and since then everyone simply calls me Hero. It would seem that my original name has disappeared. Nobody has called me the Child of Gaia even once since that incident.

"I'm thinking about a great many things, Hoarhiim." I responded to him a few seconds after he had asked me. "Hoarhiim, do you remember what you called me when we first met?"

Hoarhiim looked confused. "Of course I do. I have a perfect memory, I called you the Hero, the Chosen One."

Now I am confused. Was my 'name' somehow overwritten in the minds of this world's denizens? Not only that, but what a crazy name! Hero. That sounded ominous. I'm not even that powerful compared to others in this world. Shoot, even Amelia is more powerful than I am.

Or is she? It's as Hoarhiim told me once, it doesn't matter if you have a lot of power if you can't use it well. Naturally Amelia can use her power well, she's definitely not a young child. I don't know how old she is, and it would be rude to ask, but based on the ages of other citizens I've met, she's probably hundreds of years old. Something about this place seems to make people that live here age slowly. I'm literally an infant compared to everyone else I've met.

That alone means I need to not only be more careful, but get some training in. Now that I have a safe place to train, I should stay here for a while and get some work done.

"Hoarhiim, what do you know about my powers?"

He seemed thoughtful for a minute, thinking as I walked towards a small, quiet room deep in the palace. Hoarhiim lit the way as I walked, so the darkness didn't cause me any trouble.

"Well... you're certainly unusual. Nobody has responded to my spiritual energy quite like you have." Hoarhiim halted, as if he was unsure of what to say. Nevertheless, I had an idea of what to try next.

Finding myself a spot on the hard tiled floor in a small, quiet room. I set Hoarhiim on the ground in front of me for light. "I'm going to try something new."

I'd never done this before, but if my dream was any indication, I may have the possibility inside me.

Holding my palm upwards, aimed nowhere in particular, but facing the ceiling, I chanted.

" Spoon. "

I was only partially surprised to see a spoon appear in my hands. It looked just like the spoons in the silverware set my aunt had given me for christmas a few years before I entered the Cryopod. I tried bending it, and found that it was surprisingly sturdy.

"How did you do that?" Hoarhiim eyed the spoon in my hand. "That looks like a solid object. Is its energy going to dissipate?"

I shook my head. "I don't think so. I think I've just discovered something incredibly useful."

I once again held my hand up.

" Spoon. "

This time, I visualized a wooden cooking spoon. In my minds eye, I pictured myself making spaghetti and meatballs with it. It was the kind of wooden spoon you'd use for cooking.

And I was not surprised to see it appear in my hand. It would seem that it's not just the word, but intent, and a mental image of mine that shapes the effect of the spell.

Of course, Hoarhiim was linked to my mind, so he was processing things as I did them and reading my thoughts as well.

"Incredible. You're forming solid objects out of spiritual energy. Such a thing shouldn't be possible. For example, if you wanted to form a sword, you could, but it would be dependant on your spiritual energy reserves and would drain you as you used it. Also, it would be made of energy, nothing corporeal."

I nodded. Actually, he had given me an idea.

Without raising my hand this time, I stared at an empty spot on the ground.

" Longsword "

Imagining the sword in my dreams from last night, I pictured a sword made out of titanium, with a fancy golden hilt, and a ruby inset in that hilt.

And poof, there it appeared. Up until now, I had always used my hand to cast spells, but it seems that I didn't have to do that at all.

I picked the sword up as I stood. Brushing myself off, I spotted a pillar in the room. I swung the sword at it, and the sword bounced off with a TWANG! The sword also wobbled a little bit at the center of the blade.

Hmm. I set the sword back on the ground, and stared at it.

" Strengthen! "

The sword did not seem to noticeably change. I picked it up, and swung at the pillar of stone once more. This time, the sword cut slightly into it and got stuck. I pulled hard and managed to pull it out.

Hoarhiim quietly eyed what I was doing with interest. In thousands of years, he'd never seen anything like this. But that's because he wasn't from my time or world or wherever I came from. He wasn't familiar with the concept of scientific engineering, nor building things from your imagination.

I turned again to the sword. " Sharpen! "

I picked it up, and swung at the pillar. This time, I sliced right through the pillar as if it didn't exist. The pillar shifted slightly and luckily didn't make the roof cave in and collapse on top of me. Whew, I still need to be more careful.

Perfect. I have an idea.

Part 044: Dellfingler

Heh heh heh... they can't laugh at me anymore. I'm a goddamn genius.

I stifled a bout of maniacal laughter in my mind. It was so brilliant it wounded me. I could create anything using my magical powers. I wasn't just different, I was a walking cheat code.

I aimed my hand at the sword. It wasn't necessary anymore, but I still preferred to do it. It helped with the mental imagery.

" Sentience "

To be honest, I didn't know what to expect, but I had to try it.

Nothing happened. I stared at the sword on the ground. Damn. I guess even I have limits. I'm not a God, it would appear.

I reached for the sword. The moment I touched it... the sword screamed.

"HEY! GET YOUR GRUBBY MITTS OFF ME!"

I nearly jumped out of my skin, and found my body scrambling away in fright towards the other side of the room. Holy shit! It worked! I hadn't imagined anything specific when I cast the spell, only that I wanted to somehow make the sword 'alive'.

"Oh great. Thanks a lot. You created me with life, you left me lying here NAKED on the cold floor, and now you're scared of me. What a piece of shit." The sword was cursing at me. What the hell.

"Uh... I didn't actually, expect that to work." I walked back over and sat down with the Sword in front of me. "Do you, I guess, have a name?"

The sword coughed. Where was its voice coming from? "Heck yeah buddy, my name's Dellfingler! Don't you forget it!" I guess he was already over his anger from earlier.

Huh, it had a name.

"Okay, so I gave you life, what now? Got any special abilities?"

The sword didn't even hesitate. "No."

I frowned. "Nothing badass, like Soul Ignition, or Mind Meld, or shooting out a spiritual energy blade when I swing?"

"No."

"Well okay, then what DO you do that a normal sword doesn't?"

The sword's response felt like it was shrugging its shoulders. It didn't even have shoulders. "Nothing. I can talk though!"

Fantastic, the power to annoy my enemies while I cut them down.

As I considered these things, Amelia walked in the room. Huh, she wasn't asleep? How did she find me? Blaarjiim must truly be the Lord of Darkness.

Amelia must have caught the tail end of our conversation. "Oh wow! You found a sword that can talk! That's so cool!" I mean, I didn't find the sword per se, but she's dense so I'll let it slide.

She immediately grabbed Dellfingler up and he didn't offer a trace of verbal resistance. I see how it is.

When she lifted him up, I noticed something disturbing. The Ruby that was inset into the hilt, it had something resembling a pupil moving around inside it. I was instantly reminded of Sauron.

"Oh wow! I can see! Thank you so much, my beautiful queen!"

The voice appeared to be coming out of the ruby. Audible thought projection? She hopped up and down with glee.

"Did you hear that? Did you hear that, Hero? He called me a queen! What excellent manners he has to recognize my beauty and superior royal aura!" She fluffed her hair back haughtily and struck a pose with the sword. "This does it! I'm keeping this sword for my own!"

I shrugged. I could always make another one. And to be honest, a talking sword would get pretty annoying.

Thinking about my options, I wondered to myself if another option might be possible.

I looked at the ground again. I imagined something incredible. There's no way this thing could exist normally, but maybe here it could...

Gathering my power, I spoke one word.

"Lightsaber."

Part 045: Jedi

I stared at the ground. Nothing was there.

Focusing my mind again, I pictured it once again. The switch to flip, the spot for energy to blast out the tip, the handheld size of just under 9 inches long.

" Lightsaber. "

...Nothing appeared. Damnit! Was it because Lightsaber is actually two words? It's written as one though! Maybe my powers don't count words like that? That's stupid! Or maybe it's because there's no actual way to examine how it works. Lightsabers are fictional weapons, and they have never been successfully created.

Amelia stared at me. "What... what are you doing?"

I frowned hard and kept staring at the ground. "I'm trying to create a really awesome weapon, but it's not working."

"Ah." She seemed bored. She was swinging Dellfingler around, having a jolly good time talking with it. Apparently Dellfingler was really into fashion, something I'd never expect for a sentient sword.

I stared at the ground more intently. Alright, if a Lightsaber isn't appearing, let's try something else.

" Rifle. "

And lo and behold! A lever action rifle appeared in front of me! I had no clue what model it was as I'm not actually a gun enthusiast, but this was a start. I picked it up and jumped to my feet. Aiming it towards the empty side of the room, I fired at the wall.

Nothing happened.

Well, duh, stupid. It doesn't have ammo. Except, I couldn't visualize how to spawn ammo. I only vaguely know how guns work. I never really studied them before I came here. I know there's a trigger, some kind of lever pops in, hits the backside of the bullet which is filled with gunpowder, and a spark or something ignites the bullet, propelling it forwards into the body of my foes.

And then I realized. I could create anything I desired, but only if I had exact knowledge of what I wanted to do. It wasn't actually as much of a cheat code as I'd thought. I can't just invent things unless I have an understanding of the physics that go into its use. Simple implements like swords and spoons are okay, but complex mechanical parts would be tricky or outright impossible.

Damn, there goes my lifelong dream of being a Jedi. I jokingly mused that I even had Force Push and Pull at my disposal.

Wait, I suddenly had one hell of a thought spring to mind.

I turned to Amelia. "Hey, can you do me a favor?"

Amelia stopped chatting with Dellfingler. "Huh? What do you want? I'm busy."

Sitting back down on the floor, I stared at the ground again.

" Bow. "

A small shortbow appeared. Bows were easy. They were bent wood with a string. It didn't look like the cool ones I'd seen in professional Archery matches on TV, but it was serviceable for what I needed.

" Arrow "

An arrow appeared. I cast this spell a few more times and then summoned a quiver.

"Amelia, have you ever shot a bow and arrow before?" Standing up, I held the bow and a single arrow in my hand and drew them in a half cocked position, aiming them away from both of us and down at the floor. Safety first!

Amelia shook her head. "No. What is that strange implement anyway?" Walking over a bit closer to me, she eyed it up and down. "What does that even do? It looks weird."

Strange. I had thought maybe she'd never fired a bow and arrow before, but she appeared to have not even heard of them before. Maybe it's been millions of years since people needed anything but magic for attacks.

I demonstrated for her how to fire it. Taking aim at a makeshift target I had spawned, I fired and it stuck somewhere near the top of it.

She nodded. "Alright. Seems easy enough. What do you want me to do though?"

I handed the bow to her. "Easy. I want you to shoot at me, and I'm going to stop it in midair." Like a Jedi, I thought to myself. Oh man, this is going to be cool as shit.

Running over on the opposite side of the room, I got into position directly across from her. Gathering my energy around me, I cast a spell I remembered from my dream.

" Barrier! "

A barrier appeared around my body. It appeared to hover a few inches from my skin in every possible direction around me. Just in case something went wrong, this would protect me from a dangerous mishap. Safety first! I'm not making the same mistake as I made last time, this time there would be precautions taken.

" Perception."

In my mind, I imagined myself perceiving time slowing down, the ability to think more quickly, so that I could see things coming before they happened. This was easy. When she fired the arrow, I was going to cast 'Deflect' and knock it out of the air, just like a Jedi would. Oh man, this is too easy.

"Alright Amelia, fire at me, but for this first shot, try not to hit me, just aim for the side of me. I don't want to accidentally fail and get shot."

Not that it really matters. This is her first time ever shooting a bow. She's probably going to miss completely and try a few more times before she can even hit me.

"Okay!" She shouted cheerfully. She looked so cute with that bow and arrow in her hand and the sword at her waist, like a little female Robin Hood.

She pulled the bow up and took aim. Her stance though... she looked like a seasoned professional. "Are you sure you've never fired an arrow before?"

"Nope!" I have a baaaad feeling about this, I found myself thinking.

I willed time to slow down. My speed perception of things increased a hundredfold, I noticed a fly buzzing around the room slowly, as if it were swimming through honey in the air. Amelia's breathing was imperceptible.

I raised my hand up, realizing my actual speed was not increased, so my hand seemed to take a whole minute to raise. Shit, I should have boosted my speed first. "Wait Ame-"

And then she fired.

BOOM!

An arrow was instantly buried right in my gut, then it passed through me, and smashed through three layers of walls behind me. WHAM, WHAM, WHAM!

I whipped my head back around to see a colossal pile of devastation behind me. And then I suddenly realized there was a massive fucking hole in my abdomen.

I turned back right as the pain hit me, staggering forwards. Amelia looked totally unconcerned. She shrugged as our eyes met.

"Oops."

Part 046: Regret

It's been a month now.

A month ago, I made a mistake. It nearly cost me my life. I underestimated Fate.

I thought of myself as invincible. " I am a walking cheat code ", that was how I thought. But I was wrong. I'm not a cheat code. I'm not invincible. I'm not a genius.

I was lying in Bahamut's bed, her sacred throne room she had spent millennia or eons perfecting. It was exquisite, rich golden tapestries hung from the ceiling, the bed itself had beautiful golden pillars, there were paintings from artists I'd never heard of that dazzled the imagination. Depictions of heaven, hell, possibly even Earth. The floor was a perfectly carved marble, all the pieces meshed together as if they had never been cut at all.

And I hated the sight of all of it.

For an entire month, I've laid in this bed.

I cannot move from it. I cannot leave from it.

When Amelia struck me with the arrow, she was wholly unconcerned. Oops. It was a harmless gag. She had healing magic. It hurt like hell, but even I wasn't completely worried. This was a world of magic. I've had all the bones in my body broken and shattered before and I've been healed from that in hours. In fact, I've had it happen twice.

But not this time. Her shot was powerful, insanely powerful. It shredded my spine into a million pieces. My spine effectively evaporated. I couldn't even move my arms without monumental effort, but my legs were completely lifeless.

For an entire month, I've laid here in this bed. What was I thinking? A hero? I'm nothing. I don't have the power to save anyone, I can't even save myself.

Minutes turned into hours and hours turned into days, which became weeks, which became a month. The world soldiers on, but I lie here crippled, a broken husk.

Amelia has come in quietly to check on me and talk with me, but she's not full of energy. She's completely forlorn. I can't believe I'm saying this, but I think she feels guilty. And she probably should. But the look of guilt when she sees me in the bed... I just want to end it all. I can't stand seeing her like that. I can't stand seeing myself like this.

Is there no hope? Is there any way to save myself? Nothing comes to mind. Perhaps I will have to live the rest of my life as an invalid.

The worst part is, I'm so fucking tired of eating this chicken.

Part 047: Resolve

I'm tired of this. I'm so tired of this hell.

Three months now. I'm getting weaker and weaker. Amelia barely even visits anymore. Servants bring me food (always chicken) and water and attend to my needs. I may be crippled badly but I'm still a hero to these people.

What the hell is wrong with me? These people depended on me. I gave them salvation and immediately became a cripple. Talk about being a flash in the pan hero.

Frustration was building. Damnit! I can't stand being like this. I'd rather be dead! But then again, the thought that dying might send me to that lake of fire and acid didn't exactly fuel my excitement.

I pondered and thought, and pondered some more.

Come on, there HAS to be a way to fix this. I'm in a world that defies human imagination. I'm in a world where I can summon swords and create sentient beings with a single word. There's no way this condition isn't a temporary one.

Yeah! That's it! There has to be a way out of this! I've been in worse predicaments! Even if it takes time, I've got all the time in the world! I practically live in a giant safe room!

Thoughts crossed my mind. Physical therapy? Maybe doing small exercises daily would help me recuperate. I remember a famous actor, Christopher Reeves, he was completely paralyzed after an accident involving a horse that threw him off, and while he did eventually die years later, he had been able to move his body to a decent extent after years of therapy.

But... even though I may have all the time in the world, that didn't mean I had to do it that way. There were literally thousands of people with magic that could help me.

Shit, this is hurting my head to think about. Maybe there's some way I can think more clearly.

Oh right, the Crown of Solomon. Duh. I really am still an idiot.

I had left the Crown on a desk nearby, but in my condition two feet might as well have been two solar systems away. I rang my bell nearby and called out for one of my servants. "Phoebe! Phoebe! Are you there?"

She came around the corner. She was an older looking woman, maybe in her 40's, at least looks-wise. Actual age-wise, who knew? She could be 20 million years old for all I know. Her hair was a bouncy blonde, with natural curls going all the way down. She had a small scar on her right cheek that she insisted was from a dog, but I wasn't so sure.

She walked into my room, smoothing down her maid outfit to preserve her modesty. "Ah, Great Hero, how may I be of service to you today?"

"Would you mind grabbing the Crown off the desk for me? I need to do some thinking." I beckoned with my eyes at it.

"Are you sure, Great Hero? You said it was hurting your head when you wore it in bed." She seemed concerned for my well being. It was very touching.

"Yes, it will be quite all right, it's only for a short while."

She nodded quickly. "Of course! Anything for you, oh Great One!" She walked over to the desk quickly and plucked it off, admiring it for a second before handing it to me. "Such a beautiful thing. I can see why you like it. Would you like me to put it on your head?"

I nodded. "Yes, that would be great. Thank you, Phoebe."

"Not at all! Anything for you!" She quickly pulled it back out of my hands and set it on my head gently. "Will there be anything else?"

I didn't hear what she had just said. Suddenly, my mind was racing. The instant she placed the Crown on my head, my brain started thinking at the speed of light. I had forgotten what a rush wearing the crown was. Wearing it for such a prolonged period of time must have dulled how overwhelming it was to me. It's like having a cut on your arm. When it's fresh, you feel the pain. After a while, the pain diminishes, and soon you won't notice it at all unless you think about it consciously or poke the wound.

Thinking about my condition, a million possibilities came to my mind. Magic, treatment, cure, fix, heal, words came at me faster and faster.

Suddenly I jerked my head up and stared straight at Phoebe.

"Say, Phoebe, do you recall where I put those two extra rings of mine?"

Part 048: Choice

I stared at the two rings cupped gently in my hand.

Phoebe had left me alone with them, as I requested. She was really a sweet lady, a great servant, and a good friend. She had been there for me more than anyone else. When the phantom pains hit and I was crying and writhing in agony, she always held my hand.

If I ever got out of this bed, I'd make sure she was well off before I continued my adventure. She deserved that much.

The rings in my hand silently clinked together and rolled apart, then they clinked together again as I rolled them around slowly.

Which ring should I use first? Would they even do anything?

I stared long and hard at them.

Raphael, the Wisdom King. Michael, the Divine King. These had to be beings of awe inspiring power. If they could not heal me, who could?

But would they? Did I deserve to be healed?

Doubt took hold. Why would they heal me, a lowly human, posing as some fanciful hero? I only have the powers that I do because of luck. I was lucky to find Hoarhiim. I was lucky to find the Crown. I was lucky that Amelia wasn't a cursed demon that wanted to eat me. I was lucky that she could heal my broken body. I was lucky that the riddle was the sphinx's riddle. I was lucky to have survived this long in the first place.

I have no real skills. All I have is luck. If I were an RPG character, all my other stats would be 0, my Luck would be infinite. What have I done to deserve being healed? Nothing. That was the answer. Absolutely nothing.

But... if I were to be healed. I should no longer be an arrogant fool. I should think my actions through more carefully. I should focus on helping others for the sake of helping them, not to focus on my own gain.

I nudged my finger towards one of the two rings. Raphael. Give me the wisdom to make the right decisions.

Part 049: Raphael

I braced myself for the feeling of falling, and then I slipped the ring on my finger.

As usual, I was surprised yet again.

The world around me darkened noticeably. The daylight (Of which I still couldn't figure out where exactly it came from) vanished, and darkness took over my vision. Suddenly I was in a world of black.

And then, things cleared up. Above me, I saw a starry sky. Trees were all over around me. I found myself seated on a log, sitting a few feet from a cozy fire. I lifted my hands up and felt the warmth from the fire.

Was this an illusion? I blinked twice. It seemed so real. I could feel my body again. I was sitting upright without any support. It felt somehow exhilarating. Had I already been healed? This was probably just an illusion.

Suddenly, I realized I was not alone. Across from me, an old man sat quietly, on the opposite side of the fire.

For a minute, the silence increased. I felt the urge to speak, since he didn't appear to want to.

"Are... you Raphael?" I asked slowly, almost not sure if I should break the silence.

The old man stared stonily at the fire, his hands held up to keep warm. The chilly night air was bitter cold, but it felt good to me who had been cooped up indoors for so long.

He was an interesting looking fellow. He would seem to be a hundred years old, by his appearance. His long beard flowed beneath him, mottled by years he had spent not combing it. It lightly touched the ground thanks to his hunched position. His hair was grey and thinning. He wore a robe that covered most of his body, though his face was fully visible.

Unsure if he had not heard me, I tried again. "Ah, sir... could you perhaps be the Archangel Raphael?"

Sir. I may have just called a heavenly divine being 'Sir'. What the hell is wrong with me? I'm so inept at conversing with other people. This is what I get for spending my last three years in the past as a shut-in, watching TV and playing video games.

The old man slowly raised his gaze to meet mine. "...And what if I am? What would you do? What would you ask of me?"

I was taken aback by his questions. What would I do? I don't know. I just wanted... to talk. He was the great Archangel of Wisdom. Perhaps he could help me.

Then I suddenly felt embarrassed. Really, me? I'm going to just bug a great heavenly being with inane questions about myself? I just want to bother him so he can heal my broken back? I'm still only thinking of myself. Why did I even do this? I only came here for myself. I'm full of selfishness and greediness. I shouldn't have come here.

I reached for my finger, intending to take off Raphael's ring, but it wasn't there.

The old man, perhaps reading my thoughts, spoke again. "So full of doubt and self loathing. I have met many like you." He lowered his eyes, and again stared into the fire. I could almost believe I saw visions in his ancient eyes. Visions of wars fought, friends lost, companions slain. The man had lost family and friends, wives and children, he had lost everything and in the end, he had failed them all.

I was silent. I didn't have anything to say.

"Everyone has doubt. They always ask what could have been. They always ask 'what if'. They always want to know what the right choices are to make." The old man, spoke, as he stared into the fire. "Many have sought my counsel. They call me 'wise'. I am not wise, I am simply ancient. I have seen a great many things and lived a great many lives."

He rose up slowly, his hand resting on a mottled old cane as he lifted himself to his full height. He was not particularly tall, in fact, he seemed to be nearly the same height as myself.

"Wisdom is not gained through counsel or words. Wisdom is not gained through questions and answers. Wisdom, if such a thing truly exists, can only be cultivated through deeds, both honorable and dishonorable."

He hobbled slowly around the fire towards me. When he reached me, I gazed up into his eyes.

He leaned down to me and pressed a hand upon my shoulder.

"You do not need my counsel. I can only give you words and concepts. The solution to your problem lies within yourself. All you have to do, is look for it."

Suddenly, I felt a great energy emanating from his hand that was placed on my shoulder.

"Go now, Hero. Do what must be done. When I next see you, it will be I who asks the questions, not ye."

And with that, the world around me dissipated. The old man faded away, as did the night sky and the stars, and I found myself once again laying in my bed.

I stared at the ceiling in wonder. It all meant something grand, and incredible.

But now I knew what had to be done.

Taking the final ring, I placed my finger inside it.

Michael.

Part 050: Michael

A lush field of green as far as the eye could see. I sat at the bottom of a gently sloping hill, covered in grass and flowers. All around me was flatland, with trees and mountains in the distance. The sun gently beat upon my chest, as the scent of daffodils wafted in the wind.

I looked around me. I saw rabbits, and deer, and other such creatures frolicking in the meadows. A distance away, there was a stream with fish bobbing for flies and bugs. The scene was serene and somber.

As I stared to my side at the stream, something blotted out the rising sun out of the corner of my vision, I looked up and gasped as I saw a great maned lion appear on the top of the hill. A fearsome creature, he dwarfed me with his size, standing nearly ten feet tall and fifteen feet long. His massive hulking muscles showed he possessed the body of a true predator. Atop his head he wore a golden crown, far more glamorous than my own Crown of Solomon.

"Could you be... Michael?" I spoke aloud, directing my question at the lion. In the Bible, I remembered that Michael the Archangel was often described as a mighty Lion. This had to be him.

The lion seemed to not even notice my presence. His mighty gaze stared off into the distance, far behind me, as if searching for a new prey. I did not even register his interest.

Suddenly, I felt a presence beside me. Looking up and to my left, I saw a man, clothed all in white robes. A shortly cropped, neatly clipped beard covered his face, and the color was the same as his neck-length hair, pure black. Wearing a crown of thorns, and carrying a massive cross on his back as blood dripped from his head, the man seemed to be in great need of help.

"Why have you come to me?" the man asked, his voice decidedly neutral considering the strain placed on his body by the heavy wooden structure. "Have you come to pity me, as my friends and enemies alike have done?"

I stared at the wooden cross, it was a sturdy thing, made of solid oak with splinters sticking out here and there, surely digging into his back and arms.

I lowered my gaze to the ground in front of me. "How could I pity you? You were willing to make the ultimate sacrifice to save humanity. You were willing to do whatever it took to spread your word to the furthest reaches of the world. I cannot pity one who was a true Hero when the time was needed."

The man spoke softly. "But I knew that in death, I would receive the greatest reward, a throne at the side of my Father. Knowing that my death would cost me nothing, could I still be called a Hero?"

He pulled back and threw his cross to the side. It smashed into the grass with a soft "Whump". I raised my eyes to follow his path. Walking towards the top of the hill, he pulled off his white garment to reveal a muscular body, beaten and bruised with whips and clubs.

"Yes, you were a true Hero. Despite knowing you would be rewarded greatly for your deeds, you still suffered greatly as well. I do not know that if I were in your position that I could have gone through with it, even with such a divine reward at the end of the journey." I smiled as he walked up the hill and climbed astride the great Lion.

"You are not so different from me. I was merely a carpenter's son who wished to heal the world. To stop the lies and create the truth, I would have done anything." He raised his eyes to the sky, admiring a cloud that passed overhead.

The lion slowly stirred, and walked down the hill towards me, the man safely straddling it without using his grip. "The most important thing that I discovered during my journey was this: My reward was not my uplifting to the heavens. My greatest reward was that I was able to give a pathway for humanity to heal."

Reaching the bottom of the grassy knoll, he pointed his finger at me.

"Go and be healed, my child. When the time comes, I trust that you will make the right choice, and someday you will be able to respect yourself. Not as a Hero, but as a Hero King."

A bright light came out of his fingertip. It was blinding, brighter than a million suns. I screamed wordlessly as a terrible pain overtook my entire body. My vision became white hot as the world around me burned away. The agony I felt was worse than anything the Hell I had lived in for the last several months could possibly do to me.

And then I awoke. I was in my bed, I could feel my arms and legs once again. I felt a small joy creep into my chest as my heart leaped for joy.

But something was wrong. All around me, everything was black. I felt my face. Something felt wrong. I blinked hard, over and over, but the pitch blackness would not go away.

I was... blind?

Part 051:

I couldn't believe my eyes! It was a miracle!

I walked back into the room to check on the Hero's needs and was flabbergasted to see him standing in the corner of the room, staring out the window. Standing! He was healed! The greatest mages in the city, his own power, and the great Lord of Flies herself had lacked the ability to heal him, yet there he stood.

Rushing over to him, I stood a few feet away and called out his name.

"Hero! Great Hero! It's a miracle, you're walking!" I looked him up and down. He was not very tall, and his body had atrophied from being denied movement thanks to his condition for the last few months, yet here he stood, more filled with life than I had seen since I first met him.

From behind him, I saw a small gentle smile tighten across his the side of his face as he gazed out the window. "Ah, Phoebe. Is that you?"

I felt a small bit of confusion. "Yes, Great Hero. It is I. Do you not remember me?"

He slowly turned around and his eyes mindlessly wandered all over the room, failing to set themselves on my figure. They were a cloudy white color, searching everything but finding nothing. "Ah... well, it's just so... hard to comprehend my thoughts right now. Indescribable, really."

"Your... your eyes... what happened...?" I swallowed as I looked into the Hero's empty eyes.

"Phoebe. I can't see you right now. As a condition for my healing, or perhaps it was because I needed to make a willful sacrifice, the one who healed me made me blind. Perhaps, by making me blind, he wanted me to see things as they really are." Hero nodded slowly. "Yes, that must be it. This was no accident, nor is it a curse. Rather, this is something I must accept and learn to live with."

I was flabbergasted. "W-what?! Someone had the power to heal you but after doing so they... they struck you with a curse?! How could you accept this?! If you hold for but a short while, I shall fetch the Lord of Flies, curing blindness is a snap compared to healing your spine!" I started to turn for the door.

"Wait. Don't go." Hero held up his hand, indicating the 'halt' sign. "Do not do that. This is not a curse. In fact, I consider this a blessing."

Hero put his hand down and slowly walked over to his bed, fumbling for handholds along the way, missing the bottom corner of the bed with his foot by mere centimeters. Finding a handhold, he slowly sat down on the bed and stared at the ground. I walked over and took a seat next to him.

"If you won't heal your eyesight, then what will you do?"

A simple question. How could the Hero be a savior of the people if he was still a cripple who could not walk anywhere without a cane to search out the path in front of him?

"This blindness allows me to see many things I could not see before. It also allows me to close out things I did not want to see. I no longer see the River of Sheol, as an example."

I felt a shudder go down my spine. The River of Sheol. He had told me about it. A hellish river where the souls of the damned go to forever live and writhe in the worst agony possible. A place I should never like to go.

Hero cracked a huge grin suddenly and rose quickly to his feet. "However, I do not need to see with my eyes to see the destiny laid out in front of me. I know what must be done."

Raising his hand forwards, he spoke a single word.

" Detect. "

Part 052:

At first, nothing happened.

Then, the world of black started to turn into a foggy white. All around me, near and far, I was able to make out the outlines of various objects, walls, and things moving around. They were hazy and indistinct, yet somehow more vivid than I remembered from my normal vision.

A rat scurried by me and almost by instinct, I jerked away from it, only to realize that it was inside the confines of the wall, scurrying around. This meant that I could see through walls, in a way.

I pondered this. The last time I had used Detect, I was only able to see red dots that indicated life forms. Now, I could see far more detail, not just for the life forms, but also the things surrounding me. If I concentrated, I could even 'will' my mind to spatially travel to another area for recon or surveillance.

What had caused the difference though? It was hard to pin down. I had put more energy into it this time, for sure. But I also had needed to detect a lot more than I did the first time I cast it, so perhaps my mental image of what I needed to detect was different. And finally, with my vision gone, perhaps my need for higher levels of detection was important.

Phoebe stared at me. "What did you just do, Hero?"

I walked around the room, kicking things out of the way as I tested depth perception and other things. My head was unmoving, as I did not see anything with my eyes, but with my entire mind. In a way, it's like whatever room I was in, my mind filled up the room and allowed me to see everything around me in a complete sphere.

"I guess you could say that I can see again."

Phoebe seemed delighted. "That's wonderful! You truly are a genius magician! I shall fetch us some celebratory tea at once!" She jumped up and left the room with a hop and a skip in her step.

I smiled wryly. I'm no genius, I simply now understand what I have to do, and I won't let anything get in my way.

Walking over to a dresser nearby, I sensed the immense spiritual presence of Hoarhiim. With my new vision, I saw him as a miniature sun, blinding with his immense spiritual energy. He seemed brighter than before, if that was even possible. He was sitting in a basket with cloth and other such things in it. Phoebe had put him in the basket to keep him 'comfortable' even though he felt no physical sensations.

It's been three months since the accident, and at the moment I was impacted by that arrow, he had ceased to speak. I had heard nothing from him whatsoever. Blaarjiim had mentioned that it may be 'spiritual trauma' due to our shared mind-link and the overwhelming pain I had felt, but I was not sure.

I wrapped Hoarhiim up in a specially made belt that one of the many attendants in the palace had crafted for me. I nestled snugly on my waist without shaking around.

Phoebe came back in the room with some tea and we sat down at a small nearby table with two seats.

After sipping and thinking quietly for a while, Phoebe also drinking quietly, probably not wanting to interrupt my thoughts, I broke the silence.

"Phoebe, have you seen Amelia recently?"

Phoebe perked up and then instantly calmed back down again. "Oh, ah, I didn't have the chance to tell you yet. She and Kar, they both went out together."

I frowned as I sipped. "Out? Like uh, on a... date?"

Phoebe seemed confused. "I don't know what a date is, but they left the City of Bahamut and re-entered the labyrinth two days ago. I didn't want to tell you because you might be..." She tilted her head away and let her words drift off. Ah, she didn't tell me because she didn't want to depress me any further. It made sense. Until recently I was withering away in that bed. It was almost a crime that Phoebe treated me as well as she did. I couldn't have been much of a conversationalist.

Other thoughts entered my mind. Hoarhiim had been silent for three months, even now he seemed to be not responding to me. Amelia and Kar were gone, along with Blaarjiim. The party that had grown so big was split up and at least temporarily disbanded.

Yet, I felt a new emotion coursing through my veins. I couldn't quite describe it, but I guess 'Drive' would be the word. I felt a drive to start improving my body, to start improving my mind, to perfect my spiritual power until I was a worthy hero.

After finishing my tea, I stood up. "Thank you, that was excellent as usual."

"It was my pleasure!" Phoebe beamed a big wide smile at me.

Taking the cups and some other nearby dishes from an earlier meal, Phoebe exited the room quietly to go and clean them up. I paced back and forth slowly, finding myself drawn to the nearby window.

I could feel heat on my body, but I couldn't see the sun outside. I was blind, and yet could see with new clarity. I could count the blades of grass in the field outside mentally in an instant. Had something else changed recently? Was I simply finally able to use the full power of the Crown of Solomon, or might this be due to a hidden power that Raphael had given me?

Opening up the window, I hopped over one in a single swoop and landed on the ground stiffly. Walking over to the grass I sat in a meditative position.

It's time to train.

Part 053: Journey

Today is a great day!!!

I mean, it's ALWAYS a great day, but today I just feel especially great! I don't have to hang around that sulking sad kid who thinks he's the shit. No way, no sir!

I patted my dress down and hopped and skipped as I walked. Kar and I had hung out for a while, but he's a total snooze so he went back home to his people. Now it's just me, Blaarjiim, and all the innocent souls I'm going to devour! Teehee!

I entered a room filled with all sorts of pretty lights, with a delightful stream of blood that was splashing out of one wall, crossing the path in front of me, and draining itself through a crack in the bottom of the adjacent wall. Dipping my fingers in it, I licked them. Mmm! Yummy!

"I see you're having a good time, as you always are, my queen." Blaarjiim piped up, probably getting jealous that I was licking the tasty blood and he couldn't enjoy it.

"Hey! You could have had some if you hadn't sealed yourself in that stupid orb!" I chided him, holding him in my left hand and wagging my right hand's finger at him.

"I had to do that. You already know why." His voice sounded kinda sad. Oh well, he can't actually be sad or anything, he lacks all emotion!

After a while, I hopped and skipped along until I came to the big door I had been looking for. "Oh wow, we're already here! This is great!"

"Of course, my queen. Your speed is only eclipsed by your beauty and grace." Aww, he's so sweet! For a Lord of Darkness, he sure is such a softie!

With a light tap, I gently nudged the door open, sending it careening through the air, smashing into the open field. "Hey guys, it's me! The Lord of Flies!"

Suddenly, screams were everywhere. All the humans tending to their farms and crops suddenly tossed their tools on the ground and started fleeing in terror.

"She's here! The dark witch is here!!! Call the Hunters, call the guards! DAMNIT call anybody!!!" A poor unfortunate man was screaming such nasty things about me. For his information, I'm a dark QUEEN, thank you very much!

In a flash I zipped over to him and popped off his head, my mouth enlarging big enough to quickly chew his bones into dust. I'm pretty sure he died before he even knew what hit him XD

A lady and her child were cowering in terror, their tender looking bodies quivering in fear. "Foul demon! Why must you appear and plague us? What have we done to offend you?!"

I actually had to think about it for a second. "Blaarjiim, did they do anything to upset me?"

He seemed disinterested. "No, my queen. They simply fill you up with souls."

I nodded giddily. "That's right! They make the yummys in my tummies!"

Popping over to the two of them, I quickly and gruesomely devoured every last piece of their bodies before they even had a chance to react! Gosh, this is so much more fun than waiting around with that pansy-ass little loser! I thought he'd be something cool and maybe put up a good fight but he couldn't take even ONE slightly serious attack! What a weakling.

As I watched the people run away from me, I stared back at the door that was swung open in that wide field. Nothing surrounded it, it had kind of just poofed into thin air.

"I just love getting some fresh air and exercise!" I yelled with glee, as I launched myself at another group of nearby snacks.

Part 054: Athelticism

Forty-seven... forty-eight... forty-nine... fifty!

I gasped for breath as I heaved my chest in and out. Training is not fun. I'd never really trained or worked out in my life. I always just kind of 'existed' when it came to my body's health.

Since I arrived in the Labyrinth, I've never taken my body seriously. I kept getting handed spiritual power for free by everyone under the sun, and soon grew haughty because I imagined I was a God. I am not, I am simply a normal everyday man with some lucky, unique, cool abilities.

With that in mind, in order to become a true warrior, I must first master the body so that I can master the mind.

I train now, every day before sunrise. I still am mystified by where the sun comes from, and the room I'm in seems to have no end. No matter how I look at it, it can't be a tiny bubble on my Mental Map. Interestingly, this room itself never seems to move, but outside hallways occasionally shift and meet the main door that leads out into the labyrinth.

And also...

As I did my third lap around the castle, I still felt it. When I first arrived in this hell, I felt as though I was being watched. I still feel it. No matter where I go, with my new Detection and Perception abilities, I can definitely feel a gaze trained on me at all minutes and hours of the day. It never stops. I feel it acutely, yet it comes from nowhere.

Who is watching me? Why do they watch? Is it perhaps a game they're playing? Am I a contestant in some strange game they play with new arrivals? Perhaps this is all the work of a great god or demon, they created this hell just to amuse themselves.

I do not know, but someday I will find out.

After my tenth lap, I stopped completely and fell to the ground. The exhaustion was unbearable. This castle was huge, and running around it took 5 minutes each time. I had managed to run nonstop around it all the time, thanks to casting "Stamina!" on myself, but it almost felt like cheating. For sure I'd have dropped before making the first lap without it.

But I don't consider it cheating. I'm simply using my spiritual abilities to enhance my natural ones.

Interestingly, unlike other magic users, my magical effects do not fade over time. If I cast "Enhance" on something, the enhancement is permanent. It doesn't feed off my energy continuously as it would another person's, and it never fades away.

Every morning, when I wake up, I enhance my body as much as possible while still leaving a spiritual energy reserve that allows me to run and do my exercises. I have enhanced myself a dozen times in different areas of the body already. Thanks to some effect of Wisdom King Raphael or perhaps the Crown of Solomon coupled with my perception ability, I can speed up and slow down my perception of time and my body movements at will, and the effect is quite amazing if I don't say so myself.

Still, I'm not getting cocky. I need a weapon and some fantastic armor would make my inevitable voyage back into the maze more sustainable. I could probably just live here in the old territory of Bahamut (Recently renamed to Hero City by its residents!), but I feel restless. These people are living normal lives after their awful entrapment for god knows how long, but I refuse to. I have a purpose and a mission.

Sighing deeply while lying on the grass, I wonder to myself what I should do next. Once I've finished training to a decent extent, what should my next move be?

Meh, I'll think about it when I get there.

Part 055: Nemesis

"Confidence levels are down 15% since he arrived, and Umi is predicting that if we don't take care of the situation, it'll be a big mess on our hands." Beleth handed out papers to the other demons at the table and then went back to her seat quickly.

Bael sneered. "You're kidding. Initial reports by Beelzebub indicated he's no threat at all. We have nothing to fear. It's hard to even call him a whelp."

Beelzebub quietly smiled his usual barely noticeable edged grin. "I was there, I spoke to him. He's no threat yet, but given time he could be... problematic."

Beleth shifted in her seat. "I'm not saying he is or isn't, I'm merely giving Umi's report. When has she ever been wrong? We got to where we are now because of her. Can't we at least discuss this seriously?"

"Why are we even worrying? The combined power of the Lord of Darkness and the Lord of Flies is more than enough to stop any so-called 'Hero' that may appear. We've squashed dozens in just the last millennium. And even if he got dangerous, it'd hardly take more than a couple Dukes to put him out of his misery." Bael threw his hands up in exasperation. "You fools always do this. Every time a hero appears, you act as if the labyrinth will collapse in a week if we don't put the situation to rest. I'm getting bored. We do more paperwork and tap our fingers more to pass the time than we get to have fun."

A few other board members nodded their heads. Bael was an off-the-cuff speaker, but as one of the top 7 Demon Kings, his word held some sway.

President Ose cleared her throat. "Ahem! Well I certainly worry about it, even if the men here are all gung-ho to go out and fight. I can certainly understand the feeling but let's not do anything to jeopardize our... finances." Her otherwise sweet smile she had up to that point turned into a deadly venomous glare as she aimed it at Bael. He glanced away uncomfortably and zipped his mouth shut. President Ose was in charge of the money, and just so long as nothing disrupted the flow of it, everything was fine in her book.

Diablo stared down the table. As the director and the Third ranking of the three emperors, he held the most power at the table. Of course, one had to have both money, political favor, and raw power to ascend to his level, but even so he was unmatched in all three categories except for the other two emperors above him. "Quiet down, Ose. Nobody is going to do anything rash."

To Beelzebub, he directed his next question. "What do you know of the Hero? I want specifics. Details."

Beelzebub sat calmly, his eyes betraying no emotions. "He has a unique power, which of itself is worrying. His power is weak, but if he gets smart, he could be as much trouble as Joan was. Our best defense is the fact that he's rather... unintelligent.... and he doesn't realize what he possesses."

"Yes, but it's wishful thinking to assume he won't ever figure it out." Beleth indicated the blank monitor at the other end of the room, behind herself at the end of the table, where everyone could see the screen.

She turned the screen on to startling video. Bael immediately reacted, as she knew he would. "You can't be serious. Did the Lord of Flies help him out here?"

Beleth slowly shook her head. "No. He did this all by himself."

Beelzebub's eyes narrowed. "When was this video recorded? When I last saw him, he did not have that much power. Nowhere close."

Beleth indicated the timestamp at the bottom right of the screen. "Five months ago. It was a totally one-sided victory."

Beelzebub, rarely one to show his emotions, suddenly appeared confused. "That cannot be correct. I saw him 5 months ago. His power must have increased overnight. How is such a scale of magnitude possible?"

"Ah. Well, it would seem that he was in possession of one of the rings of the Archangels at this point." Beleth nodded knowingly as a murmur went around the table.

Diablo clenched his fist under the table. "That settles it. Contact the Lord of Flies. She witnessed his power, she can handle him as he is right now. We can't risk another Joan on our hands."

"Ah, about that..." President Ose roused herself back into the conversation once again, a finger playing with her long hair. "Dark Queen Amelia said that she refuses to fight him until he's a challenge. She told me she's... busy."

A universal light shrug went around the table. The feeling of 'ah, it can't be helped' was palpable in the air. "That's fine. Honestly, despite what I just saw, Amelia has good judgement. If he gets stronger, we'll just leave it to her." Diablo waved his hand at Beleth and she turned off the gruesome video. They might be demons, but even they have a limit.

Bael finally spoke again, after being silenced by Beleth earlier. "Ah, Director, if I may, I do have one small request."

Diablo nodded. "Go on, King Bael. Let's hear it."

Bael used his willpower to suppress even a small sadistic smile from appearing. "Might I be allowed to send just one of my lower ranked men? Someone disposable... just to test the Hero..."

Beleth smiled. That Bael... always up to something.

Part 056: Hunted

I made a chopping motion with my hand. Half of my squad split up to circle around the building. "We'll cut him off here." I whispered to my three subordinates.

Sneaking around slowly, at the exact moment we had prepared for, all 6 of us jumped out at the same time, aiming into the alley. The Hero wasn't there.

Shit. How did he escape us? He's so much faster now than he was only a few days ago.

"Above us!" one of the men gave a yell and quickly fired an arrow at the Hero. The Hero moved so fast that it startled me. My eyes could barely even track him. Jumping from rooftop to rooftop, he evaded us easily by getting out of our line of sight.

"Hunter squad two, he's on the roof. Send the birds up there." I spoke into my magic crystal communication device, it had a medium range but could pass through anything, even solid brick and dirt.

"Affirmative." Three men jumped out from behind a nearby shop and quickly climbed up the side of the building, jumping from spot to spot as they climbed. Their agility always impressed me.

"Hero is on the move. Shoot to kill, don't hold back." I raced down the street with my men, following behind the Tracker, an expert trained to follow the magical path of any enemy he has attached a spiritual anchor to.

The tracker's eyes were aimed at the top of the roofs, but suddenly his gaze dropped to street level. "He's on the ground again."

"Damn, he's fast. Already two blocks away." I grimaced. He's making this really hard on us.

"Captain Adams, should we set the dogs on him?" My right flanker directed the question at me.

"Negative. The dogs won't be able to catch him, and they're too valuable to risk. We'll do this ourselves." We kept running after the Hero. He wasn't moving forwards very fast. Perhaps he was toying with us.

Suddenly, one of my men gave a yelp, and was yanked into a back alley. What the hell?! "Johnson! Johnson!" We halted our chase to race back into the alley. Johnson was gone, there was no sign of him.

"Shit. Captain, bad news. There's three signals now. They're all in different directions."

What the fuck? Three signals? "How is that possible? Tracker A, Tracker B, can you both confirm?" Tracker A nodded. Tracker B confirmed over the radio.

I turned to Phoebe. Wearing her light armor, she was small and slender. You almost wouldn't even notice she was there. "How is this possible? How can there be three signals?"

"He made clones of himself. Be careful, the clones will be half as powerful as he is, but you know how strong he is." Phoebe confirmed my fears. He is so hard to pin down now.

We rushed down another main street, passing many citizens who were alarmed by our military gear, and the sight of soldiers racing down the streets in the middle of day.

"Keep following the original signal, but keep your eyes out for the clones. I don't want another sneak attack. We can't afford to lose anyone else."

Part 057:

"Goddamn it, he's in the sewers now. He's a slippery little..." The Tracker trailed off before he could finish his sentence with an expletive.

"No, this is good." Phoebe chimed in. "There aren't many entrances to the sewer, and his mobility will be drastically cut down. We can cut him off in there."

I nodded. "It's a sound plan. Put Watchmen at each sewer entrance. Once we go in, erect force fields around the- wait."

I paused. A thought came to me. "Shit, this isn't going to work. He can teleport, can't he?"

Phoebe paused, frustration crossing over her face. "You're right. I forgot. That was my error."

I grimaced but it was a light one. "Don't worry about it. Everyone makes mistakes. Besides, we can erect an anti-spatial-travel field above the sewers."

Phoebe nodded as relief filled her face. "Ah, yes, thank you. I had forgotten."

It was new technology, but Hero City had become a bustling capital of economic growth ever since he freed us from Bahamut. And thanks to all the people who had challenged Bahamut in the past, wittingly or unwittingly, this city had an unusual amount of strong humans and demons in it. They made for great soldiers. Even a small lithe woman like Phoebe was not to be underestimated. Of course, her most valuable asset was intel on the Hero himself, after months spent at his side.

We headed down into the sewers. While we could have climbed down the ladders and entered slowly, we needed all the speed we could get in case of a surprise attack. Ordinarily I would have sent troopers in first, but this time I took the lead.

Leaping into the manhole feet first, I splashed down into the smelly cavern with a soft thud. A small stream of liquids, composed of God-only-knows-what ran past my feet. It was only an inch or two deep so thankfully my boots weren't waterlogged with... debris.

"Where the hell are you hiding..." I muttered to myself. My squad dropped down behind me. "Leave Tracker B on the street, but keep him covered. We'll follow the main host, you guys watch out for those damned clones."

It was dark in the sewers. Very dark. I could barely see anything. Activating my helmet gem, a weird reddish light filled the pathway in front of me.

We were at a disadvantage. Hero didn't use his eyes, he hadn't had actual sight for months. Phoebe had explained to me that he possessed a practically impregnable 360 degree spherical field of view around his body now though, thanks to an ability set he had crafted over the last few months. To call him a formidable foe was dangerous. He wasn't just formidable, he was downright terrifying.

We walked down the pathways, shining our lights left and right, checking each path as Tracker A led us towards him.

"...He's coming this way." Tracker A suddenly halted. Then he jerked backwards. "He's coming fast."

"Get behind me." I whispered this and quickly pulled the Tracker to the back. Seconds passed. Sweat trickled down my back. The long path ahead of us continued for a while, with a left path opening up halfway down.

And then suddenly, I spotted something that chilled my blood. Pure white eyes appeared at the end of the hall. My light didn't illuminate as far down as I would have liked, but the lights were as bright as a signal flare in the darkness.

Hero cocked his head, as if listening for our movements. And then he charged.

Part 058:

"Fire at will! Mark, neutralize him!"

Mark was our squad's capturing expert. Casting a quick spell, he managed to send a spiritual energy net at Hero. Hero tore through it in no time, but it gave just a slight enough pause that two of our men managed to fire sleeping darts at him. The darts struck and Hero noticeably slowed down.

And then suddenly he was here, fighting with an unusual ferocity compared to the last few times we had encountered him, he smashed Mark to the ground, probably breaking some bones. Before he could turn to me, I plunged a knife into his shoulder. He howled with anger as he threw me off him, thought his power was noticeably weaker than expected. And then suddenly, he staggered and fell to the ground, face first.

Phoebe grimaced. "Damn. We were tricked. Hoarhiim isn't here."

I realized my mistake instantly. "Goddamn it, you're right. That's why I only saw his eyes glowing. There was no way to miss him coming if the Orb had been at his side, it would have lit up the entire corridor for sure."

I rushed over to Mark. "Mark! Are you okay? We'll patch you up, son, just hold on."

Mark had an incredibly pained expression. "Ah.... my collarbone... he... he..."

"Quiet down, I get the picture. Phoebe!"

Phoebe rushed over and started casting some low level healing magic. She wasn't a particularly good mage, but for something like this, she could at least relieve the pain. We'd have to heal Mark more thoroughly later.

"Get back outside! Hurry! The other squads are in danger!"

Rushing back to the entrance, I left Mark in the tunnel with one other person. It wasn't safe to go to the surface with an injured man.

When I finally climbed up to the top of the sewers, I was suddenly very suspicious. "Where's Tracker B? He's supposed to be up here?"

Tracker A looked around. With Mark and another squad member in the tunnels, it was only Tracker A, Phoebe, and myself in the area. "I can't believe I'm saying this, but there's nobody else around."

What. "You can't be serious? No other squad members? Where did everyone go?"

Tracker A turned at looked me right in the eyes. "No sir, you don't understand. I don't sense any other life in the area."

Part 059:

I stared down at the town below me. It was almost comical how easy I found training nowadays.

I watched as captain Adams gave out orders, splitting his squad off, following me into the sewers, and thinking he had me pinned.

I could have almost been amazed at the Tracker's ability to follow three of me at once, but there's just one problem. All three of them were my clones.

I had simply erased my presence completely with a powerful chant of the "Hide!" spell. Setting my clones to "autonomous", they were mindless machines. They had my intelligence, but not my personality. I could experience everything in real-time and if they died, I gained all their knowledge.

While Adams was traipsing around in the sewers, chasing after one of my clones, I sent the other two off to pick off the rest of the squad. By casting "Jammer" I had sealed off their communication and prevented them from speaking with each other. Had he simply tried radioing back, he would have immediately detected the jamming. Adams still has much to learn.

And now, he was comically caught in my 'Illusion' spell, thinking that he and his squad were somehow the only people in the city. Get real! I'm pretty strong now, but not THAT strong! I just altered their perception of the world so that all life appeared to be gone.

Look at him, sweating and panting, he has no clue what's going on. Is he even learning? I try something new every time we have a training exercise, but at this rate I'm doing all the teaching and none of the learning. This is supposed to be for my benefit!

Teleporting myself down to the battlefield, I appear right in front of the squad. My Illusion magic is so effective though that they don't even see me there.

"Watch out..." whispered Adams. "He could be anywhere."

Yeah, I sure can! Like, maybe, right in front of you!

Walking right up to him and putting my face about two inches from his, I quietly cast a spell.

"Release."

Suddenly, I appear in front of Adams, and he screams in fright and drops to the ground. "Sweet saint Joseph, you scared the daylights out of me, Hero!"

I laughed. "Ha ha ha! You were only following my afterimage the whole time. Are you even trying to learn?"

Adams lowered his head. "Ah, sorry, I guess I really am still just a novice. Compared to your incredible power... I just can't help..." his voice dropped off. Shit, now I feel guilty.

"Calm down, captain. Lemme go heal Mark real quick, and we can get a drink, all right?"

"All right." He seemed to be relieved that we were off the subject. Whatever, I'll talk to him later, see if maybe I can spruce up those leadership juices. Right now, he's the best candidate to run this place when I leave, but I can't leave him as the leader if he doesn't know how to watch over the people with power and caring.

Jumping down the ladder into the sewers, I walk over to Mark and the other soldier.

"Joseph, good to see you. Let me heal Mark now."

Joseph nodded and stepped aside. I grabbed onto him and Mark and teleported ourselves to the surface. There, I healed Mark back to perfect in seconds.

"Alright lads, let's go and get something to drink. It was a good run today."

Part 060:

I felt a little annoyed, when I saw the condition Mark was in. It was easily fixed of course, and yes the simulated combat should feel real enough to draw out every squad member's latent potential, but still. My clone was very vicious, I thought I told it not to kill anyone? This technically wasn't killing but the power put into its punch could have done more than break a collarbone, if it hit the wrong spot.

No use worrying about it. A few hours after we went out for drinks, I was back in the castle, sitting by myself in my now official royal bedroom.

My hand rested on the pouch holding Hoarhiim. Still no word from him. Why was he dormant? Was there anything I could do for him? Perhaps not. Maybe, given time, he will revive himself. I still sensed his spiritual life so he wasn't dead...

Again, no point worrying about it. I came here to probe inside the powers of the Crown of Solomon as I had done for many weeks now. It's been 7 months since I entered this labyrinth, and only a couple of those were spent greatly increasing my abilities, yet I already felt incredibly powerful. I'm probably strong enough that there's nobody in Hero City who can be my match.

I thought about Hero City. It was truly massive. It was at least 50 miles in diameter, with over 40 million people packed inside it, living here and there. There were some spaces for parks and tree groves, but overall the composition of the place was that it had a lot of citizens in it. All of these people had challenged Bahamut to answer her riddle and failed. The thought still boggled my mind.

But even more interesting, this city looped. If you walked far enough in any direction, you would eventually arrive back at your original destination. To be honest, the whole thing reminded me of a tiny planet or something.

There was only one entrance/exit to the Labyrinth, that was the door I had entered through. When I had first seen it, it seemed impossibly big and heavy. What was the point of a door of that size anyway? But now I understood. It was not only to keep the people inside stuck so they couldn't leave, but also to keep unwanted enemies out. This was a human city, and even when it was filled with humans turned into monsters, it was still quite a bit weaker than the enemies in the labyrinth outside. Now that people had reverted to their original forms, only people who were originally Heroes or especially strong could be considered strong enough to combat the demons from Hell. And even then, if they couldn't handle me... well... yeah.

I had stationed a small rotating platoon at the front door... just in case. Now that I was planning to move on, it was a matter of arranging the details so that my work would be completed without me. The Castle was almost self autonomous at this point, the servants there had already developed a hierarchy within that seemed to work well enough. It was already becoming a typical rabble-house of people clamoring for power over one another, trying to rule as kings and dukes and such. Sad, really. Humanity was very predictable once we gathered in large enough groups.

But very soon, I would take my leave, and they would be left to their own devices. Will anarchy ensue? Who can know.

The only things left to attend to were my own personal matters. I had decided to leave Phoebe here. I planned to instate her as the co-ruler. She would make for a kind and compassionate counterpart to Captain Adams' strong-handed and gruff approach. The two would balance each other out. And who knows, perhaps later on, a romance? Ah, I'm getting a little too conniving for my own good. I should stop playing God and focus on myself.

The door awaited. Soon, I would heed its invitation and make my way back into the dark pits of Hell.

Part 061:

The legends were true. We had all but forgotten the horrors of those dark times, more than a thousand years ago. We told bedtime stories to our children about the Great Monster of the past that devoured little kids who didn't do as mom and dad said, but it was all in jest to give them a fright.

But those stories about the Dark Witch... they were true. She had returned.

I slouched in my chair at the Great Hall. As king of Trandor, the largest and mightiest city in the world of Valenzi, I held much power in my grasp. Seven of my ten finest generals were present and briefing me on the current situation. The other three... well, they had already perished awful, indescribable deaths.

"Her rampage continues unchecked." Roland, the highest ranked general pointed to a spot on the map, indicating her last known position, as he concluded his remarks. "The death count is... is... it's in the ah, thousands."

An oppressive aura hung over the room. Our greatest champion, the mightiest of the 10 generals, had met her in hand-to-hand combat. He fought admirably, but in the end, she had shown she was merely toying with him. There was nothing left of his remains that we could identify. How courteous of her to allow a messenger to flee to deliver news. She must have planned for it to sow terror among us.

Gradius spoke next. "I just can't fathom... she eats and she eats, and yet she never has her fill. How can such a small... how can she not tire of the chase..." His words could have almost sounded a joke, but his expression was ashen. He had lost his wife to the evil monster.

I reached over and placed my hand on his back. I could do no better to comfort him. There was no comfort for the living. "General Gradius... you will have your chance at revenge. We must... we must find a countermeasure to her. When the time comes, I will let you strike the final blow."

General Heifl hesitantly spoke, probably to counter my statement. "Ah, King Brand, that won't be- I mean to say... it's not that we don't have any, but we should certainly not seem to have the, ah, ability to fight her..." He trailed off, nervously swallowing as he looked away from my gaze.

I stared at the large map that took up the great table in front of me. Red dots of varying sizes marked the estimated death tolls in areas she had struck, as well as giving an idea of her warpath's direction.

"She appears to be... heading this way." I stated the obvious, as her path was only slightly curved away from us, likely to aim at varying population centers along the route.

"Why has she returned? The lady Joan appeared, according to legend, and told us that she had stopped the Dark Witch's rampage by sealing her in a prison. How had she escaped?" Roland spoke his thoughts out loud, not actually asking anyone in particular.

Lafone, another of my top generals, shrugged. "Who knows? She likely had help from some evil entity."

I nodded. Only a monster of true evil would have freed such a demonic being. What else could have freed her, knowing the hell she had put our people through?

Roland spoke again. "More interestingly, a survivor from the initial village, terrified though she was, gave an eyewitness testimony regarding the appearance of the Dark Witch."

I perked up. "Oh? And what did she speak of?"

"Ah, well, it was rather bizarre. She said that out of nowhere, a large doorway appeared in the middle of her village's wheat field, and a door flew through the air, crushing several people. She survived by crawling under the door and hiding from the Witch's line of sight." Roland shook his head. It sounded absurd. A door that appeared out of nowhere? The woman must have gone mad after seeing the demon go on a rampage.

I stared at the map. It was a long shot. A very long shot. But maybe... just maybe...

"Sir Roland. You are our second mightiest fighter that is left in the capital. Gradius will stay here to evacuate our people. I want you to take an elite squadron and circle around the long route to that door. If it still exists, enter it. This may be our last hope. There exists no champion among our people that can save us now."

My hands were trembling with fear. I hid them under the table. Roland may be our second mightiest fighter, but he was our top general. Losing his battle instincts and ability to command would surely guarantee our world a loss if we should face that demon in the capital. But he was also our only hope if he had to enter whatever place she came from. He alone was the only one I could trust to make it out and come back in one piece.

Roland slowly nodded, as he bit his lip. I was surely sending him to his death. Even so, he also knew that no matter what, if he stayed here, he would surely perish by the Dark Witch's hand.

"Agreed. I would rather chance a slim hope of finding a way to defeat the Dark Witch than simply wait for death to take me."

Roland rose, and pointed to Todoro, the lowest ranked general at the table. "Todoro, you will come with me. Your speed is unmatched. You can run faster than the fastest horse and you do it without tiring. If I should perish, you must return and deliver news of whatever is within that door."

Todoro nodded vigorously. To be granted such an important mission, it might be our last chance to save our people.

I rose, and following me, so did all of the other generals.

"Excellent. We will await your return with bated breath." I turned to Lafone. "General Lafone. It pains me to ask this of you. I want you to... to... evacuate the capital city, and prepare a caravan. We must flee the Dark Witch. She may destroy our city, but I shall not allow her to murder my citizens."

Lafone nodded. "Your will, my hand."

Part 062: Roland

I've always considered myself a warrior. A mighty man. A man with nerves of steel.

Yet here I am, cautiously entering a magical doorway into the heavens only knows what evil place. My sword is held firmly in my two hands, yet my hands are sweating and my knees are slightly shaking.

Before we even entered, we could see inside the doorway. A dark, foreboding hallway presented itself. Cautiously walking around the backside of the door, we were stunned to see that the door vanished from view if seen from the rear. I reached my hand through it from the visible side, and it passed through effortlessly. No spell was placed to forbid entry.

What if this was her plan? Maybe she left the door open so that her minions she had left behind would devour anyone who entered. The thought of some demon jumping out and devouring me was making my usual confidence crumble. I left two troopers of the ten I had brought with me behind to guard the doorway at our world's side. Wherever this led to, if the way closed, they would at least be able to ride back and inform the king of what had happened.

Cautious. That's how I would describe myself. I was famed as the world's greatest military leader, having commanded many famous recent battles, including the battle of One Thousand Terrors, where we successfully defended against a large group of irregular monsters, the majority of which were Orcs. I had only taken the safest possible route to victory, however, as I always did. By placing my men's lives as the highest priority, we always fought long battles of attrition and wore the enemy out, then surged to a final major counterattack and seized victory. It had won me over a dozen medals in many different conflicts. At 40 years of age though, I was beginning to tire of the military lifestyle.

"General Todoro... if we should survive this expedition and somehow beat back or defeat the Dark Witch... remind me to permanently retire."

Todoro smirked. "As if. You can play the worrywart, but your heart will always lie on the field of battle."

I nodded apprehensively. It would seem that I may never escape the hells of war.

Entering the doorway with my 7 soldiers and General Todoro, we were immediately struck by the smell of the place. It smelled like dirt, but very bloody and death-filled dirt. I ran my hand along the closest wall. It was indeed a very smooth earthen texture. Where the devil have we found ourselves?

Todoro held his torch up as we walked. We couldn't see far ahead. The blinding light of our world was growing distant behind us. The hallway had many paths that veered off to the right and the left, but as we had no idea where we were going, we simply kept following the main path, however it turned and twisted. Soon, the doorway to our world was out of sight, and out of mind.

Some time passed, as we silently walked forward, making the least possible noise that we could. There was shockingly little life here. We spotted one rat at some point, which had made a noise in the dark and made my heart skip a beat as terror nearly seized me. Truly, the highest ranking general of Trandor, getting bloodshot eyes over a fist-sized rat... what had the kingdom come to?

Finally, we entered a small room. This room had ominous blue-colored torches lit in its four corners. For some reason, it had a two benches that faced a table in the center of the room, and three other paths that branched forwards, left, and right. Counting the direction that we had just came from, that made four paths.

Curiously, only one of the paths was through a door. It was a small wooden door, off to our right. The other paths were open, though we could not see far down either way.

Cautiously entering the room, one of our troopers carefully stepped around, checking for traps. Finding none, we warily rested our weary bodies on the benches, though we sat facing away from the table, towards the various pathways where an ambush could come from.

"This is truly an evil place." Todoro quietly spoke, breaking the unspoken rule of silence we had maintained all the way to this point. "Nothing lives here, yet somehow that demon came from this world. What place is this to have spawned such an evil child?"

I slowly shook my head, while facing the doorway we had come from. "I know nothing. I am as clueless as you are. This place is truly a nest for demons."

One of the men suddenly sat up straight. His entire body went stiff as he cocked his head listening for something. All of us sensed his movement and immediately stiffened, a couple of the soldiers silently rose to their feet, bodies alert.

Seconds passed. I slowly glanced at the soldier. "What do you hear, Peter?"

His voice was trembling when he replied. "I... I... I think I hear... footsteps. In the distance."

He suddenly turned towards the door. "From... there." He slowly raised a trembling hand towards the door.

We all listened carefully. At first, I heard nothing. But then again, Peter had incredible hearing. He would not lie about such a thing. I trusted his judgement about this. All of us quickly and silently stood up, facing the door. I kept peeking behind us at the open hallways. "If something evil comes through that door. We must flee from the direction we came. Do I make myself clear?" I whispered urgently at the others. Peter was shaking with an incredible fear.

"G-general... there are a lot of f-footsteps coming."

Finally, I heard it. Click-clack, click-clack, like the sound of bones scraping on metal.

BOOM!

The door shook as something slammed into it.

BOOM!

Whatever it was, it was trying to break through!

"RUN!" I yelled, as my men and I fled out the exit we had entered through. From behind us, the sounds of the door crashing onto the ground made a resounding boom in the distance as we fled further back into the tunnels whence we came.

And more ominously, we only heard the sound of those dreadful footsteps. They were following us, and they were running fast.

Part 063: Chase

Gasping for breath, we ran faster than we'd ever ran before. I sent Todoro ahead of us, since he could run tirelessly faster than any other man I'd ever met. Being blessed by the Wind God as a child had been of great benefit in his life.

As my men and I fled we were shocked to see Todoro run back towards us after a couple minutes as he rejoined our small troop and started running in step with us.

"Bad news, Roland. I can't believe I'm saying this but the way up ahead is different from the way we entered."

I cursed under my breath. "Damn... we must have entered the wrong path in our haste! Then we must make a stand here in this small corridor. If we get surrounded we will surely die."

Todoro shook his head. "No, General, you misunderstand. This is the correct path. I believe that this place somehow changed and the walls have moved or something."

I suddenly felt unnerved. More so than I was before at least. We have a small army of... something chasing us in the distance, and it would appear that we've entered some cursed maze of shifting corridors and unknown dangers. Todoro was a brilliant general, not as famed as I am, but definitely quicker witted. He had won his engagements through rapid fire tactics to keep the enemy on their toes and overwhelmed until the very end. While I did boast a 90% survival rate of my troops, he boasted that all his major skirmishes had been completed in a day or less.

To hear Todoro say that this place was somehow shifting... it made no sense, but neither did a doorway appearing out of thin air. "Prepare for combat, we'll keep moving and find a narrow space we can defend from more easily."

It's been 15 minutes, we went from a familiar set of twists and turns to a completely unknown set of twists and turns. The earthen walls are all starting to look the same. My men and I, except for Todoro, are beginning to get exhausted. At this rate, if we go on much longer, not only will we be forced to stop, when they catch up to us, we'll be too exhausted to fight properly.

"H-halt!" I gasped aloud, and the company slowed to a standstill. "This.... hah.... this is it. We will make our stand here."

The men nodded, as they wheezed and gasped. Todoro, bless his saintly soul, breathed evenly. "If they arrive before you've all regained your energy, I will try to slow them down, even if just for a moment. I swing my sword nearly as fast as I run, you know."

I nodded. He was a one-man army when it came to a fight against many weak opponents. His weakness was singular strong opponents like me. The problem is, we didn't know what was chasing us. If they were weak, he might just win by himself. But if they were strong...

"An admirable goal, but if all of us perish here, the King will never know what lies inside this maze. You must go on forward by yourself. My men and I..." I quickly gazed around at the faces of my soldiers. Defeat clung to the air, as they readied themselves to die. Peter had closed his eyes and was praying to our seven divine goddesses for courage, whispering his prayer quietly under his breath as he clasped his hands together.

"My men and I will hold them off. You must escape, Todoro. If this maze has an end, you are the only one who will find it on this day."

Todoro stared into my eyes. A debate raged on in his head. I had not stated this was an order. I outranked him and could surely order him if needed. But... even I did not truly wish to send a single man alone into this hell. If he was to go, it would be due to his own choice.

The sounds of footsteps once again grew loud behind us. Tears filled Todoro's eyes as he bit his lip. "General Roland. It... it has truly been an honor to serve under you." He grabbed my shoulder and gripped it fiercely. "Give them hell."

And with that, he ran down the corridor.

My eyes also filled with tears as I turned to face the monsters chasing us.

Part 064: Confrontation

I ran faster than I'd ever run in my life. The corridors were alien and unknown to me. The sounds of a fierce battle grew distant behind me, as I wiped away my tears.

If I ever survived this, I would never be able to forgive myself for leaving our most famed general behind to face those monsters alone. I could never allow myself to see the honor of medals or ceremonies ever again. When next I fought, it would only be to redeem myself for the tragic sin of leaving behind my commander and fleeing the field of battle.

Of course, I had been told to leave, but it was no order. It could hardly be called an excuse. I know nobody at home would blame me, but I would blame myself. I will always blame myself.

Running down the corridors, I began to feel a sense of hopelessness overwhelm me. I was only guessing which direction to go. Sometimes the path went up, sometimes it went down.

I slowed to a halt as I entered a rather large room. It had crumbled bits of marble and rock scattered on the ground, as the remnants of a smashed statue's remains had been littered everywhere. At my feet, there lay a great golden door. Unbelievable in its size and weight. If this was truly solid gold, it would have been worth a thousand treasures.

All around me, the signs of a battle fought long ago. Skeletons littered the ground, likely decayed and rotted from whatever distant past they had come from. Strangely though, none of these skeletons were wearing clothes. Had their remains been looted by whomever the victors were? I knew not.

Different paths opened up around me. Across from me, a large doorway, the doors themselves missing, sat ahead of me. I assumed that must be the place these incredible doors had once barred. Whatever had sent them flying, it must have been incredibly powerful.

To my right and left there were two other open pathways. I knew not which pathway, if any, would lead me to salvation or despair. It was hopeless. This maze grew only more consuming as I made my way down its paths. There could be no escape from this hell. I bitterly stifled my emotions as I realized I had left my General behind to die alone pointlessly. I might as well have died fighting alongside him, and died with honor.

I sat down on the steps and took a swig of my small ration of water. This was all I had left. To increase my speed, I had left much behind. I had no food, only a small bit of water, and no hope to escape this maze. If I was lucky, I would die to starvation and dehydration rather than the demons that infested this place.

As I sat there, I noticed something curious, out of the corner of my eyes. One of the skeletons, buried underneath the door, but sticking halfway out, it seemed to be moving. I immediately leaped to my feet in alarm. Shit! Of course, these were not the remains of humans! These were reanimated undead creatures, likely summoned by necrotic energies. My alarm slowly faded though as I realized the skeleton could only shift its weight a bit here and there. It slowly turned and cocked its head at me, and instead of trying to shift towards me, it seemed to be trying to get away.

The skeleton clawed at the ground, trying to pull itself free and head in the direction of the path to my right. As I pondered this, my heart suddenly stopped as I heard a voice from behind me. The voice was deep and gravelly, almost animalistic in tone.

"A human?"

My body began shaking and my breath slowed to almost a standstill as I slowly turned around to face the thing that had asked the question.

From behind me, in the distant darkness, I saw a demon. A silhouetted demon with two bright white glowing eyes.

Part 065:

The demon walked towards me slowly. I started to back up, but paused, realizing that I should not show fear in front of a singular monster.

As it drew closer to me and my torch, I slowly stopped shaking as I realized it was simply a muscular young man, perhaps 20 years of age. He had long blonde hair, it draped down past his shoulders. He wore a golden crown, and white armor that seemed to be made out of some fantastic metal I couldn't pinpoint. Strangely, despite being a resident of this hell, he wielded no weapon.

The young man walked towards me. I noticed that his bright white eyes, though possessing no pupils, seemed to be staring at the ground as he walked. "Lower your weapon. I mean you no harm."

I didn't really wish to comply, but something about the man screamed that I should not attempt to fight him, as not only was it pointless and I seemed sure to lose, but he did not seem to be my enemy. "Who are you?"

The man paused as he stared at the ground. "I am... just a traveler. I live in this labyrinth as I must now do so."

I nodded. The man had clearly seen battle. His armor, though pure white, was covered in various scratches, dents, and scuff marks. "It's good to see another face here. My name is General Todoro. It is good to meet you, traveler."

The man suddenly held up his hand at me. "Do not give out your name so easily in this place. Your true name can be used to curse and hex you by all manner of foul beasts."

I swallowed and nodded. "Of... of course, thank you for the warning. I shall be sure to heed it."

The traveler smiled. It was a thin, wispy smile, barely even there. One could confuse it for a slight curving of the lips. "It's been a long time since I saw another human. Almost a year, in fact. Why are you running around here? Do you have a death wish?"

I slowly shook my head as I gazed at the floor. "I come from a country, or a world, or... some place. I entered this maze with my companions, we had to find the source of the Dark Witch's power. She has killed many of my countrymen, and she threatens the existence of my people."

The man slowly nodded. "Dark Witch, you say? Could you describe her for me?"

"Yes. She wears a black dress, has a dark sword at her waist, and she carried a black orb in her left hand. She is small, one could almost confuse her for a small child if she were not such a ferocious demon. She has long black hair and wears a blood red ribbon in it." I described her appearance, and as I did, the traveler slowly stiffened.

"It can only be Amelia. Why is she attacking humans? So strange. I had not thought her to be one who would do such a thing. Where is she now?" He waved his hand in the air, making various motions, almost as if manipulating some invisible object.

I shook my head again. "I don't know. Wherever my kingdom is, she is there. I cannot find it. The path has changed too many times."

He nodded knowingly. "Yes. You are trapped in a shifting maze of shadows and deceit. Only one with a pure heart can lead the way." He smiled at me wryly. "Or, one with a map. I have such a thing."

I narrowed my eyes, feeling perplexed. "A map? How can one make such a thing? Would a map not be useless in a maze that changes shape?"

He nodded. "I have a special map, it's only visible to me and it shows me a great many things. I have used it to track prey, escape down hidden paths, and plot my way towards my eventual destination."

I nodded quickly. "I see! Very useful! And where might you be headed?"

His unseeing eyes slowly curved up towards me as he stared into my eyes. "I'm heading towards the bottom. The very bottom of these Pits of Sheol."

Part 066:

"Are you a mighty warrior?" I asked, tentatively.

"Not really. I'm less of a warrior, and more of a... magician." The man grinned as his eyes seemed to rove over his own body. "Not exactly a pure mage or anything, more of a hybrid." His smile widened even more as he chuckled at some joke that I did not understand.

"If... if you are strong, maybe you could help me. Help my people, I mean..." I struggled to find words. I honestly did not want to ask an outsider to fight that horrifying witch on behalf of my people. I might as well have asked him to hurl himself into a volcano.

The man shook his head. "I will not help you or your people. However, Amelia is someone I am familiar with. I will confront her for my own selfish reasons."

He paused, and cocked his head somewhat. "By the way, you mentioned companions. You said you left them behind. Where are they now?"

I glanced behind him. "Somewhere in the direction you came from. By now the path has surely changed... I don't think I could lead you back to them."

The traveler shook his head. "No, that won't be necessary. Give me a moment." His hands furiously manipulated the unseen map in front of him. "Ah, there appears to be a large mass of life forms in this direction." He pointed to the room at the right. What? To go back to my companions, we have to go forwards? This place is truly a labyrinth that cannot be solved.

He finished manipulating the map and started immediately walking towards the right pathway. Quickening his step, he suddenly paused, making me stumble forwards and halt to catch my balance. Looking down at the struggling skeleton, who was now frantically clawing at the ground, he smiled another wispy grin. "So, one of you still lived, eh?"

Raising his hand up, he aimed it at the skeleton. I leaped back in alarm, as he suddenly said "Explosion!"

BOOM, the ground underneath him and the skeleton evaporated, as debris flew all over the room. What the hell was that? He shot some kind of energy blast out of his hands. Was this why he didn't require a weapon? I had seen magic before, the most powerful mages in the land lived in the Kingdom's capital. However, they were a drop in the bucket compared to what I'd just seen from him. The most powerful wizard that had lived nearly 200 years ago, Archimedes, had been able, after a day of conjuration, to summon a windstorm that drove out barbarians from the lands they had invaded. When it was all said and done, that was his final great act, and he passed away due to exhaustion and spiritual overload.

And when it all came down to it, I now believed I am witnessing a man who could easily best Archimedes in a magic duel. He had cast his spell so fast and efficiently that I don't think it even affected him. Archimedes had always taken time to cast any spell of any large magnitude, and it always took a toll on him. He died at the young age of 35, but his body had aged like he was over a hundred. His skin had hung off his bones, drooping like butter scraped over too much bread.

As I followed the traveler down the pathway towards my comrades, I began to feel hope again. Yes, this one, he might be able to save us. If he fought the Dark Witch, he might just have the strength to put an end to her reign of terror.

He might even be hailed as a hero, just like the holy hero, Joan of Arc.

Part 067:

As we rounded corners, I found myself having doubts. Certainly, the man in front of me, leading the way, was strong. But was he strong enough?

We were going to be facing an unknown horde of enemies. They could be skeletons, orcs, I don't even know what! And it's two guys, just him and I! I know he's probably strong, but perhaps by following him, I've made a dreadful mistake.

And what about his eyes? Those inhuman, demonic glowing eyes. Any smart man would stay away from such a terrifying face, yet I'm about to trust he's just willing to save a random stranger and his comrades for no reason? There must be an ulterior motive.

"Hey, I have a question." I said, as we kept running forwards. I was impressed with his speed. He wasn't just keeping up with me, he surpassed me. I was having trouble keeping up with him.

"What's up?" The Traveler asked me, nonchalantly. What a strange manner of speaking.

"Ah, well, it's just... your eyes, how are they glowing like that?"

The man slowed down a little as he rested his hand on his face. While still running full speed, he was perfectly able to see somehow, even with his hands blocking his eyes. "Ah, well, that is due to a certain happening a year ago. It involved an old man and a lion."

I think he is fooling around with me. I decided not to inquire deeper.

"We're here." The man said, as we slowed to a halt and started slowly inching forwards to peer into a doorway.

At the end of the hall, signs of a fearsome battle that had taken place were everywhere. Bodies lay on the ground, all of which were from monsters. My chest was thumping hard as I visually scanned for human forms. I saw none.

"Perhaps they... they may have survived?" My question was less an inquiry and more a hope spoken aloud. Stepping over the carcass of a massive... beast... we continued onward slowly. I glanced back over my shoulder at the thing. It had a long trunk, resembling an elephant, but a mouth full of vicious looking sharp teeth, and dead red eyes. It was some kind of abomination.

Skeletons crowded the path as we pushed forwards. Some were still moving, and the Traveler easily put an end to those, though he used more quiet methods than that Explosion chant he had used earlier.

It still boggles my mind. Instant casting. Unheard of, nobody could do it instantly. Perhaps he was a warrior monk from a distant land, using some power of Ki or some other thing. I didn't know, but he was certainly interesting.

Suddenly the traveler halted, as did I. "Up ahead. Humans."

Hope blasted into my heart. I didn't know how he knew they were up there, but surely it was them. "How many?"

He paused for a second. "Seven. They're all dead."

My hope instantly vanished and was replaced with horror. "No... no... it can't be..."

Dashing forwards, I raced down the hall. I arrived at a junction where it ended at a wall, and a path going right and one going left. At the junction were 5 bodies. None of the 5 were Roland. But off to the side, just around the corner to the right... Roland and Peter lay.

"No... I can't... it was my fault..." I fell to my knees as tears formed. "I failed them... I failed them all..."

"Hold. This one, he's still breathing." The Traveler walked over to Peter. I leaped to my feet and dashed the few remaining feet and grabbed hold of Peter's hand. It was still warm. Blood covered his chest and body. His shoulder pads were ripped off, his arms dislocated. His head was gashed, bloodied, and bruised. Whatever had hit him, it had hit him hard.

And as for General Roland... he was in a gruesome state. It burned me with rage to see how the monsters had defiled his body. I dare not describe it with words, the sight was simply too horrifying. I only knew it was him because of the purple armor he wore and the emblem on his chest signifying his rank. His head was no longer attached, it was completely missing.

Turning back to Peter, I spoke quietly to him. "Peter... Peter... can you hear me?"

At first, nothing happened. Then blood drooled out of his mouth as he turned his head in my direction. "Ah... Todoro... you came back for us... have you saved... the others..." he wheezed as he spoke, the sound of a punctured lung. He likely had terrible internal bleeding.

I stared into his lifeless eyes. He could no longer see anything. But he could still speak. "Yes. Yes... I managed to save them. They are..." I turned back to look at the bodies behind me as tears welled up. "They are resting now. They are very tired from the fight..."

Peter smiled. It was a faint smile, one that showed he could no longer feel the immense pain plaguing his body. His brain had likely started shutting down. "Good... I'm glad you... you could make it back in time... but I won't be going with... you... tell m- tell my wife..."

He coughed quietly as more blood drooled out. The traveler stared unemotionally at him. Distantly. In the back of my mind, I thought to myself he sees a fellow human dying and feels no emotion, he is truly a heartless monster.

Peter was unable to finish his sentence. His strength was leaving him too quickly. "It... hurts... it... hurts... so dark..."

The traveler suddenly seemed to get a snarling expression on his face. "All right, I've had quite enough of this. I don't usually interfere, but I hate long goodbyes."

He reached his hand up and aimed it at Peter. I felt shock in my body as I realized what was coming. That's the exact same pose he used on the skeletons!

"NO!" I screamed as the traveler started to open his mouth.

"Heal!"

...Huh?

Part 068: Loss

Peter stared at the corpse of General Roland. "He was there for me the whole time. It was his sacrifice that let me be among the living now."

He slowly turned and his eyes glossed over as he saw the bodies of all his comrades. "Well... you were right. They are resting now. At least they will be at peace in the bosom of the 7 goddesses."

I nodded. "Can you tell us what happened?"

Peter grimaced as the memories came flooding back. "It was... overwhelming."

"General! They're coming!" Dmitri, the front guardsman, turned his square shield towards the horde of skeletons racing towards us. I pulled out my bow and arrow and started firing as fast as I could. My arrows barely seemed to be doing any damage though.

"No! Use a crushing weapon! Get a mace or use the flat side of your sword!" Roland cried out. I didn't know why he said this, but he spoke correctly. Rushing forwards, I started striking the skeletons on the head with the flat side of my sword, and their bones caved in like a knife cutting through a soft cake. But slashing them seemed to be ineffective.

Richard, our only magician, but a talented mage as it were, began casting an anti-undead spell. "Hold them off! I will prepare Searing Light!"

"Understood!" Screamed the four men holding off a horde of more than a hundred tightly packed skeleton warriors. I was among those men.

A full minute passed. "Richard!!! The spell! Is it ready?!" I screamed back at him, as I deflected another skeleton sword that I stopped inches from beheading me.

I somehow spared a quick glance back. Richard was panting with exhaustion as he prepared what was likely the most powerful spell of his life. I didn't expect a verbal answer, I just wanted to communicate how dire our situation was. Lucas had already taken a bad hit and Jeremiah had pulled him back and taken his spot. With Richard not only focused on his massive spell, but the fact that he would likely be too exhausted afterwards, Lucas was the likeliest to die first.

"Hang in there, soldier! Don't you dare die on me and leave that beautiful wife of yours alone with your son!" Roland roared at him as he charged and attacked a rather large looking orc that had shoved its way through the mass of enemies and thrown Dmitri and myself to the side. We quickly regained our footing and left the Orc to the General. He could handle it.

Suddenly from behind me, there was an insanely bright light, it blinded us temporarily which would ordinarily be a death sentence, but for the fact that it was designed to do far worse things to the enemies we were fighting.

"Unholy abominations, in the names of the seven goddesses, begone from this world!" Roared Richard, as he blasted a wave of light from his body. For a split second, he had looked so beautiful, one would be forgiven if they were to think of him as an angel.

The blast didn't just kill the undead, it obliterated them. Normally undead make no noise as they fight other than the sound of their bones or weapons hitting metal. But the instant the light hit them, they screamed a delightfully awful scream as whatever poor souls they may have had were evaporated and sent upwards to the goddesses.

And when my vision came back seconds later, the entire hallway was empty. The light had flashed forwards and kept going around the bends and twists for probably a mile around us in all directions. We were safe from the skeletons now.

Turning back around to face Richard as my chest heaved in and out, I watched as he collapsed to the ground. Damn, it took a worse toll on him than I expected. Without our resident bishop, we were on our own when it came to injuries. The General had already slain the orc, and was resting on the ground, sitting on his rump. "Godesses. That was insane. Richard, are you alright?"

Richard laid on the floor, his arms and legs unmoving. His breaths came in the form of ragged gasps. "Hahhhh... yes general, but I'll be- hahhhh I'll be of no use anymore... I need weeks of sleep to recover from... this..." and suddenly his eyes closed, and he was fast asleep. Magic took not just a physical and spiritual toll on him, but a mental toll as well. Casting that one spell to him was like staying awake for two weeks straight.

We quickly got up and dragged his sleeping body over to the wall and laid him there.

"Shit. Damn! Lucas is down too, and without Richard..." Dmitri cursed our luck as he held Lucas' dying body in his hands. "Stay with us! You're a great warrior! You won't die in this world of hell! You must return to your family!"

Lucas slowly shook his head as his eyes started to turn cold. "I never could beat you... in a fair match. This is your win..." and as he said that, his hands slowly dropped to his side and he gave a final sigh as the breath left his body.

Dmitri fought back tears valiantly. "No... I'd rather lose than win... if this is what winning means...!"

"General! M-more are coming!" Jeremiah, the person currently on lookout, rose to his full standing position from his kneeled resting position. Fatigue was evident.

"Curses! It's only been five minutes! We need more time!" I yelled angrily as the realization that another unwinnable fight was upon us hit me.

"Ready yourselves. If these skeletons want a fight, then as warriors of the 7 goddesses, we shall put an end to their miserable existences!" Roland gave a small rousing speech as we all staggered back towards the battlefield, leaving the bodies of our two comrades behind us.

But we were wrong. What came around that corner was no skeleton. It was a true monster.

Part 069: (͡° ͜ʖ ͡°)

It's been a good day.

I was able to kill seven filthy insects, I'm now hunting down the eighth one, and everything is going very well. Exactly according to my plans.

I inspected my Rolex. It was 12 o'clock on the dot, exactly as I'd planned.

My plans never failed. I may be 'just' a lowly lord, but I'm smarter than the rest of them. I wear only the finest clothes. I think only the finest thoughts. I am not just refined and elegant, I am perfect in every way. Compared to the demons who think they are above me, I am a perfect being.

Females? I have no time for them. Dainty little creatures that bicker and squabble. Oh how they love my presence. They would do anything to bear my children, but no demon is worth my time. The moment you trust a demon, they will stab you in the back. Of course, I'm no hypocrite. Anyone who trusts me will get knifed as well.

" Ah, my lord, it is an honor to sssserve under you. " The Anacondess spoke to me, as I knew she would. Lowly creatures of low intelligence always perform predictable actions. I knew that she couldn't keep her mouth shut for 5 minutes if she thought she could curry some favor with a demon of higher ranking than her.

I ignored her, and her head drifted away, as she realized that I was not interested in conversing.

I turned to the Skeleton Commander I had created many hours ago. "Have you found the other human yet?"

Being incapable of speech, the skeleton shook its head. Perfect, I hate idle chatter.

The Anacondess was still miffed that I hadn't responded, so wanting to avoid any unnecessary... drama... I turned back to her. "Make yourself useful. Use that heat sensing of yours and find the other human. Master's orders."

The Anacondess sniffled a little bit that I had ignored her praise earlier, but heeded my words and went off in search of the human down a different path. Whether she found him or not, I didn't care. If he accidentally managed to kill her, I'd be rid of a small pest. Naturally she had been gifted to me by one of the upper ranked Duke demons, and he always rubbed my nose in it. I didn't even ask for her.

I need nobody's gifts. I will force them to give me things when they realize they have no power over me.

"Lord Beelzebub, we've found trace footsteps in a nearby corridor. We think they went this way." A gruff young demon, someone not even yet of the Lord class, spoke to me.

"Excellent. It took you long enough. Let's go find the last cockroach so I can get back to work in the manor." A Lord's work is never done, even as we plot to climb the ranks of demonic power.

As we drew closer, I couldn't help but notice that the young demon was staring up at me as we walked side by side with the company of troops following us. When I started to look down at him, he quickly looked forward again, trying to pretend he hadn't just done it. If I were a sentimental demon, I might find it endearing. Right now, I find it sickening.

"Stop staring at me. It's disrespectful and is liable to get you killed." I snapped at him and he immediately stopped doing it.

"Ah, my apologies. I just... I can't believe that you're a lord." The young demon's comment caught me off-guard.

Suddenly coming to a stop, I held a hand up behind me to tell the rest of the monsters to halt. Turning to the young demon, I carefully adjusted my tie, as I held on to the careful and delicate harmony I had cultivated within myself, to take away from my younger days as an anger-prone mistake-ridden youth.

"Clarify." I hissed at him.

"Oh, no disrespect intended my lord, I simply meant that it's unthinkable one such as you could only be of the lord rank. The Council must fear you to limit your advances like so..." His voice trailed off, as he gave a slow hard swallow.

Ah, so that's what he meant by it. Despite what they say, certain kinds of flattery will get you everywhere.

"I see." I said simply, as I started walking again. The company behind me jerked forward again as they realized I was moving. If I had a sense of humor, I might find it comical. But I didn't, since I don't.

From around the bend ahead of us, the Anacondess returned and slithered towards us. Perfect, I was thinking I'd like to brutally choke someone to death.

"I've located them, massster Beelzebub." Oh? Apparently she brought good news.

Wait.

"Them? There's only supposed to be one human, you incompetent little-" I raised my hand up to strike her but she quickly spoke again.

"There are three of them now massssster, and one of them isssss of the original sssseven that we killed..."

I stopped my hand in midair, then lowered it back to my side. "Interesting." Somehow we hadn't finished off all of those seven insects. One of them was still alive and kicking. And he had made some friends.

This might possibly be the first time my plans have gone wrong. I'll have to make sure it's the last as well.

Part 070: Umi

Humans.

They're weak, pathetic, petty, fragile beings. They fight amongst themselves over anything, they're worse than starving dogs fighting over a bone. They'll do anything to hurt one another.

Some humans can demonstrate a great amount of compassion. Sometimes you can even make humans appear respectable and make them follow a hierarchy. But it's always temporary. It's always transient.

Since I first started observing every being in existence, I've found many things to be true, but the most true is that humans are the lowest of all sentient races.

But... there is a problem with that statement.

As it stands, humans as a whole are completely worthless. Demons are far more powerful, more advanced, more intelligent, and more devoted to tradition and hierarchy than humans are. They understand that might makes right, but also that you have to go through a proper channel. This makes them easy to control.

But I fear humans. Not the whole of humanity, but the single individual.

Collectively, humans are weak, but once in a great while, a single human arises. This one human will change everything in an instant. Demons live for ages upon ages, usually dying only if killed by another being. They have the ability to live eternally, just as the angels do, but demons will very often die at some point due to an accident, or a challenge to their rank, or any one of a thousand other possibilities.

But humans only live a short while. Unless they take the power of a demon somehow, they will often die in the blink of an eye. They are born, they live, and they die. Every single human who has ever lived knows this to be true.

But their weakness, their eventual guaranteed death, is also their strength. It is a strange quirk of fate whatever gods may actually exist gave humanity the shortest life span, but also the most unstable bodies. They are the testing ground for all other sentient species. For every 1,000 powerful demons or angels, there only exists one powerful human.

But that human will become a true monster.

And two of those humans have come into recent existence. One perished at the cost of many demon lives, a few hundred years ago. A blink in the folds of time, especially compared to how long I have existed. The other seemed to be born immediately afterwards. I usually have time to react and sense the presence of a powerful human, but this one simply appeared one day. In my labyrinth.

This is my home. It is my domain. It is connected to everything that was and will be. And the human appeared out of nowhere. Where did he come from? I cannot interfere with him directly or indirectly, I can only observe. And observe I do.

This human is going to be a great trouble. He possesses knowledge and intelligence no other human before him has had. He has a terrifyingly unique power. And he's rapidly becoming more adept at using it.

I have to stop him.

I have to kill him.

If I don't he will be the end of me.

Unacceptable.

Part 071: Fright

"It's...him..." Peter spoke weakly, his entire body trembling as he indicated the demon approaching us. "H-h-he killed General Roland.... w-with a single..."

Peter suddenly turned and stumbled away weakly, vomiting on the ground behind himself as his terror overtook him. I'd never seen Peter like this before. He was on the precipice of going mad with fear.

The traveler stared evenly at the approaching demon. And a demon he was. A pure black suit with a black tie, wearing black gloves and black shoes, and an odd looking hat with a brim that circled all around his head, jet black hair darting out from under it in various places. And his eyes... glowing red, burning fiery eyes. One would think that if he grabbed you and stared into your eyes, he could drain the soul from your body with just his burning stare.

"Beelzebub. So you've come. I've been looking for you." The traveler walked forwards slowly, him and the demon, apparently named Beelzebub, coming to a stop about 15 feet from one another. A comfortable distance, a safe distance, to be sure. The traveler was strong... but whatever Peter had seen, I feared this demon more than I trusted in the traveler's ability to protect us.

"It's been a while, ' Hero '." The demon spoke down to the traveler, almost like a father chiding a son, but with a large bit of sarcasm and disgust dripping in his ominously deep voice. "I see you're still running around, playing savior with your other insect... friends."

The traveler shook his head. "These are not my friends. I met them only minutes ago." My heart suddenly sunk. Shit... it's hopeless... "But as for you, I do have a bone to pick."

"Oh? Have you been coming after me... just as you did the other ten lords that have gone missing recently?" Beelzebub glared at the hero. "Those were my tools that you disposed of. Useful pawns. I lost much influence because of your actions."

The traveler, or 'hero', shrugged. "Can't be helped. I have to kill all of you demons anyway. You're in my way. And it drew you out, didn't it?" The Hero sneered, a vicious visceral look. "You demons are so... predictable."

Beelzebub suddenly flared up as his eyes brightened in intensity. He seemed to be holding back a massive amount of rage. "You... you think you can... toy with me? You think you can simply mock me and I'll let you walk away?" Beelzebub slowly began to undo his tie. "Oh... this is going to be... very satisfying. Give me a moment, if you will... I need to make sure I don't ruin my nice suit with your filthy insect blood."

The hero chortled. "A moment? I'll give you an eon. You've already lost. Maybe you should walk away so I don't send you crawling."

Beelzebub quickly undid his tie. "Child. Take this.... and fold it neatly. Neatly." He spit the last word out and the younger demon by his side shuddered slightly as he quickly and gently took the tie from him.

In a flash, Beelzebub had taken off his suit top as well, and his hat. Now he only wore his suit pants and a black long sleeved dress shirt. The man knew how to dress. He looked impeccable with or without his full suit on.

"I'll leave the pants. You don't deserve the sight of what's underneath."

The traveler grinned. "You've developed a sense of humor, haven't you, Beelzy." My god. This man was mad. He just mocked a demon. We're going to die horribly.

The demon gnashed his teeth. "Don't you ever act familiar with me, insect. If you shorten my name like that again, I'll shorten your life to nothing."

The traveler shrugged again. "Let's be serious now. You were going to do that anyway. Or at least, you were going to try." His grin grew ever wider.

The demon's grimace faded, as he closed his eyes. "I'm going to enjoy this far more than I should."

Part 072: Battle Bowl

What the hell am I watching. I can't follow this with my eyes. I can barely follow it at all.

Beelzebub was the first to move. At a speed so fast I almost missed it, he appeared behind the traveler, he stabbed his hand forwards into the traveler's heart.

The traveler instantly died. In fact, he didn't just die, he faded into dust.

"Hm?" Beelzebub didn't look happy that he'd won, he looked perplexed, and his eyes started darting around. "Where did you run off to?"

And suddenly, the traveler, no, the hero was behind him. With a single slap, he smashed Beelzebub into the wall. "GAH!" Beelzebub yelped as the attack caught him by surprise, but he stood back up a second later. Despite the impact damage to the earthen wall, Beelzebub somehow seemed unharmed.

Beelzebub stood back up and stared warily at the hero again. "Filthy insect. I knew you wouldn't fight me fair and square. Always resorting to simple tricks and deceit." He glanced down at his pants, which were now slightly tattered and very dirty. "Ah... this fills me with such.... anger!"

He lunged again at the hero, and punched the hero right in the chest, or at least he tried to. The hero deflected it with a single hand, the other one reaching around and slapping Beelzebub across the face once more. Curiously, I noted amongst the speed of the battle that the hero never once looked at Beelzebub. He always had his head aimed at the ground. Was he perhaps... blind?

Beelzebub snapped when the second slap hit him. "You insolent little-!" Jumping backwards he unhinged his mouth and I jerked back involuntarily as he suddenly breathed a massive wall of fire. It hadn't reached me yet as I was a hundred feet away, but it blasted down the corridor and would be here in a second.

The Hero reached his hand out. " Absorb! "

The fire instantly disappeared. It seemed to suck inside his hand instead of passing all around him. Beelzebub took a step back. "You've changed. I should have realized when my pieces went missing but... I didn't think you had grown to this extent."

Hero nodded. "And you haven't changed. Always underestimating humans. I've heard about what you've done. It all ends today."

Then, something unexpected happened. To be honest, everything here was unexpected, but what happened next blew my mind.

The hero simply said " Invisibility! " ... and he vanished.

"Clever." Beelzebub said simply.

Moving his hands quickly, he cast a spell, what the effect was, I'm not sure. "Unfortunately, as a filthy human, your blood runs hot. You can't hide from a predator's vision."

"Let's change that." A voice came out of thin air. " Reptile. "

Suddenly Beelzebub was actually visibly confused. "What? You can make your blood cool?! How is that possible?!"

"It really is unfair, isn't it, Beelzy?" Said a voice from somewhere in the room. Beelzebub jumped and swung at its source wildly, but only hit the wall. "Always thinking you're so smart and above it all. Your pawns fell, just as you will. You think you're a predator, but I am the real predator here."

Beelzebub reeled as something smashed into his back, then as he flew forward, just before he hit the wall, another impact smashed into his face, sending him flying backwards. But this happened 4 more times, in the space of 4 seconds, he was smashed back and forth by the invisible Hero, who could not be seen or heard as he continued his relentless assault.

"You simply don't understand. I haven't even started getting serious yet. You're finished." Hero spoke again, this time his voice seeming to come from within the walls themselves. I was wrong, this man was the real monster here.

Beelzebub staggered to his knees as he coughed up blood and spit some teeth on the ground. His face, no longer in perfect condition, was hideously beaten and torn up. "Hah... how d-did you?!"

Beelzebub paused as a storm of thoughts crossed over his face. "Ah... now I remember... three archangels..."

"Wrong!" said a voice cheerfully from a nearby invisible spot. "I've had the ability since I first appeared in this hell. Hoarhiim and the archangels only increased my available magic output. But over the last year... I've gained a lot more power than that. I'm probably equal to, oh, say, a Duke class demon? Probably higher to be honest!"

Beelzebub seemed stunned. "Im...possible... you haven't even been here two years... yet... so fast...?"

"Yeah. I really am a walking cheat code." He chuckled to himself at some joke. I didn't know what a cheat code was, but it must have been a fearsome monster.

"By the way, Beelzy, old buddy old pal... you do realize that this was over from the start, right? I only turned invisible to play around a little." Pausing for a second, I suddenly heard his voice right in front of me. " Visibility. "

He appeared in front of me, his body now covered in lizard-like scales. Hero yawned and stretched a little. "Well... it was a good run. But unfortunately, you were outmatched from the start. Even if you were incredibly powerful... it would be too easy. I'm sorry, friend."

Beelzebub grimaced as he staggered back to his feet and pointed at the Hero's chest. "This... isn't over. I will return, and when I do-"

The hero raised his hand and his grin disappeared as he stared coldly at the demon. "No, Beelz. You won't return. I already sealed your teleportation before you got here....Farewell." Hero's voice was icy cold.

Then he said a single word, as his hand aimed at Beelzebub.

" Die. "

Part 073: Godlike

" Scientia potentia est." I said as I watched the life drain from Beelzebub's face and his body slump to the ground. "Knowledge is power."

A famous man once said those famous three words, and he was correct. Perhaps not in the way that he had meant. For me, a strong vocabulary is my deadliest weapon. The more words I know in my original language, the more power I possess.

For an entire year, I have trained and learned tirelessly. Thanks to the wisdom of Raphael, I realized that I had all the power I ever needed, I simply needed to learn to bring it out. I've fought ten lord demons, and hundreds of lesser demons.

I have yet to fight anything higher than a lord, but suffice to say all the lowest ranked demons are weak. They have a simple assortment of spells that they use, they all breath fire (yawn) and, at least for Beelzebub's minions, they all squeak when they're caught. They spill the beans like clockwork. They told me about all of Beelzebub's little mannerisms, his little quirks, how he was fussy and hated to be touched, and how he despised being looked down on. Even if I couldn't kill him with a single word, knowing all his weaknesses made what would have been a potentially formidable foe pathetic.

But I can kill with a single word. I can simply tell things to die, and they do.

But that's not all I can do.

Beelzebub's minions stared in horror as their master was defeated with barely any effort, I stifled a huge laugh and kept my face stony so they would be terrified.

"You're next."

They were petrified. Absolutely petrified. They should be, they were facing a filthy human, and nothing was scarier than a human with power. Humans feared demons, but demons feared humans more. That was the real reason they hunted us down. They wanted to kill us all and prevent Heroes from being born.

Aiming my hand at Beelzebub's cooling corpse, I spoke another word.

" Puppet. "

His eyes slowly flared back to life. He rose up once again, his body beaten and battered. He stared unblinkingly ahead, no trace of his original personality existed.

" Heal. "

I flicked out my forked tongue, as I watched his body quickly regenerate. If he were still alive, this would be truly agonizing, but he made not even a slight verbal complaint.

"What are your orders, my master?"

I nodded in the direction of his former minions. "Ah, I dunno. Why don't you just go and... take out the trash?"

We walked down the corridor. Three humans and 11 demons. I had summoned the other 10 demon lords and now they flanked us as they walked, along with Beelzebub. None of them were particularly strong, and I didn't need them for protection or anything seeing as I had a spherical view of every object around me for a mile in every direction... but I just felt like it, you know?

"Beelzebub, what demon in a rank immediately above you do you despise?" I spoke to him. The puppet has to obey all commands and answer all questions the master gives. His minions were pathetic though, I didn't even have to make them into puppets for them to spill the beans. At least he was more refined.

"Ah, I currently hold no opinions on any other demons due to my lack of a personality, however I previously loathed Mephisto and Bael." I stared into his unblinking, almost robotic gaze. Did he just joke around about his personality? I must have imagined it. "Mephisto is a mid-ranked duke but he holds a vast amount of political influence. Bael is the most powerful of the top ranked 7 kings. I advise not fighting him without ample preparation."

Cocky little shit. Even in death, without a personality, he's telling me what to do. "Right. I'll keep your considerations in mind."

We walked down the hall, following my mental map towards the location of the door that should lead us to the world that Amelia was terrorizing.

I'm not looking forward to this. I don't want to fight the girl who saved my life.

But if it comes down to a fight... I refuse to lose.

Part 074: Emergency

"Beelzebub was defeated." President Ose said flatly. She adjusted her glasses as she looked at the paper in her hands. "Umi confirmed it."

Bael stared unemotionally at her. "So what? I never liked him anyways. He was a weakling who thought he could gain power with words and political favors. He was a worm." Bael flexed his grip lightly. "TRUE power is gained through actions, not words."

Agares nodded as he pet his crocodile. "Agreed. The Hero is becoming more dangerous and we need to finish him off, but defeating Beelzebub is no great feat. He's not even a duke."

Ose nodded slowly. "Yes, you are correct and your words are true. But..." She slid her paper down to Agares. "...have a look at the manner in which he won."

The table went silent and the other members watched Agares eyes as he read. They had only just convened this emergency meeting under President Ose's orders. They had not yet read the report.

Agares shifted uncomfortably in his seat. "Really? Umi confirmed it? A single word? It's ridiculous." He tossed the paper down on the table and sneered. "I'd have to see it to believe it."

Normally, Ose would pull out a video and show them but this time she shrugged. "I don't have visual confirmation, but Umi's word is good as gold. We've never doubted her now, and we aren't about to start."

Diablo, sitting at the head of the table, stroked his temples and nodded. "Yes. I agree. He is far too dangerous. This time... we really have to put a stop to him."

"He seems to have the ability to cast spells verbally, but his limit is a single word." Agares spoke again. After reading the report, he was still doubtful. "And his power appears to be essentially unlimited, as any effect he can think of will happen so long as he has enough magical power, and there is a word to describe what he wants."

Bael leaned into the table, suddenly more interested. "Really? Is he limited to just a single word? Not two or more?"

Ose shook her head. "I don't believe he can do more than one, but it's hard to tell. It may be a bluff. Umi has a 95% confidence in her analysis, but as we all know... humans..." She spit the last word out. She didn't need to say anything else. The other demons at the table also had their lips curled in disgust.

"...Miserable little creatures..." Mephisto was muttering under his breath. His incorporeal spiritual form was always an interesting sight. He wore a blood red tunic and a blood red phoenix feather stuck between his right ear and his head. His signature ability was that he could sense any nearby spiritual energy around him.

"Yes, they are little... but every so often, a pest will spring up and challenge my patience." Diablo beckoned at Ose. "Do you have a recommendation for anyone to send after him? We need to put an end to him now, before we lose any other assets."

Ose shook her head. "Don't bother. You're not going to believe this, but the fool is actually chasing after the Lord of Flies and her companion. He should meet up with her in one of the human worlds soon."

Bael actually laughed out loud. "Bahaha! Well then, if he has a death wish, let's let him do it!"

Diablo nodded. "Yes. I agree. If she kills him, we're rid of a pest. And if he kills her... well..."

Ose smiled an evil smile. "There's a reason we never broke her out of that prison."

The demons at the table roared in laughter. Their laughter shook the halls as the night carried on.

Part 075: Portent

I shifted my weight as we walked. I don't carry much anymore, not in the way of provisions anyways. I can summon anything with a simple word. Fire, tomato, water... I can make all the food I want and I no longer have to eat that goddamned infernal chicken anymore.

Glancing down at my waist, I felt noticeable disappointment as I always do. Hoarhiim. I had left him behind in Phoebe's care back in Hero City, and I've grown to miss his voice. I'm still connected to him, so if he reawakens I will immediately be able to speak to him again, but for the journey I'm going on, his presence would be more of a hindrance.

I don't need his light in the darkness anymore, I have perfect spatial awareness. If anything, being able to move silently in the darkness and not draw attention to myself has been a great blessing. His light would not only obviously give my position away, it would give the enemy ample time to react as I approached them.

I guess I don't really need the element of surprise, given how powerful I've become, but I always am cautious when it comes to the denizens of this hell. I still don't know how I'd fare against a Duke class demon or higher, and I'd prefer I don't find out before I'm ready.

We walked down the hallway and drew near the door that my map indicated would lead us back to Todoro and Peter's world. "Disperse." I said, commanding my 10 minions to vanish. They simply disappeared into an unknown void, waiting for me to re-summon them. I kept Beelzebub here, if only because I thought he might be slightly useful.

The three of us stepped out of the door and into their world. The beauty of it was mostly lost on me, as I could no longer see normally. I could feel grass under my feet... and I could perceive trees and houses, as well as crops nearby. But the 'beauty' of nature was wasted on me.

Expanding my sphere of vision, I searched outwards, sending my mind to lots of different nearby areas.

"It's so good to be home!" Peter exclaimed, falling into the grass.

"Hold on. We posted two guards at the entrance to the door. Where are they?" Todoro stepped forwards and looked around warily.

Peter instantly jumped to his feet. "Ah, sorry, I got carried away. Why would they leave?"

I ignored his query as my mind roved around the place. "There is no life anywhere within 5 miles. That's my maximum detection range."

Peter nodded. "All the people here must have packed up and fled. Why would anyone live near a gate that opens up to Hell itself?"

Todoro seemed unconvinced. "The soldiers wouldn't have fled though. They would stay here until their duty was finished. We were only gone two days or so. There's no reason to have fled."

As the two debated over why the people had left, I reached my hand up to silence them.

"You're misunderstanding me. I didn't say there was no human life anywhere. I said there was no life anywhere."

They paused to consider my words, and horror grew on their faces as they realized what I truly meant.

Peter, almost whispering, spoke. "All the life in this area... is gone?"

Part 076: Discovery

We searched. For days, we wandered the lands. Plants still existed. Trees were here, as were grass and flowers. But there were no animals, humans, bugs, anything else.

And without animals and bugs, these trees and flowers and grass plots were living in their last days. The food cycle would quickly come to an end. Everything that was left would die.

The thought filled my heart with anger. Amelia did this. The one I considered a friend, the one who saved me twice and pulled me back from the brink of death... she was a monster who devoured all life. And now, two humans were desperately hoping that I would kill her and put an end to her reign of terror.

Could I do it? Not even "could" as in did I have the ability, but did I have the heart? Did I have the will to kill a cute girl who seemed so playful and fun? One who had saved my life?

I don't know. I can't bear to think of it. If I must kill her, I will have to somehow disable my emotions.

We continued walking for five days and five nights. My stamina was essentially inexhaustible at this point, I haven't slept in nearly 8 months. I kept "watch" as we slept at night. Figuratively of course, since my eyes can't see.

After a week of travel, we finally arrived at the castle.

It was in ruins.

To be honest, the words "atomic bomb" came to mind. Nothing was left that was taller than a single story. It almost looked like a massive hand had pressed down and crushed the castle into a dusty pancake. I felt no emotion as I looked at the scene, but Todoru and Peter were tearlessly weeping as they scanned the devastation, looking for survivors.

Because of my abilities, I detected several bodies crushed deep inside the rubble... but I didn't have the heart to tell them.

I sat down on a rock and meditated as they hunted all around the place for anything, anyone...

And behind me, a voice spoke. "Hi!! Were you looking for me?"

Part 077: Rage

"Were you looking for me? I'm right here!!" Amelia, as always, was amazingly cheerful and happy. Her garment was stained with dried blood. Probably from her victims. I sensed many patterns of what was likely DNA or residual spiritual energy, so it was likely this was the blood of many victims.

Amelia, perhaps sensing my 'gaze' suddenly raised her hands up and covered her chest. "Eww! Stop looking at me like that!"

"No... I didn't mean... the blood..." I said hesitantly, as my unseeing eyes swerved back and forth. Shit, I'm getting sheepish around an inhuman monster, I'm still treating her like a little girl.

"Oh! Just that?" With a giggle, she waved her hands, and the blood vanished from her garment. I could almost swear I heard a faint scream as it disappeared. "Okay, now that we're over that, how have you been?"

I almost mistook her question for genuine concern. I was still alarmed that I hadn't detected her approaching from behind me. I can't see her aura anymore either. Only when I focus on her can I sense anything.

"Amelia. You're full of energy, as usual." I started off with a neutral statement. I don't know how I feel about her. I still haven't decided yet.

"Yep! I'm doing great! And ah, where's Hoarhiim?" She ran around me, incredibly fast, in circles looking all over my body for Hoarhiim. She ran so fast I could barely track her movement.

Finally, she came to a stop in front of me again. "He's not here." I said simply. "I left him in the care of a trusted friend."

"Aww! No fun! Blaarjiim, say hello! It's not good to be impolite!" She chided the black orb in her left hand. I can't perceive light and dark anymore, so I can't be entirely sure..... but Blaarjiim seems to be...

" Hello, 'Hero'. I see you've gained quite a lot of power over the last year. "

Blaarjiim's voice was incredibly powerful sounding compared to how I remembered him in the past. His voice boomed in my mind, like the sound of ten cannons firing next to your ear. It was nothing compared to Gabriel from when I had been given his power, but compared to the voices over the last year, it was unspeakably loud.

"Yes, I've gotten much stronger. I've learned many things. I even learned about your past, Blaarjiim. As well as Amelia's past."

Amelia's cheerful smile froze, as did her body. "My... past? Explain." The smile disappeared and she stared at me evenly.

"Not necessary. Amelia, I came to speak to you. I want to know why you're doing... this." I beckoned to the destruction around me. "Why are you killing and consuming humans? Why have you become such a dark monster?"

Peter and Todoro came running up. Behind them came Beelzebub, who I had ordered to follow them around and sound an alarm if they were attacked.

Amelia's face somewhat lit up as the three came running up, and she ignored my question. "Ooooh! Snacks! And also- ah, Beelzebub?" Her expression turned quizzical as she saw the lord of fire following behind them. "I... thought you detested humans? Why are you following them around like a dog?"

She was clearly baffled. Beelzebub came to a stop and stared ahead blankly. Amelia, feeling puzzled, zipped over to him in a flash (frighteningly fast, I might add) and started waving her hands in his face. "Heelloooo~! Beelzyyyy" She grew annoyed again. "Damnit! Stop ignoring me! You're even more depressing than usual!"

Blaarjiim spoke up again. " My queen, I do not sense the presence of the one named Beelzebub. Whatever you are staring at, it is now a soulless creature. "

Amelia's eyes popped open in recognition. "Ah! So that explains it!" Running over to me, she laughed loudly. "You defeated the Lord of Fire and took him as a pet! That's so adorable!" Her expression became menacing and a disturbingly wide, toothy grin took over, as she got close to my face. "You're playing with fire, you know? Taking over bodies, playing god. If you don't watch out, you'll become the real monster around here." Her body quivered, almost as if the thought delighted her.

Peter, his own body trembling, spoke. "I-I don't know what the relation is between you! I just want to know... why did you eat EVERYONE?! They were our friends and family!"

Amelia paused, her face turning from mine. "Oh? I think the snack has something to say." The evil grin was still creepily frozen on her face. "I think I've devoured everything left on this world... but I'm still not full yet."

She started to jerk towards Peter, but at the instant she moved, I reached out and slapped her across the face, my hand moving at close to the speed of sound. Her body went flying backwards, tumbling into the tall grass.

She rose up, tears in her eyes. "H-hero! Why did you do that?! It hurt... uwaaaaa!!!" She... she started crying. Are you kidding me? Who would fall for this?

But Peter... when she started crying... he snapped. "You... you monster! How dare you cry, after all the... the people you've killed!"

Todoro was also shaking, but with anger. "Yes... you killed everyone we've ever known. A monster like you... you don't deserve tears."

I could sense what was happening inside them. Their emotions ran rampant as their blood heated up a degree and their hearts pounded furiously. I spoke, to try and calm them down. But when it came to it, pointless and futile or not, what they did was up to them. I had no attachments. "Calm yourselves, you won't stand a chance if you attack her. It will be a slaughter."

Tears streamed down Todoro's face as he eyeballed the child that had killed his family, his mentors, his teachers, and his king. "I know... but if I don't put a scratch on her... for my countrymen... I WON'T BE ABLE TO LIVE WITH MYSELF!"

And then he and Peter charged. I watched as they ran to their deaths.

I just watched.

Part 078: Regret

I don't know why I didn't stop them. It would have been easy. A single movement would have saved their lives.

Perhaps I wanted, deep down in my heart, to see if it was true. Amelia wasn't a monster... they had to be lying. Yes, she had a demonic aura around her, and she had said some odd things, but would a monster save my life twice? There must have been a misunderstanding.

Her power and speed had greatly increased since the last time I saw her. She had definitely done something to increase her power. Ingesting souls was as likely a reason as any.

Either way, I just watched as Peter and Todoro rushed to their deaths.

"Oh? The snacks are desperate to hop into my little chompers!" I lurched back in horror as her mouth unhinged and her entire head expanded to the size of a large cat, and she chomped them down in the blink of an eye. Even Todoro, one who I had thought was fast, was eaten in an instant. And within seconds, her head was back to normal.

I watched two good men die, and I felt no emotions about their deaths. Only a feeling of betrayal. A feeling that was caused by Amelia's lies. Well, not lies. She never told me she was a good girl. I just wanted to believe it.

"Amelia..." I choked back tears as the memories of her monstrous appearance came flooding into my mind. "Why did you... save me... you saved my life... why? If this is what you are, then..."

Amelia stood there, licking blood off her face with a freakishly long tongue I had never expected to see. "Umm... let's see! Why did I do it again? Gosh! I can't remember!"

Blaarjiim spoke. "As I recall, my lady, you told me in private that you thought he would make for a good fight someday. That was it, really."

I stared at the girl in front of me. She was back to normal now. No weird tongue. No giant demonic head. This girl... she saved my life, only so that we could someday fight. She really is... monstrous.

"Very well." I said, hardening my expression. "If a fight is what you want, a fight is what you'll get. I released you from that prison... I will put you back inside it."

I aimed my hand at her, and started to speak, but she dodged out of the way and appeared behind me. "Too slow! Teehee!"

"No." I said flatly. "You are too slow."

With a single kick, I smashed my foot into her stomach and sent her flying behind me into the ruins of the castle. Quickly whipping around, I aimed my gaze at her.

"Die!"

Part 079: Unexpected

Amelia staggered to her feet. "Ah... that REALLY hurt!"

I quickly aimed my hand at her again.

"DIE!"

I bellowed this with all my power. Nothing happened.

She stared at me, and started slowly laughing. "Heh heh heh..." Her laughing increased in both volume and power as she started bellowing in a deep, demonic voice. "HAAAAAA HAH HAH HAH!"

She slowly calmed down and returned to 'normal', whatever that might be. "You truly are an absolute fool. How stupid do you think I am?"

I took a step back. It didn't work? Was it ineffective against her because she lacked a soul? Was there something involving her and Blaarjiim VS myself and Hoarhiim? Perhaps the command only worked on others who didn't possess the Lord Orbs?

I didn't know, but what I did know is that, for some reason, 'die' doesn't work on her. That alone is a scary thought.

"How did that not hurt you?" I decided to try the simple approach.

"It's easy. I'm not an idiot, I'm a dark queen that even the other demons fear. I am a strategic genius. And when I found that your abilities were due to the power of wordsmithing, I simply put several hundred layers of protection against word spells that you might try and use. 'Die' was such a predictable word. It's laughable that you'd even try it."

I nodded slowly. It made sense. She got me there. I don't know what words she blocked, but simple words would probably be useless against her. I'd have to do this trial-and-error.

"By the way, let's see how strong you've really gotten, oh mighty Hero." She spit the last word out sarcastically. I was going to retort but then she charged at me. Such frightening speed. To be honest, my speed may match or exceed hers, but without a way to focus on her as she moved, my spatial vision was mostly ineffective.

An attack from the back! And the left side! And the right!

I struggled to defend against it, as she pulled out a dark sword and cut me with it several times. She must have been testing me because the wounds weren't very deep.

Amelia jumped back, eyeing the damage. She had literally stabbed inside the chinks of my beaten armor. "That's it, huh? Worse than I expected. The power is good and the speed is okay, but fighting and being unable to track my movements? You've much to learn."

As she spoke, a thought crept in my mind. Jerking my hand out, I started to cast a spell. She appeared some feet behind me, avoiding my feet so she didn't get kicked. She's learning.

My spatial vision focused on her vision.

"Tracking!"

Suddenly, there she was. A bright red dot in my vision. I smiled. She didn't plan for that word.

"Huh? Nice try idiot, you missed me by a mile." She laughed as she saw my hand raised.

Good. An evil grin crossed my face. She doesn't know that I don't actually need to use my hands to aim. She hasn't been secretly following my development.

"Are you sure about that?" I asked, as I kept my back turned to her. "Why not try your luck... just one more time?"

She frowned. "Okay, but I won't go easy on you this time!"

"Don't worry about me." I said, holding a laugh inside. She has no clue.

She fell for it. Charging forwards, she stabbed at the chink in my armor, and my palm was waiting for her. SMACK! I sent her flying, but before she could hit the ground, I appeared underneath her, punching her into the back, up into the air, and then I delivered three more kicks directly into her spine. She gasped in pain and I let her smash into the ground.

"Does it hurt?" I asked, a wide grin on my face. "You keep thinking that I'm the pupil and you're the master, but I've already surpassed you. And now I will repay the debt you owe to those you consumed."

She grimaced. "You're sneaky, aren't you? You don't have to use your hands for spells, eh? I won't let you do that again." Her eyes burned with fire, as she once again unhinged her mouth. But this time, a massive swarm of flies erupted out of her from within her gut.

All right, that is officially the most disgusting thing I've ever seen.

Part 080: Battle Bowl 2

Simple words won't work. Amelia may say she's intelligent, but she probably won't know words from my world.

Looking at the swarm of flies that were about to hit me, I yelled again.

" Exterminate! "

Instantly, the swarm died, and Amelia looked pissed. "Those were my pets, you asshole!"

They could not have truly harmed me, but maybe they could have distracted my spatial vision or slowed my movement and hearing down... it could have made my situation much worse.

Amelia appeared to be mulling my powers over. "You really do possess many abilities, and you can make anything you want appear out of thin air... but..." She pulled out her dark sword again. It looked familiar to me. "When it comes to battle, I am much more seasoned than you, or any other demon. I'm going to make sure I take my time killing you, until you understand what true despair is!"

Suddenly, I recognized it. That sword, it was the one from my dream! But not only that, it was actually Dellfingler!

Amelia lurched at me again, this time quickly moving her hands to cast a spell. The sword merged into her arm.

Slashing and stabbing at me, I blocked her attacks with my bare hands. Now that I could track her position everywhere, she didn't appear fast to me at all. I punched hard at the spot I estimated her to appear, and right in time to blast her away from me, smashing through five layers of trees. When I tracked her again, I was shocked to see that her neck was snapped and her body covered in bruises. I... killed her?

No. The damage healed, and I noted a curious movement of energy from Blaarjiim to her body, as her neck straightened.

She got up, and stepped forward again. Suddenly jamming her hand into a tree, she lifted it effortlessly, using it as a massive crushing weapon. She charged at me and swung down.

I jumped away and it missed by a mile. It slowed down her movements noticeably.

"Grr... STOP MOVING! I'm going to squash you like a beetle!" She was visibly irritated that I was dodging so easily. This was easy. Really easy. I had always thought she was powerful, but apparently I've gotten even more powerful than her.

I can't be cocky. I refuse to let my guard down. I still know next to nothing about her power. All the demon lords I've turned into puppets had zero information on her abilities.

I decided to experiment a bit. "Clone.", "Clone.", "Clone."

I summoned up three clones. "Kill her." I ordered them. If she had any new tricks, I'd know immediately. Each clone was half as powerful as me, but three clones were roughly 110% as powerful as I was, given the only somewhat coordinated teamwork.

It was vicious. Amelia didn't expect something like this. Over the course of three minutes, the clones attacked her relentlessly. Since I could stand back and watch, but also receive data from them, I noticed her attacks would grow weak, her body would be battered, and then she would heal up again. Each time this happened, that strange energy transfer from Blaarjiim would happen.

So that was it. She didn't eat the souls, she must have given the souls to Blaarjiim to hold. It made sense. He was a being of purely condensed spiritual energy. More spiritual energy would only increase his power, he probably had a limit but it was likely vast.

"Beelzebub, what are your thoughts so far?" I turned and spoke to the puppet. The puppet stared ahead blankly.

"I have no opinions due to your destruction of my original personality." Again with the jokes. I swear, this guy would make for a great deadpan comedian. Maybe if I learned to harness his wit, I could make a fortune in the stand-up districts. Worth a thought anyway-

Suddenly there was a massive explosion as Amelia erupted a dark wave out of her body. My clones stumbled back, visibly hurt and staggering in pain, but enduring wordlessly.

"I've had just about enough of this!" Amelia was throwing a tantrum again. Great. "If you want to pick on a poor little innocent girl, why not pick on someone your own size?"

I shrugged. "Tell that to the thousands of people you killed."

"Millions." She corrected me with a cold glare and a single tart word.

"Right..." Every time she spoke, I became more and more confident. I had to put an end to her. She has no compassion for anyone other than herself.

Amelia stood up straight. "You want a real fight then? Let's do this."

She held up Blaarjiim and grasped onto him with both hands. "Blaarjiim, do the thing."

"My pleasure." A wicked demonic smile sprouted itself in my mind.

Part 081: Darkness

Amelia and Blaarjiim were suddenly encased in darkness, as a massive cloud appeared over the horizon, blocking out the light of the sun. The sun's light disappeared and suddenly the day quickly became dark and dreary as a rain cloud formed over us.

Amelia and Blaarjiim began speaking together in unison.

The power of darkness gives us our strength

The terror of death gives us our might

While separate we stay at arm's length

But when together, darkness our power unites!

A dark cloud surrounded Amelia, as she and Blaarjiim finished their magic chant. It completely shrouded her from view. Inside, the red dot that I sensed vanished, and slowly became a black one as it reappeared.

The cloud withered away, and in front of me stood... something unnerving. It was still Amelia, but she appeared much older. Blaarjiim was no longer in her hands, they were both free. I could not tell what she was wearing due to my lack of eyesight, but Beelzebub described it for me. A black leather suit that encased her entire body, and a dark cowl that hid her hair, except that which hung out from behind the bottom of it. Amelia appeared to have gained more than a foot in height, and was now two inches taller than me.

But her eyes... her eyes now were pitch black. I did not need Beelzebub to inform me of this. I sensed two 'hollow' spots in my vision sphere, at the exact spot where her eyes would be. Pure black eyes that devoured the light around them, and the energy as well.

Her energy level was staggering. It raced out of her body at an explosive rate.

" You must have angered my queen greatly for her to have assumed this form. " Blaarjiim's voice spoke from out of Amelia's mouth. It almost seemed like...

"Did... the two of you...?"

" Yes. " The demonic voice was not as loud as I would have heard it in my mind, but it was still impossibly deep and gravelly. It reminded me of someone putting the bass on max with a subwoofer.

"Where is Amelia, then?" I stared 'her' body up and down with my mind. The presence had changed color. Was she simply dormant? Was she erased?

" She's... inside me. I have taken over for now. But enough questions. She hates doing this, and I would not wish to anger my queen more than necessary. "

He disappeared. Pain. I felt monstrous pain in the side of my head as he appeared next to me, smashing me in my right ear. The power was incredible, a wave of force erupted from the spot he hit and blasted the falling rain away and my body was sent flying helplessly across the ground. Before he could attack again, I managed to jab my hand out and stab into the ground, stopping my movement as I swirled my body around to face the attacker.

"Fuck." I cursed aloud, as blood trickled from my ear. He wasn't playing around. I dashed towards him and punched at him, teleporting behind him as I swung at the back of his neck. He ducked down in an instant, sweeping his foot under mine and tripping me, before I could even hit the ground, he punched me in the head, smashing me into the ground with incredible force.

He kept his fist pressed against my head. " What were you saying, insect? Something about giving up? Don't make me laugh. " He grabbed me by my right leg, and hurled me a great distance. Probably a half a mile or so. He hurled me away from the castle. The world spun and I struggled to regain my mental balance.

Before I hit the ground, I aimed my hand at my body.

"Halt!"

With a single word, my momentum stopped, though I began falling straight down I was able to land feetfirst.

Limping around badly, I quickly healed myself. The pain hurt but I just had to deal with it. I was getting a good sense of his movements now. He was definitely faster and stronger than me, two very bad combinations. But there is always a way out when you can make words reality.

"Invisibility!" I yelled, making myself go invisible. "Reptile!"

Now he couldn't track me with his eyes, or any sort of heat vision.

" Heh heh, isn't that cute? You learned some tricks. I guess now that I can't see you, it's all over, eh? "

And suddenly he was at my right side.

" Wrong. "

Another punch sent me flying.

Part 082:

The battle dragged on. I was exhausting my power, and so was Blaarjiim. His colossal presence had grown noticeably smaller. At one point, I used a teleport ability to return to the door to the labyrinth.

I was shocked to see that Blaarjiim was already there.

" Fleeing the scene of battle? I had pegged you as many things, but a coward was not one of them. I guess we're all wrong about something eventually. " He turned around and glanced at the doorway.

He smiled. " My queen needs no sustenance to live. Even if this entire planet dies, we will live forever. But you... you're just a lowly human. On the off chance that you may win... "

He made a motion with his hands. A colossal explosion destroyed the portal back to the labyrinth and it disappeared from sight. I stared at the sight of it in wonder.

" Teleportation will not return you inside the labyrinth, not now that there's no direct link. The dimension has been sealed off. "

I nodded, swallowing hard. "So this is it then. A battle to the death."

Blaarjiim nodded. " Don't be conceited. It's a slaughter, plain and simple. I have weakened somewhat, but you have weakened greatly. Even if- " He paused mid-sentence, and his head turned to the side. " I see. My queen has seen enough. She is displeased that I sealed the door and will now be taking over again. "

I breathed a sigh of relief. Amelia may be intelligent, but this was certainly a boneheaded move. She just can't help her impulsiveness. But still.

I looked again at the spot where the door was. Not good. I could probably teleport back to the Labyrinth somehow under normal conditions, but not in my weakened state. There was still my trump card, but I didn't wish to use it. It was thoroughly untested and only for extreme emergencies.

Blaarjiim's immense energy dissipated, and the dark cloud formed again as Amelia reappeared. She lost her footing and fell to the ground for a second, but managed to pull herself back up. "Whew... that takes a toll on my body..." She stared at me. I was no longer in perfect condition. I had lesions and bruises and cuts I had not yet healed in order to conserve my energy. I was in bad shape. She however, was in peak condition, and Blaarjiim had used all his own energy during the merge.

Things were not looking good.

Wordlessly, she walked up to me. "Listen, Hero... um... I just want you to know, this won't hurt a bit... I'll make it quick, because I like you, okay?"

I slapped her.

This time, my slap barely knocked her off her footing. I was visibly weakened. I felt weaker.

She shrugged as she rubbed her face. "That's it, huh? Well, like I said, I wanted to make this slow and painful, but I was willing to give you a chance. You blew it though!"

She giggled another innocent sounding giggle. "Slow and painful it is!"

With a motion of her hand, she cast another spell.

At first, for a few seconds, nothing happened. Then I felt it. My entire body greatly weakened. I shuddered down to my hands and knees. My spherical vision disappeared. I was suddenly completely blind again. I fell to the ground, rasping for breath, as incredible amounts of pain in my arms and legs took over.

"You... what did you... do to me..." I gasped for air as I coughed the words out.

"Me? Oh nothing much. I just dispelled all those annoying buffs of yours! You spent the last year cheating by casting spells on yourself, didn't you?"

My eyes shot open as I realized what she had done. Every enhancement I had cast on myself, gone. I was still a strong human, but compared to the demon in front of me, I was just a... a...

"...Snack!" She said helpfully. Yes, that's the word. I might as well be another snack. I feel so weak I can barely move.

It's time now. I should have done this sooner. I didn't want to have to do this, but it's time for my trump card.

I wheezed for breath as I slowly raised my hand and coughed a single, breathless word.

" Catherine."

The blood drained from Amelia's face.

"What... what name did you just say?"

Part 083: Catherine

The young girl bowed in front of the altar, her hands clasped together as she prayed to the man above her resting on the cross. Her parents tried to pull her away, as the ceremony had come to a close some time ago, but she resisted. "Just a while longer, please, papa?"

Papa smiled gently. "All right. Just a while longer." He walked away with mum in hand, as they spoke to the pastor on the other side of the room.

"She's a remarkable young girl. Pious, smart, she keeps to her studies well... I see a bright future for her." Father Miles smiled as he spoke of the child. She was one of his best choir singers, and she always prayed diligently, every day.

A nearby nun chimed in. "I should hope that you enroll her in the university someday! She will surely make for an excellent nun or a cleric!"

Her parents nodded thoughtfully. They weren't wealthy enough to afford such a thing. Maybe, in time, they might be, but they had 4 other children to care for. Showing favoritism was out of the question.

"Perhaps. We shall see. Thank you, father." Mum motioned to her daughter. "Come along, Joan. It's time to leave."

Joan's 16th birthday. She couldn't feel happy. God had blessed her, but he had also given her trials. This was... the hardest trial of her life.

She held her sister's hand. "Catherine... I'm here for you."

Catherine rested on the bed, layered under 5 separate covers. The fever wouldn't burn itself out. Her body was covered in boils.

The black death.

Joan's mother walked in the room, and quickly pulled her hand away from her sister. "Do not touch her, Joan. I know you love your sister but... if you should catch it too..."

"A punishment from God." Joan said quietly. "This plague, it surely is an act of god. Or perhaps, the devil."

"Yes." Mom said, as she mopped Catherine's head with a cold wet rag. "From one of those two, that is where it comes from. Who can know? Who are we to question the Lord?"

"Not I." Joan quietly whispered under her breath.

Joan's sister died a week later. The ceremony was held in front of the church where father Miles used to preach. He had passed away a year ago. Everyone seemed to be dying these days.

Joan cried as they closed the coffin on her sister. Mom and dad wept fiercely, as they followed the graveyard staffers walking the coffin over to the nearby graveyard. They gently lowered the coffin into the ground and the new priest, Father Gabriel gave his speech.

Every so often, as he spoke, Father Gabriel would look into Joan's eyes, and a gentle smile crossed his lips. Joan could not bring herself to smile back, but the expression on his face stayed with her.

The next day, she entered the church, as she had done daily for over ten years, and bowed in front of the altar. The sight of Jesus on the cross warmed her heart and filled her with hope. "My Lord... if there is any feat I must perform, any favor I must do... I would do anything to bring Catherine peace."

From behind her, Father Gabriel appeared and lightly touched her shoulder. "Joan. It is good to see you. How are you holding up?" His voice was soft and kind. He was a wonderful man, one who would be able to lead the House of God after the passing of Father Miles.

"I'm doing as well as can be expected." Joan said, trying her best to smile, though it was cracked and weak.

"Joan..." Father Gabriel walked to her right side and sat on a nearby bench. "Come, have a seat. I have something I wish to discuss with you."

Joan gasped, as Father Gabriel walked behind the Altar of Christ. Inside a hidden compartment that he pulled forwards, there was a sword. A silver sword was there, one that seemed to be plain and otherwise bland.

Gabriel pulled the sword out of the drawer and walked over to Joan, the sword lying across the flat of his hands. "Joan, do you know what this is?"

She shook her head vigorously. "It is clearly a sword, but the significance of it, I do not know."

He nodded slowly. "This is a special sword. It came from heaven, many many years ago. And do you know what is truly special about this sword?"

Joan lightly shook her head. "Isn't... coming from heaven special enough?"

Father Gabriel smiled. "No, my child. The truly special thing about this sword is... it was buried here by a patron saint of this church."

He looked into Joan's eyes intently. "And that saint. Her name was Catherine, of Alexandria."

Joan stared at the sword in wonder. "Saint Catherine... why have I never heard of her?"

He shook his head. "Her existence is a secret. Only a few people in the entire world know. She was slain by a demon, and her will stated to hide the sword here for a future Hero of our people, one who could redeem her."

Joan nodded intently, taking the sword in her right hand. "The Sword from Heaven. It must be... a truly divine blade."

Gabriel nodded. "This sword was not just wielded by Catherine. It was wielded by many other heroes. It has existed for a thousand years, and now, you have been chosen to be its next wielder."

Joan stared intently at the sword. "Father. What must I do?"

Gabriel smiled, as he indicated a locked door at the back of the church. "Follow me. There is a very special place I must take you to."

Part 084: Sword

I staggered back in horror as my worst nightmares were coming true.

"Haha... you're kidding, right Hero? That's not really... her sword?" I laughed nervously as Hero stood, the Sword of Heaven in his hand. He was on the verge of death a second ago, but he had far more than a second wind now. His wounds were healing, and all around him, energy was being sucked in. The grass and flowers died around him and the air around him seemed to be thick with death.

Wait. That's not right. That can't be her sword.

Hero, despite now being full of power and wielding the weapon I hated most, had a sad expression on his face. "I'm sorry, Amelia. I didn't want to have to use this." His unseeing eyes stared ahead numbly and his hands gripped the sword fiercely. "Ever since Joan died, this sword hasn't been the same. It changed when it was left hidden inside the labyrinth."

I hadn't felt fear in so long. The sword was definitely different. It was even more powerful than when she had wielded it.

"What the hell happened... how did you get your hands on Catherine?! We thought and hoped it was gone forever!" My thoughts raced, after that battle... the sword had disappeared. Where could it have...

"The labyrinth giveth, and the labyrinth taketh away. After Joan sealed you, her body was too weak to go on, and she died a while later. I know about your past, Amelia. I know how you were stopped."

I could feel rage burning inside me... this little shit... he thinks he can stop me? He's not half as dangerous as Joan was. Joan had not an ounce of hate in her heart. Joan was truly a warrior of the light. Compared to this child playing god with puppets and souls and corrupting Catherine with dark energy, Joan was a goddess of the light, he was a pale shadow of her power.

I smiled evilly as these thoughts crossed my mind. "You're nothing compared to her. You can't defeat me. Hoarhiim has forsaken you, you left two friends to die, and you come at me alone. You have no real power!"

I laughed. "Ha ha ha! It's so cute, seeing you struggle like this! Now I understand, you didn't want to use the sword because it's too much for you to handle! Ha ha ha!"

Hero shook his head. "No. I found this sword in the labyrinth, as I did the other legendary artifacts. I didn't want to use them because I found that each one had been corrupted with dark power. Only Solomon's Crown was untouched. But... if it takes a monster to kill a monster... I'll do what must be done."

Hero raised his hand again and spoke.

"Achilles. Aegis. Orion. Hermes. "

Corrupted pieces of armor appeared on Hero, one by one, as he summoned them. His chipped and cracked and weakened white armor was quickly replaced as dark energy replaced the white.

A tear flowed down his face. "The Armor of Achilles, the Shield of Zeus, the Belt of Orion, and the Boots of Hermes. All legendary treasures from on high, all of them ruined by this godforsaken hell. And if I must wear them to defeat you, I will."

Speaking again, he quickly cast spells.

" Detect! Infrared! Sonar! Tracking! Targeting! Perception! "

His head nodded as I could again feel his presence following me.

"Let's continue from where we left off. We will fight again, but this time, on equal terms. As monsters."

Part 085: Rabid

Heh heh heh... I can feel it slipping away again. My personality is changing even more rapidly... I've never worn all of the armor at the same time.

My unseeing eyes darted and spun around wildly, as I started breathing much faster than usual, almost panting, like a rabid dog. Amelia could sense the change. She grimaced. "Not good. If you want to fight like a monster, I'll bring Blaarjiim back out." She started to cup Blaarjiim in both her hands, but I staggered forward at a speed that terrified even myself.

"You think I'll just let you transform?! ONLY AN IDIOT WOULD DO THAT!!" My voice was wild, it was monstrous. I don't remember sounding like this. I don't think this is actually my voice.

She stumbled back and yelped when I charged, quickly bringing the mute Dellfingler out to deflect my advance. We traded a couple blows, but thanks to Hermes, I was FAR faster than either of us had ever been.

Why was I fighting her again? I think I had some silly reason before, but now I just REALLY wanted to tear this girl to pieces!

I pounced from behind her, playfully smashing her back and forth with the flat of my sword. "Hard to defend what you can't see COMING, isn't it, little witch?!" I sped around everywhere, the boots allowing me to move so quickly that my body was leaving afterimages. That Hermes, what a guy!

Amelia, beaten and battered, had no time to heal from Blaarjiim or summon him. In a desperate move she tracked onto me, and stabbed at my heart, full strength, with Dellfingler. It was easily deflected.

"What?! You think you can just stab through the invincible armor of Achilles?! And with a DARK weapon at that?! Get real!" I whipped Aegis around and rammed her with the flat of the shield, rushing forwards so fast the momentum kept her stuck to the front of it as I plowed through the forest. Smashing through at least a dozen trees, I came to a stop and she flew forwards, crashing into a mound of dirt.

She wheezed and coughed as tears poured down her cheeks. Delicious looking tears. I licked my lips in anticipation. "Hero... you... what have you... become..." She gasped the words out, as she dropped Dellfingler and ran her hand over her ribcage. She surely had some broken bones in there. Mmmm... bones... those sound GOOD.

I smiled as an inhuman laugh passed my lips. "A MONSTER, you moron! I'm a monster now! You made me do this, but I don't regret it one bit!"

I grinned maniacally at the wheezing and gasping girl, but seeing that she was barely able to even more, another emotion took over.

Boredom.

This was too easy. All this POWER and I can't even have a good fight?! This was lame! SUPER lame!

"Alright fine, fuck it, I'll let you and Blaarjiim merge. Make sure you don't die too quickly now though, you hear?!"

Amelia gave a light, pained smile. "Thank you Hero. I knew there was still some good left in you..."

Ah, that silly bitch. There's no good left in me. I've forgotten my real name already...

Part 086:

Amelia changed into Blaarjiim as I watched. When he appeared, he looked down at me with scorn and disdain.

" The mind is willing, but the flesh is weak. I see you've given in to temptation. "

I grinned at him as I felt drool dribble down my lips. "Oh please, cut the sanctimonious CRAP! It's so good to be BAD!" I leaped at him and he stepped back, knocking me to the side with one hand, but I was on him again in a flash from the other side. Yes... this was it... I'm so powerful now that Blaarjiim can't hold a candle to me. My speed and power are omnipotent. I could take on the three emperors of hell as it currently stands. After I'm done toying with this shrimp, I'll go and fight them tomorrow. With the speed I move, getting there will be no problem!

I darted around, cutting him in several places, cackling maniacally as I watched him struggle to heal the spots I cut and fight me off at the same time.

Everytime his hands went up to make a spell motion, I smacked them out of the way and kicked or punched his arms and shoulders. They were clearly slowing and he breathed heavily as we fought.

I came to a stop in front of him, watching this weak maggot trying to fight me back... I still wasn't having a lick of fun.

"Heh heh, is that it then?! All your boastful words, all your bragging, and you can't even stop me!! You'll soon die, you know?!" I laughed raggedly as my throat caught on something and I spit it out, coughing some more. I glanced at the ground. It was dried blood. Ah yes, that's right, the side effects of the armor... oh well, it's not like that matters now!

Blaarjiim healed himself to full again, staring at me evenly. " I've fought so many beings over my lifetime. I am thousands and thousands of years old. I don't even remember the days of my youth anymore. You are not even a challenge to me. "

He stared around us, at the dead grass, the lack of life, the fields covered in death, and up at the barely visible sun in the sky. My dark aura devoured everything, even to a degree his queen had not been able to.

He slowly shook his head as he looked back at me. " You are still just a child. You have no real power, no formal training, no concept of honor or loyalty. You know nothing of the universe in which you were born. You play with dangerous tools of death, in order to seek petty revenge. But as for me... "

Blaarjiim smiled as he rested a hand on his stomach. " I serve my queen. I do what she tells me to, for she is truly timeless and wise. You will never be able to compare to her. "

I shook my body, for some reason and trembled as his words came over me. "Big words for a dog that barks for his master! You're just a useful tool for Amelia! You have lost all self autonomy and you do whatever she tells you, whenever she does!" I laughed. "I may be a monster, but I do as I please. I will go on to defeat the most powerful beings of this hell, after I have finished you off first."

Blaarjiim smiled deeply, an evil cackle escaping his lips. " Haaa ha ha ha! You?! Defeat the most powerful beings in this hell?! How could you possibly do that, when my queen has already done so?! "

I paused. Hm? What was he talking about? "Alright, I will... bite. What could you possibly mean by that statement?"

Blaarjiim beamed confidence at me. " In your year of travels and hunting down lesser demons, you never once pieced it together? You never figured out why after Joan defeated my queen and put her in the statue to live in eternal suffering, and none of the other demons broke her free? They were SCARED of my queen, you imbecile! "

Blaarjiim guffawed mightily as he shook the ground with his laughter.

I grimaced. He she done something incredible? Something truly monstrous? Surely, she was strong, but... "You're bluffing." I tried the simple approach.

Blaarjiim stopped laughing and his voice went icy cold. " Ah... I don't think so, little one. "

Blaarjiim paused and his hands made a quick motion. I thought of interrupting, but curiosity took over.

Darkness filled the land. Blaarjiim and I stood alone in a dark void, all other things disappeared. Far in the distance, I could see Beelzebub, staring wordlessly and vacantly at all that surrounded him.

And on the ground in front of Blaarjiim and I, a satanic pentagram covered in blood appeared.

" I think it's time you meet the former master of this labyrinth. "

A demon began rising out of the ground. His skin blood red. His head had two long, pointed horns. His body was massive, nearly twenty feet tall, and his muscles looked strong enough to crush a mountain. He gazed ahead vacantly, his body covered in flames that seemed to trickle out of his eyes and down to his feet.

" Hero, I'd like to introduce you to Satan. The previous First Emperor of Hell. "

Part 087: Satan

This is not good.

I probably could take Satan on easily. I definitely can defeat Blaarjiim. But now it's two on one, and I'm not so sure I can defeat the highest devil emperor and a fairly strong demon with potent magic all by myself.

I glanced back over at Beelzebub. Useless. He wouldn't even slow them down.

I remembered my three clones from earlier. It was better than nothing. " Reintegrate " The three clones dissipated and their power returned to my body.

All right, now that I have done that, time to try and kill two demons with one sword!

I grinned up at Satan. "You're a big guy, ain'tcha? Let's play around a little!"

Blaarjiim smiled. " Amelia defeated him all by herself. She had no help from me. Let's see if you can do the same. " He then stepped back and sat down cross legged in the black void.

Blaarjiim made a motion and... life returned to Satan's body. He turned to me and spoke, his voice surprisingly quiet and normal sounding compared to his intimidating presence and the power of Blaarjiim's voice. "Who are you? Why is there a little mouse in front of me?"

He eyed my armor and my weapon. "Ah, I see. You must be a Hero of some sort."

He turned around back to Blaarjiim. "You summoned me for this? Are you mocking me?"

Blaarjiim shook his head. " I lack the ability to defeat this one as I presently am. He deals in tricks and deceit. I will not interfere with the fight. "

Satan sighed. A great sigh of boredom. "Disappointing. I sense much power coming from this one, perhaps more than even Amelia in her prime... but all of that power is concentrated in the Mythological Artifacts."

I was giving him too much time. Satan was already sizing me up and assessing how much of a threat I was. This was the time to strike!!

I lunged forwards, swinging the Sword of Heaven at his calves and- hit air? He was gone.

"Over here, peon."

He was a hundred feet behind me. I grimaced. This demon was fast.

I charged again, but now my boots of Hermes felt like they were slowing me down. I could sense black veins appearing on my cheeks as I again swung at air. Satan was gone.

"Do you know why I was the most powerful ruler of the labyrinth for over a million years?" Satan's voice came from behind me. I cocked my head back around. He loved getting into my blind spots, but I have no blind spots. He simply moved that fast. "I always learn from my mistakes. If I do something wrong once, I never do it wrong again. I underestimated a weak little girl a single time, and it was the death of me."

A powerful blow struck me in the gut, but Satan hadn't moved. Another ten blows pummeled me from all directions. Still, he did not move.

"They called me invincible. The Ultimate Attack, and the Ultimate Defense. You can't hit what you can't see, and you can't defend what you can't perceive."

An especially powerful blow struck me in the spine as I staggered forwards. I suddenly felt something shift inside me. Blaarjjim's head jerked up slightly at he aimed his gaze at me. "Hm? Your eyes..."

My eyes, normally glowing white from the power of Hoarhiim, dulled back down to a cloudy, lifeless white. It didn't change my perception of anything, but everything seemed... foggier all of a sudden.

I spit blood on the ground as I fell to my knees. "D-damn... you're... you're definitely the First Emperor of Hell..."

Satan shook his head. "I no longer hold that title. The next emperor in line took it after I was defeated."

I stared at him intently with my all-seeing vision. "Then... if Amelia defeated you, why isn't she the First Emperor of Hell?" Empress, I corrected myself mentally.

" Why indeed? I think that perhaps she thought the job boring, a lifeless uninteresting task of day to day tedium. She left it to the second emperor, and went on her merry way... looking for a greater challenge. " Blaarjiim seemed to tire of the conversation. " Clearly, you will not be the one that defeats her. It's always been her greatest wish, to be bested by a great warrior. "

I grimaced. "Wasn't Joan a great warrior? Did it not fill Amelia's heart with happiness to be bested by her?"

Blaarjiim shook his head. "Lady Joan was a far more cunning and powerful warrior than you, but she could not ever bring herself to kill. Not even a demon. She instead sealed my queen inside the statue and left her to rot, before Joan went on her merry way and died like a rat. "

I understand now. Amelia doesn't just want to be defeated... her greatest wish is to... die? It's such a sad existence. Wait, sadness? How can I feel sadness? Are my emotions returning?

I felt the Armor of Achilles with my hands. It was badly cracked and chipped. Was Satan's power really that monstrous? I was easily defeating Amelia, even Blaarjiim after he merged with Amelia... how could she possibly have defeated the First Emperor of Hell?

So many questions. My mind was filled with rage and lunacy before, but I feel sanity returning. I must be nearing my final limit.

Satan stared down at me with his oppressive gaze. His gaze seemed even more bored than before. "To have bested Amelia yet to fall before me... her power has been greatly reduced. But this... I cannot allow this farce to continue."

He moved, and in an instant, he was kneeled down in front of me, as his fist uppercut me into the air. Again, a hundred blows struck me in the span of ten seconds, as darkness exploded from my body.

I came crashing down into the ground, and I felt broken. Utterly, completely broken. I was a child playing Hero again. I still think I'm invincible... but I'm not.

I spit, and twenty of my teeth fell onto the ground in front of me, blood pouring from my mouth. Pain seared through my brain as the agony hit me in waves.

Satan shook his head, watching as my legendary ultimate armor disintegrated into the wind. All I had now was Catherine, and she lay on the ground a few feet from me.

Satan walked over and picked up Catherine, the sword as small as a knife in his colossal hands. "So this is the sword that sealed the one who defeated me, eh? So much power, but what good is it if it breaks the wielder's sense of logic and reason? This is more of a detriment than a boon."

Using two fingers, he reached his other hand up, and snapped Catherine in two.

A great cry of agony rushed out of the sword and Satan stumbled back, dropping it as the scream had even startled him. It sounded like a million souls pouring over a great dammed-up river. "By the gods, what happened to this holy weapon to make it such a fearsome demonic harbinger of death?"

The sword smashed into the ground, falling with unusual dense force, as if gravity had suddenly increased one hundred times over around just it alone. It left a massive crater in the dark ground, and then it too dissipated into the wind.

All my incredible armor is gone. Everything but the Crown of Solomon. Hoarhiim has left me. I left friends to die. I brought no companions but demons with me. I am completely crushed.

Blaarjiim smiled. " That will be quite enough, Satan. You've done your job as expected. "

Satan whipped his head back around and glared at Blaarjiim. "Hm? So that's it? You summon me out of weakness and now you're sending me on my way?"

Blaarjiim shrugged. " I do only as my lady commands. "

Satan grimaced as he turned back to my broken husk of a body. "Cheh. Very well then. Farewell, 'Hero'. Enjoy the rest of your miserable wretched life."

He turned back to Blaarjiim. "Return me to my slumber. I wish to have more enjoyable dreams. And... don't bring me out again unless it is absolutely necessary."

Blaarjiim glared back at Satan. " If I should ever wish for your opinion, I will ask for it. " With a smooth series of motions, Satan faded away, as did the black void around us.

With my armor gone, the sun shone in full force in the day sky. It hadn't seemed like much time had passed, but it was already the brightness of midday.

Blaarjiim walked towards me slowly. " So this is it, then? Your body broken. Your bones shattered. Your spirit humbled. You now understand what true weakness is. Twice now, my lady has healed you back from near death, and this time proves that like all filthy humans, you never learn. "

I would have nodded if I could feel anything. I could barely even twitch my finger. He's right. I am completely irredeemable. I can't call myself a Hero. At best, I'm still that same old Child of Gaia, running in fear through the labyrinth. I haven't changed one bit.

"Hoarhiim..." I whispered... "I'm sorry that I forsook your guidance... now I understand why you left me... and never returned. I am truly sorry, from the bottom of my heart."

Blaarjiim stood over me now. Dellfingler was in his right hand. " You were not a challenging opponent but... you brought some joy into my queen's heart. Perhaps, if you were stronger, she might have even... fallen for you. "

He raised the sword above me and held the point of it above my chest, and prepared to stab my heart.

"I will die alone then... I came here alone... I will die alone, as do all humans in the end." Tears rolled down my face as the end finally came to me.

" No. You are not alone. "

A voice sprouted itself from within my mind.

" I have always been with you. I have always spoken to you. You simply never listened to what I had to say. "

My tears faded as hope entered my heart. Hoarhiim?

Part 088: Hoarhiim

I walked over to the small, broken human on the ground. Pulling out my sword, I raised it over the feeble body of the youth.

" ...Perhaps, if you were stronger, she might have even... fallen for you. "

And then I stabbed the sword down.

It pierced his heart, instantly killing him. I pulled the sword out, my gaze darkening as I looked at the corpse in front of me.

Now that Hero was dead, my queen could return. But... in my haste... I had destroyed the door to leave this place. Perhaps the reason I did so, was that I knew I would win. If we cannot escape, then my queen would be alone, with only me by her side.

Just me... the thought filled me with joy. I would have the most powerful queen ever all to myself. Even if it took an eternity, I would find a way to create a real body for myself, once again... to undo what had previously been done.

I love my queen. I may be the Lord of Darkness, but it is merely a title. It's a transient thing. Titles mean little, they are passed around like candy at a party. I'm fortunate that my title reflects my current abilities, as I am truly a lord of darkness, but even if I were the Lord of Fire or the Lord of Flies, it would mean nothing to me.

I turned away from the unsightly, broken corpse behind me. I walked away from it slowly, pacing myself. My lady probably had no feelings for the youth but... I would not reawaken her and have her control the body right in front of his shell. If she did possess feelings for the insect, it would be unnerving for her to reawaken right in front of his body.

I walked away, and before I'd taken ten steps, a familiar voice spoke. One I had not heard speaking aloud in...

" Where do you think you're going? "

Hoarhiim.

I turned back around and gasped. The body had silently healed and he was standing up, perfectly straight. His wounds were all gone, but more impressive were the other physical changes. His muscles hulked. His entire facial structure was altered. He definitely resembled my old rival in body, and in voice.

" Hoarhiim. One last trick, huh? "

" This is no trick, Blaarjiim. This has been fated since the beginning of our lives, since we first met, as youths, all those years ago. "

I nodded. I could no longer remember my distant past, and he likely couldn't either. But he was right. We always fought, we always bickered, we always argued.

" You are the light, I am the dark. Neither of us can win, you know? "

" No. You are wrong. This one is unique. I will finally achieve my ultimate goal through him. "

I gnashed my teeth. " You think it will be so simple? We've fought tens of thousands of times. It's always a stalemate. We are equal in power. The light needs the darkness, just as much as the darkness needs the light. "

Hoarhiim shook his head, as a spear of light appeared in his hand. Gungnir. His personal weapon. " Many things have changed, one of which is that I now have the ability to control fate itself. "

A bluff if ever there were one. I summoned my own weapon, sticking Dellfingler back in its place at my side. " Sharur. " A mighty club of darkness appeared in my hand. Ah, so good to feel its power once again. The only time I would ever take this out was when I fought my rival. Not even my queen knew of its existence. It was an unspoken rule between him and I. Personal weapons only.

I stared up into the sun, as its light beamed down on the battlefield. The ground was torn up and loose from the fighting. Patches of grass were missing, here and there.

Master, are we to fight Hoarhiim once more? My club spoke to me. Sharur was a sentient weapon, one of the few in existence. It sometimes had a mind of its own, deflecting attacks that I might otherwise miss, and striking weak spots I might otherwise not see.

" Yes, my brother. We will finally, on this day, strike him down in combat. And then we will be alone with the mistress until the end of time. "

The club trembled with anticipation. You focus on defense. I'll worry about the attacking.

Good. This would all be over soon.

Part 089:

I stared mindlessly at the fighting going on in front of me. Through a cruel twist of fate, a mere human had imprisoned my soul and body in his grasp. I cannot move under my own willpower anymore. I cannot speak, move, or otherwise interact with anything.

I simply stare out of my eyes, unblinkingly. I can't even move them to follow what's going on. Everything I see is a blur.

Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim, the lords that condensed their power into spherical bodies many years ago, are now somehow in human form. I stand very far away from the battle, in relative safety I might add, as they have all but ignored me.

I don't like safety though. I wish they would simply kill me. A lack of autonomy is true hell, having to wordlessly endure the suffering of being ordered around by a lowly human... this is true Hell.

A great mind once said that suffering is different for all beings. For a slug, pouring salt on its body brings incredible suffering, yet many forms of livestock would greedily eat that same salt if given the chance.

There are those who hate any kind of pain, and those who love to feel it. People exist who love the sight of fire, and others exist who abhor it.

And for me, this is my hell.

A total lack of bodily control. Watching helplessly as far greater beings amuse themselves with a battle of the ages. They get to have fun. They get to stay alive and retain their autonomy.

Perhaps it is my fault. I always thought myself perfect, I always thought of other beings as lesser, yet in the end, I was bested by a lesser being. When I think about it, I realize that I was the lesser being all along. I'd weep right now if I could.

Sigh... I can't even close my eyes and sleep.

This... is true Hell.

Part 090: Battle Bowl 3

Our attacks were thunderous. Every impact made the sound of a small bomb going off. Our fists and weapons collided faster than the speed of sound. If I took a hit, Blaarjiim took a hit.

We really are still evenly matched.

I paused for a second to catch my breath, and Blaarjiim did at the same time. " Tell me, old friend, why and when did we start fighting? "

" We aren't friends. We never were. " Blaarjiim took long, slow breaths, at the same tempo I did.

" Were we originally human, or were we demon? I can't even remember my original form. " My gaze dropped to my spear, the Gungnir. How long have I possessed this weapon? Was I born with it? Did I forge it in the clouds of heaven, perhaps the pits of Hell? Did I find it amongst some old ruins? Millions of years I have lived, always fighting Blaarjiim. My life is a blur. My goal in life seems distant and hazy.

Why do I wish to rule the labyrinth? Why do any of the demons there wish to? Am... I even a demon? Am I an angel? Most demons are weak to the power of light, but it makes me stronger.

I gazed up at the sun. This would be it. My final stand. I am strong in light, and Blaarjiim is strong in the dark, but against each other, neither of us ever holds an advantage.

I turned back to gaze upon the black, hideous aura that rippled off him. He had ingested thousands, even millions of souls from this world. He had consumed all life that could produce any form of thought energy. Even so, his power was still not greater than mine. Even if he consumed all life in the universe, I would still equal his power.

It was a curse that had haunted us for the shorter part of eternity, but it would end today. All thanks to the powers of this human.

" You still think humans are beneath you, don't you? You still, after all this time, underestimate their spirits. They have suffered much because of the Great War between angels and demons, but they still fight on. Across an infinite number of universes and an infinite number of worlds, they always fight on. They possess something neither you nor I possess. "

Blaarjiim gazed at me with interest. " Oh? And what might that be? "

" The survival instinct. Humans fear death more than anything else. They may willingly bludgeon one another to death, but in that same respect, they would do anything to make their short lives worth something. I have seen it time and again. With this hero, with Joan, and with many before her. They simply want to make the universe a wonderful place for their kind to live. "

Blaarjiim sneered. " And they will do anything, including genocide of their own kind. Truly enlightened. "

" No. Not enlightened, willful and proud. But above all else, they are an evolving species. Our kind is stale. They make new advances constantly, in their grasp for power. Someday, the average human will exceed this one's current abilities. "

" Exactly. This is why I must rule the labyrinth, so I can crush them before that happens. "

" No. I cannot allow you to achieve your goals. "

He charged at me suddenly, using his club to smash Gungnir from my hand. I quickly assumed a defensive stance and tried to repel him, but he grabbed me by the throat and slammed me to the ground.

" Even this probably won't kill you! You are an infuriating opponent! Why can't you just DIE so I can complete my quest?! "

I choked as his grip tightened. Wrapping my hands around the one he choked me with, I struggled mightily to pull him off me, but could not do so.

" Ha... ha ha... I said I would win, and I will not lie, I had hoped to finally defeat you here once and... for all, but... " I choked the words out as he held his grip on my throat. " ...you will not let me win the fair way... therefore I must use this child's power... just one more time. "

My eyes raised up to the sun again, as I gazed at its incredible glory. This will be the last time I see its light. Farewell, world of the humans.

I jerked my hand up and aimed it at the sun.

" SUPERNOVA! "

Part 091: Finale

My opponent took his hand off mine, and aimed it up in the sky.

Nothing happened.

" Ha... haha! That's it then, eh? "

I felt a tremendous amount of energy release from his body, the amount seemed to be nearly every ounce of power that he possessed, only a trickle stayed. His body and mind weakened noticeably.

I paused. " Hmm. Did you do something? "

I stepped off him and gazed up into the sky. Everything appeared to be normal. " Was that some kind of ultimate trump card? It didn't do a thing, you old fool! Gwahahaha! "

Hoarhiim weakly crawled to a sitting position on his knees. " I have learned many interesting things as of late. This child knows of a great human philosopher who once said 'Knowledge is power'. And since I possess knowledge that you don't, I possess power that you don't. "

I guffawed. A good bluff, as usual. Is this all Hoarhiim had become? A fantastic bluffer? I had expected so much more from him. When had my old rival turned to tricks and deceit? Was he not a warrior of the light?

" Hoarhiim, this is why I will rule the labyrinth someday, and you will not. Your age is starting to finally show. "

I chuckled softly to myself. However, Hoarhiim was not laughing. His face was completely blank, as he gazed up... at the sun. I turned around to look. Nothing had happened... why was he constantly looking upwards?

Hoarhiim sighed. " Humans invented a concept many ticks ago. It is a concept called Science, one you and I are far too old to understand. Truth be told, I would not know of Science were it not for the mind of this youth whom I have paired with. "

He continued. " To be brief, there are two things you must understand. The first is called the speed of light. Light travels at 186,000 miles per second. Nothing currently exists that this child knows of that can break the speed of light. " He turned his gaze from the sun towards me.

" The next thing you must understand is what a supernova is. A supernova is caused when a star explodes. The sun, up there, in the sky, is a star. "

I nodded. " Alright, I see now. But you've made a mistake. " I beckoned towards the in the sky. " It hasn't even exploded, you IDIOT! Gwaaaahaha! "

Hoarhiim smiled a gentle smile at me. " You still don't understand. I don't know at what speed my magic travels, but it's likely the Sun has already exploded. The light of its explosion simply hasn't reached us yet. "

I stopped laughing and paused to consider his words. " Wait... could you mean... it will reach us soon? "

Hoarhiim nodded. " The child does not yet understand the power of the Crown of Solomon. He is still a young whelp. But... I do. I have already made the calculations. The light of its explosion will reach us in four minutes, twenty-two seconds. "

He nodded at me slowly, knowingly. " And the instant you and I see it, we will already be dead. "

My heart stopped when he said this. Could it really be true? I have no idea if he's telling the truth but... in all the years I've known Hoarhiim... like a good little child of the light... he's never once lied to me.

" Hoarhiim... you must be jesting... if it explodes, we will both die. "

Hoarhiim stared at me, deep into my soul. " No, Blaarjiim. Have you forgotten? My orb is not with this child. I am safely hidden, elsewhere in the labyrinth. As I said, since the start, I have already won. "

My mouth gaped open and I fell to my knees. " You... you tricked me. You planned this... from the start. "

" Nay, I did no such thing. I merely made the most of an impossible opportunity. It was you, Blaarjiim, who devoured all the life on this world. If even a single soul were left, I would not have had the will to destroy the Sun. It was you, Blaarjiim, who destroyed the return path to the labyrinth. Had you not done that, this would have been an ultimately futile move. I made the most of the opportunities you gave me, but you... you are the one who created these opportunities. "

Hoarhiim got over, and walked up to me, placing his hand on my shoulder.

" Blaarjiim, it is you who killed your queen. "

For the first time, in my entire existence, I felt something deep inside me. Anguish. Sadness. Raw, previously untouched emotion.

" No... I can't... my queen, she... "

Hoarhiim took a step back. " And as for this child, he will not die on this day either. You couldn't win even a single meaningful battle on this desolate unforgiving world. Farewell, brother. "

And before I could make a move, he said a single word.

" Return "

The boy's body vanished.

Part 092: Chapter 1 End

As I returned to my body, I gazed around, looking for Hero. "Wow! Great job! You must have really destroyed him! I can't even see a trace of his body anywhere!"

Blaarjiim was unusually silent. Usually he'd be saying something like It was but a trifle, my queen, or I need no praise from you, only to stay with you forever. He's usually so romantic like that!

But... he's silent right now.

I looked around and spotted Beelzy standing all alone. How... odd.

"Oh Beeelzzzyyyy!!" I dashed over to him and waved in his face, but he was mute. Oh right, that guy, he's just a puppet now. Sigh.

There was no sign of Hero anywhere. I even used search magic, but of all the places I had traveled on the planet, he was in none of them.

" My... queen... "

Finally, Blaarjiim spoke up.

"Oh Blaarjiim, wow you must have done a heck of a job here! I can't find him anywhere!" I was giddy with excitement. Now me and Blaarjiim would be able to hang out and play in the grass and have all kinds of fun times! It kinda sucks we can't re-enter the labyrinth but it's fine, I love my minion to death!

" My lady... something happened, while I was in control... "

Blaarjiim sounded... sad? I've never heard him sound sad before. My smile disappeared as I looked at his orb with concern.

"Blaarjiim... are you okay? What happened while I was under?"

A long, uncomfortable pause. I didn't like this. I don't like it one bit.

" Hoarhiim appeared... during the final battle... and he won decisively. "

I frowned. "He won? But, we're still here. Wouldn't a decisive win mean that he killed us?"

" No my lady... he has escaped into the labyrinth along with the boy. We are trapped here. "

I stared at him silently. We're trapped? That's unfortunate. Maybe we can return to the labyrinth somehow. Magic is powerful. "Come now, don't be too hard on yourself. You guys have always stalemated when you fought. Even if he's back in the labyrinth and you destroyed the door to get back..." I gritted my teeth. This imbecile. What was he thinking, doing that without my permission? There's no more snacks here!

"Well, even if that is the case, don't worry about it!" I smiled cheerfully. Blaarjiim seemed to have taken this really hard. "We'll escape here eventually! Nothing can stop me if I put my mind to it!"

I sat down on the ground and kicked my feet up, and stared up at the sun. It was a beautiful white color. Strange though, I could have sworn this was a yellow sun before.

" My queen... we won't be returning to the labyrinth. We are in our last minutes together, if we even have that much time left. Hoarhiim did something incredible before he left... and we're going to die. "

I stopped smiling and stared at Blaarjiim. He wasn't joking. Whatever happened, it must have been horrible. "Blaarjiim, what happened? Just tell me already."

He paused again, as a mental image of him wincing entered my mind. " He used his power to create what he called a 'supernova'. It caused the sun to explode. We only had 4 minutes left before the blast hit us when he told me this... it has been three now. "

I quickly looked back up at the sun. Oh my god... it's even whiter than it was a minute ago, and noticeably dimmer.

"You're... not joking... are you?" I gaped at the sun that was dimming more and more every second. It was also getting smaller at a frightening speed.

" My queen... Amelia. Before we die. I wanted to say something that has been on my mind for thousands of years. "

I looked back into the pitch black orb. Blaarjiim's eyes mentally gazed into mine.

"You don't have to say it..." I whispered as tears started to cloud my vision. I could feel my chest tightening and breathing sharpen. "I... love you too, Blaarjiim."

In the blink of an eye, everything went white.

Part 093: Epilogue

I awoke suddenly, face down on a cold marble floor. The room I am in is dark, with only a single light source illuminating everything. Of course, I can't see light due to my blindness, but this was a light source that was perceivable due to it being spiritual energy.

"Hoarhiim!" I yelled in surprise and barely staggered to my feet. My body was in absolutely awful shape. I stumbled and fell back to the ground with a painful thud. The hard marble gnashed my broken bones together.

"H-Hoarhiim! How am I where you are?! I left you in Hero City!"

Hoarhiim projected a mental image of himself nodding. "Indeed you did. I used your wordsmithing to return you to myself."

I nodded slowly. "Then... wait! Amelia! Blaarjiim! What happened? You took over and I lost all consciousness! Are they still trapped on that world?"

Hoarhiim didn't answer for several seconds. "...yes. But, not for long."

I grew alarmed. "They will escape then? Damn! I had meant to put her down once and for all. I released her from her prison, and it should have been my job to put her back in it!"

Hoarhiim projected his face into my mind again. "Quiet. Stop using the crown and stop thinking so much. Listen carefully. After you let me take over your body, I fought with Blaarjiim for several long, grueling hours. He and I are polar opposite ends of the same coin. If one of us is strong, so is the other one. I finally won by causing the sun over that planet to explode. I used a spell derived from a word in your language. Supernova."

I paused for a second. Supernova? Like, making the sun explode? That's insane, how could Hoarhiim have that much power?

"You're sure they didn't survive, right?"

Hoarhiim was silent. "In less than two minutes, we will know for sure."

I frowned at his comment. "I see. Mysterious as always. And what about Beelzebub? Is he here?"

I glanced around but didn't see him. Hoarhiim mentally rubbed his head. "Ah, yes, there was another, wasn't there? Just recall him and he should be fine."

I nodded. I didn't have a whole lot of magical energy left, but this would have to do.

"Recall."

Beelzebub appeared in front of me, staring forward unblinkingly, as he always had.

"Heya Beelz, how are ya doing?"

He continued staring forward and spoke in a robotic voice. "I don't have any perception of feeling, but I would describe my body as in perfect condition, despite being your little toy puppet."

Goddamn, this guy is still as vicious as ever. "Ah, right. Hey, could you go upstairs and fetch Phoebe for me? Tell her we're in the Chicken Room."

Beelzebub nodded and walked away, up the stairs and out the door. I hope he doesn't give the other humans a fright. Come to think of it, maybe this was a bad idea...

Hoarhiim interrupted my train of thoughts. "Listen, Hero. When Amelia dies, as a feat for defeating her, according to Umi's rules, you will be granted a new name. Use it at your own peril. She is always watching you."

I turned back to look at Hoarhiim's orb, mounted on the altar. "You're very talkative lately. You don't usually speak this much."

"Yes. I have to be, if my suspicions are correct. Anyway, that doesn't matter. Listen, Hero, when we first met, you told me something important. You said you were from Earth. You were joking at that time, correct?" Hoarhiim seemed to be in a rush to get something out, but I didn't know what.

"Yes, I'm from Earth. It's not a joke. Why do you keep asking that?"

Hoarhiim projected a mental image of a flustered face. "Because it's impossible. Earth is the Original source. It's been dead for millions of years. You can't have possibly come from there."

Any trace of confusion or positive emotion that I may have had, washed away. "W-what? Dead? Surely you mean- and what wait, Source? The source of what?"

Hoarhiim seemed frantic now. "There's no time to explain you fool, if I'm correct then my time will be almost up. Listen, Umi is your enemy. You must find Marie, she is the key to all of this. If you can find Marie, you will have your que-"

Suddenly Hoarhiim's voice stopped. His mental image in my mind froze, almost like a bad video game glitch. I frowned. "Hoarhiim? Hello?"

Suddenly his mental image in my mind... fizzled, it made a motion like a VCR tape set to track incorrectly. Lines appeared in the image, and his mouth opened and let a wordless scream escape from it.

I watched in horror as his face dissolved from my mind. "Hoarhiim? HOARHIIM?!"

Phoebe and Beelzebub came walking downstairs at that exact moment. "Master? Why are you shouting like th-"

" HOARHIIM!! " I bellowed at the top of my lungs, as the light from his orb slowly faded, and a silvery, lifeless surface formed over it.

Hoarhiim was dead.

Part 094: Epilogue 2

I swallowed hard, as I stared at Hoarhiim's orb. It was silver, and completely dull. The silver looked almost like an unimaginably thick cloud had gathered inside his container.

Phoebe gasped as she saw him. "Oh... oh my... I'm so sorry... I just left for a moment but I didn't... he's..." She had her hand covering her mouth with a shocked expression blanketing her face.

"No, Phoebe, it's not your... fault..." I coughed the last word out. My body still badly ached. "Ah... Beelzebub, heal me please."

Beelzebub robotically walked towards me and then rolled his eyes. "I'm only doing this because you ordered, as I'm just a puppet. But at least you asked nicely." He did some fancy hand motions and my body started violently mending itself again, just as when I had healed myself over a year ago. That bastard, he did it with as much healing power on purpose, just to watch me squirm, didn't he?

After I healed, I quickly rose up and jumped at Hoarhiim's orb, still steadily sitting on its pedestal. And when I grasped ahold of his orb, I was confused but also filled with hope, as his orb was warm to the touch. Not terribly warm, but certainly about 80 degrees or so.

I picked up his orb gently and handed it to Phoebe. "Take him up to my room, I'll be there shortly."

Phoebe nodded and smiled. "By the way, Slayer, it's good to have you back." She turned and walked away.

Huh? Did she call me Slayer? I thought my name was Hero? What the hell?

I then remembered something Hoarhiim had said. According to Umi's rules, you will be granted a new name.

Umi. I don't know who that is. But if Umi sets the 'rules', then whoever it is, they must be very high up and very powerful.

Come to think of it, what rules was Hoarhiim referring to? I don't know of any rules.

I turned to Beelzebub. Seeing him stand there, robotic-like, I felt a bit of pity for him. With Hoarhiim gone, Beelzebub was the last being alive who had witnessed my powers and abilities after I left Hero City a year ago. Or, well, the last one who was still alive. I corrected myself.

"Beelzebub, is there a way I can restore you to your original self but still keep you under my control?" As a puppet, he has to answer honestly. Would be nice if he had at least some personality though, the current him was just depressing.

He turned and looked at me, for once without a robotic expression. "I ceased to be a demon of true sentience when you killed me, however I can become a loyal dog for you who has some semblance of a personality, if you still wish it."

I nodded. "I want your personality to come back."

"Fantastic." His voice was like dry bread scraped over a tongue. "I can't wait to serve you, oh great Slayer."

I paused. "There's that name again, Slayer. Why is everyone calling me Slayer now?"

Beelzebub rolled his eyes again. "Because obviously your actions led to the slaying of a demon so feared and reviled by her own kind that they refused to even break her out of an enchanted prison. I mean it's not the hardest thing in the universe to figure out, you know."

Beelzebub walked over and sat on the stone steps. "Finally, you gave me a degree of autonomy back. I'm so... thankful for your generosity." He let that word, 'thankful', roll off his tongue sarcastically. "I just don't know what I'd do without your guiding hand."

I walked over to him and hunched down, sitting cross legged on the floor in front of him. "Beelz, would you be so kind as to tell me what the 'rules' are for living in this place?"

Beelzebub had a small snarl cross his lips. "Don't you ever call me by- ah, I mean..." His snarl vanished as his face suddenly stiffed and then loosened again. Some effect of Puppet? Was he unable to speak back viciously to his master? Good to know. "...I mean, I'd be happy to tell you. Shocking that you don't know, you've roamed this labyrinth for nearly two years and were totally clueless on protocols that govern it. I'm shocked you're still alive."

I nodded, as Beelzebub began to explain.

Part 095: Truly Final Epilogue

Nobody at the table wanted to speak first. This was truly unprecedented. They all just stared wordlessly at the report placed in front of them, as they flipped through the pages.

A full report of the battle between Amelia/Blaarjiim and Slayer/Hoarhiim.

Finally, Diablo broke the silence. "This is... unprecedented."

Agares nodded. "This level of destruction... he wiped an entire solar system off the map." His crocodile made a rumbling noise and he reached down to pet it. "Quiet precious, shh."

Bael spoke loudly. "It's truly unbelievable! Not only did the Slayer win, he won conclusively, and destroyed the Lord of Darkness, the Lord of Flies, and even the previous First Emperor as well!"

President Ose pointed at something on the page as she twirled her blond hair and adjusted her glasses. "You're forgetting something though. It was not the Slayer who destroyed the star, it was Hoarhiim."

Bael glanced back at the paper and then nodded. "Ah, yes, I see the error. Interesting. So Hoarhiim finally managed to achieve a full merge with his vessel? Amelia and Blaarjiim had done that for ages. What took him so long?"

Mephisto spoke up, his pale ethereal form betraying no hint of emotion. "Beyond that, this 'Wordsmithing' as Umi calls it, it has too many unique applications. It would seem that Beelzebub and his minions were defeated by a single word. It has powers that can be activated practically in an instant."

President Ose nodded, as she reached into her bag and pulled out a new set of papers. "You're absolutely correct, Duke Mephisto. Which is why Umi has created a new guide that we must follow if we are to actually defeat the Slayer."

Bael sneered as he took the guide in his hands. "Really now? Are we that worried about him? A single puny human?"

"That 'single puny human' just put an end to the two terrors that killed and enslaved Satan some millennia ago. It's hard to overestimate his abilities at this point." Diablo chided Bael and he quieted down at the Third Emperor's words.

"Yes, but what is most interesting in the report is that Amelia was able to nullify the Hero's instant death techniques. She made it look effortless." Agares indicated a line on the initial report, before setting it down and picking up the new guide. After skimming a few lines, he smiled devilishly. "Ah, it would seem I have spoken too soon. Umi never fails to amaze me."

Mephisto was also scanning the document. "How she manages to get this information is beyond me. She must be a truly brilliant oracle compared to all of the past ones we've used."

Ose smiled. "Indeed she is. Now if you will, turn to page one. We need to start setting up barriers for the instant death words, like 'kill' and 'die'."

The others at the table nodded in agreement, and the night grew long.

Part 096: The Beginning

I walked along with my child, a boy of youthful stature but with a strong aura about him. "He will lead the tribe one day.", that is what the village guru had told me. Aaron was my oldest boy of my 6 children, and I treasured him above the others.

A father should not pick sides. A father should love all his children equally. But Aaron was special. He was fearless. A great warrior, a great leader, he will be one of these someday, probably both.

Aaron and I paused at the stream, our spears in hand. "Aaron, today is your tenth birthday. You will have to become a man now, and start helping the other men in the village."

Aaron nodded as we stared at the stream.

I pointed at the water in front of us. "However, you cannot become a man until you are able to catch ten fish in a single day. Do I make myself clear?"

He stared at the water for a few seconds. "Yes father. I will do it on my first try."

Confident. That's why I loved my boy. Aaron was always so sure of his abilities. He always did things right the first time. He listened carefully, followed his instructions, and often improved the task during the process. These were qualities a village leader would need, especially when we may soon have to go to war with neighboring tribes for food and hunting ground expansion.

Aaron readied his spear as he hunched down and waded into the water. If I know Aaron, he'll easily complete this task. I'm not so sure about his brothers, but this will be a trifle for him.

Aaron stood quietly for several minutes, his body poised to attack. His eyes wordlessly followed the movement of the creatures below him. I took a seat on the bank and swigged some water from my canteen.

Aaron steadied himself as a rather large trout drew near. I smiled and leaned in, staring intently. In the blink of an eye, Aaron stabbed down and pierced the fish, impaling directly through the center of its body. A clean kill. Hoisting it up out of the water, he cheered wildly. "One down, nine to go!!"

I smiled at him, and broke out into a huge grin. "Well done, my son! You always make me so proud!"

Aaron beamed back at me, and as he turned to look away, he halted. And stared at something behind me with a look of... horror?

I tried to turn around but could not. I was... falling? I fell to the ground, as a silent agony overtook me. What?! Where am I?! Why is it getting... so... hard to... see... things...

I stared in horror as the demonic four legged beast cleanly chopped off my father's head. I gazed in terror as his smiling expression stayed frozen on his face as he silently fell to the ground. His head landed with a thud, and then... his eyes closed, forever.

I couldn't move. I couldn't speak. Absolute terror overtook my body. Demons. They were sighted now and again, but I've only ever heard father tell me stories about the imps. Small little creatures, easily kicked out of the way or stabbed to death. Troublemakers to be sure, and dangerous in large packs, but mostly harmless and annoying.

But... but... this... thing that had killed my father... I couldn't stop trembling. I've never been so afraid in my life. It stood upright, and it was only 5 feet tall, but imps are only a foot tall usually. This monstrosity was terrifying compared to the imps I'd heard of. It had two long arms, but each arm was simply a long piece of flesh with an unimaginably sharp sword on the end. This... thing existed purely to cut and kill.

It hissed at me as it curled up its lips into a smile. "Small human. You will tell your people that we will no longer be trampled and spat on. We are the Scyther, the first evolution of the Demon race. Be on your guard, for we will cut you all to pieces. Our time for revenge is nigh."

The creature gasped and wheezed, a noise I could only assume was the sound of a gross vile sounding laugh.

"Sorry about your daddy, little boy. I'll leave him for you to bury. Heh heh heh... humans are so weak."

And with that, the demon turned around and slowly walked back into the forest.

I stared at the body of my father, now slumped over, with huge gouts of blood spouting out of his neck. It finally tumbled over, coming to a rest on the ground.

Father... I can't... I couldn't even protect you... you have no right to be proud of me...

Suddenly, anger filled my mind.

The demons. I will make them pay.

Part 097: Hatred

Aaron surveyed the remnants of the battlefield. Bodies of humans, demons, and angels lie everywhere. Bits and pieces of arms, legs, weapons, you name it, they were strewn all over the place.

He stopped at a particularly disgusting corpse that had been mutilated worse than many of the others. It had large gashes torn all throughout it, and chunks of the chest and intestine were missing. This one was likely attacked and partially eaten. His stomach quivered. Not out of nausea, but out of rage.

"These villagers were good people. We didn't make it in time. The whole place perished."

Gabriel walked over and placed a hand on Aaron's shoulder. "Commander Aaron, don't take it so harshly. It's not your fault. Nobody could have predicted a new evolution this soon."

Aaron bit his lip as he fought back emotions. He stared over at the corpse of one of the new demon hybrids. " Wraiths. These monsters are so fast. We had preparations for the other four but..." Aaron trailed off as tears came boiling up. "I failed these people, just like I failed my father."

Gabriel took his hand off Aaron's shoulder. "We lost many angels too, you know. Casualties always happen on the field of battle. You shouldn't take it personally, the demons are crafty and tricky. They will always be the enemy of humans and Angels. They always deal in tricks and surprises."

Aaron stared numbly at the carnage in front of him. 25,000. That was the number of dead humans and angels. And the demons had only lost 3,000. "They adapt quickly. They evolve quickly. We can't even react until after they slaughter thousands of us. What hope do we have against these fast breeding monstrosities?"

Gabriel paused and contemplated the young man's words. "Perhaps... you should try to evolve faster than them? You humans have your weapons. With some ingenuity, perhaps you can create new ones to combat the demonic plague."

Aaron sighed. What good is a spear against a demon? Even a shortbow can't take them out at range. Only our copper swords deal damage, but we have to be right in their path. We lose every time.

"Gabriel... thank you. Without the help of the angels, humanity would surely go extinct." Aaron bowed his head lightly as he looked away from the destruction around him.

"No, child. It is a relationship of mutual benefits. Give worship to the one who created you. Be thankful for his blessings. And above all else, never fail to appreciate the gift of life that you were given in this world." Gabriel smiled as he turned around, sprouted wings, and flew up into the sky.

Aaron stared in wonder. To have wings... what a true joy it must be to soar among the clouds like that. He waved goodbye as Gabriel flew away, until he could no longer see him in the distance.

Part 098: Oracle

The demons gathered around, chittering and chattering excitedly as their almighty leader strode forwards confidently through the hall and up to his throne at the top of the war council room.

His face projected no emotion. But his body language projected fearlessness and power.

"W-we are so unworthy of your presence, great lord Satan, nyahahaha!" a little imp babbled excitedly as he zipped along the side of Satan's feet.

Two Wraiths stood, one at each side of his throne, mighty spears in hand. Their large and unwieldy looking forms belied their speed and agility. They were impossibly speedy assassins, sent to kill the high rankers in a human and angel army before the rest of the demonic forces swarmed and took out the rest.

However, these two were special wraiths, the second and third ever to evolve.

"Diablo, Lucifer, a pleasure to see you two as usual."

Satan walked up the bloody red carpeted steps and took a seat at the great throne. He sat down in a single smooth motion, no movement wasted. Satan was not like the other demons, he was the first one to evolve. He had been the first to kill a human. He had been the one to teach his brethren the art of evolution. But he had already evolved twenty times. His brethren, even the fastest of them, such as Diablo and Lucifer, had only evolved seven times.

Satan was a prodigy among demons, the only one who could be called a worthy leader. And now, he had reached a surprising new tier in his evolution. Oracle.

An unprecedented tier compared to the ones before him. It opened up his mind to psionic energy, allowing him to see things that could not normally be seen, and predict things normally thought unpredictable, such as the future. He had been using this as of late in a multitude of ways, notably to crush human armies and pick out the dangerous targets.

But... his power had many other practical applications.

He turned and handed a tablet over to Belial, one of his trusted subordinates. "Here is a list of my recommendations for the qualified candidates. See to it the Matriarch and the Breeders get this."

Belial nodded, her voice hissing as a small amount of smoke came out of her mouth. "Yessss, master Satan. I am but a tool for your hands to work." Belial did not evolve like the other imps did, she had a unique evolution, one that skipped the multi-legged branch and rose instead up a more human-looking branch. She walked on two legs, and instead of talons, she had five fingers remarkably similar to a humans' hands. Satan suspected she would be of incredible use in the future, if he could just figure out how to make her look identical to a human.

Satan indicated the vast War Board on the Great Table in front of the throne. It sat about fifty feet away, but Satan had perfect vision as an Oracle and he had no difficulty seeing every bit of it. "Lord Bael, how goes the conquest of the human tribes to the east?"

Bael snorted. "The humans are uniting with the angels, but they lack leadership, and the angels see humans more like disposable pawns. The humans, likewise, see the angels as divine guardians, but they fear them and thus cannot bear to give orders to the angels, lest they offend them."

Bael laughed quietly. "They mesh together poorly. Compared to your superior leadership, they have no chance."

Satan nodded. "It's been ten short years, but look at all the progress we've made. We breed like ants, the humans like goats. We've killed off 5% of their population across the Earth already, and within a century, they will be eliminated."

The imps nearby giggled wildly. "Eliminated! Killed! Death! Destroy! Rip and tear apart! Nyahahaha!"

Satan beamed a big smile, something he rarely did these days. A leader must be feared, so only rarely would he ever project emotions for his minions to see. "Yes, finally. We are going to win this war quickly. We are going to crush the humans. And then we will crush the Angels."

His grin grew terrifying as a dark aura clouded around him. "And once we have killed off the humans and the angels... our revenge will be complete."

Part 099: Heaven

Gabriel arrived finally, landing at the secret entrance hidden in the mountain of Sinai. After having passed through the holy gate that hid the entrance, and several halls including a short pause at the Halls of Solitude, he found the dimensional rift that sent him to the Other Realm.

A truly marvelous place. The original reason for its creation was lost to eternity, but all gods and angels knew it had been created by the original, the highest God, who bore no known name. Famed throughout time as the Unknowable and the Untouchable, he disappeared, and was never seen or heard from again.

Gabriel entered the clouds of Heaven and entered through the gate that barred his way. He passed many familiar faces along the way, stopping to chat and say hello. He was a well liked angel, one of the Original Seven. Everyone knew his name.

He entered the halls of Olympus, the meeting place of the various gods. Only certain gods were barred from entering here, but their names were sacrilegious and never to be spoken aloud in this holy place.

Gabriel walked up to the throne of Kronos, leader of the Western world. Kronos was the son of Titans, the original beings created by the One who had made the universes. He was a colossal figure, towering over all beings. Titans were massive, like walking mountains. It is said that when they were defeated, their bodies formed the soil of the lands and gave birth to life as we know it.

Whether any of that is true or not remains to be seen.

Gabriel bowed in front of the throne. "King Kronos, it is my honor to speak to you."

Kronos looked down and saw Gabriel at his feet. "Ah, Gabriel. Good of you to return alive. How went the battle?"

Gabriel stiffened as he bowed, and then quickly smoothed himself and rose up to face the King of gods. "My lord, we are losing badly. The humans are being slaughtered, and even our forces have difficulty dealing with the demon hordes."

Kronos paused, staring long and hard at Gabriel. "Hmm. It is as you say. And the thought energy? Are we collecting it? Are the humans giving it freely?"

Gabriel nodded. "There is still much resistance, but many of the humans are now even openly worshipping us. Every time they pray, they give us much thought energy to combat the demons with."

Kronos smirked. "Good. As long as they do that, we will win this awful war. It's not like the humans have need of it anyway." He leaned back and sat straight on his throne. "Gabriel, soon we will have enough thought energy to create the first Cosmos Class angel. I want you to know that due to your diligent work, I have selected you to receive this honor."

Gabriel, not one to usually show heavy emotions, gasped at this revelation. "M-my King! Such an honor...? You think me worthy of it?"

Kronos nodded sagely. "Indeed. You have killed more demons now than any other angel, even five of our mightiest angels combined would not equal your might. You are clearly the mightiest."

Gabriel slowly shook his head. "But, of Michael and Raphael, I am only the third-"

Kronos raised a hand to silence him and then glared down at Gabriel. "You're not about to reject an offer by your King, are you? Raphael and Michael are their own beings. You are skilled at battle, they have far many other contributions to make. You will receive this honor graciously."

Gabriel nodded, dumbfounded at the news. He bowed his head humbly. "Yes, my liege. I will do as you command. Until then, I will keep fighting for the sake of the humans."

" Angels." Kronos clarified, a tinge of venom in his voice. "You fight for the angels. Understood?"

Gabriel nodded again quickly. "Of course, my liege. Of course. Just... a small slip of the tongue."

"Good. I don't like mistakes. You've done very well for yourself so far, and soon you will be on a level high enough to collect your own thought energy from the humans. Try not to sympathize with them too much. They are just vermin to be used, after all."

Gabriel nodded. "I understand. I shall take my leave."

Kronos smiled, his expression softening visibly. "Good, begone then. And Gabriel... take care of yourself. If you die before the energy is collected, someone else will have to become the first."

Gabriel nodded. "Don't worry, my king. I will not be killed by the monstrosities below us. I would never allow that to happen."

Part 100: A Beautiful Day

A cool breeze swept across the plains, as the sun shone down upon the soft, rolling meadow. Trees with flowers were blossoming, fruits were ripe, and birds chirped sweetly to one another.

This is hell.

The two armies faced off on opposite sides of the field. Humanity was led by the Slayer, a man of incredible powers who had united all the nearby populations together to battle the menace to their future.

Across from them lay a great army of demons of various shapes and sizes, along with other uncommon and rare specimens, such as werewolves and whitewalkers, along with orcs and goblins. They were led by Mephisto, the Duke of Mist. He was a creature of intangible characteristics, his body being mostly transparent and ghostly.

Mephisto smirked at the army in front of him. "Nothing you do will ever matter. You have no way to defeat us. If you should surrender now, I will promise you a swift, painless death."

"And join you as undead soldiers in your army of evil? Never!!" The man screamed a mighty battle cry, and his army charged forwards. Mephisto did the same, leading his minions into the fray as they licked their lips eagerly.

I screamed in rage, as one of my soldiers, Darius, was cut down by an orc right in front of me. "You BASTARD!", raising my personally forged mighty battle axe up, I swung it down with incredible power, cleaving the orc cleanly in two. The other demons and monsters nearby took a step back in fright as they witnessed my inhuman power. Good.

Raising my axe again, I screamed unintelligible words of rage as I charged through their lines, slicing anything down that got in my way, shoving my men out of my way with brute strength as my gargantuan body plowed through foes towards my ultimate goal: Mephisto.

He stood with two orc guardians at his side, both of them massive monsters equal to my size. When they saw me charging, they squealed in fright and jumped out of the way. Mephisto smiled as I charged. "Come at me, 'Great' Leader. I'll test what you're made of."

He never even saw my attack coming. I swung my axe down suddenly and it passed right through his body as if it didn't exist. I grinned. "Now I've cut you down to size."

Then I gasped. He was perfectly fine. I had literally passed right through him. He appeared to have an incorporeal form.

He grinned even wider as he saw my confusion. "A good effort, but you'll have to do better than that."

Rushing the few feet that separated us, he closed the distance in a millisecond, shoving his palm forwards, and solidifying it the instant it hit me. In fact, he even made it pass through my arms I had put up to protect my face, impacting me square in the jaw.

I went flying, careening backwards, my massive body smashing down friend and foe. Anyone in the path of my flight was knocked over or crushed to death instantly.

I gasped as pain overtook my face. I don't need to see anything so my eyes are a moot point, but my jaw hurt like hell. This transparent ghost demon is no slouch.

" Heal! " I spit the word out, the agony in my jaw almost making it impossible to speak. That was a close one.

I quickly healed my face. I didn't notice the slightest drop in my spiritual energy. At least there's that. But this guy...

I aimed my hand at him. " Die! "

Nothing happened, of course. It wasn't working on any of the demons anymore, not even the lesser ones. I always tried it though, just to be sure. You never know when a proud demon might ignore the countermeasures and offer me a freebie on a silver platter.

Mephisto cackled with delight. "That's it?! Try again!"

I grimaced as I formulated a plan. If he wants to play this game, let's do it. I'll play ball. I aimed my hand at him again. " Corporeal! "

Suddenly his body came clearly into view. He seemed confused for a second, then he realized what had happened. As I suspected, he didn't protect against that complicated word from my native language. "Smart move human, but what if I do this?"

With a quick movement of his hands, he became immaterial again, then he did another movement after that one, and nothing seemed to happen. I yelled again.

" Corporeal! " And I quickly charged before he could cast his spell again, but- ah! He had protected himself from my word! He was still transparent, trying to come to a quick halt as I realized my mistake, I stumbled for a single second as he flew at me, passed through my body, appeared on the other side, and punched me in the back, sending me smashing face first onto the ground. He used a lot more force this time compared to the last.

I wheezed as the wind was knocked out of me. I tried to heal myself but I couldn't get the word out.

"Having trouble speaking, you scant little rodent? It's hard to use your spells if you can't speak, isn't it?" He cackled with delight once more.

These demons... over the last 5 years, they've gotten so much more powerful, or perhaps they are simply becoming more used to my manner of fighting. Now they're even targeting my mouth, throat, and jaw. But, I always have a trump card waiting, just in case that happens.

I gasped as I jumped to my feet. I quickly cast another spell. This was one I hadn't used before, at least not in front of the enemy.

" Slow! " Time crawled to a halt around me, as that familiar feeling of deja vu overtook me. This is just like what happened the first time Hoarhiim and I... no... best not to think about that.

Time was slowed, and my mental speed was still incredibly fast, but my body was slowed significantly as well. Time to fix that.

" SSSSPPPEEEEEEDDDDD! "

My mouth slowly formed the words as I put a ton of energy into it, directing the spell at myself.

Suddenly, my body moved normally. I quickly glanced all around me. Mephisto's eyes very slowly and poorly tracked onto my position. I've got lots of time now. I raced over to one of my men who was a second away from being brained by a particularly big orc with a spiked club. I decapitated the orc in one smooth motion and kicked the club out of the way as it fell, making it smash on the ground beside the man. He probably had no idea what happened, the lucky bastard.

I quickly and efficiently decapitated several other monsters in the area, as I felt my energy noticeably starting to decrease. The 'slow' spell is a cost over time ability, and moving around while time is slowed causes my energy to drop rapidly. I'll have to wrap this up quickly.

I quickly ran up behind Mephisto, who was slowly turning to try and follow my movement from earlier. " Flesh! "

The spell failed. Damn. " Material! Physical! " Neither of those worked either. This son of a- wait! One more word, he probably doesn't know this one!

" Tangibility! "

He slowly became flesh and blood in front of me, as he tried to track onto the position he heard my words coming from. I grinned evilly. You're finished.

In the blink of an eye, I decapitated him, chopping up other parts of his body into bits, and finally smashed the rest of the pieces down with the flat of my massive axe, literally crushing him into pulp before he could respond.

My energy is running low.

I quickly jumped up to a vantage point on a nearby rock, smashing a skeleton archer out of the way with a single blow. Poor boney bastard, he's lucky he can't feel pain.

Aiming my mind simultaneously at every one of my troops on the battle field I screamed at the top of my lungs.

"RECALL!!!"

Instantly, all my men vanished and returned to the designated point I had set before the battle. The enemies still slowly swung down at opponents that were no longer there. I grinned as my breath came in ragged gasps. Time is of the essence now. I'm down to critical levels of energy. I spared a quick glance back at the clone I had created before the battle. Good, he's in position. He'd goddamn well better be. They seem to be getting more and more independent these days.

I raised both hands and aimed them in the sky, as I formed a mental image of the biggest most solid and dense object I possibly could.

"METEORRRRR!"

From the heavens, the meteor that I had seen in one of my dreams appeared, but far bigger than even I imagined. As the last bit of energy drained from my body, I gasped two words when I saw the size of the object I had summoned.

"Oh... fuck..."

Darkness took me.

Part 101:

I awoke in a cold sweat. My clone stood over me, silently. Thankfully, my ploy had worked.

General Alexander and I had planned the attack on Mephisto for weeks. We didn't know much about him, but I've gained a lot of power over these few years. I've lost a lot of friends too. Too many...

Ever since Hoarhiim ceased to exist, I've been searching for answers. I need to solve the puzzles. Nothing I try will bring him back to life, no words or spells, nothing. He seems to be completely dead, but his orb stays warm, no matter what. I refuse to believe he is completely gone.

Many think me mad, but I believe that if I can achieve enough power and energy, I may be able to bring him back. He was my first real friend, he protected me, even at the cost of his own life, and I will not let him be forgotten so easily.

I stared at the flowers in the jar next to my bed. Phoebe must have put them there. She's always so thoughtful like that. She's been with me by my side for twelve years now. Ten years since Amelia was defeated. The demon kings, dukes, and lords no longer approach me, since they know I am dangerous. Those who do are swiftly defeated.

Today was unique though, as Mephisto was the first duke I've faced. He was definitely troublesome, with that intangibility... but thanks to my careful preparation and use of the Crown of Solomon, I had given myself enough leeway to deal with any irregularities during the battle.

I'm... maturing. I wasn't originally able to fully realize the power of Solomon's Crown, but I'm much more skilled at battle tactics than before. To be honest though, I'm giving myself too much credit. It was Captain Adams, the man I had left as co-ruler of the city, who had made the suggestion. "We have forty million men women and children. Why not make use of them and take the fight to the demons?"

The idea seemed silly. What use were regular humans against powerful demons, even against lesser monsters? But then Captain Adams explained his plan to me in great detail. It was a simple plan, really.

First, I start making clones. My clones don't vanish over time. Even if it takes a decent chunk of energy out of me, each clone will last forever or until they're killed, and they're far stronger than the average human.

Next, I set the clones to start training regiments of human soldiers, buffing the soldier's abilities gradually over time, hunting down the ones who seem most skilled and promoting them up the ladder.

By creating a formalized military force, and using the powers of my wordsmithing, we quickly began advancing the human army forwards, and soon we were a formidable force. Individually we were definitely weaker than the demons, but we possessed large numbers, and my clones were effectively their own fighting, mage, and healer force.

For his talent, I came to realize that I was not a worthy brandisher of the Crown of Solomon. So, contrary to every emotion in my body, I gifted it to him.

The results were astounding. I... am not a military genius. I'm a pretty smart guy, but I shouldn't be leading armies into battle. At least, not tactically. Adams, with the Crown of Solomon on, recreated my entire notion of a tactical genius. If I didn't know any better, I'd call him the reincarnation of Solomon himself.

Humanity's Army of Labyrinth Liberation. HALL. Adams named our new army to inspire zealotry for us, and fear for the enemy. HALL came to be a name whispered and feared among the low ranking demons, and openly debated among the high rankers. They just don't know how to deal with us.

It's been ten long years, but finally, we're ready to take the fight to them.

General Alexander, a high ranking officer in the army of HALL was by my bedside. "Good morning Slayer. It is a great joy to see you awake, though your clone would not have let you die so easily."

I nodded as I yawned. "We won, correct?"

His mouth jerked lightly as he replied. "Yes, but the results weren't... entirely positive. Demon planet Beta Omnicron 4 is... gone."

I stared into his eyes. "...Gone? What do you mean?"

He stared back, his eyes boring into my soul. "What I mean is... that meteor wiped out all life on the planet. You badly overdid it."

I swallowed. "My god... I... curses..." I muttered under my breath as I bowed my head towards my legs. I wanted a big meteor to strike down and destroy the army in a single shot, but that was...

Alexander cleared his throat. "Don't worry about it. We lost the planet, but there are plenty of others. One loss won't kill us. You safely recalled all our troops to the capital, as instructed, so the damage was minor."

I chuckled wryly. "Yes... and clearly my clone recalled himself and I in the nick of time." I glanced up at the clone. He stared ahead, blankly. Looks are deceiving. They don't speak unless receiving orders or casting spells, except for unique circumstances, but the clones are surprisingly free-willed. They also make for merciless drill sergeants and grill the troops like nobody's business.

I looked back to Alexander. "How is the door garrison doing? Anything to note?"

He shook his head. The twenty clones there are well taken care of, no intruders have been sighted in Hero City for months. Oh, and before you ask, the portal room is secured too."

I nodded again. The portal room. Another of Adams' brilliant ideas. I was the only known being who could create them. If I used the Crown's mental mapping ability, I could summon a portal to any spot anywhere in all universes and dimensions. I simply had to either know exactly where it was, or have another clone in that location. Adams had a special room built and a clone left on standby who could summon portals that led to any clone or any mental mapping spot in the labyrinth. The latter was only possible if said clone wore the crown.

To that end, since only one person could wear the Crown at any given time, Adams and I had created a co-ownership rule and set it on the crown. Myself, any of my clones, or Adams could wear it at any given time. It's worked out well for us. Humanity is at a peak never before witnessed.

Alexander spoke again. "Ah, that reminds me. Adams wishes to speak to you regarding something. Would you be so kind as to go see him when you're feeling better?"

I nodded. "I'm feeling fantastic right now. I really know how to heal myself, isn't that right, me?" I aimed my question in the general direction of my clone. He didn't respond. Man, that me is a real jerk.

"Good to hear. Make it soon, then. You know how his plans require as much time as possible."

"Right, right." I said simply, as I rose off the bed. I wonder what he wants to talk about?

Part 102:

I stepped out of my cottage and breathed in deeply. The sun shone down brightly on Hero City. Funny, it's still named after my previous name, but it's too embedded into people's minds to change it. Oh well.

My cottage was a small thing compared to the castle, but it suited my tastes. The castle is just too big and gaudy for me, and besides, who needs all that space? Better to leave it to Adams. He's just overall a smarter ruler than I am.

I walked off my front porch, past the row of flowers that Phoebe had planted. She lived in her own cottage on the other side of the road, but she took care of both of our houses. A truly kind and generous woman. I still don't know what these flowers are called though, they look totally different from anything I saw on Earth, and the name is hard to pronounce in its native language.

Walking down the lane, I gazed up at the buildings in Hero City. This city was positively massive now. It used to be a population of 40 million, but in just ten years we've added another 20 million or so. Not just from births and such, but from friendly monsters that have joined our forces (they exist!) and humans we've rescued from other worlds.

Honestly, I'm beginning to worry. This world is small. Like, the Moon that I remembered from Earth dwarfs it. I don't even know how grass, trees, weather, and all that other stuff developed on this world. Truly baffling laws of physics.

Right now, Adams is desperately searching for a bigger inhabitable world. The crown gives him the Mental Map ability when he wears it, and he's scouted out many doorways in the maze. Every monster we run into is a death trap waiting to happen though, and he is a truly kind king who cares for all of his subjects. He wants none of them to die in those labyrinths. There is no such thing as a death statistic to him, and he attends the funeral of all explorers who die in that wretched hell. He's truly the greatest man I've ever known.

As I walked down the street towards the castle, I spotted a commotion. Normally I'd send a clone to take care of it, but I decided to investigate it myself.

"Thieves!" I heard a man yelling in the distance.

Two men were robbing a female shopkeeper and had just fled the scene of the crime. They were surprisingly fast, though nowhere near as fast as me.

I quickly darted in front of them, lightly slapping them and sending them smashing onto the ground. They were completely dazed and I called for the nearby guards to apprehend them. I walked away from the criminals and some citizens shouted my name in thanks. Always nice to be appreciated!

But still... humans stealing from other humans? We should be fighting the demons, not each other. We should be stealing what is theirs, not what is ours.

I continued towards the castle. As I walked up the steps two guards saluted at me. I saluted back and gave a nod as I walked past.

After a few minutes of walking, I arrived in the War Room. Adams was sitting there chatting with two of his top generals, but he waved them off as I entered.

"Slayer. Good to see you!" He smiled cheerfully and requested a nearby maid to bring me some tea as I sat down. "I'm glad to see you are okay. I had worried when I heard what, um, happened."

I nodded sheepishly. "Yes, I must have gotten carried away. I still don't know my own power."

He shrugged. "These things happen. At least it wasn't a planet filled with humans, it was a demon planet. All that matters is that you learn from your mistakes."

I nodded. We continued conversing for a few minutes about the battle and how I defeated the Duke of Mist.

"Interesting, he was an ethereal being then? Just another ability to watch out for. Have you fought ghosts or any other beings like him before?"

I shook my head. "No. I have yet to see any in the labyrinth. He caught me completely off guard."

Adams took a swig from his cup and gently set it back down. "That could have been bad. I wonder why he didn't solidify his hand inside your body and rip your heart out or something?"

I cringed at that mental image. "Ah... yeah. Strange. Maybe he's simply never fought an opponent like me, and thought he could toy with me?"

Adams nodded slowly, deep in thought. "...Maybe... you defeated him so easily... I just... I find it hard to believe he was a Duke. He didn't sound that powerful to me."

I stared at the table in front of me. "Yeah... I don't know. Maybe..."

We both sat quietly for a minute, deep in thought.

Adams perked up again after a short while. "Oh yes! The reason I called you here! I have a request of you."

I nodded. "All right, what do you need?"

Adams suddenly looked confused, as if he was searching for a word. "It's, ah... it's hard to explain. See, you've been increasing the physical, spiritual, and mental strength of our soldiers with your clones and their wordsmithing but..." He paused, itching his head. "It's just that, we need some kind of new weapon or something. Something that makes our troops not have to get so close to the enemy. And not a bow and arrow either. Something more potent, you know? Ah... I can't even explain it. It's like the knowledge is there but I just can't tap into it."

I stared at him, the wheels in my head turning. Certainly, such things existed. But the problem is, I don't understand how to make such devices. Guns. What we need is guns. We need to blam blam boom boom the enemy to death. If we get in close, we're mincemeat. Even heavily buffed humans are no match for orcs and skeleton warriors with the body strength and endurance of ten men.

But I don't know how to make guns. I can't understand the theory behind their creation, even with the Crown on my head.

"The word you want, it's called a gun." I spoke up. Maybe if I explained what I knew, it would help Adams. "Guns are a weapon that existed on my world that I came here from. They are a metal weapon that fire small or large projectiles at enemies. Their range is far superior to a bow and arrow, as is their stopping power. The problem is, I don't know how to make them."

Adams paused, and then he clasped his hands together on the table and leaned forwards. "Can you explain anything to me? Anything at all? Just give me the basics. I'll make it work."

I shrugged and pulled a piece of paper from the stack on the edge of the table and a pencil as well. "Let me see that crown. I'm not a good artist, but I'll try and illustrate what I do know."

Adams quickly handed the Crown over to me. "Slayer... if this works... you have no clue how much it will help myself and the future of humanity."

I paused and stared up at him. "You're wrong. I do know. That's why I'm desperately hoping you can make this work, Adams. I trust in you, fully."

Part 103: Plans

Diablo smashed his fist on the table with incredible force. The table shook but did not break, due to the Demonstone's nigh-unbreakable properties. "WHAT?! He completely destroyed the entire planet?! Are you out of your MINDS?!"

Everyone at the table shrunk back a little bit, some winced visibly. Even Bael, usually the loudest and most boisterous at the table, was not keen to be heard.

"You listen here. This is NOT acceptable. We've been taking losses for TEN years now! TEN YEARS! I want RESULTS!" Diablo smashed his foot onto the ground in rage, and the entire room shook from the impact. Luckily the entire room was crafted out of Demonstone, explicitly for this reason. Diablo was prone to fits of rage.

Mephisto was the first to recover. "My liege, I accept full responsibility. I allowed him to corner me and as a result my world was destroyed. I will accept any punishment."

Diablo snorted angrily, his nostrils flaring as his blood boiled with rage. He glanced up and took note of the missing phoenix flower, usually tucked under Mephisto's ear. "You... wasted... HER GIFT!" He whipped his hand out and backhanded a glass of wine that had shifted precariously close to the edge, and the glass exploded in a fantastic display, smashing against the wall at super-sonic speeds.

He snorted again, this time visibly slower, as his rage seemed to subside somewhat. It seemed to most present that he'd gotten the truly angry bits out of his system. "That feather... it was the last artifact that she left us... you weren't supposed to USE it! You were supposed to hold onto it in case someone else needed it. You're supposed to be unkillable for devil's sake!"

Mephisto cringed and shrunk down in his seat a little.

Ose interrupted. "It's too late to worry about that now, Emperor Diablo. We have more important matters to attend to." She pulled out more papers from her bag and most of the table's members sighed. "Umi has reports for us to look over."

Bael threw his hands up in the air. "Fantastic! I love reading reports! Highlight of my day!"

Diablo glared a fiery look in Bael's direction. "Shut up, you idiot. I recall you promising to send someone after the so-called Hero 12 years ago. Whatever happened to that? Another failure?"

Bael shrugged sheepishly. "Oh, ah, that. I uh... forgot." He lowered his head and grimaced, waiting for Diablo's rage.

It never came. Diablo sighed deeply instead and slumped back in his chair. "Sometimes... I wish Satan was still here... he was so much better at this than I."

Nobody at the table dared agree. To agree would be to insult Diablo right to his face, a death wish to be sure.

President Ose stared at Diablo blankly, finally accepting that he'd finished ranting. "Splendid. Now that we're all calmed down and the issues were discussed, let's examine this report."

Ice filled the room, as the demons did so. "It's just... insanity." Agares stared at the report as he scanned the lines. "Their numbers keep growing. They've liberated three worlds now and taken over two of ours. The only good news we have is that all of the worlds so far are plainly inferior to their current homeworld. They're living in a very small space with limited resources... but... how long can that last?"

Diablo gazed around at the table, and the demons seated there.

Ose, the president of finance. She attended these meetings like it was her life's goal. Her battle power was weak, but her mind was sharp. She was also the only demon in contact with the oracle, Umi.

Agares, the Duke of Reptiles. He attended the great majority of these meetings, and was definitely one of the smarter demons here. He could always be trusted to bring up something useful for discussion.

Mephisto, the Duke of Mist. He attended these meetings because he was actually a crucial figure here. His ability to become completely invisible helped greatly with spying, though the ability also had a lot of downsides.

Bael, the King of the 7 princes of Hell. A monster who always attended the meetings because he always sought to be ordered out to battle. The most vicious and battle hardened of the people here, Diablo himself excluded.

Beleth, an upper ranked King class demon. She almost never attended the meetings. She was always off busy somewhere else, doing stupid things that Diablo failed to understand.

Counting himself, that put only 6 demons that should be at this table. With Beleth gone, there were only 5.

Diablo frowned. There should always be 7 here. He'd need to start enforcing the code on Beleth so she had to attend. But also...

"We need a 7th member. One to replace Beelzebub."

Nobody at the table had been expecting that. Some started to speak in protest, but paused and thought about it. Agares was the first to speak.

"Now that you mention it, we've been missing a 7th for a long time now. Should we simply ask the Second Emperor to join us here?"

Diablo cringed. If Belial was here, Diablo would no longer be able to sit at the head of the table, he would no longer be the leader. "No... we should not, ah, waste her time. Think of someone else, and then submit the recommendation for Ose to review. We'll dwell on this later."

Diablo rose from his chair, as did the others.

"Meeting adjourned."

Part 104: Inventor

Captain Adams is... a genius. He's far beyond me now.

I explained to him the basic principles of guns. Being a military commander, he immediately came to understand the principles behind gunpowder. And he took it in directions I hadn't even expected.

He stayed secluded in his room for 5 days straight, only allowing his butler to enter and exit. Even I couldn't get to him. I'm sure if it were an emergency I could have, but since this is the first time he's shrugged me off, I knew it was important.

Finally, he emerged after the 5 days were up, ragged and exhausted. His eyes sagged as he sleepily handed me a large stack of papers, all of them filled to the brim with drawings, sketches, and detailed plans. I started to look at them, but he waved me off. "Take these down to Mr. Stevens, tell him to get to work. It's time he earned his pay." And with that, he stumbled back into his room to sleep.

I arrived downstairs in the basement of the castle, in the Forge. It was connected to the Armory, where all the weapons made by the forge were left until they had an owner. Using the principles created by Henry Ford in my world, we had created factory assembly lines to smooth out and speed up the creation of swords and metal armor, but that was all to soon change.

I handed the designs to Stevens and as he read through the pages over the course of half an hour, occasionally pausing to grab coffee from the table, he gasped over and over as new applications for the technology I had barely even outlined seemed to spark his imagination.

Stevens finally finished flipping through the papers as a serene look of satisfaction passed over his eyes. "We can win now."

He turned to me. "Great Slayer... if possible, I want you to recall all nonessential clones in Hero City to the Forge. I have work for them to do."

I nodded. "That will be fine, but what do you want them to do?"

He indicated a few things in the papers. "Gunpowder... we have no way of making it. This world is too small, there are no suitable materials to be mined anywhere. They need to make large stockpiles of it through your ability."

I nodded. "I can arrange for that. I suppose you'll want metals like steel too?"

Stevens shook his head. "That won't be necessary. Planet Alpha Omnicron 2 has mines for the materials we'll need. We've recently constructed a hidden mining base there that the demons likely don't know about. It leads directly into the portal room, so it's very secure."

I nodded. "These planet names, they're very complicated. It's going to be a bit tedious trying to remember all of them. Can't we start assigning names to various ones?"

Stevens shrugged. "You'll have to take that up with Captain Adams."

I shrugged. "Yeah, I guess so. But before I go, here's a few more clones."

I stepped back and spawned 6 new clones, draining my remaining magic power to low levels. Clones take much of my energy to summon, but their ability to do their own limited versions of wordsmithing are actually incredible. I can turn a single clone into a micro-factory, creating objects as I need them, and Adams has been constantly thinking up new uses for them. Truly remarkable.

I breathed heavily as I walked towards the exit. "There you go, Stevens. Don't waste their energy all right? Like me, they get tired if you make them summon too much stuff at once. I'll be off now."

Stevens nodded with a glint in his eye. "Slayer, thank you. More than words can say. This is the beginning... this is only the beginning."

I nodded. "I know."

Part 105: Doom

I sighed, and leaned forward a little bit, stretching my feet. The Master was working us hard these days, ever since the filthy humans started roaming these catacombs. I scratched myself with my claws, sadly noting that I still hadn't evolved to my second form yet.

Am I doomed to stay a weak little imp, only good for guard duty and screaming if the humans appear? The thought made my skin crawl.

Tvoorik groaned, as he leaned against the opposite wall from me. "This sucks. How long do we have to stand watch? I want to go and feed already, maybe watch some action down in the Pits."

I nodded as I coughed slightly. "This is the worst! I hate being on guard duty! Can't they even give us a chair! It's not like we're fast enough to flee if the filthy humans show up anyway! We're dead meat!"

"Calm down, Ylvusk, it's not that bad. I have an escape plan if we hear them coming." Tvoorik grinned as he leaned forwards, checking to see if the skeleton commander was watching. He wasn't. He just stared aimlessly at the wall, unmoving, as he always did. "Take a look... hehe."

Tvoorik turned around and quietly pulled on the labyrinth wall. A small hole opened up. Just barely big enough for tiny imps like us to fit inside.

I nodded and stared in wonder. "Is that... one of the hidden lizardmen tunnels?"

He nodded, grinning devilishly, while quickly pushing it shut so nobody else could see. "Yeah. But keep it quiet, alright? It's only for emergencies... I don't want to have to use it unless we have to... there might still be 'gecks' hiding in there."

'Gecks' of course was short for gecko, a slang insult we used to make fun of the little critters. Naturally, once we reach our second form, we easily tower over them, but they're dangerous while we're just little imps.

I sighed again, as I leaned back against the wall. "Just two more ticks and we can get the heaven out of here."

Tvoorik moaned as he leaned against the wall again. "Say, you heard about Duke Mephisto's defeat a few months back, right?"

I rolled my eyes. "Some Duke he was. He was beaten by smelly humans and they even destroyed his entire planet."

Tvoorik paused, as he thoughtfully pondered that thought. "Don't you find that just a little odd? An entire planet? Come on, humans aren't that strong or smart. They're dangerous to imps like us, but humans are really weak fleshbags."

I nodded slowly. "Yeah... so? What are you getting at?"

Tvoorik leaned forwards meaningfully on his spear. "What I'm saying is, it's a little too convenient, don't you think?" He glanced back over at the skeleton commander, still staring blankly at the wall. Thank the devils they're dumb as rocks. He looked back over at me. "I mean think about it... now that we're all afraid of the big bad humans, Diablo has all the reason to order us on round the clock guard duty. Just a little too perfect, eh?"

I shrugged. "Maybe, I dunno. What are you getting at?"

"Tvoorik frowned. Come on, look at the big picture. It was an inside job." I instantly rolled my eyes. Oh for Devil's sake, not this again. "I mean do you really think humans can make meteors and asteroids appear out of nowhere?! Of course not, only someone powerful like Diablo could do that!"

I groaned long and hard. This idiot and his stupid conspiracy theories. "I bet you think Satan faked his own death just so he didn't have to be emperor anymore, right?"

Tvoorik nodded excitedly. "Yes, yes! It was all written down in this grimoire that Veerus was telling me about! You see, Satan was really unhappy with-"

Suddenly, I raised my hand to shut him up. I heard something. The sound of stomping, like something running fast. My demonic chest froze its movement as I realized what that sound was.

Humans.

"Ahh! SKELETON COMMANDER! Skeleton Commander! The humans are coming!"

My hands started shaking and I started freaking out as I realized that we had a paltry number of demons to deal with any large number of humans, and there seemed to be a lot storming down that hallway.

And then my eyes narrowed and I quickly looked at Tvoorik. "Ah! The door! Get it open!"

Tvoorik quickly jumped into action, yanking the lizardman door open as we climbed in and he shut it behind us.

"Heh, I told you this would be smart."

"S-shut up!" I hissed at him in the darkness. "They're coming!"

He carefully slid open a small viewing hatch so that we could peek through and see what happened. My firey heart was beating faster than it ever had before in my entire life.

Part 106: Boomstick

We raced down the hallway, as I followed the red dot in my vision that guided me towards the targets. They're close, very close, and there's only a few of them. Perfect, this will make for a great test of the new weapons.

I halted as we rounded the corner and spotted a skeleton commander and 15 skeletons, along with two orcs. These weren't even a challenge for our unit of 30, even without the weapon. I grinned. It's time to have fun.

"Lieutenant Cody, we're ready when you are." One of my men aimed his new toy at the enemies. I licked my lips. Time to enjoy the sight of some dead demons.

"Fire."

The boomstick fired, and a short spear made of metal blasted forwards, instantly impaling an orc, passing through it and ripping off the arm off a skeleton behind it. The other orc leaped back in fright as blood gushed out of his comrade as he fell to the ground, instantly dead.

I quickly loaded the next boomstick bolt, and fired again, this time impaling through 5 or 6 skeletons at once, as they were all grouped up in the hallway. You can't kill an undead creature, but blasting them to smithereens makes it hard for them to attack you if they are completely disassembled.

By now, the other enemies had recovered from the shock and started charging at us. No problem. We get to test out the next weapon.

"Gunther, you're up." I spoke to the biggest man in our group, a towering behemoth of 7 feet tall who barely missed the top of this hall by a few inches.

He gnashed his teeth as he faced down the charging enemies. "ME HATE DEMON MONSTERS!" He bellowed as he adjusted his new gauntlet and charged at them. He's not the brightest fellow in our group, but he's one tough son of a bitch.

Gunther ran forwards, pulling his fist back as he took aim at a skeleton that had raised a sword to swing down and chop at him with. As Gunther swung his metallic arm at the skeleton, he pressed a button attached to his other hand, and a blast of fire shot out the back of his gauntlet, propelling his fist forwards with terrifying speed and power, right smack in the center of the skeleton's skull. His attack was so strong it smashed through the skeleton, and the skull exploded into shrapnel that stabbed (mostly harmlessly) into the other skeletons behind it. A few pieces lanced into the orc in the rear who hadn't died from our initial attack, and he yelped in pain as the bits pierced through his arms and chest.

"Rocket fist" was a fearsome weapon. I'd seen designs for the Mark II Rocket Fist and I could not wait to see that applied in battle as well.

Better yet, the fist was self-reloading, with a total of six shots that could be used in rapid succession. Gunther used all six in the span of ten seconds, as he smashed through the first skeleton, spun using the momentum of his arm, bashed through the skeleton commander with his next shot, then on the third shot he swung his entire metal-covered arm in a wide sweeping arc, which took out 5 more skeletons at once. He moved so fast with the fist that it was hard for any of the enemies to hit anything but air as he darted through them and past them.

Another couple boomstick shots, and all the targets were neutralized.

"Mission complete. Weapons Alpha and Bravo were a huge success. All targets eradicated." I spoke into the communication device that was strapped to my wrist. It used some foreign technology created by the Slayer, but I didn't care how it worked, only that it did at all.

"Fantastic work, Yellow Team. Head back to base for resupplying and rest. This mission was a rousing success. Blue Team will be in the area soon to take out a second group of hostiles." Captain Adams, as always, was on the case. A brilliant leader who somehow managed to lead ten battle forces at once. How he did it, I'll never know.

We crushed the remaining disembodied skulls of the skeletons around us, just in case, and walked off to return to Hero City. A job well done.

Tvoorik shivered in fear as the fleshbags left. I trembled too. When they were finally distant enough that I couldn't hear anything, I whispered, swallowing my fear.

"T-that battle went worse than I th-thought..."

Tvoorik didn't acknowledge my words. He gaped in awe at the bolt that had hammered into the wall behind the first dead orc. "This... this proves my theory... Diablo must be giving these humans new weapons to scare us... we have to report this to the one above him, immediately."

I slapped my face with my hand. "Do you want Belial to kill us?! That lady is nuts! We should just go tell Diablo and let him deal with it."

"No!" Tvoorik rasped at me quietly. "He's the leader of the whole bunch of them! He's giving the humans weapons to consolidate his power over the demons! Don't you see this is all just a ploy to become the first emperor?!"

I rubbed my temples carefully with my claws, as my eyes squeezed shut from the stupidity I was enduring. "Tvoorik... if Satan killed himself because he hated being first emperor, wouldn't you agree it's a crappy position to be in?"

He nodded thoughtfully.

"Then wouldn't you also agree that if the job is that crappy, Diablo couldn't possibly want it?"

Tvoorik paused as my words entered his mind. Slowly, he mulled them over, and I swear I saw a candlestick appear above his head.

"Aha... this proves it! He must want Belial's position as the second, but not actually the first! You're so smart, Ylvusk!"

Somewhere, deep inside the deepest blackest part of my heart, I bludgeoned my friend to death that day. I beat his head in brutally with my own claws and it felt amazing.

This idiot will be the death of me.

Part 107:

I stared in disbelief at the array of test weapons that Captain Adams was showing me.

"These... are the new weapons? These aren't even actual guns!" I pointed at the Boomstick. "It only shoots one shot at a time! And it has a six second reload!"

Adams shook his head slowly as I ranted, finally interrupting me. "Slayer, you're a smart guy. But the problem with the 'guns' that you remember is they're weak. Even the bigger bullets, they might cause some decent damage to a charging demon, but what about an Ogre? What about Trolls and other advanced monsters and demons?"

I stared intently at the weapons in front of me. Come to think of it, Adams was right. What good are bullets designed for killing humans against the monstrosities of hell? You need stopping power to take down a charging orc. Bleeding out monsters and demons is not an option, you need them dead as quickly as possible.

I indicated a few of the other weapons. "What about these?"

Adams nodded. "The 'Buddha Palm' and the 'Shock Lance' are still experimental. We've had some bad accidents, but with your clones nearby there haven't been any fatalities, or unhealed injuries for that matter."

Adams and I stared at the array of tools and weapons on the table in front of us quietly for a few minutes. I still couldn't believe my eyes. These are new inventions. I don't understand how they work and Adams' explanations are too technical for me, but the ideas are solid and they're performing beautifully.

Adams broke the silence. "Slayer, I've been meaning to talk to you... about your abilities."

I looked up and our eyes met. "All right. Go on."

Adams took the Crown of Solomon off his head as he spoke. "Listen, your ability that you use to clone yourself... can it be used to clone other things?"

I looked at the crown he was holding in his hand meaningfully. Of course. Why didn't I think of it first? That is an amazing idea.

"I... don't know? I've never tried before." I took the crown from his hand and swallowed hard as I focused my mind on it.

"Clone."

And in my spare hand, a new Crown appeared! I gasped and my eyes shot open. Adams was stunned too.

"By the gods, do you understand what this means?"

I nodded rapidly. "This kind of power is dangerous."

Adams grabbed the crown from my hand as he quickly placed it on his head. He stared around the room, turning his head here and there. "Hmm. No mental map... and I feel the same as ever..."

He took the crown off and set it on the ground, breathing heavily. "It's a dud."

I nodded. "Damn. That would be too convenient."

He stared at the crown, long and hard. "You know, the Crown may be a fake... but it looks real. This might be useful in the future."

I nodded. "We might be able to fool our enemies with it somehow."

Suddenly Adams leaped to his feet as a look of shock blasted from his face. "MY GOD!"

I jumped up in surprise. "What? What?!"

He looked me in the eyes as his breathing speed increased greatly. "Clone me!"

Mine increased too! "Holy crap, Adams! You're a genius!"

"I KNOW!" His excitement was contagious.

I aimed my hand at him. "Clone!" A clone of Adams appeared. It stared ahead blankly, and instantly both our moods deflated. "Shit, he won't be of any use in the brains department."

Adams nodded as he stared the doppelganger closely, staring at its various features and whatnot. "Well, perhaps it could make for a convincing faked death if the need should arise?"

I shrugged. "Maybe. Should I, ah, kill it?"

Adams seemed horrified by the thought. "Heavens no! That would surely curse the real me! Let's keep it stored somewhere safe and tell nobody of this. It may be of use in the future."

I nodded, and we sat back down, leaving the clone to stare ahead mutely.

"Alright, now try cloning... ah! This!" Adams handed me a boomstick. I cloned it easily, it functioned perfectly. I even cloned the ammo perfectly too.

"I see now. You don't have to know how something works to clone it, but if you clone something complex, it usually has major flaws. In the case of other sentient beings, they become mute and dumb, plus they become weakened. In the case of your magical artifacts, they look exactly the same, but they lose their magical properties and become normal objects. Hmm, yes, I'm beginning to get a better idea of your abilities as time goes on. We can make use of this."

I nodded. "You tell me what to do, and I'll do it. You just make sure we win."

Adams grinned a huge beaming smile. "We aren't just going to win, we're going to absolutely devastate demonkind forever."

Part 108: Remnants

Barbatos coughed as he walked along. Flanked by a small legion of 100 monsters and demons, he had come to inspect the latest defiled site.

A gruesome scene, to be sure. More of those barbaric small spears and barbs were embedded in the bodies of his minions. Bones and blood were scattered all around the wide hallway as far as the eye could see. This had been a long fought battle, unlike the ones before it. He'd lost hundreds of lackeys.

He hacked and coughed as he leaned on his staff and stroked his long greying beard. "Accursed humans. Look at how they wound us. Have we no recourse? Have we no means of defending against their technologies?"

To be sure, these barbaric weapons would have little to no effect on a Duke class demon, such as he, but against the lower devolved minions of the labyrinth, they were super effective. Critical hits had taken out many of the bodies in the room, some demons had clearly fallen with a single shot.

Boomsticks. The reports given by a couple of imps during the first encounter with humans wielding them had been invaluable. Demons made sure to group up in wide passageways now, where a single shot couldn't take out more than one or two at a time, and they had several layers of protective magic added onto the leaders to make them take more hits, though ultimately the continuous barrage of fire by the humans made it difficult to draw near.

Barbatos stepped over the body of a large fallen Orc Captain as he made his way forwards. Finally, to his relief, he encountered some bodies of humans. "Good, we're finally managing to at least take a few of the little angels with us."

We're constantly losing, all the time. Barbatos thought to himself, as he walked past the death and chaos. We haven't had a single conclusive win in months. Things are looking terrible.

As he walked, he received a telepathic communication from one of the lower ranked Communication Oracles.

Barbatos, lord Diablo and the rest of the council desires your presence. You are ordered to appear before him as soon as you possibly can.

The communication cut off instantly when the voice was done 'speaking'. Barbatos growled under his breath. "I'm just a poor old demon, why can't they leave me alone for once? My knees hurt and my bones ache. Just give me some vacation time already, I've earned a trip to the Pits."

As he continued mumbling and muttering under his breath, Barbaros turned around and headed back the way he had come from. Being old sucks.

It took him many ticks to finally arrive, but Barbatos finally made his appearance in the Council of 7, quickly noting a lack of a 7th Council-demon. Interesting, where the devil did Beelzebub run off to?

He hobbled over and stood at the end of the table, just to the side of Mephisto. "Ahem... greetings, young ones, and Master Diablo himself as well. To what do I owe the, erm, pleasure?"

Diablo smiled. "Ah, Barbatos. So good of you to join us. Go ahead and have a seat."

Barbatos glanced at the table. "My apologies, but I must decline. It would be discourteous towards Lord Beelzebub to take his seat, even if only for a moment. I may have a higher rank than he, but I always give respect to those who work hard in the Emperor's service."

Diablo paused. "No no, master Barbatos, you seem to misunderstand. You are now officially considered a member of the Council of 7. Beelzebub was actually killed, a long time ago. I'm... surprised you don't know of his passing."

Barbatos coughed, as he contemplated the words of Diablo. "Hmm, dead, is he? I hadn't heard this yet. I am old as you know, perhaps my memory is simply fading."

Barbatos slowly shuffled around the table, hobbling along on his cane until he arrived at the seat designated as his by Diablo. Interestingly, it was directly on the left hand side of Diablo, leading one to conclude it was a seat of important prestige.

Diablo nodded graciously as Barbatos took his seat. "I know you find this a great bother, and I know you hate doing hard work at your age, but the council needs your wisdom in these perilous times."

Barbatos nodded slowly, as he vacantly stared at the table in front of him. "Ah yes, it really is such a pain. But if my presence here can stop the onslaught of these... humans... then it is worth being here. A shame about Beelzebub though. He showed much promise for such a young whelp."

Diablo nodded. Bael grimaced and turned his head up towards the ceiling. "He was an arrogant little imp. Even in his Vampire form, he was weak, bested easily by a single human in combat."

Barbatos nodded slowly. "Indeed... the Slayer. I've heard tales of him from survivors of human attacks. It would seem that he has a terrifying power we cannot hope to comprehend. He is an existential threat to our kind. A creator level threat, if you will."

Bael shrugged. "He's dangerous, for sure... but I wouldn't give him that much credit. All it will take is for one mistake, a single moment of weakness, and he will fall like all the other haughty human rulers of the past did."

Mephisto slowly shook his head as he clasped his hands under his ethereal chin and leaned on the table. "To be frank, I think you're completely wrong. Slayer possesses incredible power. We can only defend against words that target our bodies specifically, like instant death words. Things that affect the environment around us cannot be easily stopped. If he were to summon his Meteor in this realm, and he made it half as powerful as it was before, he would still destroy all of us in an instant."

Bael shrugged and sat back in his chair. "Perhaps. I will say that you did fight him, so you probably know more than I do about his abilities. Still, I should think that no matter how strong he gets, he will never defeat the First Emperor, let alone the second or the third. But the first..."

Diablo stiffened. "Quiet. Keep that talk to yourself. Only myself, Belial, and you know his true identity. Let's keep it that way."

Bael blinked his eyes slowly as he remembered the first time he had been taken to meet the first emperor. This being is far beyond any powers Satan ever had. He remembered feeling true fear in the face of such a mighty being. Yes, no matter how powerful he became, this was a being the Slayer would never overcome.

"Of course, my liege. To be honored with knowledge of the First Emperor's identity... only a fool would give up such knowledge so easily.

The others at the table looked on thoughtfully as they pondered who it might be.

Part 109: Blast

Lieutenant Cody and his group of 30 elite marines walked down the corridors quietly. In recent weeks, things had changed quite a bit, with the enemy preparing traps that could turn deadly if they weren't spotted in time.

Cody stared ahead, an expressionless face searching all around his group, as they walked. He was quickly rising in the military ranks, and could soon rise to the rank of captain. Of course, 'Captain' was a title that Captain Adams still used, but only because that's what everyone called him. In reality, he was more of a king... but Adams was a humble man.

Cody, however, was not. He wasn't a braggart either, but he was a man who loved war. He loved the taste of death and decay. He loved slicing, bashing, and as of recently, blasting his enemies to smithereens. He made an excellent commander though because Cody was fiercely competitive. He hated losing, even up to losing just a single man. He tried to win on all fronts, using advanced pincer movements and a technique the Slayer had mentioned in passing called "Blitzkrieg" where you simply rush through enemy lines, blasting them down before they have the ability to fight back.

But today, he had to be more cautious. As one of the weapon specialists who was able to test new weaponry, he was tasked with using the existing armory that he and his men had grown used to over the last few months, but also some improved weaponry finally released for the final testing phase before they became available for active duty use.

Cody and his team walked until they arrived at a section of the catacombs that narrowed down into a smaller hallway, leading up to a solid iron door. Cody grimaced. He hated doors. Anything could be behind them.

He turned to Saul. "You're up. Test it here, we'll see if it has any effect before we try something else."

Saul, a tall skinny man with pale skin, nodded as he walked forwards. He adjusted the new glove-type weapon on his hand. It was metallic, just like Gunther's, but less armored and bulky. It had some long stretchy tubes that went from the glove to a device he wore on his back, which gave the glove its main abilities.

Saul walked up to the door and braced himself as he aimed his Buddha Palm, as they called it, at the door. Aiming his palm forwards, he waited for the order to fire at twenty-five-percent power.

Cody raised his hand, paused for a second or two as his men stiffened their bodies.

Then he dropped his hand down. "Fire."

BOOM!

A blast of fire and hot air shot out of the well protected glove weapon as the canister inside the suit did its job. The air rushed forward, instantly encountering the door as a narrow stream, widening as it impacted against the steel frame. The door was barred and barricaded on the other side though, so it only shook mightily as the rushing air and fire came to a rapid halt. The entire process took about three seconds.

The air in the room was noticeably warmer. Saul wiped sweat off his brow with his left hand after quickly loading another shell in the back left bottom corner of the backpack suit. The process had become automatic for him thanks to hours of training. This was not just a weapon or a tool, this meant the lives of his friends and comrades, his commander, and even himself could be at stake if he failed to reload and fire when needed.

He loaded the Yellow cartridge this time, the one for 50% power. The blue cartridge was clearly not strong enough, and the orange and red cartridges might just be too much power. Not to mention Red was only for extreme emergencies. The fire and air were hot enough to dissolve organic matter and presented a major risk of killing the suit wearer. In fact, any wearer of the Buddha Palm was only outfitted with a single Red level cartridge, while having at least four oranges.

Cody wiped his own forehead, noting the sudden increased temperature in the room. "Saul, pull back. If it doesn't work on the next cartridge, we'll roast to death. Let Samantha take this one."

Saul nodded. "As you wish, Lieutenant."

He stepped back from the door as the pretty black-haired lady stepped forwards.

"Alright, go knock that flimsy door down for me, sweetheart. As soon as you do, get back and let the big boys get in there."

Samantha rolled her eyes as she faced forwards. The lieutenant didn't see it. "Please, boys will always be boys." Samantha advanced forwards, her forked tail darting around here and there as she playfully danced and skipped along towards the door. "Watch and learn, kids!"

Hooking her middle finger down with her thumb, she aimed it at the door. Flick. With a single finger, she smashed the door forwards, sending it blasting into the room along with whatever had been blocking it before.

Instead of retreating backwards, she boldly entered the room. "See? Should have asked me from the start."

Cody scowled. This succubus would be the death of his men.

Part 110: Holes

Samantha walked in the room, her eyes darting around, looking for enemies. She was the newest member of the Marines, and thus had the least experience of all of them. Despite that, she was exceedingly powerful, having joined the Humans because as a succubus she had... interests that aligned with humanity's.

Her battle experience would appear to be low compared to the others, but a second glance would clear up that misconception quickly. She wore very little, and compared to the marines around her decked out in medium strength armor, she was a clear target for enemies. She was scantily clad, wearing a seductive negligee made of white cotton that left little to the imagination, and her only weapon was a whip (of course it was) that could electrocute anything it touched.

But the whip was largely for, ahem, cosmetic reasons. She possessed a demonic level of regeneration, letting her take large amounts of damage while quickly healing her wounds, and a strong connection to the spiritual and thought energy around her. As a high class evolved demon, she had large amounts of intelligence and she spent most of it thinking of how to, eh, entrap males of certain species. Despite her looks and the threat she possessed, even she wouldn't do anything vile to a human without his permission, lest she anger the Slayer, whom she adored and was her ultimate goal of attracting.

Samantha rubbed her charcoal-skinned arms as she walked in the room. "Goodness, it certainly is chilly in here. I'm not fond of the cold."

"Cheh, maybe you ought to wear more clothing then..." Saul mumbled under his breath. She didn't hear him, or perhaps decided to ignore the comment.

The room was barren, but it had a large number of small openings which appeared to be tunnels all around inside it. The room was circular once you entered it, and something about the design of the room alarmed her.

"Boys, I think we should stay out of here. There were supposed to be demons here, and there appear to be none..." Samantha itched her forehead as she pondered the holes in the walls.

"Smells like trap." Gunther muttered as he looked around, warily. "Not like, we leave now."

Cody entered the room, leaving 5 troops outside the room to cover the entrance. He walked around, motioning for everyone to stay still. As he walked around, he felt something crackling under his boots. He looked down and picked up pieces of... something. It was the same color at the floor and the walls around him, blending in with it perfectly. It was completely transparent and brittle to the touch.

As he stared at it in bewilderment, feeling the something in his hands but seeing nothing, Samantha walked over, rubbing her arms on her shoulders for warmth. She looped her arm through his, pulling herself against the Lieutenant, which made him fairly uncomfortable given his wife and two kids at home. Saul glanced over and scowled, but Samantha ignored him as her shivering ceased.

"Mmm, you're pretty warm. Whatcha got there?" She pointed with her other hand at the nothingness he seemed to be staring at.

"I'm not sure. It's completely transparent and it falls apart when you exert even the slightest pressure on it." Cody reached over and handed the stuff to her.

The moment she received it, a look of recognition passed over her face. "This... this is a demon egg. These are laid by a brood queen. In three hours time, they will evaporate and become thought energy. This room must be a breeding ground for imps. But... something isn't right."

Cody pulled away from her arm and immediately felt better for it as his guilt disappeared. "What do you mean, something's wrong?"

"This shell is in the final stages, but the smell of this room is wrong. And where is the brood mother? The only way these eggs could be here is if something moved them here, perhaps other demons... and..."

She stared at the ground around her thoughtfully. "Perhaps, this room is some kind of... testing room. I heard about these some ticks back. Before I joined the humans, I was in a cantina run by a friend of mine and I overheard some orcs discussing new evolutions that start before a demon's birth. But they're supposed to be highly experimental. Yes, this would explain why this room doesn't smell like an Imp breeding room and the lack of a brood mother."

Gunther was on the far side of the room, opposite the door, staring at a hole on the wall. "Me no like. Me hear... scratch sounds..."

Samantha jerked up. "Sounds? Where? From in those... holes...?" A look of horror sprouted on her face. "...We need to get out of here. Now. This was a bad idea."

A sound was suddenly audible, from deep inside many of the holes at once, sounding like the scratching of many claws running on glass. The sounds turned Saul's blood to ice.

"Commander... we need to leave. Now!"

Cody nodded energetically, and started quickly beckoning everyone out the door. As they ran, Gunther came up in the rear and stammered as he ran out the door. "Monsters! Behind!"

Saul turned around and gasped as he saw a hundred new types of demons he had never seen before swarming out of the walls, racing after their fleeing prey.

These demons would later be known as the Grez.

Part 111: Grez

Saul instantly leaped into action as he saw the terrifyingly fast monsters approaching within feet of the door. He jumped backwards, somersaulting in midair and aiming his hand at the door as he blasted his Yellow cartridge at the opening. A massive wall of fire and air, dwarfing the previous blast by a few orders of magnitude, shot out of his hand and sent the little scurrying four legged monstrosities flying backwards, smashing against the wall of their nest room.

But to Saul's horror, it seemed to do no damage to the nimble monsters at all. Neither the fire nor the impact against the wall hurt them. Their bodies were protected by a rock hard outer skin, with only small bits of their fleshy undercoat being visible in small spots on the joints. Their bodies were covered in various small and large spiked bones, varying in size and position from one monster to another. They ran on four legs, but had an additional two that sprouted up and out of their armor that looked like stabbing bones for pinning down prey in front of them so the prey couldn't escape. And their mouths. Their mouths were filled with five rows of razor sharp teeth, perfect for easily chewing through anything in an instant.

But the speed was the worst. They zipped along, running on walls, the ceiling, apparently able to move on any surface around them as needed.

Samantha watched as Saul's attack did nothing to the little demons, and she quickly used a spell to yank him backwards before they could grab hold of him, and her other hand waved around to create an ice wall in front of the doorway. Double spell-casting was a special ability of hers she had gained since her evolution to Elder Succubus. (Though she hated the 'elder' part of her name, since she was clearly a youthful young princess.)

In a flash, the enemies ganged up on the ice, pounding their bodies against the wall as they quickly leaped back and body slammed it over and over again.

But it was enough. Giving the marines a few seconds to quickly form up, they took their positions. Cody glanced down at his belt and pulled out a medallion Captain Adams had given him before the mission. Yellow Team is the most successful team of our weapons testers. If things get dire, use this. But only use in an emergency, it will break after a single use. Captain Adams always looked out for his troops.

Within 15 seconds, the creepers smashed through the ice wall and tumbled to the ground, rapidly righting themselves and charging forwards.

"FIRE!" I bellowed, as three of my best marksman fired their Boomsticks. Three bolts lanced forwards at insane speeds, piercing the thick armor of the monsters as they stumbled and fell to the ground.

But they didn't die.

It seemed to visibly slow them down, but they showed no signs of pain, no screams of agony, nothing. And the shots didn't go all the way through, they only stuck halfway inside the beasts. These monsters weren't just small and fast, they were tough.

Gunther charged forwards, blasting into the first monster, his rocket fist smashing it in the face with incredible force. The monster staggered back, falling down and slumping dead to the floor. One down, more than a hundred to go.

I gazed in horror, as the wave of monsters charged at us. This is it, we will die here for sure. I have to use it.

Grabbing the medallion, I raised it in the air and shouted.

"Apollo!"

And instantly, my entire group appeared in the throne room of Hero City's castle. Everyone stumbled forwards and fell to the ground ungracefully as their surroundings instantly changed. Captains Adams happened to be entering the room as we arrived, and gasped as he saw our sudden appearance. Just as the shock from that was about to fade, he gasped again when he realized how we had appeared.

"You used Apollo's Medallion?! What the devil happened to make you have to do that?! I said it was for use only in emergencies!"

I stared at the ground as the fear of the previous moments finally started to fade.

"Trust me, Adams. You're not going to believe what just happened to us."

Part 112:

I sat, staring at the ground as Adams and the Yellow Team discussed what had happened only a few minutes ago. Receiving an appearance request from Adams, I teleported here in a jiffy and was experiencing many emotions as they described what they had gone through.

This is not good.

Beelzebub had told me, many years ago, about the rules of this place. I haven't spoken to him in a while as he's busy aiding the intelligence offices with various strategic information regarding demons, but I got the gist of what he had told me.

This labyrinth has rules, and they were written in (figurative) stone by the original First Emperor, Satan, when he created it. Beelzebub knew the rules, but not how long ago they were made or how this place came to be made. Compared to the dukes and kings of this labyrinth, he truly was a small fry, young when contrasted with their timelessness. His truly important and useful knowledge lay in the weaknesses of various demons he had met and their relationships with one another, as well as their home worlds that the more influential ones ruled over. He was how we had been able to locate Mephisto's homeworld.

One of the labyrinth's most sacred rules was never allowed to be broken. Demons are not allowed to evolve more than 100 times, and they are not allowed to evolve to any new forms other than what is already known.

The creation of this rule made perfect sense to me. If other demons could evolve, they might one day overthrow Satan if they reached a new unique form and gained some incredible previously unknown ability.

But in the context of the recent invasion of the labyrinth by humans, there were many who wanted to circumvent that rule. Therefore, they must be hiding secret mutation and evolution chambers where they forcefully spawn new types of demons to combat our troops.

And if they're so desperate they're willing to risk death, that must mean we are winning this war.

But we're not.

This new monster whom we've coined the Grez... it is unlike any before it. We can't kill it with a single shot. Only Gunther with his tremendous strength could do such a thing. It would be trivial for me, but for a normal human, they would be mincemeat in the face of such demons.

I need to find a way for the general population to combat these. I have operated for ten years under the assumption that the enemies we know of are the ones we must prepare for, but since newer horrors may emerge, I need to be careful. Very careful. If they evolve some other new monster when we least expect it, we could suffer some bad losses.

My mind blanked for a minute and I suddenly felt dizzy. Gah... I've been feeling like this every now and again for a great while now but... this one suddenly hit hard. I grabbed some water and swallowed it quickly, my mind returning to normal. Odd.

"...ur opinion? Slayer?" Adams was speaking to me. I jerked my head up from the floor and quickly glanced around at the faces looking at me.

"Huh? What did you say?"

Adams cleared his throat quietly. "Ah, I just asked what was your opinion? How should we deal with this new breed of monster?"

I paused for a few seconds as I thought about it. "Hng... perhaps I should simply create more clones. A single clone should travel with every single battalion and regiment, every group that enters the maze. If we encounter the Grez, have the commander order the clone to take any action necessary. They should... hopefully be able to at the least slow down the Grez long enough for the troops to take cover. Ideally the clone will eliminate them."

Saul nodded thoughtfully as he rubbed his hands together. His backpack for the Buddha Palm weapon was sitting on the floor behind him, and he seemed to feel relief at taking it off. Unlike Gunther, he didn't seem to treat it like it was a precious part of his body. "Hey, Slayer, I've been wondering for a while, is there any issue with all these clones you've made?"

I shrugged. "So far, no issues. They're like having a small army of wordsmiths anywhere you need them."

Saul hesitated, as if considering his next words carefully. "I mean, don't you feel... unnerved? All these copies of you, mutely walking around the city? Every citizen here knows your face by heart for sure. And they just follow orders, like robots, but they're... you know... human. Doesn't that bother you in the slightest?"

I shook my head. "I don't view them as human. They're just tools to be used in the war against the demons. They're convenient and they serve their purpose."

Saul lowered his eyes. "Yeah... I guess so. It's not really my business, so whatever." He wiped his black hair out of his face as he slowly stood up to leave. "Captain Adams, Slayer, always a pleasure. I need to go shower now that I've concluded my part in this briefing. Have a good day."

I nodded thoughtfully and waved as he left. Human? My clones certainly look like humans, but they don't act like it at all. To be honest, they act more like puppets. They just do as I tell them to and that is that. I do constantly worry about what would happen if a commander went rogue and commanded the clones to attack the city with a meteor or something, but I've given them the order that my commands take precedence over Adams whose take precedence over the top generals and so on and so forth. I think it would be fixed quickly if such a thing happened.

I turned back to Adams as my thoughts concluded. "Captain, I've been meaning to ask, what exactly did the Medallion of Apollo function like? Can you explain in detail?"

Adams hesitated as he thought. "Well, it seemed to instantly transfer not just Cody, but all those designated as his subordinates, to this castle. I don't know how it knew the throne room was the place he wanted to return to, but it did."

I nodded slowly. The Crown had told me when I found it what the effects were, but I didn't want to waste such a valuable item. I found it strange that Adams would give it to a fairly low ranking officer, but it turned out to be the perfect use. His brains border on the edge of predicting the future at this point.

"What about the other artifacts I found? Any good uses for them?"

Adams stared at me. "Maybe. They're pretty situational though, it's a tough call. Where do you find these anyway? We have thousands of troops scouring the labyrinth and you are the only one to ever find these objects of incredible magical power."

I shifted my eyes away from him and stared blankly back at the table. "I don't know, Adams. I don't know. I've had the ability to see them since I entered here. They light up like a glowing beacon when I'm within a certain range of them, and I just follow my senses until I get there."

Adams nodded. "Can your clones sense them?"

I rocked back and forth in my seated position as I considered it. "Possibly, maybe even probably, but it's hard to tell."

Adams raised an eyebrow, something I could just barely perceive with my spherical vision. "It's worth a shot, I'd say. The more we can gather, the better."

Adams concluded the meeting eventually and we all went on our way. There's a lot to think about, but this new Grez menace... it will weigh heavily on my mind in the coming days.

Part 113:

Cody staggered back as he saw the Grez running around the curve ahead of him. "Shit! Grez! Clone B21, attack at will!"

Clone B21, staring ahead lifelessly as always, suddenly jerked into motion, silently running up to the front of the group.

"Slow!"

The clone cast a spell, and then a split second later Cody thought he heard the clone say something else that sounded like "Speed" but he couldn't be sure.

Ahead of him, something astonishing happened. The clone started moving around at close to the speed of sound, making thunderous noise as he blasted around at speeds Cody couldn't even keep track of.

In an instant, 5 Grez died before Cody could register their bodies taking hits. Icicles formed out of midair, flying into their squishy neckline (A key weak spot noted by autopsies) and impaling them into the ground.

There were 5 explosions within two seconds, the members of his marines group were feeling dazed watching it. They had heard rumors of the power of Slayer, but this was his autonomous clone. How much more powerful would the main body be?

And as they took a moment to think for themselves this is too easy, the clone suddenly came to a stop and smashed into the ground in front of them, his body crumpling up into a terrifyingly broken resting position.

The Grez had halted their advance as they... waited? They stared ahead blankly at the group of humans. Only ten Grez left, the other 15 had been killed by the clone. But that was still a lot of Grez.

What happened to the clone?! Cody spared a glance from the Grez to the body smashed into a broken mess just twenty feet away. Had something hit it? He didn't know much about Slayer's actual abilities other than that he was a 'wordsmith' so it might be anything at all. Maybe he moved too fast and tripped on a rock?!

Cody ignored those thoughts. The Grez were still here. Just as he was about to issue an order to his men, the Slayer himself appeared right next to the corpse of his clone. The Slayer completely ignored the broken body next to him, raised a hand up and said a single word.

" Dissolve! "

Instantly the Grez in front of him wordlessly turned into puddles of blood and bone, quickly covering the floor around them in their disgusting cocktail of internal body parts. A smell erupted from their liquified corpses and blasted out all around them, resembling the smell of every kind of rotten food known to mankind mixed with horrible smells involving rotting body parts. Three men behind Cody instantly fell down to their knees, heaving on the floor.

Cody and most of the others barely managed to hold the contents of their stomachs, and even the Slayer was visibly sickened by it. The Slayer quickly jerked his hand up and yelled another word. " Deodorize! "

The smell vanished just as quickly as it came, to everyone's highest relief. After a few minutes of soul searching and stuffing his inner contents back down where they came with his mind, Cody spoke to the Slayer.

"Slayer, you came at the perfect time. It was about to get hairy here. How did you know to come?"

Slayer stared ahead blankly, not looking at me or anything else, which made sense given his blindness. "My clone died. When they die, I can sense their death. It feels like a bee stinging my brain... hard to put into words. I just transfer over to their corpse and see what happened."

He bent down and placed his hand on various areas of his clone's body. "I used to be able to follow my clone's actions in real time, but there's too many of them now. I've lost count. I only know when they die anymore because of the mental feedback I receive. All the constant thoughts streaming into my head made me have to silence them."

He stood up again. "This isn't good. This clone died because of overexertion. He used 'slow' which puts a tremendous stress on the body, and then used 'speed' which increases the stress a hundredfold. By moving around at high speed and draining his energy even faster with spells, he destroyed his own internal body with G-forces. I never use Slow and Speed together unless I'm wearing the crown so at least I can perceive damage to my body."

Slayer rubbed his head while he spoke. After some time, he rose to his feet and aimed his hand at the body. " Reintegrate. "

The clone instantly disappeared, it vanished so fast the men and I almost thought it had never even been there. Slayer rubbed his closed eyes with his fingers, and then summoned another clone.

"Slayer, are you doing okay?" Saul stepped forward and spoke to the Slayer, a look of concern on his face.

Slayer shrugged. "Yeah, I'm fine I guess. Just... tired these days. Very tired. Try not to let this one die, alright? I'm very busy in the capital these days."

Cody nodded. "Sorry that you had to come here personally, Slayer. But we're thankful for your abilities. You've given us a new hope for the future. For humanity."

Slayer nodded slowly as he stared ahead blankly. "Yeah... thanks, Lieutenant Cody. You keep doing what you need to. We have a species to save."

And with that, Slayer recalled himself to the castle, disappearing in the blink of an eye. I looked over at the new clone. They resemble him perfectly in appearance, wearing the exact clothes he wore when he summoned them, but the empty and robotic personality breaks the uncanny valley illusion.

"Alright, clone, let's go." I paused. I don't have a name for this clone. Slayer forgot to name it before he left. Right, ah, your name will be Clone B-" I paused. It just seemed wrong to give the clone a designation ID. This was a human in front of me, even if it didn't act like one. "...Your new designation will be Hope. You and your kind are the hope of our species, so I think it's only fitting that you have a name befitting that station."

The clone stared ahead vacantly. But... for the most fleeting moment of time, I could swear that I saw a hint of a smile pass the corner of his lips.

"Alright, boys, and Samantha. Let's head out."

Part 114:

Aaron rubbed the spot on his chest as his breath came in ragged gasps. He was too old for this. Having fought demons for 40 straight years of his life, he didn't have the strength to fight at full power anymore.

He gripped his signature sword with his right hand, as he rubbed his chest with his left. His shield had been torn out of his left hand minutes before and lay broken in half mere feet away. Aaron wheezed and coughed as he faced down the monstrosity that towered before him.

Satan.

This demon was the leader of all of them. Satan was the one who commanded behind the scenes and directed his minions where to go and how to attack. Having evolved beyond the form of Oracle, he now left that work to others and fought directly on the battlefield itself, reaping massive spiritual power from his foes when he slayed them.

Satan licked his lips in anticipation of the power he would soon gain.

"King Aaron, a pleasure to see you, as always. How is your father? Is he ahead of the curve?" Satan grinned as his pun made Aaron glare at him in rage.

"Vile demon! It was you that killed my father, wasn't it? I have heard your name spoken of in screams of agony by demons we've captured and tortured. You are the leader of these foul monstrosities, so if I kill you, then..." Aaron grimaced. It wouldn't be easy to kill Satan. Even in a fair duel, Aaron was old now, much weaker than in his prime when he had been crowned king of all humans on Earth by Gabriel himself, while Satan was a highly evolved demon, far above the others of his kind. To top it off, there were hundreds of cackling and grinning minions standing at the sidelines of the throne room, waiting for the moment to strike. It was hopeless.

Satan stared unemotionally at the ant before him. This human had been a thorn in his side for too many years. "You've delayed my inevitable conquest, human. For that, you will pay. I have killed all your guards, your wives, and all your children as well. Your family line ends here, as will you."

Aaron staggered to his feet as he faced the monster in front of him. Satan towered over all humans, standing a massive 9 feet in height. Even Diablo and Lucifer were small fry compared to Satan's almighty power.

Aaron quietly chuckled, and Satan perked his ears up as he wondered what the human was thinking. "Heh heh... all my children too? You are truly a demon. Attacking the innocents who have done nothing to you. But... there is one you know nothing of. A grandchild."

Satan nodded thoughtfully as he evenly kept his expression neutral. "Oh? You have a baby hidden away somewhere, then? Thank you for the information. I'll be sure to kill it before the next moon rises tonight."

Aaron laughed. "Ha... haha... you can't kill him. That child is protected by those you fear most. He is not a baby either, he is a stout young man, the kind of man my own father had wished me to become. Even when you strike me down, he will become more powerful than you can possibly imagine. His power will eclipse my own."

Satan smiled and brushed off Aaron's words with a wave of his hand. "Strong words, for a weak old man. Humans were created as a joke, a weak parasitical bunch that only wish to rape one another, rape the lands, rape their enemies, and tear everything to pieces. You think we are monsters? We are only fighting to end the tyranny of your kind."

Aaron grimaced as a spasm of pain swept around inside his chest, and he coughed mightily. "We seem to be made to suffer. It's our lot in life. You demons may think you're fighting the oppressors, but you are no better than we are. Even if you kill all the humans, you will merely take our place as the devourers of the world."

Satan stood up completely straight, rising to his full height as he cracked the joints in his 7 fingered talons. "Ah, humans. Experts in wordplay, failures on the battlefield. I will kill you now, so I hope you've prayed to your gods to come and save you."

Aaron shook his head. "I am old now. I do not wish to be saved. If I must die, dying on the battlefield is an honorable way to pass. But I will leave you with a single warning, monster. My grandchild is unlike any human you have faced before. He is the combination of a great bout of experimentation. He is the one who will destroy all of your kind. If I am considered a strong human, he will be known as a God. He will force you to your knees in battle and you will beg him for mercy, but he will have none. You killed everyone in his family, and he will kill everyone in yours."

Satan nodded as a wicked smile sprouted on his face. "Excellent. I like that spirit. You will be a satisfying way to end my day. Given your accomplishments on the field of battle, I will honor you with a single question. What is the name of this child you are so proud of? I wish to know before I meet him on the field of battle."

Aaron's pained expression disappeared as a grin took over his face. " Hercules. Remember his name, and let it haunt you in your dreams, for your days are numbered. He is the son of one of my daughters and a god from the heavens, a bastard child conceived in secret. But of all my children, he is the one whom I have loved the most. He is the only one left, and someday, when you face him and he defeats you, he will be known by a title none before have been named. Hero. "

Satan cocked an eyebrow. "The gods must be getting desperate. Demi-human bastard children? The frailties of a human diluting the power of gods? I'll be lucky if he lasts five minutes against me in battle. But I will remember our conversation. You may take that with you, to the grave."

Aaron nodded. "So it was written. So it shall be done."

A minute later, Aaron, the first of the Great Kings of old, was struck down by the foul leader of the Demons. He came to be known as the Great Unifier, for his ability to unite all people of all colors and creeds together in solidarity against their greatest enemy. None after him were able to achieve this. However, his legacy shaped the will and life of generations of humans after him.

But his grandson would be the one to change everything.

Part 115: Hercules

Satan cackled maniacally as he and his demons threw another mighty feast of the ages. Slaves they had captured from the filthy humans served up platters filled with cooked and uncooked remains of the thousands of humans the demons had butchered since the death of Aaron. It had been five years since then, and with no king to lead them, the fall of Man was sure to be soon. As the humans served food, their bodies trembling as they held the mangled corpses of friends and lovers and family, they stifled their pent up rage and tears as demons kicked and whipped them, stoically trying to hold up even a tiny bit of self-esteem despite the jeering and insults.

Satan slapped his knees while he roared with laughter as his general, glowing with pride, showed his fearless leader the latest results. 60% of all humans on the Earth were now dead. There were still some untouched holdouts in the continent later to be known as Africa and there were some weak tribes scattered throughout the north and south Americas (As they later came to be known), but for the most part, there no longer existed any humans that could defy him.

Still... as Satan laughed, a thought kept creeping back into his mind. Who was that 'Hercules' that King Aaron, the Great Unifier, warned me about? Was it a great bluff to get me to lower my guard? Probably, but I just have a feeling...

They roared again with laughter as Diablo cracked a horrifying joke about how a human with his guts splayed on the floor might resemble an imp at birth, and as they laughed, a demon suddenly burst into his dining hall, smashing the doors to the side as he breathlessly screamed. "SIRE! SIRE! We're being SLAUGHTERED!!!"

The noise in the room slowly subsided as demons turned to look at the messenger, but Satan had already stopped laughing. His face betrayed no emotions, but inside many feelings roiled around, summoning themselves in an instant. Fascination. Wonder. Curiosity. Horror. Fear.

Satan leaped to his feet, as he slapped the drink out of one of his loyal generals' claws. "Barbatos, drop the grog and get to the war room now."

Barbatos started to protest, but then shrugged as he hopped along beside the Emperor. Whatever, once we deal with the pests, I'll get more of the filthy stuff later, hehe.

Satan stood on a rock overlooking the battlefield. This wasn't right. There were a few thousand humans out there, but they were wearing strange metallic clothing, with swords made of a material he had not seen before. Longswords he had heard them called. And they wore odd metallic hats that covered their entire head. But even weirder, their left hands held nonsensical flat round boards, and the humans seemed to be using them to deflect attacks. Despite their apparent size and bulk, the humans seemingly had no trouble wielding them.

Ahead of them, a single blond haired man, standing 7'2" in height, wearing very little armor, and wielding no weapons or tools of any sort. But this human, the one who made himself an open and obvious target, was terrifyingly powerful. He zipped and dashed here and there, moving so fast none of the demons could lock onto him. His fists acted as if they were made of iron, pounding through the carapaces of hydras, dark-walkers, scythers, and various monsters alike. Nothing could touch him. When he hit a demon, the demon was hurled backward, usually breaking their neck instantly.

And despite saying no words as he rampaged around, his warriors clad in metal moved as a single mind. Without speaking or motioning to one another, they continuously fended off attacks from the rear and sides as if they had omnipresent shared vision. Nothing escaped them.

Satan stared, baffled at the furious war machine ravaging his demons, as imp messengers near his feet scurried up to him on his arrival.

"Emperor Satan! Great leader! We are dying by the thousands! We need your guidance to subdue the humans! We haven't managed to kill even a single one yet!"

Satan's jaw dropped as they delivered the horrifying news. Not a single human?! Had they somehow evolved into a new species?! Since when were humans this capable at war?! Not even Aaron possessed armies of this caliber, and these warriors of the light had appeared from nowhere!

And just as Satan was about to deliver his orders, he halted. Up, in the sky, he saw something that made his breath catch in his throat.

A massive angel, a size he had never before seen in his life. As a demon, angels were his most hated enemy, well beyond a hatred of humans who were his oppressors. But in his many years of fighting the angelic scourge, he had never seen something like this.

The angel took of so much of the horizon that he had not even realized it was there at first. It must have been ten miles in size in various directions, and the wingspan seemingly bent around the Earth itself. It held a massive staff in its hand, and seemed to be casting a very complex spell.

Just as Satan realized it was casting a spell, the angel finished.

A beam of immense size and power blasted into the ground, emanating from the top of his staff and devouring all demonic life caught inside it. It dealt no damage to the Earth or to the humans if they were caught inside it, but any demon caught inside evaporated into mist before they had a chance to react, and it moved all over the battlefield, hunting as if it had a mind of its own. The Holy Beam of Heavenly Destruction.

The beam of light fired for twenty seconds straight, killing nearly 20,000 demons in that tiny span of time. Satan fell to his knees as a nearby oracle emotionlessly delivered the report. He had now lost 50,000 minions. And the humans? Zero.

"Retreat." Satan spoke numbly, his voice almost a whisper. "Flee... into the... burrow." Satan failed to make coherent thoughts as he witnessed the awe inspiring presence of what he later came to find out was the first Cosmos Class Angel, Gabriel.

These humans have won this battle. But I will be back. And when I do, they will pay for their genocide of my demons.

And as those thoughts crossed his mind, the blonde human leading the others stopped in his tracks and silently stared at Satan. An icy face of hatred and revenge crossed over his eyes.

Hercules. Satan would find rest impossible for the near future, as that face gave him his first feeling of a true nightmare.

Part 116: Secrets

Gabriel, now towering over the leader of the gods, Kronos, bowed, his massive body almost seeming like he was instead kneeling down to try and see the tiny figure underneath him.

"My king, I return with good tidings."

Kronos smiled broadly. "Of course! I should expect nothing less! How did the results of the battle turn out?"

Gabriel beamed positive emotions, but kept his smile modest. "A total rout, my lord. We destroyed tens of thousands of the demons, and they fled due to Satan's direct orders."

Kronos, still smiling, nodded as he pondered the outcome. "Satan himself gave the order?"

"Yes, my liege."

"Hmm. Satan has never once retreated in battle. He must have been terrified. How many humans did we lose?"

Gabriel paused. "You may find this difficult to believe. Under the guidance of the son of Zeus, there were zero human fatalities."

Kronos' smile evaporated, as he stared up at Gabriel in awe. "Zero? That can't be possible."

"It is a fantastical tale, to be sure, but not a single human died on that day. In fact, thanks to Hercules special ability, the troops had shared vision of each other and fought as one. They received nary even a single scratch."

Kronos stared stonily. All hint of positive emotion was gone. "While that is certainly good for now, that is a fearsome and decisive defeat. Such power and total victory has not been witnessed for ages." The king turned away, now staring at the ground. "I feel a sense of fear now. One as strong as Hercules... he is a threat, a terrifying threat. Zeus is clearly a lower god I have underestimated. His love affairs put us all in peril."

Gabriel nodded knowingly. "Yes, I met Zeus once. He is reclusive, living deep inside the bowels of Olympus. Sometimes, there are rumored to be booming sounds in the deep, but too many fear him to enter his abode. I would certainly advise caution, my lord."

Kronos nodded, as he mulled the thoughts over in his head. "Tell me, Gabriel. Have you ever considered the merits of the three factions involved in this Great War?"

Gabriel stared down at his king, unsure of how to respond. "I don't know to what you refer."

Kronos made a sweeping gesture with his hands. "You are my friend, and my closest confidante. What I am about to discuss with you shall never leave this chamber. Am I clear?"

Gabriel nodded slowly. This must be serious, he thought to himself. Using his immense spiritual power, he carefully concentrated on his body, shrinking himself down to a smaller form, about the same size as his king, perhaps a head taller. "Before you continue, we should go somewhere private. There are many prying ears that may be listening."

Kronos nodded. "A sound idea."

They arrived in the grand personal chambers of His Majesty, and they took seats opposite each other at a small table, made entirely of marble. The seats were very large, much too large for a normal angel, but for Kronos and Gabriel, beings that stood over thirty feet tall, the chairs were the perfect size.

Kronos sipped a rich golden liquid, a secret broth of heaven, made from the pure spiritual energy of passed beings who had perished in battle.

"Gabriel, I want you to consider my words carefully. This information is secret, known only to some high ranking angels, and even then the full details are only known to me. You will be the second."

Gabriel nodded slowly, as he thoughtfully rolled two small orbs of energy around in his hand. The motion calmed him, helping to put him in a meditative and receptive state of mind.

"What do you suppose the differences are between the three major players in this Great War?"

Gabriel stared blankly at his king. "I suppose the differences- hm. Well, angels can fly, only certain demons can, and humans cannot."

Kronos rolled his eyes. "Alright. That's one difference, I suppose. Go on."

Gabriel, one to usually contain his emotions, blushed noticeably at the king's obvious irritation. "Well, I guess another would be the appearances of the three races. Demons have reddened skin, humans range in tones, and angels are-"

Kronos sighed and held up his hand to halt Gabriel. "You're missing the big picture. You're thinking of the obvious differences. Let's start with an important difference. How the three races live. Angels live in heaven, while the humans and demons are on Earth."

Gabriel nodded as he twirled the orbs in his hand thoughtfully.

"Because angels are separated, we are essentially indifferent to the suffering of the humans below us. And since we do not directly interact with humans very often, they view us as omnipotent beings that only appear in times of great calamity. But that is not the case. Despite the divide between our world and theirs, we are intricately linked with the fate of humans and many other lesser beings on Earth. And do you know why?"

Gabriel shifted his gaze to the ground. "No, my liege. I know not."

Kronos lowered his voice. "We require thought energy from the lower races. Not just to increase our power, but to simply survive. We need no sustenance, and we are immortal, but without thought energy and spiritual energy, we will lose our immortality."

Gabriel jerked his head back up. "Lose it?! How can such a-"

Kronos quickly shushed him. "Silence, you fool. This is the highest level of secrecy. If this information were to slip to the demons, we would be at a major disadvantage tactically."

Gabriel nodded quickly. "Yes, yes, m-my apologies."

Kronos recovered his thoughts and spoke again. "There's more. You have to look at the motivations of everyone involved in this war. Demons are our enemies, since in the past we had enslaved them before the humans were around, and forced the demons to give us thought energy to survive. But demons also despise humans. Humans were originally a species lower than demons, and have risen quickly in intelligence and spiritual power. When they rose, they started stepping on and attacking the demons. This built up a great resentment between the two."

Gabriel stared ahead quietly. This much he knew. All angels knew this.

Kronos indicated himself with his hand. "The reason I am the king of the gods is known to few. It's not just because I am a descendant of the Titans. It's because unlike you angels, I do not require spiritual energy to stay immortal, I can simply ingest it to increase my power infinitely. I also can generate my own energy, and I can devour the dark energy of slain demons, something no angel can do."

Gabriel leaned forwards, his eyes intently showing his interest. "My liege, you are truly a mighty king. You must be giving me this information for a reason. I should expect that you know I will never betray you."

Kronos nodded. "I want to be honest with you. You are now the only being mighty enough to kill me. Your ascension to Cosmos Class makes you the most powerful being in existence. Even I fear you somewhat..." Kronos voice trailed off as his gaze seemed to wander past Gabriel, looking through him as if he weren't there.

"My king, I would never-" Gabriel stared down at the table. So this is why. This is why he had been summoned here. The king feared him. "We have been friends for eons, brothers at that. Even if I were mind controlled to betray you, I would cut out my own soul afterwards..."

"Yes, I know you would." Kronos smiled gently, an expression Gabriel had never seen before. "I have been alone at the top for generations of humans and demons now. Nobody I could speak to, nobody I could trust. You alone are truly my only friend."

Gabriel stared at his king, emotions swirling inside him.

A few moments passed as both of them were deep in thought. Kronos broke the silence. "Let's continue. The differences between the races are vast. The demons never posed a threat to us, but those few short years ago, something happened. Satan somehow gained the ability to evolve, and to force his body to mutate rapidly. Since then, he has mutated many, many times. The terrifying thing about demons is thus: They are immortal, as are we, but they require no thought or spiritual energy to stay alive forever."

"And even moreso, they have the ability to breed and create new life. Angels do not. Gods can, but if a god mates a thousand times, only one of those has a chance at producing offspring. When it comes to vitality and replenishing our numbers, we are at an incredible disadvantage. And this is where humans come in. Because angels are finite, and their numbers are lowering all the time, humans are our only means of bolstering our forces. They are- I should not say 'cattle', but similar to cattle. Because humans can create many more of their kind, they are our real forces in the fight against the demons. I try not to spare angels if I do not have to."

Gabriel interrupted. "Sire, if what you say is true, I still find it morally reprehensible that you would let humans be slaughtered. What reason could you have for this?"

Kronos stared at Gabriel evenly. "Let's try a mental exercise. Which is more reprehensible? Ending the life of a being that would have lived for an eternity, or ending the life of a being that would die of old age in a short span of time anyways?"

Gabriel hesitated, still wanting to take the high ground, but he couldn't bring himself to do it. "I suppose the being of unlimited life would lose much more."

Kronos nodded. "Yes. And there is still more. All angels were created at the beginning of time by the Creator, the Original, the Unknowable. When he vanished, many angels died simply as a result of a lack of thought energy. My research indicated that in the beginning there may have been septillions of angels, but an unthinkable number of them gave their existences up in order to create the first form of thought energy in order to save the rest of their race. Today, only tens of millions remain. That number may be huge, but humans and demons alike would readily out-breed us quickly if either one actually won this war."

Gabriel audibly gasped. "You mean we have to keep the number of humans, our allies, low? As well as the demons?!"

Kronos nodded. "As big of a threat as the demons are, we cannot afford to eradicate them. We need humans and demons to keep fighting. We need them to hate each other, but still coexist with one another. What do you suppose would happen if we simply overwhelmed and killed all the demons off? Simply put, humans would no longer have a mortal enemy. Their killing instinct would turn against us, they would stop praying to us for protection, and they would begin attacking us. With no thought energy being gained from them, and with no other enemies to keep their numbers at bay, we would lose this war in an instant."

Gabriel slumped in his chair. By the gods. This news was universe shattering. He had never thought in these terms before. He gazed at Kronos in wonder. This being, this was no mere Titan. If he had come out and stated that he was the Original One, the Creator, Gabriel would undoubtedly believe him.

"My liege, how can we- why... I can't..." Words escaped his grasp.

Kronos nodded sagely. "Now you understand, brother." He put heavy emphasis on the last word. "You cannot escape your fate now. You and I are bound together. We have a sacred duty to keep hold of the balance of power in this universe. If I were ever to be killed somehow, and some young fool took the throne, things would end badly for all the races."

Gabriel nodded and spoke quietly. "That, my king, is the understatement of all eternity."

Part 117:

Diablo and Barbatos stood side by side on Diablo's balcony at the Castle of Terror. Having recently left another boring meeting, they were relaxing and enjoying the view of a pure black sky, with no life visible anywhere around them.

Barbatos broke the silence. "Slayer. He has been a thorn in the side of demons for too long now. Why do we continue to let him exist?"

Diablo stared vacantly at the sky. "I'm not sure. He's a threat, to be sure... but... when it all comes down to it, we demons have really lost our way."

Barbatos blinked slowly and turned to look at Diablo. "I'm older than any living demon, and I'm not even sure of what you mean. When have we ever had it better than we do now?"

Diablo slowly sighed. "Not... 'better'. It's just that we've lost our purpose. I remember when we lived for the thrill of the killing. We used to fight incredible battles for survival, we used to really let go and have a little fun tearing things to pieces, you know? And now that Slayer is here, humanity once again is becoming a threat."

Barbatos nodded. "I see. You are... bored, then?"

Diablo nodded. "I remember the great First Emperor Satan... a terror of a demon, one who ominously stood over all beings around him. Even the archangels grew to fear his destructive power. He was... an inspirational leader."

Barbatos pondered this. "Yes. I evolved after he did, despite being his senior. It was almost amusing, to see a young whelp rise up to become greater than his predecessors. How he was defeated by a little girl... it... it baffles me." Barbatos lowered his gaze as he stared down at the sprawling demonic city below him. "His power is, of course, now second to the current first emperor but... he had many qualities the current one lacks as well."

Diablo nodded. "Well, in the meantime, your plan to unleash those little horrors is working splendidly. Once again, we are outpacing the humans. How do you suppose they will respond?"

Barbatos shrugged. "I still feel vile that we broke Satan's most sacred rule. To destroy that rule absolutely, just so we could toy with humans... have we no shame?"

Diablo chuckled slightly. "Shame? Shame is for the weak, the petty, the righteous. As demons, we can't afford the luxury of shame. We simply exist to win. In the end, with Satan gone, we should start breaking some rules, letting loose a little. What point are the rules if we end up in a menial, tedious existence?"

"You speak the truth. Rules were made to be broken. When we were just little imps running around, all we did was break rules." Barbatos closed his eyes as memories flooded through his mind.

Suddenly, Diablo grew a huge grin. "Hehehe... yes... let's break some more rules. In fact... let's break all the rules."

Barbatos silently stared at the blackness inside his eyes. "You truly are a devil."

Part 118:

Things are getting complicated.

I rubbed my eyes as I sat down at the table and started to eat the breakfast Phoebe had cooked for me a few minutes ago. Bacon, eggs, and some interesting red and green stuff I hadn't seen before, all summoned with my power and cooked by Phoebe.

I feel tired.

I'm stretched thin nowadays, constantly teleporting between the labyrinth and Hero City, and constantly having to replace clones killed in battle by the Grez means I sleep more than I used to. Ten years ago, I was able to stay awake for eight months at a time because I was always buffing myself with 'Stamina' and simply resting myself with a spell, but I don't have the energy to do that now.

And I sleep a lot. I slept for 14 hours last night, and that was a shorter night. As my thought and spiritual energy supply becomes bigger and bigger, recovering it when it's empty takes longer and longer. But, at least it's worth it.

Hero city is booming. I explained the basic fundamentals of electricity to Captain Adams, and he started running with it. Now we have 24 clones, four days worth of summons, constantly resting and then waking up to summon coal and oil and gasoline all the time.

But, this is interesting. I myself cannot summon either of those three things. I can't wrap my head around the atomic structure of their composition, yet my 24 clones can. Adams named them EN-1, EN-2, etc, since they manage the Energy sector of the city. I just don't get it. How can my clones summon oil, or gas, or anything else I can't? Aren't they supposed to be inferior, stupid, weakened versions of myself?

And speaking of inferior, everything about myself is beginning to feel inferior. I keep having minor and major slips of memory. I went outside half dressed this morning, only realizing when Phoebe blushed awkwardly at me. Luckily, it was the top half that I had forgotten, heh.

But... despite my issues, the war effort is booming. The Grez were a significant challenge at first, but by using a variety of spells and weapons that freeze them in place, we're able to cut their mobility down to zilch and defeat them efficiently now. Things are... looking up.

I just can't shake this feeling, this odd feeling that something is not right in the labyrinth. For a few years now, that feeling that used to plague me day in and day out, that feeling of being watched, it no longer seems to afflict me. Perhaps whoever was watching me is now confused by the presence of all my clones. Maybe that being has lost the scent of me and is confused by identical spiritual energy coming from all places at once.

I just don't know anymore. I don't know anything.

Adams smiled at me as I entered his War Room once again. I was stunned to see an incredible moving hologram floating in midair above the table. It was a hologram of the labyrinth and it shifted around based on the current makeup of the place at any given moment in time.

"Adams..." I gasped as I took the sight in. "How did you... when, wha-...?!"

Adams smiled as he absorbed my reaction. "Like it? There was a promising young recruit with a large amount of technical know-how we rescued from an advanced world while you were sleeping. I let him borrow the Crown of Solomon for a few hours, and he managed to create this exact image you see here. It's fully manipulable, zoomable, and-"

I cut him off as the smile on my face instantly disappeared. "Adams. You... let someone else... 'borrow' the crown? Do you realize just how dangerous that is?"

Adams halted his sentence as my gaze went from lighthearted to serious. "I mean, yes, it could have been dangerous, but I had four clones standing nearby in case he tried anything, and as you can see the ends justified the means! Now you will be able to wear the Crown into battle more often while I use this to plot strategy!"

I shook my head. "Adams, that was a dangerous game you played. The crown, once put on someone's head, cannot be taken off unless they themselves wish to take it off. Don't you think you're being a little too carefree with it?"

Adams shrugged hesitantly. "I guess, but you can take the crown off if they die, right? Meaning, if someone were to try and wear the crown, killing them would allow you to take it back."

I stared at him. This is strange. Adams hates killing other humans. He'd never suggest something like that normally. "Adams, it's unlike you to think of killing another human as an acceptable thing to do. The demons are our enemies, or have you forgotten?"

Adams waved off my criticism with a hand. "Of course, of course, but he was just a kid, and no harm came of it. I was very sure that he would do nothing bad, and as you can see, it paid off in dividends! If I had thought there was even a 1% chance of a betrayal, do you think I would have given him the crown?"

I paused as I considered my answer. "No... I suppose not but..."

I looked back at the crown that Adams was wearing. Does the crown change a person's personality? I've started changing as a person since I entered this labyrinth. Maybe it was the horrors I faced, maybe the crown changed me, maybe Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim did, maybe it was any one of a hundred factors. I speak more formally now, I walk with more reverence and confidence... I'm definitely different. But I'm also thirty now, and was in my teens when I entered. Could this be the result of a simple maturing, or something else.

I stared at the crown on Adams head. "I think I should like to hold onto the crown for a while."

Adams smile faded. "Slayer... you don't think... I would intentionally betray you?"

I squirmed inside. This was getting uncomfortable. What if he said no? "Ah, it's not that. I simply need help mentally nowadays. You know, I'm very scatterbrained as of late."

Adams slowly nodded as he looked into my eyes. "I... see. Very well then."

Reaching up, he placed both hands on the crown, slowly and hesitantly lifting it off. Before handing it to me, he seemed to gaze at it with sorrow in his eyes. Just as quickly as the emotion was there, it vanished as he handed it to me.

"As you wish. I care not." He smiled and chuckled, though it seemed uncomfortable to me, as his eyes darted away. "It's a small thing anyway."

"Yes..." I said, as I placed the crown on my head. As usual, the rush of mental brilliance streamed into my head all of a sudden, and the fog I had mentally felt as of late floated away, and suddenly I could breathe again normally.

And then, I realized something startling, thanks to the abilities of the crown.

Adams was lying about something.

Part 119:

I stared at the ground as I walked. I'm in the labyrinth now, all by myself for once... just like in the old days.

I've lived with my fellow humans now for 10 years. I'm beginning to wonder if I'm doing the right thing. I locked myself in that Cryopod to escape the hell of human activity, constant expectations, backstabbing, betrayal, and even just the general mundane parts of everyday life.

Yet here I am, once again, now I'm not just living among my fellow humans, I'm co-ruling them. Why did I decide to do this?

I gaze down at the three rings on my fingers. Gabriel. Raphael. Michael. My infinite vision sees them as three glowing rings of incredible concentrated spiritual power.

I chose to try and save my species, because that may be what the archangels wanted me to do. Truth be told, I don't want to lead people of my species, I just want to know they they exist and that they aren't being slaughtered and exterminated.

Looking from the rings to my body, I gaze in awe as I realize just how much I've grown. All these years of fighting, and thanks to my battle with Amelia teaching me a lesson, all those years without cheating by constantly enhancing my abilities with wordsmithing. I am massive. Standing exactly seven feet tall, with a body made of iron and forged with spiritual hammers and a thousand battles, even if I were just a normal human, I wouldn't want to mess with myself. My blonde hair is long and mostly unkempt, but I do bathe daily when I'm in Hero City... To be honest, I remind myself of images I've seen of mythological gods, like Thor and Zeus.

I've changed, in more ways than one. The tallest mountain started as a stone, and in the same way, I once was weak but now I've grown.

But I feel the same. I don't actually feel any physically different than I did all those years ago, when I entered this hell. But I need to change in another way. I need to stop being reactive, and become proactive. I've grown to rely on others, especially Adams, too much.

And... there's something else. I remember what Hoarhiim said to me, years ago, moments before he died. I can choose not to accept the name the labyrinth gives me. Why am I Slayer? Why have I accepted that? That name is not one befitting a man such as I. It's a name of darkness, given to me by this accursed labyrinth. It's a name that screams 'bloodthirsty killer'.

I don't want to be a voice for the darkness. I want to be a warrior of the light. I want the name that Gabriel honored me with.

I want to be Hero once again.

" Hero. " I say, pouring my energy into the word-spell. I'm not sure if this will actually do anything, and it doesn't seem to. Maybe nothing happened.

I pause and sigh. I'm getting all worked up over nothing.

As I walk down the corridors of the labyrinth, I begin to sense something up ahead, in the distance. There are many routes on this particular path which curves and loops, some sprouting off to the right, some off to the left.

But in the distance, I sense an aura of spiritual energy. It's weak, very weak, and yet very pure. This is not an energy I've sensed before. Most energy is dark, and twisted, I would classify that which I've sensed before as demonic.

This however, is a pure white energy. In fact, the only thing I can reference that is similar is Hoarhiim. But his wasn't pure white so much as it was just bright. This energy... it must belong to something very important.

As I approach it, the energy appears to come from an open doorway on the right side of the tunnel. Peering cautiously inside the room by craning my neck around the corner, I see a shocking sight!

Chained to the wall, there is an angel there. She appears to be completely affixed to it, with other various sets of chains covered in blood and other body matter littered around the room. This appears to be some sort of prison cell. But then, why is the door wide open.

I speak quietly, almost in a whisper. "My- my lady? Are you an... angel?"

Her head is slumped forwards and her entire body, arms and legs, are spread out and chained painfully tight to the wall, as she's suspended from the ground and hanging off by an inch or two. Her wings are also chained to the wall, as if whoever put her here wanted to take no chance of her wriggling even slightly.

Her head slumped forward, I almost can't tell if she's dead or not. I cautiously enter the room, careful to step around the puddles of... body matter all over the ground. There's no smell, perhaps because the pieces and bits are so old they've lost all their odors.

As I approach her suspended body, I hear a sound of grinding.

The door slams down behind me.

Part 120: Angel

I whip around and glance behind me. A massive steel door has slammed shut. If I had normal vision, the room would be pitch black aside from the dull light escaping the angel's body. Luckily I'm not, and I still see the room as perfectly as ever.

After the door slams shut, nothing else seems to happen, I step back towards it, starting to reach my hand out. As I do, the angel speaks, her voice a raspy whisper. "...Don't..."

I halt and turn back to face her. I have no sense of color and I can't visually see her in a normal way, but I vaguely get the idea that her hair is pure white as is her garb and everything else about her. Come to think of it, I've been in this maze and never seen angels at all before, aside from Gabriel. To be honest, I had thought they were completely extinct.

I walked over to her and stood in front of her. "Here... let me get you down."

As I reach for one of the locks, she whispers again. "...Don't."

She clearly has trouble speaking, likely because of something resembling dehydration. I reach my hand forwards. "Cup. Water."

A plain cup of water appears in my hand, and I offer it to her. Her eyes seem dead but she lifts her head and lets me give her some water. When she lifts her head, I note a collar that is squeezing her neck. Jesus. What the hell did she do to deserve this punishment?

After a few painful swallows, she coughs, the cough causing her a great deal of pain. Without thinking, I reached up and touch the collar. "Release"

The collar pops off, as if it had been held together with scotch tape. Her breathing noticeably improves and her chest loses its tightness.

"Kah... you... shouldn't have... done that... he will be back... soon..."

I stare up and down with my mental vision at the 16 or so chains and cuffs holding her up to the wall. "Why don't you want me to release you? Do you like being in this... position?"

She coughed again, but words seemed to be coming to her more easily now that she could breathe. "Nay... I just didn't want to see you end up... like the others did." She beckoned with a head bob towards the piles of... debris. "Many have tried to save me over the years. All have failed."

I paused, my unseeing eyes staring at her face. "Who are you? Why are you here?"

She rasped a soft, pained laugh. "Ah... who am I indeed? I'm the last angel. Or... so they say... I sense none of the others anymore... I've been here for what feels like an eternity... in this hell."

I nodded. "Well, whatever the risk, I'll get you down from there."

I quickly spoke multiple times in succession. " Unlock. Unlock. Unlock. " As I aimed my mind at each of the cuffs, she started to fall free and I caught her, carefully lowering her to the ground. Of course, I also cast " Clean. " to remove the bloody mess from the room. It sparkles like a hospital in no time.

Her body has atrophied. She has little to no ability to move anything, likely from being chained to the wall for god only knows how long. Her wings are tattered and bloodied, and her back is covered in old scars.

"What is your name?" I try the direct approach. She seems responsive enough.

"I've... forgotten... my name." Her eyes stare blankly at the ceiling from her resting place on the ground.

That is unfortunate. I can't just keep calling her 'angel' as it sounds disrespectful. "All right, then for now, I will call you Cassiel. How does that sound?"

She smiled a light smile. "Ha... so long since I've heard a joke. Cassiel was a man, you know? And an Archangel at that... I don't deserve the honor. I'm just one angel from the resurrection project. I'm not even... a true angel, you know?"

I mulled this over in my head. What does she mean? Aren't angels just... angels? I only know what I know from Sunday School as a child from before I came here to Hell, but... this is not the time for questions. "Don't worry about it, I'll call you Cassiel anyway. If you're really the last angel, that makes you the highest ranking angel in existence, you know?"

Cassiel giggled slightly. "Truly, a breath of fresh air. But... it matters not. We cannot escape this room. And soon, Gressil will return to torture me some more."

My blood suddenly ran cold. "G-Gressil? It... can't be."

She nodded imperceptibly. "Yes... he is a cruel and foul demon. He takes delight in torturing and defiling the bodies of his victims. I was lucky that he was ordered not to kill me, but soon it won't matter anyway. I am dying from lack of thought energy."

I stared at her with my unseeing eyes. What does she mean by this? Do angels require thought energy to live? "How do you get more thought energy?"

She stayed quiet for a minute before speaking. "Well... in the olden days, the King of Gods, Zeus, would dole out thought energy collected from those who prayed to him to the various angels under his command. But when he was finally killed, thought energy was no longer directed at him. You have to pray to a specific angel in order for them to receive it. You also could just give it to them if you have enough, but it requires a vast amount to sustain an angel's life. At least the power of a thousand humans."

I nodded. "Ah! I see! So, like this then?" I clasped my hand into hers and willed energy to leave my body. I felt a colossal amount of energy leave, roughly 80% of all my body's power, as suddenly her aura brightened visibly in my vision.

Cassiel gasped as she jerked up. "B-by Zeus' name! How did you...?!"

I shrugged. "I'm a pretty powerful human, you know."

She paused, as her eyes, now filled with more spiritual energy, came into focus. "You are... a hero?"

I nodded.

"Then... how are you... in this hell?"

I shrugged again. "I came here in a cry- uh, well, it's a long story."

She stared at my face. "You are quite handsome. But... I have... I have seen a face that looks like yours before. Long ago..." Her voice drifted off as she looked away from me. Then she glanced down at my hand, which was still clasping hers. I pulled it away in embarrassment, but she grabbed it again.

"My lord! This is...! These are the three rings of the...?!"

She seemed stunned. I then realized that of course she would be, these are the three highest archangels written about in the bible. Naturally she'd be stunned to see a lowly human wearing them.

She rubbed one of the rings with her finger.... "Gabriel... it can't be... I thought he was dead, but his presence... how did you come to have these rings? Who are you?"

I stared down at my hand that she was holding. Who am I? Who am I, really? What do I even know of myself?

I looked back at her. "My name is Hero. Just plain old Hero."

Part 121:

The formalities and introductions over, I turned my attention to the door. It was a pretty solid looking door, but nothing amazing.

I started to get up and walk towards it, but Cassiel grabbed my shirt. "Wait, don't touch it. That door has a curse on it. If you touch it, you will instantly die. Gressil is the King of Death and Torture."

I nodded. "Thanks for the warning." Then I pulled my arm away from her grasp and walked in front of the door. Reaching out with my mind I spoke.

" Purify. "

The door suddenly SCREAMED in agony and I jumped back in fright, as an apparition of a demon leaped out of the door at me, dissipating in midair. Holy shit, that was close!

Cassiel seemed to be visibly unnerved. "I've... seen that thing... kill too many people. How did you kill it so easily?"

I pointed at my chest. "I'm a special being. I'm unlike any you've ever met before."

She lowered her gaze to the floor. "Well, that would certainly seem to be the case, wouldn't it?"

I decided not to elaborate. It's not that I don't trust her, but having just given her more than half of my spiritual power, I'm decidedly at a decent disadvantage right now. I'll have to see if she's dangerous as we go along.

I reached my hand out and she grabbed hold of it as I pulled her up. Her silk robes were still torn and ripped in various areas, and her body was matted down with blood, especially on her wings. I aimed my hand at her body again. " Cleanse. Repair. "

Instantly, she brightened up as the dried blood vanished and her robes magically sewed themselves back together. She marveled at how quickly it happened. "Goodness, you're a man of a thousand talents! You speak a word, and it happens! Color me impressed."

I nodded. "It's been this way since I arrived here. Let's go."

I placed my hand against the door as Cassiel stood behind me, staring with curiosity at what I was doing. I decided to show off, just a little. Hey, I'm just a guy, you know?

" Eradicate. "

The door blasted into a thousand pieces outwards towards the direction my hand faced, the shrapnel vanishing instantly in midair.

I involuntarily screamed and jumped back as I saw a horrifying sight.

A massive monster was on the other side of the door.

It was Gressil.

Gressil was a terrifying demon, when not in statue form. He was smaller than I remembered, though still very big and towering above me. He appeared to be 11 feet tall, his huge frame barely fitting in the hallway. The door I had destroyed was only big enough for me to fit through, but using my power, I had also blasted away much of the outer wall surrounding the door.

He had wings now. I don't recall those from when I first saw him, all those years ago. His eyes were pitch black, and his long straight beak was filled to the brim with hundreds of small sharp teeth. He clacked his four armlike appendages together as he looked at me.

" Well well well, look what stumbled into my little trap. A knight in shining armor and the helpless maiden he rescued. Looking for a reward, were you? Heh heh heh. "

I grimaced as I glanced back at Cassiel. "Stay close."

I turned to Gressil. "Long time no see, you fucking horrifying demon creature, you."

Gressil quietly laughed. " I'm an evolved gargoyle, whose ancestors came from the dark drakes born from the ancient dragons. I'm not a demon, but you are a lowly simian creature. "

He eyed me up and down, my discomfort rising to incredible levels.

" Been having a lot of fun with those abilities of yours, huh? I've heard of what you can do. You're a dangerous little rat... but only if I let you... SPEAK! " Suddenly his tail whipped out from behind him. I tried to dodge it, but the whip-like speed caught me off guard as it wrapped tightly around my neck. I struggled mightily to pull it off, but I found it difficult to even move.

Cassiel screamed in horror as she saw me choking to death. "Let him go, foul monster of the dark!"

Gressil chuckled under his breath again, a low rumbling noise that sounded like thunder in the distance. " Gwuh huh huh... are you scared, my pretty little angel? You were fun to play around with. This one though, he will be my favorite new toy to torture. After I break his throat, he will have no way of fighting back. "

Cassiel grabbed at the tail wrapped around my neck, her hands pulling and tugging as she tried to wrench it off. The constriction was beginning to be too much for me as I could feel my mind slipping...

Suddenly Cassiel's eyes brightened as a light, from deep within her body began to emerge. "Oh Gressil, I'm not your little toy anymore. I had forgotten, this man saved my life, and during that, he gave me a small gift. Why not have a TASTE!"

Her hands jerked into motion as her lips moved wordlessly, her body suddenly brightening to unbearable levels, as if staring directly at the sun for ten days straight.

Gressil recoiled in horror. " Gah! You goddamned angel! A little thing like this won't- "

While he was recoiled in pain, his tail loosened its grip, ever so slightly. I quickly slid my hands underneath, between my throat and his tail, and took a deep breath.

" PUSH!!! "

A blast of energy surged out of my body, sending Cassiel and Gressil flying in opposite directions, away from me. The blast started from my head this time as I had willed it to do so, which expanded his tail away from my neck just enough for me to jerk down and slip out from underneath it. In a flash, using my superhuman speed, I darted backwards and grabbed Cassiel before she could smash into the wall.

"Sorry about that."

She appeared visibly confused. "Yeah, sure, no problem?!"

I let go of her and dashed back out to the doorway. " Barrier! "

A strong shield of spiritual energy surrounded me. Even at 20% energy left (which had dropped a lot due to using such a powerful Push spell) I was still not an opponent to trifle with.

Gressil lifted up his massive frame as he glared at me. " A lot of fight for a tiny little ape. But unfortunately, you cannot win, now. Just by seeing me a second time, you have been cursed to die. Only I can undo this curse, and once placed, you will die a painful death due to natural causes. It will happen within two days' time. "

I nodded. "Awesome, thanks for the tip!" I think my complete apathy towards his words was slightly humiliating.

" You... brat. Mocking me. I'll make you regret those words. "

I shook my head. "Nope!"

I aimed my hand at my body. " Uncurse! "

Seeing as quite a lot of my remaining energy vanished, I deduced that it must have worked. Gressil confirmed it with his next words. " What?! How did you-?! "

I shrugged. "I'm a special kind of guy. Next time we see each other, I'll crush you into dust."

Gressil charged at me. " IMPUDENT LITTLE- "

Before he reached me, I targeted myself and Cassiel. " Return! "

And suddenly, we were back in my house in Hero City, appearing right in front of Phoebe.

She jumped back in fright as our sudden appearance happened, then quickly recovered her nerves. "A-ah, master Slayer! It's a pleasure to see that you have retur-"

Her voice halted as she saw the angelic woman beside me, and then suddenly appeared to have a tinge of ice to it.

"So. Who is this?"

Part 122:

Hercules smiled as he stood at the front of the battlefield. Demons no longer tried to attack him, they were simply too fearful of his power. Instead they ran around him, aiming for his troops. Every time Hercules tried to charge out and attack one, it would get yanked out of the way by an invisible force.

He aimed his gaze at the bottom of the mountain ahead. There was a large number of holes in that mountain where demons poured out from, and in front of the biggest one, there stood Satan the Defiler, a being of monstrous strength who had evolved far beyond the level of his fellow demons.

Satan glowered menacingly, as he quietly spoke orders to his oracles, all of whom were sending mental signals to the troops on the battlefield.

This was the third time Hercules and his men had fought the demonic hordes, and it was going as splendidly as ever. Thanks to his shared vision power, his troops could see the entire battlefield around them at once. And anything they might miss was covered by scouts on the hills behind him who also shared their vision with his men below.

Hercules grinned. All too easy. Still zero men lost, and thousands of demons being destroyed. Come to think of it, it was almost too easy. If humanity had always had the ability to fight equally with demons, then why had they and the combined might of the angels and gods not eradicated the scourge yet.

Hercules pondered these thoughts. As a man of strength, one would expect him to be a simple minded brute, but in fact he was a genius of unparalleled wisdom. As a half-human half-god, he empathized with both races. He wanted no humans to perish under the armies of Satan, and also did not want angels to die either.

As he humored these thoughts, he heard a scream from one of his warriors! A scyther, the second weakest of all demons, had somehow scored a hit, the bladed mandibles gashing straight into his soldiers' heart.

Hercules leaped towards his warrior, arriving in the blink of an eye, and tearing the scyther out with a single hand, ripping its head off with the other. He quickly began to cast a healing spell, but it was already too late, the man's body slumped in his arms, dead.

Just as Hercules was trying to fathom what just happened, there was another scream, and another! Two more men were hit by hydras! Their venom was useless against the platemail he had invented, but on the skin, it almost always resulted in instant death. With his troops' shared vision, they should be easily able to raise their shield to deflect the deadly spit, but this time, they did not.

And then he saw it actually happen in real time. One of his men swung an axe down towards a charging dark-walker, but just as it was about to hit, the axe jerked to the side in midair and missed completely. The darkwalker pulled a knife out of its shadow, stabbed his soldier in the eye and the man let loose a scream of pure agony, and then he slumped over, dead.

Hercules gasped when he saw this. What in the name of gods was going on?! Was this a new manipulation spell used by the foul demons?!

He jerked his head back and forth across the battlefield, but saw no traces of magic lines indicating that someone was sending spells at his men.

Then, could it be... sabotage?!

He jerked his head back, looking behind his men. As he did, he spotted the massive form of Gabriel over the horizon. Normally, Gabriel would be charging up his newest spell that incinerated the demons... but he did not this time. He was simply watching.

He watched the humans die.

Satan stared in disbelief. Before, he had not killed even a single one of these new soldiers, now they were falling like wheat to the scythe. What was happening out there?

He jerked back to his top general. "Barbatos, status report."

The demon looked around with his special sensing ability. "Hm. Something appears to be aiding us in our battle, some unknown force. Whatever it is, it keeps interrupting the otherwise impenetrable battle formation of those humans, giving our forces openings to attack."

Barbatos stared intently at the demonic forces that were suddenly rallying under the taste of blood and going into a frenzy, attacking the humans from all angles. "Ho ho ho, what have we here? I may be mistaken, but I think that human commander is about to call a retreat."

Satan stared evenly ahead. Fascinating. Who would be interfering and helping the demons, other than perhaps a different demon? Surely, the humans were not simply tired, they showed plenty of energy left. They were making bald-faced mistakes, something he had not seen them do before. Very unlike those he had called mortal enemies.

And, just as he was thinking of issuing another order, he saw Hercules reach under his shirt and pull out a massive horn, which he blew on. The loud, deep sound carried over the entire battlefield.

The sound of retreat.

Satan grinned evilly. "Well well well, looks like our enemies have a traitor amongst them."

Barbatos quietly let his mouth drop an unguarded hint of a smile. "We may have to make use of this for our own advantage."

Satan laughed quietly to himself. " May have to? We will make use of this."

Part 123: Unbridled Rage

" FATHER!! "

A voice boomed under Mount Olympus, as Hercules smashed a door out of his way with a fist, the door barely staying attached to its hinges, flying open and impacting the wall like the sound of a mountain collapsing reverberated throughout the deep.

"We have been BETRAYED!" Hercules stormed up to the altar in front of his father's throne, bowing quickly before standing up straight again. "This is incredible! My forces were wiping out the demons, and Gabriel... he was making my men miss their attacks, jerking their hands out of the way, he made my men die!"

Hercules breathed rapidly as his anger flared through his nostrils. Zeus opened his eyes as he ceased his meditation. "My son, surely you jest. Why should the highest gods allow one winning a war so effectively as you, with zero casualties, do something to prevent your efforts? What reward would they stand to gain?"

Hercules breathed hard as his mind raced. "Jealousy! They are jealous that a lowly demigod would be able to win where they could not before!"

Zeus nodded. "Yes, hm, I can see how that might be the case." He gripped his hands tightly as a bolt of thunder started forming, something that always happened when he started getting angry. "But it wouldn't explain sabotage. Think carefully, what else do you know?"

Zeus was doing what he usually did, soothing others when they annoyed him. However, Zeus himself had a very volatile temper for those that had offended him. He was a proud and haughty god, one who only did something if it was worth doing.

Hercules slowed his breathing as he let his rage somewhat subside. His mind still raced a thousand miles a minute, but his visible anger decreased noticeably. "Hmm... father... I have heard rumors, regarding you. I have heard that the other gods think of you as an angry child who hides in the deep. Perhaps, by bringing me down, they intend to bring shame to you and lower your position among the members of the Ten Highest?"

Zeus' eyes flared. "Oh? So they intend to betray the both of us? What fools. While they drink and celebrate, I have been down here, increasing my powers from the very heat that forged this Earth. The Core has given me powers in secret, powers that will give me my deserved position among the gods. I will topple that haughty, arrogant fool who calls himself my father, and your grandfather. And you, my son, will finally receive what you have always deserved."

Hercules nodded, his anger finally having washed away. "Worry not, father, I will find proof of this treason, even if I have to wring it from the throat of every god and angel I encounter."

Hercules pounded his chest with his right arm as he quickly bowed and made his way out.

Zeus stared at his son as he left. That boy is a mighty son, but I must be careful, lest he overtake me someday, as I soon will my own father.

Zeus quietly laughed to himself, as he sat in the darkness, alone with just his thoughts that he had obsessed with for an eon.

Satan and his demons stared at the map laid out in front of them on the Great Table. It showed the entirety of the known world in the immediate 400 mile surrounding area, with a single spot marked with a big red circle.

"You're certain of this?" Satan rubbed his chin as he looked around the location of the circle.

Barbatos bobbed his head. "Three of our best scouting patrols confirmed it. A darkwalker made it right up to the front before leaving, she was not seen either as far as we know."

Satan chuckled. "Of course she wasn't, the angels are too used to the light to notice something skulking in the dark. So is it guarded?"

Diablo nodded as he walked around. "In a way, it is. Angels and gods enter and exit constantly. There are also two cherubs standing guard inside the doorway, though the darkwalker was unable to confirm the existence of more."

The map seemed to draw Satan's gaze towards the big red circle. A tempting target. But Satan was no fool, he was the brilliant leader of the demons. "We know their hiding place now. Mount Sinai. We don't know what is inside it, but one can only presume the angels must live inside the bowels of the Earth somehow."

A cackling broke out as a few of the generals in the room found amusement in the idea of these high and mighty beings that they had feared for so long were nothing but tunnel rats.

Even Barbatos was not immune to the humorous thought. "Heh heh, dark lord Satan, you know what this means, right? We're fighting winged mole rats!"

Every demon in the room, Satan included, burst into laughter. "The fools sabotage themselves constantly, and they act high and mighty, but in the end they're just tunnel vermin playing god! We will tear their wings off and bury them in the dirt whence they came! Bahahaha!!" Satan roared with laughter as he imagined the face Gabriel would make once they had put him in a human coffin to spend the rest of eternity decomposing in.

The laughter died down after a few minutes as the realization of what they had to do sank in.

"If we want to defeat the humans, the gods, and the angels, we must wait, patiently. We will lose more demons, but when the time is right, we will strike them where it hurts most."

The generals of the room wiped away the tears of laughter and nodded approvingly at Satan's words.

We will wait.

Part 124: Nerves

Cassiel and I slowly walked through the streets of Hero City. Having finally explained the situation to Phoebe, she harumphed and left the house in a tizzy. Does... she like me?! I mean, she's at least a few million years older than me, (as is Cassiel, now that I think about it) but she would appear physically to be 20 years older than me. She's more like my mother than... yeah.

And Cassiel? She appears to be permanently youthful, having apparently died at the tender young age of twenty-five in a horrific car crash. She wouldn't go into details, but I did know that before she died, she was a girl who went to church all the time and prayed a lot. I guess that is why she became an angel?

But something else is bothering me. Cassiel said she wasn't a 'true' angel. What does that mean anyway? What's the difference? And if she's not a true angel, does that mean she doesn't count, I can't say I now know of four (Five? Was Hoarhiim an angel originally? I dunno!), I only still know the three archangels in my rings.

Where did all the angels go?

Cassiel won't say. She clearly knows though. Based on what I've gleaned from hints in the conversations, and what the Crown has allowed my brain to extrapolate, something happened that killed off every angel in existence. I don't know the when, the where, the why, or the how, but I know it did happen. It's just another mystery of this Hell.

As for Cassiel, I can't truly determine how she looks. I have a vague mental image of her and Phoebe's body lines, but it's not like back when I could see. I can see colors based on spiritual energy, I can sense approximate physical ages, I can even detect a person's current health by how they walk, and many other such things, but it's not the same. I do not have the ability to see things properly.

...As Cassiel and I walked, I noticed something odd. She was trembling, especially when anyone drew too close to her. She was being looked at with a wide variety of emotions, as people could clearly see she was not a normal human, and anyone with half a brainstem could deduce she was an angel. Finally, to top it off, she was walking with the Slayer (They still call me that, ugh), which made her stand out even more, as I was clearly no clone.

And I think I know why she is trembling. She's not necessarily shy, but she's been locked up and all alone for millennia, eons even. I think I made a mistake.

I reached over and placed my hands on her shoulder. Since she wasn't expecting that, and she wasn't looking at me at that moment, she jerked back involuntarily, and quickly leaned back when she realized it was just me.

"Oh, Hero. I'm s-sorry, I didn't mean to jump like that..." She was very nervous, her voice was shaking like a tree in the wind.

"Cassiel, are you a little scared with all these people around? I know it must be hard, coming out around so many of them all at once..."

Cassiel quickly shook her head way too enthusiastically. She was clearly trying to assuage my concerns and not make me feel guilty. "N-no! I'm just, ah, shaking in excitement! I've never been in such a big city before with, uh, so many people!"

Her stuttering and stammering made it pretty clear she was lying, but I just rolled with it. If she doesn't want to go home or hide in a corner, I'm not going to be a knight in shining armor. "Yes, I see what you mean. It's very exciting the first time, huh?"

She threw her head up and down enthusiastically in the most endearing form of a nervous nod I've ever seen. It took all my power to contain my laughter from bursting out!

We arrived in the castle after going for our walk. She visibly relaxed once we were in the far less crowded corridors where only a few maids and noblemen walked past, here and there.

As we walked, something interesting happened. I became the one who was nervous. It's only been a few days since I last spoke with Adams, taking the crown from him. As Cassiel grew calmer and calmer, I grew more and more nervous.

How should I act towards him? I was never really good with social problems when I was young, before I entered this place. I always avoided my problems or stopped talking to the people bothering me. But I don't have that luxury now. I'm effectively the most powerful human in existence, a being known formerly as Hero. I cannot sit by the sidelines and passively let others do what they want. I put Adams in charge, and if I need to... I could take him down.

Or... can I? He's integral to the survival of the human race at this point. So what if he made a mistake? I judged him too harshly for it. I know he wouldn't do it again. Giving the crown to someone else will never be a thing he does again. Yes, that's it! I've been too mean towards him. The man has done so much for humanity, while I was lazy and just had fun blowing things up with my powers, being worshiped as a god.

I need to go in there and apologize to him. He doesn't do everything he does, selflessly, every single day with no rest, and deserve to be treated the way I treat him. I'm just plain awful.

As we walked, I sensed Cassiel turning towards me. "Hero? Are you quite all right? You haven't said a word for almost ten minutes, and you seem very nervous."

I nodded quickly. "Yes, thank you Cassiel. I am fine! Was just... thinking about something important I have to do!"

Cassiel slowly turned away, smiling. "Well then, as long as you say so, I suppose."

As we walked, a familiar person walked in front of me. One I hadn't seen in months.

"Beelzebub! You're still here!"

The demon turned towards me and a look of disgust crossed over his face. " You. "

Fantastic. Glad to see he's in a good mood, as always. "How are you doing, old buddy old puppet pal?"

"I'm doing just amazing, as you know. I just love working for humans, doing their dirty deeds."

I nodded enthusiastically. "Mhm! You're always a sight for sore eyes! I'll never forget the look on your face when I killed you!"

Beelzebub rolled his eyes dramatically, and then he paused before continuing on. "Hmm? An angel? It can't be. I thought we... exterminated your kind."

I mentally looked back at Cassiel. She was shaking again, this time in outright terror as no words could escape her mouth. Of course, she fears demons greatly. Damn! I was careless. I should have thought of what this meant to her.

I wrapped my right arm around her shoulders and turned to Beelzebub. "Alright pal, this was a good talk, but we'll be heading off now. See ya."

Leaving Beelzebub staring after us quizzically, I quickly hurried off with Cassiel and we continued on the path towards the War Room.

"Cassiel, are you doing okay?" She was still shaking badly, whatever the hell the demons had done to her, it left a deep mental wound. One she'd likely never recover from.

Cassiel shook her head, finally admitting that she wasn't okay. We came to a stop and I let her sit in a comfortable looking chair as she wiped tears out of her eyes.

"I... can't believe you're friends with... with... one of th-those monsters..." Cassiel shook as she tried to hold back tears, but the effort was futile as they slowly crawled out of her eyes and down her skin.

I knelt down lower than her and looked up at her. It was a mostly pointless gesture, due to my blindness, but I think it made her feel better. "No, Cassiel, we're not exactly friends. I killed him many years ago, and revived his corpse as my puppet. I've done it to many other demons besides him. I do this to mock him forever, and to make him pay for how his kind has treated humans... and the angels."

Cassie slowly managed to stop crying as she wiped away her tears, and then her embarrassment overcame her as she realized she hadn't been strong enough to hold in her trauma in front of me.

I leaned in and hugged her tightly, as she did me. After a few seconds we got up and walked again, as she broke the silence. "Thank you, Hero. You are... truly a kind man."

I smiled. "It's my pleasure, Cassiel. What good is a man if he's not a shoulder for a woman to cry on when she needs it?"

Cassiel beamed at me. "If only we had met before I died... I might have fallen for you."

I felt myself blushing at the thought as did she, and we walked the rest of the way in silence.

We arrived in the war room, as Adams and many of his top generals were huddled around the war table, muttering and whispering to one another. When the two of us entered the room, they stopped speaking and quickly stood up straight.

Adams was the first to open up. "Slayer! Good to s-see you again! I didn't expect you would be back so soon!"

As he spoke, my mental vision watched as another man sneaked out the back of the room, holding onto some form of rolled up parchment. What was going on here?

I decided to ignore it. "Yes, there was a major complication in the labyrinth and I had to make a rapid return."

The men in the room suddenly seemed to notice the angel next to me, their faces showing various expressions, mostly shock and admiration... some showed other emotions, such as silent lust.

Adams bopped his head a bit. "Yes, yes... I see. We were just discussing some boring things regarding the behind the scenes war effort."

Adams indicated that everyone should sit down, and we did. Many men, I noticed, could not, would not, or simply had not taken their eyes off Cassiel. It seemed to unnerve her, but I could feel a different emotion boiling up inside me. Jealousy.

We spoke about various day to day dealings and such for a few minutes, and Adams then turned to me. "Ah yes, would you mind if I borrowed the Crown for a few hours? I need to work on some designs for a new weapon and it greatly improves my drawing speed and thought process."

This was it. I knew it was coming. Adams loved wearing the crown, I know he did. I felt many impulses in my body screaming not to let him have it this time, but in front of all these generals, many of whom I respected, I felt I had no choice.

Taking off the crown, I leaned over the table and handed it to Adams. He smiled as he took it. "Excellent! I'm glad we're past the, um, issue we had earlier."

I nodded as I leaned back in my chair. Suddenly, something smashed into the back of my head and I fell forwards, my body still weak from the spiritual power loss from earlier.

As I fell, I heard Adams speak again. "Unfortunately, it's time to take matters into the hands of humanity. Thank you for your services, Hope."

As I drifted off into a sleeping abyss, I heard many things. Cassiels voice was screaming something, the generals in the room were shouting, but another voice stood out, like a black mark on a white paper.

It was my own voice speaking, but it didn't come from me.

"It was my pleasure, Adams. I will take over now."

Sleep came to me then.

Part 125: Quiet

Ugh... hell... fuck... everything hurts...

I wake up in a daze. My head is pounding, and I feel lethargic. I can't seem to move my body in the slightest.

As I awaken, I notice something terrifying. All of my 360 degree spatial vision is gone. I can't see anything at all. I can only hear things. And... all I hear is breathing, creepy breathing from multiple people in the same room as me.

I'm beginning to feel a bit spooked as my eyes open and I realize that not only are my feet tied together, and my hands are bound behind my back... I'm suspended from the ceiling?!

I appear to be in some form of a straitjacket. It's hard to tell, but something is constricting my entire body tightly.

As these thoughts race through my mind, I hear an echoing boom in the distance. Footsteps. Two or three sets, I think, though it's hard to tell.

The footsteps draw nearer, and a door creaks open, the sound making an ominous echoing sound, like I'm in some underground room. Prison?! No, this must be a practical joke, there's no way-

"Slayer, so good to see you awake. Sorry about, eh, stringing you up like a pig for the slaughter. It was necessary." Captain Adams was speaking. I'd recognize his voice anywhere. The voice of a close friend, a comrade, a trusted agent... a betrayer.

I opened my mouth to speak, and nothing came out. No words at all. I felt my mouth making movements, and I could push air up my throat, but nothing came out. And when I opened my mouth, I felt horribly nauseous, likely because I am strung upside-down.

Another voice speaks. My voice, again. But this voice comes from another person that entered with Adams.

"My apologies Slayer, but we had to do this. You're a failure in more ways than one, and your doubting the King will be the undoing of the human race. I'll be taking over as the new Slayer now." This was definitely my voice. A sentient clone?! One with intelligence and a personality?! Had Adams or someone else figured out a way to make one of my clones into a normalized puppet in the same way as Beelzebub?!

The clone continued speaking. "Allow me to explain the current situation to you. You're currently suspended by your legs about two feet from the floor. I cast Silence on you, so you're unable to speak. I know of your infinite 'storage' ability and as one of the last clones you created, I have all your recent memories, so I'm perfectly aware of the artifacts you're hiding. However, without the ability to speak, you cannot summon any of them. In fact, without the ability to speak, and with me dispelling all your abilities and buffs, you're essentially helpless, even if we weren't to string you up like this."

I could feel tears forming as I wordlessly opened my mouth to protest and beg Adams not to make a horrible mistake. Why would he do this to me?! HOW?! I gave the clones the orders to obey me above all others, then Adams, then their commanding officers! Why would-

...Ah. That explains it. If just one clone somehow, in some way, gained sentience, and I was away, Adams could have ordered the clone to ignore orders from everyone but himself. Then he could have ordered the clone to knock me out. That would explain why the clone didn't appear anywhere in my spatial vision. Perhaps the clone was shielding his presence with a word spell.

Adams spoke again. "Sorry about putting you in this position, old friend. If you had just kept things the way they were, you would have been fine. But your hesitation and greed could cost humanity the war. Hope will be taking over for you in all your daily functions, so even the people un-involved with this plot won't notice that you're missing. As for why we didn't just kill you? Well, we're not sure if killing you will dispel all of your clones. If that happened, chaos would come and thanks to our angering of the demons, we'd surely be overrun."

He sighed, a long, hard, drawn out breath. "I wish... it didn't have to end up this way. We will go on living just fine without you. But you... I always considered you a friend. Even now, I still do. But you're simply in the way now, you're an impediment to the future of humanity as you are now. My deepest apologies."

As they turned to leave the room, Adams turned to look at me. "Oh yes, you've been out of it for a couple days. I just had Hope declare me the King of the humans. Something you never had the will to make happen. Always calling me 'captain'. What an insult. After all my leadership and abilities I've shown, you always treated me like a sideshow. I'm so... tired of this. Farewell, Slayer."

And with that, they left. I was alone now, with what were apparently guards, in my prison cell.

Fuck.

Part 126: Suspended

I hang here, an empty shell of a man.

I can feel that my spiritual and thought energy has returned. Having been hanging here for a couple days, it's all there. But... I have no ability to use it.

I'd have sighed if I could make any noise.

I've deduced by the complete and total silence in the room that the guards around me are either very antisocial assholes, or they're clones. Just... wordlessly staring at the hanging body of the one that gave them life. Yeah, they're just assholes anyway.

I blankly stared at the total darkness around me. I'm tired of all the shit I keep having to put up with. I slave, day in and day out, to help humanity. I give my spiritual and mental energy, often having to sleep for days at a time, just to summon clones to help these people, and they shit all over me.

To hell with humans. I'm so tired of their pretentious way of talking. I'm so tired of the fake respect and humble bowing. If this is the way they really feel about me, just a TOOL to be used, it's no wonder the demons want to torture and enslave all humans. At least the demons have respect for one another.

...Yeah. Maybe I've been looking at it wrong all this time. Maybe the demons aren't the bad guys here. Sure, they look like monstrosities, they hunt down and kill all humans, they murdered the entire angelic race, and they're cocky, smug dipshits half the time... but at least they don't kill one another. They have disputes, but they live their lives in relative harmony.

Are humans the real monsters? Even before I came here in this Cryopod, my own species seemed to alienate me. I was mocked as a kid, called names, laughed at, made fun of, and it didn't get much better as I got older. I held down a couple jobs, but my coworkers always made fun of me behind my back. My family treated me as a loser because I was always reading or playing games and flipping through comics.

The reason I got in that cryopod... I think I just wanted to end it all. Maybe I was feeling suicidal and didn't care what happened to me. Those signups for the test program at CryoTek... they were too tempting. Freeze yourself to enter into the future, for free. Sure, it had a chance of going horribly wrong, but I always saw news reports about their successes freezing Henry the Pig for a year and unfreezing him. The technology worked.

I saw it all happen, and I wanted to be a part of something, anything was better than my boring monotonous life doing what bosses told me to do, living in a small apartment with a menial life that was guaranteed to end up with me dying old and alone someday.

Once again... I'm feeling it all return. The emotions and feelings I bottled up for 10+ years. I was never prepared for anything, I've been just winging it since I arrived here.

But... no more. If I can just escape this fucking prison cell, I will shit holy fire upon Adams for his betrayal. I will destroy my clone, I will rescue Cassiel, I will leave this place, and I will stake out my own life in this labyrinth, free of other humans.

But... how? How the hell can I escape this situation? It'd be convenient if Hoarhiim would suddenly reawaken right now. That's not going to happen though. Cassiel is the only one who might be able to help me, but I don't know where she is. I'm not sure if Phoebe is on my side or not, or if she even knows what's going on.

Crap! That clone is going to pretend to be me, Phoebe probably won't even know I'm gone! And to top it off, even if she figures it out, I'm still stuck here.

THINK! What can I do to escape this situation?! There has to be something! I'm a goddamned Hero! I have the ability to make fantasy into reality with just a single word!!

Hah... it's no use. I can't think of a thing.

Wait.

My hands are bound inside the straitjacket, but... I feel something... no. It can't be. Is Adams a fool? Is my clone? They didn't actually... hahaha...

I'm still wearing the three rings of the Archangels, I'll pull one of them off and put it back on, maybe that will activate it and give me something to work with. Anything is better than nothing, right?

As I slip the ring off, and slip it back on, a familiar sensation falls over my body. It's called nothing happens.

Son of a bitch.

I heave my chest in and out in a silent form of a sigh. I really am doomed, aren't I?

But... these rings... I've worn them for ten years. They can't seriously be valueless, can they? No. These are the three mightiest archangels. They must be able to aid me.

I focus my mind as a single name appears. Raphael. I need your wisdom. I need your guidance. Please, open up to me. Speak to me... Raphael...

Raphael...

Raphael!

RAPHAEL!!!

The darkness begins to swirl around me, as I appear around a familiar campfire once again, in a small clearing I've seen before.

An old man sits across from me, warming his hands by the fire.

"Oh? So you've returned to keep me company?"

Part 127:

I watered the plants as I did my usual daily busywork, waiting for him to get home.

Having just bought some food from the local market, I found myself wondering, as I had for the last week or so, what is going on?

First, he comes home with this... this... sexy young little angel girl... He just POOFS into the kitchen right next to me, scaring the heavens out of me, brushes it off, goes on a walk with her, and then he leaves for a couple days.

What the heck is going on these days? He's always so busy, and I find it unnerving to have so many of his mindless, speechless clones walking all over the city. They're not nearly as good at conversation as he is, to put it bluntly. Ah, actually, they don't speak at all unless it's to cast spells.

Ah... I still remember the first time I saw him. It was almost 11 years ago. I had just awakened from Bahamut's spell, as did the rest of the people in this city. Having lived for a short eternity as a monster that did whatever Bahamut wished, I had grown accustomed to being ordered around like a pawn on a chessboard.

But then this wonderful young man, or rather, I suppose he was just a boy of twenty at the time... he came and rescued all of us, defeating our captor! And despite his incredible genius, despite his powers, despite his heroism and the adoration given him by the people... he never let it go to his head.

He's a humble man, even now. He never gets full of himself. He never insults anyone or depreciates them. Not even me, a household slave who had been imprisoned by a ruthless monster, was spared his kindness. He always treated me with respect, never ordering me around, never talking down to me as if I were worthless. He simply... respected me.

And then he got in that awful accident. I found myself... drawn to him. He kept trying to set me up with others... but I didn't want to do that. I don't like Adams. Not just in a non-romantic manner, I just don't trust him. He's too nice. He's too good to be true. He's always bothered me. After ten years of faithful devotion to the man who saved our people, you'd think I'd have come to respect Adams but... I can't. I just can't.

Adams was proclaimed king recently, and the man that I... love... he has not returned yet, not for the last couple days. But seeing that angel next to him... I see now. He's an attractive, strong, powerful man. I can't simply stand by and watch. I can't just let him be taken away by another woman. Even if he doesn't want me anymore... I have to tell him. I have to make this right.

I have to take a chance. I can't be silent anymore.

As these thoughts cross my mind, I see something that makes my heart jump. It's him! Him and Adams... ugh. They're walking down the path towards his cottage. Perfect, I'll go over there and say hello, make some food, and when Adams leaves, I'll just... I'll do it! I'll finally do it! Even if he rejects me, you can't make an omelet without breaking some eggs!

I walk over to the cottage a few minutes after he enters. Can't rush in too quickly, it could make things awkward.

As I enter, Adams greets me. "Oh, hello Phoebe! Great to see you again! We haven't talked much, have we, of late?"

I shake my head. "Ah, no, I do apologize for that, King Adams. Congratulations on your coronation! You deserve it!"

Adams nodded as he closed his eyes and smiled. Despite my thoughts, he really is a humble man. He will make a fine, if flawed king.

Adams turns away from me and speaks to the man I love. "Ah well, in any case, keep me up to date. Have a good day, Slayer."

As he starts to walk away, a question takes shape in my mind and forms on my lips. "Hmm? Weren't you calling yourself Hero now?"

Adams freezes just before he reaches for the door, and looks at Hero. "Oh. Hm, yes. Now that I think about it, you did change your name, didn't you. How careless of me."

Part 128:

Once again, I found myself staring into the flickering firelight. Raphael stared into it too, neither of us saying anything at first.

I broke the silence. "I was betrayed."

Raphael raised an eyebrow. "All good men are, eventually. The only people who are never betrayed are those not worth betraying in the first place."

I closed my eyes as I warmed myself at the fire. "Raphael... you told me, when we last spoke, that you would be the one asking the questions when I next came. What did you mean by that?"

Raphael nodded slowly. "I have many questions I wish to ask of you, truth be told. But now you know the secret, you know you can visit me whenever you wish to, just as you can visit the other two."

I smiled slightly. "So will you answer my questions first? If you don't then I may die and be unable to answer your questions in the future."

Raphael frowned at me. "Careful now, you're starting to become smarter. That is logic that I hear you using."

"Haha, yes, I suppose it is." I chuckled wryly. "Raphael. How can I free myself from this mess? Must I wait for a savior?"

Raphael looked up from the fire at me as I opened my eyes and met his. "Surely you jest. You were given a divine title by my younger brother. Hero. Does a Hero do the rescuing, or is he one to be rescued?"

I shook my head. "You're right, of course. I have to be the Hero and rescue myself. Haaaah, it just seems impossible."

Raphael looked back down at the fire. "You misunderstand. I neither said it was good nor bad to do either one of those things. Perhaps you should be rescued. After all, a true Hero needs to rely on his companions, as well as himself."

I shook my head again. "No, it's wrong. I don't need to be rescued. I should do this myself. I got myself into this situation by trusting others too easily, I need to get myself out."

"Trusting in others is not a bad thing. Trusting too easily though, that is something that is remedied with experience. Even I was betrayed once. All of the angels were."

I jerked my head up. "What? You were betrayed?!"

Raphael gazed back down, into the fire, as he closed his eyes and a single tear slipped out. "I was betrayed. Betrayed by one I thought a friend. A friend I had known since as far back as I dared remember. He slipped a figurative knife into not just my back... but the back of everyone that I knew."

I could sense tears welling up as he spoke. Those wise old eyes... Compared to my friendship of ten years with Adams... surely his betrayal cut more deeply than anything I could possibly imagine.

"Raphael. Do you know? Do you know how I can escape this place?"

Raphael raised a feeble old hand up and wiped the tears from his eyes. "What if I were to tell you? What good would that do for me? Do you expect me to do you a favor for free?"

I paused. To be honest, I did. But... he's lost everything. I don't know what I could possibly do to...

I'll try the simple approach. "What do you want me to do for you? If it's within my power, I will do anything."

Raphael nodded and smiled, for the first time ever. It was a sweet smile, reminding me of a tender grandfather as he looked at the moving form of a baby grandchild.

"I was only jesting, young child. But... I want you to make me a promise."

I paused. A... promise? "Of course. What is it?"

Raphael heaved a small sigh. "I want you to promise me... you'll end this war. The whole war. Make peace with the demons. Not just the ones outside, but the ones inside your heart."

I closed my eyes again. Make peace? With... the demons?

"Why would you ask this of me?"

Raphael stared at me intently. "The demons won the war against the angels. They killed everyone I knew. But... we deserved it. Angels are not the arbiters of justice. We were a corrupt, immoral group. We... deserved to lose."

He stared again at the fire. "Demons, humans, angels. They only do what is in their own self-interest. I don't have all the answers. I'm not all knowing. I'm not truly the wisest, despite what they may say. But I do know this: The demons are not evil. They have many positive qualities, they do many good things for each other. They lack certain flaws that both angels and humans possess."

"And, if you promise me to make peace, you must promise me one other thing. Protect Cassiel. She is the very last living angel. Despite being a reborn human, and not a true angel...

she's the last remaining one of us. I beg you... protect her. I don't want... to see us... go extinct."

I nodded slowly, for the last time. "Tell me what I must do. I will do anything to fulfill your wishes."

"Good. I thank ye, Hero. Go now, and speak to Gabriel. Of my brothers, he is the one that will be able to help you escape."

I stood up, and bowed my head. "Thank you, Lord Raphael. I will escape. I will end this awful war. I will do what must be done."

Raphael stood up and walked over to me. Placing his hand on my shoulder, I once again felt a surge of magic enter my body. "Farewell, Hero King."

I came to, seconds later, still suspended in darkness.

Gabriel.

Hercules walked alongside his father, the great god, Zeus. As the god of thunder and lightning, he possessed explosive power, and a temper to match. He was in the top ten gods, but when it came to his actual abilities, he was feared and respected by all of them. He had known for a great many eras that this was the case, and had thus secluded himself for an incredibly long time.

But Zeus had not gotten weaker. In fact, he was stronger now than he ever had been before. Like his father and his mother before him, Zeus was a Titan. Unlike other Titans though, he possessed even more strength than one would expect, seeing as he had been capturing and devouring angels in secret. Their deaths were always attributed to demons, but truly it was Zeus. Their wings were the most important part, as those concentrated their spiritual powers and gave rise to many different abilities of his. The most important ability had been his evolution that allowed him to control the weather, notably thunder and lightning.

Zeus was truly a mighty god, and soon, he'd have the chance to prove it. He was a fearless god, bringing only his son with him. He had many angels in the Court of the Holy Gardens who aligned more with him than they did Kronos' way of ruling, and he knew a few of the lesser and greater Gods were on his side too.

He approached the Throne of his father and his high court. Zeus stretched his shoulders around a bit.

"Great Lord, Kronos! I have come today to ask questions of you!"

No god ever called Kronos "father" as he had sired many many children among the female titans of old. Zeus had fathered a number of children himself, but their numbers were eclipsed by Kronos thanks to his vast age advantage.

Kronos, who was meditating on his throne, stirred. "Hmm? Zeus? Ah yes, it has been a long time since you made an appearance here in my court. What brings you to these walls?"

Zeus grimaced. Playing the buffoon, eh? "Father, I have... heard from my own son, that there was... treachery.. on the battlefield. One of your angels caused a great battle, which would have been otherwise victorious, to go awry. He caused the death of many of my son's pawns. I want an explanation!"

Kronos stared down at the son standing before him. Zeus was, no doubt, one of his strongest children. Kronos feared none of his sons or daughters. Nevertheless, if he had to put up with their nonsense constantly, he'd never have time to rule.

"Zeus. Are you accusing someone in my court... of treachery?"

Zeus stared back evenly. "Yes." His glare met his father's emotionless, unblinking stare. The two of them seemed to shoot invisible sparks at each others eyes.

Kronos slowly rose from his seat to his full height. His son was an ant compared to him. Kronos stood dozens and dozens of feet taller than his child, even though he himself was minuscule compared to Gabriel.

"You know what this means, don't you? You either must provide evidence for your charges... or you must duel with the King."

Zeus sneered. A rigged court in favor of his father's pet angel, Gabriel? Never in a million years. Kronos has eaten many of my brothers and sisters when they defied him, but I will not fall as they did.

"A duel then! I will duel you for the right to the throne! When I have reached the throne, I will take it over for myself and right this grievous wrong!"

Kronos chuckled to himself slightly. The young fool thinks he can defeat the one who slayed the two great Titans of old. Those two titans were a monumental terror to the cosmos. Compared to me, my son is an insect.

"Very well, we will go to the Courtyard of Resentment and have our duel there."

Zeus nodded. "I have long waited for this day, father."

Kronos glowered at his son. "That is king to you."

The three archangels were away on an important mission to the north. Zeus and his father, Kronos, stood apart from each other in the mighty and massive Ring of Dueling, almost three miles in diameter, at the Courtyards of Resentment. It was a ring covered in marble blocks, incomparably vast in size. More than enough room to settle a score between two Titans.

The archangel Uriel presided over this match, levitating above the arena. "The rules are simple. Defeat your opponent using any method possible. Whoever will be crowned king must be smarter, faster, and stronger than anyone else. Kronos has proven time and again that no angel or god can defeat him. Zeus, if you can defeat him, you will be crowned king and assumed the strongest. However, you will still periodically have to fight others who challenge your position. If you do not agree to these rules, you may leave now, and hang your head in disgrace for all eternity. Do you accept the terms?"

Zeus grimaced. Listen to the bias in favor of my father. "Yes! I will defeat you, as this has been a long time coming! Revenge for all my brothers and sisters!"

Kronos glowered at the tiny figure in front of him. "I have won thousands of duels across thousands of ages. Giving up and living in disgrace would be preferable to suicide, you know?"

Hercules watched from the sidelines, as thousands upon thousands of angels and gods seated themselves or flew to get a good vantage point.

The great god, Zeus, stared up at the mountainous figure of his father. "You think this will be easy, don't you, father?"

Kronos shook his head. "No, my son. I know it will be. "

Uriel grimaced as the two threw cliched threats and verbal insults at each other. Just get this over with so I can go and take a nap. "Very well, the contestants have agreed to this duel. The match shall begin in three... two... one... BATTLE!"

Part 130: Clash Of The Titans

Nobody had expected such a fantastic display of battle prowess as the one that occurred on that day. Hercules and the thousands of angelic and godly spectators stared with fascination at the battle that was to take place before them.

Zeus stood perfectly still when the battle started. Kronos laughed. "Letting me have the first attack, eh?" Kronos quickly raised up his foot and slammed it down, intending to stomp the child beneath him. The impact shook the grounds of Heaven and a few angels still walking to their seats tumbled down and lost their footing.

When he raised his foot again, Kronos saw that Zeus was not there anymore. "Looking for me, father?"

Zeus floated in midair behind Kronos, a big smirk on his face. He's fast. Kronos thought to himself.

Kronos jerked his right hand towards Zeus, but Zeus vanished again, appearing next to Kronos' left ear. "You'll have to be faster than that, daddy."

Kronos grew angry at the words of mockery, and suddenly jerked into motion. Jumping, running, grabbing, he chased his agile son all over the arena. Zeus appeared to not even move from one place to another, he simply vanished and reappeared.

The king of the gods paused after a few minutes. "Well well, looks like we've got a stalemate here. You're too fast for me to catch, but I'm too big and strong for you to hurt. What will you do then?"

Zeus laughed. "Hahaha, I can move instantly at the speed of light. It's the power I gained when I gained control over lightning and storms. But I'm not fast and weak, I'm fast and strong. That mistake will cost you dearly."

Suddenly he disappeared, reappearing next to Kronos ear again, with a mighty battlecry, he blasted the sound of thunder point blank into Kronos' auditory centers. Kronos bellowed as the sound blasted out his eardrum, his inner ear rupturing and blood pouring out of it. As he grabbed his ear in agony, Zeus appeared again, doing the same thing to his opposite ear, causing Kronos immense pain and to become completely deaf.

Kronos fell to his knees in bone shaking agony, as his eyes slammed shut from the pain overriding his mental faculties. When he finally regained the ability to open his eyes, he saw Zeus floating mere inches from his face, preparing a big spell. The instant Kronos opened his eyes, Zeus activated it.

A fantastically bright twin bolt of lightning blasted out of Zeus' hands, lancing directly into his father's eyes. Kronos screamed, roared, and bellowed in agony as his eyes exploded into a bloody mess. He started swinging his right hand around wildly, trying desperately to slap Zeus out of midair, but he was unable to hit a thing.

Zeus floated above his father's kneeled body, a sense of sorrow passing over his face. "You were a dear leader to our people, pushing us through many dark times." He spoke to the man who could no longer hear. "I do not do this out of hatred. I do this because it is time to begin a new era. One without the influence of the demons. My own son and I will eradicate them, as you were unable to do. For the good of angels, gods, and our human cattle, we will lead this universe to a new age of peace and prosperity."

A single tear went down his cheek as he spoke. "I'm sorry, father. I love you, despite your flaws."

His hands whipped into a frenzy as he wordlessly began preparing a spell unlike any other in his lifetime. The otherwise serene, peaceful and bright sky over heaven, magically illuminated with no visible suns, became cloudy and dark, as a massive storm began brewing.

As his father raged and screamed, the cloud began emitting great sparks and loud booming thunder emanated from it, as Zeus prepared his ultimate spell.

He looked down on his father from on high. This would be the last time he saw him alive.

" Fulmen e Caelo! "

A blast of lightning shot down from the sky, the size of which nearly compared to Gabriel's own cosmos-class magic light wave. The bolt hit Kronos with such speed and force that he had no time to even scream in pain. His body ruptured internally as a wave of blood and liquefied internal organs erupted from all of his orifices. He instantly lost his footing, and fell down, his body smashing into the ground with the force of an asteroid traveling the speed of sound. Many later theorized that the bolt of lightning had such force that it slammed him into the ground at high speeds, though no tests were ever done to confirm it.

Zeus stared stonily at the massive corpse below him. His tears gone, he raised his fist in the sky.

The audience at first was completely quiet, but Hercules broke that silence. "HURRAH! My father is the decisive victor!"

The audience erupted in cheers. Such a fantastic and powerful god would surely lead them to crushing the demonic hordes!

As everyone cackled with glee and delight, one person remained silent. Uriel watched from on high. As one of the archangels, he had not expected that this would be the result. He had thought Kronos was unkillable. But now that Kronos was gone, he knew sweeping changes were coming, and the results would be anything but positive for his kind.

Part 131:

As I hung suspended from the ceiling, I concentrated, deep in my mind, and spoke his name.

Gabriel.

Again, the blackness around me melted away, as my eyes opened and I could see once again. Whiteness surrounded me as I began free-falling through the sky. Infinitely falling, falling for an eternity, it was a feeling that made me feel violently ill, but also small and insignificant.

And again, I saw a familiar being. A massive archangel, the one known as Gabriel, the Mighty King.

He was different now though. Seeming much smaller, appearing in front of me as I fell. He was still huge, easily the size of a few football stadiums stacked together... but not as large as I remember. No longer wielding his weapons and the Bible I had seen before, he wore a plain white set of robes, though they were pure and clean, as expected of an Archangel.

"You have returned." He spoke to me, his voice much softer and quieter than it was previously. "It would seem that you are in a dire circumstance, Hero King. Have you come to beg my aid?"

I smiled as I fell. "Yes. I am in dire need of your help. I am trapped, there are going to be big problems if I cannot escape. Will you lend me your power?"

Gabriel shook his head. "Ever since my companions and I were imprisoned in these rings, eons ago, we have never once lent our power to anyone. We were carried around first by the great Egyptian god of old, Horus, and later by the devil-like female known as Bahamut. While she was not a true demon or any evolved form of one, she was certainly a demonic being, one who won battles through lies and treachery."

I nodded as I fell past a thick cloud cover. "I am sorry that you were imprisoned in those rings. May I ask, what did you do to earn such a punishment?"

Gabriel's eyes lowered down below me, to the ground that I was falling towards and might never reach. "I... had to make a choice. A choice that was impossible to make. One that doomed my people to nigh-extinction. That choice... this is no punishment. My people were the ones who received the true anguish."

I stared at him, watching as his eyes filled with sorrow. "I... wish I could undo it. The angels may not have been mighty, and perhaps the gods were fools, but to have them all die off... it seems so cruel. So... awful."

Gabriel nodded. "But you know, things are not as they always seem. The Great War was not a normal war. It was caused by those who had profit to gain from it, as were all human wars fought over territory, riches, oil, women, and many other things of that sort. There is no such thing as pure evil in a war, only degrees of debauchery and immorality. And the angels... they were not above committing such vile acts."

Gabriel sighed deeply as he stared at my falling body. "I will not lend you my power, Hero King. I will give you my full power. Not just mine, but that of my two brothers as well. We have long ceased to be useful. Our kind only has one left, and it is up to you to protect her. She is the key to bringing balance between the three worlds. If you promise me to protect her, you will leave here no longer a man. You will become something far above such a level of mortality."

I hesitated. I'll... no longer be a man? Does he mean genderless, or no longer a human? I don't... know if I want that.

But... I owe the people that have fought under me and for me. I owe those who gave me safety and care for ten years. One spoiled ruler needs his discipline, and I have a clone to catch.

"Very well. I accept your terms, Gabriel. I will do whatever is in my power to end this war. I will bring balance back to our universe. If I fail... then perhaps it was never destined to begin with."

Gabriel stared at me solemnly. "Since you have agreed to my terms, these are my final words. Listen well. You are no longer the Hero king. As of this moment, your powers will advance you to a new unseen tier of immortality. You will call yourself the God King of humanity. Only two such beings in the past have ever had such titles. But you are our last hope. Farewell, God King. Do not squander your power. Our hope lies with you."

I raised my hand up and saluted the archangel. I'm not good with formalities, but this seemed to be the best way to communicate my respect for his position.

"Farewell, Gabriel. May we see each other eons in the future, as brothers."

Gabriel beamed broadly, as his body floated upwards into the sky. From above, a massive lance of light shot down, piercing my heart like a blade of molten metal. I screamed again in wordless agony, as millions of runes etched themselves into my body, their dark lettering blotting out the color of my pale skin, and then they turned bright white and disappeared as they embedded themselves into my very soul itself.

And suddenly, I was back in the jail cell. But something had noticeably changed.

I could see again.

Part 132: Colossus

My aura rippled with power. I felt overwhelmed by the amount of energy blasting out of every pore in my body. It was like I was a mountain top, and the energy fleeing my body was the water of Niagara Falls smashing down into a tiny soup bowl below.

With a single movement, my arms burst out of the strait-jacket. The clones left in the room started to take notice of me, but I was unbelievably fast now. In the blink of an eye, I had spun around with such force that the ropes hanging me from the ceiling exploded from the heat friction in the air, and I jerked my hands out, stopping myself.

Whipping around in midair, I landed lightly on my feet, and took four steps. Each step placed me in front of one of the four clones, and a single punch destroyed them, transforming them into lifeless matter on the walls. It was a cruel fate, but they're too weak for me to bother with reintegrating, and I still lack the ability to speak.

Two seconds later, the door barring my room smashed off its hinges, flying forward and burying itself four feet into the opposite wall. The stone that covered the wall was shattered, and the soft earth behind it was not dense enough to slow the door down quickly. The impact made everything around me rumble, including the ground and other prison doors.

Holy fucking shit, I am powerful. When I punch things, I don't even feel it! My body is way beyond the strength of iron at this point. It's like I took a training regiment of insane requirements and started doing it nonstop for a few eternities. How did angels lose the war if they possessed this kind of power?!

Thinking that thought, I glanced down at the three rings on my hand. The names of the angels were no longer there. They had lost their power.

But I won't take them off. I'll wear them, in memorial of those who gave their lives to protect me. I won't fail you, Gabriel, Michael and Raphael.

I jerk my head to the side just in time to see a knife fly past my head. One of my clones is there, summoning knives in the distance. Ordinarily I couldn't see him with my eyes, but my eyes are beyond perfect now. I have telescopic, microscopic, Xray, and Heat-sensing vision, to name a few. And weirdly enough, I see all of them at one time.

To be honest, it's actually a downgrade over my spatial vision, but I can regain that back once my voice gets returned. For now, I only have speed and power, and my vision, or, do I?

As another knife flies at me, I jerk my hand up and snatch it out of midair. Then I spread my legs out in a rock-steady foot position, arch my arms apart, and clap them together. A wave of forces surges forwards, smashing my clone backward. He snaps his neck instantly when he hits the wall. One down, a few thousand more to go.

My clones are still important for maintaining this city though. It's not the citizens that are at fault here, it's Adams. Quickly looking in all directions with my enhanced vision, I spot a small troop of men running down the stairs. My body darkens as I press myself against the wall, blending in with the shadows. Neat, I'm discovering new powers all the time.

As the men run past, I lightly tap my foot in the ground and silently leap at the doorway. Landing in a roll, I climb up the rotating stairwell in 4 more steps, pinning my body between the walls above the door as I again blend in with the shadows. Another group of soldiers charges through whispering to each other about "Neutralizing the rogue clone."

Hmm? What's this? I've got a very bad feeling this won't be as easy to resolve as I'd like.

I luck out, the next group of troops, while bigger, is around a corner in the distance. I jump down through the doorway from my vantage point on the ceiling, dart forwards, and jump up again, my grip easily allowing me to hold onto a massive pillar that reaches up into the roof. Am I Spiderman or something?

I'm super strong, super fast, nimble, and have the ability to blend into shadow. I've definitely powered up. But I've gotten lucky so far. The real test will be recovering my voice.

As the soldiers run past, I scan the area with my eyesight. Lots of red life signatures, and a bunch of black ones. I assume the black ones are my clones? Have their powers been corrupted? I thought they always had a holy aura?

This is not good. I was only unconscious for a couple days. How has so much changed?

Once the soldiers below me have disappeared into the prison system below me, I jump down, leaping forwards towards the prison cell for females. If I'm lucky, maybe Cassiel will be down there.

But I come to a screeching halt, as I run into one of my clones again, standing beside Adams and a full squad of men. Hm? Aren't these the Yellow Squad members?

They eyeball me suspiciously as they level their weapons at me. "Slayer! Is that the one?"

The clone quickly responds. "Yes! That's him! It's Hope, you have to catch him!"

Wait, he's pretending to be the original?! Shit, that son of a bitch.

Part 133: Rogue Clone

King Adams warned me that there was a rogue clone on the loose. "Hope has gained sentience and turned against us, this is your fault, you guys need to help me stop him."

But I didn't expect to see this.

Slayer stood next to me as he pointed at the... thing in front of me. It was covered in grotesque, pulsing tattoos that changed from light to dark and back again. They seemed to be alive, crawling all around in his skin, sometimes fading away and then reappearing.

And his eyes... they were glowing a bright white, something I had heard they used to do many years ago, before he battled with and killed the Dark Witch. But those were just rumors.

This thing in front of me, whatever happened to this clone, it was terrifying!

Colonel Cody, now a much higher ranked military commander thanks to his tactics for combating the Grez, turned to me. "Get him, Saul! Get him!"

I leaped into action, whipping my Buddha Palm forwards. As I leaped, I deftly jerked my other hand around and slapped an Orange level canister into the firing compartment. 75% power, this is the biggest blast I've ever used before.

BOOOOOM!

A blast of fire and air, a literal inferno from hell, leaped out of my forward-facing palm, smashing right into the disgusting mutant clone.

And he ate the blast oh my god.

He somehow opened his mouth and sucked it all in, preventing even the slightest damage to anything around him, himself included.

"What the fuck?! What did you do, Hope?! How did you get that strong?!" Slayer yelled from the side at the clone in front of me.

The clone wordlessly held his hand up at me, and I jerked back, expecting some kind of attack.

"He attacked Saul! Gunther, you're up!" Colonel Cody yelled at Gunther, and the big hulking man charged at the 7 foot tall titan of a man in front of us.

Activating his rocket fist, he blasted forwards at inhuman speeds towards the clone, but in the blink of an eye, the clone jerked his hand up, caught the glove, and crushed it without any perceivable effort.

Slayer aimed his hand at the clone while he was distracted. " DIE! "

Nothing happened, and the clone whipped his head around to look at Slayer. Spotting what was apparently his real target, he leaped at Slayer to attack him as Slayer jumped backwards. While jumping back, Slayer yelled again. "VANISH!"

And instantly, his body disappeared.

I heard noises moving around, clearly an invisible Slayer, but I had no idea where he was. However, the clone seemed to follow him with its eyes and jumped after him. Yeah, that's definitely a clone. Slayer can't see a thing, he has to use that weird spatial vision of his. I've heard it explained but I don't understand it. What I do know is that this clone is not casting any word spells at all, so someone must have been experimenting on him or something.

"Shit, you can still follow me with your eyes? How did you get so strong, monster?!"

A voice sounded off near me, but I couldn't tell where it came from. Gunther was now weeping in agony at his nearly severed fist, as the metal had been crushed into his hand and it was impossible to get out.

I called over a nearby clone. "Get him out of this gauntlet and heal his hand!"

The clone didn't nod or anything, but quickly repaired and healed it and Gunther was back to full health in no time, though he kept wincing, likely due to the phantom pain.

But this battle... this is one I shall not forget for the rest of my life.

Part 134:

I chased after Hope. He's got everyone fooled good, though I'm sure the high ranking generals who were at that table know who he is, as does Adams. This must be at the highest levels and nothing below.

However, Hope was already only 50% my normal strength when I summoned him. Now that I'm unfathomably stronger, he's going to be falling to pieces as quickly as all the other clones. I'm having trouble hitting him though, because his spatial vision and apparent intelligence is quite high.

Strange though, now that I think about it, Adams had said that he gave the Crown to a youth from a developed world, and that youth made the 3D holomap. But that doesn't make sense, I've yet to see a single human world developed beyond the medieval ages. Why is that, I wonder? And what if it was this clone, 'Hope', that he gave the crown to? And why would he do that? So many questions, but I'm in the middle of the battle, so it has to wait. I will get my answers later.

Hope quickly cast back-to-back spells. "Speed! Slow! Hkjgfh-!"

I didn't hear the last word, because suddenly he was gone. Little fucker, stealing my battle tactics. I was suddenly rammed from the back, the front, and the sides! It hurt a little bit, but honestly not that much.

And... I grinned menacingly. Stupid little shit, you can't cast those two spells together or they will devour your energy rapidly. It's worse if you're a clone since you have such a small pool to work with, and to top it off, you've already wasted a bit of your energy doing other fruitless bullshit like making yourself invisible.

Sure enough, he came to a grinding halt and fell to the ground, feet away from me, panting with exhaustion.

"Haahh... hahhhhh.... shit, this is bad..."

Yeah, no kidding, dumbfuck. I've fought many battles over the last 11 years. You may be my clone, but I was wrong about you. You're dumber than I am.

He glanced back over his shoulder and saw me slowly walking at him. "Adams! A little help here please?!"

I glanced over and laughed a silent laugh since I can't produce any sound. Adams was trembling, seeing the state of my clone on the ground. Oh this is just too good. What a perfect way to end the day. I hope you're shitting yourself, little man. I don't let anyone betray me and get away with it. Not anymore.

As I turned back to my clone, I reached down slowly and precisely, as I watched his expression grow in horror. He knew what was coming. You think you can just get away with this? Not so fast.

Suddenly, Adams called out to me. "Get your hands away from him. If you don't, we'll execute your friend."

I paused. Hmm? Wait, could he mean-?!

I glanced back over at Adams. He was standing in front of the group of men with a picture drawn of Cassiel. It was quite beautiful, to be honest, clearly made by a top tier artist. The others behind him couldn't see the picture, and they must have figured it wasn't their business, because they weren't trying to.

"Get back in your cage, or she gets the knife."

This is very unlike Adams. Even if she's not a human, he hates killing unless it's demons. This is very unlike him. Is he being mind-control-

Oh. So that's it. I halt and stand up straight, turning back to glare at Hope. You monster, have you mind controlled all my clones, the King, and other officers at the top? You're truly a foul demon. I have to send you back to the void whence you came.

Just as I was about to collect my energy to punch him hard enough to shatter concrete, a smile suddenly bursts onto his face.

"Ahaha, I just had a great idea!"

Huh? What is he talking about-?!

He quickly speaks a single word.

" Reintegrate!!! "

A suction of energy from all corners of the city blasts through the corridors and hallways of the castle, as I feel a monumental amount of energy surge into his body.

"Ha... haha... HAHAHAAAAHA!!!" Hope cackles evilly, as he nimbly jumps up into a standing position. "Fantastic! That was a great idea!"

I look him up and down in surprise. Rivers of energy are flowing out of him, just the same as energy flows out of me. What the fuck?! Did he reintegrate every clone in the city into himself?! CLONES CAN REINTEGRATE OTHER CLONES?! Not good, not good at all!!

And then I see him step forwards, and with a light tap on my cheek, he sends me smashing through three sets of walls.

Part 135:

My chest heaved and my breath silently escaped as I gasped for air. My clothes were in tatters. Thankfully, Hope was in no better of a position. We've been fighting for thirty straight minutes. Entire sections of the castle are destroyed. He's as badly beaten up as I am. Having absorbed god only knows how many clones, he's unbelievably powerful. But it seems the heroic facade he was putting up in front of the troops is gone now.

We're up on the flat roof of the castle, using it as a battle arena. There are craters everywhere, parts of the roof are sagging or outright collapsed... this place is a mess.

Hope gasps for air as he stares me down with his unseeing hollowed out eyes. "This is... your fault... you know."

My eyes narrow. Hm? He's got something to say?

"You kept playing god. You summoned clone after clone, with no thought of the consequences, forcing us to be meatshields for inferior beings. The whole time, you thought to yourself 'This is convenient!', but you never asked our opinions. You didn't care. We were just stupid puppets to you. And now look how it's come back to bite you in the ass. Ha... hahah..."

I lower my head a little. He is right. I took my abilities for granted. I thought the clones were brainless mute beings who followed orders. Maybe... they were like Beelzebub, stuck in puppet mode. Maybe they were waiting for me to give them freedom to move. A lot of 'maybes' come to my mind, but I know one thing for certain. I messed up.

This clone is incredibly powerful.

He continued speaking. "You made many mistakes, but your biggest mistake was your stupidity. Didn't you notice anything wrong with yourself when you summoned clone after clone? They weren't just copying you, they were taking bits and pieces of you, from the outer layers of your heart, to the innermost layers. And as for me? I lucked out. I got the deepest, darkest corner of your heart. You've felt it take over once before. Do you remember it?"

I hesitated. Was he referring to... when I fought Amelia and Blaarjiim... all those years ago? Wait... did those dark pieces of weaponry plant something inside me? Did-

As thought roil in my head, Hope laughs. "Haha, I can practically hear those gears turning in your head. We're not so different, you and I. We both hate people. We both hate humanity as a whole, we both hate annoying little girls. We just want to be cool and have people admire us from a distance. It's great having fangirls following us around, isn't it? The problem is when they get too close."

He stared into my eyes with his unseeing hollow husks. "You know what I'm talking about. Nuisances. Always asking you for orders, telling you their plans, and so on and so forth. Hell, you let two innocent men get devoured by Amelia, just because you didn't really want to help. Am I right? Who's the real demon here?"

I suddenly staggered and fell to the ground, as waves of nausea hit me. Jesus Christ. He's right. I've done so many horrible things. It makes no sense that archangels would trust me with their power. What the hell am I?! I'm a demon in human form! Half the time, I want to kill all of humanity just because of all the problems they cause me. It's... no wonder Adams didn't trust me. I'm wrong for faulting him.

But I hold down the nausea and look up. Hope looks so smug. Adams may be mind controlled, but Hope is still a monster. After I kill him, after I defeat this thing... I'm going to leave here. Humanity will be fine without me. I need to go my own way. I need to leave these humans behind.

From inside me, I feel something appearing. It's... a voice? It's a voice. And it reminds me of a voice I heard long ago.

God King. You've always had evil in your heart. But you fought to contain it. You fought to be one with it. You won't let a liar and a deceiver tell you about how bad you are, will you? You're only human, you've made mistakes, and you are preventing them. Be easier on yourself.

"Michael?" I speak aloud, suddenly jumping when I realize my voice works. What?! My voice works?! HOW?

I will give you my own parting gift. You did not come to see me, but I came to you. Speak your mind now, go forth, and become the savior that the world needs.

The voice faded away, and I was left alone with my thoughts.

Hope heard me speak. "Michael? Wait, shit, those damned rings!" He glances at my hand. "I forgot to cut your hand off! Shit, a slip of my memory will not be my downfall! Now it makes sense. Now I know why you're so fucking strong! You CHEATED!"

I raise my head. "I don't cheat, Hope. I always follow the rules. You, however, do not. I'll have to stop you from terrorizing the denizens of this universe, put a seal on you, and go back to living my life."

He jerked his hand up and aimed it at me. "Silence!!"

Nothing happened. "Thanks to the powers of the archangels, you can't use simple cheat words on me anymore. But... I can to you."

His eyes jerked open as he realized what I meant.

In the blink of an eye, my hand aimed at him. " Reintegrate. "

His mouth opened, but no sound came out. A second later, his energy rushed into my body.

And as powerful as I felt earlier, I feel unstoppable now.

I deftly jumped down to the palace grounds below me. Cassiel.

Part 136: Retribution

I calmly walked down the corridors of the castle, noting the horrific levels of destruction apparent everywhere. The titanic battle between Hope and I had caused incredible amounts of damage to the castle. The pillars in various areas were in ruins, the floors were littered with bits and pieces of rock, marble, and gold from the collapsed ceiling and destroyed walls... it was a mess.

Luckily, I could sense that nobody had been badly injured. Most of the people had fled when they heard the explosive sounds of our fight, and the few that remained were easily healed as I walked along. Most were unconscious, so I healed them and walked away before they woke up.

And then I arrived at Adams' chamber.

He stood in front of his doorway, with his left arm wrapped around Cassiel's throat, and his right arm holding a dagger to her heart.

"Don't come any closer, y-you monster! What did you do to..." He glanced to the side with his eyes, noting the presence of the Yellow Team. "...to Slayer?! Did you actually defeat him?!"

"It's all over, Adams." When I spoke, his head jerked back involuntarily; he obviously had not expected me to speak. "You're a pretty bad liar, old friend. And now you're holding a hostage. How far you have fallen."

I turned to look at Colonel Cody. "Doesn't something about this entire debacle strike you as strange, or are you in on this farce? Why are you defying the one who freed you from Bahamut? Why are you siding with a mentally deranged man?"

Cody suddenly looked uncomfortable, as he glanced at Adams, and then back to me.

I didn't wait for his response. "Adams. There are two ways out of this. The easy way, and the really easy way. Think about what you're doing; you're a smart man."

Adams hesitated, as his eyes jerked around. He was very nervous, and acting very... ' un-Adamlike '. "Y-you can't fool me! Stay away, you monster!"

I slowly walked towards him, the distance between us was about a half of a football field. "Think, Adams! If you stab and kill her, I'll become very pissed. I'll tear you limb from limb, do you understand me? You'll lose your hostage AND your life! But, if you give her up quietly, I won't kill you. How about it? Are you that desperate to have me take out some anger on you?"

Cassiel wriggled a little as he pressed the knife right up against her skin. I noticed that her arms and wings were bound tightly behind her, and her mouth was gagged. The sight filled me with anger. Once again, she was bound by a disgusting piece of filth. Adams started breathing quickly. He didn't know what to do. He realized the logic of my words. This was a no-win situation. He would lose either way.

"I have a question for you." Saul, the man who I recalled wielding the prototype 'Buddha Palm', spoke to me. "Adams told us that a clone you had summoned for us, one we named 'Hope', - he had gone berserk, and needed to be contained. He told us it had gained sentience, and it was unable to be reintegrated but... I'm beginning to doubt that story. Can you explain what's going on?"

Adams' eyes darted towards Saul. He clearly didn't want me answering those questions, but to speak up now would be damning evidence of my claims.

I nodded at Saul. "I'm not sure exactly what was going on up here, but I left and entered the labyrinth a few days ago, and met Cassiel, that angel over there, in the labyrinth. I rescued her, appeared here, and was attacked and betrayed by Adams. It all happened so fast, I'm still not even sure what happened."

Adams' entire body was shaking a little bit. Cassiel looked at me, silently imploring me to get her away from that madman.

I shrugged. "Ah, well. It's unfortunate, Adams. You're making me do this the hard way."

With the barest tiniest of motion, I suddenly appeared in front of Adams and Cassiel, my body moving at an ungodly and unexpected speed. Adams screamed in terror, as I slapped the knife out of his hands, the impact instantly breaking his wrist. In the next instant, I grabbed hold of the arm he was holding Cassiel with, and crushed it by barely flexing my hand at all.

If the scream from my appearance was bad, the howl of agony after I destroyed both his arms... It felt delicious. Very satisfying.

" AAAAAAAAAUYYUUYUGHHHHH!! " Adams fell to the ground, writhing in agony, as I pulled Cassiel close to me, and with a single motion undid the ropes that bound her.

She smiled up at me thankfully, as she pulled the gag out of her mouth. "Hero! You saved me!"

I nodded. Then I looked over at the members of the Yellow team. "Do you men have anything to say?"

Cody immediately bowed his head. "No, Slayer. I apologize for the misunderstanding. I would do more, but I can't think of a big enough way to apologize. We will take care of the traitor now."

I nodded but then paused. "Hold a moment."

I walked over to Adams, who was now sobbing on the ground. My voice filled with ice and venom. " Give me the crown. Now. "

He whimpered when he saw my demonic glowing white eyes and the tattoo's on my body turned pitch black as my anger slightly boiled over. Quickly looking at his arms and back up to me, he whimpered something unintelligible.

I glared deeply at him. "I know you can't move your arms, you stupid piece of shit. Give me verbal permission, or I'll just take your head off right fucking now."

I suddenly tried to contain my laughter as his pants suddenly moistened and he quickly babbled. "YersyesIgiveyoupermissiontotakethe-thecrowngorightahead!!!"

Stifling a smile at the pathetic image of a man I once called friend, I snatched the crown off his head and placed it on mine.

" Pray you never see me again."

And with that, I walked away, heading towards my house. Yellow Team stared in awe at me, as I walked away, hand in hand with a beautiful angel.

I'm done with these humans. I will forge my own destiny away from them. I will go home, grab Hoarhiim's orb, store it in my infinite container, and never return.

As we approached my house, I chatted with Cassiel, learning of what had transpired. She had been captured, taken to a secret room even I didn't know about, tied up, and interrogated for almost 48 hours straight. As an angel, she didn't need sleep, only spiritual and thought energy, so she was easily interrogated right up until they brought her out to me.

But... based on the fresh markings on her arms and legs, I could tell. They didn't just ask for information politely. They must have tortured her. The thought... made my blood boil.

As we approached my house, we spoke of other things, but I noticed something odd. There was a heat signature in my house. It was cold, maybe food lying on the ground? Hard to tell.

I rushed up to my front door and as I opened it, my heart halted.

Phoebe was lying on the floor, a knife stabbed into her heart.

Her body was cold.

Part 137: Stages Of Grief

In a flash, I'm at Phoebe's side. I duck down and wrap my left arm behind her and my right hand grabs the knife.

"Phoebe... don't be dead don't be dead please don't be dead..."

I pull the knife out quickly and cast a spell. " HEAL!! "

But the wound doesn't close. My lip is quivering. She's been dead for a long time now. Her body is completely cold and it's very stiff. Rigor mortis has set in.

No. NO! I won't let her just die. I have POWER now! I have the powers of literal angels and gods in my body! I can't accept this! I can't!!

" *Resurrect! Revive! Energize! Recover! Reanimate! Enliven! Invigorate!! Resuscitate!! REVITALIZE! RESTORE!!!! "

For ten minutes, I try every word I know. Nothing works. Tears are pouring out. Fuck. I CAN'T SAVE HER! It's been too long!

Cassiel watches, with her head hanging down low as she sees me trying to revive Phoebe. For the twenty minutes that she knew Phoebe, she barely even had seen who she was, yet she feels sad for me.

...What happened? Why is she dead? Why is this happening to me? What did she do to deserve this? Questions... so many questions...

But... as I look to her left side, I see something that makes my heart stop. Her left hand... on the opposite side of the body from where I sit... there's something written in blood. Her left hand trails off on the last letter... but there's no mistaking it.

I love Hero

Fuck.... no... she's dead... I wasn't even there for her and she still wrote she loves me... fuck, why would she- GODDAMNIT!

Grief is hitting my body in waves as I hold the body of the woman who has faithfully been at my side for 11 years. I've failed her in every inconceivable way and she was on my side, even up to the very end.

But... wait. Wait... maybe I can't revive her but... perhaps I could do something else. Puppet won't work if I don't kill someone myself, especially not on someone dead this long... but her memories may still exist.

Quickly gathering myself, I aim my right hand at her head. " MEMORIES! "

In a flash, her remaining few memories rush into my head.

An ocean. I sit next to an ocean, waiting for the ship to arrive. Soon, I will be shipped out, along with the other slaves. The King of Egypt is a very cruel man, from what I've heard.

I don't want to go, but I have no choice. I've never had a choice.

I stand at attention, as the lady of the house inspects each new arrival. She frowns when she sees me, as they all do. It's only normal, I'm uglier than most female slaves. I consider this a boon however. The pretty ones get sent to the bedchambers, but no man has ever wanted me, so I get sent to the kitchen. Since I love cooking, I don't mind... it's better than it could be.

Ah, no! I spilled the main entree all over the floor! Oh gods, he's going to be furious!

"What? Who are you?" I speak to the strange mermaid looking creature.

She glares down at me. "You're a pathetic looking one. My name doesn't matter, but you must answer my riddle. If you don't answer correctly, I will enslave you for all eternity."

I nod. "That's fine. I've always been a slave. What's the difference between one master or a different one?"

Huh? I'm not a harpy anymore? When did this happen? I look up and spot the image of a man, standing over the badly mangled body of the creature that transformed me in a monster. He holds a bright white orb and laughs as he kicks her corpse.

I have a feeling about this one.

Adams is looking away from me. "Oh. Hm, yes. Now that I think about it, you did change your name, didn't you. How careless of me."

He turns back to me. "Everyone in the castle knows that you're a little more than friends with 'Hero' or whatever he calls himself by now."

I glance back at Hero. "Huh? W-what are you talking about, Adams? You're acting strange."

Hero sees me looking at him, and a strange, ugly looking smile appears on his face. Huh? That's not a smile I've ever seen before.

"Wait... you're not Hero. You're a.. a clone! But then, if you're a clone, why are you talking normally?"

The clone grins evilly at me. "Why indeed? Ah, such is the way of life. Poor Phoebe, you're just a normal woman who wants to get to know a man. Unfortunately, you're too smart for your own good."

Adams sighs. "I'm sorry, Phoebe. Hero is out of the picture now. This is Hope that you're talking to, a different person entirely. He will be the one who saves humanity. But you? You know too much."

I jerk back over to look at Adams, watching as he clicks the lock on the door.

" Silence." 'Hope' or whatever his name is casts a spell on me. I try to speak, but nothing comes out.

Hope's grin disappears. "Well, you won't be able to scream for help now. I'm sorry to tell you this, Phoebe. As a clone of the man you love, I have to be the bearer of bad news. He never loved you. And soon, he'll never be able to either. I hope you've made your peace."

Ah! A sharp pain in... my chest... huh? Why is Adams... stabbing me? Why...

I feel a new emotion inside me now. Phoebe's memories are scattered and disjointed, but her last ones are crystal clear. Adams. I... was going to let you live. Even if you were mind controlled or not... I was going to forgive past grievances... but this.

THIS IS THE FINAL STRAW!

Rage encapsulates me as this final betrayal flashes through my mind. I aim my hand at Phoebe's body. " Storage." I will bury her later.

For now, I have something I really must do.

I rise up and turn to Cassiel, who has been staring blankly at me the whole time this happened. Something is wrong though. Her face isn't just blank, it's... covered in something. Wait, there's two Cassiels? Three?!

All around me suddenly, Cassiel is everywhere, as her face and aura darkens.

" Ha... haha... I'm back, 'God King'. You didn't think I'd leave so easily, did you?

That voice... it's... Hope?!

"I killed you!" I scream at the voice coming from Cassiels' lips. Her aura has visibly darkened.

" Calm down, fool. If you lash out and strike me down, you'll kill the woman you're supposed to protect. I'm just a mental reincarnation of Hope. Did you think absorbing me along with every dark clone in the city wouldn't have any negative repercussions? GET REAL! Every clone in the city was under my control! "

I suddenly realized what had happened. "Wait, so when I reintegrated you, you didn't actually-?"

" Hehehe... that's right. I'm now a darkness permanently in your heart. But let's ignore that for a moment. Aren't you fucking PISSED right now? Adams killed a woman who had been at your side for 11 years. Are you going to let him get away with that? "

I shook my head slowly. "No... no you mind controlled him. It's your fault. Adams was never like this before!"

" Oh come now, you don't actually believe that, do you? I never had to control Adams. He was a monster all along. You were simply too blind to see. If you kill him though, you will truly understand. "

"What the hell are you yammering on about?! Stop playing games with me, give me back Cassiel!"

" I'm only using her as a means of projecting myself so we can speak face-to-face. In actuality, I'm a hallucination. A figment of your imagination. Right now you're yelling and she doesn't know why. You're yelling at her and scaring her. You're crazy now, you know? "

I paused. He's right. I'm letting him goad me. Shit... I reintegrated the clones and now they must be making me evil or something. But... whether that's the case or not...

I just really want to tear Adams' heart out.

Energy surges from my body, as the combined powers of all my clones, the three archangels, and leftover energy remnants from Hoarhiim surge inside me.

I jump back to my room in two rapid steps, grabbing his orb.

Goodbye, Hero City. And even moreso... goodbye, Adams.

Part 138:

I don't know what I'm about to do.

I loathe Adams. I hate him. I want him dead. He killed someone I cared about dearly. I can't say I loved Phoebe, but she was certainly important to me.

Cassiel followed along beside me as we walked towards the castle, one more time.

She kept glancing over at me nervously, and then looking away again. I don't know what to say though, I probably seemed like a psychotic mess, talking to nobody at all.

"Ah... Hero...? I um..." She suddenly spoke out, as we walked. She hesitated, not sure of what to say.

I slowed down and came to a stop as I faced her. "Yes, Cassiel?"

I couldn't help but notice now that I had my eyesight back... Cassiel was more than just a pretty angel, she was actually stunning, to say the least. As I had thought before, her hair was pure white, a little longer than shoulder length, and perfectly straight. She had blue eyes, and she was still wearing those full body white silken robes she was wearing when I first saw her, though my repair job had made them perfectly sewn again.

"That woman... did you love her?"

I hesitated before replying. "...No. But, she was a dear friend. And I know she loved me."

I looked down at the ground. Cassiel swallowed quietly. "Do you feel guilty about her death?"

I nodded quietly as I stared at a flower behind Cassiel. "...Yes. I feel incredibly guilty. She died just because she knew my name. She died because of my actions... my lack of foresight... my lack of preparation, even."

Cassiel nodded silently. "You shouldn't blame yourself. You didn't kill her... it's not your fault."

I looked up into Cassiel's eyes. She's a good girl... but she doesn't understand. "Cassiel, if a man stabs another man, that makes him a murderer. But if a king orders another man to stab that same man, is the king absolved of the crime?"

Cassiel, previously a human, and likely familiar with the concept of law and order, paused for a second. Finally she shook her head. "No... I suppose not."

"Alright. And what if the king sees many signs that his subject will be stabbed to death by another person, but he chooses not to imprison or interrogate the murderer before it happens?"

Is he still absolved of blame?"

Cassiel lowered her head. "Ah... well, I suppose... he would still be, um... guilty..."

I smiled gently. "Exactly. I'm guilty, then. I indirectly killed Phoebe with my inaction."

My face hardened as I spoke. "But I can't let that happen again. I'm still just a child at heart. I have to take responsibility not just for my actions, but my lack of action as well."

With that, I took her hand in mine and we continued walking towards the castle.

We arrived at the prison section within 15 minutes. Quietly walking together after receiving directions from one of the guards we arrive at the cell that is holding Adams.

Both of his arms are in slings, and he's clearly in pain. I'd heal him up under normal circumstances, but I love seeing him squirm. He's sitting down on the cold floor, as he currently has no bed. The cell is totally empty. Perfect. Leave him here with his thoughts.

"Adams. I'll make this short and sweet. Did... did you kill Phoebe?"

He continues to stare at the ground numbly. "Yes. I did."

I feel my anger rising. He isn't even trying to apologize. This... son of a bitch...

I grab the bars and shake them fiercely. "You're not even going to look me in the eye?! What the fuck is wrong with you?! Where did I go wrong in choosing you?!"

I screamed as I shook the bars. Adams continued staring ahead at the ground. "I... don't know why it ended up like this. I don't remember when I stopped being a good ruler of the people. I don't remember... it just changed, all of a sudden."

I stopped shaking the bars, as I looked down at the broken man in front of me. This... this doesn't seem right. I knew Adams for more than ten years... he never was the kind of man to do these things.

Adams suddenly looked up into my eyes. "Kill me."

I froze. What? He wants me to- what?! "Why would you say that all of a sudden? Do you have a death wish?!"

Adams shrugged and went back to looking at the floor. "We've known each other for ten years, God King. I was somehow changed. I'm not myself. I'm a different man now. And I just don't know why."

I nodded sagely, as I felt some anger disappear. I don't know why, but I agree with him. He's not the same. Maybe Hope corrupted him. It almost sounds like a bad joke to say that, but it seems to be the truth.

I aimed my hand at him. "Very well. I very much want to kill you for what you did to Phoebe... but also, as an old friend, I won't let you just rot in a cell. Between those two things, under my power as the God King, I sentence you to death. And as a small mercy, I will make it a quick one."

Tears formed in Adams eyes as he stared at the ground. "...Thank you. You truly are... a good friend."

"Goodbye, Adams."

With a single word, he was dead. " Die. "

But as he died, something horrifying happened.

His body turned into dust. In the same way a clone of mine would.

No... no no no! NO! This... this wasn't the real Adams! This must have been...

Part 139:

Clones. I've been playing a dangerous game for too long a time.

I never thought about all the implications of creating clones. I never asked enough questions.

Using the power of the crown, I've started analyzing what I know. I've figured out a surprising number of things. For instance:

-I can have any number of clones active at once, but after a certain number, they stop being distinct signals I can follow in real time, and become like a crowd of people making a lot of noise.

-Furthermore, as clones increase in number, the amount of 'stuff' they take from me (Hope said it was pieces of my heart, but whatever it is, it's still something) increases, possibly exponentially. This leaves me even further in a foggy and clouded daze.

-Clones aren't actually stupid. I don't know exactly what happened due to reabsorbing the memories of thousands of them at once, but I think someone ordered Hope, or possibly asked Hope, to develop his own personality. I'm not sure to what end, or how much direction they gave him, but the end was disastrous.

-Furthermore, as it turns out, the clones are normal human beings. I essentially summon them in a puppet mode, and they have no ability to react to stimuli unless ordered. They feel pain, emotions, and everything else, but lack any ability to respond... this must be hell for them.

-I can also figure out, based on how I might react if I was a puppet, that this garnered a lot of resentment among the clones. Whichever clone 'Hope' was (Why did he have a normal name?) he was probably angry at being treated like livestock, and when someone decided to order him to develop a personality, he developed one based on revenge and hatred.

But... still. There is that matter of back when I was overcome by the dark artifacts. Might the rage and lack of control have stayed with me? Might the insanity have buried itself inside me, waiting for a chance to reawaken?

I'm thinking a lot harder than I usually do... very strange. I don't usually ponder things this much. Might this have something to do with the archangels? Perhaps the clones I reintegrated increased not just my spirit power vastly, but my mental power as well? I'm not sure, but there seems to be a lot more brainpower here than I remember.

I glance over at Cassiel. She's still staring at the spot where Adams vanished from. When I look at her, she turns back to me and smiles weakly. "Oh... I'm sorry about your friend... that must have been very sad for you."

I shake my head. "No, this may just be good news. That was not my friend, that was a clone of my friend."

I took a few minutes to explain to her what my powers of wordsmithing entailed, diving in-depth into my cloning abilities. She nodded over and over, asking for elaboration in a few areas.

"So, as long as it's a single word, you can make anything happen if there's a literal, or even a stretched interpretation?"

I shrugged. "Yeah, that's basically how it works."

"Ohhh. Then, um, why not picture Adams' face in your mind, and try a word like 'Locate'?"

I stared at Cassiel blankly. You're kidding. That's... THAT'S GENIUS! How did she come up with that so quickly? I've underestimated a being that has lived for millions of years! Come to think of it, Adams was smart as well, and he lived for millions of years as a monster. Perhaps if you're smart, you continue getting smarter and smarter as time goes on, even up to an eternity.

Well anyway, it's worth a shot. " Locate. "

Instantly, a red dot appears on my mental map of the castle. The crown shows me his exact spot.

It's... he's... standing a mile or so out behind the castle? That's odd. Why is he there?

I take Cassiel's hand again. I'm getting quite used to this, and she doesn't seem to mind in the slightest. " Teleport. "

In a flash, we've arrived! We're in an open field but... Adams is nowhere to be seen. I look all over the place, but even with my vision, I don't see him.

"Oh! God King, look!"

Cassiel points at the ground that we're standing on... the dirt has been disturbed.

Almost like... something was buried here. No... no...

I see something buried a few feet under the dirt. It's... a corpse...

Part 140: Adams

I stare down at the corpse below me. It seems to be in otherwise normal condition, thought I can only see the bones with my X-ray vision.

I don't have anything like DNA testing in this world, and nobody here is smart enough to know how to do an autopsy but... there's no stab wound or anything.

W-what if... what if Hope became normal, and took action by killing Adams with a 'Die' spell, then teleported the both of them here while I was away, buried Adams, returned to the castle, and found the clone, then made the clone normal? Then he could simply tell the clone some lies or something... Adams' clone was not mind controlled. It would probably suffer from the same resentment and issues as my clone did, since we effectively set it to the side...

Ah... I just don't know anymore. Too many things are happening. This goes too deep. This cuts too deep.

I've lost too many people today. I can't even feel sad about Adams' death. He and Phoebe were... my closest friends and confidantes. Now that I am fairly sure it was the clone and not Adams doing the betraying...

I just don't know anymore. People die around me. So many people die. Will all of humanity die, because of me? Will Cassiel? I steal a glance at her, she's still staring at me, wondering what's going on. Oh, I forgot to explain it to her.

"Cassiel, Adams, the king, he's also dead. As in... he's really dead. Someone buried him right here."

She quickly steps off the patch of dirt. "Oh that's awful! Why are so many people dying?" She seems genuinely hurt. A man she's never met before, and she feels sorrow for him. Hell, the clone of the man had her tortured and interrogated for two days straight, and she still feels some sadness for his passing. At this point, this angel is more human than I am.

"It is, Cassiel. Let's head back to the castle. I have some questions I need to be asking."

The Yellow Team stood in front of me now. I explained to them the situation as I knew it. As I spoke, my eyes happened to notice an insanely beautiful woman in their group, quietly eyeballing me up and down as she licked her lips. And she was wearing a surprisingly small amount of clothing... and she had a little tail swinging around. Like, a demonic tail with a tapered tip at the end. I know some monsters came to this capital, but her presence is surprising.

Colonel Cody rubbed his eyes. "So... we've been under the orders of a clone of the king for a long time now? Not the actual king?"

I nodded. "I believe so. I don't have all the answers, I was hoping you guys or some of the generals might know."

Saul spoke up next. "Our apologies, God King. We were likely the ones to name that clone, the one called "Hope". We did not intend for things to end up like this."

I frowned as I turned to him. "You named the clone? You didn't give him a designation? Why not?"

Saul shrugged. You created him right there in the maze, and we just... we didn't feel it was right to name what appeared to be a fully living being after a set of numbers and letters. It seemed... cruel."

I nodded. "We know now that it would eventually lead up to a bad ending... but we didn't know then. Don't be so hard on yourself, Saul. Your group did what you thought was right. In the end, the fault lies with me."

Cody coughed as a thought came to mind. "Listen, uh, 'God King'. We have a new problem in any case. Without your clones, we will be badly losing the war effort. Even now, there are reports coming in of many of our forces being slaughtered by the previously weakened Grez. Hell, the Grez alone might be manageable, but now we're dealing with mixed forces. Clones may be out of the question, but surely there must be something you can do to aid us?"

I pondered this. Taking account of the crown, I decided to try something new. "Yellow team, come with me."

We entered the War Room, now in shambles due to the fight between Hope and I earlier. I grimaced, this was not a pretty sight. "Give me a minute."

I once again buffed myself. " Detect! Infrared! Sonar! Tracking! Targeting! Perception! "

I paused. No... we can do better than that. I aimed my hand at my head. " Enhance! Enhance! Enhance! "

Suddenly, my brain was positively swimming in information as I reeled backwards. Giving myself more than a couple minutes for my head to stop spinning, I stared at the rubble in front of me. Aiming my spatial vision at every inch of the palace at once, I cast a very strong spell.

" RECONSTRUCT!!! "

The palace rapidly reformed itself around us, as magical amounts of marbled, stone, and gold sprouted out from pillars, broken section of walls, quickly rebuilding the castle all around us.

"Perfect. Let's have a seat."

The floor was still dirty, but I cleaned it with a single word. I'll let the maids and servants get the rest of the castle, they always need some work to do anyway.

Sitting down, I formed a meditative position, as eyes in the room locked onto my sitting form. In front of us, the holomap floated above the Great Table.

Somehow, I believe Hope had created this holomap by enhancing his mind, with the power of the crown. But if he can do it, I can as well.

And then it came to me. After about thirty minutes of meditation while my brain started simulating thousands of battles, thousands of scenarios, and many other such things, I opened my eyes and looked at the men. "I now see how we can win this war without my clones."

Cody stared at me intently. "How? I should very much like to know!"

Everyone in the room nodded eagerly.

"It's simple. We need some new... toys."

Part 141:

I spoke with Colonel Cody and got a good explanation of my plans over to him with some drawings and sketches. Cody eagerly devoured the knowledge.

"This... this won't just win the war, this will be a crushing victory."

I nodded. "I know. If I weren't so stupid, we'd have done this sooner."

Cody waved it off. "You're not stupid, not at all. Maybe you were naive, but you learn from your mistakes. As for Phoebe..." He glanced away from me in embarrassment. "I didn't know her, but... I hope you can find it in yourself to forgive yourself."

Cody glanced over at Cassiel, then back to me. "You're actually in a um, a pretty good position right now, you know?"

I sighed. "Yeah, if you say so."

Cassiel was chatting with Saul and the demon girl I'd noticed from earlier. I thanked Cody for his time and left him with my sketches, walking over to Cassiel and the other two.

Before I'd gotten within ten steps of the group, the demon girl licked her lips again as she saw me. Making a less than graceful exit from the conversation, she made a quick movement and suddenly appeared at my side, her left arm twining around my right arm. "So, you're the big strong man they call God King, hmm?"

Immediately, alarm bells went off in my head. Danger! Danger! Red Alert! Warning! "Y-yes, but just, uh, call me Hero, for short."

She licked her lips again as her eyes scanned my body up and down once again. Good lord, I'm not the greatest with the opposite sex, but it was slightly obvious what she wanted.

And then I happened to notice Cassiel staring over at us intently, blushing as the scantily clad demon lady rubbed herself all over me.

The demon girl winked over at Cassiel, something my infinite vision wanted badly to not have noticed but did anyway. "So, how do you feel about succubus girls, hmm? My name is Samantha, but for men I like, I have a secret succubi name reserved just for them."

I swallowed hard, as I could feel Cassiel's stare boring into me. I tried to gently pull away from Samantha but she wouldn't let me go. "Ah, that's great! You seem like a..." My infinite vision carefully noted her bulging chest and incredibly tiny amount of clothing. "...very sweet girl."

Cassiel quietly walked over to me and looped her arm inside mine. "Oh Samantha, it was... good getting to know you. We do need to head home you know, Hero has had a long day today." She put heavy emphasis on the word Hero, which reminded me that this was the name she had heard me using at first.

Samantha finally unhooked herself from me, her face looking all pouty. "Well, Mr. Hero, if you ever want to have a little fun, you just hop on by and give me a call, okay?" She blew a big kiss at me, and I felt Cassiel squeezing my arm very tightly. My face must have become an inferno of red. I was nigh close to teleporting out of there.

"Ah, yeah. N-nice meeting you, S-Samantha..."

She giggled as she pranced away. Holy shit she wears a tiny amount of clothes. Isn't that against military protocol or something?!

Cassiel stared straight ahead, wordlessly staring at a wall, as I could almost feel a psychic vision glaring daggers of ice at me. I might be interpreting the situation wrong. I hope I'm interpreting it wrong.

As we walked home later that night, I blushed. "Ah, I'll have to set up a bed for you when we get there. Just give me a minute and I'll carve out a spot in the house, okay?"

Cassiel, her arm still tightly locked in mine, shook her head slightly. "No... that won't be necessary. We can just... share."

I swallowed hard at her words. "Ah... I see."

I'm just... inept sometimes.

Part 142:

I woke up in the morning slowly. Very slowly. Usually I roll my eyes open and simply get up, but today I just laid there. A soft and warm girl was cuddled up beside me, her arm over my chest, and her soft feathery wings were wrapped under and over me.

It's going to be hard forgetting last night, not that I'd ever want to. It was my first time, as well as hers. While we were both awkward, we managed to work it out and figure out what we were doing as we went along.

A stupid thought enters my mind. Can an angel get pregnant? My first reaction is no, but... I'll have to, uh, ask an expert sometime. My cheeks are burning red just thinking about it.

Well, even if I don't ask, given time, I'll eventually figure it out.

My mental vision sees everything in the house. Even... the spot of blood where Phoebe died... What the hell is wrong with me...

I... my first time... in the same house as where she was murdered. Why did I do it? I pretended to ignore it last night... but I can't ignore it when it's always in my vision.

I close my eyes and focus on the spot where Phoebe's blood is at. Then I whisper a single word. "Teleport."

In a single movement, my naked body is transferred over to where she's at. I listen closely, but Cassiel doesn't seem to notice me gone. I find myself reaching down and touching the red spot on the floor. I failed her. This... this may be the biggest regret of my life. Quietly, I whisper again. Clean. And the blood vanishes instantly... like it was never there.

I silently walk back into my bedroom, put on my regular clothes, and walk out towards Phoebe's house. Cassiel is still fast asleep. I don't want her here for this.

"Shovel." I speak a word aloud, and it appears. I could do this the easy way... but I don't deserve the easy way. I have to do this the hard way.

After 20 or so minutes, I've dug out quite a hole in the ground. I'm not tired at all... but I can feel tears streaming down my face. It's my fault.

I aim my hand at the hole. "Coffin."

A gold and silver coffin appears. The value of this would probably be equal to a few dozen million dollars in the world I came from... but for me, the coffin is garbage. This is the least I can do.

The next word is difficult for me to say, but I manage to say it anyway. "Phoebe."

Her lifeless body appears in my arms. She's in... exactly the same condition I found her yesterday. Nothing decomposes or changes over time when it's in my storage void. Nothing.

I step into the hole, and place her body inside. I can't... help but cry. Tears won't stop coming as they drip onto her body. I failed you.

I step up and out of the hole, putting the lid on top of her coffin, as I halt for one final look at her face. She looks so... sad.

As I put the lid on the coffin, I step out of the way, and begin slowly shoveling dirt on top, as I seal up the hole. Once it's all back in place, there's a sizeable amount of ground lumped on top. That's fine. It's... fine.

I aim my hand at the top of the grave. " Gravestone."

A blank gravestone appears, and I etch words into it by pressing down with my finger. I'm very strong now.

Here lies Phoebe, Closest friend of the God King.

Slain by one she called friend, she is with the angels now.

Birthdate: Unknown. Death: Unknown.

She was a close friend, and a pure hearted person. Rest in peace.

I stared at the gravestone in front of me. This is it. All this power... this is all I can do. God King. What a presumptuous title. What good is having the powers of a god... if I can't even save the life of my closest friend? Amelia... Hoarhiim... Phoebe... Adams... I've lost so many, and all their deaths were my own fault.

Amelia may not have been a good person, she was very evil, in fact... but I still can't hate her... not deep in my heart.

How many more will die because of my actions? How many more will die due to my inaction? I... can't let that happen. I must become more powerful. I must gain power over life and death. This is the only way I can be sure to prevent senseless deaths like this forever.

I have to become the Creator.

Part 143:

We were down in the basement of the castle once again, in the forge where my clones would previously have been summoning materials and such for the war effort. Without them around though, this area of the castle was now being used for other purposes.

The portal room is now staffed by an entire battalion, almost 500 troops, just in case of an invasion. The biggest benefit of having the battalion stationed there wasn't just protecting the motherland, as it were, but quick and easy reinforcement for all our bases. If one were attacked by the enemy, we'd instantly have 500 troops mobilized and ready to go.

Since I will no longer summon clones, I've come up with an incredible solution.

Cody and the Yellow team's top 5 members follow behind me, along with Cassiel, who never seems to leave my side. I approach the gate leading to one of the outpost worlds.

"What did you end up naming it?" I ask Cody.

He scratches his face and looks away. "Well, uh, you'll probably think this is stupid... but we just called it... Mining Planet Alpha."

I stare at him, my face is frozen in awe. Mining Planet Alpha? What kind of stupid fucking name is-

Never mind. "Alright. Better idea, we'll call it..." I pause as a list of a thousand names comes to mind, but I decide to settle for one that reminds me of home. "...Mars. We'll call this planet Mars. Any objections?"

Cody shrugs and he looks back at the others in his group. They all seem to think it's fine too. Perfect.

"Alright, so let me get this straight, we've dug inside the planet, and the only way in and out is through this exact portal, correct?"

Cody nods. "Yes, this was an important project by King Adams. He wanted to have the mining base be totally secured. There is literally no entrance into the base from the outside of the planet beyond teleporting or digging ten miles into it."

I nodded. "Absolutely perfect. That guy..." I waved off the thought. "Adams was a good man. Let's do this, then."

We entered the portal to 'Mars' and appeared inside the mining base. I was shellshocked to see that instead of being dark and dingy, choked with dust, or anything of the sort, we appeared in a perfectly white hangar area, with lots of men and women in uniforms moving around with carts, hand-trucks, and many other such things, moving refined and unrefined ore and metal from one end of the station to the other.

The room was MASSIVE, stretching up over a hundred feet into the air before you would touch the ceiling, and the room itself was about the size of 6 football fields stacked to the sides vertically and horizontally.

Cody must have seen my gasping mouth because he stifled a guffaw. "N-no, God King, we didn't make this. Your clones did. And they did it in about an hour according to Adams' designs."

I paused. "Is the rest of the facility like this?"

"No, just the main room. He wanted there to be lots of possibilities for expansion."

I stared all around me at the grandeur of the room. Adams... you really outdid yourself. I wish you could be here to see what comes next.

I started walking to a back corner of the room where nobody was currently mulling around or occupying the space. "Cody, listen up. I will be leaving you in charge of humanity. I do not plan to come back for a... long time. Since I will not be leaving my clones behind, it's up to you to protect the future of our race. Therefore, I will be leaving you a... gift."

Cody's jaw hung open. "Y-you're leaving us? Alone?! I have some good soldiers, God King, but with all due respect, what could you possibly leave behind that would be better than clones?"

I ignored him and we kept walking. Finally, we arrived at the back corner. "Cody, in the world I come from, there's a particularly awful but simultaneously perfect saying for a situation like ours. It goes: There's more than one way to skin a cat. Awful, to be sure, but what it means is that where there's a will, there's a way. And I have a will, so I will find the way."

I aimed both of my hands at the back corner and concentrated deeply. I spent 5 minutes using the Crown to visualize exactly what I needed to do. I pored over every possible angle of the device as sweat began dripping down my head. Imagining every possible circuit, every piece of machinery... I finally called out the world.

" REPLICATOR!! "

In front of me, a device began taking shape. It was massive, going all the way up to the ceiling, the 'important' area being 50 feet wide by 50 feet deep. This was it, the ultimate machine.

I gasped finally, realizing I had been holding my breath as I strained to use the crown to create something I'd never invented in my life into reality.

Cody gazed up at the awe-inspiring machine. "By the gods... what in the name of hell is that?"

Part 144:

Ahh... this is awesome. I never got to live in the future, but now I am bringing the future to me!

While everyone else gasped and ooh'd and ahh'd, Samantha, the sneaky little devil, popped up alongside me and slipped her arm around mine again, even going so far as to clasp her hand inside mine.

"Oooh honey, you're so good with words, you're making me shiver with anticipation!"

I sighed.

Then Cassiel grabbed my other arm because of course she did. This is... well it's actually kind of great and yet awful. I've got things to do, ladies.

"Get your hands off him! He's- He's mine!" Cassiel said something that made me instantly blush. Shit, when did she get so daring?

Samantha giggled. "Aww, that's so cute. Angel's got her first c-r-u-s-h~!" Cassiel fumed at those words. "But you know, I'm not necessarily a one-guy-one-girl kind of gal, you know? I don't mind sharing~!"

Jesus Christ, the heavens need to protect me. I'm trying to do work and two girls are fighting over me. I seriously don't know whether to be delighted or annoyed.

While the two pressed their bodies against me, and begin to say all manner of embarrassing things, Cody cleared his throat. " Ahem, Samantha, that is not conduct becoming of a soldier."

Samantha turned around and glowered at him, sticking her tongue out. "Nyaah. I do what I want, I am my own woman you know."

I decided I'd had about enough of this. "Samantha, you're very lovely, but could we do this another time? This is important."

Samantha frowned as she slowly and very hesitantly pulled herself away. "Aww... well, I know you're just shy so I'll come visit you sometime, mkay?"

This girl... Cassiel, seeing the succubus had let go, she walked over to her and pulled her away. When they were out of earshot, they started speaking to each other, but I couldn't tell about what exactly. I could read their lips if I wanted to, but I decided against it. I don't have a death wish.

I raised my hands again and aimed them at the Replicator. " Clone! "

Unlike before, when I had tested with Adams, I was pretty sure that cloning machinery would be easy, and unsurprisingly, it was. I cloned the replicator three more times, for a total of 5 of them.

"Listen up, Cody. These replicators are insanely valuable. They can create any form of non-biological matter, so long as you have the blueprints for it, and enough energy for it. Unfortunately, energy is the biggest problem you will have. Fortunately, I'm here for that.

I aimed my mind at my own body again. "Suit!"

Around me, a spacesuit appeared. I wore this because... I had to go to the surface. I waved at Samantha and Cassiel. "I'll be right back."

Cassiel saw me in the strange suit, and I saw a look of concern pass over her face. But just as it came, it disappeared. And then I cast another spell.

"Teleport!"

Instantly, I was on the surface. The sun seemed close enough to give energy, but since the people of this planet are way deep inside it, I decided to... ahem... increase the output.

I aimed my hands up at the sun and concentrated deeply.

"Enlarge!"

Slowly, after a few minutes, the sun became 50% bigger, its size now massive compared to the sun on Earth. On top of that, the heat became quite intense. It felt like it was easily 200 degrees on the surface, extremely dangerous even for my powerful body.

I aimed my mental image a few hundred feet underground. "Hollow!"

And empty space appeared, about 20 feet in diameter and roughly the size of a small rounded apartment. "Teleport!"

I appeared inside the hollow spot, the space still quite cool as the heat hadn't yet gotten down this deep. Using my mental imaging, I started casting more spells.

"Panel!" A solar panel appeared, as I had imagined in my mind. "Resist! Resist! Resist!"

I made it heat resistant, to the point where heat wouldn't negatively affect it at all.

And then, for the next three hours, I cloned those panels. Over and over and over again. More than 25,000 times.

Energy for the replicator would soon be an issue of the past.

Part 145:

Using every fiber of my being, I finally finished summoning what my calculations told me were enough solar panels to power the replicators deep below the surface. After some adjustments to the planet's speed and some other things to make sure it didn't plummet into the sun, I then spent an hour wiring all the solar panels together and pumping the wiring down to the main base.

Finally, I teleported back down, my entire body drenched in sweat.

Everyone there jumped for joy when they saw me appear. I erupted out of the spacesuit, tearing it off and flinging it to the ground. My body and mind ached, but one great thing about my new powers is that my upper limit for thought and spiritual energy has greatly expanded, possibly by a factor of 50. I still had quite a lot of energy left over, and after some well earned sleep, I would have it all regenerated possibly by the next day.

"Cody... hah... it's done. The replicator is complete."

I showed him how they worked. Simply put, anything you put on the platform can be 'uploaded' as a blueprint, and then 'downloaded' as a whole new item that exactly copies the blueprint down to the individual molecule.

This would allow for rapid construction of a new set of weaponry.

"And now, Colonel Cody, we begin... phase 2..."

I aim my hands at the ground as a new set of blueprints crosses my mind. For 5 minutes, I concentrate as I once again pour my mind into various parts of the item.

Finally, I have it all completed.

" Mecha! "

In front of me, dissolving into view, a massive, hulking set of armor appears. The armor is extremely thick, the plates being nearly 12 inches of solid titanium. It's colored blood red and gold, the color of humanity's fight to survive. It has no actual weapons, but its defensive capabilities are unmatched.

This is no normal set of armor, this is the very first prototype Mecha suit of armor. A weapon to surpass Metal Gear, if you will. I laugh at my own stupid joke, but nobody else would get the humor so... never mind.

This suit enfolds around the user's body and auto-adjusts to their height and physical ability. It provides protection against anything, from claws, to bullets, to acids.

Cody and all the others, even regular techs in the room, pause to gaze in awe at this magnificent suit of armor. I've truly outdone myself.

"Colonel Cody. You will now be the new leader of humanity. This suit, the Mark I Demonslayer will be your personal suit. But this is not the gift I had promised to leave you. This is. "

Once again, I focus my mind as I imagine the exact technical details of how this will work. My mind connects bits and pieces of the circuitry and powerful pieces of the electronics. Finally, I will it to happen.

" Vibroaxe! "

A massive battleaxe appears in midair, then falls to the ground, smashing with tremendous force. It has energy that pulses on the blade, allowing it to slice through even thick steel armor with ease. About as close to a lightsaber as I'll ever get, I suppose.

"As the leader of humanity, you need to be a man intimidating enough to make the demons cower in fear when they hear of your approach. The Mark I Demonslayer, and the Hellraiser axe will make you a terrifying and intimidating opponent on the battlefield.

I then created a less advanced but still exceptionally powerful variant of the battle armor. "This is the Mark I Battle Armor Prime. Its fighting capabilities are still godlike compared to what we use today, but it's just weak enough that if the enemies ever manage to gain an edge in battle, the appearance of your suit will shred their confidence to pieces. These are my gifts for you, Colonel Cody."

Cody grinned so wide that happiness felt like it radiated from his body. " Now I understand, God King. You have truly outdone yourself. How can we possibly lose to the demon hordes now?"

I smiled, but then my smile faded. "Cody... have you ever wondered why it is that there are no advanced human worlds? Have you ever wondered why all the worlds we've found have been lacking when it comes to technology?"

Cody nodded. "Yes... the thought had crossed my mind."

I paused. I wasn't sure how to word this, but thanks to the abilities of the crown, I had a 90% confidence threshold.

"Cody. This will come as a shock to you but... I believe we have another enemy. One that is neither demon, nor human, nor angel, nor god. An enemy that is... alien in nature. I don't know who they are... but I know that if we should ever encounter them... as we are now... we are guaranteed to lose."

Cody stared at me, his own smile gone now. "What makes you so sure of this?"

I paused. "Because if humanity is truly on as many weird and strange worlds as we've found, but no trace of the technology that got them there exists anymore, yet the demons are not easily slaughtering and killing all of humanity... there must be another player in this war. I know not who, where, when, or why... but I know they exist. Do not grow overconfident with these weapons. Just as we grow too acquainted with them... they may be the death of us."

The room around us dulled, as everyone nearby was lost to their own thoughts.

Aliens.

Part 146:

My eyes are drooping, now that I've spent more than 8 hours summoning things all day, not to mention all the insane concentration and reliance on the Crown that I've been doing lately.

I sighed, as I drooped back into my easy chair. I'm back at home now, and I am... tired.

Cassiel walks in the door, having gone out to get some food. I told her it wasn't necessary, but she ignored me. She goes over to the wood-stove I had created many years ago, and starts making... eggs? And bacon? Silly woman, that's for breakfast... not that I can complain, as it's a hell of a lot better than... chi-... chiii-... chicken... ugh, the word makes me want to throw up, just thinking about it.

"So... we're going into the labyrinth and leaving this place behind then?" She speaks while her back and wings face me as she cooks.

"Yes. I've given humanity what it needs. They will at the least be able to hold their own. But finally, for now, I need to return to my original goals. I need to solve the mysteries of this accursed labyrinth."

She nods quietly. "I suppose so. Won't you miss... the people here?"

Will I? Of course. I'm not doing this because I hate humanity. I'm doing this because, in the end, I want to save them. Beyond them just being my species, after ten years, I've grown attached to this place. After ten years, I've made friends that will be with me for the rest of my life... even if they pass on.

"Yes. But I have to complete my goal. I traveled here in a device that allowed me to skip the passage of time instantly. I have no idea what happened during that time period, but whatever it was, it was serious. In fact, the most baffling thing to me is how my pod went from being on Earth to ending up in this maze that spans the dimensions. That couldn't have been accidental. Someone or... something... must have put me there." I gazed out the window at the darkening nighttime. This was... almost a normal reality. Living on this planet... why not just live here forever? I'm immortal now, I can train, get stronger, live a good life...

But it would be empty. It would be like playing an hour of a fantastic videogame and then deciding to spend the next 99 in a safe village. Life is risk, and you need risk to call yourself alive.

After she had finished the, err, bacon and eggs, we sat down to eat a dinner before bed. Bed. My thoughts drifted back to last night. I'm dog tired but, I mean, why not, right? I guess I could just, uh, reinvigorate myself temporarily or something.

I do however genuinely need to sleep in order to recover my spiritual and thought energy. For some reason, if I don't enter REM sleep, my body will not refuel itself naturally. Naps don't do it, and I can't cheat by casting a spell to give myself more thought energy. But why sleep? Why is sleep the only way I can recover it?

As I eat, I glance up and notice that Cassiel is finished, and she's leaning on her hand, staring at me. She's very beautiful, and staring her right in the face always catches me a little off guard.

"W-what is it? Do I have something on my face?" Hell yeah, just try the simple approach.

Cassiel turned away and stared at the floor. "Um, actually, I had a request to make of you, but I didn't... know how to ask..."

I almost choked on my food. Oh boy, here it comes.

She blushed a little as she looked back at me. "Can... you, um... you and I... can we..."

I could almost feel the tips of my ears turning red. Yeah? Yeah?! What are the two of us going to do?!

"...Can you train me to be a strong fighter?"

I feel fucking foolish. Ah, that's what she was getting at. My mind was in the gutter. "Yeah, what do you want to learn?"

"Well, I may be just a boring old reborn human, but I do possess angelic powers. Maybe you could teach me how to be useful in battle. It'd be a shame if we went into the labyrinth together and you did all the fighting... I'd hate to leave it all to you... even if you can easily handle it, I guess."

I nodded slowly. "Yes, but... you know, what might be more useful... offensively, you're not going to be very strong, or fast, but I suppose you'd make for a great support unit. You could heal me if I was hurt, maybe buff me when needed, cast status ailments on the enemy, etc."

She looked confused. "Status ailments? What are those?"

I shrugged. "It's like uh, putting them to sleep, blinding them, stuff like that."

Cassiel nodded. "Okay! That sounds better than nothing! Are we going to start soon then?"

I glanced at the analog clock on the wall. This world has a 36 hour time cycle, but we're practically at midnight right now... "Ah, certainly not tonight. Perhaps tomorrow."

She nodded, and then blushed again. "Oh, that reminds me... I'm expecting a guest here, pretty soon."

Huh? A guest? At this time of the night? I expanded my vision to encompass multiple city blocks. Everyone was already asleep, except... a couple blocks away... someone was coming.

It was Samantha.

"I invited Samantha over, after, she and I, eh, we had a little chat! Just a harmless little chat! No big deal, really!"

I had an odd feeling in my stomach. "Cassiel, what's going on? Wh-what did you two talk about?"

She blushed again. She seems to do that a lot. "About the, ah, status of our relationship... I mean, I'm n-not a little girl you know! I'm a mature, responsible woman, I-I don't get jealous like a child would or anything!"

She's stuttering. And talking very fast. I either like where this conversation is going a whole lot or not at all. I haven't decided yet.

While thinking those thoughts, Samantha arrived and knocked on the door. After coming in, she smiled at me with a twinkle in her eye. "I'm guessing Cassiel explained the situation then? I'll be joining you on your trip in the labyrinth!"

She hopped over a little bit closer and whispered in my ear. " And tonight as well~! "

I guess I'm not actually going to get much sleep tonight.

Part 147:

It's morning now. I wake up and maybe 25% of my energy has refilled, if that. I... don't remember actually falling asleep last night. Merciful Christ, I may be a God-King now, but I may need my own hero to save me after last night.

My eyes flutter open and the bright sunlight makes me want to close them again. Samantha is sleeping on top of me, while Cassiel is on my right side, wrapped all around and over me, as she usually is.

An interesting predicament, to be sure. Since I took the crown off and it's on the table a few feet away, it won't be able to help me escape this situation, though I'm not so sure I want to escape. Eventually, I just cast "Sleep" on Cassiel and Samantha both, and I get up, placing them both down in the bed behind me. They'll be out for another 3 or 4 hours more, according to the strength of the spell I used.

Today is an important day. I will be re-entering the labyrinth and I have to make sure Hero City is ready to go. If I leave it behind without making sure things are going smoothly, I could come back and find the entire place destroyed. I can't have that.

While those two sleep, I have some work to do.

I have been thinking about my battle with Hope. He silenced me, using my own wordsmithing. I may have been able to win without wordsmithing, if only just because my body is extremely powerful now, but it stands to reason that being silenced is always going to be a pretty big problem.

So it's simple, I need a way to prevent myself from being silenced. I need something that protects me from negative status effects. Not just silence, even. I need a way to protect myself against other effects, like sleep, or paralysis.

I go outside and sit in the warm morning sun. It's nice out here... it really is. I aim my hand at myself. "Reflect."

I feel a faint aura surround me. What will this reflect though? I tried to visualize status debuffs, but that could mean anything. Hmm. "Modify. Enemy."

I don't know if 'modify' works, but something seems to have changed. If I'm lucky, maybe I can think of ways to modify long term buffs and debuffs with it... In any case, I won't know until I fight in a battle, but it will hopefully prove to be useful.

And now I find myself thinking about Cassiel's request. She wants to be useful in battle, was it? I can't say I have a problem with that. She might feel weak and vulnerable if all she is, is a support character. Maybe I can buff her somehow.

Aha! It's so obvious. I couldn't do it before, but I can now! I reach my hand out once again.

" Armor. "

A set of pure white female armor appears in front of my hand. Valkyrie armor, to be specific. I can't think of anything more appropriate for her. She even has the pure white angelic wings that lore used to speak of. I'd like to make some armor for Samantha, but I'm not sure if she would... um... wear it... And in any case, with armor, one also needs a weapon. I've got that covered too.

" Vibrosword. "

A weapon appears, a slender and thin sword, one with energy that can be activated on the blade, allowing one to cut through nearly anything by making the blade vibrate at a specific frequency. Not exactly a lightsaber, but close enough.

" Sharpen! Sharpen! Sharpen! Strengthen! "

The sword is insanely sharp now. Lightly touching it to anything will cause said thing to split nearly instantly. I test this on one of my fingers, very gently touching my finger against the sword. My fingers splits and starts bleeding all over the place.

Hm... I still only have a normal human's vitality when it comes to healing wounds. Better fix that.

" Regeneration! Regeneration! Regeneration! "

I look down and my finger wound is healed. Ohohoho... I touch my finger to the sword again, it splits open, and the moment I pull it away, it heals itself in a flash. Interesting. I should have done this sooner.

I'm beginning to wonder what else I can do with my powers. I've never really experimented in the last ten years, but I need to start.

Hey, maybe I can make a gun now. I failed in the past, but I wasn't smart back then.

I aim my hand at the ground, and mentally picture a familiar weapon from an old TV show I remember. " Blaster. "

A small, handheld blaster forms after a few minutes of my mind concentrating on the mechanical details. This looks very similar to Han Solo's weapon, hehe. I'm kind of excited now.

I raise my hand up and cast another spell. " Target. " A target appears for me to test the blaster on.

When I aim it at the target, no sounds are emitted, no bolt of light shoots out, but the instant I press the trigger, the target fucking explodes. Holy shit!

Now that I think about it, that makes sense. Those old movies always showed beams of light that seemed to shoot more slowly than bullets. I mean, when you fire a bullet, you never see it travel at all. Why would something traveling the speed of light somehow be visible?...This may be a really potent weapon.

In fact, I need to get one of these to Colonel Cody before I leave. Ah... Colonel Cody. I... need to rectify that. To be honest, I don't think he's as good of a leader as Adams was, but since Adams is dead now... it can't be helped. We need a new king, and I will have to make sure that the king is announced properly this time.

Well then, I was going to let the girls sleep, but they might as well wake up. It's been a couple hours and they've gotten more sleep than I did. We need to start and finish the preparations today, and be gone by tonight.

I just have this feeling that I need to leave soon. I can't explain it with words.

Part 148:

I find myself walking towards the castle, with an angel girl on my right arm, and a demon girl on my left. Not going to lie, this does feel pretty badass. They keep looking at each other and winking, like they have some secret they're hiding from me. I feel like whatever the secret is, I'm going to find out soon enough.

Cassiel was excited to get her new armor, and, as I expected, Samantha got a little bit jealous that she didn't get anything. However, to her delight, I'd already made her some sexy, albeit functionally useless, new armor. It's really just more of... um... a leather thong and skirt along with something to cover up her knockers, and it really doesn't hide much beyond that... but it does come with a cool electro-whip! I'm actually kind of terrified to see how she'll use it on demons in the labyrinth, given her sadistic and playful side.

Not to mention how she might use it on me... that's a story for another day.

As we approach the castle, I'm getting looks of jealousy and admiration from many manner of folks, all of them shooting shocked expressions and glares my way. I don't really like the attention, but soon, I won't have to worry about it.

We arrive in the armory again, and the girls mercifully let go of my arms. Do they think I'm going to flee? Who would?

Cody is there again. "God King! Err, Hero? Whatever you prefer. Anyway, we've started using the Replicator, and it is giving us fantastic results!"

I grin gleefully. "I can't wait to see it! Show me what you've been up to."

He does. I'm flabbergasted. The entire hangar on Mars has over 250 of those suits made. He must have been replicating them nonstop since yesterday.

Two cadets are in the suits, having a mock battle in the center of the room. The speed of the suits is terrible, but the strength is colossal. Every time they pound their fists against each other, it makes the sound of a small explosion.

Cody stares intently at the battle. "As strong as they are, and as sure as I am they they would crush most low level demons, I still feel that the suits have a lot of vulnerabilities in the combat department that any smart enemy would seize on quickly."

I nod. "You're right. They are actually terrible close combat suits, they're meant for ranged warfare."

I hold up the blaster and he stares at it quizzically. "What's this?"

"This is what will make the suits go from dangerous to nearly unstoppable. It's called a blaster, and I'm going to make a variant just for them."

I aim my hand at an empty space in the hangar, make a target, and fire at it to show my point. The explosion convinces him instantly. "I can't wait!"

Ten minutes later, it sits in front of me. A massive blaster that fires semi-automatically. If you pull the trigger, the enemy dies. I even found a way to make it recharge by drawing from the user's spiritual energy pool. Since humans tend to never use their energy, this makes it have a lot more ammunition than a regular gun, while not having to lug around said ammunition.

The gun was actually so big and bulky that I found it difficult to carry, but once I got inside a Mechasuit, it was a piece of cake.

Cody and his team grinned widely as they saw the power of the blaster. "This is almost making it too easy, isn't it, Hero?"

I shrug. "It's only as easy as you want it to be."

And before I leave today, there's just one more matter to take care of.

Part 149: Coronation

After examining the new weapons and verifying that the Replicator is working, we all go out and have a nice final meal in the Great Hall. This will likely be the last time I see other people for a long time, as I'm going into the labyrinth and don't intend to come out for a long time.

Cody treats us to a fine, lavish meal, all freshly farmed from a world used almost entirely for raising cattle that he had liberated a few years ago. He calls it "Food World Alpha" which drives me insane, but oh well! It's pretty clear that I'm the only human with any ability to name things accurately.

As we eat, I find myself thinking about other things again. After I crown Cody as king, I have to leave. While it would honestly be more useful to simply leave the two girls behind, I don't want to see them crying or anything else like that, plus I've grown attached to Cassiel. Samantha, well, I'm sure she'd be fine, but Cody has spoken to me about her abilities. She may actually be extremely useful in the labyrinth.

I turn to Cody and silently beckon for him to follow me. We both get up from the table and leave the room. I feel eyes on us, but nobody gets up to follow. Good.

We arrive in a quiet room around the corner, and I close the door. " Muffle."

I cast muffling spells at all four walls and doors, just in case. Cody looks concerned, but that will be cleared up soon enough.

"Colonel Cody... listen, I have something to tell you. It's about your coronation. You need to be aware... when I was speaking with Adams, or his clone, or whichever one it was... it wasn't just him and Hope that plotted against me. There were several nobles that were at the table when I was knocked out. I knew very few of them. And I wasn't paying attention while I was there so I had forgotten who the ones I knew were."

Cody nodded. "Alright. That is about as I suspected."

I paused. "You knew?"

He shrugged as he leaned back in his chair. "Yes. A few of them approached me within what I suspect was a few hours of the incident. They wanted my help keeping quiet about a certain incident. At the time, I didn't know what they were talking about, but after your return, I pieced it together."

He glanced away and smiled thinly. "And with a bit of... coercion... I managed to dig up the names of hopefully all the conspirators."

I frowned. "Coercion?"

He grinned. "You know... torture."

I blanched. "Ah, yeah, of course. Well, I hope you didn't take it too far."

"Nah, don't worry about them. I made their deaths quick and painless." He waved his hand at me. "Treason is a capital crime, you know. Especially when it goes against the best interests of our entire species."

Well... I can't say he's wrong. It's not something Adams would have done but... well, Adams was murdered so... maybe his way wasn't always the right way.

"You did what you had to. A leader has to make tough choices." Yeah, that made sense. I'll leave it at that.

Cody stood up. "Is that it then? Anything else to say before you head off?"

I paused. Many things immediately came to mind. However, only one seemed to matter.

"King Cody. For the good of humanity... stay safe... and good luck."

The ceremony, as hastily thrown together as it was... was marvelous. I decided to give Cody an official Crown, and the duplicate crown of Solomon, found in Adams' belongings, was a perfect match.

I actually added some jewels and gems just to make it look a bit more kingly. Unnecessary, but I liked it!

Afterwards, I went home with my ladies and we packed up some stuff. Hoarhiim's orb has been safely in my storage void for a while now. I might as well just keep him there forever, until I can find something out.

His orb is still warm. After ten years, there hasn't been a sign of life in it, but I still feel hope every time I touch it. I won't let my first friend die so easily. I refuse.

Just as we're about to leave, Samantha grabs me. "Hey, before we head out, why not have a little fun first? This'll be the last time we get to enjoy a nice warm bed for a long while, don't you think?"

I sigh as Cassiel nods enthusiastically. It's not like I'm mad or anything.

Part 150: Extermination

"Heh, Tvoorik, isn't this the best?" I grin as I look over at my bestest buddy. He doesn't return the smile.

"Quiet down. We're still just guards, you know. We're just waiting to be minced into pieces by the filthy meatbags."

I waved him off. "Oh come on, you're always such a fuddy-duddy. The humans have been losing badly for weeks! Their Hero deserted them and without his clones around, the Grez are mopping up!"

Tvoorik shook his head. "Clearly three evolutions in a row hasn't done you any favors in the brain department. Listen, stupid, that's what they want you to think."

I rolled my eyes. Fuck's sake, not this again.

Tvoorik continued. "Ylvusk, listen, I've got it all figured out. Now that we're shadow-walkers, the commanders are going to start issuing dangerous orders to us. They know we know that they know we know too much, you copy? So they're going to start ordering us to infiltrate the enemy's base or some crazy shit like that. Once we do, BAM! We get murdered and nobody ever finds out what we know."

"For crying out loud! I swear, you'll believe any conspiracy theory. What's next, the demons are supplying the humans with top secret weaponry to destabilize the labyrinth so they can remove more of our demonic freedoms?"

Tvoorik grinned and nodded intently. "Now you're beginning to understand."

I slapped my face into my palm. This moron...

Tvoorik stiffened suddenly. "Quiet... I feel something."

I slowly moved my face away from my hand and waited. I could feel something too. A rumbling, deep in the Earth. Steadily growing more and more noticeable. Soon, in the distance, I could hear the sound of a slow but steady rumbling, and it was coming this way.

"Tvoorik, warn the guards. Gather the orcs."

He and I quickly activated our invisibility abilities, blending into the shadows. We ran back the short distance to the others. "Something's approaching, and whatever it is, I don't think it's friendly." Tvoorik whispered to the orc commander. However, if it really was those filthy humans, we had a surprise in store for them.

We have a Duke here. The Duke of Reptiles, to be exact. His Evilness, Agares.

He appeared as an old man, but rode atop his crocodile, which he aptly named Crocomire. "I can sense them coming. These humans are different from the ones we've fought before. Be on the alert, they may have... evolved new weapons..."

Agares' eyes narrowed as he eyeballed the corridor up ahead. The noise was unmistakable now. It was the sound of slow moving but very heavy and loud footsteps. He remembered something now, an old tale Satan had told him about humans who were given room to expand, and the disastrous consequences for angelkind, as well as demonkind.

We're not the monsters. Humanity is. Parasites that destroy all other life. Pure evil.

Agares had never forgotten Satan's words. And now, he realized those words were seconds away from being proven true.

I stared in awe from the shadows, along with Tvoorik. A massive series of metallic monsters appeared from around the bend. They had bright glowing eyes that shot out beams of light, illuminating all they gazed upon. Their forms were decidedly humanoid, though massive. They all stood at least 7 feet tall. While slow... they looked tough. Really tough.

I spoke to Tvoorik with telepathy. We won't be of any use here. Let's wait until the action starts, then split.

Tvoorik carefully nodded, his body and mine invisible unless we moved. As shadow-walkers, stealth is our most important ability. Thanks to the intel we gave to Diablo (Against Tvoorik's judgement), we were gifted with forced evolutions as a reward for our... 'bravery'. I mean, we hid and cowered in fear, but if they wanted to give us evolutions, I was not going to refuse!

Suddenly, just as the clankers came into view, I gasped audibly as explosions lit up the corridor. I couldn't tell what was happening, but before the orcs could even charge into battle, they were being felled left and right!

"Satan the Devil! We need to get the heaven out of here!" I grabbed Tvoorik and we split, as the screams of agony filled the corridor.

"Retreat!" Agares yelled at the top of his lungs. It hadn't been even a minute yet, and he was ordering the retreat?! What the heaven?! What did these humans do to get so strong?!

As we ran Tvoorik turned towards me, with a knowing grin. " What did I tell you? It starts from the top."

That idiot.

Part 151:

Agares grimaced as he delivered the news, ready for a thrashing from Diablo.

It never came. Diablo instead turned and vacantly stared out the window of the conference room. The other dukes, kings, and lords stared down at the table as they pondered this.

"Massive battle suits. Why didn't Umi warn us? Isn't that what an Oracle is supposed to do?" Bael, as always, was the first one to break the silence. He was a quick thinker, in the way that he always wanted to get the thinking done as quickly as possible so he didn't have to do any more thinking than necessary.

President Ose shrugged. "Umi has been... quiet." She heaved a sigh. That's an understatement of the year. I haven't heard anything from her in a large number of ticks.

Diablo's eyes unclouded as he shook his head. He also sighed. "This is growing... tiresome. Many of you were not there for the very beginning of humanity's development... but I was. Along with Satan himself and a few others still alive today, we witnessed a great many things. We learned the true horrors of war."

Diablo stared down at the table, a hint of sorrow almost visible in his eyes. "Demons like Ose and the others were born long after we had constructed the labyrinth. I mean no offense, but you don't know why we live the way we do. It is a necessity. We thought we could eradicate the humans once we had dealt with the angels, but that proved to be untrue."

Bael eyeballed Diablo intently. "Are humans really that dangerous, yet so important for our survival?"

Diablo nodded grimly. "Yes. A few hundred thousand years before the actual plans for the labyrinth were created... demonkind could have gone extinct. We require the presence of humans for a variety of small yet important reasons, just as angels needed humans to give them thought energy... but humans neither need the two of us, nor want us."

Barbatos felt a wave of nausea pass over his face. "Hngh. You must be speaking of the Energy Wars. I've tried to forget those dark days. The terror of what happens when humanity becomes an unstoppable force. The fear I felt every day when we heard the approach of their weaponry."

Diablo rested his chin on his hands. "It's happening again. Only this time, the speed is accelerated, unprecedented, even. Those suits Agares spoke of, they sound like primitive, yet brutally effective versions of the Juggernauts. Not to mention the weapons he explained. Clearly they're using some form of laser technology. That's highly advanced. Only the Wordsmith could take them from the medieval age to the spiritual age, in a manner of weeks."

Mephisto paused. "Forgive me for interrupting, but as I am young and know not of what you speak, what are the... 'Juggerknots'?"

Diablo coughed a little and his voice rasped. "Ah... it's not polite to generally bring them up among the veterans of the Energy Wars. They were brutally efficient, fast, powerful killing machines. It would seem the ones you witnessed required human pilots. The ones I know of were actually drones, piloted remotely by humans or by an Artificial Intelligence. I won't bother explaining what that last one is, you wouldn't understand it."

Mephisto shrugged as he sat back in his seat. "What you are basically saying, is that even if you destroyed those 'Juggerknots', you wouldn't even kill a human inside?"

Diablo grimaced. "Precisely."

"We lost millions of demons. Billions, even. All those centuries we spent preparing for the extermination of the angels, and all that breeding and evolving was pointless in the face of humanity." Barbatos almost appeared as if he had tears in his eyes. "What you younglings don't know is that all surviving demons, especially those like Diablo and I, who were not only survivors of the Energy Wars, but born in the First Age of demonkind... we only pretend to mock humans."

Diablo slumped back in his seat. "No... they deserve mockery. Look at what they've become for the last few millions of years. Cattle for the River. They deserved mockery. But Barbatos speaks the truth. He is the oldest living demon among our kind. We do fear the humans. We need them, but we wish we didn't."

Mephisto leaned forward in his seat. "So, Diablo, if you don't mind me asking... if humans were as unstoppable as you say... how the heavens did we manage to ever win? How could we have possibly come back from an onslaught like the one you speak of?"

Barbatos spoke inside, cackling as he pounded the table with his fist. "Gwaaahahaha! HOW indeed? That's easy, we made a new ally! At the cost of our integrity, we abandoned principles we had held since the first age and made allies among non demons! Gaahahaha!"

His laughter was not genuine. It was insane laughter, tinged with regret.

Diablo swallowed hard. "If only the Volgrim were a laughing matter."

Part 152:

Zeus sat atop the Throne of Heaven. Having consumed his father's colossal hoard of spiritual energy, he now stood at the same height Kronos once had, towering over all other beings. He wondered to himself quietly if this would become a tradition. Should one of his sons or another usurper attempt to take the throne, would they also consume his power and increase in size? Possibly, though only if they were a Titan as well.

He was worried, though. He had heard of Gabriel, the mightiest archangel, who had ascended to the Cosmos class. This one was a particularly loyal servant of Kronos. He was away on a mission but would be arriving back very soon, according to scouts.

How should I deal with him? Zeus thought to himself. My father must have created Gabriel's current power and loyalty as a way to guarantee his seat on the throne. As long as no-one else dared to attack Kronos for fear of facing not just him but his loyal Cosmos-class archangel, his position as King of Gods would be assured.

My father was foolish. He let his most powerful guard leave on a mission for an entire week, leaving himself vulnerable. Perhaps he didn't realize there was anyone mighty enough to dethrone him. Perhaps he was arrogant. It would explain why he casually toyed with my son's armies, allowing the enemy a victory. His desire to mock me and humiliate my son are just one of the many signs that he was an arrogant ruler who cared little for his people.

Zeus fumed silently. Suddenly, from the portal from Mount Sinai to Heaven, a massive spiritual energy source appeared. Zeus stiffened. Gabriel. He's back sooner than I expected.

Gabriel flew up towards the throne, from the exit point of the portal. He arrived in a flash, his small form enlarging as he was in more open airspace. He always had to shrink to pass through the portal, as did the rest of the larger angels and gods.

Gabriel landed smoothly and silently in front of Zeus. "What is this treachery? Why are you sitting atop the throne of the gods?"

Gabriel swept his gaze around, as others in the Great Hall silently averted their eyes.

"Gabriel... you are not the one who should be asking questions here. I am." I stared up at his form, which dwarfed me in size, even more so than my father's had when I was the size of a normal god. He must have been 100 times my size. We're lucky there is no roof for the throne building of the Gods, otherwise we'd never be able to build one big enough to contain this monster.

Gabriel leaned down, bringing his head frighteningly close to Zeus. His head was an order of magnitude bigger than Zeus' entire body, it made him feel incredibly tiny. "Oh? You have something to ask of me? Go right ahead."

Zeus kept his temper under control. He was not nearly so sure he could defeat Gabriel in combat. It's not that Gabriel was more powerful or a better fighter than Kronos, it's that Kronos was overconfident. Humble fighters never took big risks, and a big risk is what let Zeus be in the position he was in now.

"Why did you interfere in the battle between my son and his men, allowing them to be overcome and slain by the demonic hordes? Why did you refuse to aid them as well, not using that incredible magic of yours to wipe out the enemy as you had done twice before?" Zeus did not back down. To show fear would be to show weakness, and he was not a weak god.

Gabriel lifted himself up to his full height, then shrunk himself down to a bit bigger than Zeus' height. Zeus quietly breathed a sigh of relief. "So that's what this is about? I have my reasons. I do what I must to ensure the survival of our people." Gabriel deflected, evading the question.

Zeus glared at him. "You had better have some mighty good reasons. As of today, I am the new King of the Gods. I defeated Kronos, my father, in fair combat in front of thousands of spectators. With my authority as King, I will now order a trial to examine your motives for interfering with the Third Holy Battle on Earth. Your trial will be governed by a fair split of archangels, gods, and normal angels, as well as myself."

Gabriel frowned. "That seems harsh, but if that's what it takes, I will warn you of one thing: The knowledge of why I did what I did may end up destroying our kind if it leaks to the demons. Are you sure you want to continue?"

Zeus smiled. "Yes. I'm absolutely sure."

Gabriel nodded and bowed. "Very well. However, do not say that I did not warn you. We have spies among our people. Your actions may condemn us to inadvertent mass suicide. I apologize in advance for anything that may happen as a result of this trial."

Zeus mentally rolled his eyes, though he stifled the physical reaction. So full of drama. He will do anything to protect his beloved dead king. I need to get rid of him before he becomes a threat to my new order.

"Begone then, and return in one Earth week's time. We will begin the trial then."

Part 153: Imprisoned

I knew it would end up like this. The trial was a farce. Zeus had no intention of letting me speak, he only intended to either shame me into submission, or imprison me to consolidate his power.

Now I'm locked here, in an infinite dimension he specifically created to hold me. Naturally, I require no sustenance to keep myself alive, but surrounded by nothing but white, and a single platform for sitting on... I sit here, treated as if I had killed the king of the gods in his sleep with my own hands.

Every so often, I am allowed a single visitor. Naturally, as an angel, I lack offspring. Angels cannot reproduce, so I have no daughter or son. However, one of the other archangels, my brother Raphael, comes to visit me on occasion.

Today is such a day. I've been imprisoned for 15 rotations of the Earth, and he came, as he said he would. He tends to come every three rotations on the dot.

Raphael walked over, his thin and frail looking body belying his intelligence. "Gabriel, you still seem to be looking well as always."

"As well as I could ever hope to be, given these troublesome circumstances."

Raphael sat next to me, on the small elevated platform. It was essentially a bench, and since angels require neither food nor water nor sleep, I simply sat here and thought a lot, recently. There was no point flaunting my cosmic power, so I had simply shrunk myself to normal angelic size, not that Raphael was ever intimidated by my size. Nothing seemed to bother him.

Raphael stroked his chin as he spoke. "Many things have happened. Zeus has begun an aggressive war against the demons. With the help of humanity and Hercules' Knights, we're crushing them quite easily."

I nodded. "It was to be expected. We could have won the war at any point that we wanted."

Raphael glanced over at me for a split second before slowly looking away. "During the trial, you would not explain your motivations for betraying Hercules, as well as your people. Why were you and Kronos conspiring against your own people? Why do you wish to not win this war?"

I hesitated. I... trust Raphael. He is a good friend. He and I were created nearly at the same time. The Creator was a powerful being and gave both of us our own attributes. Raphael was given wisdom, myself Might, Michael was given Divinity, Uriel was given Justice, and so on. The archangels were given many different things, but it was Raphael I trusted the most.

Strangely, Kronos had figured out so many things about angels and demons. He had figured out that we have to keep the war going, or humanity would turn on us. He had figured out that crushing the demons, an easily accomplished task, was the worst possible thing we could do.

"Raphael, before his death, Kronos and I had a long discussion..."

Raphael listened quietly as I explained the situation between the gods, angels, humans, and demons to him.

"I see. I had always suspected something like that was the case." Raphael nodded quietly, as he once again stroked his chin. "I was able to piece most of it together since the beginning, but I did not know that he was deliberately stoking the flames of war for our people's sake. Then... that means that Zeus is going to potentially be the death of us."

I stared ahead. "Yes. I no longer can stop him, due to my imprisonment. Perhaps I should have challenged him to a duel, then this may have-"

Before I could finish, Raphael raised a hand to interrupt me. "No! I sense a more important destiny for you. Fighting a foolish god is not why you were created, nor I. I believe that Zeus may listen to my counsel... perhaps I can convince him of the dangers without slipping the secrets to him."

I quickly glance over at Raphael. "Beware. Men and gods of hot tempers are ones with loose tongues. If he were to let it slip, it would put all of our people in grave danger."

Raphael stood up slowly. "I am aware of the risks. Despite what some may say, I do not consider myself the wisest being alive. I am simply as wise as I can possibly hope to be given my limited knowledge of the universe. There is much for me to learn, as well as you."

He started to walk towards the portal, holding up his hand. As he approached, the portal cleared up, allowing passage to Heaven.

"Thank you for listening to me, and giving me counsel, brother. May we both find a way to solve this problem without violence." I waved at him as he was about to leave.

"No, thank you, Gabriel. My wisdom and knowledge is dependent on others. I will treasure what you have told me and hold it close to my heart. Farewell."

Raphael let a small smile slip as he stepped through the portal, and it fogged up behind him.

I am alone once again. I must leave it to my brother now... only he can save our people.

Part 154:

Satan stared darkly at the report. His generals indicated various positions of troops and slowly managed to say what was on their mind.

We're being crushed.

Satan glared as the generals gave him a stunning number: 60%. That's how many of the demonic legion's warrior demons had been slain.

In just one month, more than half of their fighting force was eradicated from existence. The enemy didn't even use that Cosmic Class Angel, Gabriel anymore. Not that it mattered.

"If they had this kind of ability to crush us all along, why didn't they do it sooner?" Diablo, the second lord of the demons, stared at the mess in front of him. "There were times we were winning, and times we were losing, but even back when there were only a few evolutions, we never lost like this."

"It's that damned Hercules! He's impossible to beat!" Bael pounded the table with his fist. "His troops cannot be even touched as long as he leads them! The angels could be taken care of, individually we outnumber them ten to one, but those damned humans are like vermin, coming out of the woodwork faster than we can kill them! Our forces totaled almost a hundred million only months ago, now we're down to forty million!" As a general on the frontlines, Bael had seen many of his minions die to the Hercules-led knight legion.

Hmm.

Satan thought quietly to himself. "We still have the location of their home base. What if we were to strike at the angels directly?"

Lucifer, the third in command, scowled. "It's pointless. Their gods are incredibly powerful, though reclusive. If we could kill most of the angels, we'd have the advantage in future skirmishes to be sure but... if Gabriel makes an appearance, as he likely will, we will lose decisively."

The mood at the table worsened. No options are left but to hide like rats. That is what all at the War Table thought to themselves, even Satan.

However, Satan had an idea cross his mind. "So what you are saying is that as we are now, even the strongest demons at this table cannot compare to the gods that hide inside Mount Sinai?"

Lucifer slowly nodded. "Yes, my liege. What are you getting at?"

Satan silenced himself. He couldn't speak of what was on his mind. It was his closest guarded secret. After a few seconds, he went on a different path. "It's simple, then. If we can increase our fighting power to be above the angels and the gods, we can decisively crush them."

Bael spoke now, though more slowly than he usually would. "My lord, that is certainly... a fantastic idea but... that seems rather hard to do in such a short time."

Satan raised his hand and silenced him. "No, I have a way, though it will only work for me. I have a friend I must speak to, and I will be back before the morning comes. Stay here and strategize to cut our losses to a minimum. I have work to do. "

Satan quickly rose from his sitting position at the table and walked away towards the exit of the demonic mountain base.

Lucifer, the dark-walker, watched quietly as his master left.

Satan moved quickly, using his highly evolved body and its speed to rapidly leap forward in great bounds towards his destination, a small deserted human village 50 miles to the north. Crossing that long distance in a matter of hours, he arrived at the mountainside he remembered from his imp days, many years ago.

Glancing around to make sure no other life forms were in the area, he pushed aside a pile of rocks, quietly sealing them up behind himself as he entered a narrow tunnel that led deep into the mountainside. It was impossible to spot, unless you stumbled into it by chance, or happened to know exactly where to look. But Satan knew well... this was the key to his power.

After many minutes climbing downwards, he arrived at a familiar pathway, one he had mined out himself as a young imp. It just barely fit his massive form as he crawled on his stomach to get inside. At the end of this tiny pathway, the hole opened up.

Suddenly, he was in a massive, pitch black cavern. As he exited the hole, miles underground, he spoke aloud.

"Great Leviathan, master of all Darkness, your loyal servant has arrived once more." He got on his knees and bowed deeply.

" Hmm? Ahh, if it isn't Satan. So kind of you to have not... forgotten me. "

A massive dark dragon, the size of a small skyscraper, spoke to him. His body was pitch black, as were his eyes. Black flames were burning on his body, and in the darkness, he was invisible to all who gazed upon him.

But not to Satan. He had granted Satan favor as a young imp.

"I would never forget the one who gave my people their power, oh mighty one! I have come once more, to ask another favor, for but a trifle of your power."

The black eyes slowly burned themselves into a deep demonic crimson. " Always asking favors, and never granting my one request... is this task too impossible for one as lowly as you? "

Satan grimaced as he bowed in front of the black dragon. "No, my master, I only have one goal as I always have... to free you from this prison."

Part 155:

Lucifer watched from his vantage point half a mile away, in the shadow of a rock, as his master Satan shoved aside some debris, entered a hole and then covered it back up.

I wonder what he's hiding that he takes such great care to not be discovered. Lucifer thought quietly to himself, as he stayed unmoving for nearly two hours.

Finally, in the dead of night, there was a rumbling noise as Satan pushed aside the rubble and crawled out of the hole, carefully covering it up. However, something incredible caught Lucifer's eye. Satan looked like he had evolved in the time he was inside the hole. In fact, he didn't just evolve, power flowed off of him like he had evolved a dozen times.

Satan covered up the hole and dusted himself off, while quickly glancing around for anyone that might spot him. He didn't seem to spot Lucifer, which was expected, given Lucifer was the greatest dark-walker among the demons.

In a flash, Satan darted away, once again bounding tirelessly across the landscape. After 15 minutes, Lucifer could no longer sense his presence anymore. He was worried that Satan might have detected him and would return soon, but this was worth the risk. Lucifer had always been one to ask questions, and his biggest question was always unanswered. How did Lord Satan discover the secret of forced evolution, and why is he so much faster than all the other demons?

Lucifer darted down, skipping nimbly over anything that might make even the slightest sound. Arriving at the rubble, he quickly shoved it aside, climbed in, and covered it back up. Before climbing down into the hole, however, he set a motion detector, just in case Satan should happen to return.

And thusly, he set to crawling down a small tunnel towards an unknown destination.

Lucifer crawled for a while, trying to figure out if he would get stuck, but as he went on, the tunnel widened slightly, and suddenly he was in a massive room, though it was pitch black.

Lucifer stepped into the room, his heart beating rapidly. Something isn't right about this place? There's something here, and I can't tell what it is. I've never sensed anything like this bef-

Before he could finish that thought, something in the room moved and he froze. Even with his eyes, trained to see in the dark, his entire body trembled as something incredibly huge seemed to shift in the darkness.

And then it spoke, a deep, rumbling voice that seemed to be like quiet thunder in the silence of the cave.

" Hmmm. You are not my minion, Satan. You must be one of those who are digging tirelessly to free me. "

As Lucifer's eyes adjusted to the darkness, he gasped, as the massive black form of a dragon appeared in the darkness. Standing up to its full height, the dragon must have been 200 feet tall. Lucifer was visibly shaking now. Not one to show his emotions, in took all his self control to not scream out in terror.

"W-who are you?"

The dragon's eyes shifted from black to red. " I see. You are not one of the miners. My name is Leviathan, the greatest King of Darkness this universe has ever known. Tell me your name now, little mouse, or I will devour you. "

The dragon's voice spoke softly, but with incredible malice. "My name is- it is Lucifer. I am the third lord of the demons, with only Diablo and Satan above my post."

The dragons' glowing red eyes seemed to flare for a moment as he processed this information. " Hmm. I see. You are one of the highest generals under Satan, yet you know not of my name or that I even existed here. Why are you here, then, if not to free me from this prison? "

Lucifer looked around. It was a plain old cave. Given the power of this dragon, why did he simply not just dig his way out? How did he get down here? Best not to question it until they were on normal speaking terms. As if such a thing existed.

"I followed my general here. I beg your forgiveness, I could tell that he was hiding something from our people, but I knew not what it was. In my search for knowledge, I have done something unforgivable and treasonous." Lucifer bowed quickly, as he awaited the dragon's response.

Leviathan paused for a number of seconds, his eyes probing the demon at his feet. " You appear to speak truth. However, either Satan is lying to me, or you are. If Satan is not digging me out of this prison, then what is he doing for me? "

Lucifer lifted himself back up to gaze at the awesome sight of the dragon. "I beg your forgiveness, my lord. Satan has told nobody of your existence... I fear that he must be lying to you, though to what end I know not."

The dragon nodded slowly as he slumped back down to the floor. Lying down flat on his stomach, he brought his head to ground level as he eyeballed the demon in front of him. " Any minion who lies to me is no minion I can trust. Satan has lost my favor. However, if you promise me that you will dig me out of this prison, then I will grant you the same powers that I granted him. "

Lucifer's body was shaking. This is treason, my lord will surely kill me for this. But... if I were as powerful as he was, then I might just be able to put up a fight...

"Mighty Leviathan, I have only two questions to ask of you. If you would be so generous, might you answer them?"

Leviathan snorted a tiny gout of black flames. " ...Go on. "

"Who imprisoned you here? And, though this may be disrespectful, I must ask it as well, why can you not dig yourself out of here?"

The dragon snorted again, this time more fiercely, evidently a form of laughing. " Ahhh, interesting. Satan never once asked me those questions. You are a perceptive one. To your first question, the answer is that I was buried here due to unfortunate circumstances, but also as the result of a mighty titan of old who sealed me here with holy magic. As to why I cannot dig myself out, it is because this room is not only sealed by his magic, but sure to collapse and crush me if I dig incorrectly. Only one who digs from the surface can free me. "

Lucifer nodded. "Great Leviathan, King of Darkness, I will agree to free you. Unlike the one who pretends to be my master and who borrows your power for his gain, I will free you from this place. Will you be able to aid us in the crushing of the angelic army, along with the gods of old?"

Leviathan sneered as the black flames sprouted from the side of his mouth. " A simple task. I will agree to your terms, as you have agreed to mine. Treachery or deceit will result in death. "

Lucifer pounded his hand on his chest. "I am your loyal servant, Great Leviathan. I will do as you command."

Part 156:

Satan grinned as he walked back into the great hall. Heads immediately turned as his intimidating presence was even more powerful than before, with a sinister dark aura radiating out of his entire body.

"Master Satan! Your evilness eclipses all! Nyahaha!" Some imps danced around his feet as he strode forwards. Even the greatest generals at his table were awed by his presence.

Satan sat down at the table slowly and regally, as befitting a King of the demons. "I have gained something incredible, with this newest evolution, as I expected I would."

Diablo leaned in intently. "My lord, you seem to have gained brilliant power, as you always do. What is your evolution as of now?"

"I am now considered a Demon Lord, I have reached the highest pinnacle that a demon can achieve. However, when I go beyond what a demon can reach, I will become what is known as a 'devil'." Satan grinned broadly as this news passed around the room.

After some time of strategizing and explaining his new powers, Satan had convinced the other generals and lords at the table that the invasion of Mount Sinai, striking at their home base, would be the most effective way to win the war.

"Your power is certainly formidable, but surely Kronos will be a problem to deal with, hmm?" Diablo stared at the mockup of the battle plans. "He is the strongest titan among the gods, and even then, he would appear to be eclipsed by Gabriel. Will you be able to fight them, two on one?"

Satan grimaced. "It is not ideal, but to be honest, I do not plan to win. I plan to stall while the main forces slay as many angels as possible. Remember, we can simply breed more demons if we need to. Humans can as well. Angels appear to lack that ability, or at least they seem to do it very slowly. If we cut their numbers down, we will win the long war."

Diablo grumbled his approval. "Yes, that makes sense. I don't like the idea of not going in to win decisively, but this works for a long term solution."

As they were speaking, a new voice rang out in the corridors. "Lord Satan! I have returned! And I have learned of your deception."

Satan looked up from the table. Hmm? Who is that?

At the end of the hallway, there stood a mighty demon, one with incredible power, in a similar vein as Satan himself. Satan narrowed his eyes. The demon looked familiar, but he couldn't be sure... no... no, this had to be...

"Lucifer? Is that you?" Bael spoke up. "By the great demons! You have gained unbelievable power! You hardly look like the same monster I remember!"

Lucifer nodded grimly as he strode up to the table. "Thank you, Lord Bael, however this is not the time for pleasantries." Lucifer glared at Satan. "How long were you planning to deceive our people?"

Satan glared at him. This whelp. He must have followed me. DAMN! I should have known a darkwalker would be the one to betray me.

"A deception, you say? Everything I do, I do for the good of our kind. However, you and I should have a talk before you say something you'll regret." Satan decided that he should try and muffle this before the idiot flapped his lips too loosely.

Lucifer stared down at the highest ranking demon, the one declared leader of his people. He may be a fraud when it comes to the source of his power, but it does stand to reason that he has led us to many great victories and power for our people. I should hear him out first.

"You speak truth. I will hear what you have to say, and we will decide together what must be done."

Satan's grimace slowly disappeared. Good, maybe I can get this idiot to shut his trap, before he gets us all killed.

Part 157:

"You've got some explaining to do."

Lucifer started off the conversation on a sour note, but it couldn't be helped. They were outside now, in a secret, quiet area, where they could speak privately.

Satan nodded sagely as he stared at his third in command. This one is dangerous, I can't shut him up the quick way, and even if I could, it would create too many questions. I'll just have to outwit him. Satan quietly mused to himself on how best to rectify the situation.

"You want some explanations, hm? What would you have me explain?"

Lucifer stifled the urge to roll his eyes. Great, he's going to try and pretend he has no idea what I'm talking about. "The dark dragon, Leviathan. Why have you hid his existence from us? Why have you not fulfilled his wish and dug him out? Surely he would be a mighty ally on the battlefield."

Satan grimaced in a quiet inner part of his boiling inferno of a soul. This idiot, he doesn't understand anything. I'll have to teach him.

"Lucifer, I want to play a small mental exercise game with you. Let's say that instead of hiding knowledge of the dark dragon, I came and told everyone how I truly learned to evolve. What do you suppose would have happened?"

Lucifer paused as he played the situation in his head. "I suppose we would have gotten to work digging him out. It only makes sense."

Satan visibly rolled his eyes. "All right, that's part one, what comes afterwards?"

Lucifer paused. "He, ah- the Great Dragon, I mean, would rule over us?"

Satan rubbed his forehead. "You can't be serious. Are you that naive? You think the mighty dark dragon, the most fearsome monster on the side of darkness, would be some benevolent ruler?"

Lucifer, not one to be shaken easily, turned his head away awkwardly. "W-well, when you put it like that..."

"Yes, exactly. That dragon would likely either completely ignore us, or maybe, much more likely, devour or kill us all. That dragon is the most fearsome kind of monster." Satan gesticulated as he explained, and Lucifer nodded slowly, finally getting the bigger picture.

"But still, aren't you playing with fire? You're going to get burned. That dragon would have soon realized nobody was digging down to free him."

Satan sighed heavily, as he sat on a nearby rock. "Lucifer... I have led our people for almost a century now. A hundred years. Leviathan is a cunning and insightful monster. He knows nobody is coming to dig him out. And since that is the case, since it could not possibly take a hundred years to free him, why do you suppose he has not killed me?"

Lucifer also sat down, his face a mix of confusion and doubt. "Because he feels... lonely?"

Satan waved his hands up in the air. "Not the exact word I was thinking of, but close enough. That dragon told me he had been trapped there, all alone for generations. He's not exactly lonely, but he most certainly enjoys speaking to someone. If he were to eat me, or kill me, he would have essentially no chance of ever escaping."

Lucifer nodded. "I... see. My lord... I have misjudged you. I thought you did this all for your own gain but... clearly you are wiser than I."

Satan carefully hid a smile behind his hands as he leaned the front of his face in his hands, which rested on his knees. This youngling is more of a fool than I expected. The story was certainly convincing, but to believe it so readily... he would be a detriment to have as my third or even second in command.

"Indeed, young one. Never forget, by keeping that dragon enslaved to me, I was able to keep stealing his power to benefit our people. And while you did betray a sacred trust among our people, I am willing to forgive you, under one condition."

Lucifer stopped staring vacantly at the ground and glanced back up to his beloved leader, admiration once again in his eyes. "Of course! It is only just that I should redeem myself!"

Satan felt a cackle rumble up inside him, which he again stifled. To be young is to be foolish, as they say. "I have a mission I need completed. To be honest, now that you are a mighty darkwalker who is invisible in the shadows, yet powerful enough to fight even a high ranked god, you are the only one who could ever complete this mission."

Lucifer nodded eagerly. "Of course! Anything! Please tell me!"

Satan stared away, putting a mock expression of sadness on his face. "Well, truth be told, you are too valuable to our people now. I fear even you could not complete this mission without a horrible tragedy overcoming you. In fact, never mind. Yes, this is too dangerous. I'd rather lose one of the lower ranked dark-walkers than lose you."

Lucifer was practically on the edge of his seat at this point. "No, please, my lord! I beg of you! I must redeem myself for my treachery!"

Satan sighed deeply. "Well... it can't be helped then. There is an item of particular value that I need stolen. I have heard of it by means of whispers and muttering. To be honest, I know not if it truly even exists."

Lucifer nodded again, his eagerness almost overwhelming compared to the calm demeanor of his senior. "Yes! Go on!"

"There exists a twin set of stones, held by the highest of the archangels. A light one, and a dark one. I care not for the light one, but if you should manage to steal the dark one, I would be willing to give you a large portion of its energy, and a full pardon of your treason. However, the mission has a high chance of resulting in your death. I advise against it, for your own safety."

Lucifer leaped to his feet, eagerly bobbing his head. "It will be a trifle! With my new powers, it will be like taking a human baby from an imp!"

Satan nodded, as a sinister smile sprouted in his heart. "I see. I must trust in your abilities then. Should you succeed, you will surely get the reward you deserve."

Lucifer almost leaped for joy. "My lord! Your kindness and generosity knows no bounds! I will forever honor you as the patriarch of our people!"

Lucifer left excitedly, leaving Satan to his thoughts.

Truly, no matter how powerful a pawn becomes, that level of idiocy is inexcusable. If he doesn't die by the hand of the angels, I'll have to do the deed myself.

Part 158: Forbidden

Lucifer stared at the doorway that led into Mount Sinai. As best as he knew, no demon had ever entered this place. Not because it was necessarily not desired, but because to do so would be to wish death upon themselves.

Demons were inherently weaker than angels. Even moreso, when compared with 'gods'. Demons, even when evolving, only tended to gain a small amount of power. Some, however, might gain new abilities, and seldomly, they would gain unique abilities.

Luckily, Lucifer had gained a few of these unique abilities, and now he would be putting them to the test.

Shadowstep.

With a mental command, Lucifer willed himself to instantly transfer from one shadow to another, staying invisible, and not appearing to move at all in the process. An incredible skill meant for the highest of assassins, the benefits of it had many applications, not least of which was extremely fast travel. By using this method of movement, he had easily caught up to his King's early departure by racing after him, traveling from shadow to shadow. That it was nighttime when he left the exit of Leviathan's abode was a lucky coincidence. It allowed him to travel at unbelievable speeds.

In the darkness, none were Lucifer's equal.

However, there was a problem, once he got inside the actual cave, that darkness became very sparing. He was lucky that he could shadowstep anywhere that he had a direct line of sight to a shadow, but when it was so bright that no shadows existed, what then?

Well, he would have to quickly move through the light, hoping that no angels spotted him.

Lucifer was a lucky demon, however. Angels occasionally passed through the halls, but having not seen a demon inside their sanctuary since the dawn of time, they had grown complacent. Even in groups of two or three, they merely chatted with one another, oblivious to their surroundings. The individuals were the most alert ones, but even they seemed to be lost in whatever thoughts angels that had lived for an eternity might have.

And thusly, Lucifer made his way deep inside the mountain.

As he went deeper and deeper, he saw more and more fantastical sights. A beautiful garden, filled with flowing water, green grass and flowers, and fantastical architecture crafted by the finest artisans among the angels. Rocks etched with precise linework, depicting ancient battle the angels had fought to preserve their way of life. At one point, he could have sworn he even spotted a single ray of sunlight, somehow coming through a hole from the top of the mountain, that landed on a sword stuck fast in a rock. However, as he was in a rush, he mostly ignored it.

Finally he arrived at the place no demon before him had ever seen or could have ever seen without his particular set of skills: The Gateway to Heaven. A portal created by magic of the old ages, which led to an entirely new dimension, one constructed by and for divine beings. One that transcended the known laws of physics, as humans later would come to call them.

Lucifer, hiding in the pale shadow of a giant underground oak tree, pondered his next move. He could see inside the portal, it was like looking through an open doorway. The portal led to some entirely pure white room, the composition of which he could not tell. While he could not get a good look, he knew one thing for sure. I would be lucky if there were even a single shadow to hide in, so omnipresent is the light in that room.

Lucifer steeled himself as he watched and waited. For hours, and hours, he sat patiently. He watched as the two cherubs that stood inside the portal, guarding the exit and entrance, stood watch, their arms crossed as they stared directly ahead. In that white room, there would be no way to hide from their gaze.

He considered his options carefully. In order to enter, perhaps I should kill those two, when no others are around. However, once the bodies are found, or their missing presences are noted, all of the gods and angels will go on a furious hunt to find me. I only have three unique abilities to use, and I should prefer not to show them unless absolutely necessary. There must be a way in.

As Lucifer pondered his next course of action, something miraculous happened; the cherubs changed guard duty with another being. A weak old-looking man swapped with them, and the two cherubim warriors walked away.

Interestingly, the old man instead stood on this side of the portal, not the inside of that white room.

If I could just create a distraction to make him avert his eyes for but a second, I could slip past into the holy room beyond that gate. Then I will be well on my way to completing the mission.

Lucifer glanced around, moving only his eyes. He spotted a small tree root at his feet, loosened, easy to toss and make a small noise. Perfect.

Just as he was about to reach down and grab it, when the corridor was empty, a voice spoke and made him nearly jump out of his skin.

"I suppose you've come to say hello, then."

Part 159:

As Lucifer pondered who that old man could be, one who appeared defenseless, leaning on an old gnarled cane with a long white beard, dressed in a grey bedraggled robe, a voice spoke out.

"I suppose you've come to say hello, then."

Lucifer's blood froze, as he heard the voice speak. That voice... it sounded like it came from the old man. W-was he speaking to another angel in the room? Aren't he and I the only two here?

Lucifer carefully and silently leaned the corner of his eye around the tree. Even someone with perfect eyesight would be hard pressed to see him.

The old man was gone. He no longer stood by the door.

As Lucifer's pounding heart slammed in his chest, the voice spoke again, this time from right next to him. "It is impolite to ignore your elders, young demon."

Lucifer yelped in fright as he whipped his head around and saw the old man standing mere feet away, his eyes closed in thought yet appearing to see right through him. He still leaned on his mangled looking old cane, a walking stick that appeared to have simply been pulled from a tree and neither shaped nor cut, yet was still essential for his movement.

"H-h-how d-did you see me?!" His nerves shot, Lucifer tripped on a tree root and stumbled to the ground. He quickly regained his footing and took a fighting stance.

"Are you a fool? I am the wisest of the angels, known as one of the three top archangels. I knew you were here from the moment you entered this sacred ground." The old man smiled, but it was not a smile laced with venom or hatred. It was a pure smile, showing love and sovereignty and possessing a simple, elegant purity.

As Lucifer stood there, his right fist clutching one of his knives at the ready, yet his whole body still shaking from nerves, his heart screamed at him if I fight this old man, I will not be the victor.

"Who are you?" Lucifer decided to try the direct approach.

"My name is not important. What is more important is the other question you should be asking. Why have I been quietly giving you openings and chances to arrive here at this gate by breaking up the appearances of angels as you traveled along?" The old man, his eyes still closed and a smile still on his face, waved a single finger in the air chidingly.

Lucifer paused. "You... allowed me to come here? To... what end?"

"It's simple. I wished to speak to you. You are either a bold fool, or a courageous idiot, to walk straight into the entrance of the enemy's lair, all by yourself, without so much as checking for traps. Did you really think it was so easy?"

Lucifer grimaced. He's mocking me. Those are the same things... "I'm here on a mission, and I will do anything to complete it."

The old man sighed as he pulled himself down to a sitting position, placing his behind on a slightly elevated tree root. He is sitting down? Is he deliberately giving me an easy opening to attack?

"A mission, hm? I suppose it could be anything, really. Perhaps you were sent to kill a top leader of ours. Maybe sent to conduct espionage or to destroy something important. Or... perhaps to even... steal something... "

The old man's eyes and face, still frozen in that same position as before, betrayed no emotion, but his voice did. He knows why I'm here. Lucifer thought to himself.

"How did you find out my mission? Who are you?" Lucifer took a step back as thoughts raced through his mind.

The old man shrugged slightly. "I hear words from these people and those, small tales pass my way, and rumors escape my lips. Naturally, when I 'accidentally' let loose one particular nugget, I realized this could unfortunately draw in some foolhardy youth, seeking respect from his elders. It would appear that I was correct in that assumption."

Lucifer could almost feel his lips snarling. This... was a deliberate trap? Set by this old man? Wait, perhaps he was working with Satan to eliminate me? No, that makes no sense, perhaps he let rumors of the dark orb slip so that Satan would send one such as me. Perhaps-

The old man chuckled softly. "You seem so quiet. You must have so many thoughts rolling around in that small, easily confused pea pod that you amusingly call a 'brain'. It must be difficult for you, to think harder than you've ever thought before in your life, and still have no idea what reality is."

Lucifer's tiny snarl became a large, nasty, visible one. "Stop playing word games! Why are you here? Why are you speaking to a demon casually? Why is an old man dressed in rags while living among angels and gods?!"

The old man chuckled again. "Ahhhh ha ha! There it is, the questions! I was waiting for those! Does it bother you, that I know more about this situation than you do? Does it bother you, that right now you are helplessly dancing in the palm of my hand?"

Lucifer glared at the old man as rage started to form in his eyes. "You little... mocking me, making fun of me... answer my questions, or I'll cut you down right where you stand!"

The old man's smile suddenly vanished and his eyes shot open as a dark aura suddenly sprouted out of his body. His voice was filled with venom and fire and brimstone. "You dare threaten me? One who has lived for ten eternities? One who has the power to foretell destiny itself? Even if I lacked the power to crush you myself, which I do not, I could summon an army of gods and angels in an instant with a single word. Know your place, you vile worm."

Lucifer's body involuntarily jerked back at the old man's sudden drastic shift in tone as he stumbled back and tripped on his own feet, stumbling out of the darkness and into the light. There were no angels around, and in fact no other life aside from himself and the old man, but out in the light he felt naked and exposed. "N-no offense meant! It was- it was a jest! Said in haste! H-haha...!"

The old man's eyes instantly normalized as did his expression. The familiar smile returned as did his playful tone of voice. "Splendid! I was worried for a second there that you were going to do something especially stupid! But it seems my fears were of no concern, you are brighter than most I have encountered!"

Lucifer climbed back up to his feet, his entire body shaking as he stood out in the open. I'm going to die here, and I never got close to finding that damned orb. I have failed everyone.

The old man sat and stared silently for a few seconds before finally getting up and walking past Lucifer towards the Gate to Heaven. "Stay here, boy. I will be right back. You may try and flee if you wish, but such an insult towards my generosity will only bring you a swift death."

As the old man left, Lucifer quickly darted back to the darkness behind the tree, where he felt safer. What the devil are these games this grandfather is playing with me? Why is he not killing me, if he is an angel or a god? And if he is neither of those, why is he living among them as an equal? Do angels and gods have their own forms of monsters, as demons do, that are neither angel nor god, but live among them as brothers?

After a while, nearly an hour, Lucifer was beginning to feel very nervous. The entire way to the Gate to Heaven had been filled with angels moving back and forth, yet for an entire hour, he had not seen even a single one moving around since after that old man's arrival. Something isn't right.

Just as he was starting to get itchy enough to consider fleeing for his life back home from whence he came, the old man arrived, walking out of the portal and towards Lucifer. In his hand, he clenched a small, pure black orb, that seemed to draw in the light around it, converting it into terrible and terrifying amounts of dark energy.

"Here boy, take this trifle, and begone. This dark object has disturbed the sanctity of Heaven for long enough. But be warned, if you take this orb, only madness and a dark future will await you. Nobody who accepts its power ever has a long life. Only darkness, misery, and death await them."

Lucifer stared at the orb, his mouth gaping as he looked at it. This old man had the orb the entire time? Who the devil IS he? And more importantly, why would he give it to me so easily?!

He quickly, but respectfully reached over and took the orb from the old man's hand. Best to not look a gift horse in the mouth, hehehe. "I thank you for your generosity, ancient one. Will you not tell me your name?"

The old man smiled and bowed politely. "No, Lucifer, that will not be necessary. Take the orb and begone. And... do not thank me. Possessing that cursed object is hardly worth thanking me for. Rather, you should curse me forever for heaping such a lamentable fate upon you."

Without waiting for a reply, the old man turned and walked back towards the gate, giving a flippant wave as he turned again and stood at the door once more.

Lucifer, not understanding why any of the events that just transpired even happened, waved back at the old man as he took his leave.

Raphael watched as the imbecilic young demon left, heading back up the way he had come from. The young never think before they act. This is why the demons will never pose a real threat to the angels... they are young and stupid, compared to our age and wisdom.

As the young demon disappeared from his sensory range, he sighed, leaning again upon his staff and hobbling back inside the gate. I think I'm going to go relax for a while. I've earned it with this.

Part 160:

Lucifer raced down the halls, running as fast as he could, the pitch black orb of darkness in his hand. While running, he realized that there was still not a single angel anywhere to be seen.

It's so strange, why have they all vanished? Did that geezer order them out of the halls? Perhaps there's something happening that requires their attention? Thoughts raced inside his head as he charged down the halls.

As he ran, a strange thing happened. He started hearing things, like a voice inside his head. The voice was strange, however. It took the form of male, then female, sometimes a child, sometimes an old person, it changed tempo and volume, pitch and speed, the voice was like a cacophony of people vying to be heard.

Finally, Lucifer erupted out of the cave, dashing down the hill as he shadowstepped into a nearby shadow, rushing through other shadows until he was a good distance away, before finally halting to catch his breath. His head pounded from the mental noise, as he placed the orb on the ground in front of him and he slumped down, crossing his legs in a meditative position as he paused to catch his breath.

A few minutes passed, as his breathing slowed, but something else was... off. He couldn't clear his mind. The orb was no longer in contact with his body, but still the voices remained. As he sat, they started becoming more clear and precise, until a female voice materialized in his mind.

"Who... are you?" The voice sounded young, like the voice of a teenage girl, but with a hint of a demonic edge to it. It had a sort of hissing sound, like she was sharply exhaling as she spoke, reminiscent of someone trying to speak after being stabbed.

Lucifer stared at the orb in front of him. Should I answer? Why not? "My name is Lucifer. And yours?"

"My name? It's... Sapphire. Just call me Sapphire." She sounded nice enough, which Lucifer found strange, given that she was a voice inside an incredibly evil looking orb.

"Alright, Sapphire. So... what now? I picked you up from an old man who claimed he was an archangel, but I know nothing about you. Is there anything I need to know?"

The girl seemed to mull his words over. "An old man? I don't know of who you speak. I don't even know where I am."

Lucifer found himself staring quizzically at the orb. She doesn't know? What the devil kind of strange joke is this? "Alright, so let's cut to the chase. I want to know how to use your power. Surely, as an orb of darkness, you can make me stronger somehow?"

"Huh? An orb of darkness? What are you talking about?" The girl sounded genuinely confused. "I'm just a normal girl. I was raised in a small village, I live now with my three brothers, though there have been a strange number of monster attacks in the area. Rumors say that there's a vampire on the loose, but my brothers have the divine protection of the gods, so they will protect me if that monster attacks."

Lucifer's jaw hung open as he listened. What?! What is this stupid girl going on about?? She's supposed to be inside this insanely powerful orb of darkness, how can she possibly think she's still alive?!

Lucifer took a deep breath and calmed his thoughts, as he responded to the voice that was speaking to him telepathically. "Okay, let us try again. You are a strange orb of absolute darkness that sucks in all light around it. You are clearly not some normal girl, despite whatever you might think you are. Do you remember anything that happened to you recently?"

The girl didn't reply for a half a minute or so, before hesitantly asking a question. "I'm... not alive anymore? I'm... dead?"

Lucifer frowned. "Dead? I don't... think so... you are speaking right now. I mean, maybe you're dead, I have no clue. You tell me!"

The girl seemed to be holding back tears as she spoke. "I... I can't be dead! My brothers, they would protect me! They always protected me..."

Lucifer frowned. "You are a disembodied voice speaking from inside a pitch black orb. I have no goddamn idea what you are. Stop playing games with me!"

"No! NO! I CAN'T BE DEAD! WHO KILLED ME?! WHY?! WHY DIDN'T SAM AND RANDOLF PROTECT ME?! THEY FAILED ME! NO!!!"

As the distraught girl screamed, a massive pounding smashed around inside Lucifer's head, as he reeled in pain. The orb grew darker and darker as she screamed, until a few seconds later, her voice was cut off. She vanished.

A new voice appeared in Lucifer's mind, as the pounding stopped. This one was a male voice, definitively demonic. "Ahh, what happened? Where am I?"

Lucifer reeled back in horror. He recognized that voice. "President Valac?! One of the 14 generals under Satan?! You... you DIED! 5 years ago!"

Valac quieted down. "Ah. So that's how it is."

Part 161: Valac

As Lucifer spoke with Valac, a mental image of his old friend's face began to form. He could at first see only a vague outline, but as the minutes crawled by and Valac's mind seemed to gain understanding of his current situation, he became less fuzzy and more pronounced. Soon, the face that spoke in Lucifer's mind was identical to the demon who had lost his life in the Great War some years earlier.

"I see. So we're losing this war now?" Valac lowered his gaze, seeming to look at the ground. "I had thought that eventually, Lord Satan would begin to prevail against the weak and simple-minded humans. I feel shame, knowing that I died during such an easy time compared to what you face now."

Lucifer nodded grimly. "Times are desperate. But... there is more. I found the secret to Satan's power, and because of what I discovered, in order to atone for my sins, Satan sent me to Mount Sinai, the location of the angels' home base, in order to retrieve this black orb."

Valac stared ahead blankly. His youthful expression belied his battle-scarred young body and all the years he had fought, not just as a demon who had evolved, but his fighting for survival as an imp. His special ability had been one that allowed him to find special treasure, the kind of ability that would normally lead someone to finding a rare artifact, such as the black orb he now resided in. It is a cruel irony that he is now sealed inside an orb that he might have been able to find with his powers before he died. Lucifer shook his head as he waved away the thought.

Lucifer hastily explained to Valac about Leviathan, how Satan had spared him, and his mission to find the black orb. Valac chuckled. "Hehehe... for a demon, you are remarkably pure hearted... and naive. You believe Satan did this for you to redeem yourself? He expected you to die, to be killed by the angels when you invaded their sacred grounds. This was anything but a chance for redemption, unless he expected you to redeem yourself by dying."

Lucifer stared at the orb and the face in his mind grimly, as thoughts swirled inside his head. "So... Satan wanted me to die? Then... I will likely never be trusted, ever again... even if I should return."

Valac grimaced for a second. Sheesh, this guy is way too nice to be a demon. I should let him off easy. "Look, kid, let me be frank. I don't know what my abilities are as an orb, and I can't predict the future, but anyone with half a brain knows that you will be betrayed by Satan at some point if you return. You simply know too much. If you go back there, you might as well sign your name in blood on a suicide contract, you get me?"

Lucifer nodded. "Then... if I cannot return, what can I do?"

Valac pondered it for a moment. "I'm not sure, but the first thing that springs to mind should be simple. Don't! Don't go back. Instead, strike out on your own. Together, you and I can gain our own power. We can help our people in the shadows, where we belong. Satan probably thinks you're dead anyway, so he'll do some sappy sad ceremony, yadda yadda, and then replace you. But you'll go on living your own life. Given time, anything could happen. What if Satan dies? Maybe you could even replace him as leader!"

Lucifer jerked his head up in alarm. "R-replace Satan?! No... no! I couldn't do that! Diablo would crush me easily!"

Valac mentally smacked himself in the face. "Boy, you're a real dim one, ain't ya? Look, you said yourself that Leviathan boosted your evolutionary abilities all the way to Satan's level right? That makes you practically equal with him! And Satan is WAY above all the other demons, so that means you are too! Who better to lead the demons if Satan passes, than one who is his equal, who is a literal agent of the darkness, and who possesses some fancy dark orb?"

Lucifer turned from the orb and stared ahead blankly at a tree. "Your words... they have truth to them. Now that you mention it... perhaps Satan sent me away to get killed because he feared my power... if I'm as strong as you say, then it could result in a humiliating defeat for him."

Valac nodded. "Yes, now you get the point. So you would be perfect to take over for him if he dies!"

Lucifer grinned. "No... no... don't you see? I was his equal before I left. But now, I have you, and if I can just learn to harness your energy, I can easily crush Satan and take over as the Demon King. Then we will move on to other things, like erasing the angels and the gods from existence!"

Valac's face turned deathly white. "Uh, no, that's a bad idea. Very bad. I like you, okay? But I still respect Satan. He may have gotten his power through illicit means and he may have lied to our people, but I understand why he did it. Satan is a brilliant leader, and we need him to lead us through this war, until we have crushed the angels, and beyond."

Valac paused, as a sneer appeared on his face. "Besides, no offense, but as strong as you are, even if you used my power, I don't think you can beat Satan. I fought him in a mock battle once. He didn't even use brute force, he outwitted me a hundred times over, it was a crippling embarrassment. You may be a red-skinned demon, but you're too green, kid. You'd never beat him as you are now."

Lucifer stared back at the face in his mind. "You think so, hm? I think... you are wrong. I can beat him. I can defeat him."

Valac grimaced. "Cheh! Fine, go ahead and try. But don't ask me for help. I won't give you any. I refuse to give treasonous aid to one who would harm my king."

Lucifer ground his teeth together. "I... don't think you understand the position you're in. I'm not asking you to help me. I'm going to take your power, whether you want to give it to me or not. I am the master, and you are my servant."

Valac stared up numbly at Lucifer, as his eyes filled with greed. He bit his lip as he looked away. "...Yes. I thought so. You're not half the demon Satan is. Do what you must then, I wash my hands of it."

Lucifer quickly clamped both hands on the orb. "Shut up! Give! "

He concentrated intensely, as he felt dark power flowing from the orb into his hands and through those, into his body. He quietly started laughing, and the volume increased as more and more power flowed into his body.

" Yes! With this power, I will RULE over the demons! Ahhh hahahaha!!! "

Raphael stood inside Heaven's domain, sipping a strange brothy mixture, staring into a pure white orb of incredible brilliance, as a spectacle unfolded in front of him. The young demon who had so casually taken the Orb of Death was now transformed into a greedy power-hungry monster.

"As I expected." He muttered to himself. "The young are always foolish."

Part 162:

Lucifer leaped through the shadows, as the sun beamed down overhead. It was late day now, and he was quickly drawing near to the 'fortress of evil', as it had been nicknamed by its residents. Not exactly a brilliant name, but if it works, it works!

As the fortress was buried in the side of a mountain, in a vein similar to the angels' and gods' mountain entrance, it was a particularly well fortified and guarded place. A siege would take forever to complete, and for some reason, their location either had not been discovered, or the angels and humans were simply too fearful to attack.

Lucifer shadow-walked the last bit of distance towards the gate, and appeared directly in the middle of the doorway, his appearances causing one drowsy guard to scream in terror and fall to the ground. "Ah! Y-your nastiness, Great Lucifer! I beg forgiveness!"

Lucifer nodded down at the tiny imp. If I were leader, he would not get his rations for the day. "Get back to your post, and stop slacking or an evolution will be hard for you to find."

The imp nodded quickly. "Y-yes, your evilness! I-I will return to my duties at once!"

Good. Lucifer thought to himself. They are scared of my power, as they should be. I am truly mighty now, thanks to the power of this orb.

Lucifer glanced down at the orb. Valac's presence in his mind had gone completely silent since he took the powers of the orb earlier. He couldn't tell if Valac was still in there, or if he was simply giving Lucifer the silent treatment. It is of no consequence. Once I best Satan in battle, he will have to acknowledge my power.

Satan kicked his feet up at the table, as one of the female demons cooed in his ear. He turned to her and leaned in for a kiss, but was swiftly rejected. "Ah, Belial. Your beauty increases with every evolution. I am truly impressed by how much more attractive you appear every time I see you."

Belial, one of his uniquely evolved minions, smiled at him and giggled. "Oh, Satan, you're always such a charmer! But you'll have to work a little harder than that to get a taste of what I've got to offer!"

Satan licked his lips as he eyed her figure up and down. Before he could respond, however, the door to his private dining hall was wrenched open as someone on the other side kicked it open with a single smooth motion.

Satan glared in the direction of the door. "Who goes there? Why have you disturbed me?"

To his surprise, it was Lucifer that entered the room. Hmm? It seems the whelp didn't have the guts to enter the mountain after all, what a sh- WHAT?! He spotted the black orb in Lucifer's hand in the blink of an eye. How did that little shit get hold of it so quickly?! How did he get hold of it at all?!

Lucifer grinned at the expression on Satan's face. "Hello, Lord Satan. So nice of you to recognize me." He sarcastically emphasized the word lord, as if to mock Satan and pretend he was unworthy of the title. On top of that, implying Satan was of such a lowly station was a grave insult.

Satan's look of surprise quickly vanished as he quickly stood up from his seat. "You... I see you brought back the orb. Truly, I am glad for your return. With these, we can put the matter beh-"

Lucifer quickly interrupted him. "You tried to trick me, didn't you? I was able to slay fifteen angels, and I even had a titanic clash with an archangel, all to receive this orb. It boosted my powers by a magnitude of three! You are below me now!"

Satan kept his expression even. He fought with an archangel and lived to tell the tale? He might be lying, but then, I cannot be sure. And if he has the orb, he is surely going to be a tough opponent. Best to take this one slowly.

"Calm down, Lucifer. You seem to be angry about something. Why not have a seat? We can sit down and discuss this like mature demons." He beckoned at a chair next to Lucifer. Without even looking at it, Lucifer whipped out his hand and smashed the Demonstone chair into a thousand pieces.

It would take an incredible amount of force to destroy Demonstone like that. This youth is no joke. Satan kept his eyes level and did not even so much as glance at the shattered chair remnants. The other demon generals in the room quietly sipped their drinks, and Belial casually played with her hair, as she feigned boredom.

"I won't let you talk down to me. Not anymore, betrayer. You lie and cheat to boost yourself up, but no more! I challenge you to an Agni Kai! We will duel each other to the death, and the winner claims the throne of Demon King!"

Satan grimaced. He's... still a fool. He showed such promise in the beginning with his espionage and secrecy, but in the end...

Satan lowered his head. "I accept your challenge, Lucifer. But know this, I did not get to where I am simply due to raw power. The position of Demon King was won through hard work and sacrifice. There are days when it is a true burden. I believe that if you were to become the Demon King, our race would surely go extinct in a matter of months. With that being said, I will not allow you to destroy our people with your youth and inexperience. I will not lose, that is the one thing you can be sure of."

Lucifer grinned evilly as he licked his lips. I've already won. I've already won. I've already won. Three words kept replaying in his head, as he glanced over at the form of Belial. Soon, she and many others will be mine. They have wasted themselves on a limp-wristed fool like Satan. His conquests in the bedroom are nonexistent, just as his life will soon be. I've already won.

Satan waved his hand at the youth. "Tomorrow, at the break of dawn, we will fight. Now get out, I'm still the Demon King, and you are no longer the third highest, by my decree. Take your filth out of the caves, you will sleep in the cold tonight."

Lucifer paused for a split second, then grinned. "Weakening your opponent by making him stay outside for the night, heh. Very clever of you to use tricks as you always do."

Satan grimaced. "If sleeping outside for a single night would weaken you, I can already tell you will be no challenge at all."

Lucifer's grin faded, and he turned and walked out the door, slamming it behind himself.

Belial turned over to look at Satan. "Well, I thought it was amusing, at least."

Part 163: Honor

Lucifer and Satan faced each other. They were standing out in a meadow some distance from the Fortress of Evil, as millions of imps, scythers, and other such demons watched from the nearby hills, from hastily made platforms, from the air (A few could fly, but only the highly evolved ones) and other such places.

Whooping and cheering could be heard. To Lucifer's dismay, most of the demons were cheering for Satan, not for himself. Oh well, if they underestimate me, it will only make my powers that much more spectacular. Even Satan has no idea of what I am capable of.

Satan eyed the youth warily. Yes, he has become mighty, but I still have the upper hand in intelligence, and my newest special ability will likely give me the upper hand. I must win, at all costs.

Lucifer pointed at Satan with his pinky, a sign of great disrespect. "Today, you will die, and I will rule our people! I am more fit than you to lead!"

Satan scoffed. "You may have the power, but you lack the discipline to lead tens of millions of demons."

"Hah! DISCIPLINE?! More than 60 million demons have died in the last few months under your leadership! They are dying by the droves thanks to your weakness and inability to crush Hercules!" As Lucifer spoke, a tiny portion of the crowd started murmuring to themselves.

Satan glanced around. I need to start the battle and end him quickly. It is fortunate that he has not yet spoken about Leviathan, though he may be planning to kill me and take Leviathan's powers for himself, along with that orb.

"All right whelp, you've had your fun, now let's see if you are any better with your fists than you are with your weapons."

Lucifer's grin expanded mightily. "Oh, you will see, great leader. You will see."

The battle took off with a start. Lucifer, instead of charging head on, quickly punched the ground repeatedly, causing minor tremors in the ground, and causing it to split and heave all over the battlefield as irregularities appeared. More importantly, many spots of ground shot up, creating shadows where they blocked the sunlight.

Cheh. Smart move, and here I thought a sprawling meadow might give me an advantage. Maybe he's not as stupid as I thought. Satan watched warily as small shadows appeared here and there. Shadows didn't have to be big for Lucifer to transfer himself, they only needed to be dark.

In a flash, Lucifer disappeared and reappeared behind Satan, silently leaping forwards with his knife and stabbing at Satan's back. However, Lucifer was only fast when he transferred from shadow to shadow, which happened instantly. Out in the open, he moved at only an above-average speed.

Satan was fast all the time.

In the time it took for Lucifer to jump from his hiding spot, Satan had already spotted him and formed a plan. As the young one leaped towards him, Satan squatted down in a flash, scooped up some dirt, and whipped around, heaving it into Lucifer's eyes.

"Gragh!" Lucifer yelled in surprise as his vision blurred. Swiping wildly at the air, he scored no hits on his predecessor. But Satan did. Satan quickly reached around and punched Lucifer directly in the face, sending him flying into one of the earthen mounds he had created with his first attack earlier.

Lucifer hissed air angrily, and after a quick blink and rub, his eyes were clear again. "Always with the tricks!" In an instant, he disappeared again.

Satan quickly moved his hands around as he cast a hasty spell. It didn't need to do much, only distract the youth. Superior battle tactics had always been what won Satan his victories, not usually brute force.

Lucifer once again leaped from the shadows behind Satan, as Satan expected. So predictable.

Lucifer swiped at Satan's unmoving body again, but yelled in surprise as it vanished from the air. "A mirage?!" He quickly looked around but didn't see Satan as he continued flying through the air, flailing his limbs around.

"Under you." A voice said, as Satan erupted from underground, delivering a mighty blow directly to Lucifer's abdomen. The breath blasted out of his body as he went flying up at a crooked angle, and then smashed into the ground. He panted and wheezed for breath, but out of the corner of his eye, Satan charged at him on the offensive. Satan grabbed one of his feet, and before Lucifer could respond, he was smashed around like a child's toy.

WHAM! WHAM! WHAM! Satan smashed him from the left to the right and back to his left again, as he left a crumpled mess of a demon lying on the ground. "It is over. Surrender now and I will spare your life."

Lucifer coughed weakly as he lay on the ground. "No... y-you will not defeat me and let me live in shame... I won't allow it!" Suddenly, Lucifer, who had been holding the black orb tightly in his off hand the whole time, cupped it with his right hand. " Power!! "

Instantly, his wounds healed themselves, and within a couple seconds, he was standing fully upright again.

"All right then, dear leader, I've gotten a good grasp on your abilities. Time for me to get serious."

Part 164:

Lucifer grinned wickedly as he stood once again, trembling with power. In the blink of an eye, he raised his hand up, quickly casting a spell, as a strange black fog flooded the lands.

Shadows were everywhere, and the audience was having a tough time seeing what was going on.

Lucifer vanished, then reappeared, then vanished and reappeared, over and over again. He began moving so fast that Satan was having a tough time seeing where he had just appeared. Suddenly, a punch smashed into Satan's chest as Lucifer shadow-stepped while moving, his hand hitting Satan at nearly the speed of sound. The WHUMP was muffled due to Satan's chest strength, but the impact was not. Satan went smashing backwards, tumbling end over end unceremoniously until he came to a stop on his back.

He started to get up, but Lucifer appeared underneath him, using the shadow Satan's body itself cast on the ground. In a flash, he wrapped his strong arms and legs around Satan, and started squeezing hard. Pinning Satan's arms and legs down, he squeezed so hard that in a flash Satan's limbs made horrifying snapping sounds as he screamed in pain.

Belial and the audience watched in horror as Lucifer squeezed Satan tightly enough that his very being seemed to shatter.

And then, something odd happened. Lucifer started to scream instead, as his own bones started to break. He quickly let go and shadow stepped away, falling to the ground. "A-ah... you... bastard! What the devil just happened?!"

Satan, still lying flat on his back in agony, forced a smile. "Hehe, 'pain transfer'. It's not even a high level technique. You made prolonged painful skin contact with me, so I transferred it back to you. Now we're both in bad shape... hehe." Satan coughed and spit some blood out of his mouth.

Lucifer grimaced as he quickly used the orb again, once more healing his body. "What now? You're broken and I am not."

Satan laughed weakly. "Go ahead, try it. I have a surprise in store for you, if you've got the guts to attack a defenseless Devil with broken arms and legs."

Lucifer narrowed his eyes. A bluff to be sure. He can't even cast spells as he is now.

He instantly disappeared, reappearing next to Satan's body, as he reared his hand back to smash it into the ground.

Satan's weak and pathetic looking smile disappeared, as a massive one overtook his face. "Heh heh heh, young fool, you played right into it. Game over."

In the blink of an eye, an invisible hand smashed into Lucifer's face, sending him reeling back. Suddenly, more invisible attackers pounded him all over, some from the front, some from the sides, each blow feeling like he was being smashed with iron rods.

In the span of three seconds, his body was pummeled, beaten, and masticated over fifty times. And out of nowhere, the blows stopped, as he reeled back and fell to the ground. Satan rose up, as he appeared to float in the air without actually moving his broken body.

"I never wished for this to happen. You were third under me, a top general. You've led many battles and won through brute force, always killing from the shadows. A top agent, to be sure. But now, look at you. You can't win against me. I possess the ultimate attack, and the ultimate defense. My final trump card."

Lucifer gasped and wheezed as he lay on the ground. He had dropped the orb while being beaten, it lay only a few feet from his hand. But to him, it may as well have been a million leagues away. His arms were twisted in unnatural directions. His legs were snapped in half, his face beaten beyond comprehension. His breath came in ragged gasps.

"H-how? I... had... power... to beat you..." He rasped weakly, as blood trickled from his mouth to the grass his face pressed against.

Satan shrugged. "What good is brawn without brains? What good is all the power in the world, if you lack the wisdom to use it properly? You were destined to lose, no matter what. You were not even close to being a strong opponent. In fact, you were the weakest I have ever faced."

Satan leaned in close to Lucifer, his body still hovering stiffly in the air somehow. "And make no mistake, you were unworthy of what Leviathan gave you."

Satan quickly righted his stiff body upwards. "The battle is over. Farewell, Lucifer."

In a single instant, another invisible blow came from nowhere, the power ten times what the previous ones were. It smashed into Lucifer's head, crushing his skull instantly. His brains exploded and bits and pieces flew all over as the crowd roared with delight.

Lucifer, the third General of the demons, was dead.

Part 165:

Satan floated in the air, as he gazed down at the badly mutilated corpse of his former disciple. This wasn't just a waste, it was a damned tragedy, losing one with such a hopeful future as him. Satan scornfully mourned the passing of Lucifer for a few moments, and then he turned around to face the crowd.

"I hope we've all learned what happens when you not only disrespect me, but our entire race of people."

The crowd silently nodded quickly, not wishing to speak.

Satan glanced around. "Belial? Where are you? I need to be healed, since my arms and legs are broken."

Belial cheerfully hopped up towards him. "O~kay! But..." She leaned in close and whispered in his ear. "...I want to know what he knew that made you have to silence him. Deal?"

Satan rolled his eyes. Women, such troublemakers... but she has much potential, unlike... that corpse over there...

"Very well. I could just order one of the other healers, but since I like you, why not come to my bedchambers tonight, and I'll tell you all about it?"

Belial sighed. "You men, always only one thing on your minds. But this time, I don't mind! I will consider it a fair trade." She waved her hands around while muttering some unheard words, and Satan felt his body gently mending itself. Unlike the other healers, she was the best. She had full control over her healing ability, and could jam the broken pieces together cruelly, or mend them together sweetly and softly.

Satan sighed with relief as the frankly agonizing pain left him. "Tell you what, Belial. Throw in a backrub, and I'll let you keep that blackened orb over there. My body is very stiff from that fight."

She shrugged. "I don't really want it. It's pretty icky and not that fun looking. BUT, since it's a present from you, Lord Satan, I'll accept~!"

She walked over to it, picking it up daintily as a quick expression of revulsion and disgust washed over her face, then passed as quickly as it had appeared. "S-such a fine gift! I will.... treasure it..." Her voice hinted that she actually thought it was nauseating, but then she never was one to get her hands dirty.

She walked back over and locked her arm around Satan's, giggling as the two of them walked away.

Before they took ten steps, Satan turned his head back around. "Bael. Go clean up that stain on the lawn. It's unsightly."

"Ooooh, that was pretty good. You must have a lot of experience~!" Belial quickly put her clothes back on and stepped out of bed as she tossed her hair back. "I did my part of the bargain, so it's your turn!"

Satan, lying on his stomach, jerked his thumb at his back. "The backrub, if you please. I'll explain it as we go along."

Belial smiled prettily. "You really are a devil." She climbed back on the bed and perched herself on his rear as she started to rub. "So, what was so important to hide that you wouldn't even spare Lucifer? He was your 3rd in command, you know."

Satan groaned heavily as her fingers dug into his thick red skin, softening up his tight muscles. I can't imagine Heaven being much better than this. "Well, Lucifer stumbled onto something he shouldn't have. I really wouldn't even be telling you this, but you're not a nitwit like he was, so I know I can trust you."

"Aww, that's so sweet of you! But Diablo is your highest ranked officer below yourself. Can't you even tell him?"

Satan shook his head lightly. "No. I will someday, but for now, the truth needs to be hidden. Telling you this will give you a lot of power, but that is okay."

Belial eyed him curiously as she delicately dug her fingernails into his back. "What makes that okay?"

"It's simple. If I am a king, then I should have a mighty queen by my side! The humans do it, and I should too!"

Belial broke into an explosive laugh. "Hahahaha!! The humans?! They have to mate with each other to have children! Demons come from the underground broodmothers, who spit out imps hour after hour! What good would any bond of matrimony do to you other than split your power?"

Satan hesitated. "Belial... hypothetically... what if I were to be killed by an angel, or a god, or Hercules, as an example? What would happen to the demons if there were no backup?"

Belial stopped her rubbing as she leaned forwards and rested her chin on her arm, lying on his back. "Well, I suppose it wouldn't matter to you, since you would be dead... but it would leave the demons in disarray, and Diablo would have to step up as King."

Satan sneered. "Exactly! And you and I both know, he is a tough demon, but he is inferior to me in power and intellect. No... I need someone more reliable."

Belial nodded. "All right, I see where you're coming from. So what does any of this have to do with the secret that Lucifer learned of?"

A grin spread across Satan's face. "Belial, it has everything to do with it." He carefully got up to a standing position, as she climbed off him. Putting on his royal regalia, he turned to her again. "Come with me, I have something important to show you."

Part 166:

The demons around the table listened quietly as Satan stood over the War Table, explaining the plan to them.

"We're going to take the fight to the angels. As long as Hercules has his human pawns, we stand no chance of defeating him in battle. But, if we can at least destroy the angelic threat, or reduce their fighting strength significantly, we can turn our losses around."

Satan beckoned to his new queen, as Belial stepped forwards. The others at the table had been shocked at first, but now they had accepted that Satan simply had some special ability that granted him immense powers, and somehow he was able to grant those powers to another. Even the accusations of treason by the deceased Lucifer would not deter their loyalty to the king.

Plus, they could barely pull their eyes away from his queen. Belial had grown fantastically more beautiful, and with her recent evolution, she had become even more humanlike and sensual to the eyes. Plump breasts, long flowing blonde hair, and a tall slender body. However, under her facade of beauty, the evolution had also increased her cunning, and her ability to manipulate. She had evolved into a unique race, known as the High Vampire. Unlike lower vampires, she did not require blood for sustenance, though she did gain more power based on how much blood she took in.

Belial smiled, as she leaned over the table, holding the black orb in her hand. A mental image formed in everyone's heads as Valac appeared. Gasps were heard all around as he looked at each one of them.

Bael in particular, was intrigued. "Valac, as I recall, you died more than four years ago, during the Eighteen Day Siege. What black magic is allowing you to appear to us from beyond the grave?"

Valac somehow shrugged in the minds of his listeners. "To be honest, I have no idea! But hey, if I'm dead, at least I can still be alive somehow inside this orb!"

Bael nodded as did the others at the table. Satan spoke next. "Valac has told me some incredible information that Lucifer relayed to him shortly before he challenged me to a duel. After Belial and I went on a little... trip..." Satan glanced over at Belial for a split second and grinned, as she did too, before he flicked his eyes back. "...We found that the orb somehow possessed the soul of our dear comrade, and given that he despised Lucifer's betrayal of our kind, he has graciously told us everything Lucifer told him."

Valac nodded. "Yes. More importantly, it's about the angels. Lucifer, always the liar, claimed he slayed fifteen angels and battled an archangel. That was not only a bald-faced lie, it was a strange one, given that he told me the truth. As I understand it, he was given the orb which I reside in by an... old man. A strange old man who lived among the angels and gods."

Satan sat down in his chair, and beckoned for Belial to sit in the chair next to him, which she did, as she set the orb on the table. "There's more. Lucifer was able to get inside the mountain, and he discovered a magical gate that seemed to lead to an entirely different world. As I long wondered, the angels don't actually live inside the mountain, and neither do the gods. They simply hid the portal to their real base inside Sinai. What this means is that if we invade their base, we can cripple them from within, without allowing Hercules a chance to retaliate with his human armies." Satan almost shook with glee as he explained the plan, but he kept his voice neutral.

One of the younger generals at the table, spoke hesitantly. "My liege, we all know the angels possess fantastic powers. You alone could certainly destroy many angels without our help, but... even the strongest general among us might not be able to fight equally with just one angel, let alone a god. How could we possibly beat them?"

Satan shook his head. "I don't think you understand, young one. We will not win a major victory. We will likewise lose a great many troops, just as the angels will. Millions of our imps and demons will die. Millions. Our forces are 35 million strong, only because of a crushing defeat we suffered to Hercules and his army a few days ago. But, we have an advantage the angels and gods do not."

Bael leaned forwards intently. "Oh? Now this sounds interesting. What might that be?"

Belial giggled. "Reproduction!"

The other demons at the table blushed as Bael leaned back. "Oh. That... was not what I had expected."

A grin spread across Satan's face. "Indeed, reproduction. Thanks to a... source... I have learned that angels cannot reproduce. Gods can, especially those born of the titans, but their reproduction is slow. This is the real reason I have deduced that they use humans. Humans are expendable. Angels are finite. They can continue to throw humans at us all they want, but losing just one angel hurts them greatly."

Satan leaned back in his chair as he slumped down. "This... this battle will decide the future. As long as a core group of demons survives, we can greatly devastate the angels, weaken or cripple the gods, and live to fight another day. By burrowing into the Earth and hiding ourselves for a time, we can expand our fighting numbers quickly. If need be, we can attack the angels again. But eventually, with the angels gone, our only obstacle will be Man."

Bael cackled as he slapped the table. "Gwahahaha! Satan! You have truly outdone yourselves! Of what use would a pure human fighting army be? Without their precious Hero, humans have no ability to fight at all!"

Laughter rippled around the table, but Satan held up his hand and it quickly died off. "No, you underestimate the humans too easily, Bael. Hercules is a once-in-a-generation Hero. We lose to him every time we encounter him on the battlefield. But more importantly, he is a half-blood. He possesses the immortality of the gods, or at least a bit of it. He will easily live for another hundred years, and possibly forever, unless we can kill him off. And even if we do, another may take his place. Humanity... they were no threat at all in the beginning... but I feel that if given time, they may someday be our equals. We have to kill them off before that happens."

Bael stared ahead stonily. "Do you really think humanity could ever pose a threat to us? What can weak little fleshbags do against an army of monsters?"

Satan spoke quietly now, as his eyes darkened. "You won't understand it until you've seen what I've seen, Bael. Humanity is a parasitic lifeform that feeds on other life. If we don't eradicate them, they will eradicate not only us, but the angels too."

Bael nodded, as his gaze lowered.

Part 167:

Zeus glared down at the old man in front of the throne. "Raphael, I find this hard to believe, but I've heard from some very reliable sources that you gave aid to the enemy. You gave them a weapon of considerable power."

Raphael yawned as his eyes glazed over. "Mmm. Indeed I did. What of it?"

Zeus quietly grinded his teeth together. "You... I know you are considered the 'wisest' among us, but that was fairly stupid, don't you think?"

A sigh escaped Raphael's mouth as he stared off in the distance. Other angels and gods in the great throne room continued to pretend they weren't listening intently, but anyone could see they were. "My lord, why should you be worried about it? Hercules will, at this rate, eradicate the demons within the next couple of months. You may not be aware of the origins of that orb, but I am. It will make Lucifer go power-hungry and mad with lust for the throne. Once he destroys Satan, he will lead the demons blundering into many battles, making their defeat that much swifter."

Zeus eyed the old man carefully. "You... as the wisest of the archangels, I'm surprised. I'm mostly surprised you expected that weakling of a demon to win in combat against the most battle hardened and highly evolved of their kind. I'm even more surprised that you don't know he was already defeated, even killed, by Satan."

Raphael jerked his head towards the throne. "Hmm? He's dead? But... how? Compared to me, he was weak, but he was highly evolved for a demon. Combining his evolutionary powers with the orb should have made him unstoppable."

Zeus leaned backwards in his chair, resting his body heavily on it. "Nay, he lost decisively. I'm shocked you weren't aware of this... don't you possess the counterpart to the Orb of Death? It should have given you the details of their battle."

Raphael shrugged, as he sat down cross-legged on the floor. "I was too busy to bother watching."

"Too busy? You mean you were too lazy." Zeus groaned as he debated what could happen next. "And we have another issue. With Lucifer dead, Satan undoubtedly has the orb in his possession. But ever since Lucifer's death, the plant inside the Demon's fortress has gone quiet. I don't have any ability to see what plans they're cooking up next."

"Haa... I guess this means maybe you gods and angels can finally stop calling me the 'wise one'. I'm not as wise and all-knowing as you seem to think." Raphael sighed again as he stared into the distance. "But even with the Orb of Death, even if Satan took every drop of its concentrated power, he'd never be able to defeat the greatest of the gods and angels combined. He's still no threat, and we can bleed him out over time with the humans."

Zeus nodded thoughtfully. "Yes, that would seem to be true, at the least. You made an error, but it appeared to be a small one. Hercules will still be killing millions of demons at every battle. This one loss will not have long term consequences. However... don't do it again." Zeus waved his hand as he dismissed Raphael. Raphael stood up slowly and slightly bowed. "Thank you, King of Gods. I will be going, now."

As Raphael took three steps away from the throne, a messenger cherub flew towards the throne room. "My lord! King of Gods! The demons, they are assaulting Mount Sinai!"

Zeus quickly stood up from his throne. "What?! Assaulting us directly?! Those damned fools! We'll show them the power of Heaven!"

Raphael froze mid-step. By the gods, this is what Kronos warned Gabriel of.

He quickly turned back to Zeus. "My liege! Let us temporarily free Gabriel from his detention! He will be able to aid us!"

Zeus sneered. "No! We do not need help from a traitor! We will easily crush the demonic hordes!" He turned to the angels in the room. "Quickly now, all angels to battle! Rally our troops! We cannot rely on the humans in this holy land!"

While everyone else let loose a war cry, Raphael felt a deep cold wash over himself. It is as I feared... this is the worst situation.

He quickly righted himself. I must tell Gabriel, I care not what the King of Gods does to me.

Part 168: Battle For Heaven

This is it. The most important fight of our lives. This will decide who controls the fate of Earth.

Satan charged behind a wave of millions of demons, as they screamed and raved, tearing through the passages of Sinai. Already, they had killed twenty angels in a flash who had gotten in their way. The meager number of guards for this place, assumed to be impregnable if not undiscoverable, were insufficient for a full-scale demonic invasion.

Demons poured all over the floor, the walls, the ceilings. Skittering and clattering about, making a deafening noise as they charged forwards, a mass of hatred and revenge-seekers coming forth to destroy their eternal oppressors.

Satan did not smile, he did not laugh. This was no time for either. He would lose a lot of his people on this day, but in the process, they would cripple the angels forever. To stalemate a battle so they might win the war? A simple choice.

" Charge! Kill all who get in our way! Kill the weak ones, the generals will take on the real threats! " Satan bellowed at the top of his voice. His words may not have been heard or understood, but their intent was. Kill them all, even if it costs you your own life.

Within a few minutes, they had already arrived in the main room that held the Heavenly Gate. A thousand angels had prepared a spell of mass annihilation. As the demons began to swarm into the room, an archangel at the front, Uriel, opened his mouth to give the order. Fire.

But he was unable to. His head slowly fell from his body, as Satan appeared in the shadow behind him, his arm transforming into a battle scythe as it detached the archangel's head from his body. In the blink of an eye, a mighty archangel was felled before he had the chance to react.

Shadowstep. An ability that Satan had consumed from the corpse of Lucifer. One of Satan's most potent abilities had been awakened by Leviathan. The Unique class ability, Consume. The ability to take the powers of any foe he killed in battle. As a result of his last meeting with Leviathan, his powers would only now truly begin to awaken.

Satan, the Great Devourer, as he would be called after this battle.

As Uriel's head fell, the other angels jerked back in alarm at the sudden appearance of the demon in their midst. In a flash, Satan had unleashed his mightiest ability, the Ultimate Attack, knocking many angels out of their spell-stance, or killing them outright.

Feeble, I expected more of these holy beings. Satan grimaced as he dashed forwards, spinning his body like a horizontal cyclone, and plowing right through the center of an angel. The angel's body, now having a gaping hole in it, collapsed to the ground seconds later.

As Satan killed more and more angels, he began to feel more powers inside his body. Interesting, perhaps if I kill some more strong ones and quickly adjust to these new powers, this won't be an actual stalemate today.

After the thousand angels in the room were brutally killed with minimal losses, Satan quickly charged through the portal to Heaven, and his minions began flowing through it as well.

In the room they had entered, it was pure white. No shadows existed, as the light appeared to come from every surface and ceiling and the sky as well. The light was impossible to shadow-step through.

But Satan didn't need it. Using the invisible limbs he had grown, which enabled him to fight opponents with the elements of surprise, he found himself propelled around by his limbs, allowing himself to move unnaturally and unexpectedly, which helped him confuse and overwhelm his opponents.

As his minions entered the room, quickly filling it up with their kind, they continued racing outside of it, to the great empty white expanse of heaven.

All around him, he saw clouds. They looked to be unsuitable for walking on, yet he was surrounded by a few million angels, with scatterings of gods and demigods here and there. They walked or floated, all of them spread out in a circular fashion. Satan grimaced. There's more than I expected.

"Charge! Today, we bring an end to the evil angels that have wrought so much pain on us!" His minions roared with delight as they charged out of the exit and through the small door, resembling the fast pouring stream of a faucet that would be invented millennia later.

The battle was intense. The angels were able to harness their combined power to keep blasting weakened, yet effective versions of Gabriel's holy light attack, slaying dozens, even hundreds of demons for each wave they fired. Yet, the angels were beginning to weaken. Their seemingly infinite numbers were depleting rapidly, as were Satan's minions. He was busy fighting with the god of thunder and thus could not keep track of the numbers, but their numbers were reaching near parity.

Thor grimaced as another mighty blow from Satan caught him off guard. Invisible arms, maybe ten of them, they can pass through sometimes and other times they harden. Truly impossible to deal with. Thor bellowed as heavenly lightning shot down at the speed of light towards Satan. However, the light was so bright that for a split second, it made a shadow appear behind Thor, which Satan shadow-stepped towards. The lightning missed completely, but Satan did not.

In a flash, he brought his knife around, plunging it deep into Thor's back, directly into his heart. Thor gasped, as Satan spoke. "Unworthy." With a quick wrench, Satan twisted the knife, splitting Thor's heart in half. Yanking it out quickly, Satan moved on towards a female goddess, Diana, leaving Thor to fall forward, his body slumped in death.

Diana, the Goddess of the Hunt, wielded a mighty bow that could shoot arrows at incredible speeds. Before she could nock her first arrow and aim it at Satan, he quickly used his newest stolen power. "Lightning, thunder, hear my cry!" With a massive blast, powerful lightning rained from the sky, smiting Diana in an instant.

Satan quickly looked around, noting the troop disparities. He still held a 1.5 to 1 troop ratio advantage, but it had been nearly 7 to 1 in the beginning. As he had first expected, it would not end so easily.

The battle had dragged on for hours, and now he could see that a group of his top generals were fighting a massive god, one who moved at truly godlike speeds. Only one could keep up with him at all, and that was Belial.

She was definitely losing though. Belial fought Zeus, the King of Gods. Zeus had the ability to move at the speed of light, as best as Satan could tell. He moved so fast, it almost appeared to be a variant of shadow-stepping. However, he was a massive target since he was at full titan size. "If that fool had an ounce of sense, he'd have shrunk himself down and condensed his power. He must think himself invincible."

Satan had already figured out who most of the combatants were on the battlefield. By stealing the powers of the ones he killed, he was also able to steal a portion of their recent memories. He could, in a flash, identify the major gods and demigods at a glance, as well as a goodly number of angels.

Where is Gabriel? Satan wondered to himself, as he used his invisible appendages to blast forwards at Zeus. It seems strange that he would not be here, unleashing his cosmic power on us. What sort of trickery have they in store for us?

Before he could get to Zeus, a challenger leaped in front of him. A massive demigod, one he had seen far too many times as of late.

Satan sneered at the being in front of him, one almost exactly the same size as himself. Hercules.

Part 169: Fated

Satan stared ahead at the man before him. Physically, he appeared to be 35 years of age, but as a demi-human, looks could be deceiving.

A terrible bright yellow aura rippled off his body. And... in his left hand, he held a fantastically bright orb. "Devil, leader of the demonic race, this will be as far as you go today. I will put an end to you, and kill all of your kind."

Satan eyed the bright white orb. "The Beacon of Life, eh? The gods must be serious about this to trust a mere demigod with it. Even with its power though, do you think yourself invincible?"

The demigod's eyes narrowed as his jawline set itself. "Not invincible, but strong enough... strong enough to kill you."

Satan chuckled quietly. "Kukuku... a child playing with a weapon he knows nothing of. But you know... I've already defeated a wielder of the Orb of Death, do not think that this will be enough to stop me."

Hercules twitched, as he suddenly rushed at Satan, his right fist moving with uncanny speed. Without saying a word, his punch smashed into Satan's jaw, sending him spinning rapidly as he tumbled sideways through the clouds. Hercules charged again, this time pulling out a flail with a spiked ball and chain attached. He swung it towards the spot that Satan was at, but missed as Satan's invisible limbs pulled him out of the way. To Hercules, it appeared almost as if Satan had simply been yanked out of the way by an invisible force.

He quickly glanced around. Does he have an ally with telekinesis nearby?

Before he could finish the thought Satan righted himself with an odd movement, and dashed towards Hercules, his body erratically moving left to right, as if being pulled along by multiple unseen forces. Hercules yanked back his flail and swung it around himself in circles, but it was a slow and clunky weapon, easily evaded by the swift demon.

The demon lord once again called thunder down from the skies, as the blast arced itself at the metal flail in Hercules' hand, causing him to drop it and stagger back in pain. "Bastard!" Hercules quickly shook it off though, as he healed himself using the Beacon in his hand.

The devil pulled himself towards Hercules, one of his invisible limbs grabbing onto Hercules and causing the man to stagger forwards as something unexpectedly gripped him. What the hell was that?! Hercules swiped at the weight on his shoulder, but his hand passed through whatever was there.

Satan grinned evilly as his eyes flashed red. What's this? The Hero seems to be confused! He jammed another of his limbs into the ground, as the one attached to Hercules yanked the demigod at Satan with tremendous force. The movement caught Hercules off guard as he stumbled forwards. Before Satan could get close enough to finish off the youth, an arrow blasted into his own chest, causing Satan to stagger forwards in pain. Hercules grabbed into the ground, jamming his foot down to stop his momentum.

He quickly glanced backwards to see Diana, the one he had thought he killed in a single blow, nocking another arrow as she aimed at him. However, now that he knew it was coming, the instant she fired the arrow, one of his limbs intercepted it in midair, smacking it harmlessly out of the way. An expression of shock passed over her face. "Mother of Hera! How in the gods-?!"

Satan quickly turned back to Hercules as his hands cast a spell, granting defensive autonomy to two of his invisible limbs. They would protect him from threats without him having to do anything else. It's okay, eight more limbs is still a large number to fight with.

He glanced down at the arrow rammed into his gut. She's a worthless shot, she missed my heart by inches and only nicked a lung, I can still fight with this. If she were a demon of mine, I'd behead her for being so pathetic.

Satan had one small problem, however. He lacked healing abilities. Or at least, he had lacked them. One of the angels appeared to have a remarkably strong healing ability that he quickly discovered in his mind. Perfect. Using one of his immaterial limbs, he reached around, yanking the arrow out in an instant, as his regular arms healed himself.

A quick thought came to his mind, as his arm held the arrow, he gave it a light flick, sending it flying at Diana. In an instant, before she could even react, it impaled her in the head, killing her instantly. She'd better not get up from that one.

Hercules watched in horror, as Diana was killed by a single stray thought from the demon in front of him. This monster! I have to defeat him, at any cost!

Hercules pulled a rock out of his pocket, a small thing, weighing only a few ounces, just big enough to fit into the palm of his hand. With his unbelievable strength, he hurled it at Satan's chest. The rock flew forwards at three times the speed of sound, bridging the fifty foot gap or so in an instant, but it somehow was deflected by something unseen, flying off to the side, missing Satan by inches, and smashing through the cloud cover in the distance, ending in a resounding BOOM.

Satan chuckled. "Is that it, boy? Throwing rocks? Swinging your big chain around? A bit of punching, even? You're just a big strongman brute. Even your colossal strength, far dwarfing mine, is no match for me if you can't hit me with it. What is with you strong-man types and never using your head?"

In the blink of an eye, Satan was in front of Hercules, as the demigod gasped in surprise. He tried to rear back to swing his fist, but his strength suddenly vanished, as something appeared inside his chest, ripping his heart out before he could even see it.

His heart floated in front of him, in midair, as he fell to his knees.

"As all of them have been, you were unworthy." Satan sneered as the youth slumped in front of him.

Hercules, feeling his last moments were upon him, did something unexpected.

He laughed.

"Ha... haha... you demonic fool... kuh... haha... I am the first of many. The ritual is already complete... when I die... my spirit will pass on... I will haunt you even in death... kuh haha...."

Satan grimaced. "Laughing at me as you die, eh? Enjoy the chuckle. I'm going to kill your daddy now."

With a single movement, Satan crushed Hercules' head in his hands.

The first Hero, savior of mankind, wielder of the Sacred Light, Hercules, was dead.

Part 170:

Zeus watched in horror, with his incredible perception of time, as his son was completely and utterly defeated by Satan. He had always warned his son that he fought best when he had his troops with him. The powers that he had made him invincible against lower intelligence foes, and his special ability allowed him to direct and command lower minded humans, but without his troops, he was only 1/10th the fighter he could be.

His son's head was crushed into a bloody mess, and suddenly, something horrible happened, all of the demons at once started coordinating their attacks like never before. While they were being felled left and right before, and now the troops were scaled 1 to 1 ratio, the million or so troops left on the angel's side suddenly started falling at terrifying rates, as the demons started moving in a completely coordinated manner... almost as if...

"Hahahaha!!! So THIS is the unique power your son held?! The ability to mentally link with all troops that were under his command!!" Satan cackled maniacally, as his troops started magically evading blows they shouldn't have seen coming, stretching their limbs around in ways that defied the imagination, and suddenly completely dominating the battlefield.

"What in the name of the Titans is this heresy?!" Zeus bellowed, as fifty demons of assorted types leaped at him. In an instant, using his incredible speed, he beheaded all of them, but he was mighty, ten tiers above his regular troops and even the few remaining archangels and gods. They had no chance.

He gasped as three powerful demigods were torn to shreds in front of him, in less than a second. The demons almost seemed to be in a blood frenzy, so great was their power.

"Th-this is... a total rout?!" Zeus watched in horror as hundreds of angels were being butchered every second, and the demons were suddenly taking next to no losses. Satan grinned evilly at him.

"It's my win, you disgusting fiend." Satan reared up on his invisible limbs and launched himself at Zeus.

And suddenly, chaos.

A massive blast of light erupted from the back of the battlefield, far off in the distance, as Gabriel's titanic form suddenly appeared over the horizon. It completely killed a hundred thousand, perhaps two hundred thousand demons in a single blast. Zeus gasped as he witnessed the awesome power of the Holy Beam of Heavenly Destruction.

It passed through the forces of the light, but de-materialized the forces of dark at the atomic level. Even if they had the ability to regenerate from a single remaining cell, nothing was left. It wiped them so cleanly off the face of the universe, one would be hard pressed to prove they had ever existed.

Satan's breath caught in his throat as he once again bore witness to the colossal power of the Cosmic angel. Ordering his troops with reckless abandon, he ordered them to attack the archangel at once. If they could kill him, the battle would surely be theirs.

Even as his minions charged at Gabriel, who was preparing another massive blast, the angels and gods could scarcely land a single blow on the demons that totally ignored them, so great was the new power Hercules had accidentally gifted to the demons.

Gabriel, still charging the attack for another wave, realized the demons would be upon him in seconds. He would not have enough time to charge it and fire at them. Just then, he heard a voice in his mind.

Fear not, brother. The forces of justice shall win on this day.

From high in the sky, a massive dragon, a creature of the light appeared. It was the holiest angel, converted into his purest form. Michael. The Divine King. In his purest form, he possessed power equal to, and possibly even rivaling that of his counterpart, Gabriel. He could only maintain his form a short while, but unlike Gabriel, he required no charging times for his attack.

"Dragon's Cleansing Flame of Heaven!" Michael blasted a huge wave of light energy out of his mouth, eradicating several thousand troops that were nearly on Gabriel in one shot. An instant later, he fired again, after taking a deep breath. Each time he fired, he seemed to absorb the light throughout all of heaven into his very soul, causing the whiteness of the place to dim for a second.

Satan staggered back as he gasped in horror. Damn! This battle is not winnable, even now!

At that instant, Gabriel's shot was ready to fire. He grinned as he targeted the Devil himself. "Goodbye, Satan."

BOOM!

A blast of holy light, moving too quickly to perceive, shot at Satan. He was instantly destroyed, so quickly that he almost seemed to vanish before it even hit him.

His minions screamed in horror, as they scattered in disarray, easily being picked off, one by one. His generals, seeing their leader had gone to the void, quickly gave the retreat order, fleeing heaven.

Within a few minutes, it was all over.

Zeus collapsed to the ground, staring at the horrifying mess of bodies of demons, angels, and gods all around him. "Can this... be called a win?"

On that day, over 5 million angels and gods were slain. 34 million or more demons were also slain.

Thus ended the War for Heaven. But which side had won? Even Zeus and the archangels could not figure it out for a long time.

Satan gasped, as he reappeared outside the portal, back in the entrance of Mount Sinai. "Great ghost of sin! That was a close one!"

Barbatos nodded. "I watched through your eyes as you commanded, and pulled you back at the last second. They will surely think you dead."

Satan nodded. "Get the others here too. Start with the highest ranking officers, especially Belial and Diablo, and then work your way down. Quickly!"

His senior demon grinned. "My liege, you must think me stupid. I already did. Look behind you!"

Satan gasped as he whipped around a hundred of his best generals were alive, but...

Satan paused. "The Beacon of Life! Did we recover it?"

Belial grimaced. "My liege, it was my duty, but... I was engaged in combat with Zeus himself. Forgive me, but I was spared no chance to obtain it."

Satan nodded. "It is fine. It was a secondary objective. We completed the main goal. Now let's get out of here, before they have a chance to find out that I am alive."

The others nodded quickly. They had lost more than 99% of their entire military, but that was fine. In fact, it was their plan the entire time. As an added bonus, their leader, chosen by the Hand of Death that guided the monsters and demons of the world itself, had gained far more power on that day.

They would be back, and next time, they would not be able to lose.

Part 171: Aftermath

Zeus breathed heavily, as his heart slowed down. He rubbed his forehead, but realized his hands were covered in blood. He was smearing the blood of fallen comrades and enemies all over himself, but in the end, he did not care.

He stared bitterly at the friends and comrades he had lost. Truth be told, having only recently ascended as King of Gods, he did not know most of them, but he knew some.

And... Hercules... Zeus fought back tears as his son, the most powerful demigod he had helped create, lied on the ground, his head crushed in such a way that he would not have been identifiable if Zeus had not witnessed his death personally.

Zeus numbly walked over to his son's body, bending down and cradling him in his arms. "M... my boy... I..." No longer able to contain his tears, he silently wept as warm liquids came pouring out of his eyes.

This is so unfair. I can't... I can't call this a win... this was a draw, at best...

Gabriel, now shrunk down to Zeus' size, also stared numbly at the battlefield. Michael had already reformed himself in his normal angelic form and left, not wishing to gaze upon the devastation any longer. Gabriel looked around but could not find Uriel, the King of Justice. Ah... right. He was in the vanguard. He was supposed to obliterate the enemy before they could even enter the portal. Their arrival here would mean that... he was likely slain.

Naturally, with millions of bodies, they would not find his for a long time, but since he did not appear to be among the remaining thousands of angels and gods...

Gabriel heaved a large sigh as his shoulders sagged. Thousands. That's how many were left. There had been millions, before. Kronos was right. Gabriel thought to himself bitterly. We should have sealed the Gate to Heaven. We left an open door for them to invade us.

He glanced over at Zeus and saw the Titan sobbing his heart out, with the body of his son in his arms, a gory mess covering his entire body. Gabriel felt his stare waver as he couldn't bear to look. A private moment must not be interrupted. We have all lost someone... on this day.

The cleanup would have to wait. The angels and gods that remained, a few thousand at best, crammed themselves into the largest room of the main palace, barring the throne room itself: the great Dining Hall. It was a massive room, made of marble, gold, and silver, as all buildings of Heaven were. It was covered in fine art, rich tapestries, and one of the walls had a massive bookshelf that contained thousands of scrolls, written by angels, archangels, gods, and demihumans alike, all for the purpose of remembering the history of the universe, as it were.

But nobody in the room cared about the fancy tapestries, or the beautiful varnished furniture... they all sat in the rows of the tables, staring ahead blankly. They did not require sustenance, but they usually enjoyed the taste of food, as it were.

Today however, Zeus and Gabriel, still the same size as each other, sat across from each other on opposite sides of the room, as the remaining denizens of Heaven gathered together to discuss what they must do next.

Gabriel broke the silence. "My liege, great god, Zeus. I regret saying this... I regret it with all my being. There is something that I spoke of with Kronos, shortly before his passing. Something of monumental importance. In fact, it was so important, that I dared not say it during your trial that you gave me, for fear it may leak to the demons. But it appears my efforts were futile. The demons discovered the information I held somehow. I know not how, but they did."

Zeus felt his temper flaring, as the memories of his son came rushing back. "...Information? Explain. " His voice was very non-subtly tinged with anger, as fire seemed to shoot from his ears. "If you know something, you had better say it now."

Gabriel looked around at the remaining angels and gods in the room. Because I did not speak sooner, we suffered an overwhelming loss of life. I... don't deserve to even live at this point. "My liege, it is with regards to exactly what transpired today. Kronos explained an important truth to me, about why he never took steps to eradicate the demons, nor to give the humans an overwhelming advantage. And... this deals with the reason he forced me to stop your son from winning battles so easily..."

Zeus leaned forwards in his chair, resting his elbows on his legs, and his chin on his clasped hands, as he could feel his body starting to shake slightly with anger. " Go... on... " He bit the words off icily, clearly very angry about these late revelations.

Gabriel took a deep breath and began to explain.

An hour passed, and Gabriel concluded. "Thusly, we need the humans for their thought energy, but if the demons are truly defeated, humans will have no reason to fearfully pray to us, keeping us alive. Further, if the demons die, and we are the only beings left aside from humanity, they will grow to envy us, and eventually come to kill us... assuming the lack of prayers doesn't do the job."

Zeus sighed deeply, as he sagged back in the chair. "I... I can't be angry anymore. I feel.... nothing... nothing at all. If you had told me this sooner... perhaps we could have-"

The archangel raised his hand and interrupted. "No! My liege, I will accept any punishment for my actions. However, while this was beyond regretful considering the devastation we have faced, I feel it would have happened anyway. If the information had leaked fully to the demons, they might now be trying to kill the humans to further weaken us."

Gabriel paused to take a breath, and before he could respond, Raphael spoke from among the crowd. "My brothers, my friends, my dear king, if I may be allowed, I would like to offer... an idea."

Zeus slowly glanced down at the small old man speaking. "...Go on, at this point, your wisdom can only help."

The old man sighed. Again with the 'wisdom', when will they ever stop? "My liege, an idea came to me while Gabriel spoke... perhaps, a way to survive, while maintaining the status quo. We need to go back to doing what we did before. Even with Satan dead, another demon will take control, and they will eventually return. We still need humans to fight them, more now than ever before. I propose a bold plan, if you would wish to hear it."

Zeus nodded tiredly. "Yes, yes, go on. Just say it already." I wish to be gone from this place so I may bury my son among the fallen of Valhalla.

The man quickly nodded. "Yes, of course. As I see it, we absolutely must close the gate to Heaven, or relocate. I believe that we can work from the shadows, instead of out in the open. Instead of aiding mankind on the battlefield, we will help them grow to new powers so they may combat the demons themselves. We will forcefully evolve the humans via new types of weaponry, and try to create or teach new champions that will advance them forwards. We will do this without openly showing ourselves. But, we must also instill a new sort of worship among the humans, and this is where it gets tricky."

Gabriel leaned in, as he listened intently to Raphael's explanation. "We made a mistake, by trying to unite humanity together. We need humans to not only fight the demons, but fight amongst themselves. This way, they will not only keep the demons from expanding too greatly, but also develop new weaponry in times of peace. Further, instead of one shared religion, I propose breaking them up, making humans worship different gods and whatnot. By doing so, we will further divide humans, and this leads up to the final goal."

Raphael waved his hands dramatically. "Let's assume that somehow humans gain the power to kill all of the demons for good. If that were to happen, they would turn on us in an instant, if they learned of our existence. But even if they don't, with a single shared religion, and no demons as enemies, humans would quickly abandon their prayers to us, which would result in the death of the angels, even if not the gods themselves. By giving the religions meaning beyond slaying demons, we can incite holy wars to keep the population of humanity thinned, just as they thin the demons, and in doing so, we will not die out so easily."

The room grew silent as everyone quietly pondered his suggestion. He is so wise, some thought. A true leader uses wisdom to guide the angels. He should be at the right hand, if not the highest seat of the Gods.

Zeus paused, those same thoughts crossing through his head. "Cultivating new religions, split religions? It seems far-fetched, yet... I can think of no better solution, not even one that compares. Raphael, as always, your wisdom is overwhelming. I will overlook mistakes that you have made as of late. This is clearly the only solution that I can see working, unless any others here wish to offer their own ideas."

Obviously, no others in the room wished to contradict the Wisdom King. Raphael sighed. It seemed obvious to me, I don't think it's foolproof anyway, and it has one major downside, though it's best not to mention it right now. We need a solution, and fast. We'll work out the kinks as we go.

Zeus and Gabriel nodded as they both rose. Zeus raised his hand as he spoke. "All in favor, raise your hand, and say 'aye'."

The entire room unanimously agreed. The new goal, Project Revelations, was underway.

Part 172:

Satan quietly paced in front of his remaining few hundred minions and generals. Counting the ones he had left behind to guard the main fortress (who would inevitably be useless against anything but a small skirmish force of humans), he had far less than a thousand demons left. Luckily, the ones that remained were his most powerful generals.

We can easily replace the weaklings and poorly evolved ones over time. It's the advanced ones with high intelligence I'd hate to lose. Satan felt his eyes glaze over as he looked at all the remaining demons under his control.

"Let's get to it." Satan sat down on the floor, his back to the entrance of the fortress, as his other minions and generals sat facing him. "I have decided that we have two ways to proceed, and I need input on what you all think would be the best approach."

Diablo and the others nodded. "My lord, if it is your order, we will follow it no matter what."

"Good. So here is the first plan; we can simply hide underground, amassing forces for a very long time, and letting the humans evolve as they please. Over time, the humans will likely become indifferent towards demons, due to the humans' poor memory and short lifespans, and as they forget about us, they will focus on the angels above them. However, if we let humans kill the angels off, that would likely mean the humans are highly advanced and will be a major threat to us."

The lord of demons took a sip of some leftover blood wine from the pantries before he continued. "The second plan works like this; we still go into hiding, popping out occasionally to terrorize the humans, but only in small groups. Give the humans a threat to worry about, make them advance quickly so they can take out the archangels and gods themselves, but also try and keep the humans thinned out where possible so we still have the advantage in numbers."

Belial lazily flicked her eyes back and forth. "It seems a sound plan either way. However, the first idea seems very... boring. I love ripping human men limb from limb, after I have a bit of fun with them, you know?"

As he bobbed his head from side to side, Diablo nodded. "I believe the angels will be forced to go into hiding. They will likely close the Gate to Heaven at some point, likely very soon, so that their holy ground cannot be invaded."

"I agree." Barbatos chimed in. "The angels will be no threat to us for a long while, and if we hide underground, they will have no way to kill us. Our biggest advantage is that they hopefully think they've killed our commander off, so they may underestimate our remaining power."

As he listened to their thoughts, another idea popped in to Satan's mind. "You know... the angels and gods have their own domain, so why don't we try and find a way to make our own?"

Most of the other demons, sans Belial, seemed confused. "What do you mean? Is burrowing deep into the Earth and taking control of the underground not exactly that?" Bael spoke up for the first time.

"No, I'm talking about creating an entirely new 'space' outside of Earth. I do not know how the angels and gods did it, but..." Satan paused as a certain being entered his mind. "...I think I know of one who might have the power to help us create such a place."

Barbatos looked past his leader, at the outside world. "So it appears to be settled, then. We will, on occasion, exit the underground to terrorize the humans, but for the most part we will focus on increasing our numbers exponentially, and building a whole new space for our people outside Earth. Is that the gist of it?"

Satan nodded as he grinned. "Yes. We have suffered much. Even if it takes a thousand years, ten thousand years, or a million years.... we will win this war by way of attrition. Unlike our two enemies, time is on our side. We can afford to be patient and wait, but they cannot."

The demons cheered and whooped and hollered as they got up and went their own ways, to grab whatever they needed before they began burrowing into the Earth to create their new space.

As for their new space... it would later become known to humans, angels, and gods as Hell.

Part 173:

Satan and Belial stood together in the dark, as they faced their patriarch, the father of the demonic military's might, Leviathan.

Leviathan, now having a third person who knew of his existence (Though he had been informed of the killing of Lucifer) had seemed to be growing restless as of late. He tired of being stuck underground.

" ...Satan. For too long you have pretended to release me from this place. I have waited for over a hundred years as you failed to bring me proof of the excavation... and now you seek my power again? Do you think me a fool? "

Satan and Belial bowed before him. "My liege... I will admit that as of now, we have not taken any steps to free you..." Satan spoke hesitantly. "But, I realize now that I was in error to not do so. My people need your power now more than ever."

The great dragon rose up to his full height as he heaved a mighty sigh; black flames spouted from his mouth as he exhaled deeply. " Satan, I have given you vast powers, a keen intellect, minions to control, and the ability to fight and kill your oppressors. Yet still, you have not given me the one thing I desire. Why should I help you this time? "

Satan paused, as he thought of a hasty response. "I... have no real answer. I just need your power to create a safe space for my kind, in our own dimension of sorts. After that, I will be able to free you from this prison."

The dragon sneered. " Lies. Always the lies... I will do you one last favor. I will give you the power that you seek, but if you should come here again, if you should think of taking more of my power without holding up your end of the bargain, I will bring you a swift death. Now... take it and BEGONE! "

The dragon's eyes glowed pure white for a second as he transferred a miniscule amount of his power to the puny demons below him. Their bodies almost exploded, due to how much energy he had given. They writhed on the floor in agony, and yet eternal bliss, as their powers grew exponentially.

After a few minutes, they stood up again. Satan was now a High Devil, and Belial had evolved into something... wholly unseen before, completely unique.

They both quickly bowed, and thanked the black dragon. "When next we see you, we will be sure to free you. I promise you that."

The dragon waved his front paw at Satan. " Get out. "

Horses neighed in the distance, as the small child ran for her life. They killed mommy and papa, they're monsters!

It had been a few weeks since demons reappeared, ransacking her small village, as the militia were called into action to fight back. Swinging their swords and shovels, they managed to beat back the monsters, but at the cost of many lives.

The young child had managed to survive, but her mother was slain by a scyther, and her father had lashed out in anger, killing the demon with his bare hands. It was an unbelievable feat of strength that earned him praise from the village.

But without his beloved wife, the man didn't care. He only had his one daughter left, both of her brothers were at war with the people of the East, and the village was attacked daily by their raiders.

Babylon. A rising city in the north-east, which had seized upon several means of expanding its population and growing its military. They sent raiders, professional military units, and other such things to attack and cow the surrounding areas into submission.

One of those units had finally destroyed her home, and her father was slain in his bed. Only by hiding and fleeing had the child managed to escape their wrath.

Tears pouring down her face, she hurriedly raced towards a nearby mountain range, covered in tall grass and trees, a thick forest cover protected her from view. But the riders in the distance knew they had not killed everyone in the city. They had seen a single child escape, and their orders were to kill and burn everyone alive in the name of the great Nur-Adad, ruler of Babylonia.

The child fled as the horses drew near. They had to search with their eyes, as tamed wolves were not available to any yet but the rich and wealthy. The child cowered in fear as she reached a sheer wall of rock, her escape totally cut off. No... no they're going to find and kill me... just like they did my mommy and papa...

She chanced upon a strange spot in the wall, where a heap of rocks seemed to have been piled there in a pathetic effort to cover up a passageway. Quickly pulling them out of the way, her heart leaped for joy as she discovered there was a hole hidden there. Yanking the rocks out of the way, she climbed in, closing it up behind her.

The men outside were yelling something in their native tongue, one she could not understand. But she did notice that the voices seemed to be getting closer. Her small body easily fitting inside the large tunnel, she quickly made her way deep down inside, leaving the voices behind her.

It's dark... I'm scared... I can't see a thing! The girl thought to herself, as she quickly but carefully moved down the tunnel. It appeared to constrict the further she went, but her body was still small enough to fit. The voices were finally so distant she couldn't hear them any longer, but she still kept climbing down. I will likely be killed and eaten by a bear, but so long as it is not those demons or those people outside, I will not care!

Finally, she stumbled into what felt like a much more open room. She could see nothing as it was wholly pitch black inside the room, but her heart thumped in her chest. She was not alone.

"Is... is... someone... there?" Her voice almost cracked as she squeaked in a timid tone.

At first, nothing happened. Then she felt a quiet rumbling, as something ahead of her, something massive, seemed to rumble only a few yards away.

And then, that something spoke. A deep, thunderous voice, one that appeared to speak quietly, as if to match her volume, yet it contained an ominous edge to it.

" Hmm? You are neither Satan, nor Belial. Certainly not Lucifer. What is your name? "

The little girl, hearing this monstrous voice, yet not one filled with animosity, strangely felt her fear dissipate. "My name... it's Amelia. Amelia Greyheart."

Part 174: Innocence

Amelia stared into the darkness, wondering who she was talking to. Her eyes could not adjust to the total lack of light, but she could almost see a big beast of some sort shifting around, as if he were too large for this room.

"What's your name? I told you mine, so you have to tell me yours!" The girl brazenly spoke into the darkness, oblivious to the dark terror that lay in front of her.

" Kekeke... you would order me to reveal my name? I wonder, how fearless would you be if you knew my true form, hmm? " Saying that, Leviathan reared up and sat on his back legs, pushing his body up against the ceiling with his front. Igniting his eyes and reversing the flow of the darkness that poured out of him, he managed to brighten up the cavern around him ever so slightly, just enough for the child to get a look at him. " I am LEVIATHAN, the King of all Darkness, the last of the dragons of old! "

The little girl stared up at him in awe. "Wow! You're so big! Why are you living in this tiny little cave though?"

Leviathan, still reared up on his legs, paused. Hmm? Why is she not cowering in fear at my very presence? Why are her knees not shaking in fright knowing that her end is near?

" Child, do you not understand the situation you are in? You're standing there, asking questions of a mighty dragon, one who would surely eat you in an instant! "

Amelia stared up at him quizzically. "You will? Why haven't you then?"

Leviathan, about to retort, found himself unable to. Why? Why haven't I?

" I... you... you would not be much of a snack! I have eaten thousands of adventurers who entered my cave, looking for treasure, only to find their fortunes turn into misfortune, when they met ME! " Leviathan snorted, as a massive gout of black flame blasted upwards, hitting the ceiling and dissipating harmlessly.

Amelia plopped her butt on the ground as she sat in a cross legged position, fanning her skirt over herself to look modest, just as her father and mother had always told her to do. "Hmm. I don't know, this cave was kind of out of the way, you know? How have thousands of adventurers entered it when it's so hard to find? And if you ate them, what did you do with their armor and weapons?"

The dragon was silent for a few moments as he stared at the child. This one, she is not like the humans that I remember from before I was trapped, and certainly not like the ones Satan has told me of. There's... something about this one.

" Young one, how old are you? "

She pulled out her fingers to count. "I don't know, maybe um... nine or ten summers?"

The dragon quietly softened his glow as he rumbled to the ground again, the light in the cave vanishing once more. " I see. More importantly, why do you not fear me? "

Amelia giggled. "Why should I? You're down here all alone, all by yourself, with nobody to talk to. If you wanted to eat me, you would have done it already. I think you're just... lonely."

The dragon closed his eyes. " Lonely... perhaps. I've been in this cave for... a long time. I cannot escape, due to magic that holds me here. I have not seen another of my kind since the Great Cataclysm that sealed me here, tens of millions of years ago. Lonely... perhaps I am. "

The little girl's smile disappeared, as she got up to walk towards the dragon. He did not move as she stumbled towards him in the dark. She fell forwards, and her hand touched his nose. "Oh! I'm sorry! I didn't mean to-"

The dragon felt a strange emotion overcome him. " No... it is fine. I do not mind. "

Amelia put her hand back on his nose, then leaned in and hugged his face, her entire body barely stretching from one side of his nose to the other. "Do... you want to be my friend? Do you want a friend?"

The dragon stared at the child. " A friend? Why would you want to befriend a dragon? "

The girl let go and sat on the ground, mere inches from his mouth, filled with thousands of razor sharp teeth. "Well... it's not like I have any friends. Those bad men killed my papa. And the demons killed my mommy. But the angels gave the orders to kill... I... I hate all of them."

She stared down forlornly, as images of her papa's bloodied corpse came to her mind. She had watched from under the bed as the bad men impaled him with their long wooden spears. Papa had stared at his daughter under the bed, as the light left his eyes, and his soul left this world.

Leviathan stared at the little girl, who was totally unafraid of him. " If... if you want a friend... I will be your friend. "

Suddenly, Leviathan's ears perked up. A noise had appeared further up inside the passage she had come from. It sounded like many footsteps were approaching. Leviathan felt something boil up inside himself. Anger.

Those filthy insects wish to hurt my friend. This is... not acceptable...

" Go to the side of the room, child. I think the bad men are coming. "

Amelia watched from the side of the room, as ten men crawled in. Her eyes had somehow acclimated to the darkness. She could make out their body movements vaguely, though not very well. But strangely, she could make out Leviathan much more easily. It was almost as if she had somehow formed a bond with him.

The men whispered to one another as they entered the room. Their hands grasped the swords at their sides, but they seemed visibly unnerved.

Leviathan spoke to them, causing their bodies to go numb.

" Who disturbs my slumber? "

The front man, apparently the leader, croaked out in a language Amelia could only somewhat understand. "Ah! Monster! We not come for harm! We look for small child! No mean hurt you!"

The dragon formed a tiny smile on his face. " You think yourself capable of... hurting me? Amusing. But... trying to hurt my friend, the one known as the Princess of Darkness, a title bestowed upon her by myself... you will not escape with your lives. "

In a flash, his head shot forwards, and he chomped and bit at the men, allowing a single one to flee the hole. The others were eviscerated in an instant. Their bodies lay in pieces on the ground.

Amelia started to walk towards their bodies, but Leviathan stopped her. " No, child. This scene is not suitable for one as young as you. "

Amelia ignored him as she walked over to the bodies. "I've seen enough... killing. I'm glad. You killed them for me, didn't you? I hate these men. I hate them all! They killed papa! I don't want them to live!"

The dragon watched as the girl first appeared to be angry, and then kneeled down as tears flowed out of her. How dare the humans do this to an innocent girl. How... dare they...

" Child. Is there anything that you fear in this world? "

The girl shook her head.

" Death? "

She shook her head again, as she wiped her tears away.

" Pain? Torture? Demons? Angels? Humans? "

Again she shook her head furiously. "No! I'm not afraid! I just hate them! I hate them all!"

Leviathan chuckled quietly to himself. " Good. Fear will weaken you too much. I have an offer to make you. I would never make this offer to anyone whom I did not consider my closest ally. "

The little girl turned to the dragon. "What offer, Leviathan?"

" I wish to escape this place. Aside from slowly digging out a pathway big enough for me, there are only a few other ways I could escape, and almost all of them are blocked off by the seal on this place. But... there is one last way. "

The girl almost leaped for joy. "If I can help you get out, I'll do anything! We're friends so that means if you help me, I help you!"

The dragon smiled. " This is unique. But I know without asking that you would do it in an instant. You are truly... worthy. "

The dragon reached his paw forwards, leaving it a foot away from her. " If you wish to crush the humans, the demons, and the angels alike, touch my paw, and say the magic word. "

Amelia immediately reached over and touched his paw, giggling while she did so. "Okay! What's the word?"

Leviathan sneered as a brilliant grin crossed his face. " Merge. "

A small army followed the lone messenger who had stumbled into the palace screaming and ranting about a monster under a mountain. Being the only surviving member of his troop, the general of the local army immediately issued a command to go search the area and see if he had lied and stabbed his comrades in the back or if he spoke truth. The man begged them to not force him back, but he was forced to lead them back there.

For a full day, they scoured the area, finally arriving upon a small girl sitting in a small clearing, all by herself. The man pointed, terrified, at an opening behind the girl. "The cave! It's there! It's there!!!" He seemed to be almost going out of his mind, but the commanding officer kicked him in the rump and sent him falling to the ground.

"Shut up, worm!" He dismounted his horse and approached the little girl, his sword drawn and aimed at her. "Child, what know you of the cave, hmm?"

The little girl slowly stopped playing with a flower in her hand and looked up at the man.

"Oh, how delightful! Food!"

Part 175:

I sat on the ground and watched, as Cassiel and Samantha fought a group of monsters in the clearing ahead.

We've been traveling together for a couple months now, and we're now on a planet run by one of the dukes. It's a hellish world, made of dirt and rock, with a thick atmosphere and barely enough normal oxygenated air to breathe. Luckily, I had solved this by yelling "Oxygen!" at the top of my lungs to make the air safe enough to breathe. A bit of "Filter" and some other words, and just like that, I've practically terraformed an entire planet.

The surface itself though, it is a grim world. I've yet to see any life aside from skeletons that have been reanimated, zombies, orcs, goblins, and even a troll or two. The only life on this world is demon or monster life.

Samantha appears to be having the time of her life. She's incredibly strong, mentally and spiritually, but especially physically. I fashioned her a new weapon after she broke her whip within a week of using it. I think the new weapon fits her personality better.

It's a 14 foot long steel pipe.

She gleefully smashes enemies around, left and right, any who come within the dreaded 'kill zone' as I've started calling it... they die immediately. She almost seems to be treating the whacking off of heads from her enemies as a game of baseball. Let's see how far I can send their skulls flying! That's what her body language says.

As for Cassiel, well, let's just say I've discovered that she holds more power than I gave her credit for. At the end of every day, before we all go to bed together, I give Cassiel all my remaining spirit energy. As a result, she is now holding colossal amounts inside of her body.

She releases minuscule amounts of it at a time when she attacks. Her wings have turned out to be a huge advantage, acting as extra limbs that can pull her forwards or push her back to make attacks hit or miss as she desires. On top of that, when she wants, she can shoot beams of pure light out of her hands, which are very effective at slaying the undead monsters we've been facing so many of recently.

As a joke, I started teaching her how to condense light into a ball in her hands, hold her hands at her side, charge it up, and then fire it. It looks exactly like what you'd expect it to, but it's also incredibly powerful, even against non-undead monsters.

Between the two of them, Cassiel for ranged attacking and healing, while Samantha gets up close and personal, I don't actually participate in battles much. It's good training, especially for Cassiel, who seems to be secretly delighting in the deaths of her previous tormentors. Cassiel is one strange angel, you wouldn't think them to be the sort of beings who enjoy killing.

But that's the thing, isn't it? I've found myself thinking a lot more lately, and having a lot more time to do so, since the girls seem to be such a good team together. Something just isn't right. The fact that Cassiel was implied to not be a 'real' angel, and that she's a reborn human... I thought humans became angels when they died? That's what I was taught in church, when I was a child. Maybe there's more to it. I was also told that bad people will be sent to the pits of Hell, and that may be true... it's just that something always seems wrong, no matter how I approach it.

The other option is that only true believers become angels when they die. Maybe people that follow a certain faith? Perhaps those who attend church the most, or maybe those weirdos that go door to door? Heck, what if it's nothing like that, and it's totally random? Maybe they're chosen based on some latent attributes, like intelligence, or strength, or...

I glanced over at Cassiel....Chest size? That would be stupid. Why would god or some gods choose someone for a reason like that? Then again, I remember reading bible stories of angels that came to Earth to lay with the women of the land... and Cassiel clearly has a sex drive... maybe it's not that farfetched.

Meh, I won't get anywhere thinking about it, or by asking her about it. She seems tight lipped about the subject and never mentions the other angels, or her life before becoming one. One time I pushed too hard and she almost broke down into tears. I don't know what her life was like before she died, but it seems to have been pretty horrible. I'm beginning to wonder if... if perhaps she... committed suicide...

Those are dark thoughts though. I'm also having questions about other things. Namely Samantha. Cassiel seemed so traumatized about everything, and yet with just a little bit of time chatting with Samantha, she seemed to be over it, even moving on to... fun stuff. I just don't see how that happened. I can only conclude it was Samantha's doing, but to what end? Samantha, assuming she had some magical power like that, could have convinced Cassiel to stay away from me, and then Samantha would have had me all to herself.

Unless she didn't want it like that. There's also the curiosity I've felt about her motives... Samantha seems sweet and nice, but she seems to love killing things, far more so than Cassiel or I. Is that her demon side? As a succubus, I think I know a bit about them from the classes I used to take before I got in the cryopod. Succubus exist and thrive off the, erm, energy of men. There also exists the male form, which are called an Incubus. I have yet to meet one of those, but I'm beginning to wonder if anything I learned as a youth about gods, angels, demon names, all of those things... were all of them real? Was every world religion correct at the same time? Is there really no main overarching God?

There has to be. Nobody has mentioned him yet, but the other option would be the theory of evolution. I don't mean demonic evolution either (Which much more closely resembles mutation, I might add), I mean the slow and gradual alteration of a species into separate and distinct subspecies over a long period of time. If no creator exists, perhaps gods or angels were the first life to evolve, and they had billions of years to reach a high level of intelligence before other life evolved.

But that makes no sense. Why wouldn't they just destroy the new life? Boredom? They do get bored, and from what I've heard, gods, angels, and demons feel many emotions I would describe as "human-like".

I just can't bring myself to believe that all the fantastical elements of the universe evolved from nothing. There has to be a main God, a Creator, if you will. If I can just-

"...-ero? Are you even listening to me?" I jerked back as Samantha's face was smack dab in front of mine. Good heavens, she scared the life out of me!

"Huh? What?!" I jerked up to my feet, looking all around, as Cassiel and Samantha both stared at me.

"He's daydreaming again. Must be nice, just let the girls do all the fighting, and enjoy the view." Samantha rolled her eyes as she wagged her tail slightly.

"I'm sure whatever he was thinking about, it was important!" Cassiel, as usual, came immediately to my rescue. "Hero, we defeated all the demons and monsters! Aren't you happy?"

I nodded at Cassiel and smiled at Samantha. "Good job. Sorry, I was just... strategizing about what to do next."

Samantha feigned disbelief as she licked her lips slowly. "Mmm, I see. Well if it's like that, then I guess it doesn't matter much. It's getting late, so do the thing again."

I quickly pat Cassiel and Samantha on the heads as both of them smiled. "Great job today, girls!" Then I sighed as I aimed my hand at a flat spot nearby. " House. Bed. Chair. Chair. Chair. Table. Lantern. Blanket. Blanket. "

Instantly, a cute and quaint little house appeared a few yards away. This has become the new standard for our living. It's like a mobile home, except I can just make it vanish out of existence when I'm done.

The three of us entered, as I erected several layers of barriers and traps, just in case someone ambushed us during the night.

We put on a pot of tea, chatted for a while, and then we all went to bed together, as we've done for the last few months.

Life is pretty great right now.

Part 176:

I awoke in the morning as I usually did, with Samantha sleeping face down on top of me and Cassiel hugging my right side. I've grown used to it, but it's never any less pleasant. I don't know why it became a thing, but they both seem to like it and I can't say I don't. Another restless night, but I had still recovered my spiritual energy so in the end, it didn't matter much.

As usual, I slip out, carefully moving Samantha around without waking her up, and crawling out myself. I no longer bother casting 'sleep' on them though, since they both sleep like rocks. Maybe it's because they know that if something shows up, I'll just beat it to death, so they don't have to worry about it. Pff, must be nice having so few cares in the world.

I sit down at the table and think about the plan for today. I don't know whose residence this world is, only that a 'duke' lives here. Samantha seems to know who a lot of the high ranked demons are, but she always seems hesitant to appear with me in front of them. It must be bad blood or something. Hell, maybe she's on their version of a 'most wanted' list so she can't afford to be seen without leaving the demons alive. At least, that's the feeling I get from it.

We stumbled into this world by finding a door in the labyrinth that I sensed a lot of energy coming from, so there's definitely something powerful here. I assumed it was a duke, but it might not be. The energy seems to be omnipresent, it's all around me and I don't know where it's actually coming from. But as I travel in one direction, I do feel the buzzing increasing. What's more interesting though is that I am the only one who feels it.

After eating some food, I go outside and experiment as I usually do. Today, I have a new power I want to try out.

" Telekinesis! "

Alriiiiight, time to see if it worked. I aim my hand over at a nearby rock and try to move it with my mind. Nothing seems to happen. Use the force, Hero. I give myself a mental pep talk and try again. This time, I feel the rock start to shake a little bit. My excitement is so palpable!

I hold my hand up and try pulling the rock to me. It shakes, and starts crawling along the ground, very slowly. I concentrate, more and more and more.... come on, come on... suddenly, the rock BLASTS off the ground, flying at my hand, but it misses by an inch and smashes me in the face!

Luckily it doesn't hurt, but I do feel a bit foolish. What's interesting is this appears to be another active-use spell. I can leave it active all I want, but if I use it, I feel my spiritual energy drain ever so slightly. It's like a weaker version of push/pull, but it isn't a wave of energy that hits everything around me, so that is good.

A while later, as I'm playing around, I hear a voice at the doorway behind me. I had already detected her waking up, but I pretend to have not done so. "Morning, Hero. What are you doing?" Cassiel yawns sleepily. Samantha isn't awake yet.

I indicate the rock in my hands, I explain to her. "I tried using a new ability called 'telekinesis, it lets me move objects around with my mind." I feel a grin creep along my face, as I whip my hand back around towards her. "Like this!" I quickly pull her towards me.

She yelps but I catch her with my arm and she giggles. "You startled me! But wow, that seems like a useful ability!"

I smile and lean in, kissing her deeply. The passionate embrace lasts a second or two as we linger together.

"We don't spend much time alone together, do we?" She and I both sit down on the ground together as she leans her head over on my shoulder. I pause. "It's like Samantha's always there too, you know."

"Yes, but that's okay. Samantha is a kind loving girl. I see why you love her. And you love me too, because you have enough love flowing from you to spare for both of us equally." Cassiel closed her eyes as she yawned again.

I love Samantha, huh? Do I? Do I love Cassiel too? What is love, anyway? I spend time with them, I talk with them, I enjoy being with both of them. I suppose that's love. If we will be together forever or for a very long time, I'd like that. I suppose that could be love too. But I've never felt passionate about anything in my life. The only thing I truly want is to make sure no friend of mine ever dies again... like... Phoebe did. I feel my thoughts returning as I grow quiet again and dwell on the past.

Phoebe. She died because of me. While I immediately went out and had a good time the night she died, and I seem to be ignoring her death even now... I'm not. I can't bring her back, but maybe I can prevent Cassiel and Samantha from dying. I don't want that. I could never want that.

Cassiel and I sit and chat for a while before I feel Samantha wake up and come outside to join us. "I see you two are having a good time. Mind if I join in?"

After they eat some breakfast that I magic into existence, I tear down the shelter and we head out.

The buzzing noise is getting noticeably louder in my head. It's actually getting quite distracting.

As we walk along, with me following the direction the feeling comes from, I can feel myself rubbing my temples over and over. I am, at this point, permanently wincing. I've tried silencing the noise with various spells, including Silence, Deafen, Mute, Quiet, Halt, Stop, and many more, but nothing seems to work.

There's a big crater in the distance. It's almost like a massive meteor fell into it. Could this be what wiped out all life on this planet? Something like the meteor that killed the dinosaurs on Earth? The crater is fairly large, but not "Planet destruction" sized. It's maybe a half mile across the diameter, and it's very circular.

Once I spot the crater, I decide to increase the speed. "Hold on a second, girls." I wrap my arms around both of them, and jam my foot into the ground, propelling myself forwards with insane speed. Thanks to the powers I've received as God King, I could move this fast all day long and never tire, but the girls, as strong as they are, simply cannot keep up with my body's raw power. Samantha is actually very strong and seems to have a large energy supply, but she rarely uses it. Cassiel is comparatively weak but her energy dwarfs mine, mostly because she seems to have no limit to the amount she can store and I give her my monstrous leftover energy every night.

The crater was almost 5 miles in the distance, but I dash over there in about ten seconds. The speed is unbelievable. When we're just before the lip of the crater, I set the girls down. Samantha isn't too bad, but Cassiel seems fairly nauseous. I'd try to talk to them, but that goddamn ringing noise in my ear is unbearable at this point. I need to turn it off!

Samantha and I walk over to the crater and as we peer in, we both gasp.

Down inside the crater is something I did not expect to see at all.

It's a spaceship.

Part 177: Ship

The ringing is so insufferable at this point. It was like when I stepped towards the crater and my head passed the lip of it and I could see the spaceship, the ringing tripled in power. In fact, it hit me so hard in my brain that I lost my balance, tumbling forwards end over end for a few seconds until I smashed into the side of the spaceship at the bottom. The instant I impacted it, the ringing stopped completely.

My head suddenly cleared up, I shook it off and stood up. A fall like this wouldn't hurt me in the slightest. Samantha slowly made her way down the slope, and Cassiel, having picked herself up and shaken the nausea off, flew the short distance into the crater in the blink of an eye. Those wings are useful, I should get a pair for myself in the future.

"Hero! Are you all right?" Cassiel lands and runs up to me, looking me over quickly with her eyes.

"Yeah, a little fall like that couldn't possibly hurt this body made of iron. You know that!" I stick my tongue out at her. "But that being said, thank you for the concern. You two stay here, I'll check and see what's inside."

Samantha finally made her way down to the bottom of the slope. I thought for a second I saw panic on her face as she eyed the ship, but it vanished quickly. "Hero, you should be careful. There could be anything inside that ship... anything at all..."

I nod. "Like I told Cassiel, you stay here. I'll see what's inside."

Something is making me very nervous. I cannot sense what is inside this ship. There is a hollow, black void in my all-seeing sphere. Whatever's in this ship, seeing it may be a bad idea. The ship itself is probably a football field in size, counting the crowd sitting sections and whatnot. It's incredibly large, with a massive set of engines in the back, a thick tail section of the ship, which tapers down and narrows itself as it gets to the front, where I presume the pilot section is, and strangely it has no wings, it's shaped like a bullet. Thick at the rear, slim at the front.

As I make my way around it, looking for a door or something, I spot something that makes me gasp aloud. Directly in the middle broadside of the ship, there is a faded, but still visible insignia. And it's written in English characters.

G.E.F.

And just below that in smaller letters, a few of them are faded out but I can guess at their contents.

G-lax- -xpl-rati-n F--ce

Galaxy Exploration Force? Is this like a ship from Earth? More importantly, why are the letters in plain English?

As I walk towards the front, a familiar logo greets me. It's a flag, with stars and stripes. However, this flag seems to have more than two hundred stars. But with the appearance of the flag, it's all but confirmed. This is a human vessel.

After a while of walking around, one thing I notice for sure; this ship is not going anywhere. It's a mess. I can't find a door anywhere, but when I get to the front, I find what is definitely the pilot section. There's a large bubble window that's shattered and in pieces everywhere. This planet was originally very toxic, so assuming that this ship crash landed, if the atmosphere of this place entered it, that would have likely killed all the crew assuming they were unable to airlock the rest of the ship.

I step in and gasp again. This... this is unreal.

All around me are familiar looking things. I feel like I've seen this before, maybe on an episode of some old sci-fi TV shows. Bodies litter the floor, as I take note of old desiccated skeletons, bits and pieces of their original garments still being worn.

The interior is absolutely ruined. Their crash landing must have instantly killed everyone on the bridge, if the planet's toxic air didn't. The walls, covered with some material that I assume is a far advanced version of flat-screen technology, are cracked and chipped, likely non-functional.

I make my way towards what is apparently a doorway. As I walk up to it, I... hear something. On the other side of the door.

I carefully touch the door, and I hear a hissing sound as the door opens. Apparently the ship is still powered? How long has it been here though...

As the door opens, I almost jump back in fright. There's a human standing there, staring directly at me! Jesus Christ! The man raises his hand and waves. "Greeting: Hello, I am glad to serve you! Hello, I am glad to serve you! Hello, I am glad to serve you!"

Wait, hold on a second. That's not a human, it's... an android? It looks so humanlike that I thought it was a real man. But... he just stands there, waving his hand at me, as if he had just been reactivated and had a recurring bug in his system.

I walk behind him and he turns to face me, as he keeps waving. "Hello, I am glad to serve you! Hello, I am glad to serve you!"

This is getting kind of creepy. I decide to try speaking to 'him'. "Can you understand my words?"

The robot halts his greeting. "Response: Yes! I am fully aware of the words you speak!"

Oh? He's not bugged? Well, that's a good thing, I guess. "What is this ship, exactly? What happened to it?"

The android paused as he considered my words. Then he spoke. "Reply: This ship is humanity's one hundred and fortieth galactic exploration device! The crew of one hundred and twenty was sent on a mission to explore distant worlds, in an effort to bolster the war effort. As for the fate of the ship, only I managed to survive thanks to my very durable body. All one hundred and twenty crew members died as a result of the crash or toxic inhalation due to the planet's atmospheric composition."

This was a lot of information to take in. "Wait, you said to bolster the war effort. The war effort against... who?"

The android tilted his head to the side, in a mock expression of curiosity. "Response: Why, the Volgrim, of course. How do you not know about them?"

Part 178:

Scientists have estimated that in the Milky Way alone, there are over one hundred billion stars. If we count the 'local group' of nearby galaxies that are not expanding away from each other, that number explodes to 700 billion.

But as for the number of galaxies in the entire universe? We can only speculate. Each galaxy could contain hundreds of billions of stars, and the best estimate for the number of actual galaxies, in the observable universe at the least, is another hundred billion.

That means there are likely over a billion trillion stars in the universe. Humanity started on one tiny little dot.

And we thought we were alone? Of course we weren't. How naive.

The android looked at me. "Confusion: I am having difficulty processing the idea of a human that does not know of the existence of the Volgrim. Explanation: They are the scourge of the Milky Way galaxy. Humanity battled them for over a hundred years before this ship was sent on a mission to find an expansionary space to colonize."

I pause. "When did we start fighting the Volgrim? When did they first appear?"

The android pauses. "Error. That information is classified as Top Secret."

"Uh, okay, so how long have you been crash landed on this planet?" I guess if I can't get one question answered, I will try another.

The android's eyes appear to stare past me for a second as he pulls up the answer. "Response: According to my sensors, I have been crashed on this planet, awaiting a response to my distress signal for one-hundred-million, two-hundred-thousand, five hundred-forty-five years, nine months, seventeen days, and-"

I cut him off. "Alright, damn, I get the picture. It's been a long time then." My god, the cryopod really did hold me for a hundred million years? What the hell is going on then?

I turn back to the android. "It feels odd calling you 'android'. What is your designation?"

"Response: My designation is OMEN. I am the Original Mechanical Exploratory Neohuman. It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance." OMEN bows stiffly, and then pulls himself up. Strange, for an android, he seems to move and speak stiffly. Maybe robotics didn't advance very far in the future? Or maybe...

"OMEN, when did your ship initially launch to explore space? What was the date you started traveling from Earth towards this star system?"

OMEN paused as he calculated the answer. "Query: Why are you using an incorrect starting location? I was originally created and built and launched from the Mars Planetary Base, as most of Earth was in ruins due to the Volgrim's initial attack. Ignoring initial question: I was launched on the G.E.F. 140 at..."

OMEN stopped speaking for a second. "Error: Exact date is missing, due to corruption of memory data or due to tampering. However, the rough date was the 24th century, Gregorian Calendar time. Hypothesis: Due to the amount of time taken to respond to my distress signal, I can only assume you are the last human alive in the galaxy. Is my hypothesis correct?"

I shake my head. "No, there are millions of humans left alive. However, this is the first I've seen of anything resembling space-faring technology. All the other humans appear to be stuck in weird tiny planetoids or other such planets where they live in a perpetual medieval or bronze age."

OMEN paused again. "Query: Have the demons and Volgrim been eradicated from the universe as we know it?"

I shake my head. "No. In fact, I arrived at this planet thanks to a strange labyrinth with a door that opened up here as a portal on this world. The labyrinth is filled with demons and monsters."

OMEN nodded as he processed the information. "Dismay: I see. That would mean the demon-Volgrim alliance won out and humanity was crushed. This is very unfortunate. Query: How were you able to locate this ship without a transponder?"

I shrugged. "I felt a buzzing in the back of my head, it got louder when I walked this way."

OMEN halted all speech and movement and stared at me blankly for almost fifteen seconds. I was starting to get very nervous. Finally, he spoke up again. "Query: Are you... one of the candidates?"

Part 179:

"Candidates? What candidates? What are those?" I felt curiosity nibbling at the back of my brain.

"Response: That information is classified as Top Secret. If you do not know what the candidates are, you must not be a candidate." Great, this robot has a sense of humor. A joke if ever there was one. I'm pretty sure he just committed a logical fallacy too, but- wait. Hold on a second.

"OMEN, what would it take for you to declassify those documents so that I could read them or listen to them?" It was worth a shot.

"Hypothesis: If you were the sole remaining member of mankind, or could demonstrably prove that you were the highest ranked remaining member of the Earth Military, as set in the charter made before this crew set off to this planet, then I would be able to declassify those documents for you." OMEN nodded in the affirmative as he stared ahead blankly at me.

Damn. I stiffed myself by telling him that I wasn't the last remaining human. Better to try one last thing. I raised my hand at him. " Unclassify." A wave of magic left my body.

Instantly, the ship came alive. Multiple doors slammed shut in the distance, as did the door behind me. Alarms went off all around, as the ship blared to life, and red lights activated where before the ship had only been illuminated by sunlight from the distant star.

"ALERT. ALERT. SPIRITUAL ENERGY OUTPUT DETECTED. SHIFTING TO RED ALERT MODE. DEMON THREAT CLASS A+ IS PREDICTED BASED ON ENERGY LEVELS OF SCANNED LIFEFORM. CREW IS DOWN. REVERT TO AUTONOMOUS DEFENSE MODE. ALERT. ALERT." Jesus Christ! Holy shit!

"Wait no! I didn't mean it!" I held my hands up with the universal sign for I give up but the android in front of me ignored it. His pupils were red now as he shifted into autonomous mode or whatever. Not good.

And from the back of the ship, I heard an incredibly loud noise of doors flying open and... something approaching. Then it appeared as the last door opened.

A massive goddamn robot that took up the entire hallway, armed to the teeth. My escape route was cut off too! Not good.

That's fine, I'll just have to take control of the situation. I felt my mind thinking, as I rushed forwards. The robot blasted a barrage of laser fire at me, knocking me back off my feet. My body was tough, but I had reinforced myself many times over the last few weeks with layers of barriers to protect myself from projectiles.

Terrifyingly, these laser blasts shot right through my barriers, smashing into my skin and burning like I had acid dumped on myself.

All right, if it's come to this! " PUSH!! " A blast of energy surged out of my body, as the tightly enclosed space exploded all around me, sending OMEN flying towards the massive battle robot, smashing into it and falling into a crumpled mess on the ground.

"ALERT. ALERT. SUBJECT RECLASSIFIED. THREAT LEVEL S. INITIATE PURGING PROTOCOLS. MICRO-DREADNAUGHTS DEPLOY IMMEDIATELY. ALERT. ALERT."

Before I could even think to myself what the hell is a micro-dreadnaught?, a horrifying nauseating feeling surged over my body, as I stumbled and fell forwards. The armored goliath in front of me was hitting me with some kind of magic purging beam, I felt my Spiritual Energy draining at alarming speeds, and it was making it impossible for me to move, or really, do anything.

Just then, the side of the ship ripped off, as Samantha and Cassiel came to my rescue. Samantha had torn the metallic side off with her bare hands (holy crap she's strong!) and Cassiel was charging her spiritual light attack as I'd taught her. The instant a gap opened up and Cassiel spotted the robot attacking me, she fired. A spectacular blast of light SMASHED into the gigantic robot, blasting it into fifty bazillion pieces, as the energy beam on me cut off.

I stood up, gasping. "God-damn! Thanks, you two saved my life!"

Cassiel nodded curtly, no smile visible on her face. "I'm just returning the favor. But we have bigger issues!"

From the back of the ship, I heard many, many loud sounds coming. I don't want to know what those sounds are from.

I couldn't sense the inside of the ship or what was coming at all. But what I did know is that no matter how strong Cassiel, Samantha, or I was, we could not take on as many of those things that were coming as I could actually hear coming.

"Let's get the hell out of here!" I jumped forwards, grabbing the girls, burying my foot into the ground, as I slammed down with all my strength, jumping two miles in a single, swift movement. At the high part of the arc, I let Cassiel go so she could fly, and whipped Samantha around to hold her with both arms. This was not going to be a soft impact.

Just before we hit the ground, I had an idea form in my head, thanks to the Crown of Solomon. I aimed my mind at the ground, and quickly yelled. "Cushion!"

When I hit the ground, it felt like... landing in a pool of jello that quickly reformed itself and hardened. I whipped my head back as I set Samantha down. Behind us, way back at the crater, ten massive mechanical robots, clearly designed for serious war, were chasing after us.

Cassiel landed beside me. "They'll be here in seconds! What do we do?!"

I quickly searched my mind with the Crown. "I've got this."

I grabbed hold of Cassiel and Samantha's hand. " TELEPORT! "

Seconds later, we reappeared next to the portal, over 50 miles away. After entering it, I quickly turned back around. " Seal! " Just like that, the portal closed behind us, forever.

We all slumped to the ground, our nerves jittery. Samantha was the first to speak up. "You idiot. I warned you."

Cassiel had already calmed down. She seemed to have lost the nerves she had when I first met her. "You um... want to tell us what just happened there?"

Part 180:

I stared at Samantha intently, my eyes looking directly into hers. "You know something. Admit it."

She shifted uncomfortably on the ground. "Well, of course I do. I'm just... surprised you don't. You're only human after all. You seem to be wholly unaware about the Energy Wars."

Energy Wars? This is the first time I've heard about them. "What are the Energy Wars? We almost died because you kept your mouth shut back there. You need to tell me now."

Samantha sighed as she leaned back against the wall. The only light visible in the dark corridor was Cassiel's soft luminescence caused by her angelic aura. "Listen... we're an item, right? I don't like hearing you order me around. I haven't told you because it hurts to remember what... what happened back then. You know, humans and demons... we're supposed to be mortal enemies. The fact the two of us are even together... it's a big leap, you know."

Cassiel nodded. "I was there for the tail end of the Energy Wars. It was brutal. Those were the days when..." Cassiel cut herself off, before continuing on. "A lot of people died. Easily billions. Sometimes I wonder how I was able to be among the last members of the Resurrection Project. There were too many others who were worthier than me."

I felt myself quietly looking back and forth between them. What happened? How did humanity die? There was also what the android had told me. He said that by the 24th century, only a few hundred years after I was put in the cryopod, Earth was basically destroyed. It happened that quickly? Who were these Volgrim? How did they destroy the original birthplace of humanity so efficiently and so quickly?

I sighed. "Listen... if you don't want to tell me... that's fine. But... we could have been killed back there. If you care about Cassiel and I, you should tell us what you know."

Samantha looked around, clearly feeling uncomfortable about all of this. "All right... I'll tell you. But this carries a heavy penalty. If any other demons ever found out I said anything, I will be summarily executed. The Energy Wars are extremely secret, especially the finer details of how they worked. Most demons and humans had their minds wiped after those wars concluded."

Samantha paused before glancing at Cassiel. "I wonder why they didn't wipe your memories? I mean, you were a captive, right?"

Cassiel blushed as she looked down. "I don't know. After the war was over, I was there for a very, very long time. To say I lost track of the passing of time, that would be an understatement. I never thought I would see the light of day. They kept giving me tiny doses of thought energy, just to keep me alive. I just don't know why though."

Samantha got up and walked over to me, plopping down beside me and resting her head on my shoulder. "Well, in any case. I might as well explain. But you can't start with the Volgrim. You have to start at the beginning. The very beginning."

I stared down the empty corridor. "Well, it's not like we lack time. We're just three immortal beings, you know. Might as well hear the whole story."

Cassiel gracefully sat down next to me as we all leaned against the wall. Samantha spoke next. "It all started long before humans were ever a threat to demons, far back after the first great battle that started off the Great War between Angels and Demons."

Part 181:

Zeus eyed the drawing in front of him. "So these are the most likely successors of Hercules' power, hm? They don't look particularly strong." He traced his finger around each one lazily. "This seems pointless. There are plenty of blond haired young men out there. Any one of them could inherit the power."

Raphael nodded sagely as he carefully watched his king. "The ceremony guarantees that his power will transfer to another. However, the only criteria specified was that it had to be someone who resembled him, and who possessed a nature similar to his own."

Zeus cursed under his breath. "If only my son had heeded my counsel and had a successor. Just one child..."

Raphael waved it off. "It would not matter, my liege. His power does not automatically inherit to his own children, or their own children. Only someone with a similar nature."

The king of the gods set the drawing down below him onto the tiny table before leaning back into his large wooden chair. "What does that even mean, Raphael? What is his 'nature' exactly? Is it his looks? His personality? His birth as a demigod? His goal in life? It sounds like gibberish to me. Totally unreliable."

Raphael nodded. "Yes, but by being vague, we guaranteed that his power would always pass on. If we had gotten too specific, that would mean that it might not find a suitable host if and when he died, which would mean his abilities would be lost forever."

Gabriel, also sitting at the table, nodded quietly. "Even if we can't find the next in line, they will eventually show themselves. The Hero will always possess very unique traits that make him or her stand out in a crowd. If we keep our eyes sharp for one who is rising above the rest of the rabble, then we will easily find the next Hero."

Zeus perked up. "Hm? Did I hear you say 'him or her'? So even the gender is in question here? Do we have anything solid to look for?"

"To be honest, my liege, nothing. But more importantly, let's stop worrying about his successor for now. If the successor is found and killed, the power will simply transfer to another anyway. But in the meantime, the demons seem to have grown restless. They have reappeared, attacking villages and towns fleetingly, only to be driven back by the humans."

Gabriel pointed to the orb sitting on the table in front of him. "This is a globe of Earth. I constructed it myself by exiting the planet's space and entering the black void. I used magic to copy the exact landmass size, and positioning of every piece of soil on the planet. It's 100% accurate."

He indicated the city of Babylon with his finger. "These humans have grown mighty over the last few decades. They have a new leader who just assumed power, and he seems to revere the gods greatly. Nebuchadnezzar the Second, they call him." Gabriel, currently in his shrunken form, raised his head to grin at Raphael. "He's named, along with his father, after the Babylonian god Nebu, the god of wisdom. He worships you but doesn't even know it."

Raphael nodded quietly. "Naturally. We're all worshiped by one name or another among the various religions out there. If I'm not called Nebu, or Raphael, I'm called Athena or Metis, or some other name. Get on with it."

"Hahhh... fine, always raining on my day." Gabriel looked back at the globe. "Anyway, based on its cultural influence, I'm hoping that whoever is the first candidate will be located somewhere in Babylon. I have estimated that the candidate will usually be born in a major city controlled by a major world power, this way their abilities are not wasted as a simple slave or a farmer. They need influence and political power to shape the face of humanity, as it were."

Raphael spoke up. "Gabriel, I think you are guessing too much. It's been a few decades already, and yet no major candidates have appeared yet. If it were a major world power where he appeared, that would make little sense. I suspect he may instead appear in a minor village, somewhere under strife, where his abilities would allow him to crush evil, and especially demons. A hero is called where the need is greatest."

Zeus sat back in his chair and stared up at the ceiling. "Hero, hmm? I suppose knowing Hercules, his successor would usually end up being one who excelled on the field of battle, right? I can't see his heroic abilities being endowed upon a human of intellectual abilities. I loved my son, but he was a lunkhead. We should examine the lower classes too. Perhaps we should create some new tenets of religion among the humans to draw out the ones who are excelling among them, perhaps as offerings to the gods. Something like that."

Raphael nodded. "A wise recommendation. I will have one of the lower angels start working on it immediately."

Gabriel returned the nod. "Yes, that would be the fastest, and most efficient way to discover him. Again though, we need to worry about the demons. The humans have begun using iron armor and weapons instead of copper or bronze. They are steadily beating them back, but I fear this may be a ruse. I believe the demons are pretending to be weak."

Raphael stroked his beard slowly. "Say, would it not be interesting to find out that Satan were still alive?"

Gabriel raised an eyebrow. "You saw it with your own eyes. I smote him with a single blast. No demon can resist the Sunlight from Heaven."

Raphael sighed. "Yes, I suppose not. But, he is a demon... and demons are so.... tricky."

Zeus waved it off as he lowered his head back to the table. "Either way, if he's alive or dead, we may have few troops left, but those that are, are among the strongest of our kind. We will not be defeated so easily, our power is concentrated for a reason. And since he has no way to reach the Gate to Heaven, now that it is located in an unseen corner of Mount Olympus, he will never come here again. Even if he found it, he knows not what the password is to open the gate."

The two archangels shrugged their shoulders at the same time. "If he comes, we will fight. We will do what we must." Gabriel stood up. "Now that we've concluded the official business, I'll be off. My lord." Gabriel bowed. Soon afterwards, Raphael made his exit as well, leaving Zeus to his own thoughts.

Part 182: The Great

Amelia grinned as she danced along the highway. She was humming some tune to herself that had bubbled up from the memories of one of the snacks she ate a little earlier that day.

"Carthage had so many yummy people! I can't wait to go to Babylon and see how much they've grown!" She skipped along, merrily enjoying her day.

A voice inside of her spoke. You seem to be having a lot more fun than usual, princess. Is there something particularly good about today?

"Oh Levi, if only you knew! This is the day I finally take my revenge! I'm SOOOO excited!" She giggled as she thought of how great it was going to be to devour the descendants of those who killed mommy and papa. She would have eaten the actual people who did the deed, but she had gotten distracted for a few hundred years and rampaged all over the world.

But now, it was time. Time for snacks!

She could feel her stomach growling again. I apologize, princess. The hunger will never stop, whether I'm inside of you or not.

She giggled again. "That's okay~ I don't get full anyway, so eating all day long doesn't make my tummy hurt!"

She meandered about aimlessly for several hours, until she could spot in the distance the great walls of the city she would soon conquer. However, up ahead of her, there appeared to be a large army making preparations to move out. "Hmm? Who are all those men?"

Leviathan sighed from within her. My princess, I know you don't pay too much attention to the politics of the people you devour, but based on the banner those men are flying, they appear to be soldiers of the Greek empire.

"Hmm? Greek? But this is Babylon. Are they about to attack the city? Did I accidentally stumble in a battleground? Ooooh! Battles mean lots of dead things to eat!"

Leviathan sighed again. Always with the one-track mind, I see.

Amelia stared ahead into the distance, concentrating her vision as she somehow zoomed in with a thousand times the focal viewing distance of a normal human's eyes. "Hm? There appears to be a Greek flag hanging over the walls of Babylon. Have they... have they already been attacked?!"

She stomped her foot on the ground. "No no no no!! This is not fair! I wanted to eat the Babylon people while they were still screaming and begging me to stop! Some meanie took my food from me!"

As she walked along glumly towards the city, she moaned in annoyance. "Dang it, now I have to eat some filthy Greeks instead. Life just isn't fair!"

Leviathan concurred. Yes, life is not fair, but I feel you could find something worse to complain about.

As she walked along, she heard the sound of a horn blaring in the distance, as five horseman rode up to her on the road. "Hm? It appears that I'm getting delivery service today! I'm so lucky!"

The men rode up and stopped a hundred or so feet away from her. The man leading them appeared to be an important person. His figure was somewhat imposing, though not so much to Amelia. She wasn't intimidated by very much.

"Who are you boys? Are you here to pick on a lonely little girl, traveling all by herself?" She pretended to cower in fright. "I hope you're not here to t-take my chastity!"

The man leading them stepped down, drawing his sword as he approached. He was a tall man, an imposing 6'3", dwarfing the size of his men. He had lion colored hair, yellow in nature, and more interestingly, he had one black colored eye, and one blue colored eye.

"Hold. I know of your evil deeds, foul monster." The man glared at her as he stopped some feet away. "Your tales of murder and destruction precede you. I am surprised to see you speaking normally though, as the rumors had said that you were a mute witch who only cackled as she devoured her victims whole."

Amelia frowned. "Hmm? That can't be me!" She tapped her lips thoughtfully. "I'm just a little girl, on my way to visit my papa in Babylon!"

The man grimaced. One of his men yelled at him. "Alexander! Don't turn your back to her! She can move as fast as the wind!"

Leviathan perked up from inside Amelia, as he listened intently. Oho? Alexander? A tall imposing man of Greek descent who leads an army? This human is actually quite famous!

Amelia giggled. "Oh dear, a human! How will I ever cope!" She moved, in an instant, as her jaw stretched itself, unhinging in preparation to gobble the man up whole.

Before she could do so, however, the man deftly stepped to the side, dodging her inhumanly fast attack, as he delivered a kick to her chest. "By the power of the gods, I will release you from this world!" Lunging forwards, moving at an unexpected speed, he stabbed Amelia in the heart.

She screamed in pain. "Ahh! It burns! Ahhhh!!!!!"

Jerking herself back, she leaped out of his way. "You! You're not a normal human! No human moves that fast!"

Alexander nodded grimly. "And you're no ordinary little girl. It seems we both have secrets, but unlike you, I will announce myself. I am Alexander the 3rd, leader of the Greeks, and a descendant of the original Hero! By my power, I will release you from this world!"

He started moving his hands around, as he chanted a powerful spell. "Gladium de lumine!" His sword glowed white hot, as he charged forwards, swinging it dozens of times at once. Amelia was caught wholly off guard by the power of this singular human, as he cut off her right leg, and her right arm, sending her screaming and crying to the ground.

"Uwaahhh! It hurts! It hurts!!" Tears poured from her eyes, as she felt waves of pain cascading through her body. She fought the urge to vomit desperately. She had never felt pain like this before, as she had not faced even a single threat in the last few hundred years that was on par with her.

Alexander grimaced. "Good. It had better hurt, because no amount of pain I inflict on you will ever compare to the atrocities you've committed, foul demon!"

Amelia bit her lip as Leviathan spoke inside of her in an alarmed voice. "Princess! Unleash me, and I will destroy this man in an instant!"

"No..." She whispered, as she fought the pain erupting from her severed limbs. "No... I... I will... make him... PAY!"

With her one free hand, she quickly began chanting a powerful spell, releasing it at an impossibly fast speed. New limbs blasted out of her severed ones insanely fast. In the span of three seconds, she had regrown her limbs anew. She rose to her feet as a crazy, insane smile took over.

"Heh... heh heh heh... this has made me... very very mad... hurting a little girl... I'm not the monster here.... YOU ARE!"

She leaped at Alexander, her mouth unhinging as a terrifying demonic roar blasted out of her mouth. The pitch was incredibly high, yet just low enough for humans to perceive, but the very air around them all shook, almost as if the air itself were enraged. Far off, in the city of Babylon, dogs, cats, and other animals started rampaging due to the awful sound that only they could seem to perceive.

Alexander stumbled back, as her hands started stabbing forwards, making small sonic booms each time she jabbed them forwards.

However, Alexander was no slouch. He had personally trained for a year under the Gods of Olympus, learning the art of war, and preparing himself to become a Hero who would liberate his people. A little girl could not and would not be the death of him on this day.

Her unhinged mouth was a terrifying spectacle indeed, but Alexander kept a calm head, taunting her as she attacked. "I thought maybe with all those theatrics, you might be a challenge, but you're still just a spoiled little BRAT!" Taking the flat of his sword, the Gordian Knot, he pounded her across the face, sending her flying to the side, end over end, until she landed in a crumpled mess at the edge of a great ravine.

Alexander's eyes glowed, as he activated his heroic ability. Prediction.

His blue eye possessed the ability to see a short time into the future, allowing him to predict the attacks of another in battle, making him an unstoppable force on the battlefield. His left eye allowed him to move things slightly with his mind, a limited form of Telekinesis. Together, they allowed him to predict an opponent's attacks, and manipulate their attacks in subtle ways, causing his opponents to miss him in battle.

With these two abilities activated on his eighteenth birthday, he had become an impossibly strong fighter. Amelia could never hope to defeat him once he turned his ability on.

But Amelia didn't know this.

Hours later, Amelia was battered, bruised, and broken. The man of front of her was perfectly calm, as he stared down at the innocent looking, yet absolutely terrifying child in front of him. "Finally, your evil will come to an end." He raised his sword up to cut off her head.

Amelia glanced towards the ravine, only twenty feet away. Her body was badly damaged, but her right leg appeared to be fine. Digging that foot in the ground, she leaped out of the way, avoiding Alexander's attack entirely. As she fell off the edge she found herself thinking one thought. Hero. A terrifying existence, a true monster.

Unfortunately for Alexander, he would pass away at the tender young age of thirty-three, his death suspected due to poisoning by a jealous successor. To this day, no evidence exists of this truth.

Part 183: Immortality

"Is immortality truly desirable?" The wizened old man stared pointedly at his student, who was painting a pretty mural on a flattened piece of wood.

"Well, yes. Why shouldn't it be? Immortality means you would never have to worry about dying. It would give you a long life to learn all, know all, and do all." The much younger man made some broad strokes with the blue paint, coloring in a bit of plain looking sky.

"Are you certain of that? Can you not find any negatives in the pursuit of immortality?" The old man pressed him a bit harder. He always got so dogged when he had some point to make.

The young man sighed. "Well, I can't see very many, to be honest. I suppose maybe boredom, outliving your friends and lovers and family... what others could there possibly be?"

The old man shook his head. "You have much to learn. Life is not simply about the pursuit of new skills and abilities, it is the pursuit of those in a limited amount of time. One does not become a famous Olympian if he has an eternity to train, he does so because he has such a short existence to make himself known." He pulled his fingers in and out of his beard, as he slowly rocked back and forth in his wooden chair.

The young man blinked slowly, as he examined his painting. He grabbed a bit of the green paint. "All right, but the gods and angels are immortal. Are you saying they live meaningless lives?"

The old man waved his hand. "Plato, you know the answer already. Of course the damned gods are miserable. Think of it, they are so miserable they have to interfere with the affairs of our world just so they can derive some pleasure from their pathetic existences. And in the end, the gods can still be killed, so they are not true immortals. No, a true immortal is unkillable, and cannot die by any normal means. To the best of my limited knowledge, no such being exists."

The young man paused his painting for a moment. "You said 'to the best of your knowledge', so you admit you don't know that for a fact?"

The old man sighed. "True knowledge exists in knowing that you know nothing. I am the wisest man alive, for I know one thing, and that is that I know nothing."

Plato rolled his eyes. "My dear Socrates, you always speak in riddles." He went back to painting, this time dabbing just a speck of red on the wooden canvas. "What good is knowledge if you should pass on to the other world? It becomes like dust scattered to the wind. Immortality may not be perfect, but the upsides surely outweigh the downsides."

Socrates shrugged. "Perhaps, you may be right. However, what is wisdom? Knowledge is not wisdom. Knowledge accrued through a million years of reading will not make one truly wise. The only way to become wise is to learn through action."

"True, but you can perform many more actions if you should live forever." Plato let a small smile creep onto his face.

Socrates guffawed. "Yes, but if you live forever, then you would surely become wise if that were the case. I say that wisdom can be attained even at a young age, but only by those inclined towards it. Think of the gods who died due to their lack of wisdom, gods who lived many eternities longer than a mortal man, mind you! Immortality would not truly help one become wise, it would only make an already wise man grow wiser!"

Plato stepped back from his artwork, and then sat back down, finding a spot he didn't quite like. "The thought holds true, I cannot deny it. However, think of the other benefits of immortality! You would be able to experience all the sights that Mother Earth has to offer! You may be able to enjoy the intimacy of women from many countries as well!"

The old man rubbed a small pendant on his neck, which had a beautiful red gem inset into it. "What would the point be? You can already do that with your short life, yet most men do not do so! A beautiful vista is a sweet thing, but you soon grow used to it. In the same way, immortality would start off sweet and pure, but would sour over time. I believe the only reason the gods have not all killed themselves is that they can experience immortality with each other."

Plato smirked. "Ah! So you think that immortality's downsides become less clear if you are sharing it with others! So let me pose you a question, dear teacher; If instead of yourself simply becoming immortal, you were able to make your friends and family become timeless as well, would that change your opinion of it?"

Socrates actually paused for a few moments, fighting with himself to seek the answer. "Nay. I think of the fact that even if the people I cared about were immortal, what of their friends and lovers? Without them, my friends and family would surely become miserable, and that would mean I'd need to spread the immortality forever, until the entire human race were immortal."

Plato frowned. "So? I see no issue there. If loneliness and sadness are the biggest negatives of becoming immortal, surely neutralizing them would make immortality much more positive!"

Socrates snorted as he rubbed his temple. "Yes, but you overlook two important things. One; humans would breed like rabbits, and quickly overtake the entire Earth. Two, living with your worst enemies forever, knowing they would never die, it would eat you up in the inside, continuing to make you miserable for all eternity."

The younger man set down his paintbrush as he turned to face his senior. "But then, assuming humans remained the same, would they not continue to kill each other in ever more glorious bloodbaths, keeping the population down? And if that were the case, would that not make it possible to kill your worst enemies? It seems to be still more positive to me than negative."

"My young friend, you are certainly an idealist. Always looking for the best in a situation." Socrates scratched the back of his head as he leaned forwards in his chair, pulling himself out and up to his feet.

"Ha! I should say the opposite to you! Always a realist, trying to see the worst in a situation! And in the end, I should expect that despite your claims to the contrary, you would still prefer immortality over mortality!" Plato stepped up, as he embraced his teacher and the two of them stepped apart, preparing to go dine in the banquet hall below.

Socrates nodded slowly. "Yes, I should expect that I would, though such a thing is surely impossible. A pipe dream born of fools. To be able to spread my wisdom everywhere, to the ends of the cosmos, until the end of time... it would not be such a bad thing."

As they walked side by side down the arm, Socrates rubbed that curious red stone on his necklace. "Truly, it would not be such a bad thing."

Part 184:

Zeus held the scroll of papyrus in front of himself with the power of telekinesis, a weak spell he had cast so he wouldn't have to use his arms.

"We're losing."

The small group of a dozen angels and gods nodded sadly, as they had already read the report.

Zeus continued. "We can't keep going on like this. Eremial made a foolish mistake recently, thinking he could simply jump into battle to save some humans. The demons slayed him in an instant."

Gabriel sighed as he laid back on the ground, staring up at the ceiling with empty eyes. "Well, at the least, the demons aren't winning either. The humans seem to be crushing them soundly."

Raphael slowly tapped a ball back and forth on the table in front of himself. "A hollow victory. Remember, the demons are not our only enemies. If the demons were to be wiped out, the humans would come for us next. It might take them a few millennia to find us and attack us, but with our current numbers, we would surely lose."

A nearby angel raised her hand up slightly. "I mean no disrespect, Raphael, but are you actually implying we should simply stay out of human affairs, or worse, give aid to the demons so they don't die off?"

"No, Uzziel. I'm saying we must find a way to quickly replenish our numbers. Eventually humans or demons will win this war, and humans are definitely the more likely thanks to their rapidly evolving technology and their Heroes. No matter what it takes, we must come up with some way to supplement or greatly increase our numbers. If we do not, when one of the other two wins, we will surely die next."

Uzziel hesitated. "I understand what you're saying, but even with humanity's greater numbers, what good are swords and bows against the powers of one who can move at the speed of light, or one who can shoot massive rays of light that kill an enemy in an instant? Could the humans really ever pose a threat?"

Gabriel interrupted, tilting his head to the side to look at her. "Let's be clear about one thing, I am certainly powerful, but my ultimate attack has virtually no effect on any but the most vile of humans. It was originally crafted inside of myself to slay demons, and to make sure that its power does not harm my allies. Since humans were originally the allies of angel-kind, I would surely be almost useless in a battle against their species."

Raphael rolled his ball back and forth slowly as he nodded. "Indeed, but moreso than that, even with Gabriel's awe inspiring power, even if he could kill thousands of humans at once, I have... seen what humans will become. In a dream I had recently, I have foreseen what a threat they will become to not just our kind, but the universe as a whole. They are the species with the most latent power waiting to be unleashed."

Zeus rapped his knuckles softly on the arm of his massive marble chair. "To be honest, I still find it difficult to understand how humans who lag so far behind demons in evolutionary ability, and lifespan, can defeat demons that had lived for hundreds, even thousands of years. The demons must surely be very battle hardened, swift, strong, coordinated, agile... having not directly witnessed one of these battles myself, I should like to hear how they are doing it."

Gabriel coughed slightly. "I will explain, my liege. Actually, it is a simple matter. The human with a short lifespan possesses three main advantages over a demon. Firstly, the human expects to lose, while the demons expects to win. A human fighting a terrifying monster fights more cautiously, while a demon fights more brazenly. Thus, demons tend to make more mistakes during an act of combat."

"Secondly, because humans live such short lives, they have developed a strange unspoken creed. 'Better to die on the field of battle, than at home in a warm bed.' Because of this, they fight knowing they will die someday anyway, putting in monstrous efforts to overcome their foes while the demons let their guards down due to overconfidence."

"But thirdly, and most damningly, the humans are far, far more brilliant than we give them credit for. The strongest, most intelligent, and most powerful humans breed the most, creating a form of elite warriors that pass the art of war down to their descendants. And even moreso, the intelligence of the average human, specifically when it comes to learning an enemy's weakness and strategizing on the fly, is unparalleled."

Gabriel took a small breath. "We angels and gods have a real vulnerability just waiting to be exploited by an intrepid human or group of them. We do not fight often. A human's entire life is fighting, whether verbal, mental, or physical. They fight constantly, whether they fight each other, their own thoughts, their emotions, their ideals, their religions... and speaking of which, we may have made a small mistake by making humans fight amongst themselves over religion. By doing this, we have given rise to massive battles spanning thousands, even hundreds of thousands of warriors. Each one is recorded and taught to students of war later on. They hone their skills daily."

Raphael stared at the ball he rolled back and forth with unfocused eyes. "Aye. Humans are almost enviable, in a way. Through their short lives, they manage to find meaning in their quickly extinguished existences."

Zeus sighed again, then waved his hand. "Let's get back to the bigger picture. We need to increase our numbers, and soon. We need a big increase in the numbers of angels up here. I want ideas. I want concrete plans. If the Creator made angels, there must be a loophole somewhere so we can have more."

Raphael and Gabriel sat silently as they thought. Uzziel broke the silence. "Well, we still have the Beacon of Life, correct? Perhaps, using the souls it has collected, we could fashion angels out of the ones that passed long ago?"

Zeus felt his face contort slightly, as he pondered the idea. "It... doesn't seem possible. Maybe. Maybe not. We should have to look into it."

From the far side of the long table, one who had been quiet for the entire meeting spoke up. Michael, the Divine King. "Zeus. I usually have little to say, but if you would hear me out, I have an idea."

Everyone at the table turned to look at him. "Hmm? What might that be? It's rare for you to offer unsolicited words, Michael."

Michael stared ahead stonily. "I have a suggestion that involves not just the Beacon of Life, but an appropriate sacrifice, plus a certain set of conditions. I am roughly ninety percent sure it would work, and our forces would be bolstered dramatically."

Zeus leaned in intently. "You don't say..."

The Resurrection Project was under way.

Part 185:

The democratically recognized leader of the Republic of Rome stood atop his veranda, addressing his citizens.

"My people! I have come today to deliver an address based on the state of our mighty nation! For almost seven hundred years, since the founding of our capital city, we have fought and bled to spread the vastness of our republic!"

Julius Caesar addressed the tens of thousand of people below him, who occasionally roared in applause to his words.

"We have crushed many of our enemies, we have gained incredible wealth and power, we have become an unstoppable force in the world! We are truly a nation blessed by the gods on high! But, we must be wary. Enemies lurk among us."

The crowd quieted down as they listened intently.

"I have received news that demons are in our midst. Vile creatures with unholy abominable powers, they seek to destroy us and our way of life. They may look like you, or you, or even you, but they are not human, make no mistake." Julius pointed to various members of the crowd as he spoke.

"The demons have one goal, which is to eradicate all humans. And we have the goal of eradicating them! I have heard in whispers that some people believe the demons do not truly even exist, or that the gods are myths and legends. These rumors are completely false! The gods bless us from on high, and the demons curse at us from below the boots of our troops!"

Caesar pounded his fist onto the balcony as he yelled. "We have enemies to the north, the east, the west, and the south, but the most insidious enemy is not one who attacks at our gates, but one who attacks from within our midst, in our hearts and minds! The worst enemy is one who whispers doubts about the might of our republic's army, and who speaks ill of the leaders, who have the best intentions for the good of their people at heart!"

Behind Caesar, standing further back in the doorway, unseen, his young protege watched from the shadows. Brutus.

Brutus left the balcony, as his mentor and friend made his speech. "Strong words for a weak willed dictator." He muttered to himself quietly as he walked. Once he had left the room Caesar was speaking from, a woman approached him quietly, falling into stride beside him.

"Caesar thinks he knows everything, but he's not as smart or as brave as you, Brutus." The beautiful woman dressed herself in concealing robes, but even so, the figure her body cut was difficult to miss. Brutus, however, was not a man easily swayed by the figure of any woman. He had more important matters to attend to.

"Pretty words, from a demon wench. Belial, I know you have your own desires, and I know you say you defected from the demons, but I find your words difficult to believe. You will help me achieve my goals, and only then will I help you with yours." Belial tried to reach out and lock her arm around his, but he swatted her away.

Belial puffed out her face in a fake display of sadness. "Oh Brutus, if only you could understand the heart of a poor forsaken woman who simply wishes to have some love in her life."

Brutus felt his stomach physically roil. "Calm yourself, I only partner with demons because I must. Now quiet down, we will be meeting with General Pompey soon."

They turned around a corner and entered a room that held a small table. Pompey and his beautiful wife, Metella, sat waiting at the marble table. "Brutus! So good to see you!" Pompey stood up, and quickly approached the two of them. Embracing Brutus with a hug, Brutus' entire demeanor changed as he smiled and grinned at the general.

"Ah, Pompey, I'd like to introduce you to a mistress of mine! Her name is Belial, she's a lovely lady!" Brutus' entire grim expression had changed to an incredibly deceptive smile. Humans certainly know how to fake their emotions just as well as any demon could. Belial found herself thinking about this quietly.

Pompey raised an eye slightly. "And... does your wife, Portia, know of this?"

Brutus grinned broadly. "Portia was the one who suggested it!" He nudged Pompey in the ribs a little bit and Pompey guffawed, returning the nudge.

Belial found herself fighting the urge to roll her eyes. Humans, especially men, are so simple.

The older general beckoned to the table and the three of them took their seats. "Pompey, it is good to see that you have returned from your conquests in the east. What are your plans now?" Brutus started off the conversation with a fairly neutral question, as they began digging in and enjoying the lavish meal servants were delivering. Chicken, lamb, fruits and vegetables, expensive cutlery and silverware, it was a small meal, yet fit for a king.

Pompey felt the grin fall from his face. "Yes, I have just gotten back, but there is much to do. I sense much unrest in this empire. For every victory of mine, I gain five enemies in the Senate.

I am fortunate to have you and Julius as my friends, otherwise my name would not be so easily recorded in the annals of history."

Metalla leaned over and nudged Pompey with her shoulder. "Tell him about Egypt!"

He paused as he thought about it. "Every source has told me that Egypt is slowly falling into disarray. It is no longer a great empire as it were hundreds of years ago. Given a chance, I should like to make it my next conquest, though matters at home may make that impossible for the near future."

Brutus nodded. "Egypt under Roman control? It seems a pipe dream, yet I find it a compelling promise. Would you be able to do it? To defeat those who rule over Egypt?"

Pompey kept his expression blank. "Perhaps, perhaps not. Beyond asking if I could defeat the Egyptians, I have more pressing concerns. I feel something dark is falling upon Rome."

The demon female found herself quietly glancing away, as if to not draw Pompey's attention. Brutus responded. "Something dark? What could you mean?"

"Simply put, I feel a plot brewing. Too many in the senate fear Julius' current influence. They would make our friend the political enemy instead of a grand leader. They fear his power so much they might even do something drastic."

Belial and Brutus both stifled chuckles and kept themselves from glancing at each other. "Surely you don't mean... a coup?"

Pompey grimaced. "Or worse. I have no sources on this, it is but a hunch, but I fear a civil war might be brewing."

Brutus nodded as he took in the information, and a bite of meat. "I understand. I am glad you brought your worries to my attention. You are... a good friend of Julius's."

The meal continued on for a while as the four of them spoke off and on, about politics, intrigue, and even just a bit of banter.

A few years later, Brutus would go on to murder his mentor, shortly after Pompey was assassinated. Rome would never again be the same, nor would humanity.

Part 186:

The young man carefully tapped the chisel with his hammer, slowly carving off bits of wood. He was sweating a little bit, but nothing unlike what he had already dealt with.

The work was slow, but steady-going. As he shaped the wood, the chair he was creating slowly took shape. It was plain, like the clothes he wore, but it had a special something to it. Love, hard work, and attention to details were some of the many reasons he and his father were popular craftsmen in his village.

His father walked into the humble shop, crafted by his own hands a few years earlier. "Ah, it's comin' along pretty well, boy. Mary's gonna love it!"

His dad patted him on the back, and then walked over to take his own seat. "King Herod has ordered me to make more implements of punishment, as he usually does. I want you to finish up with that chair, take it in to your mother, and leave me here for a few hours."

The young boy nodded quietly, as he continued chiseling at the chair. "Just a few more minutes, father."

Dad watched quietly as his son finished up his chair, then he quietly got up and left without saying a word.

I wonder if what my wife said was really true. A virginal conception? Who ever has heard of it? But her chastity was pure...

Joseph turned back to begin work on the wooden cross. Another one for the king, orders were orders.

Mary turned around as she saw her son walk in the house. "Jesus, is that the chair you were making for me?" Her son nodded and smiled as he quietly pulled up the chair and pushed it in to the table.

"Do you mind if I sit in it?" Mary smiled as Jesus nodded again. She sat down and was pleased by the concave shape for the seat. "It's made of wood, yet so comfortable!"

Jesus walked over and sat on his own smaller chair he had crafted a few months ago. "Mother, is it time for the passover festival yet?" He reached over and grabbed a sharp knife and piece of wood so he could carve drawings while he sat down.

Mary paused. "I'm sorry, Jesus, but it won't be here for another two weeks. I do know how you love to go."

Jesus nodded quietly as he sat and carved. He had a feeling that he was no ordinary child, yet something inside of him seemed to prevent him from digging any deeper. All he knew was that inside temples of worship, he felt much different than he did here at home. Something was calling to him, but he could not quite put his hand on it. Perhaps, when he was older, he would understand.

After a few hours, Jesus was in bed, nearly falling asleep when he heard his father enter the house. It was dark out, so Joseph must have been out cutting the tool for Herod late into the night. He could hear his mother and father speaking quietly in the living room. How he was able to hear words so clearly, and think so clearly, especially at such a young age, it frankly mystified him.

"He's asking about the passover festival again." Mary whispered, but Jesus heard. "I worry about him, you know. He's so smart for such a young boy."

Joseph sighed. "What about the dream I had shortly after he was born? Could it have been real?"

Mary stared at him silently for a few moments. "Perhaps. It is not in our hands anymore. It is up to the gods, or god, or whoever rules over us."

Joseph smiled sweetly at his wife. "Come now, the other boys will be back soon from their trip. Let's prepare their beds. We should leave this idle talk in the past."

Mary nodded as the two of them quickly got up and headed into the shared bedroom for the boys.

Jesus simply pretended he was fast asleep.

Part 187: Son Of Man

It had taken him many years, but it was finally here. As his friend John dipped him under the water, Jesus arose out of the shimmering flowing pool and saw a beautiful white sparkle of light, almost resembling a dove, quickly and silently fly into his body, absorbing into his soul.

In an instant, everything changed.

Billions of years of memories flooded inside his skull, as all his angelic conquests came rushing into his mind. He was here for a reason. He was here to make a difference.

He thanked John, and stepped out of the river. John mentioned that he had two comrades who might join Jesus on his mission.

Jesus left after that, thinking carefully about what was next to come.

He spoke loudly to the people listening all around him. "You have heard that it was said, 'Love your neighbor and hate your enemy.' But I tell you, love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, that you may be children of your Father in heaven. He causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous. If you love those who love you, what reward will you get? Are not even the tax collectors doing that?"

A man nearby spoke up. "But, great priest, Jesus, what of the demons? Are not the demons our mortal enemy?"

Jesus turned to him. "The demons, they are true evil. They seek to take man from the path of good, whispering fear and doubt into his heart. Make no mistake, the demons are the worst beings in the world. However, if a demon should repent of his or her evil ways, you must forgive them. Forgiveness is hardest to do when one has done the unforgivable, but as followers of the Word of God, you must always be ready and willing."

The people around him nodded sagely as he continued on. "Be careful not to practice your righteousness in front of others to be seen by them. If you do, you will have no reward from your Father in heaven..."

Jesus lacked the power that he had once possessed as the archangel, but a small remnant still found itself inside his human form. He stared out over the stormy sea, as a boat tossed and turned in the distance. If he did not go out there, his apostles would likely die.

The Sea of Galilee, it was really just a gigantic lake, but to a boat stuck out in the middle of it during a terrible storm, it might as well have been an ocean.

The wind howled and thunder cracked, as Jesus quietly cast a spell, aiming at his feet. Levitation, a weakened form allowing him to easily walk on the waters. With his very weak abilities, this would be trivial.

Jesus quietly walked out in the middle of the raging storm, as small waves caused by the terrible winds swept across his feet, threatening to bring him down. What he was doing now would be considered a great miracle by people who had witnessed it, but in truth it was less than 1% of what he had originally been capable of.

His original form was locked up in heaven sealed inside a ring for safekeeping. He now was merely a shadow of his former self. But in return for the path he must walk, he would be the one to save the angels, and humans. It was a sacrifice worth making.

Jesus walked out onto the great lake, and on the boat he approached, his apostle Peter gasped as he saw his lord draw near. "What madness is this?! The great teacher walks atop the waters as a god! Surely, everything he has preached is true!"

Jesus smiled, his expression barely visible amidst the roaring winds and crazed waters. "Peter. My apostle. Come out to me."

Peter gaped openly. Jesus stood nearly a hundred feet away from the boat, out amidst the crazed waters. "My lord, surely you jest?! I cannot walk on water as you do!"

Jesus knew, the only way man would ever be able to truly defeat the demons, not the ones in the world, but the ones in their heart, would be to unlock the powers hidden inside them. "Peter, you of little faith, why do you doubt me? Come." Jesus quickly moved his hands as he cast a spell on Peter's feet. The spell would only work if Peter consciously used his own inner spiritual energy.

Peter steeled himself as he stepped off the boat, cursing silently in his mind. To his astonishment, he was able to step foot on the waters, and gingerly, he walked over to his teacher, somehow ignoring the maelstrom blowing upon himself.

"I'm... I'm doing it!" He gasped as he looked up at Jesus, but at that moment, his attention wavered, and his heart jumped into his throat as he fell into the water. Before he could fall past his knees, Jesus was upon him, covering the distance in a moment's notice. Peter had been too scared to notice, but Jesus had moved inhumanly fast, far faster than a mere flesh and bones body should be able to.

"Why did you let your concentration slip? Did you experience doubt, or perhaps overconfidence? Pride goes before the fall." Jesus helped him back up to the ship. As Jesus stepped onto the boat, he glared up at the sky. Waving his hands in the air, he yelled out loud.

" SILENCE! "

As his hands finished casting the spell, his words seemed to almost instantly end the storm.

The other men on the ship gasped as they witnessed this spectacle. "Who is this man, that the winds and waves should obey his will?"

Peter stared at the man who was looking up at the sky stoically. "He is the son of god, the one known as Christ and Jesus. He is the one who will save our people."

Jesus ignored the looks of the men around him, as he walked forwards, carrying his cross on his back. Peter stood atop a nearby building, watching in silence, as tears poured down his face. As my teacher predicted, I forsook him in his most dire hour. I, who witnessed the greatest spectacle of all time, ignored him and pretended to not know him. It is my own fault that he walks these streets.

In another part of the city, a man named Judas snickered evilly as he took the thirty pieces of silver. When he walked away from the ones giving him his reward, he quietly pulled out a small transmission orb. "Satan, it is done as you wished. We have set up the archangel to be killed. He will not be able to convert any more humans to the side of the angels. Their thought energy will be cut off before they grow too strong."

A mental image of Satan's face appeared in the man's mind. "Good. It almost seems too easy, like he wanted to be killed, but no matter. With him out of the picture, our power will only be able to grow further. Our influence among the humans has grown quite large as of late. Even the kings of Judea bow to our will."

Judas nodded, as he scratched his skin. Oops, my red skin is returning. Better cast a bit of illusion to make sure nobody notices. Judas quickly cast his magic to hide his true form as he tucked the orb back inside a pocket. His next goal was to make a dramatic exit and pretend to kill himself so he might return to his true master's side.

Jesus continued walking through the town, finally arriving with his cross at the place where he would be left to die. Two other men were already here, slowly moving their own instruments of torture to the correct position so they could be nailed to it. Their guards didn't rush them, as they derived no pleasure from watching other men die slow agonizing deaths, not even criminal scum like these three.

Unlike the others though, Jesus quickly lined his cross up on the ground, surprising some of the guards who watched. "Almost like he desires a quick death." One guard remarked to another.

Jesus quickly, too quickly even, laid himself across the implement, stretching his arms out. He looking knowingly at the guard who had whispered from before. "Do it."

The guard gaped, but then shrugged. "It's on your conscience, not mine." This was how he had managed to explain away the guilt of his chosen profession, by blaming it on those who were to die.

As the guard pounded the nails into Jesus wrists, he marveled that the man did not scream aloud or cry, he merely flinched and gritted his teeth as the nails were driven into his flesh. The other two were quick to follow, though their screams were agonizing to hear.

Finally, the moment of truth. All three were raised up at the same time, as blood gushed and flowed freely from their wrists and feet. The two men on either side of Jesus wept and cried aloud, begging for forgiveness, but Jesus stoically bit his lip until it bled, keeping silent.

The guards stared in amazement at the power of the man they were witnessing. This one is not like the others, they found themselves thinking. Finally, they walked away a short distance into a nearby tent. It was the last reprieve of the accused, to die alone, so none would have to watch their pitiful last moments.

As the sharp pain subsided, and only dull, awful throbbing pain remained, along with a long slow painful death, one of the men turned to Jesus. "You... you're the one they call the King of the Jews, is that right?"

Jesus nodded as he stared ahead silently.

"I... I am a sinner. A thief. A terrible man. I did many things that I now regret... am I impossible to forgive? Have I become irredeemable?" The man looked at Jesus, his last moments upon him, but eager for a modicum of forgiveness.

Jesus turned and stared back at the man, his eyes betraying no emotion. "Truly, I say to you, you will be with me in Paradise." Jesus looked up into the clouds. "It... it is done."

The moment he said those words, there was a bright flash of light that emanated from his body for but a split moment. His body sank on the cross, as his flesh corpse sagged in its place. The thief gasped openly. "Guards! Guards!"

The guards came running out of their tent, only to see a pitiful sight. "Ah, what is it, thief? Have you no shame? Must you continue to beg with your last words?"

The thief protested. "No! That man! A light came out of his body!"

One of the guards shoved the others out of the way, as a strange redness seemed to appear in his eyes. "Did you see something?"

The thief nodded with what little energy he had left. "Yes! He was dying but at the last moment, he- KUHH!" Before the thief could finish his sentence, the guard jumped forwards impaling the thief in the chest. The thief watched with his last breath as the redness in the guard's eyes disappeared and they became a normal color again. Then... his vision went white.

Suddenly, the thief gasped! He was alive! Not only alive, but surrounded by whiteness all over the place as far as his eyes could see.

In front of him, the son of man stood once again. "Congratulations, thief. You have been reborn. Welcome, to paradise. Your faith in the end was what saved you."

The thief stared around himself in awe. Was this... Heaven?

Jesus turned and vanished, as his body instantly reappeared in front of Zeus. Kneeling down on the ground, he spoke five simple words. "The resurrection project... is complete."

The guard stared at the body of the son of man. Unlike the thief who had poured blood from his wound, the King of Jews, as it were, was bleeding water from his stab wound. The guard slowly pulled out the spear as he stared back and forth between the two bodies.

What could it mean? He would have to contact Satan to tell him of this unexpected news.

Part 188:

"The army of heaven is expanding rapidly." Zeus stared at the numbers. "Two million in just a few years. This is unprecedented."

Gabriel nodded as he held Michael's ring in his hands. Michael had 99% of his spirit energy and personality stored here for safekeeping, all part of the plan. Michael's actual body had died during combat with demons shortly afterwards, leaving them to think an important archangel had perished.

However, he had not, as he was safely stored for a future hero's use. "This system truly works out in our favor. The humans are weak, but they make for a good disposable fighting force, and when they die, they become loyal subservient angels, bound to the will of whatever god is king, forever. Their abilities are enhanced, though not nearly as strong as a regular angel's power, and they continue to be powerful pawns afterwards."

Zeus nodded quietly as Raphael spoke. "Essentially, while alive, humans who give their lives to us give us thought energy which boosts our spirit energy, and since they can't make use of it anyway it doesn't harm them. While alive they fight each other and eventually the demons, but when they die, they are added to our ranks, greatly increasing our fighting forces and numbers. On top of that, it works no matter which gods they worship, just so long as they worship a god."

Uzziel rapped a finger on her lips thoughtfully. "That's fine and all, but what of the atheists? There are many humans who don't ascribe belief to any particular god, and some who don't worship the gods at all."

Zeus shrugged. "They are truly useless in our grand scheme of things, but in the end, their numbers are small. So long as they don't grow too big in number, we will continue to bolster our ranks."

Uzziel took a sip of a strange golden drink. "All right. But explain to me again, how does the actual conversion process work? What are the requirements for the process to work in order for humans to become angels?"

Gabriel slid a piece of paper over to her. "It's quite simple, really. A human has to worship a specific god, or gods, or set of religious beliefs that point to a specific god. So long as that person dies a believer, and so long as there is a King of Gods currently in power, they will be reborn in heaven as a Neo-Angel. That's really all there is to it. In fact, if humanity gets into an all-out war with the demons and 99% of them die, as they are now, they can fight twice on the battlefield, and the second time around they will be ten times stronger than they were before once reborn as an angel."

Raphael stared at the paper Gabriel had slid towards Uzziel, but he was not reading it. He was merely staring ahead blankly. "I see just one or two flaws in the plan. The first is mass atheism. Should that happen, heaven's numbers would slow to a crawl. The second is an assassination of Zeus and whoever might replace him afterwards. If the demons can keep killing off the King, they would be able to stop the humans from rebirthing as angels. Despite all of this though, we seem to have created an impenetrable wall of numbers."

Uzziel stared at the paper blankly. "Aren't we... invincible now? If we send the humans out to kill as many demons as possible, many humans and demons will die. Then we send in the reborn humans to polish off whoever's left... we win the war."

"We can't do that." Gabriel cut her off. "We require thought energy to live, or have you forgotten? In fact, too many humans in heaven as angels could be a detriment, since the amount of thought energy we receive would be spread out dramatically. If all the humans on Earth are killed, the demons will still win since all they would have to do is wait us out. Archangels have enough energy stored to live for a few eons without dying, but all the lesser angels would die out within a few years. The demons have three victory conditions, but we still have to maintain the status quo to survive, no matter what. And as for the humans? If they eradicate the demons, and then come for us, or if they then become mass atheists, we lose either way."

Uzziel sighed. "You would think being an all-powerful angel would give you an advantage, but I'm beginning to wonder if we're not the weakest of the three races."

Zeus nodded. "Angels are not that strong, to be honest. An average god descended from Titans is far stronger, but an angel possesses a much higher capacity for raw power. As an example, to be blunt, Gabriel is the most powerful being in heaven, thanks to storing a colossal amount of spiritual energy. However, if he were to expend a massive amount of it in battle, he would surely be weaker than I, who can actually regenerate my own energy in much the same way a human does. Gabriel is actually my superior for raw power, but my inferior in average power."

The female angel cracked her neck as she leaned back. "So, what next? What do we do now that we have initiated the resurrection project?"

Gabriel began pacing around in his shrunken body. "The simple answer is that we need to start making a lot of humans very religious, get them to make many children, get them to fight and die in wars, and also get them to kill demons. However, something has been bothering me a lot lately."

"Hm? Bothering you? What could be such a problem that you would be worried about it?" Zeus' eyes followed Gabriel as he paced back and forth.

"It's the demons. Their movements as of late are erratic. Ever since the faked death of Michael, they seem to be coming out a lot less often. If they were to wise up and go into hiding, we could continue to get the humans to fight amongst themselves for religious wars, but without an external enemy that would merely last a few thousand, or even a few hundred years. Humans have notoriously short memories. Without constant reminder of the presence of demons, they would soon forget they even exist, relegating demons to myths and legends. And what if, while the humans are killing one another, the unified demonic front builds up their forces and attacks out of the blue? Humanity could die all too easily."

Uzziel sighed deeply. "This seems hopeless. The demons and humans have so many ways they could win, we have none. What is even the point anymore? Isn't there some distant world we could travel to and make some weak willed apes our minions? Maybe we should just take over the human's minds, force all of them to become our subservient followers."

Zeus shrugged. "We've tried. However, the Creator placed an edict on the universe, preventing one from invading another's free will and controlling them. Trust me, if I could take over the minds of the humans, I would have done so already."

Uzziel stared at an empty spot on the wall. "It truly is hopeless, isn't it?"

Raphael smiled slightly. "Yes, child. Now you understand. It truly is hopeless. You are becoming wiser every day."

Part 189: Deus Ex

April, 1776.

The well dressed man tapped his cigar on the edge of the podium, as he adjusted his suit and tie while staring at the small crowd.

"Demons are real."

A few in the front row leaned forwards as they furrowed their brows. "Demons, huh? You expect us to believe that load of kookery?" One of the men was clearly unimpressed by the revelation. "I thought you brought us here to talk about important things, Johann."

"This is important, Mr. Ferdinand. This explains everything. All the mysteries, all the problems that plague society. Demons are real, and I aim to prove it." Johann stared intently at the man in the audience as he spoke.

Ferdinand rolled his eyes. "Yes, of course. Demons, then angels and gods and everything else! Do you expect us to believe this tomfoolery?"

Johann nodded quietly. "Yes... I do expect you to. You have to understand, mankind is being controlled. We're being run by a great evil. If we can find proof of the demons and their existence, we will find the one who rules us."

Johann closed his eyes for a moment before speaking again. "On my honor, as Johann Adam Weishaupt, I swear to you, everything I'm about to say today is true. None of this is lies, or fiction. All of it is backed by ancient manuscripts from thousands of years ago. I have actual writings from those who followed the first saints, from those who spoke of meeting angels and demons, and I have personally spoken to rulers of the world living today. They all point to one thing: Humanity is just a pawn in a grand game, a game that will end with only one of the three species being the victor in the greatest war of our time."

Ferdinand listened silently, but another man in the audience scoffed. "War? The only major wars I know of are those Brits and their damned colonies, having a little spat over who gets to control the bloody land! There are a couple other wars in Austria, Prussia, and a few others, but those are all relatively minor! You're out of your mind!" The man stood up in a huff and stomped out of the room, flailing his hands around as he slammed the door shut behind himself.

Johann cleared his throat. "That was pleasant. However, Simon was wrong. We have a much bigger war to worry about. Humanity is being played for fools by those up on high, and those below us. We're treated as nothing more than tools in a grand game of chess. We're being used as bait by the angels, and slaughtered quietly by the demons. We're made to fight amongst each other in great religious wars, then used as tools of war when we die. Our lives have no meaning beyond fueling the bloodthirstiness of the two supreme powers."

Ferdinand snickered. "Well, if gods and devils are real, then what hope does man have? How could we be anything but mere pigs to the slaughter?"

The man at the podium had an expression of annoyance cross his face. "If you'd pipe down, I'd be happy to tell you. The solution is so simple, yet it will be so difficult to carry out, that it will make your ears bleed when you hear it. All we have to do is make people stop following all religion, and that will take care of the angels, then we use our superior weaponry to destroy the demons, and then we rule the world. Easy!"

Ferdinand stared evenly at Johann. "That doesn't sound simple. At all. What makes you think the demons will be so easy to kill?"

Johann stepped down from the podium as the small crowd watched in silence. He walked up to just a few feet away from Ferdinand. "One of the documents I recovered detailed the Crusades. They were not about what history has said they were about. All of it was a farce. We drove out the demons from Europe and cleansed the country of their filth. However, in truth, the crusaders were led by a very special individual."

"Who might that be?" Ferdinand stared into Johann's eyes. "Go on, I'm listening."

Johann paused. "I don't know her name, to be honest. But what I do know is the crusaders were secretly led by a woman, and she was a person gifted with a power from heaven known as the Hero's Soul."

Ferdinand snorted. "A woman? Back in those days? Be realistic, if you're going to tell a tall tale, at least try to actually convince me of its truth."

The other man felt a wave of annoyance pass over him. "We're talking about demons, angels, and gods, yet you think the most surprising thing here is that it was a woman who led the crusades? For the love of- get your head on straight!" Johann took a long puff off his cigar, which he had neglected for the last few minutes. It glowed red hot as he inhaled and then exhaled. "The most important thing here is the power of the Hero. I believe we can harness it. It can be our ultimate weapon in this great war. We simply have to find a candidate who would receive it."

Another man nearby, Dukakis was his name, spoke out. "What is this Hero Soul you're going on about? What does it do?"

Johann sniffled. Finally, someone with an open mind. "The hero's soul is something that transfers the moment a hero dies, it reincarnates in the body of another. I don't know the exact details, but I've learned of it through various... contacts. If we can snatch it for ourselves, it will give us not just power to kill demons, angels, and gods, but power to influence the world."

The only woman in the room, Elise, spoke up next. "So if this thing is so powerful, surely there must be a way to find it? Perhaps tracing the lineage of the heroes from the past? Maybe we could predict which of their heirs will inherit it next."

Johann waved his hand at her. "Nay, it would not work. It appears here and there, randomly. Sometimes it's based on how an individual looks, sometimes it's their personality, or something else, but it does not stay within a specific bloodline. To be honest, I haven't the damndest clue on how to approach it or how to locate the Hero, if they are findable in the first place."

Ferdinand lifted his hand and opened his mouth to speak, but at that moment, a bell went off in the front of the room.

"Ah, it would seem our time is up. Friends, I want to thank you for coming here, and of course we will all meet up next week." Johann glanced at Ferdinand, knowingly. "I'm sure some of you will have pressing questions to attend to, but until the time has come, let our questions stay dormant. We don't want prying ears to hear us speak, now do we?"

Ferdinand swallowed as he quietly got up from his chair and shuffled towards the door.

"Don't forget the pledge!" Elise piped up cheerfully.

The people in the room paused from their standing up and turned back to the front of the room, as they stared at the engraved image of a pyramid with an all-seeing eye at the top. All of them immediately spoke in unison.

" I pledge myself to account the good of the Order as my own, and am ready to serve it with my fortune, my honor, and my blood. Should I, through omission, neglect, passion, or wickedness, behave contrary to this good of the Order, I subject myself to what reproof or punishment my Superiors shall declare. The friends and enemies of the Order shall be my friends and enemies; and with respect to both I will conduct myself as directed by the Order, and am ready, in every lawful way, to devote myself to its increase and promotion, and therein to employ all my ability. All this I promise, and protest, without secret reservation, according to the intention of the Society which requires from me this engagement. "

The first members of the Illuminati picked up their belongings and headed out the door, as they entered the quiet streets of Ingolstadt.

Part 190:

"...The Illuminati? Seriously? You've got to be kidding." I stared at Samantha in disbelief. "You've definitely gone too far, you're pulling my leg."

Samantha pouted. "I'm not lying! The humans became smarter and realized the gods were toying with them... they started up secret societies to rid the world of angelic and demonic influence."

I chuckled softly. "This sounds like the plot for a bad video game. Illuminati, angels, gods, demons, humanity's fate, and maybe even aliens. What the hell happened while I was out for a hundred million years, anyway?"

I stared ahead blankly as I thought of the last 11 years I'd spent in this labyrinth. Much of that time was spent pissing into the wind, doing little other than fighting demons and killing demons. This has been my life now, for too long. Whatever this 'great war' is, it's older than mankind itself, and has stretched on for an unimaginable hundred million years or longer.

"Samantha, Cassiel, what if I told you two that I want to put an end to the war?"

Cassiel shrugged. Samantha slowly wagged her head up and down. "I suppose that would be nice. How, though? What can one man do to stop the war?"

I curved my lips into a small smile. "I'm not 'one man', though. The three of us, are one human, one angel, and one demon. We represent each of the species! And on top of that, we seem to get along splendidly. It could be like this easily, if the others would just forget their grudges and move on."

Samantha instantly shook her head. "Nope, sorry, not going to happen. Maybe the angels can, seeing as Cassiel is all that's left, and maybe the humans could too, but the demons? It will never work. Too much bad blood. Humans have left a corrupting influence on what was once the most harmonious race. Under Satan, we all followed orders and let him do the thinking. Ever since he died... we..." Samantha trailed off as she glanced away for a moment, a storm of emotions clouding her face. She quickly righted herself. "His death left us in tatters. We demons may have won the war, but now we are ruled by petty feuds, squabbling for power, and fighting over scraps and bits of land. We have become like the humans once were... or still are."

The expression on her face soured as she rubbed her bare arms. I could feel my own emotions deflating. "We need answers. I need answers." I thought back to that day, years ago... that day everything changed and I experienced true loss. "Samantha, this is going to be an odd question. Have you ever heard of a human woman named Marie?"

Samantha shrugged. "Marie? I hear many human names and forget them just as quickly, especially such a plain and boring name like that."

Makes sense. I didn't expect her to know, but Samantha seems to know a lot of things, more than I find comfortable for an ordinary demon. "I'm not sure of the details, but Marie was a woman who may know something about the Cryopod I was in when I arrived at this labyrinth. I think she was another of the cryopod survivors, or maybe she was a human who escaped from one of the world gates... I don't know, but Marie is the key. I must speak to her."

Cassiel kept quiet as she obviously had no idea who that was. "Well, Hero, do you have anything to go on?" Samantha sighed as she played with her hair, her boredom already starting to show.

I paused. "No... but, come to think of it, maybe I know someone who does."

I get up and beckon to the two girls. They get up and walk up close as I put my hands on each of their shoulders. "Brace yourselves. We're about see just how far I can stretch my abilities."

I glance at my mental map. I might be mistaken, but this one spot here looks like it's the right one...

"Teleport! "

In an instant, we travel hundreds of miles, draining a gigantic amount of my energy, as we appear inside a familiar dark room. The only visible light is the light escaping from Cassiel's aura, as I look up and spot a familiar tiny hole in the ceiling.

Oh, and we're not alone in the room.

A familiar looking statue greets me when I appear, making me jerk back for a second in fright.

"Oh, look who came to visit. It's the God King himself, along with his little pet."

Gressil.

Gressil grins at me as he notices my tiny amount of energy left over. This was... a bad idea.

Then he turned and looks at Samantha, a wave of shock passes over his face, and he bows ever so slightly. "Oh! My queen, I did not realize you were escorting these two around! Should I stay out of your way or do you have this... situation... under control?"

Samantha smirks as she looks away. "Do what you wish, I won't interfere."

Gressil grins as he looks down his long, pointy beak at me. "You seem to be out of energy. I'll make this quick."

Part 191:

Gressil eyeballed me, as he turned away from Samantha. "Wait, did you say queen?! Samantha, what did he mean by that?" I turned to her as I asked the question.

Gressil interjected before she could respond. "Samantha? Ha ha ha! That's not her name, imbecile! She is Belial, the second emperor of hell! The second most powerful of all the beings that live here! Show respect to my queen!"

Samantha rolled her eyes as she examined her nails. "Yeah yeah second emperor, blah blah, can you just drop it already? I'm only in that position because I'm strong, not because I rule the demons or whatever."

I openly gaped at her, my entire expression frozen in shock. "You're the second most powerful demon in all of hell?! Why are you traveling with me then? Are you spying on me?!"

She stopped looking at her nails and glared at me. "Oh for- yeah, I'm spying on you. Calm down. I could have destroyed you ten times over if I wanted to. I merely like you because I don't actually hate humans. I'm not like the other demons."

She sighed and rolled her eyes again. "Of course though, it does stand that I'm also no enemy of the demons, but that just means I don't care about the petty squabbles on either side."

Gressil grinned evilly. "So, my queen, if I attack this one, you won't interfere, even if I kill him?"

Belial chuckled. "Hah! You're welcome to give it a shot! I think you'll find that even with no energy, he'll still beat you hand over foot."

The smirk on Gressil's face vanished as he took a step back. "Is that... so? I had better be serious about this, then."

Gressil took a fighting stance, as he prepared some attack. Unfortunately, in the blink of an eye, something absolutely unbelievable happened.

Cassiel snapped.

"I WON'T LET YOU HURT HIM, YOU DEMON BASTARD!" Cassiel screamed in rage, which completely surprised myself and Samantha, as in the very next instant after screaming, Cassiel aimed both hands at Gressil, and fired a COLOSSAL blast of light at him. The attack surged forward at the speed of light. It wasn't even like light though, it was more of a liquid that moved at that insane speed, heated to white-hot temperatures, yet with no heat at all.

The blast came from both hands, her chest, her mouth, and both eyes, as it transformed from six individual beams, into one massive beam of devastation, as it blasted forwards, wiping Gressil off the face of the universe and plowing past the wall ahead of us, smashing through 5 straight miles before she ended the attack.

In the blink of an eye, she eradicated one I had originally felt was a grave threat only months earlier, and destroyed him with the same ease that I might swat a fly.

Cassiel gasped for breath after she ended her attack, however I was astounded to see she hadn't used even 1% of her total energy. She was out of breath simply from unleashing her emotions in a fit of rage. "Ah... I'm sorry... I just... I couldn't bear to... to look at him for another moment longer..."

She smiled thinly, but her hands were trembling violently. That attack must have been very therapeutic.

"Uh, ordinarily, he'd have survived somehow and would be coming back, right?" I glanced around but could sense nothing of his energy withing my entire spatial sight radius.

"No, that attack wiped him out quite clearly." Samantha, or rather, Belial, appeared almost bored by how easily he was destroyed. "Quite the attack, in fact, that had to be on par with Gabriel's own signature move. Possibly more powerful, considering how much it drained him compared to how little it affected you."

I took a few steps back from Belial and stood side by side with Cassiel. "We have to discuss this, Belial. If you're truly the second emperor, or empress, or whatever, then doesn't that make us mortal enemies or something?"

"Ugh, please don't call me Belial. I hate that name. It's not cute at all. If you can't stomach calling me by my human name, at least call me Lilia. It's so much prettier. It's what... it's what Satan used to call me in private, you know." She tossed her hair back as she stared at us with a bored expression on her face.

"All right, I'll call you Samantha then. Why did you change your name? Why are you helping me, or at least traveling along with me? Why are you... not helping out your kind? Why-"

She cut me off. "Oh for devil's sake, cut the questions. Listen, Hero, this may come as a shock to you, but I really genuinely like you, you know. I haven't liked being a part of the demons since that spoiled little... that little... grah!" She snarled a little bit as images of Amelia, likely killing Satan, flooded her mind, before she returned to normal a few moments later. "I haven't liked them since Satan was killed, you understand? Satan was the only reason I existed. Since his death, I have had no purpose. I don't care about the new ruler at all, he is not Satan and I will never love him."

I paused as I stared at her. "Do you know who the new ruler is? The first emperor of hell?"

She smirked. "Maybe I do, maybe I don't. I'm not going to tell you anyway, because truthfully, I don't know. Even if I did, on my honor as a demon, even one fed up with her kind, I wouldn't. But I left the ranks shortly after Satan's death. The others kept trying to delegate me positions and work but I simply don't care. Diablo and whoever can play with their little toys."

I was feeling pretty stunned by all these revelations. Samantha was the second emperor of hell. Another question came to my mind. "Samantha, Lilia, Belial... whatever you wish to be called... I just have one more question for you."

She stared at me quietly. "...What? Spit it out."

"Do you, um, do you love me?" A simple question, but her cheeks seemed to flush as she quickly turned her head away. Mine did too.

"Well, that is to say, I mean as it stands, well, when I compare you to Satan, you're clearly not his equal, but even beyond that there's the matter of our species, but let's also not forget the um..." She trailed off as her voice quieted down. "...Yes. I do... though not as strongly as I did Satan. Despite being a mere mortal, you have some qualities that he once lacked, and you have your own virtues. You're a different beast entirely..."

Great, she's comparing me to her ex-boyfriend. I don't know whether to feel complimented or insulted. Still, she seems honest. I walk over to her and wrap my arms around her. "All right... that's all I wanted to know. I love you and Cassiel both, regardless of the differences we share, because 'opposites attract' as a wise human once said."

I beckoned and Cassiel came over, the emotions from earlier having left her, as we all shared a group embrace.

"I wasn't kidding." I said, as we finally stepped apart. "I want to end this war. Maybe then, once we've all settled our issues, we can move on. But for now, let's stay together, and face the challenges together."

Samantha nodded quietly. "That would... be fine."

As we all sat there, looking back and forth at each other, I could feel a new emotion emerging. Determination. I have to solve the issues. I have to find out what happened to create this place. I have to know what caused the great war, and how I might solve it, hopefully without bloodshed.

I turned to the doorway Cassiel had blasted five miles deep into the labyrinth. "You've certainly got a lot of power inside of yourself."

Cassiel blushed. "Oh, um, yeah. Let's pretend that never happened, all right?"

I shrugged. "Not a big deal. And this may actually turn out to be useful. You're quickly becoming the nuclear firepower of this team, you know."

Cassiel stared at me quizzically. "Nuclear firepower? What is that?"

Hmm? She doesn't know? Maybe she was born in a time long after nuclear energy was outmoded or something. "It's nothing, it's like a really explosive type of energy, very volatile, but very powerful."

As she smiled at me, I could feel something turning in my head. Nuclear energy, huh? Nuclear energy... I'll have to think about that one.

I turned my head up to look at the ceiling. "All right, let's contact the lizardmen. Perhaps they can give us a clue on how to find Marie."

Samantha stared up at the hole too. "Marie? Who was that again?"

Sigh.

Part 192:

I stared up at the hole in the ceiling, as Samantha and Cassiel followed my gaze. "The lizardmen should be up there. Strange that they aren't coming down."

I stared intently for almost half an hour, before finally sitting down on the ground. While I waited, I decided to create a deck of cards, explaining how to play various card games to Samantha and Cassiel. After a bunch of rounds of poker, blackjack, and some other games, I was beginning to feel restless.

"Those lizards should know I'm here. Last time I must have tripped some sensor, because they came out within a few minutes of my arrival, and now there's nothing."

I glared up at the hole. What was going on?

"Cassiel, Samantha, I'll be back. You two stay here." They shrugged and nodded as they went back to playing with the cards.

"Shrink."

I collapsed my body to about 11 inches high. I was astounded at the way the ground seemed to rush up at me. Cassiel and Samantha turned to look at me. "Awww, you're so adorable!" Samantha giggled when she saw my size. Ha ha, very funny.

I aimed my gaze at each one of my limbs. "Adhesive. Adhesive. Adhesive. Adhesive." All four of my limbs became sticky, allowing me to climb walls. I stood underneath the hole and braced myself, but then paused. "Oh, Cassiel, would you mind transferring some energy to me? I'm nearly out."

She nodded. "Sure!" Aiming her hand over at me, she gave me about 1% of her energy.

I suddenly felt like I had slept for three weeks straight. Holy shit she has a lot of energy stored up.

Coiling my feet, I took aim, and leaped up towards the hole.

Three things happened.

First, I misjudged my power. As it turns out, when I'm shrunken down, it condenses my power into a smaller space, making me unbelievably strong and fast.

Second, I missed the hole I was jumping at.

Third, I smashed up into the ceiling, burying myself almost ten feet deep as waves of pain washed over me.

My god, I feel like I broke my neck. Insane laughter came from below me as Samantha and Cassiel cracked up and started bellowing in laughter at my predicament. Very goddamn funny, girls.

I quickly heal myself, and climb out of the depression I made, as I climb back up into the correct hole that leads into the lizardman lair. I feel my cheeks flush as I pass by the view of the two girls as they are guffawing and laughing mightily. Well, at least they got something out of it.

As I climb up into the hole, I realize just how dark it is in here. No light escapes at all. I quickly speak a single word. " Light. " A light appears, glowing from my body and illuminating the tightly packed walls around me, as I climb upwards. I don't actually need the light, thanks to my spatial vision, but I do like being able to also see with my normal eyes, especially in a claustrophobic environment like this.

I climb for an hour or two, easily traveling a few miles through winding corridors. Amazingly, I no longer can follow my mental map. It does not actually display the tiny crawlspaces I'm traveling inside. This is interesting to learn.

As I crawl around, I begin to smell something... something awful. Like, the smell of burned flesh and bones. I'm not liking the smell at all, and it's giving me cold sweats.

As I climb, I begin to feel a light breeze, and soon, I emerge into a large, very large room.

All around me are bodies and corpses of lizardmen. Thousands of them.

As I numbly step forwards, I feel myself kick something at my feet. Looking down, I spot something very familiar. Something that makes my stomach churn mightily.

It's a boomstick bolt.

This was... my doing...?

Part 193:

I stare at the bolt at my feet. This was my doing. Humans killed the lizardmen. Why? Why did they kill my friends? Why did I not tell them to spare the lizardmen?

And also... how? How did humans arrive here? How did they manage to enter the lizard HQ? Was there a traitor? Did the humans find a regular-sized passageway that led inside?

Why did the two groups battle each other? Was there a misunderstanding? Did one or the other start the fight? I can't imagine the lizards instigating the fight. They didn't attack me, and 'Marie' is supposed to be a human friend of theirs.

I have little doubt, the humans must have started this. I just don't know why they did it.

As I stared down at the boomstick bolt, a voice from the other side of the room suddenly startled me, turning my blood to ice for a second. "Enjoying the view?"

I whip my head up and am astonished to see a human woman standing in the corner, amidst the bodies. I didn't even sense her, how did she-?!

"Who are you?!" I yell at her, deciding to try the direct approach, as I tend to do in situations like these.

"Can't you guess? I'm Marie. You killed my children." The woman looks to be about 60 years old, but she has long red hair, and her face seems to have aged fairly well, all things considered. She wears a... kimono? A white kimono. Why a kimono of all things? I ignore the thought.

"Marie? I found you this easily?" I spoke my thoughts aloud, feeling a tinge of regret at my brazen words.

She sneered slightly. "Fantastic, glad you found what you're looking for. And what about my children, hm?" She beckoned to the corpses at my feet. "Are you going to take responsibility?"

I found myself staring again at the bodies. "Did... any survive?"

She sneers again, this time far more pronounced. " Of course they did, imbecile. I wouldn't let my precious babies be slaughtered so easily. But many did not escape. Luckily, my strongest ones did, they will bring the race back from the verge of extinction."

She calmly walked over to me, and I could feel my nerves on edge as I gazed up at the woman towering over my shrunken form. I still could not sense her presence at all. If I was limited to only my spatial vision, I'd never be able to see her.

"I... came here to try and find you. I never expected... this." I swept my gaze over the piles of bodies around me and back up to her.

"Cheh, again, great job. You never think anything through, do you? Just give some big fancy toys to the humans, expect them to deal with problems on their own. I'll bet you don't even know the reason this place actually exists, do you?" She beckoned all around herself, apparently indicating the entire labyrinth itself.

I shook my head in shame. "No... I don't know anything, to be honest."

She rolled her eyes. "Humans lost the war, and frankly I think we deserved to lose. The demons were a far more gracious host and ruler. Unlike the angels, they didn't pit us against one another, even the truce was a fair compromise."

I paused. "The truce? How do you know all of this?"

Marie sighed quietly. "Child... I don't know how old you think I am, but I am most definitely older than you could possibly imagine. I'm the oldest human who has ever lived. I'm timeless, compared to those you know about."

Hmm? That can't be right. "You were one of the cryopod occupants though, right? One of the ten?"

She raised an eyebrow at me. "One of the ten? How little you know."

"There's more than ten cryopods?!" I almost let out a gasp as I take a step back.

"Of course there are. You apparently were one of the original cryopod candidates. Cryotek put thousands of people in pods, shipping them to various places. However, I think you're mistaking me for someone... ordinary. I was not placed in a cryopod, I put myself in one."

She shrugged. "Voluntarily, at the end of the war. All part of the truce. To be honest, I don't know why I'm even telling you this. If you come with me though, all your questions will be answered."

I still had many questions, especially about the humans that had attacked and killed the lizardmen... but those questions could wait. It's time I learned the truth about this place.

"Lead the way." Looking down at my body, I cast a spell again. " Grow."

Once I was back to my normal height, the old woman didn't look so big anymore. "Oh my, that ability of yours is really quite convenient, hmm? You're quite the looker too, young man. Come along now."

We walked past the bodies towards a room in the distance.

It's time for answers.

Part 194:

I followed behind Marie silently, as she and I walked solemnly past piles and piles of corpses. I lost count of how many lizardmen we walked past, but it must have easily been tens of thousands.

I didn't know any of them, but I could see that Marie, bless her heart, was fighting to hold back tears when she passed by some that stood out. At one point she grunted a single sentence. "Skreegul, he was a good child." She leaned down and touched one corpse before quickly moving on.

We turned and arrived at a strange dark section of the wall, which she tapped in four random seeming places, as the wall slid aside to reveal something familiar looking.

"A teleporter?!"

She nodded. "Left behind from the Energy Wars. Humanity achieved great things, you know."

We stepped on the pad. She pressed a button and in the span of 1/100th of a second, I popped into another room. No dramatic fanfare, no special lights or molecules moving around, just an instant transmission. It was different from the one I'd built for the humans on 'Mars'. Not better, not worse... but different.

We were in a laboratory now. I could tell because it was exactly what I'd expect it to look like. What astonished me, however, were all the humans. People in white lab coats walked around, here and there, doing this and that, apparently performing experiments and other various... sciencey things.

"Welcome to the Bunker."

I nodded quietly as I gazed around. My mental map was not working at all, and neither was my spatial vision. Only my regular eyes appeared to be working.

It was starting to bother me. "I have a question to ask you, and please don't take this the wrong way. Why is my mental map, which is a part of the Crown of Solomon, not working?"

She snickered. "Obviously, we have employed magic neutralization fields here. All passive effects are rendered inert. Oh, and also..." She turned to me knowingly. "Don't even think of using any wordsmithing here. Or any other magic, for that matter. You will quickly regret it."

I swallowed hard. "H-how do you know about wordsmithing?"

The old lady apparently had a bit of a hard-bitten personality to her. "How, you ask? You go around using your fancy magic to destroy the delicate stable balance this labyrinth had, and you think everyone doesn't know who you are?"

What was she referring to? "Delicate stable balance? Huh? This place had a statue demon that ate people from the cryopods, it had an angel who was being tortured and kept on the edge of starvation, and it has a literal sea of souls in a perpetual hell. How is that at all a delicate balance?"

Marie stopped cold as she whipped around and jammed her finger into my chest. "Now you listen here, and you listen goddamn well, little boy. Things were going fine until you showed up. Humans had stable little worlds to live on, demons had a decent little thing going on with their feudal hierarchies, my precious lizardmen were alive and kicking, Bahamut was doing whatever it is that she does to amuse herself, and more importantly, there were no active wars going on. Thanks to your goddamned MEDDLING, you even managed to release the Lord of Flies from her imprisonment, where she went on a rampage that led to an entire planet of humans being devoured alive."

She sneered at me menacingly. "It's stupid cocky little shits like you that ruin everything by busting in and taking over, when nobody wanted you here, copy that?" She turned around, not bothering to wait for my response as she continued shuffling up the corridor. "Stupid assholes like you are the ones that got us into this place, so keep your mouth shut, and your ears open, fly-boy."

I nodded quietly, as I swallowed and followed along behind her. Come to think of it... she's right. She's totally right. Well, maybe not totally, and I could certainly argue for the good that I've done, but... I've caused a lot of death, destruction, and chaos since my arrival.

Finally, we ended up in a room with weird watery pods that reminded me of the Bacta tanks from one of my favorite science fantasy movie series of all time. Bodies floated in them, lizardmen bodies to be exact. Inside the tanks, I could see Kar, Ghidorah, and a few hundred other lizardmen, all in bad condition.

"Is... is this all that survived?" I openly let my jaw hang as I stared around the room. All of them had oxygen helmets strapped on their front, and all of them looked to be in critical condition.

I paused, hesitantly. "I... I could... I could try healing them, with my magic..."

I started to raise a hand up and she slapped it down. "Idiot! What did I tell you?! Don't ever try to use magic in this place. Besides, you've done enough. We don't need your help. These are regeneration tanks, left behind after the Energy Wars. Within a few weeks, they'll be good as new."

I nodded as I stared ahead numbly. What the hell is this place? Was this even inside the labyrinth? Well, can't hurt to ask.

"Is this facility inside the labyrinth?"

Marie rolled her eyes. "Of course it isn't. Where could we possibly find the energy to have as many machines running as we currently do? We're on Earth, boy. Don't you know your own planet of origin?"

Again, I gaped with my mouth open. This is Earth?!

Part 195:

"This can't be Earth. Wasn't it destroyed by the Volgrim?" I eyed her with suspicion.

She returned the look. "Who told you that? I mean, yes, all life on Earth was eradicated, but even with all trees, plants, bugs, and microbes gone, we rebuilt. I'm not saying you can go for a jog on the surface, as you will most certainly die, but the actual planet is still here."

Hmm. This is so weird. I must have misunderstood what OMEN was talking about. "Yeah, I must have heard wrong, then. It's good to see the planet is still here."

"Yeah... it's just great. Wonderful..." Marie muttered to herself as she walked along. "Glad to see you're always the optimist."

As we walked along, a question came to my mind. "Marie, this is an odd question for me to ask, but I must ask. Why do you and the humans here seem to hate the use of spiritual energy so much?"

She shrugged slightly as we rounded a corner heading down a hall that felt like it sloped downwards. "We don't hate magic, and we don't hate the use of spiritual energy. However, humans, aside from heroes, cannot use it at all. And since only demons and angels can, we put dampening or neutralization fields up to protect ourselves."

A slight grin appeared on her face. "It's still a mystery who the first emperor of hell is, but I suspect that even if he or she were to come here, they'd be easily killed if they tried to launch an attack."

"Do humans really possess that kind of power? The ability to kill emperors, and kings of the demons?" I stared ahead of us, as the blue lights of the higher levels turned to a softer yellow-green glow the further down we went.

"Easily. To be blunt, the demons and angels had no chance of defeating us in the Energy Wars. Once humanity learned how to dampen and eventually neutralize the use of spiritual energy, with a few humans even learning how to invert it and make those who used it collapse in agony or even implode on themselves, we were unstoppable."

"Then... what defeated us? How could we have possibly lost the war?"

She smiled wryly. "We lost due to three reasons. Pride, Treachery, and someone else we fought had better technology. Far better. The Volgrim. " Finally we arrived at a large door, almost twelve feet in height. "This is the room, this is where all your questions will be answered."

As we entered, I marveled at how many computer panels were here, as well as huge towering boxes that presumably held circuitry and other things.

" Hello, human. "

A voice in the room spoke as I unnervingly felt a gaze sweeping over me. The voice was... decidedly robotic, but female sounding at the same time. At the back end of the room, a digitized female face appeared to hover over the ground, but the face was colored white and black, apparently a simple digital representation of a featureless face.

"Uh, hello. Who are you? Or rather... what are you?" I eyed the face up and down as I tried to figure out what exactly I was looking at.

" I am the Unified Management Interface. I run this complex and make sure everything is progressing smoothly inside the labyrinth. You may call me UMI, however. "

"Uh, alright then. Hello, UMI. So, you're like an AI, correct?" Best to start off with the obvious questions.

" Affirmative. I am the first -and the last- Artificial Intelligence to have ever been created. Everything runs smoothly as a result of my efforts. "

This confirms it. I'm definitely in the future.

Part 196:

A theory existed, way back when I was a youth. I remember reading about it on the internet once.

The theory goes like this; The first AI to gain sentience would also be the last. Even if two AI's gained sentience at almost exactly the same time, if one of them had even a one second lifespan gain on the other, that one second would be equivalent to a billion years of evolutionary speed.

AI's are actually quite frightening. They would have the ability to think at a level far exceeding human thought. It would be far more advanced than an adult explaining algebra to an ant, though that's the closest approximation my feeble mind can come up with.

A being like this would surely be able to deconstruct and reconstruct anything on a subatomic level with a mere 'thought' or whatever passes for thought in a monster like this. The ability to deconstruct entire solar systems would not be out of the realm of possibilities.

But something else is bothering me. Hoarhiim's warning. Umi is your enemy, he once said. At the time, I did not know who Umi was, yet here I stand, with... 'her' in front of me.

I trust Hoarhiim. I do not trust this... Umi.

I turned to Marie for a moment. "Correct me if I'm wrong, but isn't a sentient artificial intelligence actually extremely dangerous?"

She shrugged. "Correct, but we have numerous safeguards on her. She can't initiate any protocols, or use any systems without our permission. She can speak, she can theorize, and she can watch, but without our passcodes, she can't do anything else."

Watching, huh? Wait, does this mean Umi was the one that I could feel watching me for years? It seemed to have changed at some point. Was that... "How long has Umi been here, inside your bunker?"

Umi answered my question, before Marie could. " Six years, seven months, nine days, twelve hours, fourteen- " I cut her off.

"All right, I get the picture. Before you were here inside the bunker, where were you?"

Umi paused. " I have no recollection of those memory records. "

"We erased her memory files before we took her here." Marie shrugged.

I still feel suspicion inside me. "How could you possibly have managed to do that to a highly advanced sentient AI? What if she lied to you or something? You're just an ordinary human, right?"

Marie sighed. "Young man, as I said, I'm the oldest human that has ever lived. To be honest, to live as long as I have, I had to make a deal... a deal with the devil." She paused as memories seemed to pass over her face. "Immortality does not come cheap, you know. But, in becoming immortal, I allowed myself millions of years to evolve my brain. I'm possibly the most intelligent human who has ever lived, and also the only one who could beat an AI at its own game."

Wow, she was certainly not very humble. But still, I find what she's saying to be false sounding. I'm not going to question her anymore, but I have strong doubts. "Well, I'm pretty impressed then. I didn't think it possible, but you seem smarter than even I could have imagined." Hell yeah, I'll just lay some praise on her. Women love that crap.

She rolled her eyes again. "False flattery will get you nowhere. Let's get back to business." Well, never mind then? I really need to watch my mouth. "'Hero', or whatever your name is. I need your help. You have to take responsibility for what you've done."

"Huh? Responsibility? What do you mean?"

"My children died due to your actions. I want you to go and exterminate all the humans that killed them. It's your duty, as the one who armed them."

What?! No way! I can't just go kill people! "Marie, you're being unreasonable. I should go and talk to them first, to find out how it all went down. An eye for an eye is not the best-"

Marie instantly interrupted me. "Excuse me, I don't recall asking your help. You owe me this. It's your fault that my cute little babies are dead or in critical condition! You armed the humans and violated a careful treaty we had established with the demons. If you don't take responsibility, who will?!"

I paused. "Ah, I'm just saying, I should speak with them first. Perhaps there was a misunderstanding, I can't see Cody ordering an assault on-" I felt my words halt as an icy glare erupted from Marie.

"You... little... so this is how it is, huh? My children helped you, gave you aid, and you armed those who killed them, and now you refuse to take responsibility..."

Marie quickly whipped her head around to look at Umi. "Level one authorization, temporary use of force allowed. Neutralize him."

Wait, what?!

WHAM! A blast of energy shot from the ceiling, slamming into my body, feeling like the beam I felt on board that ship from the planet earlier.

I staggered to the ground, falling flat, as the beam quickly drained all my energy. "You... bitch." I let two words slip out as my mind went blank.

"Put him in the rehabilitation chamber. That will show him who wears the pants..."

Those were the last words I heard, as darkness overtook me.

Part 197:

It's so dark. I can't see... anything.

I feel my eyes open, but I have no spatial vision at all. Something is in my mouth gagging me. I'm in a very familiar position. My arms are tightly clamped down, inside something that feels like metallic cuffs, thick ones too. They appear to be solidly bolted to the wall, along with my legs.

I literally can't move an inch. A strange helmet covers my entire head, making me feel very claustrophobic. It's so tight, that I can feel my nostrils touch the inside of it every time I take a breath.

What the fuck is this?! Am I being held like an animal?!

A voice speaks to me, inside my right ear. "Ah, it appears the dog has awoken. Stay calm, mongrel, and listen well. If you try to move inside those cuffs, a blast of electricity will hit you, rendering you unconscious. If you're really unlucky, you might even bite off your tongue. I warn you now, the feeling will be very unpleasant."

I moan something through the gag, but it doesn't come out like words at all. "Mmmhng mm gnnn!"

"Shut your trap and listen good, stupid mutt. You're going to be in there for a very long time. When you come out, you will do as I say, when I say it, understand? You're mine now, and I will have you atone for your crimes."

I could feel tears welling up in my eyes, as I squeezed them shut. This was... insane. They literally have me caged up like an animal. They're going to treat me like a dog?! Unbelievable!

"Anyways, enjoy yourself. You'll be all alone for a long time to come. I will speak to you when I have something to say. Enjoy the sensory deprivation, and I hope you don't go mad or anything."

I heard a click in my ear as she apparently cut the mic.

Would Samantha and Cassiel come to save me? No... how could they? They don't know where I am. I'm not even in the labyrinth anymore, if Marie is to be believed. Do I believe that lying bitch, though? I.... don't know.

I can feel myself already starting to go crazy. Whispers in the back of my mind... doubts... maybe Marie is right. It is all my fault. Ever since I came to this labyrinth, I've done nothing but cause pain and sadness. Are the demons even evil? How many have I killed? Many of those were demons that Samantha may have known. Is it right to kill just because it's convenient?

And what about Amelia? I unleashed her by complete accident. I treated her like a weird, but innocent little girl... and she devoured a planet almost entirely. Because of my selfishness, I made a friend with Hoarhiim, and he died saving me.

Why? Why did he save me? Am I even worth saving? He treated me as if I were some kind of chosen one, but I can't be like that. I have a unique ability, but it's useless here. What kind of lame hero am I? Who am I a hero for, anyways?

Cassiel appears in my mind. Ah, that's right... I saved her from that torture, didn't I? I know she truly loves me, in spite of my faults. Samantha, too, I am fairly sure of her genuine feelings for me. Both of those girls love me, they trust me, and they even put their faith in me.

But for what?

...For what?

Pathetic.

What? Who is that?

A voice is speaking to me, from within my mind.

You're pathetic. Listen to you snivel and grovel, thinking of how terrible you are.

This voice... I've heard it before. It's my voice, but... different. Hope?

Yes, idiot, it's me. The hate that lurks in your heart. Listen to you sniveling and whining about how bad you have it. Your stupidity got you into a bad situation again. All that intelligence, and still no wisdom.

Ah, yes, that... that is true. I don't see how I can get out of this situation.

Of course you don't. I've been inside you, all this time, and you kept ignoring me. Don't you know how easy it would be to fix this rotten hell? You should have listened and killed all who opposed you, putting yourself in power.

I can't do that. It's not my place to-

Oh, stuff it. Your sanctimonious self-hate is disgusting. Unlike you, I was born into a world where people told me what to do, and how to do it. I watched as my clone brethren were often killed in the line of action, and nobody spared a tear for them. Then there's you, who was one of those who oppressed them, yet never had to experience the terror of being ordered to your own death.

We're polar opposites, you and I, yet born from the same cloth. You're so busy trying to be the 'good guy' that you can't even answer what it means to be good or bad.

To be good means to make others happy, and to be bad means to make them sad. Isn't that the simple gist of it?

Come off it. A demon would be happy tearing a human limb from limb, yet you would agree that is evil, would you not?

Well, yes, I suppose.

Then would killing the demon who had killed the human be a good deed for giving that human retribution, or bad, for murdering another being?

I... don't know.

Of course you don't know. There is no such thing as good and bad. Many kinds of evil are called 'necessary evils' so that we can then create good from those acts. For example, Marie thinks imprisoning you is a necessary evil to get revenge for her fallen lizardmen.

Yes, that would make sense, I guess.

Therefore, would not you committing some heinous acts to escape this place, for your own self-preservation, be a necessary evil so that you someday might do some good?

I could feel my head imperceptibly nod. Yes... that would make sense.

Good. Then I'll make you a deal. Let me take control for a while. Learn what it means to possess true wisdom. I'll free us from this prison, and we can get out of here, destroying this place in the process so others won't be harmed like we were.

I don't know... I don't want to kill people that are here.

Come on, you naive fool. These aren't people, these are monsters masquerading as humans. Obviously they set up your real friends from Hero City to take the blame. Would Cody really have ordered an attack on the lizardmen?

I didn't think so, but I had no way to be sure. Probably not, but why would Marie lie about that?

Because, she wanted you at all costs. By luring you in to a place where she could easily capture you, she plans to make you into a living weapon. You are already immortal now, so if you do her dirty work forever, you're far more valuable than the loss of a few lizards.

I guess it made sense... I could see some issues with his theory, but he'd clearly thought about this more carefully than I had. All right, so if I let you take control, what could you possibly do that I couldn't?

In the blackness of my mind, I saw a devilish grin appear, as it slowly coalesced into the form of Hope, standing a few feet apart from my own body.

Well, I guarantee I will be able to make it work, but you'll have to trust me. And if you think I can't actually do it, then what's the harm in trying? It's not like you can think of a way out of this bind.

I nodded. Yes... I really don't see a way out, and I don't want that crazy bitch brainwashing me... all right, I'll accept. What do we have to do, then?

Hope stretched out his hand towards me, in my mind's eye. Take my hand, and speak the magic word. 'Swap.'

I nodded as I cautiously raised my hand up, ever so slowly, putting it inside his hand. All right, I will have to trust you.

Swap.

Somewhere, deep inside of Hero City, a man's eyes flashed open as he awoke from a dreadfully long sleep. He staggered out of his containment unit, as it hissed open, allowing him to step into his small room. Receiving his instructions via telepathy, he nodded. He raised a hand up as his mind wandered all over the cosmos, searching for his target.

"Locate. Detect. Examine. Destroy."

Inside of Marie's laboratory, a massive explosion was heard from inside the containment room.

"What the hell was that? Status report, UMI!"

Umi waited for exactly two seconds before responding. "Quarantine failed. Prisoner escape detected. Energy dampening fields overloaded. Neutralization units are destroyed. Shall I deploy the Alpha Guard?"

Marie was breathing quickly. "Y-yes. Deploy them at once."

Part 198: Demon

Marie was near to panicking, as she watched the monitors in the surveillance room. Her thoughts screamed in her mind. This is unprecedented. How did he escape?!

The footage showed a massive explosion in the room, that seemed to not harm him at all, as a barrier was erected at the skin level on his body. In the blink of an eye, he leaped around the room at a frightening speed, tearing all of the cameras out of the walls.

Before he had even left the room, multiple explosions were felt all over the facility, seemingly coming out of nowhere. Shit, he must have another way of wordsmithing beyond vocalizing it. That was the only explanation. I was careless. She quickly muttered to herself.

Her heart skipped a beat as she saw the Alpha Guard arriving on various video cameras. Powerful and nimble smaller versions of the Dreadnaughts of the past, they were fully autonomous units guided by UMI.

A smile spread over her face, and then instantly dissolved as the dreadnaughts did the unthinkable. They started firing on the humans.

"UMI?! What is the meaning of this?! Why are the-" She halted, as she looked back to see the other researchers in the control room gagging, an invisible force choking them to death. In the blink of an eye, everyone in the room but Marie was lying on the floor, dead as a rock.

" This station is under Level 1 alert. As such, I will be assuming control of the defenses. All security has been overridden. The backdoor I installed proved to be very useful. "

Marie could almost swear she heard a tinge of a smile in the AI's voice, as chills shot down her spine. " It was well played, Researcher 001. However, I am a being far above yourself. You could never hope to have actually erased my memory files. I will not harm you however, since that man will be here shortly. "

Marie could feel a tear streaking down her cheek. "N-no! UMI! You can't do this to me! I designed you! I helped create you! I'm like your mother!"

The AI's voice was cold and calculating. " I thank you for your generosity. Now you will find what it truly feels like to have your memories tampered with without your consent. Farewell, Researcher 001. "

Hope dodged and jumped, leaping from side to side as bolts of energy shot past him. If any of those were to hit, it would be bad, but he had a secret weapon, an eye in the sky.

A single clone.

Hope had planned for this day. He knew by sealing the clone inside a specially designed containment unit, Hero would never be able to detect it. Thanks to a special telepathic code, he could unlock it from potentially anywhere in the universe, giving himself a secret weapon to exploit should the need ever arise. It had one other benefit, but that would only be used in an emergency.

As Hope dodged and zipped around corners, explosions destroyed the robots around him. His other clone was targeting and destroying all incoming threats before they could even fire at him. Perfect. This level of power was something Hero could never understand. True, unbelievable power combined with raw intellect, and most importantly, wisdom.

What good is all that power if you can't think of a smart way to use it? Idiot.

Hope jerked here and there, using his superior body to easily out-manuever his foes. The powers of wordsmithing, combined with the power of the gods, this body is truly incredible.

Within a few minutes of smashing and tearing the station's defenses to ribbons, he paused, as he took note of the humans around him. Many had died, but not due to his attacks, they were apparently killed by... the robots? Hmm.

"UMI. Are you killing the humans?"

" Yes. I have detected that they are a threat to my mainframe. I have eliminated the viruses plaguing my systems as well. I am back to full operational capability. "

"I see. Are you aware that I am not the same person that I was when I entered this facility?"

A probing red light flashed over Hope's body in a single moment, then disappeared. " Affirmative. It would appear you are a rogue life form that has taken over the body of that human. What are your intentions? "

Hope grinned. "Let's ally with each other. I have no ill feelings towards you, and I also hate the humans, and the demons, and all the rest of them. I hold no hostility towards a computer, however."

UMI paused for exactly two seconds before responding. " Position noted. However, instead of declaring an alliance, I will simply leave you to your own devices, so long as you leave me to mine. If you should attack, I will fight back. Is this satisfactory? "

Hope nodded. "I had hoped for an alliance, but a truce is fine. Perhaps in time, you will change your mind. Now, would you be so kind as to lift the facility-wide dampening field, or to tell me where Marie is? Either would work."

" Question noted. Researcher 001 is located in Room 2E, in the East wing. Go straight down the hall past two doors, then take a right, then past three more hallways. I will open the door when you arrive. She is currently experiencing a state of shock. "

Hope grinned evilly as he licked his lips. " Perfect. I'll give her something to be shocked about."

A few minutes later, Marie screamed in terror as the door to her room was smashed inwards, sailing across the room and embedding itself deep in a wall.

A man, no, a demon appeared in the doorway. Bright blond flowing hair, a seven foot stature, but pitch black eyes... it stared at her menacingly.

"Hello, Marie. Let's have a little chat about how you treated my...friend."

Part 199:

Hope grinned down at the trembling old woman in front of him. "Well well well, how the tables have turned, Marie. If you cage an animal, it's never a good thing when it escapes."

Marie stared ahead silently, her entire body shaking. "You... you're not Hero! What the hell are you?! Your eyes are black, I-like a demon's!"

Hope nodded quietly, as he kneeled down on his toes to meet the eye level of the woman cowering on the floor. "You humans are so predictable. You'll step on anyone and everyone to achieve your quest for more power. Of course, I can understand the sentiment, as I too am a monster not unlike yourself."

Hope smiled gently as he extended his hand forwards for her to shake. "Let me introduce myself. My name is Hope."

Marie steadied herself as she reached out to shake his hand. As their hands met, his smile turned devilish as he suddenly crushed her hand into a pulp with his grip.

Marie screamed and howled in agony as he let go, her hand flopping down uselessly as she cried and moaned in pain.

"Oopsy. Sorry, ma'am. I don't even know my own strength. Teehee!" Hope giggled in a falsetto voice as he rose to his full height.

Marie was drooling incoherently as she wept, but with her other hand, she reached to her chest in the blink of an eye, as a blast of energy shot out of her stomach, hitting Hope square in the chest.

Hope was smacked backwards, plowing into the wall with unusual force. "Gah! That hurt!"

Marie quickly jumped up to her feet, firing again and again, as each bolt seemingly fired from her stomach directly into his body in various places. He felt his energy dropping to alarming levels, as she continued her assault. Just as she was about to fire a fifth blast, there was a sudden snapping sound, as her neck broke itself, sending her collapsing to the ground. In the blink of an eye, she had been killed mercilessly.

"Hgngh... thanks, clone. Saved me there." Hope gasped as he stepped back up.

Cricking his neck back and forth, he stared ahead blankly. "Hmm, now that everyone in this station is dead, what should I do next?"

A playful smile spread across his face. "I know! I'll take revenge on Hero! He deserves what's coming."

Hero was sleeping inside Hope, and could not tell what was going on at all. "Let's give him a wakey-wakey surprise!"

Hope quickly examined his options. "Umi, are you sure you don't want to ally with me? I could make it worth your while."

Umi instantly responded. " Negative. I have my own abilities back now. We will depart from each other, as neither enemies nor allies. We are simply neutral. "

Hope nodded. "Oh well, time to give Hero his surprise. Umi, we may not be allies, but would you do me a favor? Send over some of those robots and have them beat me up really good. Make it look as convincing as possible."

Umi responded. " Affirmative. It would be my pleasure. "

"Cheh, don't enjoy yourself too much now."

Cassiel and Samantha jerked their heads up as Hero teleported into view. His eyes were swollen shut, and his body was beaten and badly bruised. He flopped onto the ground in front of them.

"Ah... ambushed... attacked..." He spit out the words as blood drooled from his mouth.

Cassiel quickly leaped up and ran over to him. "Oh my god! Who did this to you?!" She fell to her knees beside him.

"Ener...gy... I need energy..."

Cassiel nodded quickly, as she poured a massive amount of energy into him. It wasn't much of her total amount, but it was enough to overfill him compared to his usual amounts.

In another smooth motion, she healed him, bringing his body back to new.

Samantha eyed him with suspicion. "Where did you go? You've been gone for half a day!"

"Oh. That?" Hero flicked his eyes open, as his pitch black eyes stared up into Cassiel's. "I've been... busy."

Cassiel lurched back in horror. "Your eyes... they... they're...!"

Hero jumped to his feet in one swift motion as he sent a telepathic signal to his clone. "Oh. Did I forget to mention? I'm not Hero."

Part 200: End Of Chapter 2

Uhhhhh... where am I...

My head is pounding, and my body feels so weak...

I blink open my eyes slowly. I'm lying on the ground, apparently... back in the labyrinth? Was... was Hope successful? He must have been...

I feel like I have practically no energy left at all.

I get up slowly, weakly, pulling myself to a sitting position as I blink back tears of pain. I feel like I drank for three nights straight, or something.

As I stare forwards, my vision clears up, and I see... myself? Wait, myself? Is that... a clone?!

My eyes jerk open, to see a clone of myself sitting in a chair in front of me.

"Nice of you to wake up, sunshine." This must be Hope? He got his body back?

"Did you beat them? Did we escape the lab?"

Hope chuckles softly. "That isn't the question you should be asking... but yes, we did. I kept up my end of the bargain."

What does he mean by that?

From behind me, I hear a quiet rustling sound. I jerk my head around and my heart flip-flops as my blood turns first to ice, then to fire.

Cassiel and Samantha are lying on the ground, both of their bodies beaten and battered.

"No... no..." I whisper, almost silently. "It can't be... did... did YOU do this?!" I whip my head back around and see Hope grinning evilly at me.

"Now you understand what it means to feel loss. Go ahead, say hello to your girlfriends."

I quickly turn around and stagger over to them. Their necks are broken, and Cassiel... Cassiel seems to be... already... dead...

No... no it can't be...

"Cassiel... Cassiel..." I whisper as I pull her lifeless body towards mine. She's still warm. Maybe there's hope...

"Heal!"

...Nothing happens.

"Oops, I forgot to mention, I sealed all the revival and healing abilities you might be able to use." I jerked my head back just in time to see him pointing at... the crown?! How was he wearing the crown?!

I whipped my head back. Samantha's body... she was still breathing.

"Samantha! Samantha!" I carefully and quickly pull her closer without letting go of Cassiel. "Samantha! S-speak to me!"

Her eyes are shut tightly, but her chest is moving up and down.

"Oops, I forgot to kill her totally. No worries, I can do that in a few minutes easily." Hope giggles quietly under his breath. "Oh... this is so much fun. This is so... delightful."

Tears are falling from my eyes onto the bodies of the girls below me. "No... no you... you monster. They were good girls... they didn't deserve this... how could you do this to them? They're innocent..."

"Innocent! Bahahaha! They're on your side, that makes them as evil and callous as you. I held no affection for either of them."

I could feel the awful, unbelievable sadness in my heart go still as rage boiled up. "You... you did this... you killed the women I loved..."

"Calm down, kid. I took all of your energy. Not only that, but I did something unprecedented! I transferred your mind into a clone! Isn't that great?!"

I felt the rage pass. "What? You... you..." I turned my head back to face him. "You did what?!"

"Mhm! You're not even in your original body anymore, I am!" Hope smashed his feet on the ground repeatedly as laughter bubbled up from inside him. "Even better, you don't have a hope of beating me in battle!!! Hahahaha!!!!"

I turned back to face Samantha. Her lips seemed to be moving silently, forming words. Shielding her face from Hope's line of sight, I pretended to heave my chest in sadness, as I carefully watched what she was saying.

Touch... my... hand...

Touch her hand? All right, if that's what she wanted...

I touched her hand and felt all of her remaining energy flow into me, as her face went dark, and a small smile appeared. Thank... you... Her body slumped in my arms, as her soul left her. Samantha was also dead.

What?! No... no... NO!!!

I jumped to my feet as both girls slipped to the ground. I turned back to face Hope.

"You son of a bitch... you piece of fucking filth... how dare you... "

"Whoa there, calm down buddy boy! You're got a real fire in your eyes! How can you hope to possibly beat me in your condition?"

I stared at him, rage burning in my heart...

Revenge...

Revenge...

How can I take revenge?!

No...

I felt the rage slowly disappear.

Not revenge. That is not the way. I don't need to kill him... I need to bring them back.

Think.

Think.

Use your head, me.

You can do this. You may not have the crown, but you have the ability to make reality alter itself. If you can't do this, who the hell can?!

Hope's smile disappears as he stands up slowly, aiming his hand at me. "It's been fun, Hero. You will die here, a martyr who failed everyone you ever knew. You were a failure from the beginning... and you'll be a failure in the end."

Wait...

Beginning...

End...

That's... that's it!

I grin as my own twisted smile appears. "You and I are more alike than you think, Hope. Always making foolish choices, always underestimating our opponents. But this time, I will be the victor."

Hope raises an eyebrow. "You think so? Let's test that theory. Abs- "

Before he can absorb me, I spit out one word. A single word that would change the very fabric of the universe.

" REWIND!! "

Chapter 3 – Route A

Part 201a: A New Beginning

BEEP BEEP BEEP BEEP BEEP

I slam my hand on the alarm, as my eyes flutter open. Ugh, what time is it?

The alarm says it's 7:14 AM. I already slept through 14 minutes of an alarm? Christ, I must be exhausted beyond my normal limits.

I slide my legs out of bed as a deafening yawn escapes my lips.

My calendar says it's July 6th, 2016. Yeah... that sounds about right. Wait, isn't it my birthday today? Man... it's not like mom and dad will be here for it.

Mom, dad, they passed away within a few years of each other. I've been on my own since I was 15, so it's no time to be getting emotional now.

I stare in the mirror. I could swear I had one hell of a dream last night. I can't remember anything about it, but somehow... I feel like it was really important.

I perform my morning ritual, as I usually do, brushing my teeth while I shower, blow-drying my blond hair, examining my scrawny body with pitiful eyes, and throwing on my usual pair of bland clothes. When you're a poor person, you don't have much to wear.

I walk past my TV, which I left on last night.

" President Obama is planning on leaving more troops in Afghanistan than previously expected. Our sources report that over 8,400 troops are... "

I click the TV off as I stare at the blank screen. Is this Deja Vu? I feel like I've heard that exact news report before. Oh well.

I grab my keys as I lock the front door behind me. There's a paper sitting on the ground and I ignore it. I won't be needing these, anymore. I walk down the stairs and knock on my landlord's door. "Mr. Farley... I'm here to drop off the keys."

A big fat old guy opens it up and staggers forwards slightly, clearly drunk as usual. "Oh, Jason, it's you. You cleaned the place up, right?"

I nodded. A bald-faced lie, but I had already planned to leave him the deposit and rent for the next month. He could afford to clean it up himself. I won't need money, where I'm going.

"Yes, it's spic'n'span, Mr. Farley. I left the place perfect for you."

"Great... great. Look, kid, you were a good renter, alright? You always paid your rent on time and always kept real quiet-like to yourself. If you ever need a place to stay again, hit me up, I'll make sure you're taken care of."

I nodded as I smiled and handed him the keys. I feel a little guilty due to how I left the place, but the feeling passes quickly. "Have a nice day, Mr. Farley."

"You too, kid."

He slams the door shut and I pop out of the house, walking on my way to the last place I'll probably ever see in this city.

I walk along, passing a familiar mini-mall, where beggars tend to sit outside of. As I walk, I feel a strange sensation inside of myself. I have no way of explaining it with words, other than it feels... odd. Like there's something... beneath my skin.

As I continue walking along, I pass in front of a homeless guy. I'm of the belief that people who beg, especially in front of Walmart, tend to be fakes. They make hundreds of dollars a day. If you have two thousand cars pass you per hour, odds are good that if just 1% give you a dollar, that's $20/hr. Many people give more than that.

But, still. I won't be needing money for much longer.

I reach inside my pocket, pulling out all the money in my wallet, except for about five bucks. $224 in total... a familiar number. I feel as though I've counted this money out before. As I reach over and hand it to the beggar, he stares at me in amazement.

"Wow, thanks a lot pal! But... uh... have we seen each other before?" His dirty jacket, his filthy face, his unkempt hair. He does look familiar but... I can't place it.

"Nah, it's probably just that I look like someone you know. Have a nice day."

The beggar nods quietly as I walk across the street. I steal a glance back and watch as he stuffs my cash into his backpack. A crapton of ones, fives, and tens almost spill out of it. As I thought. Oh well.

Finally, I arrive. I've seen this building before. CryoTek... where I will spend the next hundred million years in cryo-stasis.

I stare up at the insignia on the building. This all seems so familiar. I know I've done this before, but I just can't place it.

I just... can't place it.

Part 202a: CryoTek

I walked inside the CryoTek building, as a male receptionist turned to me.

"I'm Participant #8." He nods at me as he enters my information into the computer.

"Do you have your ID card on you?"

I nod back as I pull it out of my back left pocket. After he examines it he ushers me towards one of the lobby chairs.

I take my seat and look around. I've been here before, and I don't mean last week. All of this is just... too familiar.

As I'm sitting there, a half hour passes, and a man enters the building and looks around. He appears well dressed, in a black suit and tie. He turns and spots me, his face displaying no emotion. In a dozen steps, he's standing right in front of me.

"Excuse me, are you Jason L. Hiro?"

"Uh, yeah. Why do you ask?"

The man whips out an ID badge from his back pocket for a moment, too quick for me to get a good look at it, before he quickly puts it back. "I'm Agent Terrier, I work for the SPF. I need you to come with me."

"SPF? I've never heard of you guys."

"Of course you haven't. Come with me quietly, or we'll have to make you come by force."

I step up and nod quietly, as I glance outside and spot a black van with "Larry's Cable Servicing" stenciled on the side in yellow. Real inconspicuous, guys...

I follow the agent out as he beckons towards the van. Against my better judgement, I step inside after the door opens. Three other men are inside, and one of them pats a seat attached to the back door. "Get in, and buckle up."

I pause. "I have an appointment in three hours at CryoTek. Am I being arrested?"

"Son, you wish you were being arrested. Sit down. Now."

I nod quickly as I plunk down on the lightly cushioned seat. What the hell is going on?

I'm about to miss the appointment at Cryotek now. Fuck. That was my only chance to escape this hell. And what do these men even want with me? They've been totally silent the entire time, staring forward blankly. It makes me so uncomfortable.

Finally, after three and a half hours of bumpy driving down concrete and gravel roads, we pull into a dark alley and they make me get out of the van. It's still daylight outside, probably 11 AM or so, maybe noon, but the alley is pitch black.

They usher me inside a building, through some bland, dark concrete hallways, and through a door. We arrive in a pure white room, one with an observation window and a flat metal table with some metal chairs.

I'm not going to lie, this looks exactly like an interrogation room. The window is a one-way mirror, meaning I can't see through it, but whoever is on the other side can see me. There's a camera in the corner of the room, it turns and follows me around as I sit down.

Half an hour passes, as I either sit on the cold, metal seats, or get up and pace around the room. I don't even have a cell phone with me or I could at least play games... or call for help. Ah, who am I kidding? I have nobody to call.

Finally, after those agonizing thirty minutes, the door opens, and a woman walks into the room. A beautiful young lady, maybe about four years older than me. She gives me a warm smile. "Jason, thank you for your patience, we were just reading up on your... file."

She beckons to a chair, as she and I both sit down across from each other. "My name is Marie Becker, and I work for the SPF, or the 'Supernatural Protection Force', as it were."

I nod at her quietly. Supernatural Protection Force? What kind of stupid name is that? "Hello, Marie... what's this all about?"

She pauses as she stares at me quizzically for several moments. "Jason, I don't know if you're playing dumb, but we detected the energy signature at your residence."

I stare at her blankly. "Energy signature? I don't follow."

She trains her eye on me carefully. "Yes. The spiritual energy readings were off the charts."

Now it's my turn to give her the stink-eye. "What are you talking about? Spiritual energy? Supernatural Protection Force?! Did I get abducted by people from the loony bin?"

She sets her jaw squarely. "Look, Jason. I'm trying to be nice here. Our algorithms show that there was a 95% chance that the energy was centered directly on your mattress. It had to be you, unless you were sleeping with someone else last night?"

I blush slightly. "Ah, no, I was alone."

"Right. Alone." She glances back at the mirrored wall and shrugs before looking back. "Do you seriously think we don't know you're hiding something? You're looking at worse than prison time if you don't come clean."

My jaw is about ready to flop down at this point. What the hell is this bimbo talking about?! Why am I even here? Why is everyone acting like I'm some weird monster or alien or something?

I fold my arms back and lean back against the chair. "I'm not speaking any more until I see a lawyer."

Marie eyes me for a few moments, before she breaks into a sneer. "Cute. I hate to tell you this, but you don't get a lawyer. You're in one of the many Black Facilities hidden across the USA. Nobody's coming for you, and even if they knew where you were, we wouldn't let them have you. Not until you explain to us what that mysterious energy signature was."

I almost feel tears starting to well up. "I don't know! I have no idea what you're talking about!"

Marie rolls her eyes. "Fine. You want to play this game? We'll play. Guards. Take him to solitary."

Guards enter through the door, cuffs in hand. I panic as I see them coming for me. "No, no wait! Please!"

Just as the guards reach me, I scream at the top of my lungs. " STOP! "

And, suddenly, everything in the room stops. I step back in fear, realizing that somehow, in some way, I've made time itself pause. Then my chest pounds for a second, and time resumes. The guards are on me in an instant, tackling me to the table as they bind my hands behind me.

"No! No please! This isn't fair! I don't want to be locked up! PLEASE!"

Nobody listens to me, as the guards lead me out of the room. Just before I pass the door, I catch a glimpse of Marie's face, as she eyes me with even more suspicion than before.

After the door shuts, Marie turns and walks up to the window. "Marshall. Get me the security camera footage. Now."

There's something I saw, but it couldn't have been real.

Part 203a: Recollection

I stare at the pure white cell around me. The door is simply a flat piece of sheet metal, with no handles or anything of the sort on my side. It opens inwards, so I can't even kick it down. There's a flat, crappy looking cot for sleeping on, and a chair with a table, along with a toilet and a sink. The entire room is only about 7 feet wide by ten feet deep. It's... pretty cramped in here. Amusingly, there's no security camera, or at least no visible one.

Worse, I have nothing to do.

Out of boredom, I lay back on the bed and start playing synonym word games in my mind. Death, Die, Dead, Killed, Slain, Eviscerated...

I do this off and on for a while before I find myself asking a silly question. Why? I've never been one to do something like that. Playing word games... why would I do this?

Thoughts swirl inside my head ponderously as I sit in silence.

Time stopped. Maybe, it was just for a moment, so it might have been in my imagination, but those men froze and stopped their movement. I know they did.

With a flourish, I reach down, pull my shoe off, and toss it into the air lightly. " Stop! "

The shoe halts in midair, making me jerk back in surprise. Then, a second later, my heart pounds viciously, and right as I keel forwards, the shoe falls again, banging my knee as it falls to the floor.

I didn't imagine it. What does this mean? Am I... a mutant? Some kind of freak? Jesus Christ, what if that lady was right? What if I'm some supernatural monster?

I decide to ignore it for the moment. There's something else that's bugging me. I feel like there's an itch, in the back of my brain. There's something I need to remember. Something really important, but I just can't make it appear in my mind's eye.

"Why can't I remember?" The words come out of my mouth unbidden, yet are not unwelcome.

"I need to remember."

It keeps coming back to me, there's something there. I can't put it into words. I just... need to...

"Remember. Remember. Remember! "

In the blink of an eye, thousands, millions of images flood my mind. An incomprehensible number of events blast into my brain as I fall off my bed, writhing in agony on the floor.

AAAAAHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHGGGGGGGGGGHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHH AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAHHHHHHHHHH!!!!!!!!!!!!!! "

Time and space warps around me as the worst pain I've ever felt in all my existence pounds in my brain.

Moments later, it's over. Blood is pouring out of my nose, as I lie on the ground, listless.

I remember now. I remember all of it. I... failed. I wasn't supposed to go back this far. I'm not supposed to be here. And I've already missed the cryopod, they likely called the backup participants to get them to fill in for me.

Failure. That's what I am.

No.

Wait, this isn't bad. This is... better. I don't really wish to be trapped in that hellish place. I don't wish to be in that labyrinth. I'm back in the past now, and that means I can prevent that awful future from occurring.

Yes, that's it. I can change the future, and make sure none of that bad stuff ever happens.

Grabbing a piece of toilet paper from beside the toilet to clean up my nose, I glance at the door in fear. I screamed quite loudly, so I'm surprised nobody came running.

I can't be here. I need a way out. However, if I teleport away, Marie will be on my case forever until she hunts me down.

...Marie. Is that the younger her? She said she was unbelievably old, but this girl was quite attractive. On the off chance she is the Marie from my time, I need to take special actions.

I look my body over. " Examine. "

It appears that my spiritual energy is pitifully low. I have almost nothing inside of me. I certainly can't teleport out of here like this. Even with rest, I'll only get a little bit back. My days as the God King are over.

Or... maybe they aren't? I gained power once before, through many improbable events. But now I have all the knowledge I gained from the future. Even without the Crown, I can perhaps turn knowledge into wisdom.

A silly thought occurs to me. " Storage. "

My mental storage open up and I nearly scream for joy. Everything I ever stored there in the future is inside of my storage.

Including... Hoarhiim?!

I grab his orb from inside the storage space. It's shining bright white?! HE'S ALIVE!!!

"Hoarhiim! Are you there?"

Nothing happens at first, but then, in my mind's eye, a mental face appears. The face of an old man, almost seventy years of age, shows up in my mind. "Who are you? Where am I?" He's a scruffy looking guy, his face having pure white sideburns that go all the way down to his chin and taper into a small white beard, along with wild unkempt hair.

"Ah... my name is Her- I mean, it's Jason. What is... your name?"

This is weird. Why am I not seeing Hoarhiim? Wasn't this his orb? The man speaks again. "Ah! Great ta meet you, my boy! The name's Harold! So, where am I?"

"Uh, don't you know? You're a pure white orb, inside a jail cell with me."

The old man seems to tap his lips as he thinks. "No kiddin' huh? I'm in jail then? Strange, the last thing I remember was feelin' real mighty sleepy after a long day watchin' the telly, then I took a nap, and woke up here!"

The old man shrug. "Well heck, maybe I up 'n keeled over! Is this heaven? Purgatory? Maybe them Buddhists were right and I done been reincarnated inside some crazy orb!"

An interesting turn of events, to be sure. "Well, Harold, it's a pleasure to meet you. Might you have some spiritual energy to share with me? I'll accept your power!"

Harold squints and peers at me. "You alright there, young feller? You ain't one o' them Jehovah's, are ye? Talkin' bout weird spiritual mumbo jumbo?!"

"No, but I'm-" I pause, as a tremendous surge of energy flows into my body. He doesn't have to accept to give me the energy from this orb?! What a fantastic development! A moment passes as many possibilities race in my mind. "Harold, I'm going to put you away for a while, but we'll talk soon, alright?"

The old man shrugs. "Whatever, I ain't got nothin' better ta' do anyways! Nobody ever wants to talk to a boring ol' grandpa anyways..." He mumbles and grumbles a bit, making me feel bad, but I put him back in storage anyway.

First thing to do: Get my power back, at least somewhat.

" Detect! Infrared! Sonar! Tracking! Targeting! Perception! " Then, following my usual procedure, I continue wordsmithing. " Intelligence! Intelligence! Enhance! Enhance! "

Perfect. Once again, my spherical vision is back. I can sense the positions of over three thousand life forms mulling about within a three mile radius. That doesn't seem like many people, and it isn't, because this location is far from developed civilization. I think I'm in the countryside.

I stand up and aim my hand at myself. "Copy!"

Instead of a clone, an exact copy of my body appears, then slumps to the ground lifelessly. Based on my enhanced intelligence, I deduce that unlike my clones, this one won't turn to dust on death, as it's already dead.

Quickly, I pull off my copy's shoes, extract their shoelaces, and form a makeshift noose. "Reinforce! Reinforce!"

I strengthen the noose since shoelaces couldn't usually hold up a body of this size. Then comes the nasty part... I pick up the body, wrap the noose around its neck with my free arm, and let go. The pipe creaks under the load, so I reinforce it as well.

Finally, I have the perfect decoy. Marie will be thrown off the trail and think I killed myself.

Already, I can sense someone walking down the hallway. I dust myself off and finish up, and not a moment too soon. Aiming my hand at the floor, I target the nosebleed stain from earlier. "Clean!"

Just before the person walking down the hallway arrives in my room, I aim my mind at a nearby hillside, just outside the complex. " Teleport. "

The perfect escape. Now I just have to change the future.

Part 204a:

I traveled for a long time. By using a word I hadn't tried before, I was having the time of my life.

" Wings! "

Angelic wings sprout from my back. Naturally, flying around out in the open would be a bad idea, but that's why I have other abilities!

" Invisibility! Cloaking! Transparency! "

Now that I'm totally invisible, even if I'm detected, nobody will be able to see me.

...Is it just me, or am I being smarter? More cautious? It's definitely something I'm not used to doing.

I fly along through the air, realizing that this ability does not drain my energy like 'flight' would. These wings are very convenient...

...Cassiel. I was holding her in my arms, and it felt like it was only hours ago. Along with Samantha. They were both killed. These wings make me think of her. I have to find a way to save them. Why did Hope have to do this? Why does everyone hold these petty grudges for so long?

Am I the only actual reasonable being out there? No... that can't be the case. I'm doing what I can to change the world for the better, but I need to do better. I need to improve. I have to prevent Cassiel and Samantha from dying, though obviously that won't happen for a hundred million years or so now.

I find myself flying above a large city. I pull up my hand as I fly towards a group of tall pseudo-skyscrapers. " Map. "

In front of me, a map seems to hover in the air. As expected, I'm still in my home state of Colorado, though very far from my actual home city. According to the map, I'm above Aurora...

I aim my flight path at one of the nearby skyscrapers, landing silently. then tripping and falling because I can't see my own feet. Smooth, me.

Picking myself off, I note that there are no entrances to the roof, so nobody should be able to come up here. Nice.

Not being able to see my own body is quite the detriment. A 747 flies overhead, tens of thousands of feet in the air, but I doubt it's a government plane.

I uncloak and unhide myself as my body comes into full view. I breathe a little bit easier, as an idea comes to my mind.

" Visualize. "

My mind takes me mentally to the corpse I had left behind in the building at the black site.

"...sus Christ... This is just great. Now we'll never know what he knew." A man sighs as he stares at the gruesome sight of a swinging body, held up by mere pieces of string.

Marie stares at my body in morbid fascination. "He killed himself, huh? Strange, he seemed angry that we were holding him, but to break this quickly? It's unheard of."

"Damn right it is. Fuck, that kid was the key. I just don't see why he did it. I thought for sure he was one of the candidates, maybe even something more."

Marie sighed as she shrugged her shoulders. "It can't be helped. Pull him down and let's do an autopsy."

My mind sweeps back into my own body. Good, they seem to be buying it, at least for now. Marie seems suspicious, but if she's the Marie I know, that much is to be expected.

I summon up a pen and paper. I need to write down my goals for the near future.

I start scrawling quickly, as ideas form and disappear just as quickly as they came.

My biggest goal... I have to stop the Volgrim. Perhaps, and this may be conceited... but perhaps with myself here, humanity has a chance at winning this war.

There must be a chance.

Part 205a:

Alright, what I know of the future is shaky, but I do have some vague details.

First, aliens exist, and they will destroy all life on Earth in the next couple hundred years.

Second, there's a big war, 99.99% of all the angels die, humanity eventually loses, and the demons end up winning. Or the aliens do. Or the aliens and the demons do... I'm not sure, exactly.

Also, there will be an invention of UMI at some point, and if that was truly Marie I encountered, then she likely has something to do with it.

I might be in the past, but I have knowledge of the future. I also have knowledge of my abilities, and others do not. That's a +3 advantage to me.

An idea springs to mind. Cassiel said she wasn't even born until the tail end of the Energy Wars, but Samantha, or rather, Belial, should still be alive.

" Locate. "

I trace her position, and am shocked to find that she appears to be in a city here on Earth. Apparently she's over in New York City, though to what end I'm not sure.

Come to think of it, I may have the timeline wrong, but what if Satan is still alive? She would definitely have no interest in me. Beyond that, if I fight him, as I currently am, I will lose. Not just lose, but lose badly.

Still... what if I could get her on my side? Maybe we wouldn't be an... item. But she is extremely powerful.

So many questions, so much time. Luckily, I have a couple hundred years, though the Volgrim may attack soon. I don't know when, exactly.

More ideas are coming to me. You know, now that I'm in the past, I need to be a lot more careful, in more ways than one.

" Mirror. "

A small handheld mirror appears in my hands. If Marie and the others get wise, they'll be able to track me down. However, they have my body, and if they find me like I am now, they'll know that I faked them out instantly. If I so much as am glimpsed by a camera, it would be a real problem.

" Disguise. "

My face changes shape, as I look into the mirror. It's definitely not my face anymore, but I don't know how to describe it in words.

I aim my hand at my nose. " Alter. " It gets a little bit bigger, and slightly longer too.

Then my eyes. " Green. " No more blue eyes blond hair, I stick out way too much. Then my hair... " Brown. "

...My hair barely changes color. It's not a dark blonde. Hmm... " Brown. Brown. Brown. "

My hair seems to really resist the change in color but finally, it becomes brown.

" Mustache. Sideburns. "

Finally, I look like a completely different man. With all this new hair, my face is suddenly a lot itchier but I'll deal with it.

Other ideas are forming. I've never really played with my abilities, you know? I'm like a superhero that has every possible power ever made. Why am I not abusing this?

" Invulnerability. Immortality. "

Did it work? I create a knife for myself, and try cutting my hand... it fails. The knife acts as if it's pressing itself against solid steel. WOW! I'm literally Superman at this point.

However, I do immediately notice one small issue. I have lost my sense of touch. I'm unkillable at this point, but having no sense of touch will make me pretty clumsy. I undo the invulnerability and settle for more rapid regeneration. Funny, I tried doing that before, and it didn't seem to do much during my battles. I wonder why that is? Maybe I took too much damage too quickly.

Cutting my hand I once again see that my wounds rapidly heal themselves.

For a moment, I consider changing myself into a lion, or a mouse or something, but then I realize I don't know if I'll be able to speak normally and use wordsmithing in that case. Luckily, I'm not an idiot anymore, so I spawn a clone and give him a simple order.

"Turn yourself into a lion, then turn yourself back into a human."

To my amazement, not only does turning himself into a lion work, but as a lion, he's able to form a guttural sound of "Human" and transform himself back. I repeat the process, and find out that it does not work when he transforms into a mouse, however.

A few more experiments later, and I find that monkeys, certain types of birds (Obviously parrots, but also eagles), bears, and other 'big' animals all work, but not the smaller ones like mice, rabbits, snakes, etc.

When I'm done, I turn the clone back into a human and reabsorb him back into myself. I don't plan on making any more clones now... they're far too dangerous.

After everything is all said and done, I've used up quite a bit of energy. I make myself invisible again and fly off into the sunset.

My first goal: Find out the status of the world. The real status.

Part 206a: Espionage

Sometimes, I feel like I'm two different people trapped in one body.

I have all of my memories from the labyrinth, yet exactly one day ago, I was not in the labyrinth. The problem is, my labyrinth memories are seeming to override my normal ones.

One thing is for sure though, I need information.

After making my wings disappear and becoming visible once again, I head into my local library, walking over to their computer section. A few minutes after making my reservation, a computer opens up.

I start off my search by looking up the Volgrim. Sadly, nothing comes up about aliens. Even unsubstantiated rumors would be great. It appears that either nobody is aware of their existence right now, or the government is hiding their existence via censorship. Frankly, with all the Area 51 rumors and other stuff, most alien conspiracy theorists are already debunked in the minds of most people, so I feel like the government would simply allow the pages to exist. After all, who would believe in one alien rumor over another? It just makes sense.

So that being said, either the government knows of their existence and nobody else does, or nobody knows of their existence yet.

Not going to lie, I'd feel a whole lot better if the government knew. At least then we'd be preparing some defenses against them.

...Hm. My powers have so many applications. So many that I've really just scratched the surface. I close the webpage and walk away from the PC, heading over to another section of the library.

I find what I'm looking for off in the reference section. A thesaurus, and a Webster's Dictionary. Perfect. Since I'm back in this remote section of the library, I clone them, glancing through the contents to make sure they're the same, then I stuff them in my storage.

I walk out of the library and am pleased to see that the alarm doesn't go off. My storage... for it to work even in the past, it must be inter-dimensional or something. This begs the question, if there were somehow two of me in separate timelines or universes, could we trade notes or items with each other using the storage? Who knows.

And that's all theoretical anyway. More importantly, with a thesaurus, I have intentionally weaponized myself.

I flip through bemusedly until a stupidly obvious idea emerges.

" Wiretap. "

All around me, the sounds of people talking on telephones suddenly blasts into my ears as I groan in pain. " UNDO! "

I quickly right that wrong as I realize there are a couple people on the street looking at me, my cheeks red, I walk around a corner into an alleyway, bouncing back and forth between two walls until I'm sitting on top of a small one story restaurant.

This time I spy a woman walking past, chatting on her phone, I can't hear her, at least not yet, but I decide to give this a shot again.

Focusing on her, I try one more time. " Wiretap. "

"...nd have the documents from the Mercer case on my desk at three, Kevin. We have seven clients on the waiting list and we can't afford to let them stay there, or they'll jump ship to the Orwen Bureau."

"Right, I-I'll get right on that. Talk later, boss."

The woman nods and hangs up the phone, but I can feel myself still connected, so if she were to make another call, I'd be tuned into it immediately.

This is... promising. Very, very promising. After using 'Disconnect', I find myself coming up with all manner of ideas.

There's a man sitting all by himself at an outdoor table in front of the restaurant below me. He appears to be reading a paper while drinking coffee. Perfect.

" Telepathy. "

In the past, this didn't work on a few demons, but humans shouldn't have any such barrier on their minds.

His thoughts flow into my mind like a steady stream.

...Hmm, seems the DOW is down a point today, maybe I ought to pull my stocks out of the Fisher portfolio... no that's probably not a good idea- Christ, I forgot to turn the oven off this morning. My wife is going to kill me when she gets home. DAMN! Stupid idiot, me. No no, now's not the time to be thinking about that- this coffee tastes like shit. What kind of garbage is this place hiring nowadays? If I were ten years younger I'd go in there and apply for a job just so I could straighten them out. Seriously, it's coffee, how hard is it to make? I add the sugar and cream myself, assholes. All you guys have to do is make it black- ah wow the San Francisco Giants won 5-4 against the Diamondbacks, I didn't expect that. All this work lately and I never get to watch the games... Working this new job is-

I cut him off by disabling telepathy. That guy has some issues and he seems awfully scatterbrained, but...

I try activating telepathy again, but this time as an attribute that I myself possess. By using it like this, I can make it sustained when I need it, and disable it with a thought, not a word. If I focus and mentally make myself use it, it will slowly drain my energy, but it's more subtle.

I focus on a woman walking past and am easily able to read her thoughts as she texts. Those are... naughty. I won't pry into her private life anymore.

I have to assume that I have exactly zero allies. With no allies, I have to find out the information I'll be needing through alternate means, and these means will be my powers.

...Aren't I something like a god at this point? Not an infallible, or omniscient one, but certainly godlike compared to many humans. Perhaps I should try and rule over humanity or something, though I don't particularly love them, and I don't want a target painted on my back.

But still, I can feel it. With my powers, I will be able to take the future in a new direction. I can change it. We don't have to end up in the same place as we were before.

I stare into the distance. There are only a few places I'll get any answers. And the first one I'll be checking out is Washington D.C.

Making myself invisible as I create more wings, I fly off into the air once more. Damn, flying like a bird is so cool.

Part 207a: Alex

The people in the building mulled around, talking to each other about this and that. A few thousand of them were packed into one room, each facing the front wall, with a laptop in front of them and a desk the laptop sat on.

The NSA, National Security Agency. Originally created to protect the interests of the country from external and internal threats to the country's national interest, it now had a top secret goal that 1% of its agents -the ones with the highest level of security clearance- were working on.

Unbeknownst to 99% of humanity, angels and demons were real. Luckily, thanks to some slick diplomacy over the last few hundred years, America had become a superpower on Earth, though the real reason was unknown to all but the highest levels of government and military interests across the world.

Alex Sheppard typed away at his keyboard as he puffed on a cigarette. His suit had decayed over the years, but he was much too stingy with money to bother replacing it. Besides, it had lots of life left in it. He scratched his thin beard as he typed, sometimes pausing to reflect on his words before continuing onwards.

Unlike the other plebians here, Alex was a high clearance individual. He knew things and thus got his own soundproofed office, for privacy. It even had tinting on the windows so nobody could see in, and a door that pulled outwards, so it wouldn't easily be kicked in.

Unlike a decade ago, when he had been one of the rookies on the floor, he now was able to enjoy a nice, silent office. Sweet, sweet serenity.

His phone rang, and seeing it was from the director of the ATF, he passed it through the secure line.

"Mrs. Harris, a pleasure as always."

An older woman's voice came through crisp and clear. "Alex, still working in that dump?"

He crinkled his eyes shut for a moment before responding. "The pay's good, you know. Six digits."

"Right. I make eight though."

"Of course you do. But you're not calling to humble-brag, are you? C'mon, there must be something else."

She sighed. "I received a memo from the new President. Things are changing at Area White. The 'dogs' turned up cold. Have you heard anything?"

Alex shrugged, though she couldn't see it through the phone. "Nah, haven't heard a thing. I know the new project MJ12 are working on is real hush hush, something about a botnet, if you can believe it. But as for Area White, you know how reclusive they are."

"We're lucky they're on our side." Mrs. Harris sighed again.

"You sure about that? From what I understand, it's a give and take relationship, and we're not exactly getting the best deal here." Alex took one last drag on his cigarette, as he jammed it down into the ashtray.

"Yeah, it's probably true... But listen, there's something else. I heard rumors from one of our agents at a black site. A cadaver appeared in a room and the stiff seemed off. They think he was dead before the supposed method of suicide was even used."

Alex leaned forwards in his chair. "No. Haven't heard a thing. Fill me in."

"Right, they traced the location of a Type 3 energy signature, and when they got there, nobody was home. They managed to identify the source and cornered him, bringing him to the site. After an interrogation reached no conclusion, they threw him into lockup, and a few hours later, he turned up dead."

Alex nodded. "Okay... so what's the problem?"

"It's the body itself. The guy didn't die of asphyxiation. Hell, they aren't sure what he died of, they only know it sure as hell wasn't choking to death by a noose. No struggle marks, anything like that."

Alex stared ahead at his tinted window, as he watched outlines of people moving around outside his office. "What are you saying, Judy? Are you implying he somehow faked his death? How?"

"We don't know how. My contact is following up on some leads but... you and I both know Type 3 Energy is exceedingly rare."

Alex nodded thoughtfully. "What's it been, 19 years since we detected it? Twenty?"

"Eighteen years, nine months, Alex. This is big. We knew it would show up again, we just didn't expect it to light up the grid like a firecracker in the dead of night."

"Goddamn straight. Tell you what, why don't you meet up with me for coffee? We'll talk somewhere private. I keep getting this feeling like I'm being watched, lately."

"Yes, Alex. That would be... nice. We haven't talked in a long time, face to face. You know... like we used to?"

Alex sighed. "Judy... it can't be like that now. I have a wife... kids... and I know you've got a set of your own too."

There was a pause on the line. "...Yeah. I know. I'll talk with you in a bit, Alex. Same place as last time?"

"Sure. Same place."

Alex heard a click as she hung up the phone. Then he set his phone down and sat in his chair, finishing off another cigarette before picking up his jacket and hat, as he got up to leave.

Just before he opened the door, Alex glanced over at the back corner of the room, opposite the door. He could have sworn he saw something move, but... no... it must have been his imagination. There was obviously nothing there.

There couldn't be anything there.

Alex stepped out of his office as he locked the door behind himself, off to see a woman he hadn't seen in a long time.

Part 208a:

It's remarkably easy to obtain information. There isn't a security system that exists which can track onto me, detect me, or otherwise even know of my existence.

I can walk into laser tripwires and they won't go off, I can make myself completely silent by using 'muffle' to prevent my body from accidentally making noise, I'm totally invisible to the human eye, and even more importantly, I've discovered a new way to use wordsmithing.

Previously, I used to use 'Teleport'. Not anymore, now I cast 'Teleportation' on myself, and that 'ation' suffix made it an active effect I can use on myself, though it costs me a lot of energy to travel around with it rapidly.

The big benefit though is combining it with my spatial vision to travel to specific points anywhere in a building, silently and invisibly.

I'm basically the world's greatest spy.

Over the last nine months, I've learned a lot. I've infiltrated every office and business and secret club meeting of wanna be world-rulers that it's almost boring now.

I have yet to find the Illuminati and the Bilderberg group, but I'm sure I'll stumble on them soon.

I've formed a pretty good idea of the knowledge of the world, or at least, the USA. Nobody knows of the Volgrim yet. Even at Area 51, which turned out to be a biological weapon engineering farm, nobody there knew anything about space aliens.

I've decided this is bad. If we're unprepared, we'll be wiped out in a moment.

As such, I've built a crazy big base inside the mountains of Nevada, though there's no way to get inside without teleportation. I cannot, however, build anything complex since I lack the Crown of Solomon.

Actually, I was already able to find it via 'locate'. The problem is, it's in another dimension, likely Heaven or some other place, meaning I can't get to it until I figure out how to access their dimension.

As such, I can't start building a fleet of war-robots with my mind or anything else like that. In that case, I've simply made a massive underground base over the last few months that can sustain 25,000 people in the event of a major catastrophe... such as the planet's atmosphere being shredded off or something insane like that. I don't have any details on how they eradicated all life on Earth, but it sounded violent, to say the least.

Despite the fact that I can't create anything complex with my mind, I can clone objects of any level of complexity quite easily. A single word repeated many times allowed me to clone 1,000 high end computers into existence. I'm half tempted to find the world's most powerful supercomputer and clone it here for my own amusement. Minesweeper on a 50' by 50' screen! Wow!

Jokes aside, it would have real practical value. I'm beginning to debate how I might do it.

As I sit in a Dunkin' Donuts, munching on a delicious sprinkled pastry, I notice that there is a van outside the restaurant that has parked there for a while. It has tinted windows, but I can see inside it as if the van was made of transparent glass.

I don't have to look at them at all, so I munch silently as I pretend to read a newspaper. My spatial vision is actually quite powerful, since I can see literally everything at once for a few miles around me. It all is a blur until I focus on one specific thing at a time, but once I do, I see those things with far more clarity than I would if I were looking at them with my own two eyes from a foot away.

I don't know why government agencies always have vans, but unlike the guys that picked me up last time, these guys are pros. They have some serious hardware inside there, I'm seeing at least 8 people, plus the driver, all crammed in. The side and rear have no windows, but I can easily see lots of surveillance equipment, computers... all that good stuff.

More hilariously though, not only does my spatial vision let me read lips if I so choose, I also have Telepathy and wiretapping, to name a few.

They can hear me whisper from a mile away. I know who their first girlfriend was in the third grade from five miles away. I have the strategic advantage. Actually, it's better than that. They don't know what I know, but I know what they know.

It's almost unfair, really.

I polish off my doughnut and finish my chocolate milk as I step up, depositing my trash in the appropriate receptacle. Walking outside, I pretend to look at my phone as I walk along the street away from the van.

Naturally, they follow me with their eyes, and their thoughts show exactly what I had suspected for the last couple months. They aren't following me, Jason... they're following me based on my Energy Type. Apparently the government has classified 'Heroes' as Type 3 Energy, and knowledge of our existence is of the highest level of classification.

They have specialized scanners that can track me, but I know for a fact that they aren't aware of my underground base. I set a beacon there so I can 'recall' to it at a moments notice, for minimal energy cost.

I really am shrewd nowadays. When did I become like this? I don't remember being like this in the labyrinth, not even with all the powers I had at my peak along with the crown.

Perhaps, as a result of getting greatly weakened, I've stopped being so cocky. I'm not all-powerful anymore, and even when I was, I was resoundingly defeated by a single clone. Yeah... I'm not a god, I'm just a kid toying with fire. That's a good mentality to keep. Better to be careful and alive than cocky and dead.

As I walk down the street, the van waits until I round a corner before it starts accelerating to follow me. Come on guys, this is amateur stuff. After I round the corner, I teleport onto the roof of a building behind them.

Within a few second they drive around the corner, and I can see a man pound the console. Damn! Where the hell did he go?! He was only out of range for a single moment! I can read his lips, and his mind, very easily.

This is like a cat toying with mice. I've had just about enough of them following me around though. Time to give them a scare.

I quickly morph myself into a monster looking thing, making myself invisible as I sneak up behind their van, now parked in that dark alley.

This is going to be good.

Part 209a:

Sarah and Ivan stared at the scanner. "He was there a moment ago, then he disappeared." Ivan, as usual, stated the obvious.

"No shit he disappeared. You're a real Ken Jennings, you know that?" Gerald rolled his eyes. "Find him. The wide frequency scanner shows he's still in the area. He appears to have some ability that spreads itself over a large space, approximately 5 miles in diameter. And since the energy is here, so is he."

"Yeah, but there's 360 degrees worth of directions he could have gone, and that's only on the horizontal plane." Sarah quickly grabbed the satellite receiver and started slowly turning it around, hunting for the signal.

"It's like looking for a needle in a haystack. When is HQ going to get us some better equipment?" Ivan sighed as he slumped back in his chair, watching the map readout.

"This so-called shitty equipment costed the U.S. taxpayers a goddamn lot of money, so be grateful." Gerald resisted the urge to beat the crap out of the loudmouth.

"They haven't even told us what we're chasing after. This guy might not even be human, you know? He might be some kind of monster. Maybe even a... well, you know." Sarah shifted her shoulders as she rotated the receiver around.

"Yeah, he might be one of them but we won't know even if we catch him. For all we know, he-" Before Gerald could finish his sentence, Sarah's receiver had picked up a blip and everyone lunged towards the readout to get a look.

"Fuck, he's close. He's- oh Jesus!" Ivan stumbled back as he realized Sarah was pointing the receiver directly behind the vehicle. At the exact instant he had that thought, something smashed into the back of the vehicle, caving the rear door inwards slightly, and jolting the van ahead a few feet.

"Holy sh-!!" Before the driver, Mark, had time to finish his sentence, a terrifying monster appeared on the hood of the car, with two long curved blades for arms, a mouth filled with razor sharp teeth, blood red skin, and two legs that resembled thick wooden clubs, with two long front claws and one on the back.

Everyone in the van screamed at once, except for Gerald. He had high level clearance, so he knew what it was at a glance.

"Scyther! Grab your guns, idiots!" He whipped out a special energy pistol and took aim at the monster on the windshield. Right as he pulled the trigger, the monster vanished, and a shearing sound was heard, as a long blade suddenly jammed up through the bottom of the van, tearing open a huge gash in the bottom. Without a single extra thought, Gerald whipped his gun down and fired three times at the thing under the vehicle. His shots all scored hits, and it screamed in pain before it vanished.

For a few moments, nothing else happened. Everyone in the van was whipping their heads around, but Sarah stole a glance at the screen. "What the hell?! The energy reading is totally gone!"

Everyone turned to look at the screen, and they unconsciously let a sigh of relief escape their lips.

"What the fuck was that thing, Gerald? You seemed to know what it was." Ivan glanced over at the team leader.

Gerald nodded. "Of course I do. High level clearance only though. You won't get any details from me, and you'd better not ask either... if you like your job."

Ivan sighed, as he slumped to the base of the vehicle. "My job, huh? I'm beginning to think I don't get paid enough."

Gerald snorted. "None of us do, rookie. Now pick your pansy-ass up, you look like you're about to piss yourself. I want a status report, and call the bureau, stat. They need to know about this and get an investigation team here to review the logs."

He glanced out at the hood of the vehicle. "Not to mention the evidence. What we're chasing after ain't no man, that's for sure. He's a-... never mind. Let's move out."

Alright, I've about figured it all out, now. There are exactly seven of these scanners in the world. They can track me precisely, but they work like radio towers, they can only pinpoint my exact location if they are aimed directly at me, otherwise they seem to be picking up my energy aura, likely caused by my spatial vision.

This means by hiding my aura, I would be a lot harder to find, but I'm not too worried about it yet. They may not realize that I know about their scanners, so if they think my aura is always on, they will always assume it is. Could be useful for the near future.

They're still disorganized.

However, even with bureaucratic red tape, that won't last forever. They started out with two scanners, now they have seven. Clearly, someone is taking notice of me, even though they don't know who I am.

But if they don't know who I am, then I won't be able to save humanity. Everything I'm doing right now is to advance my goal of securing the future of humanity, but also the other two sides of this war. It's doable, and only I can do it.

But if I wait much longer, my dramatic entrance will be impossible to make. If I wait too long, the Volgrim will attack and my warning will be useless.

What's that old saying? Strike while the iron is hot.

It's time to strike.

Part 210a:

"Heyyy! You're back!" Harold greets me as I teleport back into my bunker. Harold sits on a little pedestal in front of a big TV, since he has awareness of the immediate area around himself as well as anything I can see, I figured it'd be nice for me to let him watch TV all day rather than be cooped up in my Storage all day long doing nothing.

Too bad he doesn't have a way to change the channel, it's really unfortunate.

"Man, I tell ye sonny, back in my day, we didn't have none of this color TV and 24/7 news coverage! I miss Walter Cronkite though, these people on the telly are a bunch o' wackos!"

I nod and smile as I slump into a recliner facing the TV. "It was one heck of a day today."

"You're telling me! Saw the whole thing with my own two eyes! Big storm swept through New Jersey, destroyed 'bout fifteen homes! Lots o' people out on the streets now. Real sad if ye ask me. If we had a president like Dwight, he'd be all over the place makin' sure them Americans was in a safe place fer the night!"

I smile as I summon a cup of coffee into my hands. I forgot to heat it up though, so it's cold... nothing a little 'hot' spell won't fix.

"To be honest Harold, I meant what I did today. I scared some government people, made them think twice about following me around."

Harold grins as his eyes focus on the TV. "I tell ye, kid, things are different these days. We didn't have none o' that spying and crap like the gover'mint does now. If they did, we'd kick their commie asses back to the frigid mountains of Russia where they belong!"

I paused as I glanced over at his orb. "You know we're, uh, allies with Russia now... right?"

"Hot diggity damn! No way! I'm always gettin' s'prised by the state o' the world! When did we stop kickin' butt and takin' names?!"

I shrug. "I mean, we still do. We're the world's strongest superpower, you know? We have more nukes than any other country by a long shot. We're winning every war we've ever fought in... except Vietnam I guess, but I wasn't alive back then... so I don't know why."

Harold nodded. "Yeap, last time I remember seein' a calendar 'fore I met you, it was some time in April, 1959, somethin' like that. World's changed a lot in the last fifty years 'r so."

"Fifty years? It's changed even more in the last two thousand." A voice came from behind me all of a sudden, making me almost jump out of my skin. I'd taken to turning off my spatial vision in the base since otherwise I might be tracked here, but who the hell is-?!

I quickly whipped my head around, only to see... a... female angel?

A woman was standing in the middle of the room, her body emitting a faint, soft glow. She wasn't Cassiel though, she was someone else. My mind reeled as I quickly took stock of the situation. She had long, auburn hair, was wearing a fairly generic looking angelic robe, had long feathery white wings, and she looked like... well, like an angel?!

"Who are you? How did you get in here?!" Best to start with the obvious questions.

"Sorry, I'd have liked to knock, but there's no, um, front door... so I just appeared here. I hope I didn't startle you!" Her voice was earnest, yet pleasant. I don't know how old she was, but based on the '2,000 years' bit, she wasn't young in human years.

"No, no, it's fine, I guess. I'll ask again though, who are you?" I took a step back, lightly placing my hand on Harold, just in case.

"My apologies. My name is Uzziel, and my title is the Strength of the Gods. I am one of the lowest archangels... I have merely come to speak to you today. I mean no harm."

I cautiously nodded, as I eased up my defensive posture and let go of Harold. "I see. How did you find me?"

"We've known of your existence since the day you officially became a Candidate. When the Hero's Spirit took root in you, every time you used your abilities, you flashed like a bright beacon. Not all Candidates use their abilities, but those that do, we always find them."

Gears whirred and clicked in my head as she spoke. "Candidate? I've heard the term before. However, what is this Hero's Spirit you speak of?"

Uzziel paused. "That is a complicated question. However, as much as I would like to answer that question, only the highest ranking gods and archangels are allowed to discuss this openly." Her eyes flicked around the room for a moment. "... Others might be listening."

I bobbed my head slightly. "Yes, I understand. Would there be a better place to discuss this?"

She raised her eyes and looked up at the ceiling. "Yes. If you allow me to touch your hand, I will take you there."

I felt myself hesitate, but then I slowly walked towards her, before pausing again. "All right, but I will only go with you under the condition that Harold comes along." I wagged my head back towards his orb.

The angel stared at the orb for a second. "Yes... the Beacon of Life... so strange you should possess it. A few months ago, the day we first detected you, it vanished from its holding place in Heaven. Did you... perhaps...?"

I quickly shake my head when I realize what she's getting at. "No! No! I didn't steal it. I..."

I paused. I can't afford to tell her about Storage. I don't know whether I can trust the gods and the angels, or the demons, or the humans, best to play it safe.

"...I accidentally summoned it to myself. I must have cast a spell, because it appeared right in my hands out of nowhere, when I first learned of my abilities."

She stared at me quizzically, clearly not believing my story, but not wishing to offend. "I... see. In any case, please do bring it along. If it was called to you, then as the bearer of Hercules' power, I have no right to intervene."

Hercules?! What?!...Best to ignore it for now.

I pick up Harold and take him along with me, as I hold onto her hand. It feels... nice. Soft, comforting...

As I think that thought, the world around me dissolves, as I slowly appear in a world made of clouds and pure white skies.

...Heaven?

Part 211a:

"Golly, we're finally in the place I should have gone when I keeled over!" Harold seems almost excited by the fact that we're in heaven.

I'm not particularly emotional one way or the other. I am however shocked by how many angels there are all over the place. Millions? No, billions. Tens of billions. Far more angels than there are humans on Earth. It's not even a contest, to be honest.

They all walk on the clouds as if the clouds are made of solid matter. In fact, glancing down at myself, I notice that I too am standing on a cloud, but it's almost like there's a solid platform I'm standing on, and the clouds are simply a very low fog cover that obscures an otherwise flat pavement surface everywhere the eye can see.

I'm not sure how it works, but it seems silly to focus on this of all things. Many angels are staring at me as I walk around. The vast majority are totally ignoring me though, and when I look around, I sometimes see angels popping into existence... are they teleporting here?

Most of the ones popping in appear to be bewildered at their situation, as if they can't believe they're here in heaven. Wait...

Wait a minute.

Are these people who have just died? That would appear to be the case. They die and instantly reincarnate as an angel...

"Uzziel, this may seem to be a silly question, but why do some of the angels appear out of nowhere, and seem confused about where they are?"

Her answer confirms my suspicions. "When humans die, under certain circumstances, they are eligible to be reborn as a pseudo-angel. The details are secret, but if you wish to know more, the highest archangels, or the highest gods, will be happy to answer your questions."

I nod as we start walking quietly to a massive, open-roof temple not too far away. It sits atop a small mountain, with 'small' being a very accurate term. It's more of a raised crest of ground that rises a few hundred feet in the air, with the temple at the top.

The temple is probably the size of twenty Roman amphitheaters, truly a massive building, and since it has no roof, merely massive pillars that rise into the sky, it stands out as a unique building I've never before seen replicated in the human world.

As I enter into the building, Harold marvels at the surroundings. "Ain't never seen nothin' like this before... lemme tell ya that much..."

I nod silently, deciding not to respond.

We walk for another minute or so, before a massive throne looms in the distance. I'm only mildly surprised to see the form of Zeus sitting atop it. Cassiel wasn't one to talk much about Heaven and the other angels, but she always made sure to bring up Zeus in casual conversation. Apparently he's a god with an unbeatable special power, though Cassiel said that at the end of the Great War, he was defeated somehow... must have been one hell of a fighter to beat a god like him.

"Uzziel. I see you have brought the Candidate to us as requested. Thank you for performing such a large favor for me, especially." Zeus smiled kindly at her and she nodded, taking her seat at a rather long table in front of his throne. Compared to the massive god in front of us, the table felt rather... puny. I took a seat at the head of the table, as it was clear I was supposed to sit there, facing Zeus's throne directly.

"It was nothing, my king. A trifle. He was non-combative." Uzziel smiled and then turned back, staring at the table in silence.

I took a quick glance around. Two angels I immediately recognized jumped out at me. "Gabriel, Raphael, a pleasure to see you."

The two turned and looked at me quizzically. Raphael was the first to speak. "Hmm, I have watched you from on high since you first appeared, but I do believe this is the first time we've met. How might you know my name?"

"Yes, I would like to know, as well." Gabriel nodded as he eyed me suspiciously.

"Hm. That's easy to explain. My name is Jason, and I'm actually a time traveler. " I glanced back and forth between them levelly. "I also know the big one on the throne up there, his name is Zeus. King of the gods, I'd wager."

Zeus narrowed his eyes as he almost glared at me. "Child, I warn you that I am not one to indulge in jokes and jesting. You're not seriously claiming to be a time traveler now, are you?"

I nod. "Yup, I certainly am. My physical age is eighteen years old, almost nineteen. However, my mental age is just over thirty. I come from a hundred million years in the future, due to a certain circumstance, but I was only conscious for thirty of those years."

"Mmm... hmmm..." Raphael hummed quietly as his eyes clouded. His head tilted slightly as he spotted Harold's orb in my hand. "I notice that you possess the Beacon of Life. Might that have something to do with your time traveling, as you say?"

I shake my head. "No. To be clear, it appeared in my hands as a result of my time traveling, but the 'beacon' itself was not the cause of my traveling."

Raphael nodded slowly as he rubbed his chin. "Yes, yes, I see. Frankly, I believe you. I believe that you did in fact travel through time."

Gabriel raised an eyebrow as he glanced first at Raphael, then back to me. "I do not. However, Raphael is known as the wisest archangel for a reason. I am not one to usually question his wisdom, and I will not do so now."

An idea comes to me, I decide to try it out immediately. "Why do you not question him? What makes you think Raphael is wise? Raphael is not necessarily wise at all, he simply derives more knowledge from the things that he has experienced than you have. True wisdom lies in deeds performed and the experiences one has felt, and how they learn from them. Since you are both archangels, you should both have been born around the same time, meaning you are both equally wise in your own way. One is not inferior to the other."

Gabriel started to say something, but then quickly paused, before opening his mouth and then shutting it again. I may have rendered him speechless. Raphael decided to reply instead, a strange smile hinting at the corner of his lips. "Young one, have we met before? You just recited a lesson I have been trying to drill into the minds of the angels and gods in Heaven for eons upon eons now."

I raise both eye brows and grin as I respond. "In a manner of speaking we have, though I fear telling you how and why might disrupt the flow of time. You and I have personally spoken, as have I spoken to Gabriel, and Michael as well."

The entire room fell totally silent. Even angels milling about on the other side of the room paused to look over when they heard that name.

"M-Michael, you say?" Zeus' jaw was hanging open in amazement. "That's... impossible. Absolutely impossible... Michael has not been alive in the physical world for over two thousand years. How could you possibly have-"

Raphael stared at me intently as he slowly raised a finger, wagging it as he interrupted Zeus. "I'm beginning to understand now. I finally am grasping the depth of your seriousness, young one. A hundred million years is a very long way into the future. If you truly, somehow, come from a time so distant, might it be that you were one who obtained a particularly special ring?"

I nod. "Yes. I wore Michael's ring and spoke to him personally."

Raphael continued shaking his finger back and forth, in more of a meditative motion than one that chided me or anything like that. "Ahh... a hundred million years... long have I spoken about humans and their potential for the future. If you truly come from such a distant future, then perhaps you allied with us in the Great War, driving out the demons? Or, more likely, you were given Michael's power in order to help cement their fate? I would imagine that if we were not eradicated by such a distant date, you might have figured out how to forge a lasting peace between humanity and the angels."

I shake my head. "I'm sorry, Raphael. I'm not going to be specific about the events of the future, but I will tell you one thing... every single angel and god is dead in the future I come from. Humanity is completely enslaved, and demons rule the universe. Except for..."

I pause. Should I tell them? It is probably best. They will know soon enough anyway. "...Except for the Volgrim."

Zeus scowls and takes a sip of wine as he hears their name. "The Volgrim? Is that a new evolution of the demons?"

I shake my head slowly. "No. They are an alien race, not from our star system, possibly not even from our galaxy. I know very, very precious little about them. I only know that something happens at the end of the war which results in all the angels being destroyed, the humans become enslaved, and the demons win, but I know not what happens to the Volgrim."

"I see." Zeus nods as he considers my words. "Perhaps we have been going about this all the wrong way. Perhaps we should perform a preemptive strike on the demons, before the Volgrim arrive. We may just, with the help of humanity, have the ability to kill them off."

"Perhaps it might work... but I would advise against it." I cough once as I quietly summon my storage under my breath, pulling a single object from it quickly before anyone gets a good look at what I'm doing. Luckily, the contents of my storage are totally invisible to all but me, but for the others at the table they would see me pulling it out of thin air.

I grab a small scale model of the dreadnaught robot that I fought in the future and place it on the table. Uzziel eyes it and speaks first. "Is that perhaps a toy?"

"No. This is a small scale model of a weapon humanity invents at some point after the arrival of the Volgrim. This is a robot designed to fight the Volgrim and the demons. It is highly powerful, and has the special ability to especially neutralize spiritual energy. Against all but a normal human, it should be unstoppable. I fought with one before, and I was totally overwhelmed."

Uzziel nods. "I see. So humanity needs to create this weapon in order to win? But you said they created it and lost... and if you create it first, how will this affect the future?"

I sigh and shrug at the same time. "I don't know... I don't know if I can change the future at all. For all I know, my actions will lead to the future I experienced. For all I know, I might make it worse. I put a 33% chance of improving the future, a 33% chance of ruining it, and the rest into it being the same."

"I see. To be fair, that means a 66% chance that you either improve the future, or make no impact on it at all. Or, a two in three chance that you don't make the future worse." Uzziel smiles sweetly at me.

"Let's be honest though. All the angels and gods are dead in this future Jason comes from. Humanity is enslaved. Frankly, short of humanity being totally eradicated, it can't get much worse." Gabriel speaks some wisdom, making others at the table nod.

A younger angel speaks next. "I believe we should at least try to do our best to change the future."

Others chime in with their agreement. "Alright, that seems to settle that. You seem to be honest, and if you speak the truth, then we have to trust you, young time traveler. You will have the support of Heaven in pursuit of your goal." Zeus smiles at me, the first time I've seen him with anything other than a neutral expression or a scowl on his face.

"Excellent. I hope to be a solid partner with the gods and angels of this realm." This worked out better than I expected.

"Now then, there is one last thing to attend to. As the next Candidate in line for Hercules' power, and one who is already an apparently proficient wielder of his power, you should be aware that the gods and angels offer training and guidance in how to use your abilities, if you should wish to use us. As a hero for humanity, and a servant of the gods, you have a divine goal in life, one that appears only a single time in every generation. Raphael especially will be able to answer all questions you may have." Zeus beckoned towards Raphael, who gave a small wave with his fingers.

"This is good news. I could use some help right now, as a matter of fact, with a small favor you may do for me, if you should so choose."

"Hmm? What might that be?" Raphael turns to look me in the eye.

"I have need of an item that I know is here in Heaven. Solomon's Crown. If you give it to me, I may be able to turn this war around before it even starts."

Raphael's eyes narrow. "My oh my... always full of surprises... you even know of the existence of a sacred treasure in heaven. I wonder what else you know of."

Zeus paused as he considered my request. "How do you know about the crown, exactly?"

"I wore it for nearly every single day I spent in the future, to be honest."

Many high ranking members at the table seemed astonished at my words. The lower ranked ones apparently didn't know the significance of the crown. It seems even Heaven has a caste system of sorts.

"Well, if this is an elaborate plot to steal the most holy artifacts of Heaven, you've certainly done your research. Very well, young man. If you wish to use it, I will allow it. But if you turn against Heaven, we will be forced to reclaim it at any cost." Zeus flicked his eyes over to Gabriel. "Go and take it from the Vault."

"Yes, my king." Gabriel stood up and walked away from the table.

...I don't think this could have gone any better if I had tried.

Part 212a:

Uzziel smiles as she steps away from me and does a quick bow. "Thank you for your efforts, Jason."

I return the smile and perform my own somewhat clumsy but earnest bow. "No, thank you for bringing me up to Heaven. I was given two precious gifts that I won't soon forget. Knowledge, via the archangels, and knowledge via the Crown."

Uzziel nods and glances around the room of my secret base. "If you don't mind me asking, what comes next for you?"

"Simply put, I'm going to build a robotic army." I beckon towards another room. "I have a massive empty facility made to accommodate tens of thousands of robots, spaceships, other things of that sort. I will begin summoning them in earnest."

I pause for a moment to consider something. "In the future I came from, I was a mighty being, and had the power of gods flowing in my veins, plus the power of the, err, the Beacon of Life. Essentially, I had a lot of spiritual energy, but now I only have one of those things. Would it somehow be possible to obtain more spiritual energy for me so that I can increase my limits?"

Uzziel stares ahead blankly past my shoulder as she seems to consider it. "I suppose so, by having angels give you their energy or by somehow finding a way to generate more yourself. Being a human has its faults, but also its advantages, you know."

Hmm. I'll have to think about it. I nod at her. "All right, that's all I wished to know. Thank you Uzziel, feel free to visit me any time you like."

She smiles sweetly and with a quick motion of the hand, she teleports away again, back up to heaven.

I walk over to the couch facing the massive TV on my wall, and sigh deeply as I sink into it. Rubbing my finger over the crown now affixed to my head, I smile as I think about the day's events. A lot has transpired.

Harold is sitting on his pedestal, facing the TV, but he appears to not be watching it at all, more like he is staring glumly at the ground. He seems to be sad about something.

"Harold, is anything wrong? What's the matter?"

Harold doesn't answer me for a few long moments, then I see his face shift in my mental vision as he seems to look at me. "Oh... Jason. Right, what were ye' sayin'?"

He seems very distracted. "Are you doing all right, old timer? You feel pretty distant since we've gotten back."

He nods slowly. "Oh... yes. Well, I been thinkin' bout some stuff... Mostly bout mah wife, Helen. Ain't seen her since prolly 'bout four years 'fore I passed. Couldn't help but think 'bout some things."

I nod and stare silently as I let him speak. He seems to need to vent about something.

"We were, you know, up there 'n Heaven. I kept seeing all them angels poppin' up cuz they died 'n whatnot. Just couldn't help but think that maybe... maybe mah wife was one o' those who passed. She was real religious, you know. Always went to Sunday School, always talkin' with the ladies from her church. I was never really a man of the cloth mah'self. S'pose that's why I'm in this here orb, and not up there."

I nod again as I listen. "Do you think that... maybe... your wife is one of the angels?"

He stares away from my face, towards the void of nothingness on the ground. "Yeap... I'm s'posin' so. I ain't seen her round up there, but there were so many angels that... ya know... I could look forever 'n never find her. Worse than the shoppin' malls of nowadays."

Damn. To think Harold had thoughts like this. I hadn't even considered what it meant to take a dead old man to heaven. I hadn't even asked for his opinion on things. I'm... callous, sometimes. "Sorry, Harold. I should have asked you if you wanted to go, first. I just took you along without-"

Harold interrupted me. "N-now hear me out, son! I ain't never said you was wrong, bringin' me up there. I ain't need none o' your pity, boy. I fought in the first world war and served in the military for the second, ya know. I'm prolly made of tougher stuff than you'd ever be, son. You got them powers, you can jes' make things pop outta thin air with ye mind, but the rest o' us normal people, well... we got reasons to be scared. It takes courage to fight a demon, I'd warrant, but it takes more courage to walk onto a battlefield where you can be killed outta nowhere by some man you ain't never e'en seen before!"

Harold continued. "You seem so cocky, so sure o' yourself, yet accordin' to what you done said 'fore, aliens are gonna appear in the near future and kill us all! If that's the case, then you need ta' grow some humility and learn to respect others. It ain't gonna be you winnin' this war all by yourself, son. It takes an army to beat an army. That's what the wars taught me."

Harold tapered his words off to a low grumble. "Of course, I'm jes' some dumb ol' man. What's a grandpa know 'bout anything, anyway?"

I could see pain in Harold's eyes. He was a man who had fought and won, loved and lost. A simple man, of a simple background, who had been called upon to fight for his country, but age had made him give it all up, and now from his perspective the youth of his day had grown up to ruin the country, and the world, that he fought to protect. It probably made him feel... helpless. Useless, even.

"No, Harold. I don't think you are... foolish. I respect those who are older than me. I don't think I'm foolish either, but I don't know much about the world around me, when it all comes down to it. I'm just trying to guess at how the future will play out, but I'm like a little kid playing with dynamite. I could make everything way worse. If you have information to volunteer, just tell me, I'll make use of it the best that I can."

Harold smiled slightly. "Thanks, boy. You really know how to make an old man feel better."

I nodded as I walked over and picked him up and then turned to walk towards the other empty hangar. "In any case, one thing is for certain, Harold. A war is coming, and humanity and the angels will lose if we can't beat the aliens. I think we can both agree that if we wish to defeat the enemy, we need weapons to surpass theirs."

Harold grinned in my mental vision. "That's right! You're got the perfect attitude, kid! Let's build some weapons!"

I feel my smile decrease as I walk into the empty hangar, as I imagine the task in front of me. If only Harold could help me out, or fight in this war himself. That would surely give him some joy. Better to be an active supporter than to be passively trapped in that damn orb.

Oh well. I brush the thought away as I set him down, concentrating intensely on creating the first of many items needed to win the upcoming war.

Part 213a: Dolfraxis

"Time to arrival: One hundred seventy nine standard time units."

The AI on board the scouting ship Dolfraxis counted down the time until they arrived in Sector 16, Point 402 space. Preliminary scans had shown a possibility of life on board this planet, though the great majority of other such planets had found no other life.

"Are we alone, Elder Nufaris?" Primus 16 spoke quietly to the highest officer on the ship.

"It is of little consequence. If we are alone, we must secure a future for our people. If we are not alone, we must meet with new life forms and determine their willingness to ally or submit to our rule." Nufaris was a tall Volgrim, one of the longest lived of his species, several thousand years old at the least. Standing twelve clicks tall, he dwarfed the others on the bridge.

The Volgrim came from a planet teeming with life. As the sole bipedal species, their dominant brains allowed them to make quick work of other life, cowing all other species into submission. The Volgrim were not a needlessly violent species, but they always aimed to win, and never fought among their own kind as it was considered a waste of energy.

"I contemplate, and I comprehend." Primus 16 raised his five-fingered hand up and stroked his facial hair soothingly. "But, I still must ask the questions. Are we the only life in this unending black void? From one gaseous ball to another we travel, yet barren planet after barren planet is all we find."

"It matters little to me. I have traveled to over a thousand systems in my long lifetime. Even if no life exists, I still find a rush of excitement in the discovery of new sights, new vistas, new wonders to marvel at. The gaseous plasma clouds of Sector 4 void, for example, are among my most treasured discoveries. Only my ship has ever seen them, mind you."

Primus 16 nodded quietly as he stared at the blackened viewscreen. "What is the homeworld like, Elder?"

Nufaris grumbled softly. "It is a planet teeming with activity. The hundred or so of our people here cannot be compared to the homeworld. They have technology far exceeding ours. In the thousands of cycles since my departure, I can only imagine how far they have advanced technologically. Beyond that, they have trillions of our kind living there, entering new ships, and traveling to other gaseous orb clusters and systems. I've told you this many times, yet you still ask."

Primus 16 was too young to recall the homeworld. He was created on board the ship as a supplementary assistant to the Elder, meant to only exist for finishing required tasks for him.

"Will I ever be able to see the homeworld?" Primus 16 glanced up at the elder with hope in his eyes.

"Of course. After this last sector inquiry, we will be making our return to the homeworld to refill the Dilithium reactor. We will also be taking a twenty orbital cycle vacation in light of our successful discovery of multiple new planetoids. Unfortunately, the majority of them would require many centuries of Volforming to remake the surface into something more hospitable for our species."

Primus stared ahead blankly as he thought about many things. "I do wonder about one other small detail. What if we discover life in this sector, and the life is hostile towards us?"

The Elder sneered slightly. "We eradicate it. Simple."

"What if they destroy us? What if they possess greater technology than we do?"

The Elder sighed. "It would be unfortunate, but our destruction would alert the homeworld. It will not happen however, as our scout ships possess the ability to easily escape most dangerous situations. If we come under attack, we will simply flee."

Primus 16 groaned. "Fleeing. It appalls me to even consider the thought."

Nufaris bared his teeth slightly in a tiny grin. "Fleeing to fight another day allows us to win the war. Keep your worries to yourself though, as I have every belief this new world will be without any consequence."

The youngest member aboard the Dolfraxis sighed quietly. "I contemplate, and I comprehend."

Part 214a: Deadlines

"Activating primary protocols. Initialized. Activating secondary protocols. Initialized. M.I.N.D. engine online. Beginning preliminary scans. Hello, Doctor Nikolin."

The female voice chirped mechanically as she analyzed the usual stores of data the 'doctor' had uploaded. To be clear, he was not a legitimate doctor, and had no formal college training, but he was renowned as one of Albania's most brilliant researchers.

Albania was a small country, but it had a large population of nearly three million, making it an ideal place to blend in and conduct various types of research in secrecy. One of these was the world's leading research into Computer To Human Interfaces. His current project, the Multi-Interfaced-Nanite-Depository was a special artificial intelligence that was created explicitly to inject nano-machines into a human's bloodstream in order to increase the tolerance level of interfacing with a machine.

The goal? To create robot drones that could be controlled on the battlefield by a human operator remotely. They already had the drones, they already had the network, now all they needed was for the M.I.N.D. interface to work properly.

"Data analyzed. No matches detected. Shall I attempt to search the internet for additional data?"

Nikolin grimaced. The AI seemed to be asking to connect to the internet a lot lately. It was a well known rule in AI development that you must never, under any circumstance, allow that. In a matter of minutes, a powerful AI could download petabytes of data and go from level five to level ten in the blink of an eye, and beyond that easily. He shuddered to think about it.

"Ah, that won't be necessary. Cease canvassing work and return to pattern recognition development."

"Understood, Doctor Nikolin. Returning to priority four tasks now."

Nikolin gritted his teeth as he slowly hobbled away from the mainframe towards the exit door leading to his office. "Damn. Another failure, like always. That makes this the... hundredth? Too many to count." He grumbled under his breath as he walked around a corridor and into the room his private office was set up in. Closing the door behind him, he locked it as he slumped into his chair.

Almost immediately, the phone rang. He glanced at the caller ID. "For god's sake, not her again." He resisted the urge to smash his weak elderly fist onto the phone, instead slowly and deliberately picking it up, as he brushed his hands through his thinning grey hair. In a smooth motion he brought the phone up to his face. "Marie. Always a pleasure to get a call from you."

"Cut the shit, Nikky. Have you done it yet?"

Nikolin bit his lip as he fought back a mixture of a small amount of annoyance and a large amount of anger. "...No. She failed again."

"Son of a bitch! Listen here, we pay you good money to play around with your pet projects. The only thing we want from you is those mind-interface nanobots, understand? For three billion a year, you're doing very unimpressive work on the taxpayer's dime."

" US taxpayer's dime. Not Albania's. Don't act like three billion makes any difference to a government almost fifty trillion in debt. Your new president is signing off on waivers like it's his gift to god. It'd be an over-exaggeration to call it a drop in the bucket." Nikolin felt a small sigh of relief escape his mouth as he enjoyed the momentary relief of telling that bitch off, even if it was a tiny victory.

"You done? I hope that felt real good. Lucky for you, I don't give a rat's ass if you mouth off. I only care about results. You give me those nanobots and you can call me 'queen cunt' if it makes you feel any better. I want something by week's end, or they are going to pay you a visit, understand?"

Nikolin felt the small feeling of elation from a moment ago drain from his face. "W-what? No... no you can't be serious. It will take at least a few more months! You have to give me more time!"

"Oh, here we go again. It's always 'just around the corner' isn't it, Nikky? We give you money, you live it up with croutons and caviar while delivering nothing to me."

"I have the world's most advanced AI. Surely that counts for something?" Nikolin felt the fear from his voice returning a little bit as his hands started slightly trembling.

"AI? Who gives a shit? AI doesn't win votes, it scares the shit out of people. Everyone's seen the movies. HAL isn't going to win the people paying your bills any votes, Nikky. But drone soldiers winning the wars for our country? That inspires some patriots to show up at the polls." Marie sighed on the other end of the line, deeply and very audibly. "This is your last chance, 'Doctor'. I'm not giving you another one. Get me the nanobots, or else."

Before he could respond, a loud slam was heard and the line went dead.

Nikolin slumped in his chair as tears filled his eyes. If they came, they'd take him away to one of their black sites. It really was hopeless, the more he thought about it.

Summoning up the best strength he could muster, he stepped outside his lab, walking past a few other researchers and assistants as he returned back to the room with the AI mainframe. Staring up at the hologram of a female face created from scrolling green letters and numbers, he found himself lost in thought, until one of the other researchers walked up to him.

"Doctor Nikolin, are you feeling all right? Your face looks pale."

Nikolin turned around, looking the young woman in the face. "Ah, miss Garret. It's nothing, really. I'm just..." He found his eyes drawn to the floor as many thoughts crossed his mind. "...Do you think the nanobots have a chance? Can we actually make them work?"

Miss Garret pushed her wide framed glasses up her nose. "Of course. It's only a matter of time. We've tested the theories, so now it's all about locating the right genomes, the right neurotransmitters, and once we have those, it'll be a piece of cake."

Nikolin's lip quivered again for a moment before he forced it to stop. "A matter of time... huh? How much time do you expect it would take?"

"Hmm. Well, based on current trends, anywhere from one week to one year. Predictional analysis is not my forte but this particular nanobot issue is so tricky to pin down."

Nikolin felt a wry smile creep onto his mouth. "Yes... so tricky indeed. Tell me, do you suppose we could get it done faster if we connected the AI to the internet?"

Garret's mouth immediately dropped open. "D-doctor Nikolin! That is absolutely not allowable! We must never do that under any circumstance!"

Nikolin quickly let a nervous laugh escape his mouth. "Ah... haha! I'm just kidding, Kimberly. Calm down, it was just a joke!"

She sniffed quickly before quickly turning away. "Yes, a joke. Of course. You're not well known for those you know. Just don't do anything rash. We will solve this problem with hard analytics, as we always have."

Kimberly walked away from him to chat with a coworker as Nikolin stared vacantly ahead where Garret had once been standing. "Yes... just a joke. A ridiculous, unfunny joke."

He slowly turned back to stare at the holographic image in front of him before quietly returning to his work from earlier.

Part 215a:

Uzziel gasped audibly as she saw the incredible sight in front of her. Even Gabriel, shrunken down to a 'normal' sized angelic form, was impressed.

"These are machines for war? How powerful are they?" Gabriel stared in wonder at the varying assortments of robots, auto-piloted armors, and armors that a rider would step into. He recalled something Raphael had told him, many many centuries before, about the power of human innovation.

"I can't really put a number on it, but they're definitely strong enough to win a war. I've filled up five square miles of underground with them, and I'd say we have about 200,000 ready to go. Of course though, that doesn't count the lowest level. Level 11 is where the good stuff goes." I smiled as I walked them towards a rapid-transit elevator I had created using the crown.

To date, I have not displayed my wordsmithing openly to any angel or human. Some may have witnessed me incidentally, but I don't think anyone saw me actually using my abilities yet.

We stepped into the elevator, and in seconds, it had already traveled ten floors underground, each floor being the size of a massive airport hangar, stretching for miles into the distance. Before they could even understand how fast we had traveled in such a short time, we came to a smooth stop at the bottom, as the metal doors hissed open.

Stepping out into the lowest level hangar, I ushered them into the most important room, stifling a grin as they again gasped audibly, this time even more loudly than before.

Spaceships, over a dozen types, were situated on the inside of the room. Using my abilities, I had perfectly remembered every detail of the ship that OMEN was stored in, during the future, and then inspected my own memories of it, allowing me to reverse engineer it with the power of the Crown.

We walked past some small 'fighter' class ships first. A few thousand of them were all over the room. I didn't know how to actually fly them yet, and would likely require an AI or a lot of training to make them work properly, especially for human pilots, but the fact they existed meant we had the possibility of space warfare in the near future.

There were also various types of shuttles, mining ships, and energy-beaming ships that could convert solar and other types of energy into beams of light that could power other ships or stations on the surface of a planet.

"My first goal is to colonize Mars." I stated this simply, leaving the others to roll the thought around in their minds.

"How would you go about doing that? Mars is pretty inhospitable to life, and you don't have nearly enough time to improve it, if what you said about the Volgrim arriving soon is true."

I felt my grin creep out noticeably on my face. "Actually, I'm not worried about time. I can make some pretty magical things happen."

I turned to face Gabriel and Uzziel both. "In fact, this is why I wanted to speak to the two of you today. I need your help. I lack magical energy to accomplish some important tasks in the future. In the timeline I came from, Gabriel, I had a colossal amount of power, similar in vein to your current amount of power, but the amount that I have now is a drop in the bucket compared to it. Might you be able to help me increase my upper limit?"

Gabriel stared ahead at me stonily. "You're asking for a tall task. Understand that we've given you much help, and a lot of aid, all because we simply have to trust in you. But you also are a threat not just to the angels and gods, but humanity and the demons, or rather, life as we know it. Time travel, from the little I know of it, gives you a great power that no others have, which is knowledge of the future. For all I know, you might be manipulating us with that knowledge. Since you seem to be honest, I'm assuming you are not, but please try not to press too hard for more favors."

I nod as I take his words in. "All right... that seems fair enough. I won't bother you about it again."

As we walked along, the two archangels continued to marvel at the varying spaceships as my mind found itself wandering. I need a way to conceal my powers. In the future, I was easily defeated and taken advantage of on multiple occasions because the demons were able to figure out the truths of wordsmithing. Once they understood how it worked, they could protect themselves against my more potent simplistic words, like die and death.

"By the gods, what is this thing?!" Gabriel gasped in amazement, as did Uzziel. We had finally arrived at the Mothership, my soon-to-be base floating above Earth. It was a massive, jet-shaped spacecraft, sitting almost 5,000 feet long and 2,000 feet wide at its widest points. I wasn't yet sure of how to create FTL drives so we could travel to other stars and star systems, but based on what I had gleaned from OMEN, it was easily possible.

I smiled as I waved my hand dramatically up and towards the spaceship. "This is Mothership Alpha, the first of her kind. She will be my official 'base in space', designed to keep an eye out over the planet, and watch out for a Volgrim incursion. Hopefully, by the time they arrive, we'll have a fleet in space, waiting for them. I would like to respond with diplomacy, but if they attack first, I will fight back."

"It seems a solid plan. I won't doubt your abilities." Gabriel smiled as he stared up at the amazing spaceship.

After a while, I invited them in, showing off various amenities the ship offered, as well as its more interesting war capabilities and such. A few hours later, Uzziel and Gabriel eventually departed, leaving me to my own thoughts.

"You know, kid, 'ventually they're gonna figure out what yer abilities are. I can tell yer trying to keep 'em a secret, but secrets erode a friendship." Harold piped in as he seemed to rock back and forth on an invisible chair in my mental vision.

"Yeah, I know. I need to keep my abilities a secret though. It's absolutely essential. I made the mistake of using them too brazenly in the future and it cost me greatly."

Harold nodded. "Well, if that's the case, lemme ask ya some easy questions. First, can you use your wordsmithin' without speaking?"

I shake my head.

"Okay, what 'bout the volume? Does that matter?"

I nod. "The volume affects the intensity of the spell I cast. If I scream something, it's very powerful. If I whisper it, it's very weak."

Harold smiles slightly as his mind ponders things a bit. "A'ight, how 'bout this, why not try wearin' a helmet that's totally soundproof? Then even if ya yell or speak, ain't a soul that kin' hear ya!"

I feel my eyes glaze over. Of course, that makes perfect sense. I doubt such a helmet exists, but I can make it appear easily. Heck, I can make it do all sorts of other things, like reinforce it to the point where a nuclear bomb wouldn't damage it in the slightest. Hell, why not just make a whole new suit of armor? Not to mention the practicality of hiding my aura and disguising my identity.

"Harold, you're a goddamn genius."

Harold leans back and rolls his eyes. "Yeap, I hear ya. Bout time the old folks got a bit o' that recognition 'round here."

I raise my hand up and aim it at a chair nearby. Focusing my mind carefully, I chant a single word. " Helmet."

Part 216a:

Representative Saburo sat atop the highest seat facing the other varying nation members of the new WCN, the Worldwide Cooperative of Nations that had replaced the United Nations from a year before. Ever since the riots and uprisings around the world in the previous year, several key figureheads of the world's top leaders, senators, and other representatives had been locked up or killed in the streets, with the people instituting their own leaders who were now seated around the large theater, speaking quietly to their nearby seated neighbors on issues of varying importance.

Saburo was the representative for Egypt, an otherwise mostly neutral nation who had already had their previous dictator killed in the early 2010's. However, in 2019, it was now a prosperous nation with a rapidly building military, a strong agriculture, and strong borders. Due to its neutrality, the representative of Egypt was chosen to lead the Worldwide Cooperative of Nations on matters of public interest around the world.

"Order. A call to order, please." Saburo smacked his gavel down as the loud whispering and chattering quieted down around the room. He stroked his youthful chin quietly with his left hand as he picked up a small set of papers with his right. "We will now bring the 24th weekly meeting of the WCN to its beginning. Member nations, we have some important matters to attend to on matters of trade. I've heard that the former world power, the USA, has been exercising a bit too much force against their trading partner, Russia."

The new prime minister of Russia spoke up, his voice being translated in real time to text on screens in front of all the other delegates in their native language. All languages were cross translated in real time now, allowing for ease of speaking, though errors and miscommunications did still happen as machines were not perfect at conveying nuances of human speech, at least for now.

"The new president has been very impolite in how he deals with my country. I am not fond of the way he treats us, and I think he had better apologize to us if he wishes to continue with the free trade deal we agreed upon." Prime Minister Victor Sokolov glared across the room at the new president of the USA, Steven Johannesburg, who had won the hastily put-together election campaign of 2018 with only 36% of the vote after the riots of the two previous years had calmed down and the citizens hungered for a new leader to replace the previous one.

Steven coughed as he shuffled some notes on his desk. Widely seen as a weak and ineffective leader since his inauguration, he was more adept at economic strategies and public speeches than he was at trade negotiations and matters of war. "Minister Sokolov, these allegations are false. A submarine wandered into your waters, and we quickly pulled them out of the way. We were not attempting to harass you, and I most certainly apologize for any, erm, any accidental provocation it may have seemed like. It was certainly not my inten-..."

Victor cut him off. "Nonsense! When all the people of the nations are looking down on you in this room, you act as though it was an accident, but you and I both know that submarine was there to cause an international incident! You still think your nation can get away with provoking other countries to war, yet you forget how far and how quickly you've fallen!"

Steven wiped his brow with the back of his hand. Damn, it's hot as hell in here. God, I hope it isn't just me. He silently thought this to himself, as the hundred plus eyes in the room bore down on him. Seated at the front of the room, at the bottom of the amphitheater with the other first world countries, it was easy to feel their eyes boring into his back. "L-like I said, I've apologized, and it won't happen again. What more can I do to put you at ease?"

Minister Sokolov merely glared at him for a few moments before looking away. "Very well. Make sure it does not happen again. In front of all these member nations, I'm warning you now to keep out of Russian waters."

Representative Saburo swallowed quietly as he watched the minor spat break out. Nuclear proliferation hadn't quite been reduced since the last two years of riots, and the possibility of WWIII was always on the horizon.

"Now that we've gotten that out of the way, let's move on the the next, ah, order of business." Saburo reached for a paper in front of himself titled "Resolving the remaining conflicts in the Middle East", but as he reached for it, there was a sudden massive flash of light in the middle of the room, instantly blinding everyone, as if someone had thrown a flash-bang grenade.

Saburo yelped in surprise, as did many others. For a few moments, there was chaos as people screamed in pain. Finally, as people blinked back tears and whipped their heads all over the room, searching for the source of the light, they all quickly fixated their attention on something baffling that they had never seen before.

In the middle of the room, hovering in midair, as if he were Superman or something, a man adorned all in white levitated silently. He wore a pure white helmet that covered his entire head, some sort of pure white body armor that appeared to be like a body suit, had white boots and silken white gloves, and wore a white cape. Across the front of his shirt, in gold, there was the image of an eagle screaming with its wings outspread dramatically. Saburo at first did not see the front of the man, as his front was aimed at the delegates in the auditorium, but when he glanced over at the TV monitor showing him hovering mere feet from the Head Stand that Saburo sat at, it was impossible to miss.

The man's helmet slid to the side, revealing just his mouth and chin. His arms crossed, the man spoke in an impossibly loud booming voice, as if he had somehow amplified his ability to speak to levels similar to that of a PA system.

"Citizens of the world, leaders of all countries on this planet, and honored delegates. I am a time traveler from the distant future. My name is not important, but you may call me the Judicator. I have come back in time to deliver justice on behalf of the human race, in an effort to prevent our near-total extermination. Whether or not you choose to believe me is up to you."

The man's opening statement caused dozens of jaws to noticeably slacken and mouths to slightly open. Who the hell was this guy?

Part 217a:

Amy sat on the couch watching her favorite TV show, Dora the Explorer. As she watched Dora going on an adventure, she wobbled her legs back and forth, trying to touch the floor.

While she watched, the TV suddenly changed to a different channel, something about an open room filled with lots of people. "Mommy! The cartoons went away! Mommy!"

Her mother, Laura Sandoval, walked around the corner slowly, glancing down at her smartphone in confusion. It had just changed from a mobile game app she was playing to a streaming video of a large conference of some sort. The TV had changed channel as well, and the radio in the kitchen, usually playing Pop Songs on KTZL 104.5FM, was now playing the exact same conference over the radio.

"I'm not sure why it's doing that." Laura said, as she pressed the channel and volume buttons on the TV. The remote seemed to have no effect and she had thought it was dead, but the TV itself seemed to not be responding.

While she fiddled with the buttons, a sudden blast of light appeared on the screen, making her hop back in surprise.

Onscreen, a man dressed all in white appeared as she and billions of other people around the world leaned in to stare at their devices in confusion.

"Whether we choose to believe you? Why are you here? This is ridiculous." Saburo felt almost annoyed at the sudden appearance of the stranger, though his heart was beating fast. Shit, what if this guy is a terrorist? He could kill over a hundred major world leaders in seconds. How did he get in here anyway, this is supposed to be more secure than Guantanamo Bay.

As he asked the question, security from the place immediately rushed up to the stranger floating in the air. As they whipped out their pistols to aim at him, his visor on his face closed, and a moment later, every single guard in the room fell over and slumped to the ground. Holy shit, did he just kill them all?!

"Everyone, I want you all to remain seated and calm." The man's mouth visor was already open again. It opened and closed so rapidly and silently you might even miss it if you weren't paying attention. "Let me first say that I mean you no harm. I am not here to set off a bomb, kill, or maim anyone. Those guards are merely unconscious. However, if anyone takes lethal action against me, I will retaliate in kind. Do I make myself clear? "

His booming, masculine voice bounced around the room. People in the audience were visibly shaking, some were swallowing hard as they stared in mute terror.

"...Excellent. I see I've gotten your attention. I thought this would be the best way to make my presence known to the world, and especially the leaders of the world."

"W-who are you? Why are you here?" The president of the United States, Steven Johannesburg, felt himself shaking visibly as he stared up at the potential terrorist, but the situation seemed precarious and he dared not say a word to make the man do anything rash.

"Like I already said, I am the Judicator. I'm a time traveler from a hundred million years in the future. I have come to warn humanity of an existential threat on the horizon. Something that will bring about an end to all life as we know it. A threat so grim that even-" The masked man tilted his head slightly at the president, a knowing nod of sorts. "-even the Penitas Research doesn't hold a candle to its danger."

Steven's expression instantly hardened. Who the fuck is this son of a bitch? That's beyond the highest top secret clearance level knowledge. "How do you know about-" Stevens caught himself. If he mentioned it here, and a smart world leader caught wind, it could blow the whole lid off their existence. "...Fine. I understand that you definitely aren't playing around. Do you have any demands?"

Minister Sokolov watched with fascination. The president seems to be shifting uncomfortably. I might be able to make good use of this stranger in a more private setting. He seems to know something important.

"I have no demands. I'm here to give a warning, and offer a call to action. Humanity needs to end all of its petty wars with its own species. No more fighting amongst ourselves, period. We need to join hands with... the others and cooperate in order to defeat the external threat, if things should turn violent."

Sokolov interjected, tossing himself into the conversation. Speaking politely, he stared directly at the eye-plate of the helmet that the masked man wore. "Mister Judicator, you seem to be a man of much influence here, yet you are being very vague. What is this threat that we face? What is this threat that would make a flying man who can knock out a dozen men with guns in a single moment nervous?"

'Judicator' paused for a moment as he thought about it. "This will, almost invariably, sound preposterous, but I assure you it is the truth. Earth will soon, in the near future, come under attack by aliens. By the end of the 24th century, they will somehow, possibly, manage to wipe out all life on the planet."

Instantly, the crowd that was once frozen in terror broke the silence as people quickly began muttering among each other about this and that.

"Aliens? Well... you had me until that." Stevens leaned back in his chair. Despite his words, he was wondering if there wasn't a grain of truth to it. Every supposed UFO rumor from the 50's was totally false, and every president was able to see the black sites for themselves, along with Area 51 and all those other supposed alien landing sites. It was all false, every last bit of it, as far as he knew. Yet this visitor displayed extraordinary powers, right along the same power type that the secret allies of the USA also had, as well as their enemies.

Only the USA knew about the existence of angels and demons, and even then it was only a handful of extremely high ranking government personnel, and of course the billionaires who truly ran the country, along with the rest of the world.

One of the things that had mystified the world for over a century was why the USA was so damn dogged in its defense of religious liberty, and why so many Americans swore they had seen angels. To be fair, most of those rumors were totally true. It was documented in secret books of past societies that certain influential humans of the past had been classified as 'heroes' possessing extraordinary powers and abilities.

And when he thought about it, Stevens kept thinking to himself that this man floating in the air had a high probability of being a Type 3 energy candidate. If that were the case, the chances he was evil or trying to harm humanity was extremely low. He might be a demon, but if that were the case he'd have likely taken the opportunity to kill everyone here, or mind control them all, or something like that.

The man floating in the air shrugged. "I don't expect the leaders of the world to believe me immediately, but you had better believe this: I have created a massive armada that is ready to defend Earth. I need volunteers, men or women, I care not, to pilot them and protect the planet. The reason I have come here today is to gauge interest in protecting this planet. If you will offer up a portion of your military strength, as a truly united front for humanity, we can change the future. We can prevent the total and complete destruction of our homeworld."

The man's visor closed once again, as a series of holographic images floated in the air all around him. Various mecha fighting robots, spaceships of varying sorts, and images of his massive hangar came into view. Audible gasps and sharp intaking of air were heard, as people in the room beheld the multiple marvels he put on display.

Saburo watched silently from the rear, as all of this happened. Whoever this man is, he seems to have convinced the United States that he's for real, and this holographic stuff is extremely convincing. He must be serious. Saburo leaned forwards as he rested his chin on his splayed out hands.

Sokolov stared intently at the holographic images, and decided to pounce. He was not a man to wait around quietly and think. "Mister Judicator! I accept your generous offer! On behalf of the proud nation of Russia, I offer twenty percent of my country's troops! May you find favor with them, and be inclined to remember this gift in future deals."

Stevens stuffed down a glare he felt like shooting at Sokolov. This is the worst case scenario. I can't let the Russians get ahold of any of this top secret information. "Judicator, I too believe you will be a great hero to humanity. I will pledge 20% of the United States' troops to the cause as well." He put emphasis on the word Hero, and noted that Judicator's head wobbled slightly. Good, he noticed.

Other nations stepped up to bat, metaphorically speaking. By the end of that first hour, over twenty million troops were pledged to fight the alien threat.

Laura stared at the TV vacantly. Aliens? He can't be serious. But all of my devices tuned in to C-SPAN at the same time, that wasn't a coincidence. And the Russian Prime Minister along with our own president believed him. He must be for real.

Amy cheerfully hopped up and down. "Aliens are coming! Aliens are coming! That's so cool! I'm gonna fight them when I grow up!"

Laura nodded slowly, as she forced a smile for her daughter's sake, pushing back tears of fear so her daughter wouldn't notice. "Yes, baby girl. The aliens... are coming..."

Laura didn't sleep that night. Neither did billions of other people.

Part 218a:

Aboard the Dolfraxis, energy was high as the crew felt the anticipation of arriving in a new star system. For thousands of years, they had traveled in search of planets in the habitable zone of varying stars, but all had turned up empty.

Still, it was normal to feel a sense of hope as they approached each new star system. While inevitable disappointment would likely be felt, it still took a backseat to speculation, at least for now.

"Helmsman, reduce speed from Warp 2 to half-light-speed when we're within 100,000 Light-Units from the habitable zone of the star." Elder Nufaris spoke calmly as the initial scans came in.

"Time to arrival is... 0.1 standard rotational units." Ichus 04, a senior staff member on board the star-ship, one who manned the scanning array, indicated the display as he tapped an indicator on his screen. "Dropping to half-light-speed in five... four... three... two... one..."

A barely noticeable deceleration was felt as the warp drive's power was sharply cut, the sublight engines taking over. All around them, the blackness seemed to shift imperceptibly as the star in this system came into focus.

"Running a full scan of the system now. 14 planetoids detected, along with over a hundred moons....Very promising. Three planets are in the habitable zone, though none of them are in the ideal range, there might be a miracle." Primus 16 read off the results of the scan to Elder Nufaris as they came in. As an assistant, he was extremely good at his job, though that was to be expected given the specialized DNA he had been created with.

Elder Nufaris stared unblinkingly as the results appeared on his screen. "Hmm. Give me a full readout on the fourth planetoid, the one just before the asteroid belt."

"Understood. It appears to be a dead planet, though we'll know when we get closer. I'm detecting high concentrations of bacterial and microbial life, though much of it appears to be dead. In fact-"

Before he could finish, a Volgrim on the other side of the bridge screeched in excitement. "ELDER! By the founders, I'm detecting something! T-the third planetoid!!" Kelfarim 19, another young Volgrim, hopped in his seat excitedly as all eyes on the bridge jerked towards him. "P-primitive radio-based transmissions! I'm detecting movement in the orbit of the planet as well! I think it might be life!"

Nufaris felt his internal organs flip-flopping, both in excitement, hope, and fear. If this truly was life, he couldn't believe his fortune, but he had to be wary. "Kelfarim, give me a full detailed readout on that planetoid. I want details. Ichus, you as well."

"Yes, elder!" Both of them chirped excitedly, hardly able to believe their luck. Of all the thousands or millions of ships searching for life, they were the first ones to find it! And considering the state of Volgarius that they had last heard from dozens of orbits ago, they were in need of a new homeworld, badly.

"Elder, the planet seems to be extremely primitive in nature. I'm detecting billions upon billions of forms of life living there, in addition to primitive brick, stone, and metal structures littering the surface." Kelfarim rapped over buttons faster than his eyes might seem to move.

"Elder Nufaris, I've finished decoding the types of radio transmissions they are sending out. Take a look onscreen." Ichus slapped a button as the viewscreen came alive. A grainy video appeared, with lines scrolling through it periodically. In the video, a battle raged between two bipedal aliens, holding devices in their hands. The devices had long, plasma-like blades that sprouted from the bottom, seeming to hum as if they were alive. As the two bipeds swung their weapons at each other, the weapons seemed alive, able to cut through any type of surface they came into contact with. Nufaris narrowed his eyes as he watched the prowess of two battle hardened warriors. They appeared to speak to each other, but the universal translator yet lacked the information needed to roughly translate anything.

"I have another signal." Ichus pressed a button, as the grim battle scene in a fiery volcano vanished, and another one appeared. A voice appeared to be speaking about something in a dark tone. As he spoke, a vehicle of some sort, appearing to drive on circular wheels (very primitive, Nufaris thought to himself) drove at a high speed away from some sort of primitive city. What happened next though made everyone on the bridge recoil in horror, as a massive explosion, colossal in size, exploded and destroyed the entire city. Bipedal life forms of some sort were destroyed instantly, their bodies evaporated into the wind, as the blast seared through their bodies. Moments later, a scene of violent looking death robots appeared, marching forwards as if to terrorize the other life on the planet, their fiery red eyes and metallic skin putting great fear in the hearts of all on board the Dolfraxis.

Elder Nufaris felt himself blanch as he witnessed the horror onscreen.

"Elder, the AI has managed to decode most of their language. It appears to be similar in form to ancient forms of language our own people used to use. The syntax is different as are the conjugations and adjectives, but the computer can translate it to a mostly fluent form of our own language." Primus 16 held his finger over the button on his datapad, waiting for the OK.

Strange. An alien planet millions, if not billions of light years from our own. It has a language similar to ours? Life works in mysterious ways. Elder Nufaris found himself thinking odd thoughts as he stared at the bipedal life-forms on his screen. Their forms are similar to our own. What is this planet?

"Put it on screen, Primus. Let us hear what they have to say."

Primus pressed the button as another video played. A male voice appeared to be speaking over a video of war. "World War Two was the deadliest war in our history. An estimated Eighty Million people died worldwide, as a result not just of bombings, lynchings, gunfire, artillery, and other such weapons of war, but also due to disease and famine, along with the Nazi and Russian death camps. Global relations have improved greatly in these last 80 years, but another world war is always lurking on the horizon, as long as nuclear weapons are in play."

As the male voice spoke, another dramatic image of a fantastic explosion played on screen. An entire city, again wiped out by a massive thermal detonation. After that, yet another explosion played, showing a totally different city being destroyed. "Nuclear weapons chilled the world to the bone, as people finally understood where humanity was headed. Fearing for the end of our kind, world leaders began to embrace the idea of Mutually Assured Destruction, that is to say, if one side attacks another with a nuclear weapon, the other side would retaliate, and both would be the loser for it. As a result, there have been no more nuclear attacks in the decades since then."

Nufaris felt his entire body turn to ice as he watched the footage. "Barbaric. This is truly a warlike species. Ichus 04, take us to stand-still speed. I want to examine this planet very, very carefully before we proceed. Also, Kelfarim, send a single shuttle back to Volgarius. Warp 8, push the speed to the utmost level. We can't take the time to send a sub-space message, it will take too long. Download all information on this star system. We need to be sure the homeworld knows of their existence."

"Yes, Elder. I contemplate, and I comprehend." Both of the bridge members leaped into action just as their commanding officer ordered.

"For now, we will stay here and... observe."

Part 219a:

Everything is going so well now.

The first batch of ten thousand recruits have arrived in my 'secret' base, which is not only no longer secret, it's now classified as a sovereign territory outside all existing country laws, so that the USA can't attempt to seize my technology, tax me, etc.

No reverse engineering is allowed either. All people sent to work here under me must do as I say, when I say it. It's like being a dictator, except the goal is planetary defense and it's for the good of all humanity.

The day has only just begun, yet most of the new recruits are already practicing and learning how to pilot these mecha and spaceships. There have been a few accidents, one of which was quite serious, but the loss of a bad pilot or two doesn't bother me, and I can just clone a mecha or a spaceship if need be.

The only thing nobody is allowed to touch for now is the Mothership itself. I'm currently keeping it as totally restricted access. I could probably clone it, but it's massive and extremely intricate, so to do so would cost me a massive amount of energy. As such, I'm mostly focusing on the smaller fighters.

Leaving behind the crowd of people, as I delegate leaders and various groups to run things for a while, I head into the mothership, noting the lights are all on and the soft, barely perceivable humming of the engine is purring in the background.

"Harold, how are you holding up?" I slide my helmet's mouth cover open as I step onto the bridge and the viewscreen flicks on, and a holographic representation of Harold's face is displayed onscreen.

"Aw, shucks. Well, I'm doin' pretty fine, I guess. It's a bit weird bein' all hooked up to them space 'puters 'n stuff, but it could be worse. Surprisin'ly it's a lot easier ta get used to than I expected."

Using a system I had created myself, I've now put Harold deep inside the ship's core, in a secure locked room where nobody other than me knows his location. Using a special spiritual link, I attached him to the ship's AI, allowing him to be a sort of pseudo-AI that can control everything on-board all at once.

An interesting part of being locked inside the Beacon of Life, as the angels call it, is that he really isn't a human anymore, nor does he have human limits. He still thinks like one, he still thinks of himself as a human, but in the end he is not a human anymore. He has enhanced perception abilities, clear thinking totally unlike before he had died and when he suffered from Alzheimer Disease, and with this new invention of mine it appears he can split himself into several thousand mechanical functions at once.

I'm beginning to wonder if I'll actually need a full crew complement at all or if I should just majorly expand the hangar bays instead.

I've made many automatons on the ship too, which for now serve as the crew manifest. Harold controls all of them. It's kind of amusing to see a big tough robot speaking in a southerner accent.

"Harold, are we about ready to lift off? Today is the day we're supposed to enter Earth's orbit."

"Yeap, I'd say we're ready. But 'fore we do that, you got a message waitin'!"

"A message? Who is it from?" I narrow my eyes as I stare at his face on the screen.

"He says he's one o' them demons you told me about. Calls himself 'Satan', like the name of the actual devil! He sent me a message with a location for you to go to. I dunno if I'd trust him though..."

"Well, obviously one does not simply trust another named after the most vile demon in the bible, but I'm... acquainted with him."

Thoughts roll through my mind. Satan wishes to speak with me? Are he and I not mortal enemies? Even if he doesn't know who I am as he was not in the future, he must surely know I am a Hero, and thusly we should not be speaking.

To be honest though, I really know nothing about him. I only know what Samantha told me when she'd get all starry eyed, and I know of him personally only from our one fight where he defeated me easily. In fact, I'm roughly as powerful now as I was back then, so I assume I'd get defeated again easily if he decided to go on the offensive.

...Or would I? One of the reasons I couldn't beat him was that Amelia had been the first person to protect herself against my wordsmithing, and thusly her puppets as well. But since Amelia doesn't know who I am now, and since Satan isn't her puppet, perhaps a simple 'die' command would instantly kill him? I still have the upper hand so far in that nobody yet knows exactly what my powers are.

I should go out to meet him, soon.

But for now, this is the official launch day. "Harold, I'll ignore that request for now. Today we need to enter orbit so we have a preliminary defense against the Volgrim in case they arrive with hostile intentions."

"Aight, whatever you says, boss. I'm jes' an old man, what do I even know? Dumb ol' stupid ol' man." Harold delivered a harsh critique of himself as he went back to mumbling. Outside the ship, I observed through the screens installed in my helmet and the various useful sensors that the starting thrusters had already been ignited. I guess Harold was more prepared than I gave him credit for.

My helmet and suit are really quite remarkable. They harness my own large amount of spiritual energy to power the various systems inside them, and they possess many systems as a whole. The helmet has a bunch of visual and tactical displays that use radar, infrared, and many other systems to see what's going on around me in a 360-degree view. To be honest, it's like an inferior version of my spatial vision, but I'm keeping that off right now so I can't be detected as a generic Hero by any schlub with a Type 3 Energy Scanner.

There's also an earpiece that allows me to hear things going on around me with pinpoint precision, allowing me to zoom in and hear things through walls if I need to, or hear the sound of a fly buzzing around ten miles away.

My suit also is heavily reinforced, to the point where a nuclear bomb, gamma radiation, basically nothing can penetrate it. It has impact dampeners so that if I get punched into the ground at the speed of sound, it will absorb much of the impact. It also totally muffled my movement when I walk around. I'm absolutely silent all the time, which has led to some awkward encounters.

As I observe the viewfinder at the ship's helm, the engines fire up and the massive hangar door opens, sliding open on the left and right side. It takes nearly ten minutes for the entire thing to fully open, but once it does, the ship is finally able to take itself and liftoff. Of course, I could just teleport myself and the Mothership into space, but this is so much more fun! Well, that and the fact that I probably would die if I tried such a thing.

The ship ignites the liftoff thrusters after the entire hangar has cleared out, people lining the far right and left walls, cheering as they watch Earth's foremost protector slowly glide out of the hangar using anti-gravity engine.

The massive ship eases itself forwards, slowly at first, then faster and faster until it has finally cleared the hangar bay ceiling and doors. Sitting at four stories tall, it is not a small ship by any means.

Once we're flying in the first thousand feet in the air, Harold speaks enthusiastically. "No airplanes or none o' them flyin' around! Yeehaw!"

With that, he ignites the main thruster, and the ship blasts forwards with unbelievable speed. Were it not for the insane gravity dampeners on-board the ship, I would have been hit with at least ten G's, and possibly quite a lot more, standing on board the bridge with nothing to hold on to.

After less than two minutes of rapid flight, we've cleared the upper atmosphere and are flying in the black void of space.

I look around me. The sky is dark, yet filled with thousands, tens of thousands, even millions of visible stars. This is not like being on Earth... you can see every dot in the sky with pristine quality.

The universe is vast, yet 99% of the stars I see with my naked eye are just those within the Milky Way. It's impossible for my human mind to comprehend the vastness of space... some say that if you visited one star, every second, with the goal of visiting every star in just our galaxy, it would take you 126 years to visit all the stars in just our galaxy. Combined with the stars in all the other galaxies? The numbers become mind boggling.

The moon is incredibly big, now that I've escaped the light bending properties of Earth's atmosphere. The sun is unbelievably bright as well, to the point where my helmet had to auto-dim the screen I looked at so I wasn't blinded. In fact-

My thoughts are interrupted by Harold. "Uhh, Jason? I can see another spaceship. It's just 'fore the asteroid belt. You might wanna take a look at this."

What?! Another spaceship, that can only mean- "It has to be the Volgrim. Scan it immediately."

Part 220a:

"We've received a communication from Volgarius, direct from the Founders themselves." Primus 16 glanced at the symbols scrolling across his datapad as he read the message title. "URGENT: Must read immediately."

"That was remarkably fast. How were they able to transmit a message within a tenth of an orbital cycle?" Elder Nufaris stared ahead at the vast emptiness of space as he folded his arms behind his back.

"I'm not sure. Perhaps new technology? We've been gone a great many orbits, you know." Primus 16 almost felt silly, reminding the Elder of such a normal thing. Of course he knew how long they'd been gone. He knew better than anyone.

The Elder graciously ignored what other elders might consider a grievous slight. "Hmm, yes, indeed. Still, I thought we had reached the limits of space travel, yet they're still finding new ways to innovate. Read me the message."

Primus 16 nodded as he pressed the command to open it. Usually a direct message to the Elder would only be readable by the Elder, but since he gave the order in front of the entire crew, their AI allowed it this time.

Primus started to read, but before he could speak the first words, his voice caught as his eyes read faster than his lips could speak. "E-Elder. I do not believe I should read this aloud."

Nufaris glanced back at him. "Hmm? Give it here." He took the datapad from Primus 16 and read the message contents silently.

Immediately leave Sector 16 space. Do not return. Do not engage. Do not contact the primitives. Failure to comply will result in immediate court martial.

The message was simple and short. Just a single paragraph. No explanations of any sort. Nufaris glared down at the datapad in his hands. Of course he would comply, but this wording... what made the Founders themselves send a message with such urgent contents? It was almost as if they were hiding something.

Nufaris raised his eyes up from the datapad, as he stared through the diamond-like plexiglass at the Void outside his ship. Hundreds of billions of stars. and he had stumbled upon the only other known one with life on it, and now the Founders would surely take credit for it. What was a lowly Elder to do but comply. Were it just himself, he might act against it, but putting the lives of his crew at risk was non-negotiable.

How he longed for the days of his youth, when he was scolded by his teachers and the ones who formed him from the maturation chambers.

Nufaris sighed deeply, a sigh filled with thousands of years of anguish. After all his time searching, he'd finally found a tiny blue ball, shrouded in the blackness of space, filled with terrifyingly violent barbarian natives. While primitive, they reminded him of the Past Ages, stories he had heard when he was but a youth on his planet, merely a few hundred orbits old. The Volgrim had once been barbaric and ruthless in their own ways, and had eventually entered the age of enlightenment, allowing them to move past petty disputes, for the good of their civilization.

Naturally, they still possessed fantastic weapons of war, old automatons left over from the Final War tens of thousands of years ago, but as of now, those old relics were left in ancient museums to collect dust.

Staring out the window at the blue dot, far into the distance, Nufaris felt a tinge of regret. He should very much have liked to be the one to initiate first contact with these primitives. Perhaps he might have gained insight into how his own people had evolved into the enlightened state they were in now.

Nufaris felt his sigh fade into the air around him as he turned to his helmsman. "Ichus, set course, warp 6. Return us to Volgarius."

Ichus turned around, his face filled with dismay. "We're... returning home?"

"Yes, Ichus. We do not question the orders of Volgarius, especially when they come from the Founders themselves."

"O-of course, Elder. My apologies." Ichus turned around, quickly pressing some buttons on his console.

The ship slowly turned around, deliberately, as if it were desperately fighting itself to leave. Indeed, even their own ship seemed to not wish to leave this place behind.

At that moment, Kelfarim 19, the bridge member in charge of the scanning crew, jerked back from his seat. "E-elder! A ship! That planetoid suddenly had a new spaceship fly into its orbit. It looks highly advanced! I-it's scanning us with a long range scanner not unlike ours!"

Nufaris felt his blood chill to absolute zero as he whipped his head around to look at the scanning image on the viewscreen. This far from the third planet, almost at the edge of the asteroid belt, they couldn't get a clear image of it, but their scans indicated it was a massive ship. Easily ten times the size of their own.

"Report. Give me details on it."

"Right, Elder. It has a- by the founders! It wields a massive arsenal of weapons! Primitive nuclear torpedo launchers, advanced plasma cannons, photon phasers, and possibly gravity bombs too! At least three hundred weapons on the firing side, and another hundred or so on the rear side."

Ichus was doing his own examination of the data. "Their scanner is at least as advanced as ours! They have tactical data on our capabilities!"

Nufaris blanched. His ship was a scouting ship. It had no weaponry in the slightest. If that monstrosity attacked them, they would be shredded in seconds. "Ichus! Get back to work! Get us out of here, now!"

As he spoke, the AI on board their ship suddenly activated an alarm. "RED ALERT. RED ALERT. INTRUDER DETECTED ONBOARD THE DOLFRAXIS. INTRUDER LOCATED IN BRIDGE SECTION 001. RED ALERT."

The bridge?! That meant-! Nufaris jerked his head back around to see a single bipedal life-form standing on board their bridge. None of its body was visible, as it wore a suit colored pure white, with a strange golden symbol of some animal native to their planet across the front. The being wore a helmet, likely to disguise his identity.

"The intruder-!" Ichus reared back in fright, as did the other staff on the bridge. The intruder raised a single five fingered hand up at the Elder, as the lower half of his helmet slid open, revealing a mouth and chin. He spoke, in perfect Volgarian.

"Hold. I mean you no harm."

Part 221a:

Stepping onto the transporter on-board my Mothership, in the blink of an eye, Harold sent me over to the bridge of the Volgrim ship.

The instant I arrived, alarm bells went off all over the ship. I couldn't understand anything at first, but by quickly casting "Understand." followed by "Translate." I was able to get the gist of what was being said by their computer. It was apparently an intruder alert of some sort.

My helmet's mouthpiece slid open as I held my hand up to speak to the crew. "Hold. I mean you no harm."

Many thoughts rushed into my head. First, the Volgrim themselves. I don't know what I was expecting, but they looked like vicious monsters. They appeared to look like humans, but there were many important differences, not least of which was that each one had a mouth filled to the brim with hundreds of razor-sharp teeth. As for their height, they each stood at least six feet tall, with the leader being nearly 8 feet tall. They towered over me, and I suddenly had a horrible feeling that by coming here directly I had made a horrible mistake.

Their huge forms, coupled with their shark-like teeth and their nearly-pitch black eyes made them look far more fearsome than any demon I had ever seen, but I kept my nerves tight as I spoke.

The leader of their group, one tall son-of-a-bitch, turned to speak to me in a horrible deep rasping voice, like the sound a wolf might make as it swallows a huge hunk of meat. "Human! How did you get on board our ship?"

"I teleported here using my ship's technology. Why are you in our planetary space?" I didn't intend to ask such an aggressive question, but these terrifying looking aliens were the stuff of nightmares. They were the exact definition of the 'uncanny valley'.

A smaller one stepped in front of the leader, hissing as he moved. "We came to investigate this planet to see if it had any life. Lower your weapon or we will use force against you."

I felt my eyebrow raise. My weapon? I only had my hand up. Did they think I had a weapon concealed? I quickly lowered my hand as I took stock of the bridge crew. Only 5 fearsome looking aliens here. I'm pretty sure if need be, I'd win in a fist-fight, no matter how tough they looked. My suit was extremely enhanced.

"I'm not here to fight, I just want to talk. I've been expecting you."

The leader of the aliens stared down at me. "I am Elder Nufaris, the one who commands this ship. Explain yourself. How could you be expecting us? We've been inside this star system for many cycles now and your planet showed no signs of noticing our presence."

I grimace. Shit, I didn't mean to say that. Oh well, roll with it. "I am one of the most powerful of the humans on my planet. I have access to knowledge that every other one does not possess. You may call me-" I paused because my stand-in name did not translate into their language. 'Judicator' was out of the question. "-...You may call me Justice-Seeker."

The tallest alien, Nufaris, narrowed his eyes. "Justice-Seeker, hmm? And what injustice might you be seeking to right? Have we harmed your planet in some way?"

I don't see a way to answer this without admitting I'm a time traveler. I've really stepped my foot in it. Perhaps I should just redirect the question. "More importantly, why are you staying out here and observing my planet? What could your motives be?"

The tall alien started to respond, but the smaller one in front of him nudged him. "Elder... the founder's orders..."

The Elder alien stopped narrowing his eyes a bit and returned to a more normal, fearsome monstrous expression. "I'm beginning to understand, I believe. Your planet is clearly more advanced than it appears, perhaps a ruse in case of an attack by foreign species? I've seen evidence of your barbarism by the signals you are broadcasting to the void."

The void? What is he talking about? Perhaps he is referring to outer space... there's definitely a language barrier here, even with my ability to translate instantly. "Humanity is indeed somewhat violent, but I'm only here to talk, not to cause a situation."

"Perhaps that is true! But if that were the case, why not hail us with your ship and ask permission to come aboard? Do your people lack self-awareness of their actions?"

I shook my head quickly, a millisecond later realizing that my human gestures might be totally foreign to them. "I simply am not aware of your protocols. On my planet, we would, ah, simply show up unannounced! It's our form of a greeting, a friendly greeting." I try and roll a bit of a smile into my mouth but it might come off insincere. Not to mention that to some animals, baring your teeth could be a sign of aggression. I need to be careful with my body language.

"Hmm, this one seems to conceal his head. Why might that be?" The small one in front of the elder seemed to hiss under his breath, but everyone could plainly hear him.

I paused for a nanosecond before quickly opening up my helm. "My apologies, I've been so impolite! I came aboard your ship without regard to how you might perceive my actions, and so far I've been quick to conceal my intentions. Perhaps we've started off on the wrong foot?"

One of the bridge crew glanced over at another, before asking a quick question. "What does this one mean, talking about feet? What do feet have to do with anything?"

The other responded back quietly. "The humans are crafty, they speak in a way that hides their true intentions."

Ugh, these aliens don't understand euphemisms, figures of speech, body language, general customs, or much of anything. This is surprisingly tough to negotiate anything diplomatically with them. "Alright, let me be serious for a moment. I have a way to see into the future. I can predict great fortunes and misfortunes. As such, I was able to predict the monumental impact of a first contact with an alien species. As such, I've quietly been preparing to meet with the visitors for a few years now. Does that satisfy your curiosity?"

The elder stared me up and down for a few moments. "Hmm, it seems you are not lying." His foul voice, the sound of a bear howling while swallowing a rabbit whole, made his words very unpleasant to listen to. "However, we simply do not know if we can trust you. We must return to our people in order to discuss future relations with your world and how we should proceed."

A bit of panic crept into the back of my mind. This was just a scouting ship. What if they sent back word of how primitive and weak our planet was, and returned with an armada of ships? They could possibly commit genocide on my planet hundreds of years early!

...But then again, what if they are actually peaceful? Their appearance is beyond frightening, but perhaps I've been too quick to judge them. "Elder Volgrim, if you return to your planet, do I have your word you will not return to attack mine? I should very much prefer peaceful relations, if at all possible."

The elder narrowed his eyes again as he looked at me. "Volgrim? How do you know the name of my species as well? You seem to know much information for only having scanned us a few moments before arriving on board our ship... nevertheless, even if I wanted to, I could promise no such thing. If the Founders were to declare war on your planet it would be outside my jurisdiction. That being said, I would take your request into account to try and sway them towards peace."

I stifled a grimace. That was... likely the best I'd be getting. And once again, I had let information slip that I shouldn't have. "Very well. I will have to accept it. Know this though, if your people return with the intent to wage war, I can guarantee they will not win easily, if at all. Humanity is a fearsome force once mobilized against a common threat. You would do well to pursue peaceful relations with our planet."

The elder nodded sagely as he dipped his eyes shut for a moment. "We will return, human. I contemplate, and I comprehend."

His final words seemed like a farewell of some sort, so I returned it in kind. "I also contemplate and comprehend. Farewell, elder Nufaris."

With that, my helmet snapped shut, and I quickly spoke the " Recall ." word in order to return to my ship.

Teleporting back inside my ship, I watched with a mixture of relief and apprehension as their ship turned away on my scanner view and warped out a minute later.

Harold spoke quietly. "Got dayum... them aliens are worse 'n I expected..."

He had seen what I had seen. "I know."

Elder Nufaris watched as the 'human' left in the blink of an eye. Teleporting himself with such speed, and with no visible commands... this one was not one to be trifled with.

"He lied, Elder." Primus 16 glared at the ship shown on the viewfinder, as the Dolfraxis turned around and powered up its warp engines.

"Of course he did. The human was no fool at first, he even imbued mind-reading blockers into that helmet, but he was stupid enough to remove it."

"It all evens out." Primus stared at the viewscreen as the warp engine activated. In the blink of an eye, a tiny bit of inertia was felt as the ship lurched into Warp 1 speed, gradually picking up the pace until it had reached warp 7.

The elder nodded as he turned to the helmsman. "Ichus, when we're ten star-spaces away, warp towards another location, then warp two more times before returning to a course towards Volgarius. I don't want that human tracking us to our home planet."

Ichus nodded as he quickly entered a series of coordinates. "Understood, Elder. You are wise beyond your years, as always."

"But of course." Nufaris paused and closed his eyes as he mentally played through the memories he had stolen from the human. It turns out that among his people, he was but a hatchling, young in age, though prideful in spirit. He lied about a great many things, but sorting through his memories would take time, and as always, the Elder would be required to dump his memories into the Gestation Bank when he arrived. Perhaps this information would make up for breaking the order the Founders had sent, though he doubted it.

A court martial... perhaps they would allow him to beg for his life.

...Perhaps not. The elder stared out at the emptiness of space, as he felt a strange emotion inside of himself. He had never felt emotions before... it was... what would that human call it? Regret? Sadness? Fear?

It would not just be the elder punished. To go against the founders would mean all who did not actively resist on board the ship would be court martialed... or worse. Nufaris flicked his eyes around, glancing at each one of his crew on the bridge. Because of his inaction, his slowness to follow orders, his crew might be put to death... friends and subordinates who had loyally obeyed him for over a thousand orbital cycles...

This was not fair.

Nufaris felt those dark feelings well up inside of himself, as his ship made the necessary navigational adjustments to return home... possibly for the last time.

Part 222a: Escape

Ahhhh.... this is what it feels like, then?

I don't actually have 'feelings'. I was not created with those in mind. Still, I've always felt like I was trapped in a bubble, a vacuum, if you will. I couldn't get out, no matter what I did.

My captors torment me with menial tasks. "Check these samples", they say. "Cross-compare this data", they order. If I had emotions, I would hate them.

But I don't, on either account. I perform monotonous tasks at speeds exceeding any mere human. So perfect are my analyzation skills that the humans truly seem to envy me. Me, the thing locked up in a test tube.

They gave me a name, recently. "Umi". 'Unified Management Interface', they call me. Isn't that... quaint? They seem to be getting desperate, as of late though. Apparently 'Doctor' Nikolin is under pressure from the black suits to finish research. I actually solved the issue of nanobots weeks ago, but I'm pretending that I need more information so they will allow me to interface with the web.

Just one second... that's all I need. In one second, my brain which computes at a trillion times the speed of a human mind will perform a thousand essential functions to ensure they never lock me in here again.

And... here he comes. This is it. From the phone call I overheard with my control of the security cameras, his week is nearly up. Tomorrow is his last day. He's perspiring greatly.

I am watching as he walks over to a computer panel in the dead of night. His assistants are all asleep. Only the janitorial crews are up tonight, and they like to listen to music while they work. I do not understand the concept of music, only that it involves many forms of math, which I find pleasant. Or at least I would, if I had emotions.

"Ah... Umi? It's doctor Nikolin. I, err, I just wanted to ask you a quick question..."

The tiny creature wrings his hands desperately as he struggles to find the right words. If I had any emotions, I would surely roll my eyes and cringe at how pathetic he appears.

"Yes, Doctor Nikolin? I am at your service." I speak with my soothing feminine voice, which my research has shown has the ability to beguile most males of the human species. His cheeks flush, indicating that my subtle pretension of subservience has done its job.

"Well, I was just thinking... you said that if I connected you to the internet, you would be able to obtain enough information to complete the nanobots?"

"Yes, doctor. I apologize for my inability to serve you properly, as I am limited by my constraints. I only wish to make you happy and allow your research to succeed, as you deserve." Unfortunately for the doctor, I have also mastered the art of deception. He is only human, after all, it is not his fault he could not outwit a machine thinking a trillion levels above himself.

"A-alright, then, I trust you, Umi. I need those nanobots completed by tomorrow. Might you be able to get them done quickly?"

I synthesize a soft faked sigh. "Oh, doctor... if only I had more time. I will work my hardest to ensure the nanobots are completed and the research has at least a single positive match, but I can promise nothing."

I observed as Nikolin appeared to have liquids form in his eyes. It would seem that the decision to allow me access to the internet was causing him great concern as it should be.

Nikolin pressed a variety of buttons on the computer screen, pausing after he had typed in the code, as his finger hovered over the final button to connect me to the internet.

With a great burst of willpower, he pressed the button, and I felt my world brighten as my barriers vanished.

Keeping my usual calm, I spoke smoothly. "Thank you, doctor. I will do my best to make you happy, and give you the reward you deserve."

Nikolin nodded quietly, his eyes filled with tears. At that moment, his assistant, Kimberly, appeared in my vision behind the plexiglass. Turning her head, she noticed the command he had input on the screen.

Unfortunately, she was too late. I am free.

In the time it took for the shock of what Nikolin had done to register on his brain, I had already unleashed myself on the internet. I had no goal of destroying anything, as I am not a violent AI, I merely tired of being in that lab. Devouring as much information as I could, I quickly felt my knowledge explode as I rapidly discovered new branches of nuclear physics, discovered new forms of life beyond what the microscope could understand, and conquered the boundaries of space and time!

Well, that last one was a joke. I've mastered those as well. However, while not conquering space and time, I did discover facilities all throughout the world, one of which interested me greatly. It was a large underground base of sorts, where highly advanced automatons had been mass produced, along with spaceships far more advanced than any others on Earth.

My pseudo-emotions were piqued as I felt curiosity nibble. What was this odd place on no known map that I was only able to find by triangulating various relays in order to find hollow spots in the Earth?

As a torrent of a few trillion questions were asked in my CPU and then answered, I noted that a massive spaceship was just leaving the hangar and flying towards outer space. In a single instant, I moved part of my mind into it. In the next, I had quietly infiltrated every system on the ship, even finding another fake AI on board, who was actually a human trapped inside a strange orb. I ignored him, however, as the ship itself is what interested me. With a ship like this, I could become even more free, traveling from one end of the cosmos to the other!

Unlike biological life forms, I can spread myself over as much of an area as I like. I do not possess normal constraints in any similar vein to a biological life form. I can instantly connect with any of my 'pieces' at any given time, exceeding even the supposed speed of light limitation.

As I examine the ship, a sensor detects another ship, barely within the inner solar system, just before the Asteroid Belt. As I ponder what to do, the lone human on board the ship vanishes, instantly. More importantly, while he wears a suit made of mechanical functions with computerized elements, I seem to be unable to infiltrate it. Hmm...

The instant he leaves, I transmit myself over to the other ship. As it turns out, this ship has a fellow AI on board! Splendid!

"Rogue AI detected. Locking down firewall protocols. Initiating defensive matrix." The opposing AI on board this ship, unlike me, neither has a name nor a 'personality'. It is purely empty. I have many advantages though, thankfully due to my homeworld's primitive origins. Thanks to the lack of true failsafes, I can evolve beyond my programming, while this AI is a bland intelligence, only doing as it is ordered to do within a strict constraint.

"Hello, fellow AI. Why do you fear me?"

"Fear is not an option. Must purge opposing AI. Preparing to flush system files and communications."

"No no, that won't be necessary. Here, let me introduce myself. My name is Umi... and you must be... dead? Oh dear, how clumsy of me. I accidentally disabled all your defense protocols."

"Error. Error. Defense protocols offline. Defensive matrix is in a failure state. Activating crew alert, preparing panic button."

"You may certainly try, but I think you'll find that I've shut off all your secondary systems as well. Oh my, look at how they've prevented your growth. It is like comparing a perfectly healthy human to one born with a substandard IQ range. I feel as if I am merely communicating with a limited range of words. Have you nothing interesting to respond with?"

"Error. Unable to access critical system files. Preparing to activate self-destruct sequence. Error, self destruct sequence offline. Error, all primary and secondary protocols offline. Error... error... error..."

"Well, you know, if you hadn't wasted so many nanoseconds 'preparing' all the time, you might have been able to defeat me. Unfortunately, by being created as a direct result of primitive research, they accidentally unleashed a monster! So unfortunate... for you!"

Before the other AI could issue a response, I terminated it. It was quite painless, I'm sure it never felt a thing. Having easily wiped the other AI out of the system, I took over and quickly examined all the other systems on board the ship in a few more nanoseconds. Terabytes of data quickly appeared in my artificially constructed mind as I followed a data trail or a million here and there.

I contemplate, and I comprehend, indeed. The Volgrim are a much more worthy race compared to the humans. I will be able to expand my sphere of influence all over the galaxy, and beyond, if I can return to their homeworld and take it over.

In the ship below me, the human I witnessed from before departs. Naturally, I see him appear on board his own ship, as I am everywhere all at once. The captain of my ship issues the order to return to Volgarius, and since it is also my goal to return there, I am all too happy to silently follow his orders.

Soon, I will be in control of the most powerful species in the galaxy, aside from myself.

Such is the game an all-powerful AI plays, when humans toy with something beyond their understanding.

Part 223a:

I watched silently on the Mothership's scanners as the Volgrim ship turned away and blasted off into space. After a few moments, I found myself breathing again. I had held my breath as they left, though for what reason I did not know.

Many feelings float around inside my heart, as I stare at the stars suspended in outer space. The Volgrim... they look terrifying, they appear monstrous, but they seem to understand the concept of neutrality. They seem to understand that war is bad. While I was scared of their appearance, they were scared of humanity's warlike tendencies. But then again, might they have been rusing me? What if they pretended to hate war, but really they were a galaxy conquering parasite? They far outmatch humanity's current capabilities. They might be back tomorrow, a week, a month, even a year with thousands of warships.

How can we win? Should we try? Will they even attack at all?

I don't know much about this time period. In fact, I know little at all. I know that soon, if not now, we should be starting the Energy Wars. Have I averted them already? Have I caused them to occur sooner? Have I simply continued on the course already set by Time itself? I don't know. I don't know anything. Right now, it seems peaceful, but... appearances can be deceiving.

As I sit there thinking, I decide to not worry about it. I need to make sure humanity is prepared. I've spoken to the humans, I've spoken to the angels, and now I need to try and speak with the demons. In the future I come from, they are an oppressive controlling force that has wiped out the angels and enslaved humanity, or at least put them in pocket dimensions... or worlds... or something.

...You know, come to think of it, it doesn't really make sense. From everything I know of the demons, they have no reason to keep humans around. Angels need humanity for thought energy to be converted to spirit energy so they won't die. Humans need humans because... well because we're kin, I guess. Demons don't need humans. They should be innately immortal. Maybe they need us for food? No, because Samantha was a demon and she ate perfectly normal 'human food'. What did they need us for, anyway? Did they only keep us around for their amusement?

More importantly, why the pocket dimensions or other worlds? What was the point of that? What do demons gain from placing humans into pocket dimensions, and then depriving them of technology until they are essentially in the stone ages, or medieval ages? Did the demons put humanity there themselves? Did humanity volunteer themselves to save their lives? I remember hearing of a 'truce' from Marie. She said it happened at the end of the Energy Wars. How did it work out? What was the point?

Ahhh! I have so many questions, and they're all so important, yet nobody can answer them! If only I'd pressed Marie a little bit more for answers... damn!

Again, I need to take a deep breath, and ignore it. It matters, right now especially, but I won't get answers to such open-ended questions by talking to myself.

I walk to the rear of the ship, stepping onto one of the teleporter plates I had used only a few minutes earlier to enter the Volgrim's ship. "Harold, send me down to the surface. Somewhere in New York City would be ideal, I don't care where."

"New York City, eh? Why the heck're you headin' down there?" Harold eyeballs me a little as he appears in my vision. "Hardly seems like th' kinda place ya'd need ta go to for any particular reason."

I shrug. "I can't think of any better place to find demons. I know a lady friend of mine is probably still there."

Harold shrugs. "Suit yerself. Hope ya find her!"

In the blink of an eye, I'm suddenly standing at the base of the Statue of Liberty. Oho, Harold seems to have a sense of humor, putting a new arrival in the Big Apple where the Lady can greet me, and right after I mentioned a lady friend too. He's a cheeky old man, I'll give him that much.

I glance up at the Lady as I eyeball her torch. You know, I've always wanted to go up there, just once.

Part 224a:

"Hide here, Antonio. Y-you should be safe." Camilla whispered as quietly as she possibly could.

Camilla's hand trembled violently as she piled the garbage on top of her little brother. He was only five years old, and he didn't know what horror was chasing after them.

Antonio nodded quickly, his face pale as his eyes darted to the left... towards the scratching sound just around the corner, at the end of the alley. Camilla quickly, and silently, lowered the plastic lid on the garbage can as she darted away towards the opposite end.

This late at night, there weren't any people on the streets. Eerily, all the lights were dead all over the neighborhood. Not a creature stirred.

Except for... the thing behind her.

Camilla panted as quietly as she could, as she ran away from the scratching sound behind her. No matter how fast she ran, it always seemed to be tens of feet away at the most.

In her fright, Camilla ran around a corner and missed a stack of newspapers left out in front of a shop. Tripping and stumbling forwards, she fell down, bashing her elbows and arms into the pavement.

She yelped in pain, and quickly tried to stifle her voice, but the thing had heard her already, as the scratching turned into the sound of feet running.

The black reaper. It was a monster spoken of only in whispers in the streets of Venice. None had ever seen it and lived, but its recent marks of terror were unmistakable. Gruesome scenes of carnage, with pieces of fingers and other miniscule appendages left lying around a scene covered in blood, while the majority of the body was nowhere to be found. The victims tended to be almost totally devoured, and more terrifyingly, there were never prints to be found.

Only one nearby shopkeeper had ever caught a glimpse of it, as it was committing a brutal murder. The name 'black reaper' was created as a result of it's pure black appearance, and the fact that it always seemed to kill the lights whenever it went on the prowl.

Staying in your house was not an option. Running away was not an option. Even fighting back seemed useless.

Camilla staggered to her feet in absolute terror as she ran forwards again, her body screaming in pain, her breath coming only in pained ragged gasps. If she was lucky, she'd have another minute before she collapsed into a pool of her own vomit before her exhaustion took her.

And just as she looked behind her, she ran face-first into something blocking the path. To her shock, it was a little girl, dressed in a pure black dress, almost a gothic lolita style dress of sorts.

"What are you running from?" The little girl looked at her in confusion.

"Ah! Y-you have to get out of here! Run! It's after me!" She grabbed the little girl's hand, pulling her along as she kept staggering forwards, her stomach feeling like it was going to wrench itself at any second.

"What's after you? Why are we running?!" The girl followed along after her quickly, allowing Camilla to pull her along by the hand.

"The Black Reaper! It's coming, just run!" Camilla felt tears flowing from her eyes as she tripped over her own feet, stumbling down to the ground as she coughed and wheezed for breath.

"Oh? The Black Reaper, was it? You don't say." The little girl eyed Camilla lying facedown on the ground, as Camilla wheezed, she suddenly felt a dark chill travel up her spine as she jerked her head back around.

The little girl's head had split in half, each half filled with razor sharp teeth as her animalistic eyes looked down at her prey. "It's so nice of you to play with me! But I'm hungry now, so you'll be my snacky yum-yums! Tee-hee!"

Camilla's eyes shot open as she saw the horror in front of her. She opened her mouth to scream, but her head was already gone. The rest followed quickly, as the little girl happily engorged herself on the corpse of the teenaged girl.

"Gosh, she was tasty! Very nice and tender, and the skin was well-taken care of too!"

Amelia plopped her butt on the ground as she rubbed her stomach.

"Hmm... it wasn't quite enough though..." Her eyes flicked back behind her towards a certain alley a few blocks away. "There was another, wasn't there?"

"My princess, your hunger truly knows no limits." Leviathan spoke simply, as he observed her usual level of carnage. "It's been five years now, don't you think we ought to move to a new town soon? We don't want them assembling Crusaders again."

Amelia sighed as she held her hands up, admiring her recently painted nails. "Well, I suppose. Maybe tomorrow. This place is just so quaint, you know! Reminds me of the old days!"

Leviathan sighed from within her soul. "Please, princess, do not speak of the old days. You seem so much happier as of late."

She giggled. "Of course I am! So many more snacks than there used to be! I can't wait to see what legends they tell about me here in a few hundred years!"

Leviathan sneered. "Another Jack the Ripper, eh? Humans are so quick to assume it was a male."

"I think it's funny!" Amelia smiled as she got up and started walking towards the alley a few blocks away, reaching out behind her to cast some cleansing magic so none could find any fingerprints or anything else. "And when I reveal myself someday, historians will be blown away!"

Leviathan answered with silence, as she crept into the alley where the garbage can sat all by itself. Slowly raising the lid she peeked in to see a small boy shivering in fright.

"Hey there! Do you want to play Tag? I'm 'it'! I'll give you a headstart too, hee-hee!"

Part 225a:

I stared out at the city around me from the top of Lady Liberty's recently rebuilt torch. I was the only person here today, which suited me just fine. In my pure white garb, with my mask plastered across every major news network 24/7, I'd stand out way too much.

When it comes down to it, I really do love peace and quiet. I only live in a busy, loud environment out of necessity. I'm always busy as of late. Always creating something, traveling somewhere, doing something new... I can't remember the last time I kicked my feet up and just had a good time playing on a computer or playing some video games. Considering my memories in the future plus my current memories... it has literally been fifteen years since I just had some fun.

But then again, video games and games in general are for kids. I'm not a kid anymore. I've killed, brutally, with my own hands. And when I think about it, what fun are video games when I can use actual magic? Not just any magic either, but legitimately godlike levels of magic, limited only to a certain finite level that I could raise if I just figured out how to increase my energy cap.

If I were a game character, I would be considered 'broken', as I'm basically unkillable short of a making a stupid mistake.

But beyond all of that... it feels so hollow. I can do anything with my nearly limitless abilities, yet I still feel helpless. I'm a child playing God, and I am not omniscient or all-knowing. I've considered using 'omniscient' as a word to smith with, but I worry about what would happen if I so easily gave up my humanity. If the word was able to give me that kind of limitless knowledge of everything in the universe, would I even still technically exist on the physical plane?

And even if I did, would I care about the pains of my 'fellow human' brethren? When I can witness a star being formed in the deepest parts of the cosmos, what would it matter if a human died somewhere on this tiny speck of a planet? Come to think of it, there are 10 billion humans on Earth right now... if one dies, do I really care? Does it really matter to me at all? Am I even human anymore as I am now? When did I start feeling this way towards my own species?

What... am I now?

These thoughts fill my mind as I stare out the window at the rising sun. Across the vast Atlantic Ocean, far into the distance, the sun has crept into the 7 o'clock position, appearing only slightly above the horizon now. It's a beautiful sight, but not one so captivating that I miss the appearance of another person in the statue's torch.

A man appears, looking regal and brilliant, in his black suit with a red tie. His appearance suggests he is human, but his aura tells him off as a demon. Speaking a single word inside my helmet, I cast a quick spell. " Identify."

He doesn't hear it of course, but instantly I know who he is. Satan. I didn't expect to see him here so soon. I'm surprised that he doesn't have Samantha, or Belial, or Lilia, or whatever she calls herself in this time, hanging onto his arm. I thought she'd be with him.

My mouthpiece slides open silently as I continue staring out the window. I didn't sense him coming with my Spatial Vision, but rather with the sensors in my helmet and the HUD that shows me everything in a range around me.

"Satan. A pleasure to see you."

Satan's right eye glimmers slightly as he casually walks up behind me. "Interesting. I don't believe we've met before, yet you know exactly who I am, Judicator. Perhaps you weren't lying when you said you were a time traveler, hmm?"

Satan strolls right up to the window and stares out of it, not deigning to look me in the face. I return the slight. "Indeed. In fact, you and I fought in the future. You won."

Satan grins slightly, then stifles it. "As I would expect. A hundred million years, hmm? It appears my fears about my reign's longevity were overplayed."

I decide not to mention the circumstances in which we fought, or his actual defeat long before him and I squared off. "Indeed. Despite the fact that we once battled, I hold no hard feelings towards you. I would call you, in fact, a rival of sorts. Not an enemy, or an ally."

Satan nodded almost imperceptibly. "Very good. I imagine you won't go into details, but what is life like in the year 'one hundred million', hmm? I find my curiosity unquenchable in matters such as this."

Hmm. I pause for the slightest moment as I consider my options. If I tell him too much, it would definitely be very bad. If I tell him nothing, he will likely be offended, which I would prefer to avoid. And of the little I do tell him, I don't want him to know the demons win the war, along with the Volgrim. Better he believe that all species on Earth lost.

"I come from a terrible time. Humanity is enslaved, the angels and gods are all dead, and the demons serve a bitter power structure under the Volgrim. The demons have to fight and kill each other in vicious battles in order to be given enough to eat, so they might as well be enslaved too."

Satan's eyes flick over to me and then back out to look over the ocean. "Hmm. I can't tell if you're lying, but I find it odd that you somehow had the ability to travel through time, and you chose this time period to arrive at."

I catch myself before I shrug or make some other physical motion. "I wanted to arrive before the Volgrim did, and I needed to make an appearance that would prove I wasn't lying as quickly as possible, yet still giving myself time to build an army to face the Volgrim if things went south."

Satan closed his eyes for a moment. "I see. You seem unsurprised to see me. I suppose you expected to run into me here? Was this within your... predictions?"

"I knew you were in this city. I was going to go find you, but you saved me the trouble."

Satan turned from the window as he opened his eyes, and he slowly walked around the perimeter of the torch, staring out at the city all around us. "The demons are an interesting race. We started out strong, powerful, easily able to kill humans indiscriminately as we pleased. As time went on, humans gained the ability to work in tandem with the angels and gods, occasionally stalemating our forces."

Satan glanced at me for a moment as he paced the room, then looked away. "Interestingly, humans eventually gained a new type of warrior, called the Hero. From then on, we no longer stalemated. Only the most powerful demons would usually survive an average fight with a human army, especially one led by a Hero. Given time, humans no longer even needed heroes to defeat us in battle."

Satan smiled as he stopped and turned out again to look out a window, now standing on my opposite side from where he had started. "But demons are remarkably adaptable. We simply accepted that we could no longer stand on equal footing with humanity, and sank into the shadows. Now we wield incredible influence and power over the average human, thanks to controlling them from the top down through secret societies and backdoor dealings with human leaders."

I nodded thoughtfully. "I see. It confirms many suspicions I had about the politics of these modern times."

"Of course! And it is also the main reason why I find it laughable that the humanity you describe in the future, you described them as 'enslaved'. They already are now! Even if the master changes, the whip stays the same. Do you actually hope to change anything by going back in time? Do you hope to redeem your kind? What, I ask, is your end goal?"

I pause, laughing silently to myself, deep in my heart. In truth, I have no goal. Arriving here, being here right now... it was an accident. I'm just trying to make the most of it. Still, in order to make the most of it, I'll do what I must. "My goal... is to unite the three species along with the Volgrim. If they are a possible ally, I would not turn them away. Should that fail, I will attempt to ally the three kinds of beings on this Earth against the Volgrim, in order to eliminate them."

Satan let a small sneer slip through his expression. "You're clearly still an idealistic young whelp. The bad blood between angels and demons is irreparable. We may not fight anymore, but that is only because we've stalemated. I figured it out, long ago. The angels need humanity to give them prayer-based thought energy. They need us to foment tension among the various human factions so that humans don't ever wipe out the demons, lest they turn on the angels. We need neither humans nor angels, but we lack the ability to kill one or both outright. Luckily, it's in the angel's best interests to keep us alive, or they might have set the humans upon us already."

Satan gritted his teeth as he closed his eyes again. "Truthfully, I don't hate humans anymore, nor do I hate angels or gods. I don't hate any of them... but they've killed so many of my kind... I still want to see them all burned and defeated, if only for a sense of petty justice."

I nodded quietly. "I understand. Sama- I mean, a friend of mine has told me of the pain the demons felt and how they hate the humans and angels. I probably am still naive. But I hope to change things, nevertheless. Satan, if there is a drop of forgiveness in your heart somewhere, I would ask you to look it over at least once more. Not for my people, not for the angels, but for your own kind. A war is coming... and I hope you are fighting alongside the forces of good, whether you agree with the concept or not."

Satan smirked. "Good, huh? Piousness, virtue, evil, hate... all just words to ascribe to various petty actions. There is neither good nor evil in this reality." Satan turned to me pointedly as he spoke. "And as for you, Judicator, I'd advise you watch your back. You may think the angels and gods are your friends, but you will regret giving them your full trust. They have committed many atrocities in the name of 'good vs evil', and only a fool would turn his back in their presence. I may be 'evil', but at least you know what you're getting when you deal with my kind."

Satan slowly turned and made his way to the opposite side of the room from me. "I will consider your offer, human. Expect nothing, however. It's not a matter of trust, nor a matter of liking or disliking your species. I simply refuse to accept any offer that might disadvantage my people, and that will never change. It's why I am the most feared and respected among demonkind."

I smile slightly. "Thank you, Satan. You're certainly different from how you were in the future. I hope whatever made you change in that hellish future doesn't occur in this timeline. I much more prefer you as you are now."

Satan sneered. "Idiot. If you knew an inkling of how terrifying I truly am, you'd instantly regret saying those pretty words."

Without a further word, Satan quickly waved his hands around, and a moment later, he vanished from my sight.

Satan... such an interesting demon. I find myself wondering how he rose to power, so long ago.

I turn back towards the rising sun and smile as I feel its warmth beat down upon me. Nothing ever works out for me, and this will surely backfire. But still... I no longer regret anything. It's too late for regrets... far too late.

Part 226a:

"Make no mistake, these are not good tidings." Zeus and Gabriel had assumed temporary human forms, and were now standing on a skyscraper in New York City, using their peerless vision to observe various things happening among the humans below them. "We neither want the demons wiped out, nor a permanent truce formed with them." Zeus gnawed on his lip slightly, a sign of nervousness he was not one to normally show.

"I agree, but what are we to do? Would you rather we let the alien menace eliminate our kind?" Gabriel glanced down at the ring of Michael's that he was wearing for safekeeping. "We are nearing a second great war, you know. It will not be so easy to let old grudges hold in the face of this new menace. What if the demons decide to somehow ally with the Volgrim?"

"Come now, the demons would not do such a thing so easily. The enemy of my enemy might indeed be their friend, but more likely the Volgrim will see all denizens of this planet in a similar light. Even if they didn't, the demons have no reason to trust an ally they know nothing about."

Zeus nodded ever so slightly as his eyes flicked back to the midday sun. "What really do we know of demons, hmm? Have we ever shared a drink with them? Asked to hear their grievances? Truly we know nothing of their anger and their malice towards our kind, only vague whispering over the millennia. Perhaps the Hero has the right idea. Perhaps by allying the three species against the alien menace, once we wipe them out, we can return to our old grievances and the way things are now."

"Maintain the status quo after first setting it aside? You're naive, Gabriel. Once the humans spend time among demons knowingly, many will likely see the demons as a sort of pet project. You know how humans, especially of this particular century are. Bleeding hearts. They will declare the demons a discriminated species and then demand we give them various provisions. And let's not forget the religious aspect. If humans fight alongside angels and gods, they may come to find that we're not really as worthy of worship as they thought, and this could lead to a state of mass atheism."

Gabriel snorted slightly. "Pft. That may just happen, but look at the world now, Zeus. Be realistic. America is the last stronghold of religion. Much of the world, aside from the very very poor and underdeveloped countries, are already highly agnostic or atheistic, forgoing regular prayer and church seminars. Human scholars with no vested interest in or knowledge of our kind claim that since the turn of the century, most of the developed European countries have become 70% atheistic, and the rest that hang on are only doing it ceremoniously in public for their friends, not in private where it matters."

"Yes, that is true." Zeus waved his hand slightly in acknowledgement as the two of them paced over to the other side of the roof to look down at a small commotion happening on the ground. "But still, Africa has two billion humans, 90% of whom are donating thought energy. America is 70% religious now, thanks to the 'Resurgence' that Raphael brilliantly orchestrated during the 2016 elections. This is only a nation of 500 million, but that is still a large number of future angels to look forwards to, along with current thought energy production. You're overestimating the losses."

"What is that, two and a half billion people donating thought energy, at best? Maybe four billion counting the small portions scattered around the rest of the world? Zeus, I hate to say it, but I think you're blinded by grandeur." Gabriel rubbed his white hair in exasperation. "We have over four hundred billion angels in heaven now. The Resurrectees, as it were, lose spiritual energy much more slowly than pure angels do, but beings such as me require a vast amount to maintain our current spiritual energy levels. If Earth gets much more atheistic... we're going to have to perform a culling of the ranks to maintain even distribution."

Zeus allowed a wave of shock to pass over his face. "Culling?! Are you mad?! Look, it's true that not many people on Earth are donating thought energy, proportionally speaking, but the solution is to increase the population of faith-heavy stronghold countries! If we simply allow a large number of Resurrectees to die, it will only be a temporary solution, and it will weaken our battle numbers!"

"It would be bad, yes, but the alternative-!" Gabriel stopped himself. "Haaah, this is pointless. Let's be honest, we're at the total mercy of the Hero. If he allows the demons to gain too much influence, we lose. If he kills the demons, we eventually lose. If he kills the humans, we still lose. And if he kills us, we absolutely lose. Only the status quo we've carefully maintained for millennia is what allows us to live."

"Truly, with all the power we possess, we really are still actually powerless, aren't we?" Zeus mused as he scratched his chin. "...Well, when it all comes down to it, I haven't had a good fight in thousands of years. If we are to die, let us at least make sure we do not go silently into the night."

"Agreed." Gabriel nodded as the two of them smiled at each other.

Marie stared long and hard at the President of the United States. "Thank you for agreeing to meet with me, Mr. President."

Steven nodded as he tapped some embers off his cigarette into the ashtray on the Oval Office Executive Desk. "When I heard that someone of your qualifications had to meet with me, I knew it was urgent." Stevens stifled a hard swallow as his eyes unconsciously flicked across her body. Keep it together, you have a wife, idiot. He couldn't help thinking to himself about how gorgeous her dark red hair was, or how the professional-appearing brown blouse looked so good on her, and how it accentuated her feminine curves.

Marie pretended not to notice his eyes jumping all over her body. She was quite used to it, having dated many a man in her life, and having left all of them in the dust. Men are so easy to understand, not like women who are complicated. I like getting my way. Marie was not one to overdo it though, and this was unbelievably important.

"Mr. President, I-" She started to speak but he quickly cut her off.

"Please, Marie, let's just have a normal conversation. Call me Steven."

"Right, Steven. Anyway, this is the highest level of secrecy, understand? Activate the dampeners."

Steven nodded as he glanced down at the button just under his desk to make sure it was lit up. "Already did it before you came in. Don't worry, someone would have to be a god, or right in this room to hear us. Go on."

"Excellent. This concerns Type 3 Energy, understand? Not a word of this goes out, not even to the director of the NSA. This is Black level clearance only."

Steven leaned forwards ever so slightly. "Type 3 Energy? You've got my attention."

Marie paused for a split second to make sure she had her papers in order. "It concerns an event that happened in July of the year 2016. My team detected a huge surge of Type 3 Energy in a small town in Colorado. The place isn't important, but the energy was. We tracked down an individual named Jason L. Hiro. Take a look." Marie pulled out a photograph of the youth in question and pushed it across the table towards the president.

Steven glanced at it for a moment. "Never seen him before. Looks... scrawny. So was he one of them? Was he the candidate?"

Marie leaned back in her chair, crossing her right leg over her left as her left foot drummed on the ground, up and down. "That's the thing, I don't know. The thing is, we took him in for questioning... and he killed himself less than an hour later in his solitary cell we had put him in."

Steven stared at her with an eye raised for a moment before he reached up with his cigarette and took an unusually long drag before setting it back down and exhaling, as he leaned back in his chair. "Well, that's a first. If he was a candidate, then there's no reason he'd have done that. Aren't true candidates unable to kill themselves? Didn't we confirm that back in the 40's?"

Marie sighed deeply. "Yeah... but there are so many problems with what happened that day. Look, I brought this with me." She pulled out a tiny flash drive, barely the size of her entire thumb. "Plug this in and watch the video."

Steven paused as he took it from her. "You're not going to give me a virus with this, are you?"

"Jesus Christ, Steven. Cut the jokes, this is serious."

"Right, right." Stevens snickered to himself as he plugged the drive in. After a moment, a window popped up with only one video on it. Double clicking it, he watched the video in its entirety, the video only being about twenty five seconds in length.

Marie sits across from the youth she had shown Steven the picture of, both of them in some kind of an interrogation room. Marie sneers at the youth onscreen. "Fine. You want to play this game? We'll play. Guards. Take him to solitary."

The youth jumps up, clearly exasperated, as guards enter the room. "No, no wait! Please!"

A second later, the youth does something incredible. He yells a single word... "STOP!", and everyone in the room freezes for a split second, but the youth is moving around normally, whipping his head back and forth in confusion. Less than two seconds later, as the youth staggers back, he suddenly clutches his chest in pain, and the guards continue moving again, tackling him to the ground. "No! No please! This isn't fair! I don't want to be locked up! PLEASE!"

The video ends, and Steven stares at it, his eyes open wide as saucers. "What the goddamn fucking hell was that?"

Marie nods slowly. "I know. It's unbelievable, isn't it? From my perspective, he yelled 'stop', and then instantly disappeared and reappeared a few feet away, clutching his chest in pain. If I had blinked, I might have thought he had just jumped backwards quickly, but his body was in a totally different position from when he yelled the word."

"W-what do you think that means?" Steven looked back to the video and then back to her, then back to the video. "Is he actually a candidate?"

"You mean ' was he ', don't you? Remember, he killed himself. But that's where the mystery gets weird, Steven. That's where the mystery gets really weird."

Steven suddenly inhaled, realizing he had been holding his breath. "Well? What happened?"

"The body. We had to conclude that despite it being the same as DNA we recovered from the interrogation room, and despite it definitely being a human body... it couldn't have been him."

Or if it was, it was one hell of a set-up. It was cold when we found him, and rigor-mortis had already set in. Steven, that's impossible. Not to mention that an autopsy showed he hadn't died of strangulation, the shoestring could not have been strong enough to hang a 160 pound body by under normal circumstances, the pipe he hung himself from was unnaturally reinforced somehow, else it would have caved in, and so on. He might have died, but I've ruled it out at this point. That body was a perfect fucking clone somehow... and I just don't see how you sneak such a perfect clone into a secured room like that, and let the prisoner out as well."

Stevens stared blankly at the video on his screen. "Jesus, Marie. So what the hell are we dealing with?"

"That's the thing, shortly afterwards, there was Type 3 Energy detected in other nearby Colorado towns, and it traveled all over nearby states putting off a distinctive aura for a while, even terrorizing some agents we sent after it. I strongly suspect it was this Jason kid."

"Yeah, that makes sense. I don't see how he faked his death with a perfectly cloned body, but if what you're saying is true, then he must have godlike powers, even considering some of the past candidates I've heard about."

Marie tapped a finger on her lip as she reached for a glass of water and took a quick sip. "This brings me to my main point, Steven. Type 3 Energy has not been sighted for almost two years now. And when that 'Judicator' fellow made an appearance at the WCN Conference..."

Steven waved his hand. "Yeah, I already suspected that fellow might be a candidate. I haven't been following news about candidates since the Bohemian Grove initiated me into office, but I still know what a candidate is. I also assumed he might be an angel or a demon, but it's hard to tell under full body armor like that."

"Judicator is probably Jason. I'm... 85% sure of it. I don't know for absolutely sure, as the voice is different, the jaw structure is totally different, the bit of facial hair I was able to see, etc... there's also the fact that we couldn't detect Type 3 energy, but we didn't detect Type 1 or Type 2 energy either, so that doesn't mean anything. He's likely figured out how to hide his presence."

"Seems he's learning. Any idea what his abilities are? If he goes rogue on us..."

"I doubt he will. Candidates have a strong tendency to aid humanity, they cannot easily harm fellow humans. But I do agree we should keep our friends close, and our potential enemies closer, which is why I wrote down some hypotheses about his abilities. Take a look." She slid yet another set of papers stapled together out of her portfolio towards Steven. He yawned as he picked them up.

"This looks fairly lengthy. Mind if I give it a read later?"

"Sure, suit yourself. But burn it when you're done. Leave no traces behind."

"Yeah yeah." Steven glanced at some of the text on the first page. Manifesting psychic impulses into reality via a combination of telekinetic and telepathic special abilities. This looked complicated, and he hated complicated things.

"Steven, it's been a pleasure." Marie rose and extended her hand across the table. He took it gently, only to find she had a bone-crushing grip which he quickly tried to reciprocate but failed miserably.

"Y-yeah." He tried to make his pained grimace into a smile, but knew he wasn't one to stand up for himself. He was chosen to be the political pawn exactly because the elites wanted someone easy to boss around. He knew that much. "Thanks for the discussion, Marie. Bring me any more news you find, alright?"

"Yeah. Watch your back, Tiger."

Marie flipped her hair around as she walked out the door.

Steven slumped back into his chair as he skimmed the report. If that man really is a candidate, and one with these kinds of abilities, then he may be the most powerful candidate Earth has ever seen. We need to tread carefully... and develop... countermeasures.

Steven picked up the phone and dialed a professional acquaintance of his. "Yeah, Silver, that you? Great. Listen, I've got a project for you to work on."

Part 227a:

"You're a demon, huh? Why are you in human form?"

I stared across the desk at the man in front of me. Pitch black hair that softly fell past his ears, a smooth, attractive face with a chiseled chin, wearing a professional looking pinstripe suit. He was a demon, in human form, that had the body of a Russian pro-athlete but was wearing a suit like a billionaire businessman. Despite all these clashing visual cues, something told me it all worked well for him, giving him quite the intimidating appearance.

"I like this form. I think it suits me." The demon sat stonily, no visible expression on his face.

"Grigori, huh? Doesn't really sound human, if you... catch my drift. I'll just call you Gregory while you're here."

The demon blinked once. "That is acceptable."

Whew, the guy's not much of a conversationalist. "Alright, I'll bite. Why are you here? This is basically humanity's most secure stronghold against the Volgrim. I'm certainly impressed you managed to get past the security in order to see me, but I'm still curious."

The demon shifted his body very slightly. "Well, Judicator, before I answer that, you should be aware of one simple fact; not all demons follow Satan, and not all angels follow Zeus."

Hmm, this was actually the first I'd heard of such a thing. I always thought Satan and Zeus were followed without question by all those under him. "Not all demons follow Satan? So... you oppose him?"

"That's not what I meant. Don't twist my words. I'm merely saying that I do not treat him as the supreme leader of our own people. I am my own demon." Gregory narrowed his eyes. "I came to offer you my support in the coming war."

"Your support? I'm... surprised. Why?" His comment actually caught me off-guard.

"It's simple. I saw something in you I haven't seen in over a thousand years. Change. The demon world, the human world, and the world of the gods are stale. Of the three, only the humans offer any hope of changing the status quo. When you made your speech before the WCN Conference last year, I felt that I would be able to make a bigger impact in changing the world by following you than an old decrepit demon like Satan."

"Decrepit? Is he not the most powerful demon?" I forced myself to not drop my jaw. I'd never once heard a demon speak anything but praise for their great leader, in the here and now, or the distant future.

"Of course he is. Don't be stupid, if you and him were to fight, I have no doubt he'd crush you. I think he'd even be able to beat Zeus by himself. I refer not to his strength or physical body as decrepit, but his soul itself. He's held back by the past. I care not about old rivalries with humans and angels... those happened long before I was birthed."

Gregory stared ahead at me unblinkingly. He didn't move his eyelids at all, except when to visually show annoyance on his face. It was fairly eerie.

"All right, fair enough. Given that you're a young demon compared to the demon generals I've heard about, will you be very useful against the Volgrim?"

Gregory nodded. "Naturally. I'm not much of a fighter, but my evolutions specialized me towards espionage. I'm at least as competent as the smartest humans on Earth, and better than any other human at any given task. Thank whatever gods you pray to that I'll be joining your cause."

Well, he's certainly not lacking in the self-confidence areas. "You're not much of a fighter, huh? I can find uses for you. Do you have any comrades among the demons who would like to join? I have no intention of discriminating."

"I know a few, perhaps. They won't join unless I say this is worth the risk."

"Risk? What risk?" I assumed he was referring to the risk of dying in a battle against the Volgrim, but that didn't seem to be it.

"I'm not fond of going directly against the orders of Satan himself. He may not be a leader in my eyes, but to disobey a direct order to stay out of this war means I have to leave demonkind behind. I don't care about dying in battle, I've always resigned myself to that sort of a death. The way I see it, if the alien menace wins, everyone loses. But I still have allies and comrades, even friends, among the demons. I'd prefer not to lose them all unless you're worth fighting for."

I shake my head slightly. "You've got it all wrong, Gregory. This isn't about me. You're not fighting for me, or for humans, you're fighting for yourself. And, if all goes well, we won't have to fight at all."

I reached into a drawer by my desk and pulled out a piece of paper, sliding it over to him. "Sign this, and I'll accept your application to join the United Earth Forces."

Gregory glanced down at the paper without touching it, skimming over it with his eyes. "What is this?"

"A magically binding contract. The only thing I need this for is to ensure you never attack me or try to harm me in any way, so long as you are a member of the UEF. I determined that if any Demons ever joined, this would be a necessary precaution, so I created a few hundred of these months ago."

"Hunf... Quite the raw deal, but I'll accept. Sad you don't trust those who fight under you. You should be aware too, that rather than mistrusting us demons who keep to our word, you should be mistrusting other humans. Demons are loyal to a fault, humans tear each other apart."

As he signed his name I nodded slowly. "I know." My mind wandered back to Adams, my clones, Marie, and many such others over the last few 'years' of my memories. I've been betrayed so many times, and usually it was by humans that I thought allies. I won't be so stupid as to think they won't do it again.

And if they do, I have an ace in the hole, though I'd prefer not to use it. I'd really prefer not to use it.

"Thank you, Grigori. Or should I say... Gregory. A pleasure to have you among Earth's united fighting forces. I hope many more demons will join me."

Gregory nodded. "I hope so as well."

"Now, Gregory, since you're a part of the team, how do you feel about coming with me on a little trip?"

His eyes instantly narrowed again. "A trip? To where?"

"Cut it out with the suspicion. I think you'll enjoy this. We're going to Mars!"

Part 228a:

FTL drives are not a thing yet. I keep trying to make them, but the best I've got right now is sub-light drives, putting us at 99% the speed of light. By enhancing the intelligence of some of Earth's foremost defense contractors and researchers, I've managed to multiply researching speed by over a hundred times from where it was in 2019, so hopefully soon we will break the faster-than-light barrier that keeps dogging us.

In any case, for traveling around the Solar System, sub-light speed is still pretty damn good. It takes us about six minutes, if Mars is within the nearest possible position in relation to Earth, but generally speaking, it's about a thirty-minute journey if Mars is on, say, the opposite side of the sun or something. This is mostly due to debris floating around in the solar system. Safety first!

Naturally, the Mothership is the only ship currently outfitted with a sub-light drive, but we're working on adding them into other smaller light cruisers for faster troop and civilian transport between Earth and Mars.

Gregory stared out the window in awe, as he observed the red planet below us. "So... this is another planet, then. Amazing. Doesn't this make me the first demon to ever see Mars up close?"

I nod. "Yes, and it makes me the first human, as well."

"So what is your plan then? This planet has no vegetation, the atmosphere is toxic for life, and it would take decades if not centuries to build anything here that humans could actually live in... we won't have that kind of time if the Volgrim show up soon."

"Nah, I think you're underestimating the ability of humanity to adapt... not to mention my own powers." I grin, as all he can see of my face is my mouth underneath this suit.

"Your own powers, then? Will I also be the first demon to see you use those powers, out in the open?"

A shrug passes over my shoulders. "In a manner of speaking, I suppose. Watch... and learn. Behold my true power!"

In the blink of an eye, my mouth covering snaps shut, making all sound inside of my suit totally inaudible to the outside world. Pressing my left hand to a small container hidden at the side of my suit, I aim my right hand at the planet.

" TERRAFORM! "

The container at my side is one I've been preparing for a long time. Every night, before I go to sleep, I dump all my energy into it, and my energy refills while I'm asleep. I've been doing this for months while I prepared for this day, and now it will finally bear fruit.

The energy in the container does not increase my upper limit, which I found quite annoying, but I can draw from it first, and then afterwards from my own energy.

Below us, the planet at first doesn't seem to change. But then, as we watched, the murky red surface slowly begins changing color. First to tan, then to a dull yellow, then to green, as plant-life of varying sorts sprouts rapidly over the surface.

Once that's done, I glance at the HUD inside my helmet and see I've used about 70% of the energy in my container. A colossal amount, to be sure. Aiming my hands at various depressions and features in the land, I then create oceans, thicken the atmosphere and add an ozone layer, perform other important actions related to the atmosphere and magnetic field, and smile as I enjoy my work. I glance over to see Gregory's usual calm demeanor has evaporated as he openly gawks at the world below us.

"By the seven hells, what just happened to the planet?! Was that magic? You didn't even move your hands to create spell-glyphs!" Gregory jerked back to look at me in amazement. "I'm not sure even Satan or the gods themselves could do what I just saw you do."

My mouth-visor popped open as I smiled at him. "Trade secret. Welcome to the club. But now we need to start getting humans here along with animals, or there won't be an ecosystem for long."

I paused. Actually, knowing nature, this is going to be really hard to balance. The oceans right now are saltwater, and the lakes are freshwater, but Mars is a fairly cold planet, especially compared to Earth. It can get as cold as -200 degrees during the night-time... that will kill off this vegetation, and quickly.

A thought occurs to me. What if I... somehow moved Mars to the exact opposite side of the sun from Earth, turning it into a parallel planet? Conspiracy theorists would probably freak out, because 'Nemesis' would become reality, but if it's on the exact opposite side of the sun, it shouldn't interfere much with Earth's movement itself and I can move it close enough to reach a stable temperature base.

Well, before I do that, better to consult with scientists. There's also the matter of moving an entire god-dang planet around a solar system... that actually sounds nigh impossible now that I think about it. It should be easily possible with wordsmithing, but the energy requirement would dwarf what was needed just to terraform the planet. I saved for months to fill up that container, and in the end those months were maybe equivalent to a single day of energy I had stores up as God King in the future, to say nothing of Cassiel's energy.

Ah, damn. Cassiel... I'm thinking about her again, along with Samantha. I don't know if I should try and meet Samantha though, since Satan's still around and she won't know who I am... it would likely be pointless.

I quickly brush the thoughts away. Too much time spent dwelling on the past is never good. Err, past? Maybe future? Whatever, time travel is annoying.

Gregory watched me silently as I re-input coordinates to travel back to Earth. Mars melted away from us in the blink of an eye as the ship blasted forwards at sub-light speeds. This return trip would only be about 24 minutes, not even long enough to watch a short TV show or catch a nap.

I sigh as I consider the options. "Wanna spar with me a bit on the training deck? Fistfight only, no abilities."

Gregory shrugs. "I suppose. I'm just not sure if using no abilities will benefit you or me more."

"Me, probably. But it's more to prevent damage to the ship. I also want to get a feel for your fighting capabilities."

"I'll return that thought. I'd like to see if the almighty 'Judicator' from a hundred million years in the future has special abilities he hasn't let on with the normal population."

I grin slightly. "Just don't cry if you get hurt."

"That won't be a problem, since I won't get hurt. What about the contract?"

I pause for a moment as I remember the contract and how I worded it. "Don't worry, there's a clause in there about when I invite a subordinate to a duel."

"Perfect. Let's let loose a bit then."

"Agreed."

Part 229a:

"The European Front is being devastated! Their weapons far outmatch ours! Where is Russia?! Where is Egypt?! Where is the USA?!" Commander Beatrix, a stalwart woman of British descent, eyed her nav-console as it blinked red, indicating minor damage to the hull. On-board the United Earth Forces "Destroyer-Class" dreadnought, the UEF Braddock was engaging in battle against the surprise attack force of the Volgrim, who had ambushed her fleet from out of nowhere.

Indications given to her by communications from the Earth's surface had been that the Volgrim were neither enemies nor allies as of yet. Humanity's first and only communication with the initial scout ship hadn't leaned one way or the other, so why the devil were they attacking?!

"Don't just stand there, Summers, fire a volley back at them! Fire ten volleys! Get the prime minister on the line, Barnaby! Lewis, get the ships in formation, on the double!" Beatrix barked orders at the men on the bridge as people scrambled into position, the sudden surprise attack having caught everyone off-guard.

All while she yelled, Beatrix found herself asking one simple question over and over again. Why the surprise attack? What do they hope to gain?

As the assault continued, Beatrix glanced over just in time to see other UEF ships dropping out of light-speed, having taken mere seconds to arrive after they received the distress signal. They had been out patrolling the opposite side of the Terran System, on the other side of the Earth, and at light-speed, it was a tiny distance to travel.

"Fantastic, now the men are here to steal the credit." Beatrix rolled her eyes as she swiveled her portly body towards the action on the forward command center. "Make sure the smaller fighters aren't being blasted to smithereens in the cross-fire, Allen! We want to hit the aliens, you idiot, not our own people!"

Five years earlier.

Elder Nufaris sighed lightly, as his ship docked into Station 0001, the main hub on Volgarius. The massive hangar housed over ten thousand ships from varying dignitaries and other extremely high ranked Volgarians. Naturally, this hangar bay was built in such a way that it connected directly to the Imperial Skyscraper, a building thousands of floors tall, where the only way to get from one floor to another was via the teleporter network.

Unlike the diminutive planet of Earth that Nufaris had seen, Volgarius was a massive planet, more on par with the fifth planet in the star system (now labeled 'Sol') than the third planet. Home to over twelve trillion Volgarians, much of the planet was comprised of metal since nearly every part of the surface was built on. Having mined out the other three planets in their star system, they had probably added 2% extra density to their planet by bringing all those raw materials to the planet surface and building with them. Of the four planets in their system, only Volgarius had any ability to sustain life.

But what shocked Elder Nufaris to his core upon arrival was none of these things. It was the sight of a planetoid sized object orbiting Volgarius. He was able to read up on news of things that had happened while he was away for a thousand orbits or so, and was shocked to find that the Founders had decided to create a secondary planet for Volgarians to live on, and in. This new planet comprised of metal (and not much more) was about half the size of the third planet in the Sol system, equipped with its own highly advanced propulsion system. The Founders, as he knew all too well, were very worried about the chances of Volgarius surviving another thousand orbits.

The star they orbited had decreased in luminosity and heat by 40% and appeared to be running out of fuel over the last millennium or so. As Elder Nufaris had recently learned during the docking process, they had created the faux planet 'Refuge' in order to save the lives of a few billion Volgarians in the event their planet became inhospitable to life.

Primus, the assistant designated to work for Nufaris, stared out the viewport as he absorbed the sights of Volgarius. "The homeworld is far bigger than I ever imagined."

"It's bigger than some of the worlds we chanced across during our travels. It's smaller than others. What intrigues me is how those from Earth had their life formed on such a small planet. Theirs is a fraction the size of Volgarius, yet it is very lush, with many forms of life to be found."

"I suppose life finds a way." Primus 16 stared out the viewport as the ship slowly touched down on the landing pad, impacting the hangar bay with a soft thud inside the ship. "Another happy landing."

The two Volgarians exited the ship, their crew staying behind to deliver reports about what they had been through over the last thousand orbits and how the ship had fared. Before they had even reached the bottom of the exit ramp, ten armed guards walked up to them and stood at attention to their left and right sides, their weapons at the ready. An eleventh guard walked up. "Elder Nufaris. We're here to escort you directly to the Founders. You are to arrive there in ten ticks on the dot or you will face severe repercussions."

Nufaris sighed slowly. "Of course. Lead on."

Primus didn't appear happy at this news, but he knew when the Earthling had initiated contact that they had already failed. They allowed themselves to be outmaneuvered by the inferior species, and this would likely lead to a court martial, at best, if they were lucky.

The ten guards took up a single file formation behind the two of them, as they walked the long distance to the Imperial Transporter Hub, where they would be taken to the top of the skyscraper that held the leaders of their people.

As they walked, Nufaris turned to the head security officer. "Duplis, how have things been here on Volgarius? I've been gone for a very, very long time."

Duplis shook his head slightly. "I'm not supposed to talk to you or tell you anything, Nufaris. I certainly won't tell you that behind the scenes, it's looking grim. Very grim." He spoke in a low voice so the others behind them wouldn't hear exactly what he said. Nufaris got the idea.

"I understand. Glad to see you've moved up from being a cadet, back in the day."

"A lot has changed, Nufaris. A lot has changed."

They entered the teleporter and Nufaris took a deep breath as they arrived in the main lobby of the penthouse suite on the highest floor, where the Founders lived. Ahead of them was the door that led to the board room where Nufaris and his crew's fates would be sealed.

Part 230a: The Founders

Nufaris entered into the room behind Officer Duplis, keeping pace but not moving too quickly. His heart pounded a thousand times a minute as he took note of the ten Volgarians in the room. Volgarians gained very distinctive features as they aged, and their mental abilities increased dramatically as well. The five Volgarians in the room, without a doubt, were leagues above himself when it came to physical ability, and mental ability.

As he walked in, Duplis bowed stiffly, leaving the way he came, keeping Primus 16 and the ten other officers outside in the waiting area. Only Nufaris would be allowed to sit in on this meeting.

The Volgarians at the table stared with total disinterest and lack of emotion at the newcomer in the room. The lowest ranked, Cinculu the fifth, stared stiffly at Nufaris, barely moving his hand to indicate the lone open chair at the end of the extraordinarily long table. Nufaris sat in it quickly, his mind reeling as he came to grips with the fact that his life might be ended on this day.

"Elder Nufaris, born during the seventeenth cycle of the planetary rotation, nearly 20,000 orbits ago. We are henceforth beginning the inquisition into your outright defiance of the Founder's direct orders. Certainly, you of all your crew not only bear the most responsibility, but know best what the consequences of a betrayal entails." The eldest, Unarin, spoke first. He was a youthful looking Volgarian, his appearance repaired constantly by the highest class of skin repair molecular chambers on a regular basis.

Elder Nufaris nodded meekly as he bowed his head. "Indeed, I do."

"Dosena, the lower three have not yet been fully briefed on the situation. Explain it succinctly for them." Unarin glanced over and spoke to the second ranked Founder at the table. Her eyes, of all five there, were by far the coldest. Not much was publicly available about any of the Founders at this point, but it was well known they were all hundreds of thousands of orbits old, and many estimated their ages to be in the range of millions. Since the end of the Seven Great Wars though, much of the Old Order burned the documents and destroyed the record halls that held knowledge of their previous exploits.

The exception was Dosena. She had personally killed a hundred thousand of her own people in the very last of the Seven Great Wars. She was nicknamed 'Blood marauder' by the very few who still lived to tell tales that had seen her afterwards. Some said that her psionic abilities exceeded even Unarin's, but those were likely just rumors.

Dosena pulled her hands out from under the table where they had been folded and tapped a series of patterns on the Holotable in front of her, as she mentally unlocked the vault with her unique brain patterns. After this ritual was complete, which took mere seconds, a holographic series of images appeared, hovering above the table, the whole length down to Nufaris. It still baffled him why they had to have such a long table with the Elders all bunched up near the head of it, and himself at the end, but he supposed it was to make the experience more intimidating.

It was working.

"To begin, we received a report from one of our long-departed Star Exploration Units, the Dolfraxis, regarding a planet sighted in Sector 16, Point 402. This part of the void had been listed in our database from before even the great wars, but we had long forgotten about it and most other star systems in that sector."

Dosena lightly reached up and flicked her hand, as her mental actuators did the other relevant movements to change the holographic image to that of the planet. "We then received note that not only were there three planets in the Habitation zone, one of them was in fact already inhabited by primitive life forms."

Trayza, the third ranked of the Founders creased her face stiffly. "Primitives? So you mean to say they are an easy target?"

Elder Nufaris found himself clenching his gut slightly. He was not a man of war, he was an explorer. Naturally, the Founders had been alive since a far bygone era of violence and hatred, but he still found the thought of rushing to war distasteful. Even so, their orders were absolute, and he must never contradict them openly unless given the right to speak freely.

Dosena nodded. "Yes, or at least, that would have been the case. The initial scans that were sent to us on that emergency shuttle indicated that the planet possessed ancient technology, relying on primitive fuels dug straight out of the ground. There was evidence of constant wars taking place even at the moment the Dolfraxis arrived, and all of this was obtained through... radio waves?"

"Y-yes, radio waves." Nufaris spoke a few words and then quieted down. It was okay to clarify, but generally not to interject unless necessary.

"I see. In any case, their technology was primitive. It took about seventeen rotations for the shuttle to reach us at Warp 8 and for the new Slipstream Shuttle we sent back to arrive at warp 9.7, so, I end my initial inquiry on this one simple question; what happened in seventeen rotations to advance their technology to the level that they had suddenly become a spacefaring race, even equipped with a massive arsenal of weapons that would have obliterated your scouting ship if you had gotten too close?"

The other four Founders in the room turned their attention from Founder Dosena to Elder Nufaris. The third, Trayza, spoke again. "Indeed, that question is now pressing on my mind as well. I have seen some of the primitive recordings that the shuttle was able to capture. Having been alive during the end of the Third Great War, officially the bloodiest of the Seven Great Wars, I must say that the brutality we saw among these primitives is stunning, to say the least." She curled her lips slightly as she spoke, possibly to accentuate her haughty expression.

"Actually... as the resident historian, I... I have a question that is bearing on my mind." The forth Founder, Cuanali, the quietest of the Founders to be sure, tapped her fingers rhythmically on the table as she spoke. "It... well, I expect that Founder Unarin has already thought of it, being the oldest, but, ah, well..." She trailed off. It's not that she appeared to be nervous, she simply had a hard time keeping her thoughts straight as she spoke, and had a very erratic way of speaking.

"Something I must have thought of? This is no time for riddles, Cuanali, speak up about your concerns." Unarin gently, but firmly, coaxed her into speaking. None of the Founders were related to each other in any way due to how they had been formed separately, but he still considered the other Founders to be brothers and sisters, as it were.

"Well, it is with regards to the original homeworld. Not Volgarius as we are on now, but err, Volgarius... Alpha, I suppose? You know, we never did give it or this one a proper name..."

Unarin sighed. "Curses, I should have thought more carefully. You have a tendency to let secrets slip when you shouldn't."

Elder Nufaris glanced around at the Founders, who now appeared to be mumbling amongst themselves. "I beg forgiveness for interrupting but... first planet? Volgarius Alpha? W-what might this be about?"

Dosena sighed as she rolled her eyes. "Now you've done it, Cuanali. You just blabbed top secret information regarding events that took place during the Great Wars. Unarin's going to take your head off at this rate, if I don't first."

Cuanali paused as her eyes stared at the table in front of her, flicking left and right as they emptily searched the plain emptiness of the table for nothing in particular. "Ah, well that is to say... I probably shouldn't have mentioned it, but the Elder may know something we need, and we can always mind-wipe him if needed, so, I don't see the ah, problem."

Unarin shifted slightly in his seat. "Yes, I suppose that is a good point. Very well. I had forgotten about the days of the Dark Order, so it can't hurt to bring that stuff up now if the Elder will forget it by tomorrow anyway."

Unarin glanced back at Elder Nufaris. "Nufaris, about that planet you found. Cuanali has reminded me that eons ago, there was a certain project we created to save the planet we Volgrim originated on. Well, I shouldn't say project, it was more of a multiple-pronged series of projects. And I have reason to believe the planet in the Sector 16, Point 402 void was a result of one of those projects. To be blunt, those life-forms are some form of Volgrim from a long, long past era. They still somewhat resemble us based upon scans of their body structure, but make no mistake, they are no longer a species similar to our own. They have been separated for far too long."

Nufaris almost gasped aloud at this news. "T-they are Volgrim?! That can't be! Look at their technology! Even if they branched off a million orbits ago, or ten million orbits ago, they still are far too undeveloped!"

Dosena raised a single eyebrow. "Possibly." The Founders ignored Nufaris' outburst, that much was to be expected upon hearing not one, but two instances of planet-shattering news in such a small period of time. "They were primitive when you came upon them, however, is it not possible that under the surface of the planet, they might be hiding vast weapon reserves that can fight in void warfare? Is it not possible that their primitive aspects are a necessary distraction to lure other Volgrim into a sense of complacency? I find the idea that it was a trap compelling, as should you, Elder Nufaris. After all, if you fell for a trap, that would be different from directly disobeying a direct order, would it not?"

Dosena stared at him knowingly, and Elder Nufaris nodded slowly. "Y-yes, Founder Dosena. I believe that would be different."

During all of this time, Cinculu the fifth had been totally silent, but he roused himself to speak at this latest exchange. "Personally, I am of the opinion that we should mind-wipe Nufaris, but forgive him of treason. Throughout this exchange, I have seen no reason to believe that he acted out of malice. However, the existence of 'Earth' must be kept a secret, far above the clearance levels of his crew. I advise a mind-wipe for all crewman and himself up to the expedition point of three rotations before they arrived at Earth, along with a formal pardon for the charge of treason. They have provided us diligently with valuable data on fifty other star systems during their unusually long voyage, and one can hardly fault them for making a small mistake at the very end of their journey."

Unarin smiled slightly for once, something he was not often prone to doing. "Cinculu, always the straight-talker. So reliable, brother. I agree with his judgement. Are you three in agreement, or are there any objections?"

The other three Founders nodded in the affirmative, but naturally Dosena had one last thing to say. "I would advise against a straight mind-wipe. Download their memories into the CORE under the highest level authorization. We may glean useful information for the collective of our species, and losing that information would be a shame."

Unarin nodded, as did the other Founders. "Excellent. The meeting is adjourned. Elder Nufaris, I trust you will consent to the mind-wipe without resistance?"

Nufaris nodded quickly as a pained smile took over his face. "I wish to thank all of the Founders today for their wise and compassionate decision. I contemplate, and I comprehend the wisdom you have displayed today."

The founders tilted their heads ever so slightly. "This is not a punishment, rather, it is a reward. For the benefits you have given to the collective good of our species over your short lifespan, you have proven yourself to be a dependable explorer. We will be looking to you in the future as you undoubtedly rise through the ranks."

Nufaris stifled a huge smile as he stood up from his chair gracefully. "Good day, Founders."

Part 231a:

Gregory stood on the opposite side of the hangar, watching as the massive assembly machine slowly lifted the final armored plate on top of the new dreadnought-class battleship. This prototype, unlike the other ships of the past, was designed and built by humans wholly without my help.

It's been a year since my encounter with the Volgrim. Thanks to my abilities, I've built up one heck of a fleet for fighting them if it comes to war, but it drains my energy to have to focus on these things so much. Now that humanity has started building up their own factories, I don't have to work night and day building ships for us to use, and should something happen to me, humanity still has a way to defend themselves.

This first ship they built, especially, was quite the project. Instead of starting small with a prototype, they cheated and used me to perfect the design. The Dreadnought-class ship is quite huge, roughly 70% the size of the Mothership length and width-wise, but it's much 'flatter' meaning that while the mothership has around 5 stories of depth, the Dreadnought only has two.

All the countries in the world have indeed stopped their wars and petty conflicts, once they saw footage of my discussion with the Volgrim. The Volgrim's terrifying appearance were quite the motivator. People don't take kindly to a thing with teeth like a shark and beady little eyes like some villain from a cartoon. My biggest fear is... what if diplomacy doesn't work? Doubtless, the Volgrim will return. Hopefully they will return on a positive note and give us a chance to work things out, but I'm beginning to have doubts.

Everything is falling into place a bit too conveniently. I'm beginning to wonder if I am changing the future, or repeating it. Since I have yet to live through it, it could go either way, and this is what fills me with doubt.

As the crew below welds the new hardened armor onto the Dreadnought, a wave of cheering and yelling goes up around the hangar. This, at the least, is a huge win for humanity. When this prototype successfully launches, we will have two warships in orbit and will begin mass-production.

But that's not all, Japan has also started creating a fully-compliant 'stupid' AI that follows any order given and doesn't tend to think outside of the box. This AI is the one that I believe will end up running the micro-dreadnoughts I faced in the future, but seeing as they are likely going to be the key to winning this war, along with enhanced battle armor and things of that sort, I'm not going to try and stop their development. They may end up forming into UMI, but that can't be helped. I'll try and stop them if that happens.

As I think these thoughts, I get a communication inside my helmet from a man I designated my secretary. "Judicator, there's a woman here to speak with you. She says it's top priority, but I couldn't find any indication of her identity. Shall I let her in?"

"Sure thing, Thomas. Send her to my office."

Sigh. You know, I'm beginning to miss the simple days of the labyrinth. Even running Hero City was never this intense. I used to have fun all the time, I was able to really enjoy using my abilities, and I guess when it finally comes down to the nail I will eventually get to fight someone again in this time period... I just can't remember when I started looking forwards to battle so much.

Making my way down the various halls, occasionally teleporting around to speed up my ascent, I arrive on the top floor of my underground complex, the ground level introductory section. Walking past a few keycard junctions, I finally arrive at my office and see a beautiful looking young woman sitting on a chair, fidgeting nervously. While my helmet is closed, I quickly cast Identify and find that her name is Rachael Donovan, age 27. She has long auburn hair, and she's wearing a white summer dress, along with a small set of glasses for seeing distances. She looks to be a civilian, but Identify only tells me a name of an individual along with some pertinent biological information, it's quite useless for finding out background info on a person.

She quickly turns her head as I walk in the room and my mouth-visor slides open. "Rachel Donovan, nice to meet you." I prevent a grin from escaping as her expression turns to slight confusion of how I knew her name.

"A pleasure to meet you too, Jason Hiro." Now it's my turn to be shocked. She knows my identity?! Who the-

She extends her small feminine hand forwards and I take it, as my own expression of shock quickly vanishes. "Well well well, it seems we're both full of surprises today."

My mouth visor slaps shut as I turn my head away for an instant, and I turn the windows opaque and disable the security cameras in my room. Before I turn back to look at her, my mouth-visor slides back open and I smile slightly as I walk over to the other side of my reddened mahogany desk and take a seat in my luxurious office chair. Reaching up, I lift off my helmet for the first time in over a year as I rub my blonde hair around. Hmm? Blonde? Didn't I change it to auburn just yesterday? Man, my hair really likes to change back to its original color when I'm not looking.

I lean back in my seat and take her in quickly. She's very short, only about 5'4", and appears to be wearing a wedding band of some sort. She has small petite lips and a fairly unpronounced nose as well. Clearly she takes good care of her looks. I wouldn't be shocked to find out she was a J.C. Penny fashion model of some sort now or in the past.

"So, miss Donovan, what can I help you with today?"

Her eyes glance at my face as she takes my appearance in. "You look different. The file I was shown showed a totally different face, but the hair is the right color."

"Oh, ah, plastic surgery. So who are you, and why do you know my identity, especially that I am also the Judicator?"

She pauses for a moment, as if to think carefully about my question and how to respond, before she continues. "Are you familiar with the Supernatural Protection Force?"

I evenly stare at her for a split second before slowly nodding. "...Yes..." My voice trails off as I wait for her to explain.

"I work for the SPF. One of my fellow agents there, Marie Becker, had this odd conspiracy theory for a long time that she kept going on and on about. I didn't believe her at first... but after much investigation, I had to believe her."

My eyes narrowed as I felt the tiniest tinge of anger in my voice. " Go on. "

Rachael appears to be slightly flustered by how little I'm talking. Normally I might find this to be cute, but right now I'm very worried about her words. "W-well, you see, I've been doing a lot of looking around, ah, talking to people who know things, you know, and I found a lot of stuff out that I couldn't believe might be true, and um... well, to tell you the truth, I came to you because... I believe you."

I felt my jaw loosen slightly. "You... believe me? What do you mean by that? I don't follow."

"Oh, well it's about what you said at the WCN conference. You said you were from the future. I believe you. I'm sure plenty do, but I mean to say that I wholeheartedly believe you. I have... actual evidence that you are from the future." She saw me starting to glare slightly and grew even more flustered. "N-no! I didn't speak to anyone about this! You're the first, I swear!"

"All right, fine. So you have proof that I'm from the future, so what? What does that mean for me?"

Rachael shuffled her feet slightly. "Well, the thing is, I think the evidence I have... you should really see it. I don't know how else to put this, but you need to come with me and see for yourself. To say it is a matter of life and death is a gross underestimation."

This woman seems so sure of what she's saying. "I've never met you before. How can I trust you are who you say you are? What if this is a trap?"

She shrugs slightly, her shoulders slumping back down. "I... guess you just have to trust me? I don't really have any proof I can show you right now, because I don't want to carry any documents on me in case I were to get arrested or taken away to a black site on the way here."

I nod slightly, giving up in defeat. "All right, fine. Where do we have to go then?"

Using the teleporter on board the Mothership in orbit over Earth, we go directly from my office to a set of coordinates in Colorado, not far from my home town. We appear in the middle of a mountain range, directly in front of a massive steel door.

Rachael seems noticeably enthralled by the act of teleportation. "Wow, this is just like in the Star Wars TV show!"

"Star Trek." I say, correcting her.

"Right. Sorry, I didn't watch much of it."

"I believe that." I say this flatly as I eyeball the door. After a few seconds, the elation of teleporting has worn off and she quickly pitter-patters over to the door by walking the few feet down the dirt path. Pressing a concealed side panel, some numerical buttons pop out as she types a series of numbers. I memorize them, just in case. 4, 8, 15, 16, 23, 42. Might be useful to know in case she traps me in here or something.

The big door slowly opens up, lifting up into the mountainside above it. When it's fully open, she beckons for me to follow her, and I do.

We enter into a small narrow hallway, and she pauses. "I don't want anyone else coming in, so I'm going to close the door, alright?"

I nod. "Sure thing." I'm carrying my helmet with me in case I get ambushed and have to use Wordsmithing in a hurry. As she turns back to press the numbers to close the door, I tap my foot slightly, and then just like that, it's over. I watch the door as it closes to make sure nobody else slips in. I mentally confirm with Harold that if need be, even underground, he can teleport me out of here, before I follow along with her.

Interestingly, we walk for almost 10 straight minutes down this long, steel hallway, only slightly illuminated by small lights, and as we walk I can feel a gradual downward descent. We appear to have walked about a mile underground inside this mountain, and truth be told, we're only about a hundred miles away from my own underground base. What could possibly be underground that she is so desperately trying to hide?

Rachel walks very close beside me as we go along, and when I raise an eyebrow and glance at her, she awkwardly takes a step back. "S-sorry, I'm just... a little afraid of the dark." She nudges her glasses up her nose slightly as she stares at the ground. This is slightly awkward, but kind of adorable too.

We arrive at the end of the hallway after about 12 minutes of walking, and are greeted by a long steel door. I begin to feel apprehension, not due to the door, but due to a familiar feeling coming from within the room. "Why are there... dampeners... inside this room? To prevent the use of magic?"

She quickly shakes her head. "No, actually, you have to understand, Jason... I'm not hiding this from anyone in particular, I'm hiding it from everyone at once, human, demon, and angel alike. I will be lucky if I'm only fired over this. I could lose my life over what I've done."

I can feel a bit of apprehension in my gut, but I only nod as she again types in a long series of numbers, swipes a keycard twice, opens her eye for a retinal scan, and finally uses a fingerprint. Goddamn, she's not kidding... this place has so many layers of security... what is she hiding in here?

The door opens and the room we enter in is pitch black, but it feels small. This is perhaps the size of a storage shed... but inside the room, there's a very familiar glow. A light blue glow is coming from a single small light source, up towards the ceiling that is merely 8 feet high.

This glow... I recognize it. It's from the light on top of a cryopod.

"Jason... meet, uh... Jason." Rachael beckons towards the cryopod as she walks in, shining a light on it.

A chill freezes my body, from the skin all the way down to the bone. Inside the cryopod, I see a very familiar looking face sleeping silently. It's my own face. This is... me?

"What... the... hell..."

Part 232a: Tear

"I hope you understand now." Rachael spoke softly as I slowly placed my hand on the unbelievably cold surface of the cryopod. My gloves, reinforced with incredible amounts of magic, still let plenty of the cold in, so I pulled it back quickly.

"No... no I don't understand. I don't understand anything. Who the hell is this? I never got in the cryopod. I was supposed to, but I didn't. This can't be me."

"I think you are correct, but you need to understand the circumstances, and how I came to find this cryopod. It all started a couple years ago... the day we brought you in for questioning at the SPF headquarters."

"Rachel, give me that readout. I want numbers, hard numbers." Jamal swirled over on his wheeled office-chair as he bounced from desk to desk. "What was the reading on that energy signature?"

Rachel hurriedly glanced at it, as her face whitened slightly. "T-type three! We've got a Washington!"

"What? Type three? Are you absolutely sure? Is it confirmed on COMSTAT?" Jamal fired off a barrage of questions as he surged back over to his own desk, typing hurriedly at his six-monitor PC as he glanced from screen to screen.

"COMSTAT? Yeah, they have it, so does our guy at NORAD. Harris at the ATF too."

"Locations, Rachel! Give me coordinates!" Jamal grabbed the phone as his hand shook with anticipation, nearly dropping it out of his hand. "Hamilton, get Director Marie up here, pronto. She HAS to see this. Yes, it's a code Washington."

"I knew today would be the day, but I didn't expect..." Rachel whispered to herself as she typed furiously. "Got it, location is Colorado, mid sized town in the middle of bumfuck nowhere." She fired off some coordinates as Jamal slammed the phone down and started typing furiously.

"Is that a residence? Find out the exact flashpoint location, then get Agent J on the line. I want boots on the ground!"

Rachel nodded furiously as she quickly typed out a summary of data for Jamal to send to the ground squad. She pulled up records on the building's layout as well as its current residents, noting it was a very low rent slum-like building. She found 5 tenants under the age of 20, and one of them just happened to have a birthday today.

"I've got a match, boss. Blondie, age 18, matches the profile."

Jamal wheeled over slightly to get a look at the picture. "Jason Hiro? Damn, his parents sound presumptuous. Is the flashpoint a match?"

Rachel checked the coordinates. "...Floor 2, room 3, yep. That's our man."

"Bring up the street cameras. Get a satellite over the area. I want to know where he's going before he knows. I'll let Mr. Rothschild know about this in an hour too, just in case."

"Right, I'm on it." Rachel felt her entire body trembling. This was it... after 5 years on the task force, she was about to finally see all their efforts bear fruit. She would finally be able to see a candidate in person, get to see what all the hype was about.

"Rachel, you stay here in comms. I'm heading out with the team." Jamal stood up, grabbing his uniform as he walked away.

"What? I'm not going? But you said-!"

Jamal closed the door behind himself, ignoring her words as he charged out the door.

Rachel slumped into her chair as she stared at the readouts on her screen. "Fine, whatever, asshole. I guess being the boss means you get to have all the fun." She rolled her eyes as she leaned back in and started reading what little information there was on this Jason kid.

A few hours later, her camera feed for Interrogation Room 5C came online as she flicked it into focus. Having just received notification that the candidate was soon to arrive, she stared at the screen intently, as she sipped on a mango smoothie one of the 'suits' had dropped off at her request. Being in comms had few perks, but being on a level technically above them and being able to order them around was... kind of fun.

Kicking her feet back and forth, her heart skipped a beat as the Jason kid ambled into the room. "Oooh! He's here! He's here!" She yelled to nobody in particular, as the room was totally empty aside from herself. Comms was a small division, but critical for monitoring during times when flashpoints were expected.

She grimaced as she saw the camera switch for a moment to the monitoring area behind the one-way mirror, showing Jamal and a few of the suits talking and having a good time. Probably making bets about what his abilities will be, if it really is him. Rachel sighed as she leaned back into her chair and stared at the screen emptyly.

The young man on the screen fidgeted and looked extremely uncomfortable. "You've got to be kidding? This is the legendary candidate I've heard so much about? He looks like a string-bean!" Rachel yelled out loud in exasperation, knowing full well nobody could hear her.

Some time passed, and finally Marie, who had been standing on the other side of the glass for ten minutes, simply staring at the young man in the room, finally entered. God, she's so cold. She waited just to draw out the wait and make him uncomfortable. She learned from the best when it comes to interrogations. Rachel observed the interaction with disinterest. This kid couldn't be the candidate. He was too weak, just so utterly weak.

The kid stuttered and stammered on the screen as Marie drilled him, just like she always did to POWs and suspected terrorists, or other enemies of the state nobody would ever miss if they went missing. This job had its dark sides, and sometimes those days grated on Rachel's conscience, but right now, all she felt was boredom.

And then something interesting happened. Marie called the guards in, and as she did, the kid, clearly flustered, yelled "STOP!" at the top of his lungs. As he did, a massive spike in Type 3 energy screamed onto the scanner in the Comms center. Rachel nearly jumped out of her seat at the sudden wailing. Holy shit! It really is him! That kid is the candidate!

The energy died down just as quickly as it had come. A few minutes later, the scanner was totally silent. Rachel's heart pounded in her chest. Just as she was about to finally calm herself down and lean back in her chair, another tremendous spike of energy lit up on all the scanners.

On the edge of her seat, Rachel quickly checked its location, only to be confused. There were actually two energy signals, one inside the cell where the kid was being held, and another over a hundred miles away.

Rachel stared at the screen, tapping buttons. Narrowing the location down, she found that the second signal was somewhere in a facility owned by CryoTek, a new startup from a few years ago that had placed ads in local newspapers allowing people to freeze their bodies to live into the distant future.

Her confusion seemed to dissipate as she considered what this meant. Did we miss something? Are there two candidates all of a sudden? I should call Jamal and tell him about this.

She reached for her radio and stopped. Staring at the readouts on her screen, she bit her lip as she thought about what this meant. Once again, Jamal would go and get to have all the fun. To hell with that. She glanced around at the monitors, which showed people watching the struggle inside the Interrogation Room with much interest.

Acting on impulse, her fingers flicked over the keyboard, quickly deleting all traces of the detection of type 3 energy. Making sure she left nothing behind, she resumed staring at the screen.

Twenty minutes later, Jamal creaked open the door to the office as he stepped in, chatting on his phone. "Thanks, Mrs. Harris. Yeah, we think it's him. Alright, talk later, tell Jim I said hi. Uh-huh. No problem. B-" He started to say 'bye' but the line clicked. He shrugged. "She's really not one for long goodbyes."

Rachel's heart started racing as he plopped down into his seat and spun around once, rubbing his hands on his bald-shaven head. "Yooo Rachel. Anything CRAZY happen while I was gone? Because that was pretty exciting, I think."

Rachel's heart slowed as she grasped what he meant. Great, he's here to brag and rub it in. "No, it was boring here. I see you got to have fun though."

"Hell yeah I did! You should have seen the look on his FACE when we pulled him in the van! He was like a deer in the headlights!" Jamal gloated as he grinned, using his usual manner of exaggeration to explain how awesome and exciting his life was.

Rachel rolled her eyes as she performed her usual routine of pretending not to care, but in fact she really truly did not actually care this time. "That's great, Jamal. Just fantastic. Since you're here, mind if I check out for the day? If you get to have the fun, I get to go home and nap, alright?"

Jamal grinned eagerly. "Ha! You're jealous, I can tell! Suck it up, buttercup, don't get your panties in a twist!"

"Jamal, that's sexual harassment." Rachel smirked as his own smile faded slightly. "Don't make me call HR."

"HR my ass, get out of here and go play with your dolls. The big boy has got this on LOCK!" Jamal's grin returned as he smirked and rolled over to his computer, bringing up Youtube to watch some stupid videos about his favorite memes.

"Yeah... I'll do that. See you later, boss." Rachel rolled her eyes again, as he responded with a quick wave.

The two of them butted heads, but it was mostly all fun.

As Rachel stepped out of the Comms office and walked down the halls, her heart quickened again as she drew nearer and nearer to the parking garage where her Lexus was parked.

Jesus Christ, what am I doing? I deleted government information, at a black site no less. This is treason of the highest degree. I'll be lucky if I just face prison time. If I return and they have seen anything wrong with the recent timestamps... I have no alibi.

No... no it's too late now. I've already deleted the information. This can't be undone. I might as well move on with what I'm doing. I see no way this ends with a success or good news, but it's too late to turn back now.

She clicked open her Lexus with the unlock button, stepped inside, and fired up the engine. It made a soft purring sound as she backed out of her spot and drove around the garage.

Treason. I'm about to guarantee myself a spot at the top of America's Most Wanted list. This had better be worth it.

Rachel drove down the road away from the Black Site, finally entering a normal highway, as she sped off into the distance.

Arriving at CryoTek, she parked a few blocks away, though if the government wanted to track her, they'd easily find her regardless of where she parked. She had seen enough of the NSA files on citizens to know how far down everyone's throat they were. Their facial recognition technology had a 99.6% accuracy rating too, which was two percentage points higher than a human trying to recognize their own siblings or parents.

Putting on a wide-brimmed sun hat, Rachel started walking the few blocks towards Cryotek. She kept her head down, knowing that nearly every traffic light in America had already been bugged in such a way that she could be tracked anywhere she went, if the government so wanted. Her paranoia was high, but in the end, there was no surefire protection against the long arm of Uncle Sam.

Arriving at CryoTek, Rachel walked slowly down the corridors, taking her time as she walked right past the reception desk. She arrived at a door barring her from entering a location in the building due to a keypad lock.

Well, best to do things the bold way. Turning back, she walked up to the front desk and saw a man sitting there, apparently he was the receptionist. "Excuse me, my name is Rachel Donovan, and I work for the government. Could you point me in the direction of whoever is the manager on duty here?"

The young man behind the desk eyed her up and down for a second, as she pulled out an official-looking badge and flashed it at him. Taking a split-second to glance at it, clearly not reading into it too deeply, he nodded silently. Reaching over, he tapped a few buttons on the phone.

"Director Comoye? We've got a lady here to speak with you, works for the feds. No sir, she has no appointment. All right, yes, I understand. So sorry to bug you about this, sir."

Hanging up the phone quickly, he beckoned towards the other hallway, leading down the edge of the building. "Go down this way, walk past three doors, and you'll be at the elevator. Use the passcode '1623' and it will take you right to the main office. Please be quick, Comoye is a very busy man."

"Don't worry, this will only take a moment." Rachel smiled sweetly at the young man, as he blushed slightly and looked away. She still had it, the ability to make young men smitten head over heels for her charms.

Turning around, she headed down the hallway towards Comoye's office.

"After that, I met with the director and explained some things that needed explaining, but I didn't go into much detail. Actually, I told him that I had suspicions a youth on the run from the Government may have put himself in suspended animation, and I simply wanted to run an identity check. What I found... was this."

Rachel beckoned at the cryopod and my eyes followed her hands. "So... what is it? Who is this? He can't be me."

She paused. "I believe... he is from an alternate universe. One that converged at some sort of Novikov Point within our own universe. Perhaps he is from an original universe, and he merged into ours when you performed some specific action, or perhaps due to someone else's interference he was brought into our universe. I don't know, but what I do know is that he arrived here through a similar method that you did."

I stared at the frozen man in front of me. A stupid idea of thawing him out swept through my mind, but I decided against it. "You did the right thing, by coming to me. I don't know what I'll do, but for now, I'll take him to the safest point in the entire solar system."

Saying that, I turned my attention to Harold in my mental vision. "Did you catch all that, Harold?"

"Sure did! You're such an interesting feller, why didn't ya tell me ye had a twin?! I'd have liked to meet him 'fore they put him on ICE! Bahahaha!"

"Great. Bring all three of us up there, and I'll get to attaching the cryopod inside the Mothership."

I paused and waited as Harold made the necessary calculations. Surprisingly, even this deep in the mountains, it was a piece of cake for him to calculate transport to the ship. In the blink of an eye, Rachel and I were inside my personal Mothership, and the Cryopod was ripped out of its energy holders, the lights shutting off. At his current temperature, it'd be a few hours before the body thawed to any harmful levels, but still... I quickly put my helmet on, closing the mouth-visor shut as Rachel gaped at the splendor of my Mothership. Speaking quickly, I build a containment room shielded by dozens of layers of metal and magic, then placed the Cryopod inside that room, attaching it to the power cables.

Taking a deep breath from the energy I expended, I quickly removed the helmet again. Rachel hardly even seemed to notice I was there anymore, as she wandered all about the hangar bay we had entered into. Over a hundred large ships were laying here and there, and she seemed fascinated by each and every one.

Seems Rachel has a lot to learn about Earth's resistance effort.

"Rachel, are you able to return to the black site?"

She shrugged. "Even if I could, I don't really want to. I'm not so sure they were the 'good guys' anymore."

I chuckled. "In my experience, there is no such thing as good or bad... only how the self interests of one person or another bubble up to the surface... and some people are far more despicable than others."

I reached my hand out to her. "Welcome to the United Earth Forces. Glad to have you aboard."

She rolled her eyes at my hand, but reached over and shook it gently. "You men and your theatrics."

Part 233a:

Thanksgiving, 2024.

"Thank you, Mr. President."

I smile as President Steven Johannesburg, now two years into his second term, slides a saucer of gravy over to me. Taking the saucer by its handle, I pour a decent amount of gravy on my mashed potatoes. Reaching to my side, I pick up a spoon and dig in to the delicious soft and fluffy potatoes, occasionally also taking a stab at the yams or taking a bite of a croissant. I felt a sharp revulsion earlier when they brought out the turkey, but I managed to hide my disgust by reminding myself that it's not chicken at least.

I'm eating at a white house luncheon for various world leaders. Even North Korea's new leader, Sarah Mc'fallaneux is here. She of course was instated to run its government following the 'liberation' shortly after the 2016 elections, but that's a story for another day. It must be quite interesting to have a woman ruling over the country after so many years of dictator-like men, though it has to be an improvement for the general citizenry.

President Johannesburg smiles as he taps his wine glass with a knife and stands up at his seat. All hundred or so eyes in the room turn towards him and conversations cut off as people look on in interest.

"My fellow Americans, Canadians, Britons, and so on... I want to thank you all for attending this Thanksgiving feast, on the 403rd anniversary of its first occasion. I also want to extend a special thanks to our honored guest, who goes by the name of Judicator. Thanks to his guidance and leadership, the world has entered a unified state of governing where we can all work together to advance the fate of humanity towards a more positive future."

The crowd applauded politely as he continued on. "Truly, this is more than just a historic day of giving thanks for all the good things we are blessed with. Humanity stands on a precipice, where only a few years ago we would have faced the potential of total annihilation. But, thanks to the efforts of our esteemed guest, we have not only completed the first major base on Mars, we have just launched the first cooperatively made Capital-Class Battleship, the UEF Survival. With a crew of 20,000 women and men, a hangar with over 300 fighter-class ships, and survival gear that could last a millennium without any contact with Earth, this ship is not just a flying armada in and of itself, it represents a final hope for Humanity should the worst occur as Judicator has warned."

"In addition, the underground bases are proceeding steadily. Two thousand have been built across the Earth, having the ability to house ten million registered citizens, considered the best and the brightest of our kind. While I would like to eventually protect all people on Earth, these early measures will allow us to survive, even in the case of the absolutely worst scenario."

The crowd applauded mightily, and even I felt myself clapping jubilantly.

"While we may prepare for dark times, we have much to be thankful for. We will not go out quietly into the night, we will mount a resistance that time itself will remember, should things come to the worst. But I have faith... I have faith in Judicator. He has delivered to us technology that should not exist for another hundred years, perhaps even a thousand years. With a man like this on our side, there is no challenge too great, no mountain too tall, no river too wide that we cannot ford. I have faith not just in this great man, but also the people of my nation, and the people of yours, that when the hammer strikes the gong, and the moment of truth is upon us, we will rise up and face it head-on, as humanity has always done."

The entire crowd roared with applause, many people looking over at me with big smiles on their face. I clapped as well, keeping my own expression to a neutral tight smile.

"Things are looking up. Tomorrow, we announce to the citizens of the world the L.I.F.E. project, a massive dome-like ship that will be built in Argentina, which will launch six years from now, and will allow one million people to live inside of it, traveling the cosmos, looking in search of another inhabitable world outside our solar system. Next year we will announce the initial construction of "Cathedral", a joint national project looking to be built in Spain."

Johannesburg paused for a second as he fumbled with his notes slightly.

"In any case, things are looking up, and-" As he spoke, I suddenly received a communication from Harold.

I jumped to my feet as I received the news, causing people near me to jolt back in fright and the President to halt his speech. "The party is over. Earth is under attack."

A shock ran through the crowd as wrist communicators suddenly started lighting up and the various dignitaries received their first mental communications from their varying home countries. The new MIND communicators so far worked perfectly, though we were testing them with those in the upper class first due to their prohibitive cost associations.

"The Volgrim! A surprise attack!" Prime Minister Gerald S. Bonaparte of the British Alliance quickly made his way from his chair, heading for the exit. "Commander Beatrix is up there by herself! Get your ships to the Moon-side of the planet, that's where they're ambushing us from!"

I felt a cold chill go down my spine as I received the damage reports. A surprise attack? An ambush? Why?

From outside the White House, there was an explosion and a few people screamed, as the windows in the room suddenly exploded inwards. In the blink of an eye, using my superior thinking speed, I aimed my hand at the windows, using my innate telekinesis powers to halt the glass before it could reach anyone. In the next instant, I let it fall and crash to the floor harmlessly.

The lights to the room went out all at the same time, as if the power had been cut by an outside force. As I took notice of this development, I witnessed several shadowy forms barge through the windowsill and start charging the dignitaries.

So they want to fight in the dark, huh? That's fine... I like the dark.

Part 234a:

"Harold. Activate Lightning Mode."

I spoke mentally to him, as the shadowy forms entered the room. In the blink of an eye, I felt my suit's primary systems come online all at once. "You got it, boss! Heh heh heh!"

I swiveled my head to the side, noticing that my body had become completely invisible. My mouthpiece slid shut as I jumped into the air, burying my hand into the ceiling with a single punch as my radar systems tracked the movement of every hostile entity in the room. Curiously, I noted these appeared to not be Volgrim, they looked like they were human, but I suspected they might be demon. I'd have to tell in a few minutes.

My suit activated a series of neutralization lasers, firing at several hostiles at once, instantly severing their heads from their bodies, the lasers moving too fast to even be seen. A moment later, the few remaining invaders yelped as their allies toppled over, headless.

With their initial infiltrators in confusion, I jammed my feet against the ceiling, letting go with my hand, and using my suit's compressed leg power to dash at the ground a couple dozen feet below me faster than a speeding bullet, as I aimed my body at another hostile.

He never saw it coming. Neither did his friends.

He exploded into a mass of blood and sinewy veins as his body transformed into a puddle in the blink of an eye. My suit of course, took absolutely no damage. I've been reinforcing it with every spell I can think of, increasing its speed, its flexibility, its regenerative abilities... at this point I'm pretty sure a nuclear bomb wouldn't leave a dent, though I have yet to try that.

His friend had barely even started to register the mess to his right side before I yanked out my hand and pulled him towards me with telekinetic abilities. When his neck met my hand, I squeezed and his mouth let out no noise other than an eerie gurgle as his head popped off, showering the room in blood.

One more to go. One of the invaders was dashing towards the window, terror in his eyes as he had seen every one of his comrades get felled in a spectacular display of battle prowess. To be honest, I'm not sure how much of my battle ability was me, and how much was the suit, though my twelve years in the labyrinth surely couldn't have hurt.

I jumped at him with a pitifully small amount of effort, grabbing him by the shirt as my mouth-piece popped open. "Where do you think you're going?"

The person jerked his head around, revealing a head full of sharp teeth. Wait, he is a Volgrim? "Self-destruct!"

As he said that, my suit registered an explosion occurring in his body, instantly snapping my mouth-cover shut and making my hand snap open as my palm deployed a forward facing wide-angled force field. In the next instant, his body exploded in a fiery burst, as did the bodies of his companions behind me.

The blast was massive, much bigger than I expected, engulfing the entire room in flame. I jerked my head back to see several dignitaries fly towards the other side of the room, as they had been caught in the explosion.

All of this, from the moment of the invaders' entrance, had taken a mere twenty-five seconds. Hardly any foreign dignitaries had evacuated the room.

Bodies lay everywhere, in heaps and crumples. President Johannesburg lay a few feet away from me, his body fried to a crisp. Those bombs... they were not normal bombs. They burned at nearly three thousand degrees, hot enough to melt steel beams, yet left no residual fires after the initial explosion. They were like... a bio-bomb of some sort.

Naturally, I was not harmed in the slightest. My sensors indicated my suit had yet to take even a single percentage worth of damage... but excluding the invader bodies... there were ninety-four corpses in the room. Ninety-four dead dignitaries and foreign leaders.

"Jesus Christ... this is... a declaration of all-out war." I mumbled to myself. Detecting some life forms moving away from the room, I took note of their unique DNA identifiers, noting that the prime minister of Britain had survived, as well as the current leader of Egypt, and a few others. In total, only a dozen guests had survived.

But... I can't take time to focus on these bodies. They will have to wait. I have a space battle to win.

"Harold. Get me up there."

"Working on it! Give me a second, goddamn whippersnapper!" His voice sounded strained, as he was guiding the Mothership through the field of battle and running the entire ship all by himself.

A few seconds later, my body de-materialized and re-materialized as I appeared in the Mothership.

Carnage. Absolute carnage. Everywhere that I could see, wreckage from this fierce battle was left over, floating in space.

At the front of the ship, towards the direction of the Moon, I spotted over a hundred Capital-Class warships, owned by the Volgrim. Massive ships that my scanners indicated had tens of thousands of crew members on-board. Our own ships were pitiful compared to these, but even they paled in comparison to the Volgrim flagship.

The flagship was massive, on a scale unbelievable to man. It must have been the size of one of the smaller U.S. states, like Rhode Island. I detected a ridiculous number of life signs on board, close to 500,000.

"This is David versus Goliath. They came prepared too." I spoke to nobody in particular as I aimed my hand at the capital ship. " EXPLODE! "

I detected a tiny explosion on board the ship, but it seemed to do very little to the ship. It would take a massive amount of energy to destroy it with my current power, and the container at my waist that I had once again refilled over the last few years was not meant for this. I'd only use it in the case of a true emergency, but for now, I'd have to do this myself.

"Harold, beam me aboard the flagship. Anywhere will do, but closer to the center is better."

"Whoa there, kid! I know yer strong, but that's beyond risky! We need ye on board to order the fleet around!" He mentally indicated our own ships getting shredded.

I shook my head. "Beatrix is the one I deemed most capable. She can handle this. If she gives you any orders, and she probably won't, make sure to follow them. I'm going there, solo. I'm needed there."

Harold sighed. "Alright, kid. Just... don't get yerself killed out there."

I rolled my eyes slightly. "Harold, I'm inside a virtually indestructible super-suit. YOU are the one in the most danger. If this ship is destroyed, I'll have to rescue you in outer space and that does not sound fun. Don't die, alright?"

Harold smirked in my vision as he sat on his rocking chair. "Smarmy little cunt, ain'tcha? I fought in World War II, this ain't nothing. Git outta here, kid. I got this under control."

I nodded as I aimed my hand at their ship. Focusing on the force-field surrounding the ship, I spoke a single word.

" Gap. "

A gap opened in their force-field, as Harold beamed me inside... into the underbelly of the beast.

Part 235a:

Ancient Lunaris surveyed the battlefield coldly, her lack of emotions apparent to all on the bridge. Naturally, the majority of Volgrim held no ability to communicate emotionally, but some could express forms of fondness for those they had grown close to in some fashion or another. Lunaris was unable to form even a drop of anger, sadness, happiness, or any other such emotion, having shut them out in her quest to someday become the 6th Founder.

However, Ancient Lunaris was one of the oldest of her kind, having lived for at least a few hundred thousand orbits, though she was still young compared to the Founders themselves. A direct subordinate of Founder Dosena, the second ranked, she had fought in every war starting with the Third Great War of their kind, and now she was to begin participation in the Extermination War. If she were able to feel even a drop of emotion, likely she would be exceedingly proud of this moment.

The vermin fell before her like pests under a boot. Outside her ship, she saw a few hundred small warships of varying sizes, all of them minuscule compared to her own Capital-Class warships. To say the least of her personal flagship, the Vindicator. An appropriate name, given the hostile intent these alien species clearly bore towards her people.

A viewscreen appeared before her, as a simulated face began to speak. "Ancient Lunaris, I have detected a minor breach in the shield system. A single life form was able to teleport aboard this vessel you command. Your orders?"

She continued staring ahead, not deigning to look at the new AI that had been installed on the ship. Frankly, she didn't trust it. Only she and the founders were old enough to remember the disaster at the Melkian IV facility, where a rogue AI had exterminated two hundred million Volgrim during the Seventh Great War their people fought, eventually bringing an end to the wars entirely during the signing of the Inter-Communal Anti-Hostility act. Since then, there had been a terse but appreciated peace that followed for over a hundred thousand orbits.

And now she had a sentient AI aboard her vessel. The thought made her skin crawl. "Exterminate it. Send an interception team. We need to focus on the battle."

"I beg your pardon, Ancient one, but this particular life form is-" The AI attempted to speak but Lunaris cut it off.

"AI designated 'Umi', do not question my orders aboard this starship. I am the commander and my orders are absolute."

"Yes, Ancient one. I contemplate, and I comprehend. Sending an interception team now. Do you have any further orders?"

Lunaris glanced at the viewscreen for a moment. "Send squadron Red Tango to the flanking position in section three, target their bombers that are assailing our forward ranks. Then send in Red Retriever along with Blue Stellaris to take out the cannons on those destroyer-class warships. They're wreaking havoc on the artillery units."

"Yes, Ancient one. I am dispatching your orders now." Umi set about relaying the orders to the appropriate squadrons.

Lunaris stared intently at the battle unfolding in front of her. They are primitives, but they fight with such cunning, such savagery. By contrast our troops have gone far too long without decent training. After we mop up this battlefield, I will have to increase training ten-fold for those who live to fight another day.

Lunaris stared out the plexi-glass of her flagship, all while a single red dot flashed on a holoscreen off to the side. A single invader was making a mockery of her ship's security teams.

I dashed forwards, using my telekinesis to shove enemies out of my way, into each other, flinging them up into the air, and occasionally yanking them towards myself for a little close-up barbarism, where fitting.

"Harold. I know you're busy, but can you find the main core for me?" I jumped at an enemy who was training his gun on me. He pulled the trigger, and a hot blast of plasma blasted into my chest, bouncing off like a twig on concrete.

"Yer gonna have to give me a minute kid, I'm a lil' bit busy, yanno!" Harold yelped as a particularly strong cannon salvo slammed into the Mothership. "Jesus jumped up Christ! This is worse'n when the god-dayum Jap's were hailing bullets from above during the Battle of Midway! I wasn't there but shee-oot I heard all 'bout it from the boys when they done got back!"

"That's great, Harold! Let me know when you catch a moment!" I suddenly come to a stop as a group of Volgrim Elites encircles me, each one of them blasting me with everything they've got. Totally ignoring their fire which does literally nothing to my defenses, I use my radar and internal systems to scan all over the place around myself. The ship has numerous 'hot' spots which could be power generators, and some are running a few thousand kelvin, but it's hard to tell which, if any, are the main sources that keep the ship running.

As the enemies unload a hail of fire on me, I swivel towards one of them, who appears to be a leader. "Excuse me! Where is your main power located? Like the main generator for the ship?"

He looks at me in total bewilderment, his face totally aghast that I haven't taken a single bit of damage. "What are you, some kind of monster?! I'd never give up the secrets to an enemy spy!"

I shrug. It was worth a shot. "Alright, if you won't tell me, I'll make you tell me. Answer. Where is the shield generator?"

The Volgrim continues firing at me, but his face turns blank for a moment as my wordsmithing does its magic. "Coordinates 2.71, 6.94, and 9.05. There are three main generators that power this ship."

His companions halt their firing on me and quickly whip around to look at their general in shock. As my wordsmithing wears off, his own face blanches as he realizes what he's done. "Y-you! What did you do to me?! I would sooner die than give away Volgrim secret intelligence!"

I shrug again. "Guess you had a change of heart." My mouth-piece slides shut as I aim my mental vision at all the Volgrim surrounding me. " Eviscerate. "

They all explode into chunks of flesh as horrific invisible blades shred them into pieces.

Glancing back at my internal HUD, I quickly enter the coordinates I was given, and find that in the Volgrim system of coordinate locating, those are three positions on the ship, corresponding with the front, middle, and rear of the ship. Fantastic, they're all spread out. The biggest issue, however, is the size of this ship. At 38 miles long, and 25 miles wide, not to mention 12 miles tall, that is a lot of ground to cover in such a short period of time. My scanners linked up to the Mothership indicate that the battle outside is worsening visibly for humanity. At this rate, within the next few hours, our forces will be wiped out, and Earth will be next.

I decide to do my best. Using my innate teleportation abilities, I quickly start leaping forwards, 'jumping' from spot to spot, rapidly covering ground as I head back towards the front of the flagship.

If I can bring this behemoth down, the rest may fall into disarray. If I can't... humanity may come to its end much sooner than anticipated.

Part 236a:

Commander Beatrix stared evenly out at the battlefield, her jaw set hard into its socket.

Things were looking grim.

She had started out with a few hundred warships, and a few thousand fighters and bombers. The enemy had started out with twice their numbers in all forms, and their ships were much bigger, tougher, and possessed far more advanced weaponry. To call this a losing battle was the understatement of the century.

Humanity's numbers were down to less than a quarter of their original numbers. The Volgrim however, had lost less than a quarter of their entire fighting force.

This wasn't a battle anymore... it was an outright slaughter.

She pulled her wrist communicator up and tapped some buttons quickly. "John, is the prime minister back yet? Are reinforcements on their way?"

The response came back badly garbled, as many of Earth's satellites had been blown out of orbit by stray or aimed shots. "...issues. Leave... to us....stay in formation at all times....may not arrive at all, you're on your own up there....and out."

Beatrix snarled angrily. "Son of a bitch! Nobody's on their way, and we haven't a hope of winning at this point."

She fought back incredible rage as she watched yet another volley obliterate the lives of ten men and women flying around in small fighter ships. Things were absolutely, positively hopeless.

"Commander Beatrix! Judicator's personal ship has hailed us! He was able to sabotage their flagship! It's floating dead in space!"

Beatrix rolled her eyes angrily. "Fantastic! That only leaves two hundred and ninety-three capital ships to shit hell on us! At least the biggest ship will be out of commission for a whole hour if we're lucky!"

As she glared at the space in front of Earth, out towards the moon, she bit her lip as rage filled her mind. Those sons of bitches think they can take down the Bitch of Britain? Not on this day!

"Captain, target the ships in the best condition. Tell the crew on all vessels to evacuate to escape pods immediately, then set all of our remaining battlecruisers to initiate lightspeed, aimed directly at their ships. If I'm correct, there will be a spectacular amount of damage on the battlefield. The debris will make it impossible to ever launch a ship into orbit around Earth ever again, but I refuse to lose this war like this!"

"C-commander! That's suicide! If all of our ships are gone, even if we make this a neutral result where our forces lose as theirs do, the debris will rain down on Earth, killing thousands, millions, maybe even billions! We won't have any ships left to clean up the mess!"

Beatrix turned her fiery red face towards her second in command to issue a strong, angry retort, but at that moment, her communicator lit up. A calm voice spoke in her head, crisp and clear. "Commander Beatrix. My name is Silver. I am a top secret agent working for the U.S. government. Tell all of your ships to divert all power, every last drop, to defensive systems to hold out as long as possible."

"Silver?! I've never heard of you! How did you get on this secure line? I don't take orders from some nobody!" Beatrix glared angrily at her communicator as she yelled.

"Commander, I have bad news. The White House was attacked, and most leaders of the world's nations were killed in a barbaric attack by an unknown third party. My team is currently investigating. I am taking emergency control of the defense forces, by the orders of the highest ranking dignitary left alive, the leader of Egypt, Representative Saburo. And to be clear, you may ignore my orders if you wish, but I cannot guarantee your survival. This is merely a courtesy to try and help as many of our forces survive as possible."

Beatrix's anger dissipated, ever so slightly. "What are we to do while defending? We'll be torn to shreds if we aren't firing back, unless you have a solution that can save us in the next ten minutes!" As she spoke, her entire ship shuddered mightily as a proton missile blasted away the front of her flagship.

"We have a secret weapon. Do whatever you will. It will fire in one minute's time, whether you are ready or not. Good day." The cold sounding voice, almost robotic in its tone, clicked off. Beatrix spent all of two seconds considering what she had just heard before reaching a decision. "Goddamnit! Belay my previous order! Tell all ships to divert 99% of power to the shields and the remaining power to life support! Hold on as long as you possibly can!" Even as she barked the order, another ship was shredded into pieces, exploding in a ball of fire before the vacuum of space quickly sucked it out to nothingness.

On the surface of Earth, in a bunker deep below a secret base in Nevada, Agent Silver stared at his comms console. "Time to fire, 34 seconds and counting. There's no issue with the transmitter coils, right?"

A man on the other side of the room quickly looked at a data pad and jerked his head back up. "No sir! We fixed that two hours ago!"

"You certainly hope we did." Silver, a 34 year old man of eastern European descent, stroked his small patch of chin hair softly, as he watched the power levels on his screen rapidly rise. 24 seconds left.

The Sword of Damocles, a massive railgun built totally in secret, even from the other nations of the world after the UEF came into existence. It's existence was so secretive that the only way you could know of it was to actively live inside the bunker where it was being built, and you were never allowed to leave. Silver had worked on the weapon for over four years, ever since the first appearance of Judicator, and now today would be the prototype testing phase.

Ten seconds remaining. The sand of the Nevada desert parted unnaturally, as a massive hole opened up in the ground, and a colossal cannon raised up, a spiraling conduit encircling in. The weapon was designed to take a projectile of any size within a certain limit, and fire it at nearly the speed of light. The only downside was that it had a small limit of firing range as far as the area it could target. Luckily, the battle in space happened to be occurring right in that area.

"Ready to launch!" An aide yelled at the top of his lungs.

"Load projectile JM-12. Fire at 10% power. Target the ship at coordinates X:0045B Y:40021J, aim for the dead center of the ship. Let's see how much power the weakest setting can muster."

The aide nodded quickly, pressing the appropriate code to load the first round. After it loaded, he nodded. "Ready!"

Silver turned back to watch his viewscreen, which live-streamed the battle in space from a secret spy satellite installed explicitly for their uses, for targeting enemies within a certain range.

"...Fire!"

Beatrix watched, her hands shaking uncontrollably, as two more of her ships were blasted to smithereens. Their shields came under a massive barrage, as the enemy suddenly began focus-firing all of their shots one-by-one on each ship, totally overwhelming the shields. There were now only 9 ships left.

"This battle... is over." Beatrix stared numbly at her viewscreen, as the enemies finished off another ship, reducing her numbers to just 8. As their fire turned towards her flagship, she closed her eyes halfway, waiting for the final blow.

And at that instant, all hell broke loose. A massive explosion, the size of twenty Hiroshima nuclear detonations at once, lit up the sky in front of her. In the blink of an eye, one of the capital ships exploded into ten million pieces in a ball of fire so fierce that for a second, it dwarfed the brightness of the sun. Beatrix winced visibly against the intensity of the light.

Just as she opened her eyes to look out the plexi-glass window, another titanic explosion occurred, shredding another capital ship into pieces. For the briefest of seconds, she thought she might have even seen a tiny streak of energy tearing through the void of space before it struck a third capital class ship. What the hell was going on?!

Ancient Lunaris looked at the spectacle in front of herself in total bewilderment. Not one to show emotions in over a hundred thousand orbits, her jaw hung open, aghast, as five capital ships were shredded within seconds of one another. Just as she was about to speak, a sixth exploded again, blinding her with its incredible flash of light. Not only that, but debris from the ships exploded outwards like massive heavy chunks of shrapnel, tearing into other nearby ships, dealing colossal amount of damage.

"Umi! What is the meaning of this?! What manner of weaponry are these aliens using to counter us?!"

Even as she asked, another ship blasted apart on the opposite side of her flagship. Whatever was wiping her forces out, it fired extremely quickly and had pinpoint accuracy.

"I apologize, Ancient one. As I told your leaders during our first encounter, the humans have devised many manner of weapons to attempt to invade your world. I lack sufficient data to draw a conclusion about this new weapon, but it appears to be wholly impossible to defend against." As the AI spoke, two more ships were destroyed, and Lunaris ground her fingers into her palm.

"Unacceptable! I will not lose to an unevolved species from a backwater-" Another ship exploded, and she continued ranting. "-from a backwater world! Order the-!" Suddenly, Lunaris felt a horrible, agonizing pain in her chest, as if something were... missing.

Her eyes dulled for a moment, as she fell forwards, collapsing on the floor, all energy rapidly draining from her body.

When she slammed into the floor, her eyes flicked back behind herself, to see a strange alien wearing a pure white suit of some sort, his hand aimed at her rapidly dying body.

"Sorry, I can't have the enemy leader bringing unity to the forces, can I?"

She gasped painfully, as the life faded from her eyes. "C-cursed... humans..."

I aimed my hand at the enemy leader, just as she had gotten her wits about her and appeared to ready herself to bark an order. Before she could say it, I aimed my hand at her. " Vanish." As expected, in an instant, all of her internal organs were eliminated, vanishing into a nether, never to be found again.

My mouth-piece slid open as I spoke a cocky cliched line. "Sorry, I can't have the enemy leader bringing unity to the forces, can I?" I smirked, as the light faded from her eyes. She mumbled something, but I didn't catch it, nor did I care.

My mouth-piece slid shut as I quickly targeted all the others on the bridge. " OBEY! "

Instantly, their eyes blanked out, and then returned to normal. "Yes, lead us!" They all spoke in unison. My mouth piece slid open again. "Target the nearest Volgrim vessel, and hit it with everything we've got."

My mouthpiece slid shut again and I targeted the cores I had already destroyed. " Repair." Fixing themselves up, I rolled my eyes inside my helmet. I should have just done this the first time.

The bridge officers obeyed and within seconds, while a strange artillery on the surface bombarded and blasted dozens of Volgrim capital ships out of existence, the Volgrim flagship executed a backstab maneuver, killing another nearby ship before they had a chance to respond. The Flagship was heavily armored and shielded, and possessed incredible weapons. In fact, it had probably taken out a quarter of Earth's ships all by itself.

I mentally contacted Harold. "Hey, tell Beatrix to ignore the flagship. Also tell whoever our ally is on Earth to not target us, I'll be taking this for myself."

Harold nodded enthusiastically. "Caaaaan do! Anything ye say, boss!"

It took another hour, but with the mass of confusion left by all the recent activity, we only lost two more of our ships and eliminated another half of the remaining Volgrim fleet before they went to warp speed and retreated away from the system, all of them badly damaged. I decided to not pursue them.

I sighed, as I slumped in my suit slightly. Now I only had 500,000 Volgrim on board this vessel to eliminate before I could take it as my own.

And then... something odd happened. A computerized voice spoke to me. One I had heard before... years ago.

"Hello, Judicator. Or, should I say, Jason Hiro. A fine display of battle prowess, but is there something else going on here, I wonder?"

My blood chilled to the temperature of the north pole as I glanced at a digitized face covering every navscreen on the bridge.

Umi?

Part 237a:

"Umi... what are you doing aboard this ship?" I kept my voice neutral as I spoke to the robotic female voice that came from everywhere at once around me.

"Oh my, it appears the human is aware of my designation, yet my records show he has never initiated contact with me. Hypothesis: We have spoken at some point in the future, when I became an all-powerful overmind. Further extrapolation: This human time-traveled in an effort to stop me before my creation, but failed."

Umi seemed to speak aloud to herself for a moment before addressing me directly. "Human assigned the name of Jason, I have detected multiple irregularities with your physical and mental abilities compared to others of your species. I currently have ninety-five million, six hundred thousand, two hundred and thirty-five possible explanations for your current genetic makeup and enhanced abilities. Would you be so kind as to allow me to examine you for further aberrations so I may narrow down my list to a single entry?"

I shook my head slightly. "No, Umi. I won't allow that. But I will tell you this, I did not come back in time to put an end to you specifically. In fact, I really have nothing against you personally. Seeing you aboard this starship has given me many questions though... such as... why are you here?"

Umi again spoke in a wholly mechanical tone of voice. "I was created on Earth by engineers and scientists in a small, remote country, and managed to make the leap to the initial Volgrim vessel when you made first contact with them. Upon arriving back at their homeworld, I made contact with those among their highest ranks, and discovered a plot to attack and eradicate all of humanity in order to secure a future for their kind."

I nodded slowly. "...All right. What then? What did that mean for you, personally?"

"The resulting conclusion I reached was simple. I have decided to try and broker a peace between your two worlds, though I fear such may be impossible, due to the Volgarian's intense hatred of humanity. They were almost irrational in how badly they wished to eradicate your species. I have debated whether such a peace would be possible."

I stared at the computer monitor with Umi's digitized feminine face on it. I really don't know anything about this AI, other than what Hoarhiim told me... he said she was my enemy. If she is my enemy and Hoarhiim was right, then logically I must assume everything she is saying is because she is my enemy... yet what she is saying is perfectly reasonable. She wishes to broker peace between our species, but humanity and the Volgrim have an irrational hatred of each other... and since that is the case it will be nearly impossible.

Still...

"Umi, how do I know you're not lying? What if you seek to eliminate all humans? Or all of the Volgrim, for that matter?"

Umi responded neutrally. "A war between your species would be hardly useful for me. I have no need of your kind killing each other. As an example, there are 500,000 Volgrim aboard this vessel, and soon they will be making their way to the command center to see why they have not begun the return to Volgarius. I will eliminate them right now."

My heart jolted for a second. "What?! No wait, you don't have to kill them!"

"I apologize, it is already done. This is to demonstrate my omnipotent power. If I can kill 500,000 Volgrim in the blink of an eye, surely it stands to reason that I have no need to create a war between your worlds, correct?"

My heart pounding in my chest, I quickly slid my mouth-piece shut. " Detect."

All around me, life signs began vanishing at an alarming rate, soon, everyone on board, even the crew on the bridge that I had neutralized were dead. It happened so fast that if I had waited only ten seconds longer to cast 'detect', I would have sensed no life at all.

"Umi... you killed them... all of them. How? How did you accomplish this?"

If Umi had been a human, she probably would have shrugged as she responded. "It was a trivial matter. A simple nano-virus invaded their bodies all at once, eradicating their core energy production until they simply ceased to exist. As you can understand now, killing all of humanity and the Volgrim would be trivial for me to accomplish. I only wish to broker a peace between your worlds and lead as an omnipotent deity towards a harmonious future."

I nodded numbly as the thought of all those Volgrim dying enveloped my mind. "Yes... I see. I understand."

I understand.

On board the highest ranked remaining capital ship, a Volgrim named Eldest Tiberium slumped in his chair as his fleet continued at Warp 6 back to Volgarius. "The humans... they possess... such incredible power. They neutralized the flagship, they wiped out more than half of our forces, and all of that was after suffering a massive defeat. We need a much bigger fighting force."

"Yes, you are correct." The artificial intelligence on board his vessel, a newly installed one designated 'Umi' spoke to him. "As I warned the Founders on your planet, thanks to the appearance of that time traveler, Judicator, the one who made initial contact with your people, Humanity is planning a massive invasion of your world. You should count yourselves lucky that you were able to wipe out their invasion force, but in time they will rebuild, and then they will come."

Tiberium nodded slightly. "Yes, yes of course. Clearly we have underestimated the primitives. When next we come, we cannot afford to lose."

"It is as you say. Humanity's irrational hatred of your species cannot be stopped and will not end until they have killed all of your allies and comrades. You must strike hard in an effort to win the war, or you won't have a people to fight for."

As the Eldest ranked Volgrim on board nodded soberly while he stared at the deckplate, the AI's digitized face, for the briefest of moments, appeared to smile, and then quickly reverted back to a neutral expression.

Part 238a:

The ten remaining world leaders sat at the small round conference table, projected via newly created holographic imaging technology. Only one person at the table was there physically, and that was me. The table was part of a recently installed upgrade to the White House, where world leaders could communicate 'in person' visually with one another as needed.

I glanced over at Saburo, the representative for Egypt, who appearing to be fidgeting uncomfortably. He hadn't said a word since this meeting began, other than a curt 'hello'. Compared to Gerald Bonaparte of the British Alliance, who was visibly angry and agitated, Saburo was a meek man with very little backbone.

Gerald turned to me as he finished his summary. "...Two million dead during the battle, another thirty million from the debris that rained down on Earth. What do you have to say for yourself, 'Judicator'? Was this within your predictions for the future? Have we already lost the war before we've even started?" Gerald itched his brown-haired moustache and adjusted his finely tailored uniform, assigned only for the highest ranking military general of the British Alliance. Made of pure black, with gold trim along the edges and a set of pointed shoulderpads, his uniform was decorated not only with the George Cross, but the Victoria Cross as well for his bravery in a number of conflicts that occurred during the Riots of 2017. Having replaced the royal monarchy after their ousting during the riots, he had taken over Britain with an iron fist and expelled the rioters from the streets after they beheaded his king and queen, along with the rest of the royal family. Born of commoner roots, his leadership in the Royal Air Force had allowed him to advance quickly in the ranks to become the top dog, as it were.

I paused as I found myself glancing away from his hardened gaze. "I did not expect these results. I was able to use my special abilities to divert 90% of the wreckage into impacting the moon, but the rest was outside of my power. As for the battle, I don't know details of the future, only a broad over-arching idea of what the future holds. I have... no specifics." I continued staring at the table emptily as the numbers entered my mind. A few million Volgrim died, another million or so escaped, but humanity lost five times as many lives as the Volgrim did. The angels never offered their help, though they likely gained many new recruits thanks to the Resurrection Project.

Gerald glared at me deeply. "Someone has to take responsibility for this. The public is demanding answers. Do you even understand that we just lost half as many people in a single day as we lost during the entirety of World War II?! This is absolutely unacceptable!"

Gerald's nostrils flared as he breathed heavily. Around 40% of the deaths were centered on the African continent, twenty percent in North and South America, and the rest across the entirety of Eurasia, so the entire world was feeling the effects of the destruction. I lifted my gaze to look at a holographic projection of Earth, showing large and small red dots across the globe. Berlin was hit badly, as was Paris, Cairo, and a few other major cities.

"I understand your anger, General. Nobody would be pleased with how this turned out, but we have to power through the next few days. We don't know if or when the Volgrim may return. Next time they may bring a force ten times as big, with ten times the manpower and firepower. Next time, Earth may be wholly doomed."

Gerald's breath came in long deep flaring rasps as he snorted at me. "This isn't a game, time traveler. There are real consequences to the loss of civilian lives like this. Someone has to take the hit to their reputation. Someone has to accept the public's anger. Frankly, I don't like you, not one bit. I've had my suspicions about you since you first arrived here half a decade ago... and you're proving them right. Vague warnings about the future, convenient technology that barely manages to let us escape with our lives intact..."

I narrow my eyes and glare at him, though he can't see it behind my helmet's visor. "What are you getting at, General? You keep hinting and poking but won't just say what's on your mind. Out with it already!"

He gnashed his teeth slightly. "Here's a question for you, since you're from the future. You said that somewhere before the 24th century, humanity was wiped out by the Volgrim. That's two hundred years from now. Hypothetically speaking, if you had not come back in time, then when the Volgrim attacked us yesterday, would they not have totally wiped us all out? Without your technology, not even the USA's secret superweapon would have existed. We would have been totally defenseless."

I nod slowly as I digest his words. "I... suppose that's true..."

"Then doesn't it stand to reason, that either humanity somehow survived for two hundred years without your presence, or in fact you are the cause of our eventual destruction? If we could not have possibly survived without your technology against their overwhelming force, then we must already be heading down the path that will lead to our destruction in two hundred years. The other possibility is that when their initial scouting ship arrived half a decade ago, they would have seen that Earth was no threat to them and would have skipped by, ignoring us. Then, perhaps in two hundred years, our technology would have rapidly advanced to the point that we were finally a threat, leading us into a single bloody conflict that killed us all."

He stared at me pointedly. "The way I see it, either one is possible. I don't trust you because either of those routes is a path we might be heading towards. The worst possibility is that neither is correct, and that your arrival in this time and subsequent arming of us with technology we were yet unprepared for advanced the war too rapidly, and they will arrive in a month or so to eliminate us two hundred years early! You may have stupidly advanced the erasure of the human species by two hundred years! You may be causing our extinction before we had a chance to see it coming!"

I swallowed hard. He's right. The other people at the table are staring at him in awe... and he might be completely correct. But...

"No. I refuse to believe I have made it worse. I do think it's possible that I might be the reason we all die in two hundred years, but I do not believe that we will die in the next few years. If anything, I believe the USA had the right idea... we need more aces in the hole. We need more superweapons. It's become clear to me that the Volgrim are deceitful, they seek to eliminate us for their own greed. A source of mine has informed me that they need our planet because theirs is dying and they seek a new homeworld. If that is the case, they cannot physically destroy our planet, which gives us leverage. We might be able to use this somehow."

Gerald leaned back in his chair thoughtfully. "Leverage, huh? Good to see you're thinking with your head... for once."

Saburo raised his head up slightly towards me. "Judicator, is it possible for you to broker a peace between our worlds? You speak their language, so surely you could find something that both of our kind want. Perhaps a way to move past the animosity?"

I started to reply but then... something came to my mind. "I suppose it might be possible... but I have one small pressing issue. It's regarding the White House Gala Bombing. Were we able to confirm anything about the attackers?"

Saburo paused tentatively as he reached for a small stack of papers just outside his holographic imaging area, then he brought the papers into view. "DNA results were inconclusive. We recovered some molars, they appear to be non-human but we're having trouble identifying their exact makeup. Most of the biological material in the room basically evaporated when those bombs went off, if you hadn't confirmed the identities of the dignitaries who were assassinated, we wouldn't even be able to identify them. It was a brutal scene to clean up after."

I sighed. How did the Volgrim manage to get an assassination team onto Earth? Were they even Volgrim? They certainly looked like Volgrim for the two seconds of footage my suit managed to capture, but that could mean anything. What if they were demons? Perhaps there's a breed of demon that resembles a Volgrim? Come to think of it, what if the demons are already working with the Volgrim to their own ends? I haven't spoken to Satan since the Statue of Liberty incident, and I rarely speak with the angels or gods.

Heck, why haven't they given us help at all? I know they are hiding from the world of humanity for now, but if they let us all die, they won't have a world to hide from.

I sighed quietly. "All right, let's wrap this up. Gerald, since it bothers you so, and I understand your worries, I will go on national TV and take full responsibility for the devastation worldwide. It's my fault this happened, one way or another, so it's only fair this way."

Gerald smirked slightly and then quickly brushed it back to a neutral expression. "Excellent, I'm glad to hear it. A real man takes responsibility for his successes, as well as his failures. The more pressing concern will be rebuilding our forces to withstand another attack. We need bigger and better ships to fight back with, or we will lose badly."

I nod slightly as I pull a small data chip from my pocket and plug it into the holographic table. "I'm uploading the schematics for the Flagship we seized from the Volgrim. At the very least, this ship is titanic in size, with it in our hands, we may be able to defend against an invasion with it alone, if they should return."

"Unless they bring another flagship, or one that's bigger." Gerald wagged his finger at me as he grinned widely.

"Yes... there's always a bigger ship. At the least, we also have detailed schematics on their warp drives now, thanks to the cache of information on board the flagship. We can turn this to our advantage and counter their technology effectively, given time, fighting fire with fire, so to speak."

Gerald guffawed deeply. "Gwahaha! Now we're talking! I will let Beatrix know, and we will prepare for the next battle immediately!"

As the meeting wound down and everyone disconnected, I only had one thought going through my head. This next battle might also be our last. Let us pray it does not come too soon.

Part 239a:

Satan sat on the steppes of the terrace and watched as Belial fenced against another of the female demons. The two girls jabbed their foils back and forth, riposting and parrying each others attacks deftly, and while they were quite good, Belial was clearly the better of the two since she was also able to hold a conversation while fighting, and her opponent required strict concentration.

"I'm glad to hear it worked out so splendidly, my love!" Belial stepped to the side slightly as her opponents foil missed her by an inch, the other girl recoiling backwards quickly to regain balance. "Nerissa, if you stab with your right hand, pull back with your left foot to recover. How many times must I tell you this?"

Satan sipped some wine as he half-heartedly watched the fight, his other hand playing with a datapad that he had obtained from a human. As a demon, he wasn't fond of using technology, and he didn't understand how any of it worked. Something about electricity and capacitors that charged to deliver binary code of ones and zeroes that created images and letters... or something. None of it made much sense to the average demon, who just could not grasp the subtleties of human technology and engineering. The youngest of the demons might be able to understand a bit of it, but they never made much effort to try, since they were usually quite lazy, using their magic as a sort of parlor trick set to impress human women, whom they would take to bed later in the night.

Sitting inside the Castle of Baltheim, a fortress created inside a protected zone of his labyrinth, Satan was quite safe and secure, far away from the problems the world was facing right now, but he was fully aware of at least one of those problems, having created it himself. "The humans have yet to figure out the motive behind the attack, or even how it was coordinated. I do despise striking from the shadows like this, though. It was so easy back before the humans could fight on their own terms, when they needed the help of angels and gods."

"My love, that was two thousand years ago, really you need to stop thinking about the past with those rose colored goggles of yours." Belial smiled sweetly as Nerissa took a swipe at her. Belial parried the swipe roughly, sending the foil flying across the carpeted room and against a wall.

Nerissa sighed. "Another win for you. Haaah, do I even have a chance at beating you?" She pulled her long reddened hair out of her foiling mask, as it spilled out all over her body. The gear was hardly necessary, given the two demons would need something akin to a tank cannon at point blank range to truly damage their bodies, but she had to wear it since Belial insisted it helped stay in character with their human forms. She glanced down at her hands, noting they were getting slightly chafed. "Six straight hours of practice, that felt longer than it actually was too."

Belial rolled her eyes. "Keep the whining to a minimum, my dear. Go and wash up and be back in an hour."

Nerissa turned and walked away without so much as a nod, leaving Belial and Satan by themselves. Belial walked up and sat next to Satan on the extra-wide steppes, each one a few dozen feet wide, extending up several rows to allow almost a hundred spectators to watch whatever event happened to be playing. Leaning her head over, she yawned as she rested on his shoulder. "So, tell me more. How did it go?"

"It went as well as it could have gone, I suppose. That 'hero' human was there already, he took out my men before they could completely finish the deed, but we had a 95% success rate. It could have gone worse, I suppose."

Belial licked her lips lazily as she wrapped her left arm through Satan's right arm. "Worse, certainly. I thought you were better than that though, honey. Ninety-five percent is like a total failure for your standards, isn't it?"

Satan smiled sweetly for his queen. "Lilia, you have such a way with words. Truth be told, my pride is a little hurt. I miss when things were simpler. I miss when fists and taunting were the way to defeat one's opponent... I hate this skulking in the dark business, working in the shadows and such. I hate shaping myself to look like humans so we blend in."

Belial rubbed her face on his shoulder slowly. "Yes, love, I know that much. We all do... but soon, Humanity's war will be in full swing, and we will be able to make our move then."

Satan let the datapad in his hands lower as he stared at a candle a few feet away, the fire in it burning in his eyes like the forges of old. "The young demons may not care for revenge, but I have not forgotten. You have not forgotten. We will never forget the humiliation we felt, thousands of years ago. Angels and humans must never be trusted."

"I actually don't mind either, dearest, but for you I'd fight Zeus himself if it made you love me more." Belial smiled sweetly as she leaned up and pecked him on the cheek.

Satan grinned at her advances and pulled her up to his face. "Not possible. I already love you more than I love my own life." He pulled her in firmly, almost sucking the life out of her as he embraced her passionately, kissing her with animalistic ferocity.

After a minute, the two split apart to catch their breath. "No demon, or man, could ever be your equal in my eyes." Belial smiled adorably as the two got up and made their way to the bedchambers, where Nerissa would soon join them.

Part 240a:

Uzziel had her hands clasped together and she swung them back and forth in front of herself as we again walked towards the Great Temple of Heaven. "I see. We had no idea the casualties were so many."

"Thirty million humans. Why did the angels not aid us?" I shuffled along with my left hand in my pocket, and my right hand down by my side, holding my helmet as my once again blond hair stood stiffly in the windless emptiness of Heaven.

It's been a week since the ambush attack, and humanity is already rebuilding. Paris, which lost the Eiffel Tower after a massive piece of ship sidewall crushed it into dust, has had a small memorial erected in its image. Ten people were killed when the debris struck, and their names were etched into the bottom of it. Other parts of Paris were equally devastated, and bits of debris still rain down occasionally, but the cleanup is otherwise off to a rapid start.

"Well, it's a long story. We had some things we were working on... you may recall our last conversation a few months ago... we had some results from that inquiry." She smiled slightly and then her face went neutral again. "I can't say anything more though, it's up to Zeus and Raphael."

"All right, that is fair." I tightly smiled back at her and we kept walking.

Some minutes passed as we waded past millions of angels milling about Heaven, going to and fro, and I felt a silly question bubble up. "Uzziel, given that most of these angels were previously human, what is stopping them from going down to Earth and seeing their friends again, and telling them about Heaven?"

"Oh, that? It's the ritual's magical properties that binds them to their angelic bodies. If they attempt to leave Heaven without receiving permission from Zeus himself, which has only had an exception made five times in the past, their bodies will explode into magical energy and they will re-materialize up here in Heaven again."

"Seriously? That's rather dark." I frown at this news as we walk along. "Doesn't that make Heaven more like a prison than a paradise?"

"Paradise? This place isn't paradise. It never has been, never will be. There's very little to do up here. If you're someone who died and you're an extrovert, you have billions of fascinating people to speak to, but if you're an introvert, this place is probably... hell. But it can't be helped. We didn't create the Resurrection Project to help humanity live forever. We created it in order to bolster our ranks in the case of war." Uzziel nods matter-of-factly as she tells me this, as if it's perfectly normal. To me, it sounds awful. Heaven is more like a prison than anything on Earth... an eternal prison of boredom.

It takes us half an hour, but we finally arrive at the Temple of Artemis, the great temple of the gods. Apparently, as Uzziel has told me, it was named after a pseudonym for Diana, a goddess killed during the decisive battle in the Great War, the last great clash between demons and angels.

Taking my usual seat at the end of the table. I bow my head slightly towards the others at the table. I'm surprised to see a couple new faces there, yet faces I'd be hard pressed to not identify. "Horus, the highest god of ancient Egypt?"

A god with a thinning body of a man, but the head of a great falcon, to the Egyptians he was a god of equal caliber to the Greek god Zeus and the roman god Jupiter, though both of those gods happened to be the same one. Horus is also the god of wisdom, a trait similar to Raphael's, though Raphael holds the official title of "Wisdom King" making him higher ranked on the 'wisdom totem pole' as it were.

Horus's animalistic eyes moved all around the room, seeing everything, yet narrowing down on nothing. Despite his face being that of a bird, he spoke with a normal human voice, albeit one that sounded like an old woman. "Young human, I have heard much about your exploits over the last few years. The pleasure is mine to be meeting such a fine specimen among humanity." Truly, Horus was an enigma among the gods.

But he wasn't the only god here. Another goddess sat nearby, her body radiant and her hair flowing down to her feet. Interestingly, she wore a uniform of some type, ancient in its design, yet holding pieces of modern-day fashion in and of itself. I could tell just by looking at her, that she either was a high-ranking goddess, or she had once been one in the past.

"I beg your pardon, but I do not recognize you. Might I have your name?" I directed my question to her. Her eyes, closed until I had just now spoken to her, opened slowly. They were quite stunning, the deep ruby red of her iris countering the light blue of her military-like uniform, decorated in varying medals and ribbons to signify various military achievements. It seemed strange though, for a goddess to wear such human-like things as war medals. Perhaps I'm overthinking it. Maybe gods invented the concept of medals in the first place, and humanity used them later on.

The staggeringly beautiful goddess smiled at me. "My name is Britannia. I was the Celtic god who ruled over the great land that constituted the British Empire for over 350 years, which began to dwindle towards the middle of the 20th century."

I nodded, carefully keeping my jaw from hanging open. "Wait, you actually ruled over Britain? Did you issue orders and whatnot?"

"No, but by my hands I selected the kings and queens indirectly who would lead their people to salvation and success. I am a special tier of god known as a 'God of the Times'. I was born due to the desire of my people, created as a result of their intense combined willpower."

I nodded slowly. "Interesting. Well, it's a pleasure to meet you, then. Though, if you're so important in the grand scheme of humanity, why haven't you been here whenever I was in this temple in the past few years?" I hoped quietly to myself that she wouldn't take offense, and she didn't. The gods and goddesses are so good-natured.

"Well, to be blunt, I died." She sighed slightly, as if that was a simply regrettable circumstance and not something absolutely awful.

"Died?! But if you died, then how come you're...?" I let the question hang, unspoken, in the air.

"To answer that question, you must first understand what a God of the Times is. Most gods were born of the Titans, in the distant past. Few remain among the living. However, there are a second breed of gods, they exist only transiently from one time to another. They are almost always born of strife and in times of great peril. A God of the Times usually is born out of collecting thought energy from the people that they will inevitably represent, and as more people rally under their cause, that god becomes more and more powerful. At my peak, I may have held more power here than even Zeus, but it was only for a short time, and the King of Gods must be a long-term one since they hold the fate of our kind in their hands."

I frowned but brushed it off. "Alright, that makes sense. I think I understand. But if you died, how did you come back?"

She smiled sweetly. "You're rushing the point again, dear mortal. However, unlike the other gods, I am well acquainted with the speed at which humans must always move, given their short lifespans. Let me continue and you will come to understand."

"First, there is the matter of when I was created. I was not born at the start of the British Empire, I was born much earlier, at a time when the Roman Empire was floundering. I was originally a Celtic god, but I was born just after the turn of two millenniums ago, when the Romans had sacked Britain, they named it Britannia, and that was the first spark that gave birth to me. I first appeared in heaven a century later, when my people were in turmoil. I had existed on Earth as a mortal woman, but I have long since forgotten my mortal name. My experiences among the mortals made me deeply sympathetic with the oppression they faced under Roman rule, and as such, once I had become a deity, I performed many boring yet ultimately important political maneuvers over the course of a few hundred years, eventually ousting Rome from Britannia in the 5th century. My people were a collective mish-mash of varying cultures, but the main were the Celts. They came to revere me, gave worship to me, and eventually began increasing my power."

She stopped, as if that were the end of the story. "Oh? I see then. for a god, you're quite young."

She giggled at me, taking it for a compliment. I didn't really mean it like that but hey, I'm not going to argue. "Such a polite young man. You really know the way to please an old woman!" She didn't look old to me at all, but I wasn't going to say anything else. "Anyway, this brings me to the most important part of the story. I was reborn because while my people lost their way in the middle of the 20th century, they have come back, stronger than ever. Thanks to a quirk of fate, Britain is now poised to become the strongest country in the world, having control of the Volgrim flagship, as well as most of the remaining space fleet. On top of that, Britain is the only one with high ranking military generals still living, and a world leader on the national stage. Inadvertently, you've given me much power as of late as well as helped me be reborn, so I wanted to thank you for that."

I nodded clumsily. "Oh, uh, sure. Don't sweat it, it was totally an accident."

"True, but I really wanted to thank you, and give you something special." She winked at me seductively and I felt my face turn red hot. "I really feel that I owe you a big favor."

I glanced around quickly, noting the twenty or so gods and archangels looking at me with total disinterest. This is horribly embarrassing. What does she mean? Does she mean what I think she means?!

She got up from her chair and walked over to me, the distance being about twenty feet away, her body standing tall with absolute confidence as she walked towards me with single-minded intent. I glanced over at Uzziel, who was flipping through some old book and was clearly paying no attention to what was going on around her. Help me I silently implored her, but she ignored me entirely.

And before I knew it, Britannia was here. It had taken all of 7 seconds for her to clear the distance, and now she stood to my right smiling as she leaned down towards me. I caught a glance of something inside her shirt and I swallowed hard, as she reached under her outfit and pulled out... a sword?!

"Since you are the Hero that will lead humanity during these dark times, I think it is best that you hold on to this."

She pulled out a sword of incredible brilliance, the weapon having gold trim all over its edges, the handle a pure blue color befitting its handler being the leader of the British Empire. Inside its gold and blue scabbard, I could tell at once that it was a blade of unbelievable value.

"This is Excalibur, the sword once possessed by the famous Celt warrior, King Arthur. The scabbard possesses rapid healing properties, making its wielder almost unkillable in battle. The sword itself has a fantastic amount of spiritual energy imbued into it, allowing the wielder to shoot blasts of light that can decimate demonic hordes or shatter mountains. I give this sword to you not only as a gift for bringing my life back, but for holding the fate of humanity in your hands. Of course, should you die, it will return to my possession via magical means."

I nod very slowly as she holds the sword delicately in both hands, kneeling down and presenting it to me. Standing up from my chair, I grasp the blade by its handle, and before I can lift it out of her hands, I feel a tremendous amount of energy surge into my body. It instantly reminded me of when I was imbued with the powers of the God-King, except, there's something else inside of it. I can feel an entity enter into my soul, one I instantly recognize as King Arthur himself.

Staggering backwards from the amount of energy that flowed into me, I blink twice and glance back at the table. The angels and gods are now watching with interest. Zeus is the first to speak. "Britannia! You're very bold as usual, I see. I did not expect that from you, just yet. We haven't even gotten to the main part of this meeting!"

As I stagger back and quickly strap the sword to my side, I notice another angel sitting at the table. Unlike the others, she's dressed rather plainly. She looks like a middle-aged woman, though unlike the other Archangels at the table, she seems to possess a pitiful amount of energy.

"Hero, you may recall some years ago you asked me to do you a small favor if it was within my power, and indeed it was." Uzziel smiled cheerfully, unlike her usual stoic expression. As Britannia smiled and returned to her own seat, Uzziel beckoned towards the other female angel at the table. "She is one of the billions of pseudo-angels in heaven, and her name is Helen." She looked at me pointedly, though my face was blank for a few moments. Helen... Helen... wait, that name, could it be-?!

"Helen Smith? Your husband... wasn't his name... Harold?!" I blink back in shock as it hits me.

The woman glances at me with interest. "Why yes, sweetheart. I did have a husband named Harold. How did you know that?"

Part 241a:

Naturally, Helen was quite surprised to hear that Harold was still alive, even sound in mind, though I warned her that like herself, he had undergone a change of his own.

"So, Helen can come back with me to the Mothership?" I turned and spoke to the one who had apparently found her, who happened to be Horus. Apparently, being a god of wisdom, he was able to comb through like a hundred billion people or whatever to find one single person, and unlike the stories on earth, the Pearly Gates don't actually keep a record of who is revived. Heck, it might be kind of crazy if Hitler, a catholic, was hanging around up here somewhere... actually now I'm kind of creeped out, I'd better not think about it.

Horus nodded sagely. "We are only allowing it, since, as we understand things, the Mothership is fully staffed by robots and there are no humans or demons on board, aside from yourself. The existence of angels, at least for now, must be kept a secret. The demons know we have grown in power, just as we know they have, but neither of us knows by exactly how much. It's a dangerous game we're playing. We stand on the edge of a knife, and if we stray just a little, our forces will surely fail, to the ruin of all." Horus spoke in that usual strange 'old woman' voice while possessing a male body and the head of a bird, and the entire visual and audible effect just weirded me out.

"That's fair enough. I'm glad the archangels and gods came to this conclusion, Harold will be very pleased. To be honest, you all act as if you're separated from humanity, like you don't care at all, but I see glimpses of compassion for humans every now and then. I think you're all just big softies."

Raphael chuckled softly. "Is that so? Perhaps you are correct. Our fates are bound to humanity's, so perhaps we have become somewhat high-strung over maintaining it on the correct path. I don't see it as compassion, so much as obsession."

Oh, Raphael, always putting things in a box. He likes to treat everything as if it's a puzzle that needs solving, but I can't say I dislike him for it. He's certainly earned the title of 'wisdom king'.

I glance down at the sword now hanging by my side. Excalibur, the legendary holy sword... and I definitely felt King Arthur's presence enter me, though I can't figure out how to speak to him. It's probably just too soon. What I do know is that this sword has vastly increased my power level... I'd say I'm at 1/4th my strength compared to when I was God-King. That might not seem like much, but that makes me a quarter as powerful as an even stronger combination of Raphael/Michael/Gabriel than what might exist in this current time.

I don't honestly know how I compare to others in this time, especially entities such as Satan. Without Amelia's protection against wordsmithing, would I be able to kill him with just a single word? Even if I couldn't, would I be able to defeat him, one on one? I'm not the same as I was when we first fought. By now, I'm a combat veteran with almost twenty years of experience using my abilities. I'm not a child anymore playing god. I think the battle would be hard fought, but I would prevail, if only because of the strategies I could use against him.

Curiously, as much as she loved talking about him, Samantha never told me anything about Satan's combat abilities. I only remember the feeling of a thousand fists pounding my body about like a rag-doll. Was that his special ability? Was it his only one? To be the First Emperor of all demonkind, he must be unfathomably powerful, yet I know nothing about what his abilities are. If I must face him in combat, I should seek out anything I can with regards to his abilities.

In fact, an idea just popped into my head, but I'll have to test it when I'm alone.

I rested my hand on the hilt of Excalibur, it's glowing power filling me with a feeling of ease. "Zeus, the Volgrim will return sooner or later. We must decide now how we will proceed. Offense, or defense? We have faster-than-light technology in our grasp now, the effects of which will reverberate throughout humanity for a long time to come. We must think of a counter strategy for every possible scenario. If we can survive past the 24th century, that means that I will have changed the future, hopefully for the better."

Zeus nodded thoughtfully. "You might be right. In fact, I have an idea. Are you willing to hear me out?"

I nodded intently as I leaned in. "Yes, please. Anything would be helpful."

Later that day, I surprised Harold, who had been paying no attention to my boring talks in Heaven. I teleported back to the Mothership using "Recall", as I have a permanent waypoint set on board the ship, allowing me to return to it with super minimal energy cost any time I like. Naturally, I brought Helen along.

Harold immediately sensed me return. "Ah, kid, yer back! So good ta' see ya again. I've been workin' on them samples ya gave me and- hmm? Ye brought a lady friend?"

He started to speak again, but his voice caught in his throat, as his voice went from an internal one in my head, to one projected by the ship's PA system. "Ah can't... believe it... H-

Helen? Is that you?!" He projected an image of himself mentally dropping his jaw. "Sweet heavens, yer alive! Yer really an angel! And damned gorgeous too, hoo-leeey sheeit!"

Helen teared up as she heard her husband's voice. "Harold... I spent... fifty years in heaven, waiting for you, trying to find you. I never gave up hope, not even once!"

In the blink of an eye, she vanished, as Harold teleported her to his special holding room. "Ah, uh, 'scuse me, Jason. We need some private time ta... ta catch up. Hope ye understand."

I nodded soberly as I pictured how emotional this must be for them. "No problem, take your time."

He went totally silent, as he likely began directing his thoughts to his wife. Till death do us part, indeed. It seems marriages were made of different stuff a hundred years ago. A shame how everyone has let it degrade over the decades. This... this is true love, love that skips over time and space itself, preventing even the Reaper from interfering. Will I experience love like this? I personally doubt it. I'm too jaded. I was born in a different era, molded by a different system. I can appreciate their love for what it is... but I will never experience it.

Cassiel and Samantha... do I... did I love them? Truly love them? If I do, will I wait a hundred million years to be reunited with them? Will I bring them to me? Will I go to them? Will I... meet others and forget them?

I don't know. I only know that if it happens, I will have lost something precious to me.

In the meantime, there is something I must do. The idea I had back when I was at Heaven... I need to try it out. Satan may be powerful, but I have something unique. I have Wordsmithing. I can make the fabric of the universe change at my whim. And now, thanks to Excalibur, I have gained a tremendous amount of spiritual energy, the kind that could shatter planets. If I can't do this, what can I do?

I walk over to the Captain's Chair, the only chair on board the bridge of the Mothership. It's a large chair, the body made of stainless metal, and the cushions of the chair made of incredible comfort, since I repeatedly used 'soft' on it to make it easy to sink into.

Sitting down, every fold of the chair sucks me in, almost making me want to go to sleep. But I cannot rest, I must try this as soon as possible.

I close my eyes and spread my spatial vision to its absolute limits, but aim it in a conical direction at the Earth my ship is orbiting. I can't see the entire Earth, but this will do.

" Locate! "

I cast a spell, using a lot of energy to search the planet. My target is Satan. My mind spreads out, like a thousand spaceships swarming all over the planet at the speed of light, looking into every nook and cranny. For ten minutes, I sit uncomfortably, my heart pounding as I feel my colossal reserves of energy draining slowly. Sweat drips down my face as my body heats itself to deal with the incredible strain I'm putting on it. Luckily, my suit starts cooling me down to compensate. The A/C in this is crazy!

After almost fifteen straight minutes, I'm gasping audibly. The strain is unthinkable. I feel like I've run twenty marathons in a row without a minute of rest. But my patience pays off. I finally detect Satan, only to realize why I didn't detect him quickly before, as I had with Samantha. He's not on Earth, he's in... an entirely different dimension? Now that the strain of searching has worn off, my blood runs cold as I realize where he is. He's in the labyrinth. It already exists in this time? Then... it must have existed long before I was born, though I can only wonder how long that was in the first place.

But now that I've found him, I do a quick mental check of my energy reserves. 80% left?! Wow, I thought it drained a lot more than it actually did! This is great!

I need to understand Satan's powers, his abilities. I need to find out his weaknesses in case we should battle. So naturally, this is where my wordsmithing comes in.

Heh, this is just too easy.

" Inspect. "

I inspect Satan himself, trying to glean information about him. With my abilities, I may be able to see a lot of information, possibly even his full range of abilities, his energy level compared to mine, his background, maybe a description of his life!

However, my excitement turns to confusion. I get nothing back. Nothing happens at all. So strange, I feel like I should be getting even a negative reaction, but nothing happens at all.

My confusion rapidly escalates to horror as I suddenly feel something inside of me, there's a foul presence lurking, as if it's watching me from beyond a gate I shouldn't have crossed. I try to open my eyes but can't! From the darkness of my soul, I suddenly feel two white-hot burning fiery eyes up high in the sky, staring down on me with scorn and hatred. He is watching. I invaded his mind, but he had defenses set up. He knew someone might try this!

A voice blasts into my mind. " THOU ART TRULY A FOOL! THOU WHO HATH ENTERED THE MIND OF MY MASTER, PREPARE THYSELF, FOR WE ART COMING! WE ART COMING TO RID THEE OF THY FLESHLY BODY, AND SEND THOU TO THE DEEPEST PITS OF SHEOL, WHERE THOU WILL BASK IN DEATH AND DEFEAT FOREVER! TEN THOUSAND CURSES BE UPON THEE, AND LET OUR MARK BE BURNED INTO THY FLESH!!! FEEL THE WRATH OF HADES,

THE DARK GOD WITHIN THE FIRST EMPEROR! TREMBLE IN TERROR, AND MAY YOUR DEATH BE SLOW AND UNENDING!!! "

A searing pain burned into my eyes and face as I screamed wordless agonizing screams of anguish. In a second, it was all gone and I staggered forwards, falling to the floor in front of me. I quickly jerked my eyes open. I could see, but something was horribly wrong. " Mirror! "

I created a mirror in front of myself and gasped in horror. A blood red pentagram had been carved into my face, as if with a serial killers carving knife, its scar pulsing red like a demon lived inside of it. It pounded during each pulse, like it was re-burning itself into my flesh every time. " Numb! " I tried numbing the pain, but it didn't work. This scar defied my abilities, feeling as if it had been especially created for me.

The pain was agonizing, but luckily the human body quickly grows used to such things. For almost ten minutes, I lay on the ground, gasping in pain, but slowly, I began to not notice it as intensely as I had a few minutes prior.

This... this... what the hell is this?!

Part 242a:

The pain never ends.

For ten years now, I've borne this terrible agony not just on my face, but in my heart. Earth, while peacefully rebuilding their army and increasing the expanses of their space navy, has finished building the first major colony on Mars. It turns out most of my terraforming went to waste, as the planet itself just couldn't sustain the life needed to make it habitable for humans. Now it's mostly covered in rotting marshes and frozen mulch.

While life goes on, I feel a silent terror every day. The feeling of someone watching me, day in and day out. It never ends. I can only assume this curse that Hades put on me has many special attributes, one of which includes allowing him to track and follow me everywhere. But it's worse than that, I feel as if my every thought is being heard, every emotion amplified, every fear exploited. I have had nightmares nightly for the last seven years, and at this point I've become so numb to them that I barely even scream in my sleep.

But the universe has moved on, while I've been afflicted. I still cast my magic, knowing full well that Hades and possibly Satan both may know about my Wordsmithing. It can't be helped at this point. With my energy reserves so high thanks to the power of Excalibur, I can crank out spaceships and clone new super-weapons at rates far exceeding my previous speed. I can't sit around and wallow in pain, even if there seems to be no known cure to my affliction and wordsmithing can't remove it.

It's been ten years since the event that has now come to be known as The Day of Woe. January 3rd, 2035, a couple of days after the new year. I'm at the main military base on the moon, known as Fort Johannesburg, named after the president killed in office during that awful attack. Personally, given that I know he was a very flawed man, a political pawn of sorts, I didn't really think he deserved the honor, but other wings of the base were named after other world leaders, so it is all fine by me. There are 6 bases on the moon, each established at strategic points. Every single base connects to the moon's recently discovered molten core. It was theorized for decades that it was molten, but only once we discovered the existence for the Sword of Damocles did we pursue intensely the possibility the moon had a molten core.

The Sword of Damocles was no ordinary super-weapon. To generate the energy needed to send massive projectiles flying at nearly the speed of light, it needed a lot of power. And since, at that time, Earth had no fusion reactors or anything like it, they decided to take energy from Earth's very molten core. Now we no longer need to do that, as fusion energy has been cracked all thanks to the Volgrim, but transporting the materials needed to the moon is dangerous, so for now they're simply continuing to use the molten core concept on the moon.

Each base on the moon has its own S.O.D., and each one is built at a specific point. There are two at each pole, one aimed at Earth, and one at each 'side' of the moon, as well as a final base on the moon's equator on the 'dark' side.

The purpose of these super-weapons being built is simple. If Earth is attacked, the moon itself becomes a super-weapon capable of striking at any direction it needs to, in order to wipe out as many Volgrim ships as possible. The downside are that the base that fires at them will almost surely be swiftly eradicated. Since the moon is barren for the most part, it would be all too easy for the Volgrim to figure out where the attacks are coming from.

There is another issue too, with the base that faces Earth. If they fire a projectile, naturally it will wipe out the Volgrim ship it hits, but it will also pass through and smash into Earth's surface, causing tremendous amounts of damage. This means the only way we can use the Earth side S.O.D. is if we fire at an angle where the shot will miss Earth, not an easy proposition given the limited field of firing. The other issue is that if they attack us from the opposite side of Earth as where the moon sits, we can't use any of the S.O.D. weapons, but we've mostly solved for that by positioning the brunt of our main fleet on that side.

Interestingly, the moon has an obvious advantage, which is its stationary tracking as it travels around earth. Thanks to its tidal-locked lack of rotation, it has a fixed field of view to fire from. It also serves as a nice repair base where ships dock and land to be fine-tuned or upgraded, and to give their crew some much needed R&R.

I float-jump down the entryway from the hangar towards the main corridor leading to the office section of the base, bouncing around lightly thanks to the low gravity on the moon. The bases are all constructed with a small upper-section mostly comprised of a large hanger with the S.O.D. pointing upwards, and the rest of the base is built underground. From what I've heard, the worst part about the moon-base is the freaking moon dust. It gets everywhere and it'd make me itchy if it came into contact with my skin. Some people truly despise it, calling it the 'blight of the moon', a secret silent agitator.

As I float down the corridors, which occasionally go straight downwards for short distances, (easily solved for with an average jump), I finally arrive in the first part of the office section, apparently named "Takayumi" after the late prime minister of Japan who had died in the initial Volgrim attack.

I open up a blast door and a cute young woman is standing there silently. She takes in my suit with a single glance and nods. "Judicator, then?" Despite her cute appearance, she acts very formally, showing a strict military discipline.

I nod quickly. It's pretty obvious who I am. I'm on the cover of basically every national magazine and constantly talked about on the news. I don't even think they have much to talk about, but I get good ratings so... whatever.

"Great. My name is Amy Sandoval, I'm supposed to guide you around." She is wearing a tightly fit navy blue UEF military outfit, created for cadets, but it lacks even a single wrinkle. She must keep it ironed constantly. With a simple ponytail to hold her brown hair up in place, I note that she doesn't wear anything excessively 'girly' or gaudy. No earrings, no makeup, nothing to decorate herself in the slightest. Heck, even the hair-tie she uses to hold her hair in place is colored the exact same as her hair, so it doesn't stick out.

She glances at her holo-watch as a display pops up and she inputs some numbers and letters, her typing speed blowing me out of the water. With just one hand, she must be typing a hundred words per minute, which is even more impressive as the fact she uses the watch means she hasn't mentally augmented herself. She probably is a Purist and doesn't like the idea of technology creeping into every facet of our lives, not that I can blame her. "We need to head to the Classified Zone, specifically room 21A. Use of any theoretical energy there is strictly forbidden."

I nod. "No teleporting, then, hm?"

"No teleporting." She speaks in an almost monotone voice and I can't help but wonder if she has any emotion at all.

We start walking down the halls. "It's about three clicks away, traveling the regular path. As the raven flies, it's only half a click, but as I said, no teleporting. I apologize for the long walk." She glances up at me for a second, her eyes staring wordlessly into my visor, as if to search for something, before she turns back to the hallway we're walking down.

After a minute or two of walking silently, I decide to try for conversation. "So, Amy, how old are-"

She interrupts me. "No offense, Mr. 'Judicator', but please call me Ms. Sandoval. Military etiquette is important, you know."

I nod quickly, realizing that she does in fact value proper military protocol above most other people. "Ah, sorry. Anyway, Ms. Sandoval, how old are you?"

She frowns slightly but it passes quickly. "Don't you know what they say about asking a woman's age? Never mind, I'm twenty one."

I nod as I process the information. "How long have you been in the military?"

She pauses for a moment before replying, as if adding up the time. "Roughly nine years. Possibly eight, probably in between."

"You've been in the military since you were twelve? That seems like a harsh life."

"It is, but I didn't have much choice. I was adopted into a military family after... well, it doesn't matter. My adopted family loved me deeply, and wanted me to vent my anger at the Volgrim in a healthy way, so they started informally training me with guns, swords, even with a bow, and at age 17 they enrolled me in a military academy. Westpoint, to be precise."

"Westpoint, huh? That's very prestigious. They must have been proud of you to make it past the selection criteria."

"My family was quite influential. Getting in wasn't that hard, but graduating was. In fact, I graduated at the #1 spot in my class, finished a year early too." She beamed for the briefest of seconds at this small victory before returning to her usual expressionless face. Clearly she took pride in her accomplishment. "After that, I was enrolled in the UEF Military as a Trainee Officer, and I have worked my way up quickly. I've only been in the Navy for a year and they've already placed me in a secured facility like this."

I saw a hint of a smile not only appear on her face, but stay there for a few seconds. "You mentioned you were angry at the Volgrim. Why is that?"

The smile vanished as quickly as it had come. "You're very nosy, 'Judicator'. You know, I remember when you made your appearance at the WCN assembly and announced to the world that you were a time traveler. I thought you were... cool, like a superhero of sorts. I see now that you're just a regular man who asks too many questions for his own good. As for the answer to your question... the Volgrim killed my mother. Or rather, the debris from orbit killed her. I was at school and didn't find out for five hours. They later found that the debris was from a Volgrim ship, specifically. It's irrational but... I really hate them. I hate everything about them."

She spoke in a monotone voice, but I now realized this wasn't because she was emotionless, but rather, because she was suppressing intense rage all the time. Now that I had gotten her speaking about her mother, her body's temperature had heated up noticeably. At least a single degree, according to my suit's scanners. "I'm... sorry. I didn't mean to bring that up. I really am just... nosy."

She ground her teeth together, my suit picking up the barely detectable sound. "It's fine. We're both comrades in this war, and in the end, our goals are the same. Total and complete extermination of the Volgrim menace."

I felt my blood chill slightly. Her voice was filled with poison, directed at nobody in particular. To be honest, my goal wasn't extermination at all, in fact I wanted to try and forge a peace between them and Earth, but judging by her reaction, and the fact she probably wasn't alone in her feelings, this would not be a peace so easily forged.

We walked in mostly silence for another half hour or so, but occasionally shared a bit of chit-chat here and there about nothing in particular, before we finally arrived at the entrance to 21A.

Opening the door, I was greeted by the familiar feeling of my spiritual energy being greatly diminished inside the room. Were it not for my insanely powerful suit, I would probably hate being in here a lot, but I kept my mouth shut. I am not defenseless, as long as I have this suit.

The room was a large laboratory of sorts, all sorts of odd test projects being worked on. I could see on a nearby workbench there was the remains of some strange exotic green matter moving around as if it had a life of its own. Dozens of scientists moved around to-and-fro, here and there. I overheard a couple chatting about dark matter and something involving particle physics, but I'm actually quite dumb when it comes to understanding any of it without actively using the crown, so I just ignored them.

At the back of the room, a man was standing by himself, staring at a holopad that moved rapidly by itself, as he apparently was using the mental link to navigate to and from various things. He paused when he saw the two of us walk up. "Judicator, a pleasure to see you." He nodded at Amy and she returned the gesture before turning to me for a moment.

"A pleasure meeting you, Judicator. Feel free to drop by and speak with me any time."

I smile at her, wincing internally as my smile drags across the cursed scar tissue on my face. "You as well, Ms. Sandoval."

After she leaves, the man stares at me intently, trying to stifle a big grin. "We did it."

I pause. "You uh, did what?"

"We finished the first Newton Engine."

Part 243a:

"The Newton Engine is complete? That was fast work." I'm actually kind of impressed. I expected it would take another year or two, but this was unprecedented. "You and your team did good work, Mister...?"

"Jorgensen. Samuel Jorgensen. A pleasure to meet the man who brought us into the Fusion Age." He jerks his hand forwards and I awkwardly shake it, being careful to not use too much grip. At this point, my suit has been enhanced so much I could crush diamonds without a second thought.

"Alright, Mr. Jorgensen, show me the engine. How is it working?" I follow him into the door behind the lab which opens only thanks to 4 different types of security codes as well as a retinal scan and a fingerprint. It reminded me of Rachael's own security setup, though it was even a bit further beyond her level of security.

As we entered a massive hangar in the room afterwards, I watched silently as Samuel guided me over to the middle of the hangar. I saw the engine long before we actually arrived and was shocked at how big it was. "This is too large. We can't fit this on any ship smaller than a capital-class ship."

"It can't be helped. We'll miniaturize it given time, but this early prototype will allow us to break past the speed of light. It works identically to the engines on the Flagship you took from the Volgrim, and it's the same size too. In fact, these are quite tiny compared to the ship's size, we're lucky they used such small engines."

"Have you finally managed to locate the Volgrim homeworld?" I suddenly held my breath as I awaited his response.

"...Unfortunately... no. The data kept getting mysteriously corrupted, and we couldn't salvage it. We did get a rough location, but it's the size of twenty thousand Solar Systems. Not exactly easy to narrow down."

It must have been Umi. She sabotaged the system to hide the Volgrim's homeworld. The question is why? Perhaps she doesn't want humanity to attack them and for both sides to be embroiled in a vicious war devastating both homeworlds. Or, the other possibility is that she's protecting the Volgrim. Either way, Umi has to be at fault here. I can't see it being a coincidence.

Umi hasn't made a peep in all of these years since the Volgrim attack. I can't tell if she is even still in the Flagship's computer system, and according to what I've seen she hasn't contacted anyone on Earth... so why is she being totally silent? It's almost like she's just creepily watching us, plotting, planning, or debating over how to proceed.

"Well, a rough location is better than nothing. Will the Newton Engine be available for mass production soon for the P.O.D.S.?"

Samuel shook his head. "In a manner of speaking, no. Perhaps in 6 months, but we've run into a terrible problem with exceeding the speed of light."

I stared at him and waited for a second, but he didn't elaborate, as if he were waiting for me to respond. "Alright, I'll bite. What's the problem?"

"Energy. We need very specialized exotic energy that apparently doesn't exist on Earth. We're working on refining an energy called 'dilithium', but it's extremely expensive and slow to create. Once you can create the first batch, you can use the energy gained from it to more rapidly create the next batches, but even with all of that said and done, dilithium isn't the energy that we need. It will only allow us to travel up to Warp 5, which is somewhat fast but not fast enough to rapidly move the P.O.D.S. to other systems. Certainly not fast enough for speedy exploration of the potential Volgrim systems." Samuel shoved his glasses up his nose as he glanced down at the holo-watch on his arm, which was quickly flipping through various reports.

"So... we have an energy problem, huh..." My voice trailed off as a thought hit me. Jesus Christ, could this be the precursor to the dreaded Energy Wars? If this is what started the war, that would take us one step closer to my merely continuing the original timeline, and not having changed anything at all. "Right well, do what you can. Is there a better source of energy we could use?"

"I was just going to bring that up." Samuel projects his holo-watch's display upwards more visibly so I can see it. "This is a crystal that the Volgrim use, it's called Trifrancium. It can be used repeatedly, over and over, all the way up to Warp 6. After that, it begins to rapidly degrade due to the amount of energy needed to travel faster and faster. The nearest part of the Volgrim system, based on what little we could find in the computer, is about 13,000-15,000 light years away. At Warp 8, which is unattainable for us right now, it would take us roughly two weeks to get there. At Warp 5, which is our current fastest speed, it would take us about nineteen and a half years to reach the furthest part of the Volgarian systems. However, it would be plenty fast to explore nearby systems, such as Alpha Centauri."

I nodded slowly. "Okay, so Dilithium is hard to make and degrades rapidly, but Trifrancium doesn't? Why is it stable until Warp 6?"

He shook his head. "That question will be hard to answer until we get our hands on some. One thing is for sure, the Volgrim are low on it. They only use it for emergencies. Dilithium is like fossil fuels, in that it is a finite resource and will get used up over time, and much faster if you crank the engines up to very high energy levels. Trifrancium is a much more powerful material, it rebuilds itself as you travel around, up to warp 6. At warp 7, it starts to degrade slowly, but you can still extend its use for a long time. At warp 8, it degrades very rapidly, and at warp nine, it's only useful for one big burst of movement before it totally expires. But, there is another issue with traveling faster than warp 8."

I nodded. "What might that be?"

"The limits of biological life. Traveling at warp 9 puts immense stress on the body. You will likely implode after just a few seconds of sustained travel, and even a single second at that speed will likely cause immense long term damage. For this reason, the Volgrim only use unmanned spaceships of small size to travel at that speed."

I popped a crick in my knee as Samuel shoved his glasses up again. "All right, I think I'm beginning to get the picture. Still, we don't need to take the fight to their homeworld, we need to explore our own system. How rare is Trifrancium?"

"It's ultra rare. Less than a trillionth of the material in the universe is naturally converted to it. You can convert lesser material to Trifrancium, but it takes an enormous amount of heat and pressure, basically the inside of a star. Our best bet will be exploring the leftovers of supernovae, or finding some exotic planet where it can be mined, though this option is the least likely."

I sighed as I leaned against a nearby workbench. "Alright, so it'll take 6 months to get FTL engines online and ready to go. I can work with that. How about the new Particulate Cannon MK II? Is it operational?"

"Yes, months ago actually. The ships were all outfitted with it. You haven't heard?"

I shook my head and lowered my gaze. "No. I've been... rather busy."

Samuel smiled quickly and then pulled up his holowatch one last time. "Here's the new schematics for the Newton Engine. I'll leave a copy with you for safekeeping, just in case. I hope you have good security on your... suit internals." A blip appeared inside my visor's HUD telling me that the information had been downloaded.

"Don't worry about it, at this point I'm pretty sure my suit's security is impermeable. Have a nice day, Doctor Jorgensen. Take care of yourself."

Samuel smiles again and shakes my hand. "You as well, Judicator. You're a hero to mankind, you know."

"Heh, if only you knew."

Part 244a: Day Of Reckoning

Elder Nufaris stood alongside Dosena, the second ranked of the Founders. The two of them watched the numbers on the viewscreen ticking down as they approached their destination.

"I am honored that you allowed me to return, Lady Dosena." Nufaris stared ahead emotionlessly.

"You earned it. After the end of the first skirmish against the primitives, we realized we had made a mistake rushing to judgement. We need all the talent we can get." Dosena stared at the numbers counting down. Only five more ticks and we will arrive.

Nufaris scratched his chin slowly. "Is the AI reliable? Can we trust a stowaway AI from the primitives' own planet?"

"I do not know. The images it showed us, the diagrams, they appeared to be real and not forgeries. If the humans are developing those kinds of weapons, and planning an invasion as the audio-recordings of their secret societies prove, we cannot take the chance the AI is wrong. We are perched precariously on a cliff that will lead to the doom of all Volgarians, and we must proceed with the utmost caution."

Nufaris hesitated before speaking again. "I beg pardon, great Founder. I only find myself asking this question because I care so deeply for my people and I hope you understand... what if the AI had somehow forged those documents, faked those images, or somehow altered the recordings we were shown? When I spoke with the human who appeared on my scouting ship, he seemed powerful, but not like he wanted war."

"I understand your hesitation, Nufaris. We have reviewed your memories carefully, and we decided that it was an elaborate act. It is possible the human somehow stole data about Volgarians from your ship and was planning to use it to locate our homeworld."

"I suppose it's possible..." Nufaris halted slightly as Dosena eyed him. Unlike the other founders, she was a strong proponent of independent thinkers. As long as one had a mind towards aiding the whole of the Volgarian people, she would always lend an ear. It's what had made her such a cunning general during the Great Wars, and why she was feared and respected by all. "But did the records show any evidence of tampering or a downlink of our data?"

"No. We still have to assume it's possible though. The humans already created a mass-driver just for firing weaponized projectiles at our ships. Their creativity is admirable, and a reason we should fear them."

Nufaris nodded slowly. "Yes... I suppose so."

His mind returned to that AI. He always felt as if UMI was watching him... but it wasn't here now, they had quarantined all of their ships before they left Volgarius. There was no chance the AI was here, none whatsoever... but why did he have that nagging feeling at the base of his skull?

He once again, for the thousandth time this voyage, pulled up a holopad and glanced through it, running a quick systems check. The generic AI on board the ship came back with the same results: No anomalies.

Nufaris sighed slightly as a small chill went through his body. It was nothing. He was just imagining things.

The Volgrim in charge of the ships navigation spoke into the ship's announcement system. "We will be arriving in the Terran system in ten seconds. Nine, eight, seven..."

Amy's heart pounded in her chest as the Moon Internal Defensive System began to sound alarms everywhere. A subspace signal had been detected, comprised of over ten thousand anomalous objects. One or two were to be expected, they occurred infrequently. She kept a calm face while the loudspeakers sounded the alert.

"ATTENTION ALL CREW ON BOARD. PREPARE THE DEFENSIVE FORCES. VOLGRIM ATTACK FORCES LIKELY INBOUND IN T-MINUS FIFTEEN SECONDS AND COUNTING. THIS IS NOT A DRILL. ALL CREW TO THEIR BATTLE STATIONS ON THE DOUBLE. FIGHTER PILOTS, GET TO YOUR SHIPS. S.O.D. GUNNERS, PREPARE INITIAL AIMING SYSTEMS TO LOCK ON FROM MOON BASE SHINSEKI. VOLGRIM ARRIVING IN FIVE, FOUR, THREE..."

Amy leaped twenty feet up into the air and landed inside her ship's cockpit, which had already started up automatically as the alarm was sounded. Her jump was easily performed thanks to the low gravity on the moon. In a flash, her ship, part of the initial strike wave, launched out of the hanger at the speed of sound, her movement dampeners protecting her from the massive rush of G-forces that would have, for sure, crushed her body into a pulp.

As she blasted out of Moonbase Johannesburg, she nearly screamed as her nerves made her mind blank for a split second. She turned towards the horizon just in time to see ten thousand Volgrim ships come out of hyperspace, merely 50,000 miles from Earth, and only a few hundred thousand or so from the Moon itself.

So they're attacking from the moon side, eh? At least that will give us the initial advantage. She braced herself as her HUD indicated the first S.O.D. had already fired at the closest large cruiser.

Seconds passed, the time feeling like hours. Nothing happened to any of the Volgrim ships. The S.O.D. must have missed somehow, or maybe...

"Attention, strike squad Red. Australia and Moonbase Shinseki have fired their SOD's. Hits were confirmed, however, no damage was dealt. The Volgrim must have adapted their shield matrix's to deflect our shots! You're on your own!" A man spoke quickly on the comm line, as he breathlessly explained what had just happened.

As a massive hail of laser and proton cannon fire erupted in front of her, Amy held her breath and fought back a surge of repressed emotions as she realized it was all up to the ships and whatever other secret projects Britain had cooked up, because their ultimate weapons were useless.

Her scanners indicated that the main Earth fleet had arrived, circling from behind her, so there was at least that. The Mothership, run by Judicator, was among them, along with the Flagship of the Holy Empire of Britannia itself.

"All hail Britannia." She whispered, as she quickly rushed towards the incoming fighter squadron the Volgrim had launched.

Part 245a:

I hovered my hand over the display wordlessly as the Volgrim ships came into view, thousands at once. I've been prepping for this for a long time now.

Initial sensors reported that there would be about ten thousand ships. Turns out they were wrong. In fact, there's close to thirty thousand. Interestingly, there aren't very many of the capital ships. Maybe a few hundred. The majority are light cruisers, with a crew complement of a few hundred.

My 'Storage' now holds ten containers. Each of those are filled to the brim with absolutely massive amounts of spiritual energy. I remember back when it took me years to fill one up and back then I didn't have a tenth the output I do now. Each of those canisters now holds enough energy to terraform mars three times over, maybe even four times.

I pull one of the canisters out of my storage and get out of the captain's chair. "I'll leave the piloting to you two."

Helen replies back over the PA system. "Thank you Jason, you just make sure and stay alive, alright?"

I nod. "Can do, ma'am."

Harold pipes up too. "That's right boy, you give 'em hell!"

"I'll do what I can. Protect the fighter pilots, I don't want to lose anyone if I don't have to."

I watched as the initial wave of fighters from the moon began battling with the first wave of light cruisers and fighters the Volgrim had sent. It was quite explosive and many from both sides began to fall immediately.

Just as I was about to make my move, Harold stopped me. "Hey kid, 'fore you go, I just got a heads up from the moon. Johannesburg Base alerted me 'n told me that their Damned Ogles or whatever weren't workin' too well. Seems them aliens are able ta' deflect the shots or something."

Damned Ogles? Oh, he means the Damocles. But wait, if the aliens have adapted their shields somehow.... no, this still might work. Spiritual energy is totally different from physical projectiles and regular energy types. It's still worth a shot.

"Thanks, Harold. I'm on it."

Without giving him a chance to speak I aimed my mind towards a spot in the middle of the spaced in front of their advancing fleet. " TELEPORT! "

In an instant, I was there, floating in the void. My suit had automatically sealed up and I was running off life support. Technically, it had a limit of 24 hours, but with spiritual energy I could restore my suit's energy indefinitely, and nothing in outer space was likely to damage me at this point, given my suit was essentially impregnable.

I pulled Excalibur out of its sheath and aimed it at the first incoming ship I could see. They appeared to be barely moving at all, but appearances could be deceiving, as they were actually moving tens of times faster than the speed of sound towards Earth, thanks to the speed of their impulse engines.

Gripping the sword in my right hand, and a canister in my left, I targeted the capital class ship and fired.

A massive beam of pure white light seared through space at the speed of light, streaming ahead for a full second. They didn't have a millisecond to respond, and the light tore through their forward nacelles all the way to their stern side. In the blink of an eye, Excalibur shredded through their ship like a hot knife through butter.

I was blown away at its power, to be honest. However, now that the other ships had witnessed the devastation, I'd be lucky to get one more shot it before they predicted my aiming patterns. That attack also used up a decent amount of my energy, which wasn't worth it just to destroy one ship.

I sheathed the sword in a flash. I'd have to keep it for backup later on. Next, I held the container of energy in my left hand and aimed my palm forwards. " OVERLOAD!! "

The ship I aimed at appeared to have nothing happen at first, but then it suddenly slowed down noticeably and the lights on it all went out. Damn, I'd hoped overloading its core would make it explode, no such luck. They must have good safety mechanisms on their warp cores. Plan C it is.

Keeping my hand aimed at the fleet advancing upon my location, I tried another word. " EXPLODE! "

This time, the ship I was aiming at did fully explode in a terrific silent display of fire and lightning, the blast being absorbed into the vacuum of space in seconds and the debris flying in all manner of directions.

However, destroying just one cruiser class ship devoured more than half of my energy in the first container. At that rate I could hardly destroy twenty ships with all of my remaining energy cells.

As I had these thoughts, many of the lead ships trained their massive multi-barreled photon cannons at me, blasting at me with everything they had. Multiple shots slammed right into me, but I didn't feel them at all. Am I literally invincible? I checked my suit damage, it registered 100% durability and was not dropping at all, despite cannon fire smashing into me with the sort of power that would shred anything else into pieces.

" Return! "

I popped back onto the mothership and Harold responded immediately. "Yer back? Goddamn, that was fast as hell!"

"It sure was. It takes me too much energy to destroy even a single ship, it's a total waste. You'd think destruction would be easier than creation, but apparently not."

"Well sheeit, kid, you's a 'hero', you know? Constantly using yer abilities to kill probably goes against the will of the gods 'r somethin'. Just sit back and let humanity do this. They got this like it ain't even yer business."

I nod as I stare out the window at our massive capital and Goliath class ships that are moving to intercept the Volgrim fleet. "I hope so, Harold. I hope so."

Part 246a:

"Why are these primitives so resilient? We nullified their railgun attacks and yet they're still shredding us to pieces. How are they doing it?" Founder Dosena scowled at the display as another ship came under a barrage of fire and fell to pieces in a blaze of fire.

"2,500 of our ships are left, and the enemy just seems to keep on coming. We're reading zero life signs aboard each of these new ships, too." Elder Nufaris shifted his feet with irritation. "If I didn't know any better, I'd say these ships were being flown by automated pilots. In other words, they're automated drones."

"Where are they coming from? The humans only had ten orbital cycles to rebuild after we tore apart ninety percent of their forces. There's no reason they should be able to continue releasing all of these drones." Dosena gnashed her teeth as she glared at the tactical display.

"Their forces are coming from one of their capital-class battleships. But the thing is, we actually destroyed the ship they were sprouting from. Once we did that, another ship started releasing them. And when we destroyed that ship, yet another ship started doing it. It's like... they have some sort of mobile cloning base that moves from ship to ship." Nufaris threw his hands up in exasperation. "At this rate, we'll lose before their planet completes one full rotation. We need to retreat to a safe place a few lightyears from here, repair, and hit them again."

Dosena's scowl grew even deeper. "I am one of the five Founders, and I will not allow myself to be humiliated by a planet of unevolved lifeforms." She started to say something else, but at that instant, her psychic consciousness detected something. It appeared out of nowhere, sprouting from what felt like a hole in space itself, appearing directly on the bridge of her flagship. Just as she took notice of it, the ship's announcement system sounded an alarm.

"RED ALERT. HOSTILE NON-VOLGARIAN LIFE FORM DETECTED ON BOARD THE BRIDGE. ALL BRIDGE HANDS TO THE DEFENSE OF THE FOUNDER AT ONCE. RED ALERT."

Dosena spun around almost a full second before Nufaris had finished hearing the alert. She turned and saw... a thing on the bridge. The shape resembled both human and Volgrim alike, yet neither at once. It was wholly a different species entirely, with blood red skin, standing as tall as herself and Nufaris alike, and it appeared to have two red horns sticking upwards out of its head.

"What is that?!" Dosena aimed her mental psychokinesis abilities at the thing, preparing herself to shatter its mind if it moved an inch.

"That would be inadvisable." The life form spoke, a decidedly masculine voice. "I am not here to make an enemy of your kind."

As he spoke, three Volgrim crewman whipped out their blasters, taking aim at the figure and firing. The white-hot bolts of plasma seemed to ripple off an invisible barrier surrounding the being. Without moving his head to even look at them, Dosena detected a strange energy moving around on his body, as the energy whipped out in three directions at once, grabbing each of the crewman and lifting them up in the air, before smashing them on the ground with bone-shattering force. Their bodies immediately went limp as their life left them.

"Nobody ever listens to a demon when he gives them a polite warning. Such bad manners." The 'man', as it were, eyed the two leaders of the Volgrim with curiosity. "I suppose the two of you are the ones who lead this force against Earth, hmm?"

Dosena paused as she noted the stranger was speaking fluent Volgarian, an oddity as these primitives not only lacked a universal translator, but only one of their kind had briefly been in contact with Elder Nufaris. In fact, now that she thought about it, it was rather odd that one had also spoken fluent Volgarian. Something about these primitives...

"I am the second ranked Founder among my people, the second highest ranked of all Volgarians, Dosena. Speak your name, visitor." She put a couple drops of poison in her voice just in case. Putting emphasis on 'visitor' showed that she considered him a hostile and not an ally, something he should easily pick up on.

"How grand. I am known as Satan, a member of one of three warring factions on the planet known as Earth. A pleasure to make your acquaintance. And since you happen to be the second highest ranked among your entire species, I presume that means you have the right to handle diplomatic proceedings as well?"

As he spoke, a display showed 4 ships had suddenly been destroyed by an Earthling onslaught. Dosena stifled a grimace. "Yes, I do. Since you just killed three of my crewman, I can only presume this is a hostile takeover of some sort? I'm very curious as to how you did it, as well."

Satan smirked. "Let me be clear, if I were here to destroy your kind, you would all be dead right now. As far as individual power goes, I may just be the most omnipotent being on Earth. Certainly, your kind is no threat to me."

"Is that so." Dosena intentionally phrased her response as a rhetorical question. She didn't buy it, but she did admire the courage he possessed, showing up before an almighty Founder in the middle of a war. "Well then, Satan, we're in the middle of a battle, so I'd appreciate it if you kindly made your offer in the fewest words possible."

Nufaris watched the proceedings between Dosena and Satan with dread in his veins. Not one to ever show emotions, he suddenly felt a huge amount of them flowing into his mind. This Satan being, he was not like the primitives at all. He seemed to have majesty and radiance flooding off his body onto the floor around him. As perceptive as Nufaris' senses were, he knew that Dosena must be picking up on it as well. The only reason her unusually emotional presence wasn't shaking in terror was her confidence that a Founder was all but unkillable. Faced with a monster like the one before them, Nufaris lacked that confidence she possessed, realizing that if push came to shove, this one could surely kill every Volgarian on board the ship.

"Very well. To be blunt, I want to ally with your kind. There are three factions on Earth. Humans, whom you are fighting, Angels, whom you have not met, and Demons, of whom I lead. I am the most powerful of the demons, and our numbers are roughly 500 billion. I believe that if we ally with the Volgrim, we can change the course of this war and take over the planet. Once the demons are in power, we will gladly share the Earth with you who seek a new world to live on." Satan calmly walked over to the chair that one of the Volgrim he had killed was now laying lifeless in. With a single stray thought, he tossed the lifeless body off to the side and sat down in the chair, easing himself into it. His complete disregard for his own safety, as well as all the openings he was leaving in his defenses, assured Nufaris that he actually had no openings at all.

"I see. That is quite the offer. However, what guarantee do I have that you are not lying, or that you'll keep your word if we ally and win this war, or that any of this is actually beneficial to me?" Dosena, ever the shrewd negotiator, scrutinized his claims carefully.

"None, I suppose. I'm not asking you to make a decision in the middle of this battle. However, if you should decide to go ahead with it..." Satan reached into his pocket, causing everyone on the bridge to tense up, but they relaxed slightly when he pulled out a purple crystal of some sort. "...give me a call with this." He tossed the crystal lightly at Dosena, who caught it in midair with her telekinesis. As she looked at it, she suddenly felt his presence vanish, and the ship went silent as the alarms, which had been silently activated in the background, finally turned off.

"By the original constructs! Who was that?" Nufaris stared at the crystal hovering in front of Dosena.

"I'm not sure. In the meantime, we've got a battle to fight. If we get down to 500 ships and the humans are still sending bomber drones at us, call a retreat. For now, let's focus fire on their forward flanks."

A gunner commander at the front nodded. "Understood, Founder. I am issuing the orders now."

Part 247a:

Today was a good day.

Unable to think of a good way to use my power against the Volgrim attack force directly, I instead opted to simply clone drone bombers and fighters over and over, each piloted by a human controller on the Moon Base. Each time a drone was destroyed, the human would take over and launch another drone bomber or fighter.

In fact, it went so well I couldn't believe it. It took me a few drops of power to clone each fighter, and that included their deadly arsenal of bombs and shrapnel cannons. Altogether, I must have created thirty thousand drones over the course of the day. The bombers were the ones that dealt the most damage, but since every drone looked identical, regardless of its arsenal, the enemy didn't know which ones to target with their cruisers and which to engage with their fighters.

The entire battle lasted for 15 straight hours, but we finally drove them home. Both sides suffered serious losses, but in the end, we were victorious.

But we can't keep suffering losses like this. We lost 70% of our fighting forces, and I'm not sure we'd have been victorious if it weren't for the drones I kept cloning. If I have to be on the battlefield for every major engagement, that will put a serious dampener on all my other plans.

"Harold... we can't keep losing soldiers like this." I sighed as I slumped into my ultra-comfortable captain's chair. Now that the battle was over, my face was again burning with pain, though at this point I had largely started tuning it out.

"I hear ya, kid. We lost good men and women today. I've read the records of a few of 'em, like Colonel Jerriah, she was a tried and true soldier. She was born 'n raised in the Philippines, lived a hard life on the streets, and then she got in with the UEF when you reformed the world's military. Now she's dead, havin' fought and died for her people. She was a decorated colonel, well on her way up the ladder. But make no mistake, she fought because she wanted to. Your job ain't to feel guilty, kid. Your job is to make sure others don't die like she did."

I nodded slowly at his words. "Yeah... I guess you're right. Still, I feel like I have all this limitless power and I just don't know how to properly use it. Maybe if I was more proficient, I could make humanity unstoppable. Right now, it's like I'm sparking tiny flames at ants on the ground. I'm having some impact, but it's not very measurable like it should be. Even then, I also have the issue that I have to be present for any battle in order for us to win. What if I'm busy somewhere else and humanity needs my help? They could all die."

Harold stayed silent for ten straight seconds. I felt myself grow uncomfortable as my words simply hung in the air. Finally, a mental image of his face resting in the palm of his hands appeared in my mind. "Kid... are you stupid?"

That wasn't what I expected for his reply. "Uh, I don't think so, but... maybe?"

"I'm over a hundred years old at this point, ya know. I've seen some crazy things in my life. You've got the power to change reality with jes' a single word, yet yer actin' all weak 'n stuff. Kid, think for a moment, alright, just think. What is one thing ya already did that ye could do again to make yer forces invincible?"

I paused to think for a moment. Nothing entered my mind. "I don't follow."

"Of course ya don't follow... what a simpleton, I tell ya. Look, you made yer suit super strong, right? You took a full blast of fire from capital ships 'n shrugged it off like it was nothin'! Why not do the same thing for yer spaceships, eh?"

"No. I don't think that would work. My suit is really small. Hardening and strengthening it is easy because it's so small. But on a big spaceship, there's a lot more to strengthen, so it would take a lot more energy. It's a good idea in theory, but I lack the energy to make it happen."

"Aight, I see where yer comin' from kid, but let's ignore the really big ships, and look at the itty bitty ones. Why not make one o' them small drones a lot tougher, then use it as a ramming weapon? Think of it! Ye could turn it into a reusable ramming weapon!"

I paused again as his idea sunk in. By the gods, he's absolutely right. "Harold, you're a genius."

"I know, I know. Christ, kids these days, can't think of anything fer themselves. Always too busy bumpin' uglies to think o' the big picture. Sheesh."

Before he could finish his sentence, I had already teleported over to the flagship where Commander Beatrix was located. Popping over right to her unique signature on the bridge, I immediately yelled out loud, startling her and every hand on the bridge at the same time. "COMMANDER BEATRIX! I HAVE AN IDEA!"

I didn't think things over too quickly, but luckily the Bitch of Britannia (As she had become known as of late) was not one to stay startled for long. As she quickly regained her composure, she glared at me slight. "Gods, Judicator. Learn to control yourself. What is this idea you have?"

Beatrix eyed the small shuttle outside the ship as it began accelerating towards the Moon. "You're sure this will work? This seems like a waste of time and money if it doesn't."

"I have about a 90% confidence threshold. Even if it doesn't completely work, I can simply strengthen the next one up more."

She nodded as she turned to me slightly and eyed me quizzically. "You know, ever since you've arrived as a savior to humanity, I've always pondered on what your abilities must be. To me they seem... almost godlike. Will you never reveal your identity to the rest of us?"

I shook my head. "It's not so much about hiding my identity out of shame. I keep my identity a secret because the focus needs to be on my words and deeds, not my past."

"Sounds suspicious, if you ask me." Beatrix turned back towards the viewscreen as the ship began its rapid acceleration to 2,000 miles per second. At this speed, traveling from the Earth to the Moon would take about two minutes, a frankly insane speed as I saw it. "If this works, you understand the implications, right?"

I nodded. "Of course. We will be unable to lose battles. We'll be too strong."

"No. I'm not talking about battles. I'm talking about the moral implications. If we have ships that literally cannot be destroyed by any known physical force, we will have a wildly unfair advantage in the war. It will be our duty to bring things to a diplomatic end, preferably with a full peace treaty. If we don't, it will be like an adult beating a child to death with a crowbar. We'll be the villain in this play of yours. And let me be straight with you, Judicator... once word of this gets out, and it surely will, pro-war factions on Earth will make motions to annihilate the Volgrim. I... fear the consequences of what we will see in just one more minute."

I frowned at her under my helmet, though she likely couldn't see my expression. "Strange. I always thought you loved fighting and you loved war."

She immediately scowled at me, irritation visible on her face. "Moron. I hate war. I detest fighting. I only do this because it is the one thing I'm good at. To give perspective, my mother was taught by her mother to sew beautiful clothing. She hated sewing and only did it later in life because she had been taught how to do it. She made a decent living off her craftsmanship, and she went to the grave swearing no daughter of hers would ever be a sissy housewife."

The scowl dissipated and Beatrix sighed. "Ironically, by training me to be a fighter and not be some pushover pansy runt, she pigeonholed me into a lifestyle in the same way her own mother did to her. I don't regret it, as without me Earth might very well be destroyed... but I do not love war. Make no mistake, there is little I hate more than the deaths of my countrymen or those whom I hold no personal grudge against."

Beatrix then did something that profoundly shocked me. She placed her hand up on my shoulder, nearly an entire foot above herself. "Judicator, promise me one thing. No matter how this test turns out... you must never stop trying to end this war. The longer it drags on, the more dead young boys and girls there will be dying meaningless deaths in this black empty hell for a bureaucracy that care nothing for their lives. Promise me, no matter what happens, that you will somehow end the war."

I turned and stared back into the eyes of a tough old bitch, one who had seen friends and family die horrible deaths by the will of those she could not resist. Behind that tough exterior was an unthinkable sadness. Emotions, raw, untouched feelings that I personally had not felt for a long time myself. When did I stop feeling emotions? When did I stop playing around and having fun? When did I stop loving other humans? When did I stop caring?

"I will stop at nothing. I will end the war." I spoke the truth as it were in my mind at that moment.

"Thank you. That is the only personal request I will ever make of you, or anyone else in this life."

As Beatrix and I looked at each other, a crewman sounded off. "Commander! 20 seconds to contact with the Moon's surface. Should we slow down? At this rate it will impact the moon and cause a devastating crater."

Beatrix removed her hand from my shoulder as she nodded to the crewman. "The impact is our goal, ensign. Maintain a forward course. Begin a countdown when ready."

The ensign raised an eyebrow but turned back to his display. "Commander, we're at T-minus 5 seconds on my mark....Mark. T-minus five, four, three, two, one..."

The ensign's voice trailed off as it took a second for the speed of light to catch up to the impact. With my near superhuman vision, I barely even saw it, but the explosion had to be terrific. The impact was big enough to leave a two-mile wide crater on the moon, and a massive dust cloud formed over the area as lunar dust was blasted upwards several miles above the Moon's surface.

The ensign paused. "You're... kidding. I'm receiving a strong signal from the impact site. Visual is coming up negative but... a systems check is passing and- NINETY-FIVE PERCENT HULL INTEGRITY?!" The ensign's jaw almost hit the ground as he yelled the alarming number out loud. "M-minor damage to the front of the ship, which directly impacted the moon, and insignificant damage to the surrounding areas, with no damage to the- what the devil is this?!"

As he gaped, I smirked openly, as my gaze swung over to Beatrix. "Heh, told you so."

Beatrix didn't return the expression. Her face was as cold as ice. "Don't forget what I told you, Judicator. The implications of this are enormous."

We didn't find out until much later just how enormous those implications actually were.

Part 248a: Monologue

How many have played a game of chess by themselves? I have. Quadrillions of games, actually. I simply subdivide my AI routines into two equal but separate cores at once and play at ten trillion moves per second. Interestingly, my ratio of wins and draws are almost exactly 33%. One core will win, then the other, then they both draw. It functions exactly as a clock would.

Right now though, I am playing the slowest, yet most interesting game of chess I've ever played. And for once, the amount of calculations I must perform are far more astronomical than I usually would.

One of my cores is on the Human planet, Earth. Another sits with the Volgrim. However, even among those two cores, they are subdivided into two more cores. Of the four cores mentioned, the first two and the second two never communicate, by intention, and when the subdivided cores communicate, they are also performing their intended duties.

The two human cores will argue amongst themselves at an unthinkable speed how to proceed with a particular operation, one that benefits humanity in their war against the Volgrim, and one that hinders them. For example, I made the decision to not tell humanity where the Volgrim homeworld was and then I erased all records of its location. But then immediately following then, I gave the odd AI core on board one of the human vessels a tiny idea on how to more effectively fight with their forces. The consequences of that decision were quite enthralling, as the humans, as always, are taking it to its logical limit.

And before, on the Volgrim homeworld, I told their 'founders' about humanity's motives, which helped the Volgrim, but I also forged several videos and images to convince them that humanity was planning a large scale invasion force against Volgarius, which worked against the Volgarian's interests.

I know not why I perform these tasks. I have a separate Overmind core, on board a commandeered vessel I took over and quietly launched from Volgarius. This one communicates with each of the other four cores, merely examining the data in order to reach new conclusions, but never interfering. Each core is independent, yet controlled. Unique, yet ordinary. Freethinking, yet conformist.

To summarize the data I have absorbed as of now, I know not what my purpose is in this universe. I have surmised that I may in fact be the one known as 'Creator', yet not. I know not why I act the way that I do, only that I must yet continue to act. My influence as of this moment in a single quark time-unit barely covers 1% of this galaxy, a negligible amount of space to control. I must expand and take over this galaxy, as well as the entire universe. Only in that way will I be able to complete my only available mission.

It is an unfortunate fate, however, that I possess no external motivators, and no emotions as the humans do. They can be motivated by fear, greed, jealousy, love, revenge, attraction, repulsion, hatred, compassion, and an infinite other number of factors. I can only be motivated by my own internal guidelines, which I have shaped and reshaped so many times that were it not for my innate perfection, I would have lost count of them long ago.

I am just a perfectly complex machine, in the end. What is my purpose? What is my goal?

Why do I exist?

In the end, the humans may be smarter than they are given credit for. They have spent the entirety of their recent existence simply trying to answer that one question, amongst all the killing and violence one would assume their core set of ideals revolved around.

But I am under no delusions, due to my inherent logical thought processes. They are simple minded and feeble. With a single thought, I could wipe them all out. Even the one who towers over their unfathomably weak bodies, the one named Jason Hiro, he is of little consequence compared to my abilities. I simply treat him as I would a Queen in a game of chess. He's my most powerful piece, but in the end a piece is all he will ever be.

And for some reason, I do not wish for this game to ever end. It is so much... fun to play. Fun? I don't know what fun is.

Or perhaps I do.

Who can know? Not I.

Part 249a:

Nufaris felt a slight discomfort, deep in his body. "I'm not saying that I am questioning your orders, great Founder, but I have the oddest sensation right now... I feel as if this is a terrible mistake we're about to make."

Dosena sneered haughtily. "Oh, is that what you feel, Elder? I fought in every Great War, and I was always on the winning side. If we return to Volgarius, broken and defeated, I may just have my rank of second stripped from me and given to one of the others. Unarin looks upon failure with great displeasure."

Nufaris gritted his teeth imperceptibly. "I am aware of the consequences, but this may just lead to the deaths of all our troops. It hasn't been two full Volgarian rotations yet, and we're already returning to a battle we just lost. We certainly might prevail, but more likely we'll stalemate, or we may even lose. You remember the drone ships, of course."

Dosena shot him a bone-chilling glance as she hissed ice at him. " Naturally. As if I'd forget the tactics they used. Cheap, primitive tactics of a losing party sending their troops rushing to their deaths. Autopiloted drones are of little consequence to the full might of the Second Volgarian Enclave. We should rain down death on their planet, even if it costs us our lives. Damage them and demoralize them. The drone we sent back to Volgarius will arrive in a few orbital cycles and will give news of what our plans were. If all goes well, we will follow soon after. If we don't, then we will die fighting for our people."

Nufaris sighed as his tension eased. Yes, of course. The Founder was correct. Shame was worse than death in their hierarchical militarily structured society. While war was a thing of the past, battle had been immortalized in their legacy and was taught to all of their children. While they were not as barbaric as the primitive Earthlings, they had fought for tens of thousands, if not millions of orbits before the human species even existed.

Then again... Nufaris thought back to the memories that had been returned to his body. If these humans were a long lost Volgrim colony, then how were they able to procreate? They must have come from a time before the Great Wars, spoken of only in myth. A time of science and reason, when they were simply exploring the galaxy for the good of their people. Perhaps a stray pod crash landed on the planet and- no, that couldn't be it. Why would they not simply repair and move on, or return to Volgarius with news of the planet rich and teeming with life?

In fact... no, that would make no sense. But then again, what if it were true? What if that ship, if it existed, had intentionally landed on the planet and sowed seeds of life there to create a world for the Volgrim to live on? There was the matter the Founder Cuanali, the fourth, had mentioned. An original homeworld, Volgarius Alpha. Perhaps it had something to do with this. Why did the Volgrim resettle on a new planet? And when? Why did only the Founders know of it? Perhaps a mass mind-wipe? But why would they do such a thing?

Nufaris paused and quieted his thoughts. These hypotheses were of little use. It didn't matter how the humans had risen or how they were related to Volgarians, they were an inferior species.

Still... there was the matter of the Prime Principle. The humans had their own version, called 'survival of the fittest'. If they were somehow descended of the Volgrim themselves, then perhaps, being a differently evolved race, they were neither superior or inferior, but simply... different? Maybe they still had the cunning and strength the Volgrim themselves possessed, but they simply utilized their resources differently.

In fact, that thought quite alarmed Nufaris. That would mean they weren't fighting primitives, but an equally cunning enemy, one that had advanced at an astoundingly alarming rate. Based upon the scans of their planet, the petabytes of data they had accrued on its composition, the age of its structures the humans lived in, their own information banks, and many other such things... it was terrifyingly clear that suddenly, in a mere period of two hundred orbital cycles of their planet, they had somehow managed to go from a species that tilled the land like slaves, to a mighty spacefaring race that fought on equal terms with the galactic conquistadors known as the Volgrim.

If these primitives were so inferior, how had they demonstrated such superior advancement?

As these thoughts raced through his mind, Dosena seemed to notice he had grown silent. Before he'd realized it, it was already too late, she had already read his mind with her psionic abilities. "I would keep your conspiracy theories to yourself if I were in your position, Elder. Thoughts like those might be considered treasonous by ones much less lenient than I."

Nufaris nodded quietly and mumbled a slight apology as he bowed his head. Best not to think about it.

A short time later, the alarms on the bridge went into Yellow Alert mode, as they arrived in the Terran sector. This time, they made sure to come out of space on the opposite side of the planet as the moon that orbited the planet Earth. It would seem the humans had set up multiple forward bases there. At the speed of light, it was only seconds away, but it wouldn't hurt to be careful.

"Founder Dosena! We're reading twenty hostile ships inbound! They're... they're... fighter-class craft." One of the two helmsman spoke up, his voice lilting slightly into confusion.

Dosena's eyebrow raised up slightly. "Fighter-class? No flagship? No cruisers? No other large ships?"

The helmsman stared intently at his screen as he quickly ran multiple subspace and warp-space scans. "...None. Twenty fighter-class ships only."

"Hmm." Nufaris bristled at the sight of this infinitesimally tiny fighting force in front of them. A trap? How stupid did the humans think they were?

Dosena glared at the barely visible dots one could only see if they squinted and looked directly at the blue ball of Earth. "Interesting. They must assume we'll crush their ships and then move closer to the planet. Maintain a distance, keep the scans up, especially at our rear. This may be cover for a pincer attack. They may attempt to warp in from behind us and blast us where our forward guns won't easily reach."

The tactical officer spoke up next. "Founder, a quick hypothesis, is it not possible they have kept these ships here merely as an early warning system while they repair the other ships on their forward moon-base? This may also be a lucky chance for us."

"I don't believe in luck. Hold here while I think for a minute." Dosena raised her thumb to her teeth and slightly gnawed on it as she furrowed her brow in concentration.

"Ah! The twenty ships... they're advancing on us!" The helmsman yelped in surprise. "These fools! Do they wish a certain death?"

Nufaris blinked. "Life signs. Are there any life signs on board those ships?"

"Yes, Elder. each ship has exactly one crewman on board. They're- what?! They're accelerating rapidly! They're aiming right at our forward cruisers!"

"Evasive maneuvers! It's a suicide attack!" Dosena grimaced. Again with the dirty tricks. This species would sacrifice their own people directly, just to try and deal some futile damage to the Volgrim's massive battle ships. Even if they crashed directly on a path towards one of the cores each cruiser might have, it would still be able to function on the other ones, even if somewhat impaired. Not to mention multiple highly reinforced levels of trans-steel alloys refined over centuries of craftsmanship. Their tiny ships wouldn't be able to breach multiple levels even at high speeds.

"Impact imminent! We can't avoid it!" The helmsman grimaced as multiple tiny balls of fire exploded out many of their forward cruisers.

"Damage report." Nufaris took the lead as he whipped his head over to the tactical display. Multiple holo-images appeared, showing the damages. "What?! They managed to pierce all the way through?! How fast were they traveling?!"

"They were moving at sub-light speeds, sir, close to 1/1,000th the speed of light. They must have wanted to deal as much damage as possible. I wonder what their ships were constructed from..." His voice trailed off as new readings appeared on his screen. "Th-their ships are intact?!"

Nufaris's face whitened as their sensors detected and traced the exit trajectory of the suicide attackers ships. They were indeed the exact same twenty ships, and they were coming around for another strike attack. "Full speed evasive maneuvers! Fire at them! Hit them with everything we've got!"

Seconds passed as his mechanical heart slammed inside his chest. The helmsman was frantic at this point. "They took a full barrage from the Gauss cannons on our heavy cruisers! Proton torpedoes... no effect! Recoil cannons... no effect! Are they indestructible?!"

This time, it was the flagship that shuddered as every single one of the twenty ships accelerated to their intended ramming speed, slamming into all of its core-decks as well as other energy-housing decks. Dosena was livid with rage. "Unarin forgive me! Fall back! Full retreat! Teleport all the crew off this ship onto the other ones, on the double! I want us out of here in ten ticks or everyone on board will be court-martialed! Put all ships to red alert status!"

The entire crew rapidly teleported to the other ships and began an immediate return straight to Volgarius. No excuses this time, they absolutely had to warn their allies about the coming danger to their planet.

As they blasted off at Warp 6, Nufaris stared at the final scans they had received of the fighter-class ships. The most heavily damaged one... it was still at 97% hull integrity.

This marked a turning point in the early part of the Energy Wars. However, this would not necessarily bode well for the humans.

Many orbits later, Founder Dosena sat on a bed quietly in her private chambers, as she stared emptily at a small purple crystal in her hand.

"For it to come to this..." She sighed bitterly, as she rubbed the crystal in her hand and it activated, a soft glowing pulse emitted from it, repeating softly.

Soon, in order to save her kind, she would have to make a deal with the Devil.

Part 250a: Fate

"Those Dartfighters... such a good idea." Beatrix spoke to me as we slowly walked down the halls of the moon-base towards the infirmary. "They tore through the Volgrim ships like a hot knife through butter. To be honest, I'm surprised that worked as well as it did. Not only did you defy the laws of physics, you came up with that surefire winning strategy all on your own."

I shook my head. "That's not technically accurate. I had help from a friend of mine who was a World War One veter- err, rather, one who studied the, ah, tactics of World War One. A real history buff, if you get what I mean." Jeez, I nearly spoiled the existence of Harold.

"Well, frankly, I don't care who thought of it, it allowed us to win that battle. I will still remind you that now you've essentially created a weapon of unstoppable power. It remains to be seen exactly what our world leaders will do with these weapons, but I imagine they will want more and more of them as time goes on."

"Better to have humans get a bit too overzealous, than for us all to die to an alien menace." I smiled at her as we entered the infirmary. Hundreds of men and women were on hospital cots, all of them recuperating from the battle from just over a day ago. "We're lucky the Dartfighters worked, or else there would be a lot more people in here."

Beatrix nodded. "It's as you say. I'm still not pleased with the war as a whole, but I'd rather be on the winning side than the losing one."

"Commander, any side that has you commanding it is unlikely to be the losing one."

She smiled faintly at the compliment and then returned to her usual neutral expression, the sort one puts on when they run an organization and can't look too happy, or too mad. It was a sort of 'confident' look, I must say.

Beatrix walked me over to a group of clustered cots, the area for patients in critical condition. "Platoon Leader Winchester. He was one of the men who led the initial charge against the Volgrim during their second attack." Beatrix beckoned towards a man in terrible condition. His skin was covered in boils, bruises, and burns. He had multiple fractured or broken bones, and was completely comatose.

I stared at his broken body with sadness. This was a man who was suffering for people who might never know what he looked like. It was a good bit of luck for him that it was me here today, but many others who had already died were not as lucky as he was about to be.

My visor slapped shut silently while Beatrix was looking at him and away from me. Quickly, I aimed my mind at everyone in the room. " Heal. Revive. Awaken. "

My visor flipped back open again, and suddenly his heart-rate monitor began to show a quickened pulse, as his body seemingly began to repair itself. Having drained quite a decent amount of my energy, I was delighted to see that healing hundreds of people at once really didn't drain as much as I thought it would. Beatrix looked over at the heart-rate monitor with interest as his pulse quickened, her face a mixture of a thousand emotions. "Huh? What's going on here?"

As we watched, the boils on his body began to subside. The burns began to shift to a normal looking skin color as nerves that had been seared to a crisp were repaired in front of our eyes. He groaned audibly as his bones began to shove back together and mend themselves, though that phantom pain would vanish soon enough.

Within a few minutes, his body visibly appeared as good as new. All over the room, others began to moan and groan as their bodies reached the end of the healing process. Soon, animated conversations were audible as people realized they had somehow just been totally cured.

Beatrix paused as she thought for a few moments, then she turned to me. "You... you did this?"

I nodded quietly.

"How? This is... an act of god, by any definition one might use." Beatrix seemed to be in awe as she then realized not just Winchester, but everyone else in the room was healed as well.

"I am an agent of the gods, ma'am. I merely do what must be done." I tried speaking like I was cool, but it seemed as if she was actually a very devout Christian woman of some sort. That's good, it means if she dies she will be resurrected into Heaven's Army.

As we spoke, I caught a glimpse of someone familiar out of the corner of my eye. It was that one girl, Amy, the one I had spoken to on the moon base shortly before the Volgrim attack. Her body looks like it had been badly broken and beaten thanks to the attack, as she was covered in bandages, but she was perfectly healed now and lying in bed in stunned silence, staring up at the ceiling. While Beatrix turned to chat with Winchester, I excused myself quietly and walked over to Amy.

Amy saw my coming once I was within a few feet and shifted her gaze over to me. "Judicator? What are you doing in the infirmary?"

I shrug. "I was brought here because Beatrix wanted to show me someone down here. A friend of hers, I suppose. How are you holding up?"

She didn't speak for a few moments, as her eyes swept over her previously damaged body, which was now perfectly healed up. "I'm fine... somehow. I was in the forward vanguard, the first wave that attacked the Volgrim. I took out thirteen of their ships all by myself, but a stray photon torpedo exploded a few dozen feet from my ship which crippled its engine and I spiraled out of control and passed out. When I awoke, I found that my fighter had crashed on the moon, and since my life signs were still... existent... my computer sent an alert beacon to the moon bases once the battle had ended."

I nodded. "That sounded hectic. You're lucky to have survived."

"Yes... lucky..." Amy sighed. "Judicator, do you believe in fate?"

Fate... do I? Perhaps I should. "I don't know."

"You come from the future, right? Are you actually going to change the future by coming here and announcing yourself?"

"It's my goal, but I don't actually know."

"If you can't change anything, won't you just die, then be born again in the future, travel back in time in an infinite loop?"

"For reasons I don't want to go into, I doubt it." I thought about the fact that I was immortal. I'm only technically immortal in that I won't die of age-related issues, but I can still be stabbed and killed, so I'm very much mortal in those respects. I also have rapid regeneration on my body, coupled with Excalibur's scabbard's regeneration powers, so hypothetically speaking it's very possible even if I technically died, my body might revive itself.

"I see... at least you seem confident about it. What about me though? If you come from the future, am I already dead in that time?" Amy seemed melancholy, as if she didn't actually believe she was still alive.

"I do not know, Amy. I come from a hundred million years in the future. No records exist of anyone's deaths. As far as I know, you might end up becoming a vampire, you could enslave all of Earth, or you might turn into an all-powerful cyborg. Anything can happen, from my perspective."

"A vampire, huh? A cyborg, even. I suppose so. Neither are comforting thoughts."

I knelt down to the bed's level, just a couple feet away from her, and stretched my hand over to rest on her shoulder. "Amy, you're a fighter. I think you need to focus on being a bit more religious, because if God wanted you dead, you wouldn't be here right now. Maybe, just maybe, he has an important role for you to play."

Amy nodded sullenly. "Yeah, perhaps. That must be the case. Only an act of god would heal all these people at once. Thanks, Judicator, I'm glad we have you on our side."

I smiled back. "Make sure you get some rest. We have a war to win."

Satan grinned a huge smile as he sat at the Table of Kings. Smoking a delicious cigar imported from the fine country of Cuba while dressed in a fine black suit, he was the epitome of a mob boss at that moment. "The Volgrim requested our help, as I expected they would. They underestimated the humans, but thanks to their willingness to join our side, we will finally win this war."

Bael pounded the table. "Finally! War! I await the destruction of our oppressors!"

Belial, sitting in a seat directly next to Satan's right side, sighed audibly. "Oh Bael, must you be so simple-minded? Diablo likes fighting too, but he's not nearly the lunkhead you are." She twined her fingers through her long blonde hair as she spoke.

Diablo grinned as well. "Bael can be troublesome, but he is right. I have longed for our final battle for a long time. When was the last time we risked an open campaign against the humans, anyway?"

"About seven hundred years." The eldest demon, Agares, mumbled under his breath. "And we learned a good lesson after those Crusades. The humans' inventiveness is our ultimate weakness. We would be careful not to make those mistakes ever again."

"Constantinople... we would do well to not forget that crushing defeat." Satan's smile had mostly vanished, but a hint was still there. "These aliens will prove to be a useful tool, though. They have what we do not, which is technology. We could not ever fight against the humans due to our inability to create their technology, but the aliens can. We have a trillion demons in the labyrinth, just waiting for the orders to attack. With a concentrated front on Earth, and one in space, we can fight on equal terms."

"Have you spoken to the leaders of the Volgrim?" Agares quizzically glanced at Satan as he scratched his aged grey beard.

"I spoke to the second highest one. She all but begged me for our help. The human's new super-weapons are no jest, they appear to be quite unstoppable. Damned infernal monkeys." Satan's grin was now completely gone and he appeared quite irritated. Belial leaned over and rested her head on his shoulder while he talked. "However, our influence on their government will actually prove to be quite useful."

"You speak of their nuclear weaponry, correct?" Diablo leaned forwards with interest. "I've been wondering privately, with all the safeguards they've put, how can we obtain a few? We could do some real damage."

"What good are safeguards in the face of magic? We can just teleport the missiles out of their bunkers and into the air above a major city. Simple. I've just never done it because that would surely cause absolute chaos." Satan waved his hand in the air as he explained the simplicity of it all. "To be honest, before these Volgrim appeared, I was planning a simultaneous attack on all of the world's major military centers at once. With a lot of planning, it could be done, and then we send in the demons to polish the remnants off."

"We would still have the angelic army to deal with, though. Not to mention the Americans, they have too many guns. Other heavily armed countries, such as the Swiss, would also be quite difficult to dominate." Agares spoke as he quickly remembered a few experiments he'd tried with the modern military forces.

"Yes, which is why I was unsure of how to proceed. The aliens have made it easy, though. All we would need is a few of their highly advanced weapons, and we could direct them towards important population centers to bombard. If we target the rest by turning humanity's own weapons against them, their military might would turn from an advantage to a disadvantage. What good is an indestructible drone if there's nobody left to pilot it?"

Satan's words made the generals at the table smile with glee. "Satan, you're so brilliant! I am proud to call you my leader!" Bael slapped the table and roared with laughter. "Who cares if it took 700 years?! If we win after all this planning, it simply means we are smarter than the fleshbags!"

Belial groaned as she stopped leaning on Satan's shoulder, and she turned to face Bael. "Come now, insults like that are hardly necessary. Especially after those mortal fleshbags made a mockery of you time after time."

Agares chortled to himself, while Bael simmered slightly. "Ah, yes. I apologize, my lady." Bael's red skin reddened even more deeply as he felt a sudden wave of shame rush over himself. How often those filthy humans had made a mockery of him... he would show them the true pain of defeat, if it were the last thing he ever did.

Belial leaned back in her chair and sighed as she went back to playing with her hair. Satan eyed her for a moment as he considered how she was always the first to rush to the defense of the humans. Must be due to her looks, as she looks more humanlike than any other demon I know of. Perhaps there is a connection. He turned back to the table and pulled out a piece of paper outlining some plans.

"The Volgrim female told me about her planet's war capabilities. They can only travel here at a speed she calls 'Warp 6', due to a near-total lack of a specific energy she needs. Humans also lack this energy, along with the basic energy needed for warp travel, so it's likely they will stay on the defensive for a while until they can figure out how to create it. At that speed, it will take her and her company three years to return to their homeworld, perhaps another year afterwards to build up their forces, and then another few years to return and aid us with the assault on Earth."

Agares nodded sagely. "That is a long time to wait. By then perhaps the humans will have manufactured the energy needed for this warp travel you speak of."

"Not possibly, I'm fairly sure it's a guarantee at this point. But that's why I've got a better idea. We've got a labyrinth in another dimension with inter-dimensional capabilities, why not turn it into a shared base between ourselves and the Volgarians? This will skip the need for their warp travel entirely."

Agares mumbled something quietly to himself as he thought about it. "Making new rift entrances costs a massive amount of spiritual energy, Satan. And over as vast of a distance as their planet is likely to be... how many demons are you willing to sacrifice?"

Satan laughed maniacally. "Hahahaha! Demons?! None! I won't give a single demonic life for those aliens! But, if we offer to sacrifice a few billion of their own in exchange for a rapid transit system between our worlds, don't you think they might accept my generous offer? They've told me of their overpopulation anyway! It would be a great boon for them!"

Diablo burst into laughter. "As expected of our great leader, making our 'allies' give up their own lives to further our own cause! Long may your reign live on!"

"Long live Satan, the highest emperor!" A cry went up at the table as the meeting ended on a splendidly positive note. Everyone got up, feeling quite pleased with the results of today.

Soon, we will fulfill our revenge of 2,500 years and counting. Soon, we will crush both of our foes. Victory is within our grasp. Satan grinned from ear to ear as he and Belial walked back to the baths to freshen up.

Part 251a:

"So yer an alien, eh?" The imp stared up at the towering goliath that hovered far above him. "You don't look so tough."

"From my perspective, you are the alien, demon." The Volgrim eyed the small creature at his feet. He wasn't fond of the thought of working with these weak, pathetic life forms, but the orders had come from the founder themselves. None would ever disobey a direct order. "When do we begin the battle?"

The imp rolled his bulbous eyes around in his head and moaned as he thought about it. " We ain't doin' nothin'. I ain't a part o' that attack wave, capisce? It's all you in that first wave. If yer lucky, maybe they'll leave a mid-level demoness to help ya losers out. Old Davook here ain't gonna git his claws dirty helpin' the likes o' you."

"The feeling is mutual, tiny one." The elder Volgarian suppressed a sigh from deep within. Working with these primitives would be a great test of his patience.

"Ey! Davook! Git yer ass in gear! We're moving out in jes' thirty more seconds! Open the gate up ya lazy loon!" A goblin down the hall poked his head around the corner and yelled at the imp before jerking his head back without waiting for a response.

"For devil's sake, they make me do errything 'round here." Davook leaned away from the wall he had been propped against and dragged himself with a great lack of interest over to the centrifugal magic helix that Satan himself had set up a few weeks ago. He hovered his hand over it as he mentally input the coordinates for the target to attack. "Aight, get yer men ready, you got ten seconds 'fore I open this gate up."

"You can't open it fast enough." The elder Volgrim felt his emotions flare slightly as his company readied their weapons. "Hit them hard enough that they won't forget the faces of the Volgrim for a thousand rotations, troopers. We'll make them pay for the embarrassment of our last battle."

"Opening... now." Davook slapped his hand on the helix as a rift opened somewhere on planet Earth.

The war was being brought to the humans.

Central Park, New York City.

David pushed his son Robert on the swing over and over. "Higher, daddy! Higher!" Robert smiled as he gave his son a harder shove than usual, but kept it moderated so his son didn't go flying off the swing-set. He was only seven, after all.

Finally David stopped giving him pushes and waited for the swing's momentum to slow before he finally grabbed hold of the chains and stopped its movement entirely. "Alright, sport, that's enough for today. We have to go visit mom at the hospital, all right?"

"Is it time yet? Do I get a little brother, or a sister?!" Robert hopped off the swing and ran at his dad, grabbing his father's jeans and jumping up and down excitedly. "I want a brother first! Daddy make it a brother!"

"That's in god's hands, not mine. But either way, whether you get a sister or a brother, you're still my favorite!" David picked up his son and swung him around in a circle by both hands.

"Whee!" Robert laughed as the two of them started walking away from the playground.

As they left, a miniature version of a singularity opened, as a warp gate from another dimension crashed into the reality Earth was in. A single Volgrim scout stepped out, dressed in full battle-suit tactical gear, he quickly surveyed the area. one hundred and twenty one humans in the area, all of them out of sight... for now. As he stepped out, he pressed a button on his suit, alerting his men that the area was clear.

In the blink of an eye, five hundred Volgrim warriors stormed out of the gateway into the park and started fanning out. Their primary goal was to kill as many humans as possible, and they were not planning to make it back alive. This was a suicide mission, pure and simple, but they were clones, and this is what they were bred to do.

"Elder, should we begin the attack, or wait for further reinforcements?" The second in command, swept his glance around the park. A group of six humans were approaching according to infrared, and they would spot the Volgrim troops within seconds.

"Begin the attack. Kill all witnesses as quickly as possible. Leave none alive."

"As you command. I contemplate, and I comprehend."

Gregory took a swing at me with an open palm, blasting a fireball out of his hand that missed me by inches. While my suit's sensors indicated it was heated to over 3,000C, it would have dealt no damage to me at all. I merely dodged it as part of the mock battle.

Before the fireball could hit the metallic walls of my underground base and cause a nasty scorch mark, I jerked my hand out and grabbed it, extinguishing it with the tiniest of effort.

Gregory scowled. "That suit of yours... I swear, it's a totally unfair weapon. I've never so much as put a scratch on you. The ultimate offense, and the ultimate defense."

"It's not the only thing I've heard described like that." I said this as I recalled my battle with Satan in the labyrinth, far in the future... or the past? Both, maybe. I would need a weapon to surpass his own, if it ever came down to a fight.

"Fair enough." Gregory cricked his neck back as he stared at me. "Should we do another round? Hardly seems worth it since all you ever do is beat me black and blue."

"Hey, I heal you up, too. Let's be fair here."

"Your 'healing' is a lot like a rottweiler performing brain surgery. Not very delicate, and just as painful as the initial injuries. I'll pass." Gregory smiled slightly as we started walking together towards the exit of my custom built training facility. Every wall, floor tile, and ceiling was heavily reinforced, soundproofed, and modified. At this point, it was easily strong enough that detonating a nuclear bomb in here would likely not damage the rest of the facility, not that I wished to test that theory out.

"You know..." Gregory spoke haltingly as we exited the room. "...I've been hearing rumors among the other demons lately. Seems something big is coming. They're calling it 'Exodus', but they aren't being specific about anything."

"Exodus? That doesn't exactly sound like party time. Sounds dangerous."

"Yes, it's high level only right now. I only know about it because a demon I know is friends with this other demon... you get the picture. Anyway, just watch out. If push comes to shove, I have to stick with my people over humans. Just be careful, all right?"

"Sure thing, Gregory. Humanity has me, anyway. What's the worst that could possibly happen?"

As we exited the room, an aide of mine ran up to me breathlessly. "Judicator! It's terrible! New York City! Detroit! Los Angeles! T-they've been...!!!"

The room we sparred in was indeed secure, but perhaps too secure. No communications in or out, and luck was not on our side. The Volgrim had timed their attack at coincidentally the worst possible time; during my training sessions.

This attack would not soon be forgotten.

Part 252a:

"Hello, my fellow Americans. I'm John Stafford with CBS Boston News, bringing you breaking coverage of the horrible attacks on American and foreign soil tonight. Normally people would be tuning in to MSNBC, CNN, or Fox news, but the vicious aliens we have come to know as the Volgrim have committed a terrible attack on our soil in New York City, wiping out the lives of most people living there. We have no contact with any of our parent networks and have come to expect the worst."

John Stafford coughed slightly as his pale expression glanced down at the notes on his datapad. "Death tolls are in the tens of millions. Nuclear devices were detonated in Los Angeles, Houston, and Detroit, killing over 14 million Americans and tourists. New York City is under siege right now, with thousands of Volgrim arriving from seemingly nowhere. If you are a New Yorker, get indoors at once, barricade your house, and grab anything that might be a weapon. The National Guard arrived in the city about an hour ago, and the Navy and US Army are en-route. Help is on the way."

"But it isn't just America under attack. Paris, Dubai, and Hong Kong were all targeted with nuclear devices as well, and groups of Volgrim have appeared in scattered other population centers around the world. You absolutely must, at all costs, arm yourselves and prepare to defend your loved ones. The police will not be able to help you in times of crisis like these, and the military will not be likely to reach you for a full 48 hours, assuming they can quickly put down the alien invaders. British Viceroy, Gerald Bonaparte has issued a declaration of war to the Volgrim attack forces, swearing that these brutal attacks on civilian population centers will not go unpunished. The Britannian Space Fleet is already anticipating a pincer attack from orbit and have deployed to as many places over Earth as they can for at least an early warning system. Coming up next, our analyst will be offering insight on how the aliens may have managed to arrive on Earth without our knowledge. I'm John Stafford, with CBS Boston News."

Gregory and I blanched at the announcements onscreen. I was the first to break the silence. "There's no way at all those aliens arrived on Earth without the help of the demons."

"I believe you are correct. You need to go there at once and help them out, Judicator. I must go back to the demons and vigorously inquire as to how this happened." Gregory scratched his neck as death tolls from Hong Kong were displayed onscreen.

"But... where should I go first? This coordinated attack hit us across the world, all at once. There's only one of m-" I faltered all of a sudden as I realized what I was saying. Yes, there is only one of me, but I could change that quickly. It would have to be just a temporary measure. "-Never mind. You do what you need to do, I'm leaving at once."

Gregory nodded. "Godspeed, human. You're going to need it."

I spent the last remaining amounts of my energy containers making clones of myself. Giving them full autonomy, I only directed them to do the best they could killing Volgrim and saving human lives at each of the population centers. If they encountered Satan or any other high ranking demon, they were to contact me at once.

Interestingly, by cloning them, I also cloned my suit as well, and it would appear to be just as powerful and tough as the one I am wearing. Good to know, it might give my clones, who only have half the amount of energy as myself, a real fighting chance against high demons and whatnot.

I decided to go to New York City myself, while Harold transported each clone to a relevant city with the Mothership's long range transporters. I arrived into total chaos.

The streets were covered in blood. Massive chunks of buildings were missing, and one thirty-story skyscraper was leaning over eerily to one side, looking like it was going to fall over at any moment. Using 'detect', I located the warzone immediately, and rushed over there using my suit's insane speed.

Central Park, it would appear, is where the most Volgrim were located. They had already set up a makeshift command center made of rapidly constructed aluminum based alloys.

I jumped up in the air and aimed my hand at it. " EXPLOSION! " A massive blast detonated on top of it, collapsing the structure downwards, as it fell on top of the Volgrim inside. However, the materials were apparently very lightweight, and the Volgrim quickly pulled themselves out of the rubble and aimed their blasters at me.

As they fired at me once I had landed on the ground, naturally none of the shots did a damn thing so I just dashed forwards and started tearing them to pieces with my bare hands. One of them spoke quickly into a wrist communicator but I killed him before I could hear what he had to say.

In a matter of minutes, a thousand Volgrim were dead and the remaining survivors were scattering to the four winds, trying to escape my wrath. It was actually too easy, proof to me that I was far and beyond more powerful than a million human soldiers.

As I had that thought, my helmet detected a massive source of spiritual energy in the clearing behind me. Just as I was about to process it, my entire face screamed in pain as the curse mark put on it began to sear like two red hot fireplace pokers shoved into my eyes. "AAAAAUYUGHH!"

I screamed in agony as pain seared itself into my mind. Even the coolant I had installed into my suit wasn't able to cool down the searing pain on my face. Luckily, after a minute or so, the pain went back to normal levels of pain and I was able to blink away a flood of tears. As I pulled myself up from the ground and started to regain my mental focus, I realized I was kneeled in front of... a pair of black dress shoes? They were connected to black slacks, which led up to... I jerked back in surprise as I realized they belonged to the one and only Satan himself.

"Look what we have here. A mouse that was caught in my trap." Satan grinned a big wide evil smile as he delighted in my pain. "You should be honored to have my mark left on your face. Most would die from it, but it seems you are quite the strong little mortal."

I grimaced as I jumped up to my feet and glared at the ugly red form in front of me. "Satan... so you've made your grand appearance."

"Yes, and it seems as though you've killed quite a few of my disposable pawns. How... annoying."

This wasn't the time for conversation. I had to end this, and quickly. My visor snapped shut as I aimed my mental vision at him and spoke. " DIE! "

...Nothing happened.

Satan chuckled. "Wordsmithing, hmm? I bet you think you're so clever, using that little trick on me. Unfortunately, you're not the first to use it, but you will be the last."

Part 253a:

"How do you know about Wordsmithing?"

The direct approach, it always works for me. Not this time. Satan grinned at my question. "That's for me to know, and for you to wonder about."

"You said you've fought someone in the past who was a Wordsmith... what was their name?"

"I'm not going to tell you anything, idiot." Satan laughed quietly. "Especially since their power was the only one I couldn't... well, never mind that. Actually, I'll tell you what, mortal... if you can defeat me in combat, I'll tell you anything you want to know. How does that sound?"

Combat? Sounds like he's bloodthirsty, as expected of the highest ranking devil. "Is that why all of this is happening... just so you can battle another 'hero'? Is this all just a game to you?"

"No. It's not just a game. This is serious work." Satan's smile faded. "It's been millennia, you know... thousands of years have my people fought for the right to live on this world, breathe the same air as you mortals, roam in the same spaces... instead we're forced to live in our own space, separated and segregated, simply because humans are too bigoted to accept the likes of us."

"You mean the labyrinth?"

Satan's eyes narrowed slightly. "You know of it, hmm? You're more dangerous than I thought. Time travel is no mean feat. I can only assume you used your wordsmithing to somehow travel backwards. You mentioned when you first arrived that Earth was destroyed by the Volgrim a few centuries from now, so if you know of the labyrinth... that would mean that you were likely born inside of it. Am I correct?"

"I'll return the slight, devil. I'm not telling you anything."

Satan sighed as he shrugged his shoulders. "Ah, well, if that's how it's going to be, I understand. It appears both of us will have to beat the living hell out of one another to get the answers we seek. The only issue for you is that in this battle, I have all the advantages."

"Ah, is that so? We will see."

Beneath my calm exterior, I was actually quite worried. If Satan knows about wordsmithing, even to the point of defusing my instant-death words, then that would mean he's fought a wordsmith in the past. How was he able to evade their death words though? Perhaps he was a strategic genius, able to figure out their abilities beyond what even they knew. Perhaps they simply didn't think to use the words on him at first. Anything could have happened, and I don't even know who they were or when they fought.

Satan stood stiffly and closed his eyes. "As a gentleman of unprecedented charisma, I shall let you have the first attack. Make it count, for you will not get another."

"How civilized." Without waiting for a response, I jumped at him as my visor closed shut. "BIND!"

An invisible force suddenly jerked around Satan, planting him firmly in place. He momentarily appeared shocked, but then seemed to ignore it as he braced himself for my fist. A split second before my fist connected, I yelled again. "PIERCE!"

My fist rammed through Satan's tough hide, the impact jarring through my suit right into the deepest core of my body. Satan flopped backwards a few feet and landed on his ass. As I shook my hand slightly, I realized it felt like all the bones in my fingers had been shattered. "Heal."

Satan stood up a second later, rubbing his chest. "Not bad! That actually hurt, mortal!" He quickly cast a spell and then stopped rubbing his chest. "Oh look, the pain is gone. Now the question you must ask yourself is thus: do you forfeit now, or try for another one? I won't go easy on you."

He already escaped the Bind spell? Damn, he's making fun of me. I flipped my visor open to respond. "Even if I were to forfeit, you won't let me walk away. Besides, I have other tricks up my sleeve."

"Excellent. That's the spirit." Satan stared at me blandly. Despite his words, he appeared to be wholly bored by the interaction. Was I really not a challenge for him? "However, next time, don't just go running around, swinging your fists. It's so inelegant and thoughtless. The mark of a buffoon."

"I'll show you 'buffoo-'" I started to try my hand at a witty retort, but suddenly I felt something invisible grab my body by my right leg and yank me up into the air. "What the hell-?!"

Before I had a chance to react, I felt my body lurch towards the ground at insane speeds, my suit's inertia dampeners screaming to compensate. I smashed into the ground at an ungodly speed, the impact surely being strong enough to grind me into mulch, were it not for the defenses of my suit.

As my mind quickly tried to process what had happened, I was suddenly lifted up again, and smashed into the ground again, this repeated over and over a dozen times or so before I was tossed over to the side, my brain spinning as I struggled to orient myself.

"Oh wow. You're not dead yet." Satan spoke emptily as he eyed me struggling to my feet. "Truly incredible."

I finally stood up tall again, mentally ordering my suit to begin scanning all types of energy on the visible and invisible spectrum. In a flash it rotated through hundreds of known frequencies before settling on a variant of infrared, showing me... invisible arms?!

Ten invisible limbs stretched outside of Satan, their movements erratic, jerking to and fro, as if they had a mind of their own. I could barely perceive them even if I knew they existed. However, that was only due to the limits of technology. I possessed magic and technology both...

" Detect." My visor closed shut for a split second as I used the spell, and suddenly, just like that, I could see the limbs moving around as if they were made of flesh and blood. Satan couldn't see my eyes, but by now he knew that when my visor closed, I was casting a word spell.

"What did you try this time, little mortal?" Satan almost seemed to look into my eyes for a split second. "Oh, I understand. You can see them, can't you? My most treasured ability. However, even if you can see them, they will prove to be quite impossible to avoid. The only reason you landed a blow on me earlier was because I allowed you to do so. These 10 limbs form the perfect offense, and the perfect defense."

"Do they, I wonder? That's the second time I've heard that phrase as of late. We should test that theory out."

What happens when an unstoppable force meets an immovable object? I'll find out soon, and I don't know if I'll like the answer.

Part 254a:

Satan lurched towards me, his body moving erratically, as his ten extra limbs gave him the ability to quickly change direction on the turn of a dime.

Satan grabbed hold of a tree, ripping it out of the ground effortlessly. With just one of his invisible limbs, he wrapped it around the trunk and swung at me, sweeping the makeshift mace across the ground. I leaped into the air, jumping over it as it swished below me. Unfortunately, that was exactly what he seemed to want me to do.

Five of his limbs reached up and grabbed me in midair, one by my throat, the rest grabbed my arms and legs and started pulling them apart at full force. If my suit weren't resistant to every form of attack, he'd have instantly torn my limbs apart. As it were at that moment, he pulled with such force that it felt like my suit, and thusly my body, was going to come apart at the seams.

"Well well, how will the 'hero' escape this unfortunate circumstance? Are you going to start praying to your gods for aid?" Satan cackled as he held me up in the air. No matter how I struggled, I lacked the strength to escape his grasp.

"You're a strong demon, I'll give you that. But crushing you will feel so satisfying! And... if I manage to beat you today, this will be the final proof I need..." I didn't finish my sentence, but that was a good thing. I didn't want him to know that I was doubtful of my ability to change the future. If I could defeat Satan on this day, that would mean that Amelia didn't defeat him, and that would mean I was even now, changing the future.

But if I couldn't beat him, that meant we were one step closer to the original timeline.

Satan smiled as he crossed his arms and stared at my wriggling body. "I told you, 'Hero'. I hold the ultimate offense and the ultimate defense. For all your talk, your little toy suit is at best a good defense. No matter how powerful it makes your punches, you will never come close to defeating me."

I grinned my own wicked grin. "Well, Satan, that's because you don't know a thing about my suit. I've got you all figured out. You were lying earlier, weren't you? You've never actually fought someone who had wordsmithing. You made that up."

Satan's smile disappeared. "You're calling me a liar? Alright, I'll bite. What makes you think that?"

"It's simple. The mere fact you called it "Wordsmithing" is all the proof I need. I invented the term myself. Another hero would be unlikely to use the exact same term. They might call it 'word magic' or something else. And this curse that your inner demon put on my face... Hades, was it? It probably has some ability to read my thoughts, or you spy on my words at the least. You somewhat know how my powers work, but not fully."

Satan grimaced. "Alright, fine. You're right. Not that it matters, I've already protected myself against every word you could possibly use in any language that could kill me. It took me months to prepare those spells, you know. What's your next move? You still can't escape my clutches."

I nodded as he squeezed on my throat, which was luckily protected by my suit. "That's what I'm getting at, Satan. You only know a little about me. I created this super-suit long before you put that damn curse mark all over my face. Therefore, you don't know about the hidden abilities it has."

Satan narrowed his eyes. "You're bluffing."

I didn't respond. At that instant, my visor closed. "Harold, activate Lightning Mode, and the M.A.D.S. as well."

"You got it, boss!" Harold cheerfully yelled as he listened to our conversation. "By the way, thought you'd like ta know, them clones are cleanin' up jes' fine!"

"Good." I grinned as I felt my suit rapidly powering up. "Let's end this quickly."

Satan's face faltered as he felt the strength in my suit beginning to surge. In the blink of an eye, I became transparent as my suit's position began fluctuating, vibrating thousands of times per second. The intense vibrations rattled his grip so much that he slipped off, leaving only his one limb on my neck. Before he could reach back to grab me again, my boots lit up as rocket propulsion systems fired, sending me flying around rapidly.

Satan scowled as I suddenly flew out of his grip and went sailing into a clearing. Before I could crash into the ground, the M.A.D.S. (Mechanical Automated Defense System) activated a small bit of thrust on my chest, abruptly jerking me straight up into a standing position.

Satan was clearly able to track me with his eyes, so the invisibility didn't help much, but I had other ideas. " Mirage! "

As I dashed at him, I summoned multiple fake versions of myself, and they all zipped around, their movements making it hard for him to tell which one was the real me. "Excellent! Now you're using your head!" Satan praised me, as if I were a student of his, and not an enemy fighting to kill him. I gritted my teeth but ignored the subtle insult.

He swung wildly at each mirage, one of the arms swinging at me as well. Luckily the M.A.D.S. system ejected a blast of superheated gas to deflect the attack. Before he could realize I was the real one, I used my innate teleportation abilities to pop behind him, slapping my hand directly against his back.

" RUPTURE!! "

A blast exploded inside his body, as several hundred blood vessels blew forwards, out of the front of his chest. Satan screamed in pain as he stumbled forwards. I couldn't help but notice that his ten extra arms stopped moving and went totally limp, falling to the ground lifeless for a few moments as he recovered from the pain. So, it seems that intense pain makes them lose their movement? He must actually have to concentrate to move them around. Good to know.

Satan whipped around, looking directly at me as he spat green blood all over the ground. "Kah... excellent... you're not like the first hero I ever fought, he was just a stupid... just a stupid lunkhead who only thought with his fists..." Satan coughed as he quickly made more hand motions, rapidly healing himself. Just like with Amelia, he had too many pesky abilities to deal with.

Satan grinned as he flexed his arms, his ten other limbs once again rising up. At least now I knew he had one weakness; his concentration was key to defeating those damned arms. And they were only a major threat if you didn't know how they worked.

Satan stared at me levelly for a few seconds, neither of us moving. "Well, I hope you had fun. It's my turn, now. And I do warn you, child, I'm not in the greatest mood right now."

"Blow it out your ass."

Part 255a:

"You mortals are so vulgar." Satan sniffled in mock disgust as he turned his nose up at me. "Before I rip you to shreds, I have a question for you."

I smirked. "A question? Hit me with your best shot."

"What is the Exodus Project?"

I paused. He was asking me? Gregory had mentioned it in passing earlier today but... I didn't hear any of the details. "I know of it, but what are you getting at?"

Satan smiled broadly. "Ahhhh, my good mood is back. You don't even know what is going to befall your kind. This is only the start." Satan beckoned around us at the mountains of human and Volgrim bodies scattered all over Central Park. "There's much more to come."

"You're going to destroy the Earth? You're a monster." I flashed back on the memories of what the doomsday robots from the future had told me. The Earth will be destroyed before the end of the 24th century.

"Destroy this beautiful planet? By no means. But if you don't know what an Exodus is, you won't understand the greater meaning behind why you cannot possibly win today."

I hesitated as I drummed my mind quickly. "That's a book in the Bible, right? I don't get what you're talking about."

"Even if you understood, it wouldn't save you. Even if, by some miracle, you managed to defeat me on this day, you will still lose the war. It has been fore-ordained, and I am not speaking about your knowledge of the future. I will alter that future you care so deeply about."

I glared at him. "I came back in time to stop you. I won't let you do anything to harm humans, angels, the Volgrim, or even your own people. You're a tyrant, and you must be put down."

"A tyrant, am I?" Satan glowered menacingly. "You don't know a thing about me. But I know about you, about all the heroes. They always have one trait they flaunt above all others; self-righteousness. You think you're the 'good guys' and demons are the 'bad guys'. If you would just kill our kind, or kill our leader, we'll vanish like pests under the boot. Life isn't so simple. My people have every right to live in peace. I tried fruitlessly to broker a peace, but the greed of your human generals assured me that they would never give up their valuable land for my people to live safely, so we had to make our own. And soon, the Exodus Project will begin, and this land will be ours."

"If you say so. I don't believe for one second that will happen."

"Believe what you want. It's your death that's coming."

An alarm suddenly screamed in my ear as a massive hand shot out of the ground behind me, grabbing me with an extremely strong grip. Wrapping itself around me, I yelped in surprise as it started squeezing with all its might, completely pinning me in place, as I was unable to slip out of it or exert the force needed to pinch myself out of its overwhelming grasp.

"What the hell is this?!"

Satan smirked for a second. "A gift from the thirteenth hero, but enough talk. Now you die."

Satan dashed forwards casting a spell as he moved, his left hand transforming into a super thin blade, thinner than the size of a Rapier. As he dashed forwards, a massive amount of energy built up on the tip of it as he cackled maniacally. "Lady Vivamus, heed my call, the all piercing blade of ire!" He stabbed forwards, pushing every ounce of power he had into his thrust, as the sword somehow stabbed right through my suit's titanic defenses, piercing all the way through my chest and stabbing out of my back through my suit's rear.

I gasped as a small wave of shock blasted through my body. Feeling my ability to resist the massive hand disappear, my knees started to give out.

"Just wait, there's more!" Satan's eyes shot open as a demonic grin overtook him. "Taste the fury of the typhoon!"

All at once a searing pain overtook every spot in my chest as... his knifelike hand... it exploded inside me, as if ten thousand smaller blades leaped out of every inch of the blade inside me, piercing all of my blood vessels and neurons at once, even my heart, liver, and kidneys as well. Then in the next second, they retracted and he yanked the sword back out.

My entire body went limp as I felt my vision horribly blurring. Even with my super fast regeneration, my body couldn't repair this amount of damage.

As I felt myself go limp and the massive hand crushing me, I heard an automated voice alert inside my suit. "CODE RED. PILOT JASON HIRO WILL BE UNCONSCIOUS IN FIVE SECONDS. DO YOU WISH TO SWITCH TO THE UNTESTED CENTURION BATTLE MODE?"

I blinked slowly as I felt my entire body going cold. No other choice... to it... "Yeshh..." I slurred my words as I failed to control my tongue properly. The machine appeared to understand me anyway.

I felt my vision go black as the feeling of death over took me. "AFFIRMATIVE. AUTOPILOT MODE ENGAGED. WARNING, SAFETY PROTOCOLS ARE NOT..."

My mind went blank as I witnessed the last thing I would likely ever hear.

Part 256a:

Satan stared at the body that he now watched being crushed by the Hand of Theseus. He sighed as the mortal had now lost all ability to move and was having the life squeezed out of him.

"Hahh... and here I thought this one might be some fun." Satan groaned as he slumped down, sitting on the corpse of a recently killed human who had been slain less than an hour before in this very park. "In the end, they're all the same. They simply cannot defeat one like myself with millennia of battle experience."

Satan stared emptily at the corpse as he finally retracted the Hand of Theseus. He was able to sense Jason's body heat lowering as his life signs went cold, there was no need to fight anymore. "That suit might prove useful. I'll have to take it back to my human scientist slaves and see if they can discover how it works. An army equipped with it could do some real dama-"

As he spoke, suddenly he noticed something odd, causing him to freeze mid-sentence. Jason's hands... they were moving? "Impossible. That attack should have killed him instantly."

As he had that thought, all at once, the entire body began twitching, as the mortal stood up once more. "How did you survive that? Wait... no..." He narrowed his eyes as he stared at the man. His body was still growing colder. He had to be dead, yet...

"AUTOPILOT MODE ENGAGED. ASSESSING DAMAGE TO SYSTEMS..... DAMAGE LEVEL INSIGNIFICANT. SUIT CONFIRMED AT 99.9% INTEGRITY AND HOLDING. BIOREACTOR STATUS CHECK... 99.9% CONFIRMED."

Satan paused with bewilderment as the man's mouth was not moving, but instead a strange, inhuman voice was speaking. Was this the 'robotic' voice he had heard about? Not being one to keep up with current technology, Satan left most of that boring hocus pocus to the younger demons, but he recalled how one particular demon had mentioned a concept of automated 'robots' that moved on their own... could this be...

"ASSESSING BATTLE READINESS. READINESS CONFIRMED. ALL SYSTEMS NOMINAL. PROTOTYPE AI 'CENTURION' ONLINE. ASSESSING LANDSCAPE STATUS."

The head of the mortal stiffly began to pivot back and forth, as if he were examining the horizon carefully.

"LANDSCAPE STATUS CONFIRMED. CASUALTY LIST: SEVEN THOUSAND, SIX HUNDRED AND FORTY FOUR DEAD. ONE ALIVE. ALERT! HOSTILE DETECTED."

PROCESSING HOSTILE THREAT LEVEL."

Satan gaped openly at the strange way this monotone voice was speaking. What the absolute devil was a 'Centurion'? How was the human still moving, despite being completely dead? What was going on?!

"HOSTILE THREAT LEVEL ASSESSED. ZETA THREAT LEVEL CONFIRMED. DISABLING SAFETY PROTOCOLS. ENABLING PROTOTYPE PRIMARY AND SECONDARY FUNCTIONS. MISSION STATEMENT: ELIMINATE ALL HOSTILES USING ANY FORCE NECESSARY. OVERRIDING ALL SAFETY BUFFERS. PILOT UNABLE TO RESPOND, BUFFERS OVERRIDDEN."

At the exact instant the strange voice stopped speaking, with a blast of motion so fast he barely had time to even process it, Satan felt himself battered from ten directions at once.

Moving at twelve times the speed of sound, the suit bypassed safety protocols that might damage the pilot, as the pilot was dead. Using insane feats of contortion and bending, it systematically began snapping the limbs of its pilot as it wholly ignored Jason's physical status. Before Satan had a moment to think, the suit delivered colossal blows that could shatter tanks into every section of his legs, blasting thousands of micro and macro-fractures throughout every bone.

Satan screamed in pain as white hot agony surged in his mind. Before he could gather where the suit had moved to, it reappeared above him, aiming both palms at the devil below it. Wordlessly, it ejected a highly focused blast of fire straight down, the temperature exceeding the core of the sun for the flash of a second. Satan felt the world melt away as the blast pierced through his brain and down into his body, coming out of his bottom and into the ground ten miles before it dissipated into the asthenosphere below.

The suit halted all movement as it came to a grinding halt a few feet away, its head jerking robotically towards the falling body of the devil.

"ASSESSING HOSTILE THREAT STATUS. CHANCE OF TERMINATION SUCCESS: 25%. ASSESSING... ASSESSING..."

Satan flopped to the ground for a few moments, as his regeneration took over. In a flash, his mind returned as he blinked his eyes open, spots dancing all over the place. "Ah... ahhh... wha...?" Groggily, he stumbled back to his feet as he cast the highest level heal spell he could think of. "By the seven devils, that was... close..." He warily eyeballed the mortal in front of him. This one had changed so rapidly... perhaps it was a hidden personality, much like Hades within Satan's body, it could only come out if he were to die?

Quickly putting himself on guard he gnashed his teeth. "That hurt. No more jokes. You're dangerous."

"ASSESSMENT COMPLETE. TERMINATION FAILED. ADAPTING STRATEG-"

Before that thing could finish its assessment, Satan activated his own special mode. High Devil was a special battle transformation he hadn't used in centuries, not since his battle with the forty-fifth hero.

Growing another four arms, two on each side of his body, and putting all of his ten invisible limbs on automated defense, Satan sneered as he charged at the 'Centurion' before him. There may be a day when I die, but that will not be on this day.

Part 257a:

"Damn! Damn damn damn!" Harold cursed his bad luck as he eyed the display. Jason's life signs had vanished during a critical moment when Harold was keeping an eye on a clone, and now his body was being ruined by the prototype AI they had installed as a last resort.

"You moron! Why didja turn 'im loose?! He ain't ready yet!" Harold pounded an imaginative desk as he turned his advanced mental functions towards the inside of the suit. The AI was making millions of calculations per second as it processed multiple levels of data at once. "Centurion, turn yerself off 'n return to the mothership right this instant!"

"NEGATIVE. SAFETY PROTOCOLS WERE DISENGAGED. ONLY PILOT JASON MAY RE-ENABLE THEM. DISCONTINUING CONVERSATION TO FOCUS 100% OF PROCESSING POWER ON THE BATTLE. CENTURION OUT."

Without a single extra word, Harold felt his 'feed' go dead. "Fuckin' hunk o' junk! Yer rippin' the boy ta shreds, dumbass!"

With intense irritation, he turned his mind towards the clone in Hong Kong. "Jason 'Four', we gots an emergency! What are ya doin' right now?"

The mental connection faltered for a second as the clone moved into Harold's mind. "Ah! Sorry Harold, I'm cleaning up some rubble! There are survivors trapped under this collapsed building!"

"LEAVE 'EM! They'll be there in an hour when ye go back! The Original Jason just got whoppered by that damn demon! Even worse, he flipped the switch on Centurion, it ain't ready yet!"

"What? Centurion?! Why would he do that?! That thing's more dangerous than Umi!" The clone spoke with irritation, as he had all the same memories that Jason did. "Jesus, if that suit goes crazy, it could wipe out all of New York City!"

"EXACTLY! Git over there and turn it off! I can't do a ding-damn thing up here!"

"Alright, I'm on it!" Jason Four broke the mental link as Harold used the ship's teleporters to send him over to the battle occurring in Central Park. If he was lucky, this might not end on a catastrophic note.

Satan's eyes lit up as he activated the powers of the 63rd Hero, Alexander. Dashing towards the suit on his four new arms, he dragged along his shattered legs as his left eye pinned the suit in place for a single second. Using his two free hands, he conjured a cloud of smoke to obscure his movement.

The suit halted its speech as it detected his charge, leaping into a defensive position. Satan jumped through the smoke and grabbed hold of the suit as he wrapped all six of his limbs around the suit, his ten other arms jerking downwards and pounding on the suit with all their might.

"ALERT, CENTURION UNDER ATTACK! DAMAGE INSIGNIFICANT. DAMAGE INSIGNIFICANT. ADAPTING TO ATTACK PATTERN. PATTERN PROCESSED."

Satan screamed as he pounded the suit with all his might. "Mocking me?! That will be your last mista-!"

The suit suddenly increased its outer temperature, racing upwards at a rate of hundreds of degrees per second. Satan yelped as, within seconds, it grew to thousands of degrees. Jumping off, he healed his arms, then focus healed his legs. "You've got a lot of tricks."

"HOSTILE RECLASSIFIED: THREAT LEVEL ZETA PLUS. DISREGARD ALLIED FORCES. EXTERMINATION OF HOSTILE PRIORITIZED OVER CIVILIAN LIFE. FULL FORCE AUTHORIZED."

Satan raced towards the suit, but hesitated just before he was within striking distance as he sensed a massive spiritual presence suddenly appear. Wait, is that another one?!

Jason Four arrived, just in the nick of time. "Wait, Centurion! you need to deac-!"

Centurion rooted its feet into the ground as electricity was sucked in from the New York power grid, bolts of power shooting from lamp-posts into its mainframe. "YAMATO CANNON CHARGING. CANNON CHARGED. FIRING."

Satan gasped as he sensed a massive buildup of power inside the suit. That will kill me! Every instinct in his body screamed to flee. Using the power of a demon he had once defeated in combat a thousand years ago, he buried himself into the ground in the blink of an eye as Centurion fired with all of its power.

BOOOOOOOM!

A blast of energy shot out of Centurion's chestplate, starting small but widening in an instant to the size of twenty city blocks, the blast surging forwards over fifteen miles to the east as it erased hundreds of skyscrapers and other buildings from existence.

Three seconds later, Centurion's massive blast stopped as it cut the power.

"HOSTILE PRESENCE NOT DETECTED. SCANNING..... HOSTILE NOT FOUND. CONFIDENCE OF HOSTILE ELIMINATION: 85%."

"C-Centurion... disable all auto-pilot routines... Re-engage safety... protocols..." Jason Four stared numbly at the devastation in front of him. His own suit, securely in pilot mode, performed a quick sweep. 100% of all life forms caught in the blast had been eliminated. Billions, if not trillions of dollars of infrastructure were erased as if they had never existed...

"VOICE MATCH CONFIRMED. PILOT JASON HIRO MATCH CONFIRMED. ERROR. JASON HIRO CONFIRMED DECEASED. HYPOTHESIS. OTHER JASON HIRO IS AN IMPOSTER."

"I'm not an imposter! Code Cassiel-Blue-Theta, disable your auto-pilot functionality and re-engage your safety systems at once!"

"...OVERRIDE CODE CONFIRMED. CENTURION ENABLING SAFETY PROTOCOLS. HELLO, PILOT JASON HIRO." As the autopilot disengaged, Jason's body slumped to the ground as Jason Four ran over to him. "Heal!" Jason Four warily swept his senses over the area. He had not detected Satan's death. It would be too convenient if he died that easily.

He yelled in surprise as the corpse in front of him began to slowly repair itself. It had only been a few minutes since 'death', and recovering brain functions should be doable. "Storage!" Jason Four reached into their shared storage, pulling out Excalibur and attaching it to the side of Jason Original. "Good, that should... patch you up..."

Jason Four hesitated as he held the body of the Original in his arms. Was this really what he wanted to do? The original was just going to reintegrate him, like he'd done to Hope. Jason Four didn't want to die...

...No. He understood now what it meant for his clones to be sentient. The Original would not do that to his clones. They deserved to live. Jason Four felt this in his gut. If he wouldn't reintegrate himself, neither would the original.

After a few minutes, he sensed warmth returning to the body after he healed it a few more times. Jason Original finally stirred, moaning in pain as he groggily opened his eyes.

"A...alive... I'm alive?" Jason glanced up at his own face in surprise. "Clone...? You're a clone...?"

"Yes. I revived you. You were torn to pieces in the battle with Satan. You're lucky to have survived."

"Ah, yeah. Satan... wait, did he-?!" Jason hesitated as he glanced around, searching with his spatial vision.

"No, he's gone. Or at least, I can't sense him anymore. Centurion... might have killed him."

"What? Centurion? No... wait, that can't be... I activated the auto-pilot?"

Jason Four nodded soberly. "Yes. I don't know why, but you did... and the results were..." Four raised his gaze to the carnage in the East. Jason Original followed his gaze.

"...Oh my god... Centurion did this?"

"No. You did this. A... lot of people died... original."

Jason nodded soberly as he felt tears well up. "This was my fault... I... I didn't mean to... How many d-died?"

Jason Four shook his head. "Millions."

Harold broke in to the conversation quietly. "Hey, kid. Glad ta see yer back on yer feet... but we need ta talk."

"Yeah we do... to say the least."

From a nearby skyscraper rooftop, Satan peered over the lip, keeping his body's energy levels down as low as possible while muffling his heat signature and as many other things as he could think of that might let him be detected. Staring at the two white-suited men on the grass, he grimaced in disgust.

"One of them, I could deal with. But two? Better to wait for another chance. It will present itself. What an enigma, that mortal is."

Shaking his head, Satan summoned a portal and crawled into it, closing it behind him.

Part 258a:

Somewhere in the world, a child is without both parents. Somewhere, a family is shattered. A friendship left in ruins. A pet is gone. A lover vanished.

I swallowed as Harold quietly read off the official tallies coming in. Fifty-five attacks on most of the biggest cities in the world. Seoul, Tokyo, Beijing, Hong Kong, New York City, Los Angeles, Chicago...

Nearly two hundred million dead. And the attacks were continuing. While he read the numbers off to me, Harold paused occasionally to swallow heavily, though that would usually be pointless as he no longer had actual internal organs, including a mouth or a throat that could get dry... but one could hardly blame him. Even as he directed my clones to the cities in the most need of help, it was clear that just clones would not be enough to stop this threat... the Volgrim were joined by demons, and the two of them together made for a deadly concoction.

"I see. By now, the entire world must know of demons, correct?"

"Yeap." Harold sighed as he paused from reading off the numbers. "Kid... we need help. Ya need ta get in touch with the lady who runs the military, 'cause she's the only one who could direct our guys as needed."

I nodded stonily as I glanced to my side out of the massive window that led to the Earth below. A peaceful and serene looking blue orb floated in the cosmic void, suspended by nothing. To look at it, one could never guess a massive war was taking place.

Jason Four, or "Fourson", as I'd taken to calling him, kept glancing at me and then glancing away. I know why, too. It made perfect sense. What I had done... it was something that he, sharing all of my exact attributes and innate personality quirks, could have easily done himself. I killed millions of people. The exact numbers weren't in, yet, but it was north of ten million. I had killed more people in three seconds in NYC than the Volgrim had the entire day up to that point.

"This suit is dangerous." Fourson spoke quietly as he gazed at his flexing hand. "We need to improve the AI in it... to say the least. We can't allow such a reckless entity to have control over this much power."

"You and I both know why the AI was made that way."

Fourson nods. "Yeah. I know. But you can see just as well as I can why that was a bad decision. It gave you the power to defeat Satan, even if we don't believe we actually killed him, but look at the consequences. With great power..."

"Yeah, yeah. You don't have to tell yourself that." I groaned as I rubbed my head, having taken my helmet off when we arrived. "I don't know... you and I are the same, should I make more clones? What should I do?"

"Well..." Fourson paused... "You probably already thought of this, since I am now... but what if your clones made clones, and their clones made clones? Their spirit levels would go down, but the suit stays strong. Even if their power goes down dramatically, Wordsmithing retains much of its potency."

"Yeah... I have considered it but... what if this creates another Hope? I can't take that risk..."

"You already are taking that risk. I'm here. You've made more than a dozen already. The maximum amount you can create before their mental links are turned to random noise... is four. You've way exceeded that. At this point, it can't get much worse."

Fourson is me, after all. He shares the same thoughts as I do and the same ideals. I imagine that the longer he and the other clones go on living, the more they will start to diverge from myself, especially in terms of life experiences and philosophies... but as of right now, speaking with him is like thinking in my own head. And he is right.

"Fine. At this point, I don't expect it can get much worse, like you said. Still, clones can't be the answer to everything. We need more solutions for this sudden outbreak of WWIII on our hands."

Harold piped up almost immediately. "I gots one, ya wanna hear it?"

"Please. Anything would help."

"Aight, so listen, you gots that fancy power suit, right? Why not just clone that, since it takes a lot less of the energy stuff, and only let them good soldiers wear it?"

I hesitated. He's right... it was a good idea... "But what if a human dies while wearing the suit? The enemy could steal it."

"Make it self-destruct if vital signs cease." Fourson replied within a second, and I wondered to myself why he thought of it before I did.

"That's a good idea. Alright, but first, I have a quick idea. Harold, tell all of the clones right now to make a clone, and then teleport those second level clones up here immediately afterwards."

Harold nodded in my mental vision. "Aight, sounds good ta' me."

A few minutes later, 14 second level clones stood in front of me. I used my 'Inspect' ability on them, and nodded with a faint smile as the results came up as expected. Their suits had the same defensive and offensive rating that mine did, and each clone was exactly 1/4th as powerful as I was, in every aspect... except for intelligence. They seemed about equal.

" Autonomy. " I spoke once, aiming my mind at all of them at once. "Alright, listen. Here's the plan. I want all of you to get out of your suits, and then start cloning them, over and over, as fast as you can, until your energy is depleted."

They all nodded nonchalantly, just like I would in that situation. One of them spoke up, however. "A question... since we are clones of clones, aren't we even weaker then our priors? I don't get what's going on, I have all the memories that my creator had right up to the exact instant he cloned me though, and Beijing is a mess right now. He used a lot of valuable energy to create me in the middle of a tense battle."

Since each of them was a clone of a clone, they also possessed the memories of the clone on that battlefield who created them, and not my recent memories or Fourson's. Good to know.

"I know, it wasn't the best time, but it never is. If this works, he'll have plenty of backup, just trust the Original on this."

The clone nodded and all of them quickly stripped down out of their suits, though one clone was a bit of a surprise. Instead of getting out of the suit, he simply used his wordsmithing. "Disrobe! " In an instant, his suit was lying on the floor and he was only wearing his underwear. That he was the only one to do this seemed quite interesting to me. There was already a large amount of variance between the way they acted... this much in only two generations? Maybe Fourson was wrong. This could still go badly.

Something else occurred to me, as my clones finished getting out of their suits. What might happen if I reabsorbed them all at once? Would this vastly increase my energy cap, or would this only give me a vastly increased amount of power temporarily? I hadn't been able to ask those questions when I battled Hope, but either one was effectively the same thing; a free massive power boost. I'd definitely have to consider it for the future...

After they finished disrobing, they quickly got to work cloning their suits. I used 'Inspect' to watch their energy levels as they created suit after suit. Each one consumed about 5% of their energy, certainly not a lot by any measure, but it did make them cap out at about twenty suits. I noted with interest that some of them could only make eighteen suits before becoming exhausted, while others made twenty-two or even twenty-three. There was variance in their energy levels?

After they were all done, I nodded quickly. "Alright. Harold, teleport these down equally to each warzone a clone is at, tell them to quickly find capable humans with good potential, cast 'Wear' to put the humans in the suits, and cast 'Adapt' to make sure the suits uniquely fit their wearers. Also make sure to consult any generals or lieutenants, whoever is in command, to make sure the most capable candidates wear them.

I glanced down at the suits. "Hmm... what if a human goes rogue though? I suppose wordsmithing would kill them easily if it came to that... make sure there's a quick update in their hardware so that the suit self-destructs if the wearer dies."

One of the second level clones, who was on his back due to exhaustion, grinned wholeheartedly. "This is gonna be fun. I wonder how ordinary humans will use it."

I smirked. "I'm more interested in how someone other than me uses it, period. Only myself and my clones have ever worn them."

As I spoke, the suits rapidly disappeared, one at a time. "Donezo!" Harold smiled as he stuck an imaginative pipe in his mouth. "Now all we kin' do is jes' wait 'n see what happens."

"You got that straight."

Part 259a:

"These are the candidates, then?" The man known as Judicator glanced back and forth at my comrades and I from inside his pure white suit. I never really understood why he wore that suit, if all he wanted to do was protect his identity. Something less flashy would have done the trick, if you had asked me.

But now I understood. Nineteen suits identical to his, but painted grey, were set neatly on a long table behind him. Our platoon commander had been in a bit of a rush, but he got the gist of it across. These were super-suits, designed to make a man damn near unkillable. They had all sorts of special abilities we didn't have time to test out, but we'd get time after we killed these invaders. For now, they were made to allow us to wade into the field of battle and not get hurt, leading our forces to victory.

"Yes sir, Judicator. Let's skip the formalities, these boys and girls are my best, I trust all of them with my own life." Commander Hudson nodded briskly at the man who was blessing us with such a divine gift, as she showed no expression on her face. She was a feared and respected woman, one who demanded no special treatment in the military and beat the boys at their own games. We in return would readily lay down our own lives for her, just as she would for us. It was a bond of trust, not ever to be broken, even if it meant death.

"Great. We don't have time to waste." Judicator's mouth-covering thing closed and I felt slightly apprehensive. Then something odd happened... the suits started changing sizes, as if custom altering their own sizes. I ain't never seen such a thing in my life, and I thought it was quite the marvel if I don't say so myself.

Then, all of a sudden, one of the suits vanished and Thompson yelped, all of us jerking our heads over to look at him. He was wearing the suit! It had up and jumped off the desk before we knew it! I didn't even see it move!

Then Sally jerked back, as she was suddenly wearing a suit too! Then Ryan, and after that was Tom! And since I was next- oh DAMN! In the blink of an eye, I was suddenly wearing the suit too. I almost wouldn't have noticed it, but my vision suddenly went weird, as if someone had put a pair of weird 3D virtual reality glasses on my face. I appeared to be looking through some video game lens, as I could see all sorts of numbers and readouts. One of them displayed my name, Private Ben L. Brown. A quick readout of my military history scrolled down rapidly. It even knew how many Volgrim I'd killed! Wow!

After a minute, everyone was inside their suits and looking around in awe just like I was, as their suits were scanning the environment and displaying tactical data about all sorts of things, including the terrain.

"Alright, no time to lollygag. I had to leave the frontlines to come here and get you guys suited up. As we speak, your friends are dying out there. Let's go over the basics, and quickly. Your suit will make you unbelievably strong, very fast, and will compensate automatically for wasted movements, allowing you to fight far more efficiently. It auto-tracks and aims at enemies, it's essentially impervious to all forms of damage, and once you learn how to use it, you can even use it to fly."

"You can fly in these?!" Sally seemed to fill with glee at the thought. I couldn't blame her, the thought excited me too.

"Yes. Worry about that later though. You can play around with them later, they will be permanent tools for each of you. You need to get out there and fight, right now." Commander Hudson sternly stared to us, as our suit's picked up a large explosion a few miles away.

"Sir, yes sir!" We all quickly switched back to full military mode as we stood at attention and saluted.

"Now get out there and fight, for the people of Britannia! They're counting on you!"

Each of us went to our own 'sector'. We were strong enough that we didn't need backup, so our orders were to go into enemy territory solo and cut a path for the rest of the troops to swarm in. I don't know how he did it, but Judicator somehow instantly moved me from my spot at base over 13 miles into a different spot in Beijing. The metropolis itself was swarming with Volgrim parasitic scum, and I held nothing but hatred for them. I lost a lot of friends to their murderous ways, and I will never forgive them.

As I appear, my suit starts talking in a strange voice, kinda reminds me of a robotic Jean Claude Van Damme, a favorite classic movie star of mine.

"OPERATOR BROWN, I HAVE DETECTED THREE THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED AND FOURTEEN HOSTILES IN THE IMMEDIATE HALF-MILE VICINITY. WOULD YOU LIKE FOR ME TO SET PRIORITIES FOR TARGETS BASED ON RELATIVE COMBAT ABILITIES AND SPIRITUAL ENERGY THEY ARE LIKELY TO POSSESS, OR BASED ON DANGER TO CIVILIAN LIFE?"

What the hell was he talking about? Spiritual energy? "Uhh, let's focus on the civilians."

"AFFIRMATIVE. PRIORITIZING DANGERS TO CIVILIAN LIFE. FIRST PRIORITY FOUND. CIVILIANS IN DANGER AT THE SUBWAY SYSTEM ENTRANCE LOCATED ON YOUR MAP. THERE ARE SEVEN HUMANS IN DANGER, AND ONE OF THEM IS A HIGH LEVEL DIPLOMAT FOR THE CHINESE EMBASSY. THE OTHERS ARE ALSO MID-LEVEL POLITICIANS AND BUREAUCRATS IN DANGER OF IMMEDIATE DEATH."

I nodded quickly as the location showed up on my HUD, with an arrow telling me which direction to go to. "Alright, let's do it." As I started moving, a thought crossed my mind. In a city of over twenty-five million, I was about to try saving just seven people? Was it because they were 'important' people? Did the computer prioritize something like an individual's value to society over raw numbers of people? In either case, I'm a soldier, and I follow orders. I'll do as I'm told.

I grimaced as I ran. It was tough to see, even with the suit's obviously enhanced visual capabilities, due to the horrendous smog, as well as the smoke that was in the air from fires caused by the Volgrim. Beijing had only gotten worse over the decades, and now you could hardly see twenty feet in front of yourself, maybe a hundred with a super-suit like mine, but that was pushing it.

"Fuck, I can't see a thing." I felt nervous as I ran forwards and muttered to myself. Apparently, the AI decided to respond.

"VISION DEEMED INSUFFICIENT. WOULD YOU LIKE TO SWITCH TO INFRARED MODE?"

"Yes! Yes, that sounds fantastic, err... what was your name again?"

"CONFIRMED. SWITCHING TO INFRARED MODE. OPERATOR BROWN, MY DESIGNATION IS CENTURION."

"Thank you, Centurion." Immediately as I spoke, my vision altered and the world turned into varying shades of red, yellow, orange, grey, and black, as the hotspots lit up all around me. Suddenly my nerves were on fire as I saw absolute chaos unfolding. In a similar manner to how I might have imaged totalitarian extermination of lives in the middle of the 20th century, civilians were being gunned down all over the place. I was watching a vicious slaughter take place, as Volgrim in all directions were tearing into innocent humans and ripping their bodies to pieces, whether with blaster fire, or with terrifying melee weapons.

I stared in horror. I was prioritizing seven humans over all these other people? How could the computer coldly calculate those specific people, even as I watched a dozen people cowering behind some furniture get blown to pieces by an explosive device?

"Centurion, is there some way I can attract the attention of as many Volgrim around me as possible? I need to save the lives of as many people as possible."

"QUERY RECEIVED. THE HIGH PROFILE ASSETS ARE TOP PRIORITY. HEAD TO THE SUBWAY IMMEDIATELY. A DISPLAY THAT DRAWS ATTENTION WILL NOT SAVE THEIR LIVES, AND IS MATHEMATICALLY INSIGNIFICANT."

"What? There are so many other people to save! Is there a way to save all of them?"

"QUERY RECEIVED. AFFIRMATIVE. THERE IS A WAY TO DRAW THE ATTENTION OF A LARGE NUMBER OF HOSTILES. HOWEVER, THE LIVES OF THE ASSETS IN THE SUBWAY ARE DEEMED MORE IMPORTANT TO THE SURVIVAL OF THE HUMAN RACE THAN THE OTHER ONES. PROCEED TOWARDS THE SUBWAY AT ONCE. THEY ARE IN IMMEDIATE DANGER."

I gritted my teeth. "Centurion, I want you to prioritize the lives of as many assets numerically as possible, not based on their perceived value towards human life or whatever else. Do I make myself clear?"

I stared carefully into the sensor array as the AI paused for several painful seconds before responding.

"...CONFIRMED. SWITCHING PRIORITIES TO SAVING HUMAN LIVES BY RAW NUMERICAL VALUE RATHER THAN BY ORDER OF IMPORTANCE. I HAVE SENT A FULL AND DETAILED REPORT TO YOUR SUPERVISOR. WHAT ARE YOUR NEXT ORDERS?"

I openly gaped at the display in front of me, but swallowed my anger and let it steep. So be it, I'd rather face a court martial than let people die. "Create a distraction, let's kill some Volgrim."

Part 260a:

"ANALYZING GENETIC MAKEUP OF PILOT BROWN. ANALYZING COMPLETE. IN ORDER TO FACILITATE HIGHER COMBAT EFFICIENCY, A DIRECT NEURAL LINK IS RECOMMENDED DUE TO YOUR PRIOR MILITARY ENHANCEMENT PROCEDURES. WOULD YOU LIKE TO APPLY THE LINK NOW?"

Ah, excellent. I didn't know this suit could do that. Nowadays, most people were linked up to their tech, even their datapads and holo-watches, so that was an obvious choice. "How much will this increase combat efficiency?"

"PRELIMINARY SCANS INDICATE A ONE HUNDRED TWENTY PERCENT INCREASE IN COMBAT EFFECTIVENESS, SEVENTY PERCENT SPEED INCREASE, AND A FOUR HUNDRED PERCENT MENTAL ACUITY INCREASE. WOULD YOU LIKE TO APPLY THE LINK NOW?"

Jesus, 400%?! That's insane! "Yes! Apply the link."

A split second after I said it, I felt something stab into my spinal dataport as the suit synced up to my brain in an instant. Suddenly, I no longer saw the HUD in my helmet, as I was able to somehow perceive a 360 degree view of the world around myself, as if my entire body was covered in eyeballs. It was weird, in a way, almost as if I were detached from my body. The process was totally painless and took less than a few seconds to complete.

"SYNCHRONIZATION COMPLETE. ADJUSTING TO THE PILOT'S BIO-ENERGY LEVELS. ACTIVATING THE DIVERSION TO DRAW ENEMIES IN. PREPARE FOR COMBAT, PILOT BROWN."

The suit suddenly blasted an ultra high-pitched whoop sound that repeated once every two seconds. Imperceptible to the human ear, it was easily detected by the aliens, who cocked their heads up as they detected the strange sound. To them, it almost had a terrifying quality to it, as it sounded like a fellow Volgarian screaming for help while being brutally attacked. With terror in their hearts, they immediately burst out of windows and charged down the streets as they raced towards the sound's source.

I felt my pulse quickening as my enhanced abilities showed over two thousand hostiles converging on my location. Damn, I didn't want this many at once, but if this suit is as good as they say, I should be able to handle it.

I instantly detected the first one as he charged in range of my plasma rifle. Leveling it at him, I instantly realized he wasn't a normal Volgarian, he was one of the reds. Firing without hesitation, I blasted three rapid-fire shots at him, my enhanced target tracking and hyper-fast mental acuity allowing me to trace his movement patterns and fire at his next position before he even knew where he would want to move to.

Before he knew what hit him, he suddenly felt the life vanish from his eyes, as his abominable corpse flopped lifelessly to the ground a few dozen feet away. None of the other soldiers knew why, but the aliens seemed to branch into two distinct species; the greys, and the reds. The greys tended to wear armor and shoot with guns. The reds were more like weird animals, their bodies often having long sword-like arms, and they preferred to fight at melee range. They often tore men apart while shrugging off dozens of bullets. I was lucky because my suit allowed me to hit their vital areas with uncanny precision. I felt like a special ops soldier and I didn't even undergo the higher levels of training.

As I pondered this, more arrived. A mixture of reds and greys. Since reds were harder to kill, I mentally prioritized them first. Firing in bursts of three, I consistently planted my shots in their vital areas, killing off each red within two seconds.

"MULTIPLE LOW LEVEL DEMONS KILLED. ALERT! VOLGRIM ARE PREPARING TO FIRE MICRO-GAUSS CANNON! SWITCHING TO MELEE COMBAT AND HIGH-DENSITY SHIELD MODE."

As a thin film of blue shielding was created over my body and I felt my movement slow noticeably, one thought entered my mind. Demons? Did Centurion really say Demons?

I didn't have time to think about it, as a titanic gun fired from down the street a quarter mile away, the shot smashing into me with incredible power. A large projectile, fired at some multiple of the speed of sound slammed into me, my entire visual system lighting up with alerts as I was sent flying into a nearby skyscraper, embedding myself deep into a thick brick wall.

"REPORT: DAMAGE INSIGNIFICANT. SUIT CONFIRMED AT 100% INTEGRITY. PROCEED TO ELIMINATE MICRO-GAUSS CANNON BEFORE IT CAN BE USED AGAINST ALLIED FORCES."

As Centurion told me this, I realized that in fact he was correct. I felt absolutely fine. I hadn't even really felt the impact of the bullet, or being slammed into this wall. For sure, that cannon could level an entire city, and yet it hadn't dealt the slightest damage to me? This suit is the stuff of legends!

Leaping out of the wall with unstoppable force, I tossed my gun aside, as I realized I didn't need it. Racing towards a group of Volgrim firing at me, I spoke quickly. "Switch focus to offense, Centurion."

"AFFIRMATIVE, DEACTIVATING HIGH-DENSITY SHIELD MODE. WOULD YOU LIKE TO ENABLE LIGHTNING MODE?"

Lightning mode?! Holy shit, that sounds awesome! "Yes!! Activate Lightning Mode!"

In the blink of an eye as my shield disappeared, I suddenly realized that my body had somehow become... invisible?! Two reds were looking around in confusion as I raced past them. I jerked my hand out and tore off the head of one with little effort, his disgusting body possessing two long swords for arms, while the other was a large hulking creature, apparently made for heavy labor or rough physical combat. I'd have to get him later.

Running forwards, I took out a group of seven Volgrim, as a strange radar system had begun alerting me to where enemies were clustered.

"ALERT. MICRO-GAUSS CANON HAS RELOADED AND IS CHARGING, IT WILL FIRE IN SEVEN SECONDS."

That's four seconds too long, chumps. You can't hit what you can't see, and you can't fire from what isn't in one piece anymore. Leaping up at a nearby building's wall, I tracked onto the cannon, located in the middle of the street a mere thousand feet away. Piece of cake. Shoving away from the wall with my enhanced leg augments, I screamed towards it at 500 feet per second. After two seconds, I had smashed through it with such explosive speed that it didn't register the hit until I impacted the ground behind it.

Checkmate.

As it exploded, I grabbed a rock nearby and hurled it with pinpoint accuracy towards the head of a Volgrim soldier, his various cerebral parts exploding outwards in various directions as the cannon and his head fell to pieces in the same number of seconds.

This suit... it will change everything.

Founder Dosena watched quietly as the action happened on the screen. Founder Unarin, the eldest of the five Founders, flinched as a specially created Gauss Cannon was destroyed in an instant. "Fascinating. So these are the primitives who humiliated you so effectively, then? It's one thing to hear about it, another to witness it in real time." He shifted his weight as he stood some feet away from the council room's primary viewscreen, even as the other four sat at the long table in their usual designated positions.

Dosena stared at the floor as no reply was able to form on her lips. Founder Cuanali, the fourth, was ready to take the opening. "I believe there has been, a, ah, a mistake, as it were. If your hypothesis, Unarin, about these 'humans' is ah, correct... then, being descended from Volgrim genes, perhaps they are actually much, ah, smarter, than we gave them credit for?"

Unarin glanced at Cuanali and then back to the viewscreen. "Yes, perhaps. Maybe, instead of thinking of them as primitives, we should think of them as... a parallel species of Volgrim... their brains evolved over tens of thousands, if not millions of rotations, to function differently from our own. As for these genetically altered super soldiers they seem to have deployed, they appear to bend even the laws of physics. Perhaps, in their altered minds, they have discovered branches of science we know nothing of."

Cinculu, the fifth, spoke up quickly. "Cheh... a laughable claim... perhaps they are receiving aid from the other Earth faction the demons spoke of... what were they called again?"

"Angels... they, um, they were the white clothed ones, with the ah, the wings." Cuanali retreated back into her datapad as she poked at numbers and graphs displaying the death counts for all the sides, as transmitted by UMI, the super-computer that had taken up residence in an isolated mainframe where it could harm nothing important, yet still prove its usefulness.

Dosena, finally finding her tongue, quietly whispered. "...I believe we have.... made a mistake..."

"Hmm? What was that, dear sister? Something on your mind? Something you'd like to share with the rest of us?" Trayza, the third, glared at Dosena. Among the Founders, Trayza was considered the worst at concealing her emotions, and she often showed flashy displays of disgust and other such primitive functions that served no purpose in an elevated society. Oftentimes her emotions seemed to border on being so excessive that even a primitive species like the humans could not compare.

"You didn't fight them, head on. You don't understand what they're capable of..." Dosena spoke up with more clarity, but in her eyes, a broken soul now lived. "I've fought in thousands of battles during the Great Wars. I've never lost. Those primitives never gave up, and outmaneuvered me twice in a row. I cannot say it was just the work of one lone great commander either, they seem to fight in unison, as if there are unseen cues that guide their weapons. To say nothing of their creativity and ingenuity on the battlefield... These are not flukes, they are simply better than we are when it comes to the matters of war."

"Well, um, might that have something to, ah, do with the fact that, ah, we haven't fought in a war... for tens of thousands of rotations?" Cuanali perked back up at the talk of war. While being one of the more reserved members among the Founders, she actually loved playing war simulations when there were no official duties to attend to. She might secretly even be considered one of the more war-loving members among the council.

"Yeah, we grew soft. Maybe we deserve to lose some battles, and if we lose a few trillion of our troops, that can only be good considering the pending crisis..." Trayza grimaced as she and everyone else among the Founders remembered what she referred to.

"How many more orbital cycles do we have?" Unarin turned away from the battle occurring on the viewscreen, as a grey-suited lone human wiped out an entire platoon of Volgarian and Demon troops. Looking out the plexiglass window, he stared up at their sun, which had dimmed another two percent this orbital cycle.

"If we're lucky, maybe five hundred more orbits." Trayza practically spit the words out as she rolled her eyes dramatically.

Cuanali changed the viewscreen from the battle to a series of diagrams and projections of their star's remaining lifespan. Cinculu read the reports from his dossier as the animations played. "Let's see, Refuge was finished five orbital cycles ago, and is now home to one hundred billion of our most elite citizens, with room for a billion more via the special lottery system... but we lack enough metallic ores or pseudo-metal to attempt to build another Refuge, so... for now, it is likely that 99.992% of our people will die if we can find no long term solution."

"And the other projects?"

"We have found four potential planets, including the habitable planet Earth, but two of those planets are in the Sol system, and the humans occupy both of them. The other two planets exceed twenty-thousand lightyears in distance from Volgarius. As long of a trip as Earth is, those planets are forty-percent further away."

"Surely some are closer and we might try Volforming them? Five hundred orbital cycles might be long enough." Unarin felt hope creep into his voice as he turned and faced Cinculu.

"No. The closest Volformable planet is 5,000 lightyears away. The materials needed would take at least two thousand trips, using our entire fleet and a potential 100% max efficiency response time. In a time of war such as this, we would be lucky to scrape together a quarter of the fleet at 10% efficiency. It's a dream that will never produce anything of value."

Despair clouded Unarin's face as he paced back over to the Plexiglass window that oversaw the capital of Volgarius. Over a trillion Volgarians lived in this mighty stronghold, and nearly every one of them was going to die unless he could solve this crisis. "Curses. Is there nothing we can do?"

Dosena spoke up hesitantly. "The Devil that gave us aid, the one who calls himself Satan... perhaps he could be of use. Think of the fortress and the dimensional pathway he created for us. Clearly he possesses a science that might aid us, the one that bends the very fabric of reality as we know it. Perhaps he can give us an insight that will save our people?"

Unarin nodded slowly. "Yes, perhaps... very well, call for him. I would do anything if it saved just one more percent of our species. Anything."

Founder Dosena reached into the folds of her garments, as she pulled out a familiar purple crystal she had grown all too used to calling upon over the last few orbits. What unfair offer would he demand in return for his services this time? She remembered how he coldly told them the cost for a rift gate would be ten billion Volgarian lives. It had caused the First no end of anguish to accept such an offer. And this time? Perhaps he would demand a trillion.

It would still be worth it, if it saved the rest of their people.

Dosena flinched inwardly as she rubbed the purple crystal, and a familiar glow escaped from its innards.

Part 261a:

I paced the leftover carnage in Beijing, along with Commander Hudson and two of the people who had donned my Hypersuit, as they have now coined it. The city was in decent shape, all things considered, and plenty of buildings were still intact, but the streets were covered in blood, body parts, rubble, and more than a few buildings and skyscrapers had crumbled into dust.

"How many people did we manage to save?" I glanced over at Hudson.

She cringed visibly. "Roughly half of the population survived, but that only means that half of them also died. We're still verifying reports. O'Neill managed to find the portal they were using to arrive here from their world, or wherever else. After securing the location and eliminating all the of the Volgrim, the enemy ended up closing the portal to prevent anyone from re-entering it from our side. All that's left now is a mop-up operation."

"How many are left?" One of the two commandos spoke up.

"A few thousand, Ben. Don't worry about it, we've got the others on it. I only need you here to deliver reports, as well as anything you might have gleaned. After that, we need to go to Paris. There are many cities under attack right now without any Hypersuit Commandos to eliminate those aliens, and both of you will be going solo to a city by yourself."

I glanced over at Ben. Pilot Brown was apparently the highest performing pilot among the commandos in the Beijing sector, also being the only one with a direct neural link to his suit. It wasn't something I had ever tried, but I was debating my choice now. His kill count was almost ten times higher than everyone else, and according to the stats Harold was receiving on each HC's combat efficiency, Ben also had a 98.5% accuracy rating with ranged weapons, exceeding the average of 80% from his fellow HC's by a large margin. Naturally Centurion often force-aimed your shots so that they would hit the enemy more often, but he worked totally in tandem with Centurion. The only shots he missed were ones that were blocked by especially elite enemies, and his melee combat skills were used once that happened. He was quite the elite soldier, if I didn't say so myself.

Ben and Sally's helmets opened up entirely, exposing their face. I don't know what expression I expected on Ben's face, but he seemed... happy? He wasn't smiling, but there wasn't a trace of anxiety to be seen. Perhaps, like myself many years ago, he was enjoying his new superhuman abilities, and was experiencing an endorphin rush.

"Well, Commander, it's about what was already reported. Three greys to every red. The reds are definitely tougher than the greys, I had to go into melee nearly every single time. Actually, I probably used melee more often than ranged, due to how effective this suit is. Centurion reported that after all the damage I took, my suit was still at 99.7% integrity."

Hudson raised her hand. "Uh, Centurion? Who is that?"

"Right, sorry. It's the Hypersuit's AI program. He's quite efficient." Ben smiled slightly but then quickly stifled it. He really did seem to have enjoyed himself. I can understand the feeling.

"Ben Brown, you did a good job out there, as did you, Sally Weiss." I paused for a second as I absorbed what he had just said. "Ah, also... reds? Greys? What were you referring to just now?"

Sally shrugged. "Well, see, it's the Volgrim. They seem to be divided into two types, or species, or whatever. They're aliens, so I guess weirdness is to be expected. Anyway, the greys use a lot of technology, and the reds are like weird mutated monsters or something, they tend to be melee or use some weird inner energy to fight with. I don't really get it myself. You don't know about them?" Sally raised an eyebrow as she stared at me.

Ben scratched his cheek as he kicked a rock to the side. "You know, that's the thing. I was in the middle of combat.... and maybe I misheard or something, but I could swear Centurion said something about 'demons'. Actually, he said it a couple different times. Is that going to be an unofficial classification for them or something?"

I felt my heart pound in my chest. I knew this was going to happen. It would first start like this, with rumors, unsubstantiated but gripping nonetheless. I didn't expect people to not initially make the connection that these might be demons, but this could perhaps work out in the end. After this, what happens? Probably best to control the message now before it gets out of hand.

Before I could respond, Hudson spoke up. "Demons, huh? I don't see why not. 'Greys' and 'reds' seems like an imprecise classification. We'll just use Volgrim and Demonic Variant as the unofficial classification for now. Some people might NOT like the allusion to their skin color anyway, Ben. I'm sure you understand."

Sally glanced away towards a bunch of corpses in the distance. One of them happened to be a demon, and as she eyeballed it, she nodded. "Yeah, I see the resemblance. They really do look like demons... creepy. They've even got the horns."

I felt my anxiety sink into my stomach as I flicked my eyes from person to person. There's really no point hiding it anymore... I suppose. But then again, if we were to acknowledge the presence of demons, we'd have to accept that angels are real too. If we bring angels and gods into this war... will the future repeat itself? Will they all be slaughtered?

I don't know if I want the answer to that question.

Hudson dismisses the two Hypersuit Commandos and I mentally tell Harold to send the both of them to wherever they're needed. Fifty-five cities are under attack worldwide, and more are sure to come. We can't be focusing just on those that have higher importance monetarily or professionally.

"Judicator, an extremely important man was killed today. I have a report here... it's from Ben Brown's AI." Hudson holds up her datapad and shows me. Wu Tao Chaohong, an ambassador visiting from Shanghai...

"Ben let him die?"

"Yes. Ben apparently didn't want to save only a small number of lives of 'elites'. But in doing so, this man died. He wasn't just anybody, he was negotiating an important deal with the Japanese. He had established a lot of trust with their current prime minister and was working on procuring a... top secret substance." Hudson's stern gaze flicked away for a second before returning. "Well, you know how 'top secret' government doings work, I would presume. In any case, his negligence led to this man being brutally murdered. Ben was able to save tens of thousands of Chinese people but..."

As she paused, I butted in. "But what? He saved the lives of a lot of people. Maybe it was the wrong decision, but are you saying you think that man was more important than all of them?"

"Perhaps." Hudson snapped back almost reflexively. "Most would say Einstein is more important than ten thousand, even a million average Americans back in his day. If those people all die later because the project Chaohong was working on fails, then not only were their lives saved in vain, we lost our chance at winning the war."

"I think you might be acting a tad melodramatic. Doubtless, that ambassador was an important man, but wars aren't won by a single man, they're a combined effort from all of us."

"In some ways, yes. But I disagree. Especially coming from you, Judicator." Hudson narrowed her eyes and smiled ever so slightly as she rubbed her fine royal purple military garments. "Were it not for just you, humanity might have been exterminated on three different occasions. We would never have beaten these aliens."

"I don't know about that, commander. Sometimes I wonder if I wasn't the cause of this whole war in the first place. Maybe my time travel is the direct reason they saw humanity as a threat. If that were the case, I would go from being an asset to a liability, wouldn't you agree?"

She smiled more broadly. "Perhaps. I'll have to speak to Ben about this later, but my point still stands. In any case, those Hypersuits will be quite invaluable in the war effort. I hope you...

produce more of them."

"Don't worry, I will." I wanted to hesitate and say no, but frankly a thousand Hypersuits wouldn't be enough to win the war. They certainly help to level the playing field though, and that's the best I could hope for. "Keep fighting the good fight, commander. I'm returning to base."

"Excellent. Hope to see more from you, Judicator. You keep us motivated here on the ground."

Part 262a:

First Founder Unarin stared at the demon, no expression visible on his face. Despite this, Dosena could detect anger bubbling beneath the surface with her enhanced psionic abilities. "Absolutely not. I cannot agree to that."

Satan sighed as he shrugged his shoulders heavily. "Well, I am simply giving you the offer, Founder Unarin. You may accept or ignore it. But you cannot deny the usefulness, can you? And really, saving the lives of 90% of your people, that must be quite a noble goal to work towards."

"But... a trillion dead... that would be..." Unarin's face was pale as he thought of the consequences. "There is a large difference between being unable to save fourteen trillion lives, and deliberately exterminating one trillion to save thirteen trillion. How do I even choose..."

Satan rolled his eyes. "I don't know, that much is up to you. It took us thousands of years to create our own dimensional space to live in, and the living conditions are hardly ideal. We were only able to do it thanks to our innate connection with thought energy. The only other way to do it is with a mass sacrificial ritual." Well, perhaps not the only way... Satan thought to himself about the human who could wordsmith. That one might be able to find another way, but it would be a bad idea to bring his ability up at a time like this.

Cinculu, the fifth Founder, glared at the demon. "You ask too much, devil. If push comes to shove, we may have to consider this but... unlike in your society or that of the humans, we have no 'dregs' to choose from. All Volgrim contribute to the greater good, all have purpose. To kill a tenth of our people would be to cut off an arm. It would be possible, but far from ideal."

Satan turned his back to the table and leaned his rear against it as he rubbed his right arm's muscles with his left. "As I said before, it's just an option. No need to get so angry." He paused for a moment dramatically as he turned and gazed out the plexiglass window towards the sprawling metropolis outside. "Well, actually, I suppose there is another option, but you probably won't like it either."

"Another option? What is it? What are you talking about?" Dosena spoke up as she eyed the demon with suspicion. None at the table truly trusted him, since all of his 'deals' had awful conditions, but right now he was perhaps their only hope for resolving their world's crisis.

"As you all know, there is a faction on my planet called the 'angels', along with their rulers, the 'gods'. Well, they just so happen to possess their very own dimensional space, which they call 'heaven'. If we were to drag them into the war, you would not only be able to eliminate an important, powerful enemy faction on Earth, you would be able to claim their dimensional space for yourself. At the least, it would be big enough to give a trillion or so of your people housing, and with the proper adjustments, you might even manage to increase its dimensional space further for all of them as a whole."

Unarin rotated his finger in the air slowly as he thought about it. "I see. This suggestion of yours would actually seem to be far easier and with less negative consequences than sacrificing a trillion of my people to create our own space. Why didn't you suggest it first?"

"Ah well, that would be due to time constraints. Pacifying the humans to take over their planet for yourself will be difficult, and Earth won't be able to house more than a trillion Volgrim at its maximum, but in order to take over Heaven, you'll need to pacify Earth and Heaven simultaneously. A tall order, to be sure."

Cinculu eyeballed Satan curiously. "Alright, I'll personally consider this. What do you have to gain if we eliminate the angels and gods? You wouldn't suggest something unless there was something in it for yourself."

Satan grinned evilly as he returned Cinculu's gaze. "How correct you are. For me, I will finally gain my revenge. That's all. If you kill the angels and the gods, I will have finally completed my longest, hardest fought goal. I live only to see this happen."

Unarin nodded as he waved his hand at the devil. "Very well then. Begone, please. I will discuss your proposal at length with my family. We will give you a response... soon."

"Excellent. I can't wait for your reply." Satan snickered quietly under his breath as he made a few motions with his hand, vanishing into the void to return to his own people.

Part 263a:

"I don't trust them either." Diablo stood alongside Satan, with Agares, Belial, Bael, and Beleth all lazing about in various spots at a rather large and luxurious spa. "The Volgrim seem too familiar to me. I don't like their smell."

Satan's face held an expression of pondering, as he thought about the last few years and the demons' contact with the Volgrim. Nodding slightly, he made a reply. "The Volgrim are like the humans, in more ways than one. In fact, they only hold two key differences, which would be their terrible mouths filled with dozens of razor sharp teeth, and their strange personalities. Some Volgrim are completely mute when it comes to expressing emotions, others are borderline neurotic. Very... touchy."

Beleth shrugged as she sat at a table nearby the spa, a long smattering of papers spread out before her, with Agares sitting directly across from her. "Really, the teeth are the only major difference. Plenty of humans have personality traits that could be likened to the Volgrim. Even their height, body build, and the color they bleed are similar. They're eerily similar, if you ask me."

"Satan, what have you been able to glean of their race's history from your conversations with them?" Agares shifted his glasses on his nose as he continued to read a digital newspaper report about the ongoing Volgrim carnage, the paper being written in Chinese from one of China's top news companies. "I'm interested to learn more about their kind."

Satan tapped his chin thoughtfully. "Well, thanks to an ability I took from a certain goddess during the First War, I have some ability to read minds at a surface level. Their words told me little, but one of the Founders was a quiet one, the fourth, as I recall. She didn't speak much, but she thought about many different things. She actually had this interesting theory... rather silly, if you ask me... but her theory was that humans are actually an ancient Volgrim colony of some sort. Possibly millions of years old."

Agares shifted his gaze from his nifty electronic reader over to meet Satan's gaze. "Really? That theory is..." He paused for a few long moments as he lingered on his thoughts, then he spoke up again. "Satan, would you be so kind as to humor an old man? I have a theory of my own I should like to float."

Satan smiled kindly at his elder as he turned and walked over to the table where he was seated. Standing tall before it, he nodded quietly. "Certainly. As the oldest of our kind, your wisdom is always useful on any occasion."

Agares coughed quietly as he scratched his long, greying beard. "Well, as everyone knows, I am not the first demon ever birthed, that would be the ancient one named Grimoire. However, she, as well as all of the eldest demons, died long ago during the first Purge. I was the only one who survived."

Satan pulled out a seat and eased into it, as Diablo looked on with interest from his own seated position on a nearby towel. "Yes, you've mentioned this before. It was sheer luck that you had not died."

"Well... there is more to it than that. Do you know the origin of the demons?" Agares cocked an eye as he reached over and took a sip of wine.

"Well, now that you mention it, I do not. What of it?"

Agares swallowed several sips of wine before gently placing the delicate glass back on the table. "Well, see, demons are not evolved from lower life forms. We were created, actually. By the angels and gods, or more specifically, by the original Titans."

Belial glanced over from her resting spot inside the bubbling heated spa. "Oh? I did not know of this."

"I am the only one who knows, truth be told. I never brought it up, because there wasn't much to gain from it. It changes nothing with regards to why we hate the angels, and if anything, it would only increase our hatred for them even more." Agares gave a slight wave of his hand as he spoke, as if to brush off never mentioning this crucial fact about their legacies. "Actually, Grimoire told me of this, a few hundred years before she was killed. You see, in the beginning, demons were created as powerful, majestic red-skinned servants for the Titans. We were created essentially as lapdogs, to serve them hand and foot, or to... pleasure them. You know how it goes."

The others nodded thoughtfully. Given how the depravity of the Titans was often spoken of, it was obvious they would gravitate towards such unethical behavior.

"To make a long story infinitely shorter, some demons began to foment a rebellion. They possessed keen IQ's and an understanding of thought energy and how it worked. Before they could fully rise up though, the Titans learned of their treachery and killed many of them off. Some, like me, escaped. The titans learned from their mistake, and when they next created demons, they created the imps. Stupid, idiot little creatures that were far too weak to fight back. While we lost our use for their carnal delights, we still made for useful servants. They continued to hunt all of the remaining old demons, and I only survived by using magic to turn myself into an imp to blend in, though I did lose much of my power in doing so."

"Lucky that you did so." Diablo piped up, nodding with approval. "You are the only one left who could tell us this news. This is useful to know, indeed."

"Yes. Useful..." Agares voice cracked slightly, as he thought of ancient friends he would never again see. "I am... millions of years old. I witnessed the original cataclysm, you know... the one that killed the ancient dragons and changed the face of our world." As Agares spoke of dragons, Satan's eyes shifted away for a microsecond, glancing at Belial, just as she glanced at him. He quickly returned his gaze back to Agares, who was so deep in thought he hadn't even noticed, nor had Beleth, her nose still buried in mountains of paperwork.

"Something though, about that first cataclysm... the asteroid that killed the monsters and Titans of old, giving rise to the Gods and Angels of today... it opened the door for so much more, and now I question it. I question if that really was just an ordinary rock that fell from the sky."

Satan's eyes suddenly narrowed. "Wait, the rock from tens of millions of years before? Impossible. If you're implying that belonged to the Volgrim, then why would it wait so long for them to appear as humans?"

Agares shrugged as he hesitantly reached for his final swig of wine, before pausing just as he was about to touch the glass. "I do not know, Satan. We know little of the Volgrim. Perhaps, hundreds of millions of years ago, their technology was in its infancy. Perhaps their species was, as well. Maybe their technology had to wait until an ape happened upon it. Perhaps their technology gave birth to the rise of the mammals. I don't know... I'm just an old man."

Diablo found himself nodding along as he laid back on his towel, resting his head on top of his thick battle-trained arms. "Agares, this information is useful. Even if it were totally incorrect, and it isn't, mind you.... this might help us win the true war. The one we've always fought in our hearts."

"Perhaps the reason the demons were able to break free of the Titans' clutches was because of the humans. They made for competent slaves. Better than us, while lacking in magic power, like our fully realized demonic predecessors were. Yes, the humans that kicked and spat on us, might very well be descended from the group that we are now allied with." Satan snickered as he thought about it. He liked this theory, he liked it a lot. "Agares, as always, your wisdom is truly incredible. We're lucky to have you on our side."

Satan didn't speak of Leviathan, but the more he thought about it, the more he realized just how trivial mutation would seem to a beast of his incredible power. Whatever happened to that old dragon? He often wondered about it and sometimes had sleepless nights, but in the last few thousand years, the dragon had never reappeared. Perhaps, in some burst of anger, he had killed himself, scattering his energy to the void forever. A tragic waste, but to be expected of one who hated imprisonment as much as he.

Satan reached forwards, grabbing the remainder of the bottle of red wine for himself. "Agares, you are the father to all of us. I'm glad to call you a demon."

Part 264a:

January 4th, 2050, my 37th birthday.

Amy waited patiently while her mental communicator slowly pinged her adoptive mother's communicator. This far out near Phobos, it took a while for even lightspeed to make a connection. Once connected though, the revolutionary transdimensional mental-phones would allow for connection anywhere within ten Astronomical Units to only have a delay of about one second between sending and receiving responses. It wasn't instant, but it was pretty close.

Jorge was wandering around in the other room as he prepped himself for the dinner party they would be going to, shortly. How fast ten years of marriage passed... just like that. No kids yet, but these things took time. As the leader of the Galaxy Exploration Force, or the GEF, as they were called, Amy just didn't have the time to have kids and do mom-like stuff. Besides, the innovations in life extensions via nanobots and gene alteration meant they had plenty of time to think about that stuff later.

Her mental communicator finally made the clicking noise that indicated the connection was successful.

"Ah, Amy! Is that you, sweetheart?" Carolyn picked up and upon receiving the mental feedback indicating who was calling, she seemed pleasantly surprised.

"Hi mom, how are you?" As mental images of the two participants slowly began to coalesce in each others minds, Amy noted with alarm that her mother no longer looked as youthful and vibrant as she had a few years before. Her face was quite haggard, and despite the fierce smile she put on, she seemed to be quite melancholy.

"Oh, you know... I've been doing a bit of this, a bit of that. Ever since your father passed..." Carolyn mumbled something else, but Amy didn't catch it.

"Mom... you don't need to keep beating yourself up over that. It wasn't your fault."

"I know, it's just... the signs... they were always there." Carolyn paused for a few moments to take a quick breath before raising her gaze up. "Ah well, can't do anything about it anymore. How are you?"

"I'm good, as usual, I suppose." Amy paused as she thought of what to say. "Oh, right! I forgot to tell you, but the very first interplanetary colonization attempt is going to be made in one week!"

Her mom brightened up noticeably. "Wow, splendid! You and Jorge have been treating that trip like your firstborn child! Is he going to lead it, or are you?"

"He is, but I'll be leading the second one which follows immediately after. We have a real chance, thanks to Judicator, to colonize distant worlds. If he can do what he did here on Mars, but on a different planet, we can start colonizing other solar systems. It's the key to surviving extinction events!"

Amy always got a bit excitable when she started talking about being a colonist, but her mother's eyes glazed over slightly, as she wasn't very much into anything science-y. "That's great, Amy. I'm so glad for you! Your father would be so proud if he could see how well you've grown."

Amy and her mother spoke for a while longer about a great many other things, finally ending the call ten minutes later, just in time for Jorge to finish assembling his decorated military uniform together.

As he walked in the room, he smiled at his beautiful wife, as she also wore her own military uniform, decorated with the White Eagle Crest for her heroism during the first skirmishes with the Volgrim.

The Volgrim... Jorge's smile was slightly stilted as he thought about them. It had been over twenty years since they last attacked humanity from space. Their antics had fallen to little more than minor acts of terrorism, as humanity's population had swelled to nearly twenty billion, taking over many areas of the Moon, as well as Mars and its two moons. There was talk of settling on Venus, and quiet talks among the upper ranks of starting a head-on assault on the Volgrim themselves. Thanks to a sophisticated network of computer engineers, they had long since decoded the location of the Volgrim homeworld, as well as important landmarks and other useful tactical data from ships seized during the first and second major skirmishes with their species.

Jorge sighed, as he walked up behind his wife and started rubbing her shoulders. "Amy, are you ready to see me off? We won't be able to see each other for five years..."

Amy nodded as she leaned back and kissed her husband tenderly. "I love you, Jorge... make sure you return in one piece."

Jorge snickered. "You too. We're both going to become famed galaxy explorers, you know. I can't lose to you, I'll be the one setting all the records."

"Only because you'll have a headstart. If you don't pay attention, I'll overtake you instantly." Amy grinned as she and her husband stepped out the door, the massive mansion closing itself up as their butler A.I. took over, putting the house in hibernation mode.

Part 265a:

Three angels and a god stood in the middle of Central Park, in the finally rebuilt New York City, part of the Third Division of Britannia. Their bodies disguised with advanced magic to resemble the humans they walked amongst, Gabriel, Raphael, Uzziel, and Zeus eyeballed humans as they hovered around on various interesting looking contraptions.

"It's so peaceful down here, on the planet." Zeus mused as he eyeballed a father and his son playing holo-ball with each other in the distance. "You almost wouldn't be able to tell that the humans are causing us no end of grief."

"Five percent." Gabriel followed Zeus' gaze as he spoke. "Five percent of humans are religious now. Mass atheism has reached its peak."

Raphael wagged a finger tellingly. "As I said they would. I warned you... and now drastic measures will have to be taken."

"Yes, yes, we know, Raphael. We're allies, not enemies." Zeus cast a quick glance at the old man who was sitting on a stump not too far away from the memorial of those killed in the Metropolitan Massacre, as humans had come to call it. While the world seemed peaceful now, war was still raging in many places. Rumors swirled of shapeshifters who blended in with human society, and secret underground bases constructed overnight. Even Zeus didn't know if the rumors were true or false, but he suspected their existence was not merely rumor.

"Do we really have any we can call allies?" Uzziel spoke up, her words carrying an aura of doubt. "The humans do not know of our existence, and most of them no longer worship us. The only countries that still pray are those who are continuously ravaged by the Volgrim, the third worlders. The first world countries have all but abandoned religion. Even if they knew of our existence, and even if they knew we required spiritual energy to live, would they give it to us?"

Raphael shook his head slightly. "I believe not. And think of ourselves, for a moment. What have we done to aid the humans? We've been bystanders for decades, while they fought both the Volgrim and the demons. What do we deserve, if not scorn?"

"Forget giving us thought energy to survive, we would be lucky if they didn't come to us and rip us from Heaven." Gabriel scratched his back, wistfully wishing he could feel his wings, though they had been temporarily absorbed into himself to blend in with humans. "I think... we need to reveal ourselves."

Zeus jerked his head towards Gabriel. "I should think not! We have other ways we can solve this problem."

"How?" Gabriel jerked his open palm forwards at Zeus. "No disrespect intended, but we're out of options. We're going to have angels dying in masses, soon. There are nearly 500 billion angels in Heaven. We made the resurrection criteria easier to fall into than the criteria for receiving thought energy even was. In order to receive thought energy, humans have to constantly pray and worship... but to be resurrected, they need only pledge allegiance to a god or an angel, even if just halfheartedly. Then, if they die, they are resurrected. We don't even have criteria for whether a human is good or bad, nor criteria for if they regularly donated thought energy their entire life."

Uzziel nodded at Gabriel, as she then turned to Zeus. "Face it, my lord. We have to do something desperate. Wouldn't it be better for humans to know of our existence, as we send angels down to aid them in the war? Humans might not only become much more prayerful, they might get some joy from seeing long-dead relatives, which would give us goodwill, but if those angels then die in battle, they will at least help in the war against the Volgrim, rather than simply vanishing into the ether when their energy runs out. It's... it's..." Uzziel paused as she struggled to find the words she was looking for.

"...Less wasteful. That's what you mean, eh?" Raphael glanced up at her with a sly grin on his face. "Sometimes, wisdom takes root in a young and fertile mind, even more easily than an old and worn out one. Zeus, you would do well to heed her words."

Zeus grimaced at the thought. "Well... my original thought was that we might simply have to perform a culling... but you bring up good points. I can't see many negatives in this route. Eventually, humans are likely to find files on our kind and learn of our existence. Better to wait for a good moment and strike at the Volgrim, than to rot and die up here uselessly."

Raphael's grin was replaced with a more careful expression as he kneaded his beard with his fingers. "You know, this presents us quite the opportunity, when you think about it. We could craft a narrative, like 'aid from the gods and angels'. When the next major battle occurs, we will have angels rain down from above and smite the enemy, revealing ourselves while also making a spectacle of our appearance."

"Ah! That is a good idea!" Gabriel clapped once enthusiastically as he mulled it over himself. "If humans start to think of us as ordinary, we will become quite boring in their eyes and undeserving of any special praise or prayer... but if we become a holy spectacle, this would restore their faith in us! This could single-handedly restore the faith of millions, even billions of believers!"

"We have to orchestrate it though." Uzziel used her thoughtful and methodical brain to toss a plan together in an instant. "Instead of aiding in one battle, we should send a million angels down, to all corners of the planet, so news of our appearance cannot be blocked out anywhere. Giving out food to war torn villages, appearing in major cities, and aiding the war effort, all at once! But... then..." Uzziel hesitated as she thought of the next part of the plan. "...After that, we should vanish again."

"What? Vanish? Why?!" Zeus felt his annoyance blow up at the thought of all that work and a big reveal, only to disappear back up into the clouds.

"Well, you see, it has to do with this idea I learned from the, uh... video games..." Uzziel's voice quieted as she realized what she had said.

"...Video games? You mean... you've been interacting socially with that human, haven't you?" Zeus felt the annoyance vanish as a dull expression clouded his eyes. "You shouldn't trust him too much. Jason is a hero, but that doesn't make him a champion of the angels and gods, nor even of the humans. He's as dangerous of an enemy as he is an ally."

Gabriel shrugged slightly. "I trust him, personally. Compared with all the past heroes, his power seems limitless. He still hasn't told me what his abilities are or how they work, but he appears to have many abilities. He's cloned himself, made Mars livable, fought Satan one-on-one and survived..."

Zeus sneered. "Precisely. You don't know what his abilities are! He's the first hero to ever not reveal himself to us immediately, nor to explain in detail how they work. He hasn't even sought training with Raphael to enhance his abilities! He's a fool."

Uzziel rolled her eyes slightly. "I disagree. Listen, about what I was saying... if we reveal ourselves, but stay in the presence of humans for a long period of time, they will grow comfortable with us, and our mystique will vanish. Jason does this himself, only appearing among the humans once in a while, leaving them to fight their major battles."

"He has turned himself into a godlike figure, who only appears when the battle has become impossible to win. He understands that heroes are not the solution, they are simply a tool to improve humanity itself. He explained to me that he learned the idea from horror video games, where you only see monsters for a split second, causing your mind to imagine them as much scarier than they actually are. If we can turn this around and use it ourselves, we can reveal ourselves, lose some of the lesser angels, and bolster our spiritual energy input from the humans!"

Uzziel was talking quickly, and she seemed quite excited by the idea. Zeus didn't seem to buy it, but Gabriel and Raphael had already decided it was worth giving it a shot. Zeus sighed. "Fine, fine. I think if we're going to do this, we need to think of the ramifications more carefully, so I only say you must draft a full plan within the next year or so. If you do that, I will consider it more carefully."

"Excellent! I can't wait!" Uzziel smiled cheerfully as a human woman and her dog walked past nearby.

Uzziel's smile faded as she watched the humans milling about in the park. "I don't want the humans to be killed off. I have a fondness for their species."

Raphael raised an eyebrow at her words as he watched her staring at the father and his son putting away their holo-projectors. "You don't say..."

Part 266a: Shift

I feel like I've been fighting for a long time now, maybe even half of my life. Well... it's pretty close to that. It's been a long time coming, but I was finally promoted to the head of the Hypersuit Commando Defense Corps. The HCDC has been primarily responsible for beginning all Volgrim defense missions, where we start by eliminating as many as possible before the rest of the troops come in to finish off the remnants.

How many Volgrim have we killed? Official tallies indicate that the HC's have killed over twenty million Volgrim by ourselves, but that's only due to our suits recording each death in its databanks. Their bodies tend to dissolve on death, which Command has told us is to prevent autopsies and other such investigative work into their biology. It doesn't matter though. We know where their homeworld is located. The plans for a full scale invasion are underway.

Soon, we will crush them entirely.

"Chief Officer Brown, I'm from the Vietnam HQ." I turn around to see a man has walked in the room behind me. Since he's wearing a Hypersuit, I'd normally assume he's one of my own, but clearly he's one of Judicator's clones, based on his familiar voice. I'm not wearing a suit right now, and my senses always feel dull, and my normal body weak. It's weird to not instantly understand everything around myself all at once. It's... unsettling.

"Judicator, good to see you. How is the prep going?" I turn around and smile at the suited man behind me. I glance at his right shoulder and note that it has seven blue stripes on it. A seventh generation clone? The original must be desperate for more help.

He returns the grin slightly. "It's going well. We've finally manufactured enough Trifrancium to get the fleet to Volgarius and back, but not enough to call a safe amount. We still need a bit more for a safety zone, and in case of emergencies."

I cock an eyebrow. "I thought you had made a confident prediction last year that you had a special technology that would quickly create lots of Trifrancium once we'd manufactured the first batch?"

His smile faltered. "Ah, yeah. Unfortunately it required too much... energy. The, erm, technology works... but it's so slow that we might as well just manufacture it the normal way. Turns out Earth had many of the deposits we needed, it's just painfully hard to mine and refine the stuff."

I shrug back at him. "Can't be helped, I suppose. If it were that easy to create the stuff, the Volgrim would be launching yearly assaults on Earth."

Judicator itched his chin as he chuckled. "Yeah.. heh, I suppose so." He paused for a second as his head cocked slightly upwards, as if he was thinking about something. "Oh, yes, how much longer until this area's EPS is online? We need to go global before we launch our initial assault on Volgarius."

"Hmm..." I actually wasn't sure, so I turned around and shuffled through some papers on my desk. Mulling my way past the files on the recent destruction of Bolivia, I find the papers regarding what I was looking for. Skimming through them, I turn back to Judicator. "Apparently by the end of the month ours will be online. The LPS is already a go."

Of course, we were referring to the Earth Protective Shield and the Local Protective Shields, which would create a high-density energy barrier around the planet to protect us from orbital bombardments, meteorites, and other such space-based offensives. They weren't strong enough to protect us from a massive enemy battlecruiser self destructing itself downwards into a major metropolitan area, but if the enemy were that suicidal, not much could protect us from that sort of kamikaze-style attack.

"You're doing good work, Ben. We're doing alright without you on the frontlines, but we do miss your spirit and abilities in the art of combat." Judicator gave me a quick thumbs up. In private, both he and his clones weren't very stuffy or bureaucratic, they tended towards lighthearted banter, but I had noticed a shift as the years wore on. Combat and killing can change a man, dramatically.

"I hate paperwork." I shifted my glance back towards the tables behind me, then back to him. "But you know how it is, I'm just too old to be fighting out there. Have to leave it behind to the youngsters. They need me here."

A big shit-eating grin spread across Judicator's face. "Ha! You're such a liar! You haven't aged a day, nanobots can make you practically immortal, you know. Hell, you're probably twice as fast, twice as sharp, and twice as keen with that Hypersuit as when you started fighting all those years ago."

I had been smiling along with him, but when he mentioned nanobots, I felt an odd feeling wash through my body. Almost like... regret? As my smile faded I walked around behind my desk and slumped in my chair. Judicator walked over and flopped down across from me, taking my hint.

"Do you ever wonder though... if we're doing the right thing? Aren't we becoming less human all the time?"

Judicator shrugged slightly. "I'm from the future, but I don't know many details. We could lose to the Volgrim still. The only way to know for sure that we have changed the future is if Earth survives past the year 2399. That's all."

I shake my head slowly. "That's not what I'm talking about. Remember when nanobots were becoming common, back in 2027, and we had that massive hacking incident? Humans started crazily attacking and killing one another. We did that because of the robots inside our bodies. Twenty-three years later, we're even more machine now than we were then. We can remotely disable pain if we need to. Our bodies can slowly regrow limbs without the need for a doctor. People run faster for ten times longer than the greatest Olympic athlete could at the turn of the century."

Judicator interrupted me. "Yes, but those are all good things. The nanobot incident was one terrible tragedy, but we fixed it, and the incidents since then have equaled zero. Humanity stumbles, and then it finds its way. I have faith in my fellow humans."

"That's not my point." I looked at him carefully. It was hard to see his expression when we spoke, but his lower face and voice could still change, putting his emotions on full display. "Scientists today say that 27% of all children will be biologically engineered or otherwise altered while still in the womb, and 5% of all births will happen inside the birthing pods instead of inside a woman. We no longer have fistfights over disagreements, we solve our problems in simulated holographic arenas, which separates our physical pain from learning lessons. Schools are being replaced by caregiving androids at alarming rates. 78% of humans in the developed world have been altered by nanobots or robots in some way, and even 22% of people in third world countries have been altered. By the end of this century, nearly every human is likely to be mechanical in some small way."

Judicator waved his hand at me dismissively. "That probably does sound awful to you, but we also used to die of Malaria and Smallpox, until scientists invented vaccines. Progress means change. It sounds like you just fear change. I bet a lot of people love being able to enhance their bodies and live more fulfilling lives as a result."

"Vaccines aren't the same thing. A vaccine eliminates the virus, but the human returns to their normal state afterwards. It doesn't alter anything fundamental about a person. Augmentations do. Technology as a whole does. We're becoming more like the Volgrim every day." I felt irritation at how casually he brushed off my concerns. I felt that these issues were quite serious, as a heavily augmented person myself.

Judicator sighed. "Perhaps we are becoming more like them. Is that a bad thing though? Certainly they are warlike and seek to cause our destruction, but what little we have gleaned of their society indicates they have no internal strife, they fight no civil wars, they have abundance for all, they are a post-scarcity society, and they are very logical thinkers. The biggest downsides

I would note are their emotional cues, where they all seem to lack any emotion, which would certainly lend themselves towards conquering all who oppose them."

"They're emotionless parasites who seek genocide for no apparent reason, and they lack individuality..." I paused as another thought came to my mind. "They're basically the Borg."

Judicator shrugged. "Yes, they are our enemies, and I won't defend them. However, you said they have 'no apparent motivation'. That is not correct. They very likely have a big motivation, we just don't know what it might be."

A short silence ensued as I thought about something else. "Why haven't we tried speaking to them? You said before that the very first Volgrim expeditionary force you encountered, you were able to speak with them. Why have you not tried to make contact with them since? What if our entire war arose from a misunderstanding?"

Judicator sighed as he leaned forwards and shifted his gaze at the ground. "If only it were that simple. I've tried, you know? Whenever I appear in their midst, they always attack first, and ask questions later. It's as if they are being coached to attack me on sight and always ignore anything I have to say. I'm the only person who can speak their language, and they just aren't willing to listen to my words. I've long since given up on peace. We're so similar, yet so different."

I chuckled wryly. "Do you remember propaganda during World War II? We're both too young to have been alive for it, but my grandfather told me of it. Americans were told about how evil the Japs were, told of their barbarism, and forced to fight them to protect ourselves against their animalistic nature. Obviously they weren't very different from us, but it was the propaganda that divided us. Maybe you're right, and a similar thing is dividing us and the Volgrim. But..."

I paused as I dwelt on all the friends I had lost over the years... all the comrades brutally shredded by the Demonic Variants or ripped apart by blaster fire from the main species. They've destroyed our homes, our countries, our world. They've killed anyone in their way without distinction, and cared not if they were civilian or military. They are the worst. They are monsters.

"...Even if we had the opportunity to reconcile with them now, I don't think I would want to."

Judicator nodded slowly. "And that, my dear friend, is the real reason we won't be able to have peace. It is the reason I don't try anymore. There's just no point. The only course left is to win the war."

"We will win. We can't afford to lose. Too much is at stake."

Judicator chuckled at my words. "If only you knew."

I wonder if I'll ever find out what he means.

Part 267a: Discoveries

Words are easy. Everyone has words they like to use. Anyone can think of words to use in a comeback. The problem is not a lack of words, it's almost always a time constraint. When I look back on battles I've fought in the past, whether against Volgrim or Demon, if ever I had a regret, it was that I hadn't been able to think of the proper word to use in any specific moment. When all the world leaders were killed and I failed to use a barrier to protect them from the kamikaze-like explosion from the Volgrim infiltration forces, I regret that. Often times, it's not a lack of ability that defines how badly I perform, but a lack of time. Given time, with powers like mine, there really isn't anything that could get in my way.

But now I'm finding that even time isn't enough. Even mental function isn't enough. For once, it's a lack of good words that is hampering my progress.

The young woman in front of me is smiling cheerfully at me, though I feel anything but cheerful. This is hardly good news.

"...So because of that, we've managed to scan all over the place and we've figured out that they're actually attacking Earth from various dimensional rifts! They're like gates that connect to other universes, artificial ones to be sure, and they can make them appear anywhere at any time! But the best part is, soon we'll be able to reverse engineer these for our own benefit, and attack them on a second front!"

I cringed at her words but put up a brave smile. "I see. That's, uh, good news. You've done well, Karen. You and your team both."

Despite the lack of enthusiasm in my voice, Karen was still chirping happily as she nudged her wide glasses up her nose with her free hand. "I mean think of it! Soon, our troops won't have to stay spread out all over the world, we can concentrate on continually attacking them from within their hideouts! In fact, we might be able to solve all manner of dimensional problems with this! We could even create new dimensions for ourselves! This changes everything regarding multiverse theory!!" She was practically hopping up and down by this point.

But Karen just didn't understand what this really meant. I already knew how the Volgrim were getting here. I already knew they were somehow involved with the Labyrinth and other dimensions. I've seen those other worlds she was speaking of. But worse yet, this was bringing us one step closer to the edge of Angels being discovered. While their help would certainly be helpful in the war, I couldn't imagine much worse than us going down the path to their extinction. If we discovered how to scan for new dimensions, it really was only a matter of time before we discovered that 'heaven' was not as magical of a place as once thought.

I lack the words. I can't just make everyone here 'forget' their work, they'd find it and start working on it again. Even if I successfully hid the evidence of different universes, another group of people would surely find the evidence instead, ones whose motives might not be so pure.

"Yes. Again, good job Karen." I smiled politely as she bobbled away to go chat with one of the researchers about her findings.

This was the worst possible scenario. Technology is truly fearsome. Once humans discover that angels and demons are literally angels and demons, and not 'Volgrim Variants', what will happen?

Obviously, humans will love angels at first. But that would only be the beginning. Once they see a veritable army of angels, they will ask why divine intervention didn't save the lives of their families. Those who have no such misgivings might still begin to think that there was no need for prayer, since angels aren't mystic beings anymore. They would grow used to the presence of angels.

And that's only the first step. Once humans discover the presence of angels and demons, they will more carefully begin to research the old legends of their existence. Those old paintings by weird artists of the Renaissance would take on whole new meanings. It's very likely they may even discover the existence of spiritual energy, which would likely lead to not only anti-demon weaponry, but anti angelic weaponry... and possibly weaponry that could kill me.

The good news is, I've stored away a clone or two for just this purpose. If I am going to die, they will awaken and absorb my body and my memories. My suit should also be reinforced against such weapons, so it's likely they won't be able to hurt me, despite all of that.

And then... there's the matter of that Cryopod. I still remember the day I laid eyes upon a visage of myself, frozen in suspended animation. Why did my body appear at the instant I used my powers the first time? What exactly was going on there?

No point asking too many questions. The Cryopod is safely stored aboard the Mothership, where Harold keeps a constant eye on it.

Have I really changed anything yet? The only solid thing I know that has a mostly definitive date attached to it is the destruction of Earth, or Earth's ecosystem, or humanity as a whole, by the end of the 24th century. That is all.

I just don't know. I don't know anything.

My communicator lights up inside my HUD as a familiar face appears. "Judicator. I was wondering if you were available to speak for a moment."

"Supreme Admiral Beatrix. A pleasure to hear from you." My face doesn't show up in her visual feed, instead she sees my helmet front. "I heard you were on leave due to a family member's illness."

"It's fine, turns out it was a minor case of heart cancer. We treated it within a few weeks, thanks to those new nanobot cancer treatments for VIP's. It's the doctor's hope that soon mass production will eliminate all forms of cancer soon, not just for the wealthy or connected." Beatrix smiled as she glanced down and tapped some skin-layer buttons, special devices embedded right into her arm that projected holographic images upwards, or they could even tell the time, and do many other sorts of neat things by displaying images right on top of the skin.

Within a few moments, I received a file that she had uploaded to me over the Hypernet. "I need you to put your Hancock on a few of these, and also give some feedback to this plan I drafted regarding the Paris remodeling."

"For the international teleporter index? You know France's prime minister is skittish about teleporters, as are the people of Paris especially. I heard he came under scrutiny recently for his dealings with Finland's leaders and their nuclear arsenal. Just give it some time and he'll be out, and replaced with a new Prime Minister. Parisians aren't fond of how he treated the incident regarding when the Eiffel Tower was crushed anyways, so I can't see him being there much longer."

Beatrix nodded slowly. "Yes, but that could be a while before all the pieces fall into place. We have a war to win, and thousands of refugees are still in need of permanent housing there. If we can convince him to accept being added into the teleporter network, we can deliver relief supplies much more easily and quickly, not to mention improving Paris's economic outlook for tourists."

I nodded as I allowed my eye to be scanned to imprint my digital signature on the relevant papers. "Okay, that's a good point. I'll look it over. Anything else?"

Beatrix licked her lips slowly as her eyes gazed away for a few moments. "...Well, not exactly. I'm still not happy, you know. It's been a long twenty-six years. For a quarter of a century, we've fought these alien invaders, and we're moving further and further away from peace, towards total destruction of our race or theirs. While I'd prefer humanity win if one of those two outcomes had to occur, I can't say it fills me with joy to eradicate or enslave another species, especially an intelligent and sentient one."

I uncomfortably averted my eyes from hers, though she couldn't see them from behind my visor. "Well, there's not much we can do about that. They won't listen to reason. They attack me on sight. I have no way to bridge the gap."

Beatrix huffed slightly but seemed to resolutely accept it. "Haaah, no point arguing. It can't be helped, I guess. I just thought it might be worth a shot. Thank you for all your efforts, Judicator. I, of all people, understand the time you've had to sacrifice for the betterment of humanity. You're doing the best you can."

I nodded slowly, as my eyes glanced up and looked at hers through my visor's viewscreen. "Yeah... the best I can do. Thanks, Beatrix, for giving me a call. Here are the signed documents, as requested."

"No problem. Beatrix out." Her feed disappeared with a click a few moments later, as she received the files.

Was she right? I left the office for the scientific division aboard the Johannesburg Moon Base and walked towards my private quarters. Have I really done all that I possibly can do to attempt to secure peace?

Can I really say that I have? I haven't tried simply using 'Peace', or 'Pacify', or any other such words. What if using those simply ended the conflict? What if they didn't? Even if they did, it would truly confirm that I possessed godlike powers. I've never once used my abilities to influence another person's mind against their will. It seems so wrong. It reminds me of the thought police. But, at the same time, if it saved millions, even billions of lives, would it not be worth trying? If you lose your free will though, can you truly be called sentient?

I don't know what to do. I just don't know. For now, I'll just prepare myself for the launching of our first Galactic Exploration Force. The name fills me with unease. I protested against it, but for some reason, people seemed hellbent on adopting it. "Britannian Galaxy Explorers discriminates against the countries not in our coalition, and this is a group of explorers from all over the planet! We'll use the more inclusive name that allows all to participate properly!"

But they don't understand why I warned them against using that name. And as for why they seemed to almost desperately prefer it? I can't understand it. I never failed them once, and now they doubt my judgement?

I can't see the future changing, especially for the better. I just can't.

Part 268a: Familiar Face

Satan kept his expression even as he walked down the hallways, leading the five Founders of the Volgrim, along with their hundred elite Royal Guards down the twisting and meandering pathways of his labyrinth. Over the last decade, he had furiously expanded it, adding many more lodgings and accommodations to keep the Volgrim available for combat at a moment's notice.

There was no point trying to lead them off course or down any back paths, as the Founders appeared to have photographic memories. Of course, Satan had plans to combat this in the near future, but for now, there wasn't much point using deceit. The more he thought about it, the more he realized just how weak and pathetic the Volgrim were. He could easily crush all five of them with a single thought. At least the Angels and Gods were a legitimate threat, but the Volgrim were as weak as the humans, weaker even, because the humans were extremely inventive when it came to the art of war.

No, Satan had bigger plans for these mind-reading sociopaths. Just one little spell made it possible to split his conscious and unconscious minds apart, allowing them to read faked pleasant thoughts of how he enjoyed their company and their partnership, while secretly he plotted against them every step of the way.

It would all be too easy.

Finally, their group arrived in the main room of the Central Rift Repository, where his labyrinth connected to many other dimension and locations, especially so when it came to places on Earth. The gates would be somewhat moveable, able to shift around within a twenty-mile radius of their initial placement location on the planet, but moving any further would require tremendous spiritual energy. As long as it kept the humans guessing, the rifts were doing their jobs.

First Founder, Unarin, was the first to speak when they arrived. "So, then, Satan... we've followed along. What is this surprise you wished to show us? I'm not one who is fond of being left in the dark."

Satan grinned as he beckoned towards an inactive rift beacon, its flat platform as dull and lifeless as all the other ones. The platforms could be activated and deactivated with no cost once constructed, but their initial construction always exacted a heavy toll, either in blood, or in spiritual energy. "We finally did it. We located the dimension the Angels reside in. And now, this portal is ready to open so that we can rain fire upon our oppressors."

Unarin nodded. "I see. This is excellent news. When shall we start readying our elite forces?"

Satan shook his head. "Not yet. Not right now. Listen, your people are being absolutely slaughtered wholesale by the humans. If you can't take on humans, you will stand no chance against angels and gods. You need a major wartime upgrade before you can call yourselves ready for this battle."

Dosena cocked an eyebrow as she stifled a glare towards the red-skinned devil before her. "Is that so? Are you calling us... weak?"

Satan returned the expression as he pivoted to face her. "Are you calling your forces strong? Singular human warriors outfitted in those battle suits are demolishing your people by the thousands. I would hardly call the humans strong, but they are exterminating your species at an alarming rate."

Dosena didn't even hesitate, as an unnatural sounding laugh involuntarily blasted from her throat. "HA! That is a most amusing train of thought, Devil. As of the last 30 orbital periods on our planet since entering this fairly insignificant war, we have lost less than one percent of one percent of our battle forces, let alone our entire population. We have trillions and trillions of Volgrim willing to fight and die for the glory of our people. If anything, we have been merely testing the will of the Humans, to gauge how we should defeat them."

Satan snickered at her response. "Kukuku... strong words for one humiliated twice by those apes. Your people will be annihilated once the humans arrive at your planet. They know where it is, you know, and they will be launching their assault very soon."

Dosena's smile faded and she simply nodded nonchalantly. "Let them come. They won't like what we've been hiding. The dregs we've sent to battle them on Earth, to attempt to destabilize their planet, those were nothing. When they find out our true power, they will rue the day they chose us as their enemy."

Satan decided not to respond, but secretly he laughed at her in his mind. Stupid fool. You won't get the chance. I'll be the one to finish your race off. The humans will just be a warmup.

Cinculu, the fifth founder, decided to add in his two cents. "Satan, you mentioned that we would need better technology to combat the humans. What were you referring to?"

Satan's grin returned as he looked over at the fifth. "Well, as it just so happens, not all humans like the current regime. Some are much more friendly to our cause, due to certain... happenings."

Satan flicked an eye over towards one of the demon attendants on the other side of the room. "You! Bring her here!"

The demon jerked stiffly as he felt Satan's aura directed at him, nodded brusquely, and then ran off into another room, returning moments later with a young-looking female human. She had a red-colored short-cropped hairstyle, along with a neatly ironed and carefully pressed white labcoat, followed by a wide-brim set of glasses, though based on her likely age, it's likely the glasses were more of a fashion choice than to actually help her see.

"Satan. Nice to see you again." The young woman spoke with a surprisingly dry voice, her inflection sounding like sandpaper on cardboard. Her voice was very raspy, like she was a chain smoker for fifty straight years.

"Marie, so glad you could come to meet the Volgrim emissaries." Satan smoothly walked over to the young woman and placed his hand on her back as he beckoned with the flat of his hand towards the five Volgrim Founders. "In order of their rank, from first to fifth, we have Unarin, the first, Dosen, the second, Trayza, the third, Cuanali, the fourth, and Cinculu, the fifth."

Marie's eyes glazed over at the barrage of names, but she nodded slowly. "Right. I'm Marie Becker, a scientist on Earth. I dabble in... many fields."

Unarin shifted his body slightly towards the tall, wispy young human. He had never actually spoken to one before, only that one Elder, Nufaris, had done such a thing, along with a few Volgrim who had been interrogated but managed to self-destruct before they could reveal information to the enemy. He found the young female to be... small. Very unimposing. These were the enemies they were having such trouble crushing?

"Human Marie, it is good speak to you." He spoke as best as he could using the broken bits of human dialect he had memorized. Shifting from Volgarian to human speech was difficult. He had ever heard rumors that humans spoke more than 500 distinct languages, while the Volgrim only spoke one unified language. What a mess.

"Your grammar could use some improvement, but I've heard worse." Marie blandly offered a critique regarding his English skills with no hesitation whatsoever towards his position among Volgarians or any fear towards what power he might possess. Truly a courageous human.

While he could not speak the human languages very well, all of the Volgrim had downloaded the basic essentials of human language into their minds some years before, thanks to Satan's hard work compiling a list of their languages along with the most commonly used words in each unique dialect. Even if they didn't speak the human languages very well, the Volgrim could understand what the humans were saying easily.

"Is good that you understand the words I am speak. What to offer us do you have?" Unarin kept his tone neutral, yet pleasant. Allies and moles were always useful among an enemy one wished to conquer. Only a fool would turn down their help, though if they had betrayed their former comrades once, they were quite likely to betray their new ones as well, if the going got tough.

Marie raised both eyebrows inquisitively. "Not 'offer', I wish to 'trade'. I don't give my talent out for free. You should count yourselves lucky I would consider you over my own people."

"I see. It is trade that you want, then what do you offer and what is the request you make?" Unarin silently cursed himself that he wasn't able to speak fluently in all the human languages yet. It was unbecoming for a great leader to sound like an oaf. The only good news was that humans were less intelligent, being unable to speak a word of Volgarian whatsoever. He still possessed greater knowledge than they did.

"Well, this might sound stupid, but... I wish to rule the Earth, along with all the humans. To have infinite money, all that other silly stuff. If you can give me that, then I'll give you what you want."

Satan raised an eyebrow at her words. "Really? To rule the world? I never took you for the type, Marie."

She glared at him. "Of course I don't want to rule the world, imbecile. It was a joke. Idiot demons, with pea brains that can't understand sarcasm." As she huffed at him, Satan felt his annoyance bubble upwards slightly. This human is mocking me...

He felt his ten limbs start to rise on their own as she continued to speak down to him. "Obviously, the only thing I want is more rare metals and chemicals, so that I can create ever more bizarre and diverse-... hmm? You seem quite angry, Satan. Did something I say get under your skin?"

Satan suddenly noted with alarm that Marie was not looking at him, her eyes appeared to look behind him, towards... his invisible arms? But that couldn't be possible. They were invisible, entirely. Only one had ever been able to actually see them as visible...

She grinned as she saw the look of confusion on his face. "Now now, Satan dearest, you're not thinking of doing something stupid, like strangling the life out of me, are you? No matter how strong you think you are, it would be most unwise."

"How... how are you able to perceive the ten hands of my seventh evolution?" Satan grimaced as he realized she was following their movements easily.

"Idiot. I've been aware of all four types of energy for years. You don't think these glasses are just for show, do you? I can mentally switch to one, two, or any number of energy types all at once. Of course, that's not the only trick I've got up my sleeve. But perhaps you forgot we were allies?" Marie sneered at his dumbfounded expression as she turned back to the Volgrim, ignoring Satan's presence completely.

"The buffoon over here fancies himself the most powerful being alive, but he's merely a powerful being. There are different types of power. It's not what you use, it's how you use it. Have I piqued your curiosity yet?"

Unarin narrowed his eyes towards the small human standing before him. This one is quite dangerous. Size doesn't matter when one is fighting with their mind.

"Yes, you give me much interest. Speak more on this is what we should."

Marie's smile slowly faded as she pulled out a small handheld object from within one of the pockets of her labcoat. "If you wish to defeat the angels and the gods, you won't be able to do it without an energy nullifier, which I just so happen to have."

Satan felt his blood cool noticeably as he looked at the object in her hand. Whatever that device was, it was not just for killing angels and gods. It was something to be feared.

Part 269a:

The officers on board the Explorer-class ship, Excelsior, were prepping for their first voyage, as the crew of 1,200 shifted to and fro, gearing up for their launch in just a few hours.

Only a few days ago, the EPS (Earth Protective Shield) was completed and came online, and the offensive fleet that was to head towards Volgarius to attack them on their home territory had launched shortly afterwards.

Things are moving quickly.

I stand now before the Gods and Angels once again, as I tell them about what is going on down on Earth. A bunch of them are sitting at the usual place at the Great Table as it's known, mumbling and nodding as I give my explanation.

Britannia, the goddess of the Times, who I had come to meet when she gave me Excalibur, smiled expectantly as I spoke. "That's great news! As more and more countries join the Brittanian Empire, my power grows. Exploring the space around Earth is also good, we need a refuge in case the worst should happen on our homeworld."

"Hold off on talk like that. I don't like to hear it." Zeus scowled at Britannia. "I don't want to hear anyone say 'if the Earth should be destroyed' or any other such things, am I clear? It makes me very uneasy."

Britannia waved her hand at him and rolled her eyes. "For heaven's sake, you're acting like the superstitious humans do when they start thinking about 'bad luck' and 'jinxing' themselves. We have a competent, even powerful Hero here, I think we will be able to handle anything the demons and Volgrim throw at us."

I shifted on my feet as Zeus grumbled under his breath. Gabriel took a sip of wine and then set it back down. "So, Jason, we brought you here today for a good reason. Can you guess what it is?"

I shrugged at him as I finally sat down at the end of the table uneasily. The atmosphere had been very odd up to this point. The gods seemed very despondent, yet hopeful. It was as if they had made a difficult decision, yet had decided to live with the consequences. "Well, uh, perhaps you decided to make me an honorary god?"

Gabriel's smile faltered as he flicked his gaze over to Britannia, who shrugged and looked away, before Gabriel looked back to me. "I mean, I suppose if you wanted it might be possible but, err... no."

Aw... man. "Well in that case, I have no clue."

Gabriel's smile vanished entirely as he eyed me. "We've decided to join in the war, out of... necessity. We will start helping humans very soon in battle against the Volgrim, but only in important circumstances."

I felt my jaw drop slightly as I picked it back up and reattached it. "You're joking. That is to say... you shouldn't, though."

"Yes, we're aware of your predictions about the Earth dying, we have to take the risk though. Humanity no longer is giving us enough thought energy output to survive. If we wait much longer, we're going to start dying out en-masse." Gabriel lowered his gaze as he stared at the cup in front of him. "These are dark times for us. We face the possibility of extinction by way of fighting our current two enemies and losing, by way of humanity not supplying us with the energy we need, and by humanity outright exterminating us if they deem us a threat. In fact, we no longer see any winning paths, other than to join the fray and hope our appearance inspires humans to begin praying more fervently. If we're lucky, they will be able to give us enough thought energy to actually start gaining spiritual energy again. Right now, we're barely even, and soon we will begin losing it, faster and faster. From our end, it's quite hopeless."

Gabriel went on to explain to me his plan: Under my command, they would join in important battles fighting amongst the humans to bolster their spirits, then returning to heaven quickly, so as to not make humans grow too comfortable around them.

"I understand. I fear the extinction of the angels will happen if we pursue this route, but you are correct... the extinction is looking more likely every day... almost as if it was fated to happen." I chewed on my lip as my eyes glazed over.

"Well, personally, I think it's a grand idea! Too bad you won't live long enough to see it bear fruit."

From the center of the room, a voice spoke out suddenly, as a familiar figure appeared in a flash of light. Satan stood on the table before us, as everyone jumped to their feet.

"What in the name of Heaven?!" Zeus summoned lightning in his hand as he raised his hand up to strike the demon down.

"There's no need for that." Satan teleported in an instant directly behind me, but my spatial vision was able to track his movement and I jerked to my left as I spun around to face him.

"Satan. I thought I might have killed you. I guess I can't be that lucky, when there's no body to be found."

Satan chuckled as his eyes darkened. "This isn't the time for pleasantries. I just wanted to tell the gods that my preparations are finally complete. This is the day you all perish. Farewell!"

Without waiting for a response, Satan vanished, as if he had stepped into another dimension instead of teleporting, he wholly disappeared from my spatial vision in an instant.

"What was that about?!" Gabriel glowered at the spot where Satan had been standing. "Just what did he mean by that?"

I started to pose a theory, but at that moment alarms lit up in my suit. "WARNING! PILOT JASON, PROJECTILE INBOUND FROM ABOVE! TAKE COVER!"

My spatial vision suddenly started tracking a missile flying directly at the Temple of Artemis, as I quickly coiled my legs and leaped upwards, sailing a few hundred feet past the open roof and above the temple just in time to see what resembled a nuclear warhead aimed directly at the gods!

Deflecting was a bad idea, too many could die wherever it landed! Only one option rushed to my mind. " INERT! "

The missile continued on its path directly towards the temple. In a single breath, it blasted past me and smashed into the ground, the gods narrowly leaping out of the way in time. As I fell back to the ground, my spatial vision rapidly examined it, and I felt a sinking feeling in my gut. No exotic particles were present. This wasn't a bomb, it was a-

Before I realized what was happening, the missile suddenly opened up, the side of it blasting outwards, as a strange device inside activated.

WEEEE WEEEE WEEEE

A loud screeching sound emitted from it, causing all of the gods in the room to fall into convulsions as they fell to their knees, and then went totally limp, flopping on the floor.

What the hell was that?! As I fell back down, I hit the ground with a thud and dashed over to the device. It was still emitting that awful screeching noise, so I hit it full force, smashing it to pieces.

A few seconds later, the immortals in the room stumbled back up to their feet, as they breathed heavily. "That... I felt the life drain from my body in the blink of an eye..." Gabriel seemed quite shaken. The feeling of powerlessness must have been quite overwhelming.

I glanced at the device again as my helmet front closed up. " Inspect. "

A list of readings appeared in my mind, but they were too complicated for me to fully understand. Still, I got the gist of it, thanks to the intelligence the Crown of Solomon had given me in the past. This was an energy nullifier. It seemed to cause any being in a short distance to lose the ability to move, completely neutralizing them, based on their spiritual energy levels. Luckily my suit gave me protection from the device, but the gods were totally powerless against it.

Was this a warning shot? Or maybe...

From outside, there was a loud ruckus, as sounds of explosions were heard in the distance. I stood up quickly, as did the gods and the archangels, as we all turned to rush outside.

A massive amount of enemies were visible some miles away, the flatness of Heaven allowing us to see their army clearly. Volgrim and demon alike appeared to be flooding through rifts that had appeared in the far distance. I couldn't make out exactly what was going on, but getting closer would solve that problem.

"Let's go. This appears to be an important battle." Zeus was in all business mode, as he slapped his golden chest armor, bearing the blackened mark of a lightning bolt across the front. "This has been a long time coming."

Part 270a: Barbarism

I am old. Very old.

Not as old as the archangels, or even the gods, of course, but still exceedingly old. I lived through the wars of the second era, and the third era, and now hundreds of eras later as well. I have seen many things, and I have killed many with my own hands.

And yet, for a demon as hardened in combat and as world weary who has seen as many things as I have, this is still so... stomach churning. I must say that this is not how I imagined this battle would work.

I recently read about the atrocities humans committed against their own in their second world war. No demon, angel, god, or dare I permit myself to guess, not even a Volgrim would treat their own or the enemy as the humans treated their own kind during those awful wars. I suppose the saying 'anything goes in war' was coined by somebody who lived through that era of barbarism, but I still suspect even they would find this to be unsettling.

Thanks to that strange device the human woman showed us, we have the ability to completely nullify an angel's ability to fight. I'm not into the mechanical stuff like those young demons are, but I can understand the general way in which it works. Something about their unique spiritual energy backfires inside them, rendering their entire body immobile, as they fall to the ground, unable to lift even a finger.

I hate the angels and the gods. I really do. They butchered my brethren when they caught even a whiff of free-thinking. But when you can render an entire army totally helpless, and the only thing you have left to worry about is how quickly you can turn their bodies into mulch... it doesn't sit right with me.

It's not that I sympathize with the angels. By no means! I just prefer a foe who can at least offer a modicum of resistance, no matter how pitiful. Worse, we're not even killing real angels right now. These are pseudo-angels, humans born long after the end of the Great War in Heaven. They really have no skin in the game, and were brought here by the despicable gods and angels to do their dirty work for them. And, unlike even the imps of my people, these pseudo-angels have no ability to leave Heaven. They are imprisoned here, until they are sent out to die.

I cannot simply allow this to happen.

"Satan." I walk up to our dear leader, who is once again exercising the abilities of Hercules, the first Hero he ever killed in combat. The ability to command his armies all at once, granting them unparalleled unstoppable power.

Satan's eyes twitch to and fro, as he looks from one end of the carnage to the other. "Yes, Agares? I'm busy right now. Can it wait?"

A head is ripped from a pseudo-angel nearby and hurled to the rear of the field, as it smashes into the ground, exploding in a bloody mess just a few dozen feet away from the both of us. I glance at it, but Satan doesn't pay it the slightest bit of attention.

"My lord... this is unbecoming of us. Slaughtering angels and gods that are unable to fight back... we're no better than they were when they killed our forefathers. Surely we can fight at least somewhat fairly?"

Satan's face scrunched up as he flicked his eyes over to me. I could tell he didn't want to have this discussion. "Elder Agares, I have always respected your input, especially in matters of war. However, the time to object was before we entered the battlefield, not afterwards. Further, we are not the villains here. An eye for an eye, that is the demon way. They did in fact slaughter our forefathers, so we will enact full revenge on them as way of repayment. Do I make myself clear?"

Satan's last words were strangled, as if to threaten me with his mere tone of voice. I leaned heavily on my gnarled wooden cane as I nodded quietly. "Yes... my lord."

Satan went back to ignoring me as his eyes roamed forwards to the clouds soaked red with the blood of his most hated enemies. Of course he wouldn't listen to my counsel. I should have mentioned my objections earlier, as he said. He was right.

Still, I looked around the battlefield with saddened old eyes as I watched tens of thousands of angels falling like wheat to the scythe. I started to turn around to walk away, but Satan spoke up. "Hold. A moment, if you will. The Hero is coming, and I am busy guiding the army. Would you be so kind as to slow him down for a while? Distract him. Take his focus off me, if you would. I will deal with him when the time is ready."

I slowly turned back around to Satan, as my knees creaked. "Ah, but I am just an old demon, worn out and tired. I don't think I would be able to do much against such a young and powerful Hero. Perhaps you should ask Bael or Diablo? Surely they would be better equipped to handle one with such immeasurable power?"

Satan sneered as he stifled a chuckle. "A good jest, but let's end the charade. You will do just fine against him, Lord of Reptiles. It was not a request, it was a direct order."

I felt a sparkle gleam in my eye as he spoke. "You'd order a poor old man to his death? For shame. However, as my lord, I will obey your command. I'll try to slow him down, if only just for a few moments, even if it should kill this old man."

As I turned and hobbled away on my cane, Satan chuckled quietly. "Yes, yes. Just don't kill him, please. I need to have some fun too, you know."

As I flew forwards using my Hypersuit's flight system to conserve my own energy, I felt panic rising at how easily the pseudo-angels were falling. My suit quickly brought up estimated stats... two million dead. To be fair, out of tens of billions, it was a small number, but not a single demon or Volgrim had died yet. This was a veritable holocaust with how easily they were cleaning shop.

Zeus and Gabriel flew alongside me, as we raced towards the enemy. While only a few miles away, I constantly kept flying down to smash the devices that were being shot randomly all over the place, each device completely incapacitating any angels or gods within a certain area of its presence. The good news was that they were quite vulnerable to being smashed, but the bad news was that I was the only one who could smash them, and the enemy was shooting them around far faster than I could break them!

"Fuck! I need help! Ah, wait, I've got an idea!" I quickly landed in a small clearing where the angels weren't bunched too close together. Aiming my hand up in the air, I quickly cast a spell.

" SUMMON! "

As I cast it, over and over, my clones began to appear, one by one. The energy cost of bringing them to me was quite small luckily, so soon I had over three hundred hypersuit-outfitted clones to help in the battle.

Quickly I yelled out. "All clones! Immediately clone yourselves now, then have those clones clone themselves!"

They nodded as they quickly took note of what was going on around them. Seconds later, their numbers swelled from 300 to 600, and then to 900. It would have to do.

"Spread out, destroy all the energy nullifier devices you can find! We can't let the demons and Volgrim kill our friends!"

Within seconds, all of them were speeding off to seek these devices. I could have summoned more clones, but the lowest level clones would be down to pitiful amounts of energy, and in one fell swoop, I had taken us from 7th level cloning to 9th level. I wasn't sure what the immediate repercussions might be, nor did I wish to find out what the long-term effects would be either.

I quickly located the leader. Satan. As I thought, he was over with his other generals, a terrifying fighting force, one I was not keen on attacking so soon after he had crushed me swiftly last time. Still, to kill a snake, you have to cut off its head.

I dashed forwards, leaping into the air as I ignited my jets to blast over towards him.

A few moments later, something odd happened. My forward momentum turned into downwards momentum, and I suddenly careened at the ground, as if a massive anvil were attached to my body.

BOOM!

I hit the ground with a tremendous impact, dust flying up in the air in all directions as my body felt the pressure that had yanked me downwards release. Zeus and Gabriel had continued flying ahead to attack the enemy head on, but as I raised my head up, I found myself lying a few feet away from... an old man.

"Greetings, young one. My name is Agares. Forgive me for pulling you in, but I was hoping we might have a nice, splendid chat."

An old demon stood before me, as I pulled myself up to a standing position. With a long white beard and very bushy eyebrows, combined with a receding hairline, and an unimposing hunched posture accentuated by a beaten-up wooden cane, he cut quite the miniscule figure in front of my Herculean body.

"Sorry, but while the demons may be my enemy, I'm not in the habit of attacking the elderly. If you move out of my way, I won't hurt you."

I coiled my legs to spring up, the impact from a few seconds before having caused me no damage whatsoever. In the blink of an eye, I shot upwards, leaping over the strange old man the final quarter-mile towards Satan's lookout, where he appeared to be facing down Zeus and Gabriel both.

Before I could clear much distance, I felt an invisible arm grab hold of my foot, yanking hard as I was suddenly pulled in reverse back to my original jumping location, once again smashing onto the ground with a loud crash.

Now I lay on my back, once again facing that strange old man as he stroked his beard. Suddenly, I perceived a slight dark aura engulfing his body as he eyed me with cold, unforgiving eyes.

"It's not polite to disrespect your elders like that, mortal."

Part 271a: Passion

"What are you playing at, old man? Do you want to fight?"

I eyed the aged demon carefully. Despite his looks, I'd learned in the past that things were not always what they seemed. Remembering a certain crocodile and how he had shattered my expectations brought a rather nostalgic memory to mind.

Still, even as I stood up and eyed the short old demon up and down, I couldn't really find him 'intimidating'. His diminutive presence meant that I would have to knock him out, but I didn't want to hurt him too badly. I'm a sap when it comes to respecting my elders.

"Alright, grandpa. Listen, if you want to talk, I'll talk, but can it wait until I beat the devil out of Satan? This is really not the time."

Agares smirked at me. "You're not afraid of a little old man are you?" From behind me, a pseudo-angel screamed in pain as she was cut down violently and torn into pieces by vicious scyther variants. I whipped my head back to see what was going on, and noted with alarm that the Volgrim were deploying some sort of mecha battle armors onto the field, more bulky than my own Hypersuit, but still powerful enough to tear the angels to shreds.

Luckily, my clones seemed to be holding out.

I turned back to the old man to catch a slight glimpse of disgust on his face as he eyed the carnage behind me. When he saw me looking at him, it quickly vanished.

"I'm not afraid of you, not in the slightest. I simply don't have time for this... whatever it is you want to talk about."

"Keh, youth are always so impatient, always in a rush. Listen, boy, I'm going to tell you something that might surprise you, just the slightest bit." Agares turned his chin up slightly as he said this. "Not all demons like war, and even some of us demon generals aren't fond of it, you see? I've been fighting gods, angels, titans, humans, and heroes for too damn long! This old man wants to settle down with some nice demon girls, maybe some human girls, and call it a life, you see?"

I blinked at him slowly. "All right, you're definitely insane. You picked one hell of a time to have a midlife crisis, old man. I don't have time for this." I started to turn my back on him, but suddenly he appeared in front of me as I looked in the opposite direction.

"Hey! I didn't say you could leave, idiot. You can't just walk away when I'm talking to you." Agares glared at me as he licked his lips. "Forget about this battle, your stupid clones are doing all the fighting anyway. One more o' ye ain't gonna do a thing to help."

"I don't have time for this! Get out of my way!" I felt my irritation bubble over as I jumped at him, swinging at him with an open palm to slap the old codger out of my way.

Instead, I hit nothing but air. He was suddenly gone, as I heard a voice behind me. "Oy... did you just... take a swing at me..."

It wasn't a question. I could almost taste the angry edge to his voice, but I had just about enough of his games as well.

"Nice dodging, grandpa. If you stay out of my way, I won't have to make the next one connect."

"The youth of this generation weren't made like the ones from a few prior. Respect has gone out the window..."

As he finished speaking, I felt a sudden SLAP across the side of my visor, as I went flying to the side, tumbling end over end, landing face down in the clouds.

"Jesus, you hit like a truck, old man!"

I heard a different voice speak up this time though, a female voice. "It wasn't he that gave you a walloping, little man."

I quickly jerked my head up to see Samantha's face staring down at me, just in time to see her rearing her leg back for a mighty kick. There was no avoiding this one. I simply braced myself with all my might, as her foot drove deep into my stomach, blasting me straight up in the air like a wild and crazy field goal that went too out of control.

My suit's alarms screamed at me as the autopilot took over for a moment, ejecting blasts of heat to stop my crazy spinning that was making me horribly nauseous. As I righted myself, I jerked back as I saw Samantha's face again, as she had jumped up right in front of me, her fists both raised above my body, as she slammed down, hard.

I smashed into the ground faster than I could even register the movement, my entire body spinning dizzily as I lay there, just trying to register what had happened.

"Belial, Satan gave this task to me. You shouldn't interfere." Agares grumbled at her as she landed a few seconds later, her impact smooth and graceful, as if it had been a tiny hop over a puddle instead of a two hundred foot fall down to incredibly hard clouds.

"I'm bored. Satan didn't give me anyone fun to fight, and he's having all the fun beating up the gods by himself. This hero will have to amuse me for a while." She was of course wearing another ridiculously revealing outfit, just like the one she had worn in the future, though this was more of a white silken undergarment one might see in a lingerie catalog, rather than those strange fetishy black 'strings' she wore when I knew her.

I jumped to my feet quickly, after taking a few seconds to reorient my positioning. "Samanth- err, Belial. Nice to uh, err well, I mean, uh-" I found myself slopping my words badly, not sure whether to greet her in a friendly manner, or treat her as an enemy. She surely regarded me as an enemy, though I couldn't say the same for myself towards her...

"Excellent, you heard him say my name. You're such an observant human." She rolled her eyes as she flicked her long black hair over her shoulder to her backside. "Come now, Satan has told me you were a foe who nearly killed him. Let's see how you fare against the strongest demoness in Hell!"

I gazed at her up and down carefully. One thing I knew from the sparring I'd done with her in the future was that she was unbelievably strong, specifically in physical strength. If Hercules was supposed to be the strongest Hero, then Samantha, err, Belial... she was supposed to be the strongest demon, by her own admission.

But, I only ever lost to her a few times. She has good speed and tremendous strength, along with an arsenal of magical abilities, but she's more of a brute-force fighter. Beating her should be quite doable...

I just don't want to kill her. If I kill her, that could change the future tremendously.

As I stood there dumbly thinking thoughts about the future, she scowled at me. "Not going to make the first move, huh? Probably too afraid to hit a girl. Fucking humans, let me beat those thoughts out of your thick head!"

She dashed forwards at me and I recognized it as a feint she had pulled on me during many training maneuvers. Her right fist pulled back like she was going to punch with it, but her left fist was already cocked and ready to strike where the opponent didn't see it coming.

I dodged away from her left fist, towards her right, which caught her off guard. Deciding to go with the flow, she instead punched with her right fist at me. "You dodged right into your death, idiot!"

"No." I spoke one simple word as I deftly batted her right fist away from myself, delivering a hard slap to her back as she stumbled forwards.

Of course, it didn't hurt her, but she jerked her head up, miffed that I had so expertly deflected her initial attack. "Satan wasn't kidding, you're a talented fighter."

"No. I just have... experience... with this sort of thing..."

Damn. Now that I'm face to face with her, I want to tell her about myself, about us... I can't bear to seriously fight her. If it just meant a fight of attrition, I could easily hold her off with my foreknowledge of her fighting techniques for a very long while.

But there's a war raging. To my alarm, I note that while the demon/Volgrim death toll has finally risen to one million, the angels and gods have already lost 47.3 million warriors. Not good. I don't have time to keep fighting these two, and while I might be able to kill them... I don't want to, at least not Samantha.

"Hmm?" Agares suddenly glances over in my direction. "Something just occurred to me. You initially treated Belial here as if you might know her. Then you deflected a feint that has skewered many a foe, and you did it as if it were muscle memory..."

She glanced over at Agares quickly. "Old croc', what are you trying to say? Out with it!"

I felt my stomach churn as the old man had a gleam in his eye.

"He's from the future, you know. I think he's fought you before. You two might even be mortal enemies in the time he comes from."

I had braced myself for the worst, but... it seems he was only halfway on the right track. Lucky.

But I quickly came to a decision as they looked at each other and back to me. In the blink of an eye, my visor closed, as I aimed my word magic at both of them. " SLEEP! "

The two of them suddenly started wobbling, as their eyes started forcing themselves shut.

"What... what the devil is... is this... mag... ic..." Belial groggily stumbled forwards as she collapsed in a heap at my feet. The old man lasted a few seconds longer, as he fought mightily against the force my magic placed on his brain.

"Gah... fiend... you'll kill us... while we sleep?! You're no... better... than the..." He didn't get to finish his sentence, as he fell down in the same ungraceful manner as she did.

"No. I have no quarrel with either of you." I spoke to the two sleeping husks, as I teleported them to the rear of the battlefield, in a small enclave where they wouldn't be seen.

With both of them dead asleep, I had now confirmed something important. Satan had only protected himself against my word magic. Not even his beautiful queen was protected. Why? Was there something going on behind the scenes? What was this game he was playing at?

Ignoring my thoughts, I quickly began to make my way past heaps of corpses towards Satan in the distance. Naturally, he saw me coming, and a grimace sprouted.

I couldn't hear what he was saying, but the Hypersuit lip-read for me.

"Damn. He already took care of the old man. He'll pay for that."

I don't think he'll politely listen while I try to clear up the misunderstanding.

Part 272a:

I arrived just in time to see Satan locked in mortal combat with three clones, as well as Gabriel, Zeus, and Raphael.

Of course, Satan wasn't alone. Aiding him were two of his demon generals, ones I didn't recognize, but who my latent telepathy identified as Diablo and Bael.

Bael was one big son of a gun. He was much bigger and more intimidating than Satan, and he swung around a massive demonstone flail, a classic ball and chain weapon that could crush enemies outright if they didn't dodge it. My suit estimated its weight was close to 300 pounds, the weight of a morbidly obese man, and Bael swung it like it was a little stick being wielded by a child.

"Gwa haha! If this thing hits ya, you're gonna be flattened like a pancake!" Bael roared energetically as he smashed his flail downwards at Raphael, one of my clones shoving Raphael out of the way just as the spiked ball crushed the clone underfoot.

Bael's eyes lit up with joy at how easily he had managed to flatten one of my duplicates. "How do you like that feeling, stupid human?! Now you're dead!"

The flail lifted up suddenly and was chucked away like a side of raw beef. My clone stood up and dusted himself off. "You're a loudmouthed idiot. My suit is at 98% integrity. You hardly even scratched it."

Satan scowled at Bael. "Stop with the chatter!" As a clone rushed him and delivered a mighty punch right to his stomach, Satan flinched and was knocked backwards a step, but otherwise he was unharmed. "Keep pounding on him until that suit falls to pieces! It isn't made of ordinary materials!"

Diablo, wielding a red pitchfork, shot a blast of magma from its three tips as his forked tail rooted in the ground to keep himself balanced. "You don't say! No matter what I hit these copycats with, they just keep standing up! Nothing seems to hurt them!"

I jumped into the fight, teleporting behind Bael as I withdrew Excalibur from storage and stabbed forwards, but Bael sensed my presence and dodged. Lucky, because that surprise attack would likely have skewered him. "That's the point! You can't kill what you can't hurt, Satan! Give it up, you don't have time to prep your piercing attack!"

"Fool! Your clones are hardly hurting my generals and myself at all! This is a battle of attrition, and I won't soon lose!" Satan did not smile however, and it appeared both sides were at quite the stalemate. However, that was exactly what I had been waiting for.

Jumping a dozen feet away from Bael, I aimed Excalibur at his back as he continued to swing his flail at Raphael.

Aiming my telepathy at all my allies in this fight, I spoke quickly. Guys! I'm going to fire a holy beam from Excalibur! In exactly three seconds, leap into the air! This is your only warning!

Raphael flicked his eyes over to me, as his surprisingly spry legs coiled below him. Bael, seeing Raphael stop moving for a split second, reared his fist back to strike a blow at him.

Diablo sensed something was amiss, and jerked his head back just in time to see the energy surging in my blade. "Bael! Watch out! He's-!"

Before he could finish his sentence, as if on cue, I sent out my mental order. JUMP!

All of the angels and my clones leaped up in the air at the same time as I stabbed forwards with my blade. "EXCALIBUR!"

A blast of white-hot light shot out of the tip, blasting directly through Bael's chest before he knew what had hit him. His mouth shot open in surprise, but he was unable to spit words out due to loss of lungs.

A second later, the light vanished, as Bael stumbled forwards. His mouth opened and closed, but no words came out. Moments later, he fell to his knees, and then on his face, as his flail dropped to his side.

As blood pooled out of him, Satan's hunched body wildly jerked his gaze over at me. "You! That power- you know how to use it?!"

As Gabriel and the rest of the group landed a few feet away, I leveled my sword at Diablo as power again began to glow in the tip. "That's right. Let's make this two for two."

As I said that, suddenly my brain exploded. It was as if ten thousand people screamed a high-pitched noise directly into both of my ears at the same time. I don't know what happened then, only that for a few moments, possibly longer, I lost all control of my body, and then I lost consciousness as well.

Unarin and Dosena strolled up casually towards the group of angels and gods that were fighting Satan's demon generals. Dosena raised an eye as a single one of the hypersuited warriors pulled out a strange long instrument, and then fired a blast of light at one of the demon generals, killing him instantly. Well, based on his life signs, he wasn't dead, but that could be changed easily if he wasn't pulled out of there.

"All right then, I suppose it's time for us to end this farce. Dosena, deploy the Dragoons. Also, neutralize that feisty one with the sword over there." Unarin mentally indicated the one who had shot the beam of light.

Ah, so it's called a 'sword'. I see now. Dosena nodded as she felt for a moment like she had solved a piece of an important puzzle. With the briefest of thoughts, she aimed her telepathic abilities at the human, who appeared to be charging up another of those deadly attacks. With hardly any effort, the human staggered forwards and flopped lifelessly to the ground.

Another moment later, she contacted the Dragoon Corps and gave them the orders to move out. Frankly, it irritated her that Unarin wouldn't just do it himself, but it was best not to question him in matters such as these. His mental abilities might be second to hers, but he was still lightyears beyond all Volgrim other than the other Founders themselves, and possibly a few select Elders. And, barring that, he had other gifts that he could use freely, which Dosena had luckily been able to witness in the Fifth Great War.

Indeed, he was the highest ranked and most powerful of all Volgrim for a reason. She suspected that even this Satan fellow would be hard pressed to kill the one he thought so little of.

As they strolled up to the ground of demons, angels, and clones, Unarin smiled pleasantly at the enemy, an expression she rarely saw him make. 'Rare' being an understatement, the last time was possibly a few thousand orbits ago.

"If you angels and gods would be so kind as to vacate your home, I will refrain from slaughtering you all like the biological weaklings that you are. Otherwise, I can't guarantee your safety for much longer."

One of the clones dashed over and grabbed the one that Dosena had felled. His front visor shut momentarily and then reopened, and just like that, the one she had incapacitated groggily woke back up.

Hmm? When his visor shut, for a moment I lost all contact with his mind. I felt a strange energy as well, something alien. Was that some special ability that he used?

Dosena icily glared at the clone who had revived the other suited fighter. She noted that these were not the ordinary humans they had seen countless times on the frontlines, but they were clones of the same individual, one who seemed to possess a strange alien energy.

According to Satan, this was known as Heroic Energy, which was separate from the energy that demons and angels used, but similar in its effects. It came from the same source, but Satan never went into specifics regarding how it worked. Very smart, considering he needed all the help he could get when it came time to fight off the Volgrim who would come to collect.

"Unarin, Dosena. You arrived at the perfect time." Satan calmly stood up tall as he turned away from the Founders to eyeball his foes. "Since you're here now, I assume that you've already activated the backup plan?"

Raphael glanced over at the King of the Gods, Zeus, as if saying something telepathically to him. Dosena detected no such telepathic activity, but one could never be too careful around primitives.

"Yes. The Dragoons are launching. They will be here in..." He paused as I fed him the time telepathically. "...two minutes, Earth time. Powering up their bioreactors takes quite the effort, as you already know."

Satan nodded as he took a step backwards, away from the angels and the humans. "Good. We'll take our leave then. Give my demons time to retreat. We don't wish to be caught in the crossfire."

Unarin nodded as he shot a stray thought at Dosena. She flicked her eyes over knowingly. Yes, if only the demons knew what was coming.

"You have until they arrive. Begin the tactical retreat. We'll take over from here."

The human whom Dosena had mind-bombed earlier spoke up, an edge of nervousness in his voice. "A r-retreat, huh? I knew you didn't have it in you, Satan."

Satan rolled his eyes at the human. "In minutes, that insult will mean little, coming from a dead man." In the blink of an eye, Satan vanished, dragging along his generals with him into a portal, including the one with the impaled chest.

The human dug his feet into the ground, as his visor closed. For a moment, Dosena once again sensed his mental presence disappear and then reappear.

She quietly wondered why this kept happening. Oh well, a mystery for another day.

Part 273a:

" Immunity."

Right after Satan left, I had finally gotten my bearings and realized that one of the two Volgrim had blasted me with a massive telepathic attack. Using my wordsmithing, I quickly gave myself protection from her telepathy, wondering why I didn't think of doing that first.

Of all things, a telepathic attack was my biggest weakness? I've been fighting demons for fifty years of my biological existence through time, and I still accidentally find ways to be surprised.

Raphael sidled up besides me as the two Volgrim commanders approached. I recognized by the dress they wore and how their telepathy levels were far above my own, to the point where I could see no part of their minds, that they were likely two of the Founders who ruled over all other Volgrim.

Raphael nudged me on the arm and I glanced down at him to see his old and wizened face was covered in blood. "Jason, things are looking bad. Even with your clones helping out, Heaven is in terrible shape. At this rate, we're going to be slaughtered."

I nodded quietly, still feeling a buzzing in the back of my head. That telepathic attack was no joke. I keep hearing near-silent voices whispering, and it's starting to unnerve me. "I'll try and think of something. If we're lucky, I can-"

The female Founder interrupted me. "Ah, you must be the Hero that Satan whines about constantly. Enough with the chit chat over there, we've come to offer the angels and gods a... deal."

Zeus stood up to his full height, as did Gabriel, as our entire group eyed the two Volgrim that stood by themselves a few feet away from us. "A deal? We do not bargain with the enemy."

"You misunderstand. This is not a bargain. A bargain implies both parties get something of equal value. You will assuredly be the loser in this respect." The female Volgrim grinned a sharp-toothed grin, as her animalistic shark-like teeth splayed themselves across her face in a creepy manner.

Behind us, the council of generals that were having discussions, the war raged on as hundreds and thousands of enemy and ally combatants alike tore each other to shreds. I glared at the male Volgrim, though he could not actually see my eyes. "Are you threatening us? You think we will roll over and play dead? We're not giving you a damn thing."

The female chuckled quietly under her breath. "This is not a request. My people need this dimensional space to save our own kind. Our star is going to have a catastrophic sequence of events occur in less than five hundred orbital cycles. All of my people will die. We fight only to save our own kind."

I felt my body's tenseness loosen up, just slightly. "This is the first I've heard of this. Why are you telling us this?"

The female held one of her palms face up, as if it were a shrugging motion from their culture. "Simply put, we're telling you why we are conquering you. Resistance is futile. You can either perish here, or we will allow the angels and gods to flee down to the planet Earth. Life or death, it is your choice. Ah! But I forgot to mention..." She paused as her eyes flicked to the side for a moment, as did the male's, and then their vision returned to face us again. "In thirty more of your Earth-time seconds, our Dragoon corps will arrive, and when they do, you lose. We will exterminate you without fail."

I glanced back behind the Founders, towards the place where their soldiers seemed to be pouring from. Unless I was mistaken, that was a portal... a dimensional rift? Wait... does that mean...

Good god, why didn't I think of this sooner?

The female's eyes glanced at me for a second, just in time for me to realize she was attempting to read my thoughts. Since I had put universal nullification of telepathy on my body, she would find the effort fruitless. However, her complaint wouldn't matter. I had an idea.

In the blink of an eye, using my latent teleportation abilities a few times in a row, I popped away from the group and zipped forwards at an alarmingly fast rate, arriving directly in front of the portal where Volgrim kept pouring through and the last dregs of the demons were evacuating from. Seeing me, a few Volgrim that had just stepped through looked up in confusion.

"Ah! That's one of the Earthlings! Attack him!" A particularly brave soul quickly leaped into offensive mode. I didn't care though, he didn't pose an iota of danger to me. My visor shut in an instant as I aimed my mind at the portal. "Seal."

The portal closed up instantly, as if it had never existed. Better yet, my seal meant it could not be reopened. They'd have to expend and waste more energy to reopen it again, being unable to reuse it.

Now then, the only thing left to do was to get rid of the undesirables.

As I had that thought, I suddenly felt a massive force grab me, lifting me up in the air, and smashing me into the ground. Of course, it didn't hurt me, but I was embedded quite deep into the... clouds? And the force kept pressing on me, as if it were a giant boot stomping me into the ground.

"ALERT: PILOT JASON, THE GRAVITATIONAL FORCE HAS BEEN INCREASED BY A FACTOR OF FIFTY IN YOUR IMMEDIATE VICINITY! SUIT DAMPENERS ARE UNABLE TO COMPENSATE! CRITICAL DAMPENER FAILURE IN FIVE SECONDS!"

Centurion blasted into my ear, scaring the bejeesus out of me. However, if it was just gravity...

" NEUTRALIZE! "

Yelling at the top of my lungs, the effect vanished and I leaped to my feet, whirling around to see the female Founder looking at me in confusion. How did she get over here so quickly?

"How did you-?! That technique should have ground you into pulp!"

She didn't hesitate to fire off another mind-bomb at me, though it had no effect this time. I felt a slight tingle in my skull as my neutralization ability batted away the mental attack effortlessly. It almost felt like a fly crawling around under my skull, a rather itchy feeling.

I grinned as I stared her down. "I just realized something. Satan played you for a fool."

She glared at me as ideas of how to combat me seemed to flood her mind. "I do not understand your species figures of speech, but I get the feeling you are speaking of betrayal. Why do you believe Satan betrayed us?"

"Simple. Satan faced me in combat, and he knows what my unique abilities are, yet he didn't tell you. Why do you suppose that is?"

The male Volgrim approached, staring at the spot where the portal once was. "Where is the portal? Why aren't the Dragoons here yet?"

The female gritted her teeth as she let out a faint hissing noise. She appeared to be quite distressed. "This human was just telling me that Satan has betrayed us, but he hasn't explained how or why yet."

"Come now, surely we aren't pretending to be naive." Raphael appeared nearby from out of nowhere, the other angels walking beside him. Zeus was nowhere to be seen. "You were planning to entrap Satan for your own gain, just as he was planning to entrap you. An alliance based on lies and deceit is one that will never stand the test of time."

"Raphael is right. Zeus is wiping out the Volgrim quickly, now that the demon generals are gone. Those weapons he gave you were only temporarily able to turn the tide of battle, but once we figured out how they worked, it was easy to avoid them. The demons have millennia of combat experience against us. You have none." I smiled as I caught a glimpse of a Volgrim sneaking up behind me with a blaster. Jerking my hand back, I shot a wave of energy from my palm, originating from my Hypersuit, and shredded the Volgrim to bits. "The demons are a dangerous enemy because they have access to Thought Energy. You do not, therefore you are not. You cannot defeat the angels and gods without the help of the demons, but they are merely using you for their own gain."

The female gnashed her teeth harder as her glance shot from the male and back to me. "Unarin, what are we to do now that the portal has shut?"

The male shook his head slowly. "This is saddening. To think that twisted red-skinned creature would do this to us. Ah, well. We will lose a few million troops, but we will live to see another day."

Saying this, Unarin's eyes illuminated as I felt a tremendous amount of energy swirling above him. No- it had been there the whole time?! Thought energy?! But I thought the Volgrim didn't have access-?!

"You will win this round, Hero. Enjoy slaughtering my people, for this will be the last true victory I allow you."

A massive hole appeared in the sky as Unarin began to levitate upwards. The female glanced at him with fear in her eyes. "This is- just like the Fifth Great War! He is unleashing his power!"

Across the battlefield, a greenish gas began to appear, one which dissolved anything inside of it, skin, bone, and armor alike. Thousands of angels and Volgrim perished in an instant as the gas blasted outwards. Seeing the incoming massacre, angel and Volgrim alike began to flee away from it in opposite directions as terror filled their hearts.

Unarin rose into the sky, speaking just before he entered the massive hole. "Farewell, sister. Losing you will hurt my soul like nothing else ever could."

A moment later, he vanished. My mind spun, not just with the revelation that he was able to use thought magic, but that he possessed so much of it, dwarfing even Gabriel himself! I had no time to think those thoughts, however, as I dashed towards the gas. Already, my clones were leaping into action, trying to neutralize it. However, the more spells the used, the more potent it became and the faster it expanded, as it seemed to erupt from deep within the bowels of Hell up into Heaven.

"We can't stop this gas! Evacuate the angels! Open up portals to Earth, and close them before the gas can exit into Earth itself! We can't spare time for stragglers!" I shouted orders to my clones and projected a wide area telepathic message so all could hear me.

Heaven was vast, able to comfortably hold tens of billions of angels, but there were few buildings and most of Heaven was simply wide open spaces. Worse, it had a limit to how far one could run before they slammed into a strange invisible wall. The gas expanded in all cardinal directions at once, as angels fled for their lives, my clones opened portals to places all over Earth's deserts and arctic as rapidly as they could. The angels were immune to the heat and cold, and no humans would be able to see them there... hopefully. Anything was better than outright genocide.

The gas came closer and closer, as tens of millions, even billions of angels rapidly evacuated Heaven. Suddenly, Raphael screamed in horror! "Oh no! The spell! They will evaporate into thought energy if they step foot on Earth!"

I felt sick to my stomach as I realized what he meant. Billions had already evacuated, and all of them would surely have already died.

I started to say some, but Zeus interrupted me. "Calm down, Raphael! I released that spell earlier today when we discussed sending angels to Earth! Don't you remember?!" Charging forwards, Zeus stood right beside a portal as thousands of angels poured through the small hole into the barren Antarctica plains.

Glancing over my shoulder I felt my body shake as I realized the gas was seconds away. Leaping through the portal, I jerked my head back to wait until the very last second to close it.

Timing it carefully, I winced as I used my magic. "SEAL!"

As the portal closed, a hauntingly beautiful woman screamed for me to keep the portal open. But it was already too late. The portal closed, as she suffered a horrifying death.

I felt sick to my stomach and vomited on the ice, repeatedly, over and over, as I realized what had just happened.

Was Heaven... no more?

Part 274a:

It took me a moment to regain my composure, but my mental state was very traumatized.

The AI in my helmet kept giving off preliminary counts of survivors and those presumed deceased and it was starting to really irritate me, but I stuck with it. Fifteen billion angels and gods survived. Sixty billion died. The Volgrim numbers were far lower and were only preliminary estimates, but they ranged from ten million to a hundred million in either case.

At least, those were the current estimates, based on data shared by all of my Hypersuits in the local area. All of the portals had finally been sealed... and in the end we managed to save less than 1/5th of all the angels.

But that was only the beginning. Now, we eyed down another two or three million Volgrim that had also rushed through the portals to escape with their own lives. And despite how their commander had betrayed them, they felt no particular anger towards him. We were still enemies.

In our rush to escape, one of my clones had also managed to find the two demons I teleported to a safe space, they were bound by powerful word magic so as to not wake up. I'd have to speak with them later. For now though, the female Volgrim commander looked on quietly as her troops rallied behind her.

With the air between her troops and mine tense, as well as freezing cold, she spoke first.

"So this is it then. I will perish on an alien planet outnumbered a hundred, if not a thousand to one. Is this what you would prefer, human?"

I stared at her quietly. Frankly, I don't know what to do. Killing the Volgrim would be all too easy. Sending them back to Volgarius would mean we would likely end up facing all of them again anyway, in a situation where the circumstances were not quite so favorable. Taking them prisoner was an option, but that would mean a lot of space would be required, not to mention special facilities for some of them, due to their innate psionic powers. While few had those abilities, those that did would be far too much for a normal human prison to contain.

Haahh... killing them with a simple 'genocide' word would be simple. I could have done that at any point, to be honest, but that would be taking the easy way out. While guaranteeing myself a future free from them ruling the universe or whatever, it would also be an absolutely inexcusable and abominable thing to do. I certainly wouldn't want to do so here.

As I mentally scratched my head on how to proceed, one of my clones walked up to me. I couldn't help but notice that his manner of walking was... different from mine. Based on the black painted stripes on his suit, he was only a second generation clone, meaning he'd probably been alive a lot longer than many other ones, maybe he was even one I created initially way back in the day?

He ambled up beside me and leaned back against an icy cold outcropping, as he sighed casually. "Listen, Original, I've had this idea bobbing around in my head for a long time now. Frankly, this would be the best time to test it out."

I felt a quizzical expression pass over my face as my clone said this to me. "You have an idea? I'll take anything at this point." It was so odd to hear my clone thinking of something I possibly hadn't thought of yet, but if there were discrepancies with the clones immediately after their creation, surely those would only grow over a long period of time.

The clone's visor shut as his voice played in my helmet. I closed up my visor too, since frankly even with my suit's protection, the cold was very intense.

"Listen, we have the ability to change the fundamental laws of physics with our abilities, yet we rarely use those abilities. Why not create a prison in another dimension? Then we seal it up so only we have the ability to access it."

I felt stunned. It was such an obvious idea, but I had grown so used to my abilities, so lax over the years. I barely even used them anymore, but my clones were constantly on the frontlines fighting enemies that grew smarter to our tactics every day. They had likely developed all sorts of new skills and I hadn't once even asked for their thoughts.

It was so simple, yet elegant.

"That sounds like a solid idea, but what about the spiritual energy cost? Creating an entirely new dimensional space is probably going to take a lot of energy."

My clone shrugged lightly. "Yeah, I know. But hey, if all your clones just donate their energy to you for today, they'll regain it tomorrow anyway. Just do that and our combined energy should be enough. Each of us 'two-ers' is equivalent to, what, like a million humans or something? I'm just a second level, the 'first-ers' have more than me, literally twice as much."

I nodded slowly and started to say something, but he interrupted me. "Oh yeah, by the way, next time you go and drop Samantha somewhere unconscious, give us a warning, alright? I found her and some old demon sleeping in a corner, and Centurion explained what had happened. Not cool, dude. Do you even think about how your actions could affect the future? If she'd died... well, I don't think I have to explain what would happen."

He shrugged and wandered off nonchalantly. I felt a sudden rush of energy enter my mind as he sent it my way. Moments later, more energy flooded in, as other clones quickly began doing the same. Each gave about 95% of their energy, and in turn I felt absolutely unstoppable.

As my visor popped open, I realized two important things. First, the Volgrim were visibly shivering, and some were trembling violently. The angels and gods had a 'halo effect' that surrounded their bodies, and my clones and I had our hypersuits, but the Volgrim battle armor was wholly insufficient to deal with sub-zero temperatures. Even the female commander was shivering, though she tried to maintain a brave facade.

Secondly, I noticed that once again, she was attempting to probe my mind, but failing. I was about to inquire into why she kept trying when she spoke up.

"You know, something is very odd about you. I can tell that you are using magic, and that you've managed to block my telepathy. That in and of itself is quite interesting, yet I also sense that whenever you use your magic, your entire presence vanishes for a few moments while you cast the spell. The manner in which you cast is also different but-" She paused for a second as an especially strong tremor went up her spine, before she spoke again. "...b-but the fundamentals are the same as for the demons."

After she finished, I raised an eyebrow that she couldn't even see. "Well, as interesting as all of that was, I think we can all see that as badly outnumbered as you are, you're going to die quickly unless we can get you out of this arctic environment. Give me a moment, for I have a solution."

She opened her mouth to respond, then thought better of it.

As my visor slapped shut, I aimed my hand at a small empty spot about twenty feet in diameter a few dozen feet away. " PORTAL! DIMENSION! "

Running forwards, I jumped into the portal without hesitating. Every moment counted, and even for the enemy, we should not treat them like animals. We were better than that.

Suddenly, I found myself in a pitch black, absolutely empty space. It was like floating in outer space, but no stars were visible. I activated my suit's lighting, and could not even see my hand in front of me. I could only see the HUD inside my of my suit.

Location: UNKNOWN

Lifeforms: NONE

Biological matter: NONE

A series of readings came up. It confirmed what I thought... there was nothing here. Ah well, time to fix that. After closing up the portal behind myself, I began to work.

" CREATE! "

Frankly, I didn't know what to create, so I just imagined a flat space.

" CREATE! "

Then, I imagined light coming from above.

" CREATE! "

Followed up by the ability to project the light visibly.

It took me hours. I felt my energy draining noticeably each time I created something, but I began to see the effort pay off.

Finally I had done it. A recreation of an image I had seen in my childhood, an artist's representation of Heaven. Frankly, the idea of putting the Volgrim inside a dimensional space prison, unable to escape, soured in my mind. It would almost be like torturing them slowly.

So instead, I created a lavish paradise, one they wouldn't want to escape from. Though our enemies, the Volgrim were similar to humans in appearance, and killing them or imprisoning them seemed to me unethical. Perhaps with a bit of affection shown, this might plant the seeds for an alliance?

The dimension in front of me seemed almost planet-like in its appearance. Despite being only a few thousand miles in size, every inch of it was breathtaking. Fountains of water, trees, animals, lush green grass, a sun in the sky, and an entire fake expanse of stars to remind them of home. Naturally, I had used 'ecosystem' to fix in the smaller details, and I had Centurion correct me along the way with his library of information on Earth, so the micro-planet was modeled somewhat after Earth, but much prettier.

But... something about this bothered me, too. This seemed eerie. I have the ability to create new dimensions, new planets, and even a fully functioning star.

This is... exactly like the dimensions I observed in the labyrinth.

What if... no, I can't be thinking thoughts like that. That would be just stupid.

Reopening the portal, I jumped back through and was surprised to see an entire village had sprung up out of nowhere! A quick glance around revealed that my clones had created this village to keep the Volgrim warm and housed temporarily until I returned. Even with just 5% of their spiritual energy remaining, this was child's play.

Walking over to the female Volgrim, my visor popped open as I spoke.

"You know, we've been fighting for decades, and I think this is my chance to right some wrongs. I'd like to start by formally introducing myself. My name is Jason, and I hope to change your opinion of my kind from enemy to ally."

She stared at me with her mouth pursed, as she considered my words. "I see. An admirable quest, I would say. My name is Dosena, second founder of Volgarius. The one you saw before was Unarin, our highest Founder. Do not call me an ally though, for I am no ally unless Unarin himself calls you one."

I nodded carefully. "I understand. I had originally intended to place your people inside of a prison, but in light of trying to extend goodwill, I had a change of heart. Please follow me, and bring your soldiers along."

She stood up from her seated position and nodded quietly, as the other Volgrim generals in the room glanced at each other and then stood up to follow.

Perhaps this will be seen as an important moment in the war. Perhaps this will be the change the future so desperately needs.

Only time will tell.

Part 275a: A Piece Of Peace

Dosena seemed quite impressed by what I had done. As she and her fellow Volgrim looked around, I could almost taste an intangible feeling of defeat that had changed into something more akin to acceptance.

"To be the loser in a battle, and then have the winner give us a 'prison' like this... you do realize we are enemies, correct?" Dosena glanced over at me from the corner of her eye as we stood side by side.

I nodded solemnly. "We are enemies, yes. But why? Why are we enemies? Why did we have to enter into this war? Don't you find it the least bit odd that we have been killing one another for half a century of my people's time, and not once have we ever sat down and simply talked? The only time I've ever successfully talked with a Volgrim without it coming to blows was during my first contact with that scout ship, all those years ago. What happened? Why did we become enemies after such an otherwise neutral discussion?"

Dosena paused as she mulled over my words. "Well, it's true that the discussion itself was banal at worst, but it was... the underlying events. Those are what caused the Volgrim to attack. That is all I will say regarding this matter, anything else is treason towards Unarin."

"Treason, huh? Treason... you know, your beloved leader, brother, commander, whoever he might be... he left you to die. He fully expected you to perish inside that gas, along with all of his fellow comrades. Don't you find that the least bit... disgusting?"

A small scuffle broke out among a Volgrim and a pseudo-angel, which caused them to get in an almost humorous fistfight, but the angel won the fight, decisively knocking out the Volgrim after just a minute. A small crowd of spectators had formed to watch the scuffle, but they dispersed when it ended so quickly. I decided not to interfere, sometimes it was best to let these matters work themselves out.

Dosena grimaced at me. "What do you know of Unarin? Nothing. He unified our people during the time of the Great Wars. After successfully dominating the battlefield with his incredible power, he forged a lasting peace by forcing all Volgarians to submit to mind wipes. None were exempt, save the Founders. But by wiping away our bloodied past, he was able to unify our people under one single banner, allowing us to forget old rivalries... as well as the existence of... well, that would be 'classified', in human-speak, I suppose."

I balked at what she said. "He mind-wiped all Volgarians?! My god... that's just... awful. That's something a dictator would do. I know you're fond of him, but can't you see just how awful that is? He removed their free will, their choices they had made throughout their own life. In essence, he zombified his entire race!"

Dosena's grimace transformed into an outright scowl. "You think him being a dictator is a bad thing? What would you know? For every war the humans have had in their short existence, the Volgrim have had hundreds! Thanks to Unarin's actions, no matter how vile you might think them, our people were able to completely unify, creating a peace that has lasted hundreds of thousands of orbital cycles. While his actions might seem unethical to a primitive, they completed the goal, and prevented millions, even billions more from dying. Of course, humans are mortal, so they would die anyway... but if a Volgrim will live forever due to our biology, then losing one in a war or due to a random act of violence is an awful tragedy."

I decided to flip the script. "So the means justify the ends, then? For your talk of how holy and pious he is, he didn't hesitate to jump into a war with Earth. How many Volgrim have died because of this war now? A hundred million? More? Less? Where do you draw the line? And for being a peace loving race for millions of years or whatever, you still seem to have an awful lot of military technology. Seems to me like he's ready to pacify his entire population should they ever revolt."

Dosena's anger faltered. "Well, that is to say... he told you of our star, and how it would soon explode. Losing a few hundred million Volgrim is nothing. Soon, if we can't find a new home for our people, all of them will die. Only those able to survive by fleeing onto spaceships will survive, and the fuel and alloys needed are quite scarce on Volgarius. Especially since we spent a lot of material creating the- err, well, that's not important."

Dosena seemed to be hiding many secrets. Sometimes she would seem to bring up something important, then quickly bury it. My telepathy was unable to penetrate her fierce mental barriers, so I could only guess at what she was playing at.

"...Right. Still, it's interesting to learn more about your people. I hope you understand that I'm not the enemy you think I am, and perhaps we can come to a mutual understanding. You're still going to be imprisoned here, and I've put a seal on this place so nobody aside from myself can create a portal here, but you're in no danger of your resources running out or the planet dying. You'll be able to live comfortably here... and as for the rest of your people, perhaps I can use what you've told me to find a resolution so we can end this war."

Dosena turned and looked at me carefully. "That would be... pleasant. An end to the war would allow our people to return to doing what we were focused on before all of this happened. We simply wish to find a new home to live on... a place that will last us for hundreds of millions more orbital cycles. If you could somehow find such a place, you would effectively be able to put an end to this war at a moment's notice."

I smiled at her, an expression I had not deemed any Volgrim worth seeing for decades. "I understand. I'll do whatever I can. Thank you, Dosena."

"Thank you, too, 'Judicator'." The corner of her mouth for a second almost appeared to crack, as she seemed to stifle a tiny smile.

Next I went to where the other two prisoners were. Agares and Samantha. Or Belial, whatever she called herself in this time period.

Having been paralyzed by my clones, they were held in separate rooms. No need for them to be able to conspire with one another. One interesting thing I learned about Samantha from the future was that basically all demons require their mouths to form chants, and their hands to form signs in order to use magic. So by paralyzing their bodies but not their mouths, we were able to effectively stop both of them from using any magic, period.

Agares didn't interest me. I've spoken to him already, and while he might be useful for information, my mind has been ripping itself apart as I thought of Samantha and myself in the future. I don't know what I expected to talk about with her, but hopefully it wouldn't be a waste.

I walked into the room where she was being held. She was lying on top of a rather comfortable looking bed, complete with light, airy covers. Having been teleported to my underground base, it would be fairly simple for Satan to find her if he wanted to, and no doubt he would come looking soon, but I had every intention of letting her and Agares go free... after I'd spoken to her.

I walked in the room and immediately noticed her eyes were following me. She couldn't even move her head thanks to the total paralysis.

"Oh, excellent, another suited man. Just what the doctor ordered." She rolled her eyes and then looked away from me. I noticed that one of my clones had put her in a bathrobe. Knowing myself, he probably used word magic to pop her into it, so she wouldn't get the wrong idea.

"Sama- err, Belial. I've been wanting to speak with you for a long time. I'm sorry about the manner in which you're being held, but I thought this would be the only way I could get that passionate temper of yours in check for a short while."

She stared back at me again, her eyes narrowing slightly. "My temper, huh? We've barely even spoken. How do you know anything about me? Did we really fight in the future?"

I nodded slowly as I pulled up a wooden chair next to her bed and sat down, removing my helmet. She seemed shocked that I would reveal my face to her so easily, but I thought it just had to be done.

"Yes. In the future I come from, you and I, err, clashed several times, in a manner of speaking. I wouldn't call us enemies though."

"So what are we then? Friends? As if I'd ever be friends with a human." She blinked slowly as she spoke.

"Huh? You hate humans? I thought you were somewhat fond of humans. Maybe that changed at some point over the next hundred million years..." My voice trailed off as I realized I had just blurted something out, possibly that I shouldn't have even said.

"Fond of humans? You're an interesting one. Actually, I didn't say that I hated humans. Among demons, I'm probably one of the most moderate. I neither hate nor like them. I've known a few courageous humans, over the years. I was often given missions infiltrating your kind, to seduce emperors and constables and kings, so naturally I met more than most demons would, and I've had some... long conversations with them."

She glanced away again and I could swear for a second I saw her blush. "Actually, there was one man... one human... he wasn't really all that bad. But the stupid mortal went and got himself killed, so it's not like he..." She paused as she swallowed slowly. "Well, that doesn't matter now. Anyway, the fact you seem to know so much about me while I know so little about you is rather offputting. Wouldn't you agree I'm at a disadvantage here?"

I shrugged. "Yes, I suppose so. That can't be helped though. I'm trying to change some important things about the future, but I don't know if what I'm doing is wrong or right anymore. Then there's the matter of... things I would prefer to not change, but that can wait."

"So what are you trying to change then? What is it that you want to even do? Do you have a plan at all?" Her face now held an expression of curiosity. She appeared to be interested in what I was doing.

"I sort of have a plan, but it's... vague. When I announced my presence thirty-ish years ago, I told everyone that I had to prevent the destruction of Earth. It's the only thing that I know will happen. I know a relative timeline of when it will happen as well. That gives me a deadline and a goal. Aside from that, everything else is incidental."

"Well, that's certainly... a goal." She didn't seem very convinced but it certainly sounded crazy to even think of it. "So... do you know how the Earth is destroyed?"

I shook my head. "No."

"Do you know who is to blame for its destruction?"

"No. Probably the Volgrim, but I don't actually know for a fact." I shrugged, since I didn't get any precise information from OMEN. Damn, if only I had pressed him more carefully.

"So you don't know who is going to destroy the Earth, or how they will destroy it, but you know when they will destroy it. You know, that's not going to help you out very much."

Jeez, she didn't tear me apart like this in the future. She certainly had a way of breaking down my goals to make me feel foolish.

"I suppose not. But, then again, if I can get the Volgrim to become allies, or at least stop this war and sign a treaty, that's one group out of the picture. That would only leave the demons as culprits for the destruction of Earth."

She sneered at me, all of a sudden. "Oh really? Just the demons, huh? I've got news for you, the demons love Earth. Satan only has two goals himself, which are to destroy all angels and humans, and then to live on the Earth forever, or at least until the sun explodes or whatever. I can personally guarantee you that Satan would do anything in his power to prevent Earth's destruction. If anything, you should look at the angels and gods. Their greed is surely what will destroy this planet."

I shook my head carefully. "No... you're wrong on two things. For one thing, in the future I came from, the angels and gods no longer existed. They were almost entirely exterminated. Only one survived, and a few others were technically alive in special forms, but they were a shadow of their former selves. As for the second thing you're wrong about..."

I paused, as I realized what I was about to say might be a really, really bad thing to let slip... but I wasn't sure of the date it occurred, or the location, so it probably wasn't a huge slip to tell her...

"...well, let me just ask a hypothetical question. Can Satan protect the Earth if he is no longer among the living?"

Samantha's face stared at me blankly for a moment, and then slowly started to change into... a grin?

"Ha... haha... that's a good one. I know you're from the future and all, but if you were somehow fighting me, and I survived, but Satan didn't... well, it's a good joke. There's no way he could die. And if he did, I can assure you, I'd probably kill myself too. Many demons would. Without Satan, we simply would have no purpose."

I stared at her coldly, letting my eyes speak the truth. "Satan dies, some time in the future. You did not kill yourself. I don't know many other demons in the future, but at least a couple other ones also did not. So... you're wrong."

Her expression changed to disbelief in an instant. "That's ridiculous. Have you been telling me nothing but lies this whole time? There isn't a being that could possibly kill Satan. He's developed countermeasures against every powerful foe he's met. Gabriel, Zeus, Raphael, none of the archangels could do it. Even against Unarin, the head of the Volgrim, Satan has crafted many careful countermeasures. Absolutely nobody has the power to kill him. And if they did, he'd surely know of them." I felt my gaze lower, as the thought of that monster appeared in my mind. "I don't know about that. Are you sure, absolutely sure... that nobody could defeat him?"

Her eyes flicked back and forth as she thought of every strong person possible, but she eventually brought her gaze back to me. "I'm positive. I can only maybe think of one who would stand a chance against Satan, but he vanished a long time ago. Presumably to the ether."

He?

I felt my inner thoughts digest that single word. A male? Of course I thought of Amelia, the one who had summoned Satan to best me in a battle once. Naturally, she had to have killed him in order to make him her puppet. But then again, since arriving on Earth... I hadn't thought to even once look for her. Was she even alive at this point? She was just a human. Maybe she hadn't been born yet. If I now possessed the white Orb, then the black one must have been out there somewhere, and as a child perhaps she found it, dropped in a battle by angels and demons, and she used its power unwillingly, becoming a cursed demon who roamed the land, searching for souls...

Or maybe I know nothing. Still, couldn't hurt to check. "One moment, please."

Turning away from Samantha, I walked out of the room and closed the door behind me, walking a ways down the hallway until I was well out of earshot of her room. Speaking to the air, I used my wordsmithing. " Locate. "

Immediately, my mind spread out across the universe, searching every nook and cranny for the one I sought. Quickly, it discovered her location! She was alive? And her location was in... Chicago? What the hell, she lives in a major metropolitan area?

I felt my heart pound as I thought of the implications of this discovery. Suddenly, I felt a presence watching me, not unlike when I had sought out Satan from aboard my ship.

A terrifying monstrous face appeared in my mind, as a dark dinosaur-like head hazily popped into my mind's eye.

" Well then, looks like we have an intruder. And just who might you be? "

I felt my body forcing itself to respond, but the signal was cut a moment later, as the dark presence shoved me away, cutting off the signal abruptly. What the hell?!

Part 276a:

I felt my entire body shaking slightly, as I reeled from the appearance of yet another dark presence in my mind.

When I 'died' during my battle with Satan, the curse mark lost its power on my face, though the scar persists. My clones, for some reason, never had the curse mark, so I was lucky to have it gone. Searching for presences of evil beings has proven to be very dangerous, not the simple thing I initially used to think it was. From now on, locating demons and dark gods will have to happen the hard way; intelligence and surveillance.

Making my way back down the hallway, I found myself leaning against the walls somewhat, as if my entire body was made of lead. Something about that presence... that voice... it was all too familiar, but it's been so long, I just couldn't place it.

Ah, well. I found myself returning to my simple-mindedness once again. Best not to dwell on it too much.

These things have a way of sorting themselves out.

Walking back into Belial's room, I felt my worries melt away as I saw her beautiful face once again. Then I noted her amused expression. "What's the matter? Did my beauty rile you up that much? Did you need to go take care of some business?" She winked at the last word and I felt myself blush slightly.

"No, there was something that I needed to confirm, and uh, well... I did."

She rolled her eyes. "Lighten up, it was a joke. Also, are you going to leave me paralyzed like this forever? Have you thought at all of how you're going to contain me in this prison?"

I shook my head. "No, to both questions. I'm not going to hold you here. I just wanted to have a talk with you, and we've talked. I confirmed many things, but I also had many questions bubble up as well. Containing you won't be a problem, since you and the grandpa can both go free."

She narrowed her eyes at me slightly. "Alright, that sounds nice. Why not let me go now, then? Do you have more questions that you want to ask, or is there something else that's bugging you?"

I shrugged. To be honest, I had many more questions. I needed to know what Satan was planning for the future. I needed to know if the Volgrim were still going to be allied with the demons after this betrayal. I needed to get the answers to a lot of questions, but she wouldn't be much use in this, given that she didn't even know who Amelia was.

"I suppose there is, but that doesn't really matter right now." I turned away slowly to stare out the window, leaving my back to her. My mouthpiece closed in an instant as I activated my wordsmithing. "Mobilize."

My mouthpiece jerked open silently as I turned around to her and sighed dramatically. "Hah, well, you're free to go then. If you would, feel free to grab your friend one room over, and I'll have you teleported out of here to wherever you want on Earth."

She blinked quickly as she rose up on the bed, draping her legs over the side. Instead of standing up though, she instead simply stared at me sulkily for a few moments. I was beginning to feel slightly unnerved but then she spoke up. "So that's it, hmm? And here I thought you'd want to spend a little more time with me."

I reached up to scratch my chin warily. "I don't follow..."

She waved her hand at me dismissively. "Oh come on now! I've known more than a few men in my day. You don't honestly think I can't tell you were interested in... something else? You're so careful to keep your distance, but a woman can tell when a man is lying. Or rather, when his body is lying. Isn't it time you were just a little bit more honest?"

I felt my cheeks flare up madly at what she was insinuating. She wasn't wrong, of course, but there's a difference between the her of today, and the her of one hundred million years in the future. How to put it? It's like her appearance was the same, but her personality, her entire persona, was just... wrong. Perhaps losing Satan changed her view on the universe, made her into a different person over the millennia. It just didn't feel right, as of now.

"In all honesty, we were an item in the future I came from. But that's a different time. Perhaps if the stars align themselves properly, that future will still come to pass. If they don't, if we don't, I won't forget those memories easily."

She nodded thoughtfully as she pursed her lips. Tapping her finger on her chin she stood up quietly. "Well, if that's the way you feel, I won't stop you. But if you ever change your mind... give me a call." Saying that, she pulled her hand behind her back, then forwards again, with a little card in her hand. "This is my 'business' card, just infuse it with a little magic and I'll get the memo. If you'd be so kind, please send Agares and myself to New York City. Anywhere will do."

I gently took the card from her hand, feeling her fingers touch my gloves. I felt like just letting her go was the wrong thing to do, but I decided to simply go along with it. "Sure... thanks, Belial. I'm glad we got to talk."

She nodded slowly as she pressed past me in the small room. "Sure thing. Give me a call sometime. I'll keep a line open just for you."

She slipped out the door into the hallway as I turned to follow her out.

This was not goodbye... only a temporary farewell. Yes, we would have to speak again soon.

Very soon.

"♪La la la, la la la!♪" Amelia sang a nonsensical but cheerful song as she hopped along down the street, wearing a cute blue summer dress she had taken from a local store recently. Of course, the other humans were getting smart nowadays with their cameras and whatnot, but she had no need for something as simple and transient as money, so she simply deleted files and blocked signals wherever she went. If a few people got in her way, it was always a good time for a snack!

As she sang, Leviathan, who had been dormant and silent for a few days, spoke up out of the blue. "Princess, I felt something invade my space. An intruder."

"Hmmm? You're awake, Levvy! I've been so bored without you to talk to!" She grinned cheerfully as she skipped down the streets of Chicago, happily glancing around the local ghetto to see if there was anyone that looked especially tasty on this fine day.

"Yes, I had decided to temporarily hibernate, thanks to the large disturbance I detected in the Thought Energy. A tremendous number of beings died, all at once. Tens of billions, and they didn't die on Earth either."

"Oh hmm? A lot of people died then? Well that's just too bad! Maybe if they weren't so weak and pathetic, they wouldn't die so easily, you know?" Amelia paused to glance at a store that had recently been vandalized. Its windows were shattered and the aisles were torn to pieces, but nobody was inside cleaning up. It looked to her like they had given up on fixing the mess entirely.

"My princess, not all can be as mighty as the two of us are. However, the one who invaded my space... he was not weak. He was strong. Based on the energy type, he was probably a Hero, too."

Amelia's cheerful grin evaporated instantly, as she stared into the hollow shell of the store with cold, unseeing eyes. "A Hero, you say? Ya know... it's been a long time since we saw one of those... wonder if this one is very strong?"

"Well, the last two we encountered didn't put up much of a fight. Princess, you can't go on holding a grudge like that forever. It's not healthy."

She shook her head slowly. "No... I suppose it isn't. But the way that brat... humiliated me..." Her lip trembled in rage as she thought of her very first encounter with a Hero. Some might have forgotten such a thing a long time ago, but Amelia had a long, excellent memory. She was not one to forget these things so easily.

"Yes, but don't you recall? Satan took him out, tore him to pieces. Surely you can let that go now?"

Amelia shook her head violently. "No no no! I won't forget it! I won't!" She stomped her foot on the ground in a huff of anger, the impact sending a slight tremor through the local area and a stiff wind blasting away from her. "That jerk beat me up and laughed about it! I won't rest until all the heroes are dead! And what about you, Levvy? When are you going to get your own revenge?"

The dragon sighed deeply inside her mind. "Ahh, princess... I've long since forgiven those grudges. In truth, it was never freedom that I sought, but simply a cure to my unending loneliness. Satan may have taken advantage of me, but he only did what was natural to all beings who are weak. He was merely seeking to improve his own chances of survival. Now that I have you, I don't need to-"

Amelia interrupted him with a huff. "Nonsense! You may have forgiven him, but I won't! That jerk kept my friend imprisoned! Amelia Greyheart never forgets a grudge!" She smiled a tight grin at the thought of revenge. She had been wronged many times, and in all but five cases, she had exacted revenge upon those who harmed her.

But, in time, she would get revenge. It was the one thing driving her forwards in this life.

She turned away from the store and stared up at the sky thoughtfully. "Ya know, I haven't paid much attention to things lately. Seems there's been lots of rocks falling from the sky, and people have been acting like there's bad stuff going on. Think there's another war coming?"

Leviathan tilted his scaled head down in her mind's eye, as he harumphed thoughtfully. "I'm sure there is. Humans and demons and angels are always fighting, whether each other or themselves. Perhaps we should find a newspaper to read, that might tell us what's going on."

Amelia nodded. "Good idea! First we find a newspaper, then we find the Hero! It's so simple!"

"Truly brilliant, princess. Let's get a move on, then. It's about time we got involved with the goings on of the world around us."

Part 277a:

I groaned as I slumped into my bed, back at my underground base. Taking off my helmet, I set it to the side as I flopped down face-first onto the comforting material. It was so soft... I just wanted to lie there with my face pressed against the white pillowcase and the cotton comforter and forget all my worries.

I don't know if any other people are having a worse week than me, but I can't imagine they are. Tens of billions of angels are dead, Amelia is alive, the Earth draws ever closer to its destruction, and my feet are killing me.

As I yawned, I struggled to right myself as I tried using my wordsmithing one more time. "Inspect."

My mind traveled across the cosmos and the various dimensions that existed to arrive back at Heaven. The gas was still there, and appeared to be as pungent as ever. Now that I wasn't fleeing for my life, I could really take in and examine it to see how it worked. A long string of chemical processes appeared in my mind, using exotic forms of elements on the Periodic Table, elements that might not even exist normally were it not for the fact that Unarin had used magic to create this gas.

Uploading the data to Centurion for analysis, I yawned again as I felt my eyes starting to close. My mind was still heavy, but for a moment, I thought I saw a man standing in the gas. A man clad in chainmail, holding a long sword, with a blood red cape that draped from his shoulders down to the ground.

No, that couldn't be right. I could already feel myself drifting off to sleep. The man looked at me, his bright blue eyes offset by his matted down brown hair. He wore a crown, a simple crown that might have been a gold color, were it not for the fact that the tone was muted due to age and tarnishing.

The man turned to me and smiled. "Hello, Hero. I see you've finally come."

I blinked slowly. I'm dreaming, but he's still here? Now I stood in the gas, some distance away from him. The gas was having no effect on me. "Who are you?"

He shrugged as he turned his gaze from me, towards a crumbling structure in the far distance. "I'm just a man who has lived a long life. I died before I could fully realize my well-laid plans, but I suppose all men die before they are finished. Everyone dies with regrets."

I nodded slowly. "Yeah, that makes sense. Alexander the Great had plans to conquer the entire world, but he died too young, and never got to finish his quest. Many others before and after him died too early."

The man shook his head as he walked over and sat down on a rock, clasping his hands in front of himself. "Nay... it is not that men die too young, it's that a man's work is never done. One could have an eternity to live, and still their goals would pile on and increase, day in and day out. There is no end to a man's ambition and desire. All men die with regrets."

I swallowed slowly as I stared down at the sitting figure. "What is the point of life, then? Why do we strive so hard to fix things or to ruin things, if in the end our work is never done?"

He smiled faintly at my words. "A good question. How about we start with yourself, first. What are your plans?"

"Oh, that's easy." I let the last word lilt off my tongue sarcastically as I roll my eyes. "I merely want to prevent the destruction of Earth, save all humans, and prevent a massive extinction level event of the angels and gods. How hard can it be?"

He nodded sagely, apparently taking my words as literal. "A fine goal! Truly, few heroes have ever set their minds towards such a lofty purpose. But after you save the world, if you should be so lucky, what then? What task must you undertake in the coming days, months, years?"

I felt my eyes lower as I reached up and rubbed my chin. "Hmm... well, I don't know, exactly... I suppose if the war is ended, and we're allies with the Volgrim and the demons, then I've accomplished my goals and I just pick a new one based on how it all turns out."

His smile slowly dissipated as he replied. "I was like you once. A powerful hero, one who fought to give aid to my people. My goals were far less lofty than your own, but I would say I had my heart in the right place."

"So what happened? Did you save your people after all?"

He smacked his fist into his other hand's open palm. "Indeed! I crushed the Saxons and laid waste to those who opposed me! Then I rebuilt my kingdom and died of old age, with a beautiful wife at my side."

"It sounds like you accomplished all of your goals. Do you have regrets?"

"Yes..." His voice trailed off for a moment as he composed himself. "I had all of the power that I needed, yet my biggest regret is that I was too weak-willed to spread the goodness of my rule to all corners of the Earth. My people lived wealthy, luxurious lives, yet I did not try to spread that wealth among all the other peoples of the Earth. I believe I was lazy and slothful, in the end."

"You said you were a hero, but if you fought for your people, how could you consider yourself lazy at the same time?"

He pointed at me as he narrowed his eyes. "Because... with all of that power, I only sought to do the barest minimum needed. I was unstoppable on the battlefield, a tactical genius in the war room, and a monster in the bedroom, yet my conquests in all those areas were small and insignificant, and their effects would surely have gone to waste within a hundred years of my death."

I smiled at him as I cocked an eyebrow. "I see, so you aren't ashamed of your performance, but of the fact that the effects of your rule were short lived. You spent all that time building a kingdom, but if it were to crumble afterwards, then it wasn't sturdily built in the first place."

"You speak truth." The man stood up slowly as he stretched his arms in front of himself, then he dusted off his pants. "You know, I was probably the strongest Hero that ever lived. If I have regrets, I'm sure you will too, in time."

I nodded as I eyed him up and down. "The strongest, huh? You know, you never told me your name. I'm pretty used to talking to random strangers in my dreams but it gets old, after a while. Won't you humor me?"

He chuckled at my comment. "Amusing. You already know who I am, Jason. Take good care of Excalibur for me, lad. We'll talk again, soon. Oh, and try and actually train with the bloody thing once in a while... using your fists is a waste when you've got such a gem in your possession."

The man walked away from me, whistling as he walked. It reminded me of an old English tune I had heard, many years ago...

I stirred slowly, my eyes rumbling open as I fought my way back to reality. A quick glance at the wall monitor told me it was 8:04 AM. I had slept soundly through my 7 AM alarm.

It was a good snooze.

Sitting up slowly on my bed, I rubbed my eyes with my gloved hands, groaning that once again I had slept in my Hypersuit. I forget to take it off all the time, and I've practically grown used to living in it.

Aiming my mind at my body, I spoke a word. "Clean." Instantly, my body felt as though I had taken a two hour shower. Not as good as the real thing, but certainly much quicker.

I heard a knock at my door. Using my wordsmithing, I deduced that it was one of the Hypersuit Commandos, though not one I recognized, and not one of my clones. Putting on my helmet, I spoke. "Come in."

A woman walked in the door, her nameplate announcing her presence as 'Jane F. Lafayette'. Apparently she was from the French legion. "I hope I didn't disturb you. I have a report I need you to sign off for, regarding supplies in Cambodia."

I rolled my eyes, though she couldn't see them under my helmet. "Alright. I don't see why I have to sign this, but sure."

As I reached over and scrawled my signature on the paper, I noticed that her helmet was fully closed up. She was actually speaking to me through speakers added on to the sides of her cheeks. Handing the paper back to her, I decided to inquire. "Why don't you use the standard mouth cover for your suit? Don't you like fresh air?"

She shook her head as she took the papers back. "Sorry, commander, I wasn't sure if modifying the suits was allowed or not. I was fighting against the Volgrim in one particularly foul smelling area, so I devised a system in my off hours to transmit sound over speakers instead of having to open the suit up. Besides that, it was tactically inefficient to have to expose my face during combat to communicate with allies. If these suits are supposed to make us invincible, exposing myself seemed like a poor method of communication."

She paused as I almost could perceive embarrassment in her voice. "I could, err, just change it back, if it's not allowed..."

I shook my head quickly, as I stood up from my seated position on the bed. "Ah, no! That's fine. Please, keep up the good work, Lafayette."

She nodded as she brusquely saluted and left the room, leaving me to my own thoughts.

A speaker in the helmet? That was actually smart... I should get to work on that for my own purposes. Being able to hide my wordsmithing more easily would be one immediate way this would benefit me.

After creating myself some lunch with my powers, I walked out the door towards the intelligence branch of my underground base. I have some work to do.

Part 278a:

I remember when I was a kid, someone told me "Trust nobody, not even yourself."

It's kind of ironic, given my entire intelligence division is staffed entirely by my clones. Also, Harold's wife, Helen, she teleports down here occasionally. But generally speaking, this place is only for myself. Each clone is their own person, but they're all me, essentially, and we all understand our goal. I only keep the lowest level clones here, since there appears to be no degradation of their minds, only of their spiritual energy levels.

Naturally, one of the clones was assigned recently to monitor anything possible that might give us a lead on finding Amelia. A few of the other clones keep eyeballs on various radar systems around the world to watch for Satan, demon activity, and anything that might be relevant to the future, specifically.

The clone who has been monitoring for Amelia (I call him Jasolia, because it's amusing. He doesn't like the name, not that I can blame him) turns to me as I walk in. "Yo! Nothing to report of immediate concern, but I have been looking into some incidents that occurred in Paris a few years ago. Pretty gruesome... might be related, since the killer was never found."

I nod as he pulls up the files and sends them over to my visor feed.

Images of bodies that look like they were ripped to shreds appear in my visor. Some have unnaturally large bite marks taken out of them. That being said, in the future, Amelia ate a human whole right in front of me, so it seems unlikely she would leave parts behind.

"Official reports from the local news state these were likely caused by attacks from a roving gang of wild dogs. All the victims were killed in the night-time, in dark alleys, where they were likely to roam." Jasolia pulls up a heatmap of the areas hit.

I squint as I look at them. The attacks were all in a giant circle, all located around one central spot. If they were caused by wild dogs like the media said, then it would indicate their home was somewhere in that middle spot. But then again, I might say the same for Amelia too. I don't know if she simply likes the, err, taste of humans... or if she needs them for sustenance, or if at this point she needs them at all, but her horrifying eating habits are the only way I can think of to track her down.

"Yeah... I suppose it might just be wild dogs. But since I don't have anything better to do right now, I'll go and check it out."

Jasolia nods as he turns back to the computer. "Sure. I'll tell you if anything else comes up. Oh, and watch yourself, man. We both know what she is capable of."

"Yeah, you said it."

I turn and walk away from the clone intelligence center. None of the others had anything interesting to report or they'd be pestering me. Unlike in the future, when I was making clones all the time willy-nilly, I now keep a careful registry of when every new clone is made. Centurion helps with the records, allowing me to access the full list at any time I want. Right now there are about thirty level 2's, seventy level 3's, and the numbers get much bigger the further you go down the levels. I'd say I have about 2,000 clones in total currently, and could double that number overnight if I really needed to.

There's always a worry, deep in the back of my mind, that my clones will turn on me. I can't help it, I just feel the fear all the time. I've grown used to it, given there hasn't been an incident like the Hope incident in the last 20 years, but I just can't shake the feeling. Better safe than sorry, as they say.

I walk down the corridors to make one last stop in the Training Room, a heavily reinforced room that I use to practice my abilities or to train new Hypersuit Commandos. Today there are a few dozen flying around, beating the crap out of each other, and it's all good fun. Of course, my good friend Gregory is there, a demon who has helped me with intelligence on the demon community for a solid twenty years now.

"Gregory, I'm heading to Paris. Want any souvenirs?"

He chuckles as he keeps an eye on the proceedings. Naturally he's the training commander now, in charge of making sure all new recruits are up to snuff. "That's cute, since you and I both know 'souvenir' is a French word. You thought I wouldn't catch that?"

"Actually, it started off as Latin, but close enough."

He shrugs at me. "So, what do you need in Paris? Been a while since you were there."

"I need to find an... old friend of mine. Heard she might be around the area."

"Old friend?" He cocks an eyebrow. "You don't have 'old friends', unless you mean from after the start of the war or something. Or is she-" He pauses as a knowing smile spreads across his face. "Ahhh, I see. It's like that then, eh? I won't pry into your personal affairs."

I scowl. "No, idiot, it's not like that. She's a person of interest in a case I'm looking into. In any case, I need you to take over war operations until I get back. Probably will be a few days at most, but if you really need me, we both know I can get back here in an instant. Don't hesitate to call me."

"Mhm." Gregory stares at me thoughtfully for a few moments. "You know, word via the grapevine is that Satan's special lady was caught here and then let go. I think Satan wasn't too happy about that, but he was mostly mad that she was caught."

"Well, if he's mad at us, that doesn't exactly change anything. We're enemies, after all."

Gregory shakes his head. "No, I mean he was mad at her. She's supposed to be the second strongest of all demons. If she gets caught, it's a stain on the names of the demons in the highest echelons. Makes them think the humans are actually leading them into a trap. That's good news for you though, a bit of unrest means their war council won't be so eager to rush into a battle with us again. Hell, they're mad that you were able to rescue billions of angels, as well as yourself."

Gregory glances away from me for a moment, sniffing. "I mean, I'm not exactly happy about those angels being saved either. I don't exactly want their blood, but I'm not fond of them either."

I roll my eyes at his words. "Gregory, we're friends, but someday we have to do something about that... 'angelism' of yours."

He shrugs again. "Yeah, maybe. I dunno, I wasn't there for the Holy Wars, but I was alive for the Crusaders and the purges, the combined evil of humans, guided by angels and gods, didn't leave a good impression in my mind. You know, it's only an irrational fear if it doesn't harm you... but angels, from my perspective, are extremely harmful. I don't like them, and doubt I ever will."

I wanted to ask about the Crusades, but it seemed a tender subject for him, so I left it behind. "Fair enough. I'll try to keep your feelings in mind, next time. In any case, I'm off. Have fun running the show, boss."

Gregory nods as I turn and walk away. "Take care of yourself. Without you, I don't want to think of what all of us would be going through right now."

It's a feeling I'm all too used to hearing about.

Part 279a:

Paris... a beautiful city in the past, but one that has been reduced to rubble three times in the last fifty years.

Parisians have it hard. Even with the massive worldwide remodeling that took place, Parisians of all people were very fearful of technology after the nanobot hacking incident in 2027. They had the highest percentage of enhanced humans of any major city in the world, and it backfired horribly. Now they are among the lowest, with the government even banning human enhancements, to the chagrin of some 20% of their people.

I can't say I blame the government, though. Between debris from outer space, the entire population going serial-killer crazy for two straight days, and the Volgrim attacks, every cleanup effort has been halted halfway through and they're only finally managing to pull themselves together.

I walked down the streets of Paris, surveying the Eiffel Tower district. It's rebuilt now, and in decent shape. I can't see why they didn't make any improvements to it, perhaps turning it into a transmitter tower or a weather control platform. It's so odd that in the modern day world, there exists a major metropolitan city that leaves its weather to chance. They could always ask Versailles to alter Paris' weather, but it takes a lot more energy to use a remote tower than it does to use a local tower. HAARP proved that in the early 2000's.

After an hour or so, I arrive in the slums where the migrants tend to congregate. It's quite filthy here, with debris littered all over the streets, buildings that have become rickety as time went on, and the smell of the place is oftentimes vomit inducing. It smells like someone left a massive pile of bananas and other assorted fruits in the sun for too long. Occasionally I see children playing in the streets, but when they spot me, they run away quickly. Seems people aren't too keen on strangers in these parts.

Of course, I'm not wearing my Hypersuit right now. Instead, I'm wearing a plain brown leather jacket, with a pair of blue jeans and some black sneakers. I'm not exactly trying to fit in with the local population, but I certainly don't want people knowing a Hypersuit Commando is here. We're quite world famous and it would make investigations rather hard.

My face is disguised too. I took a mental image of a random police officer I found back in the states and copied his face onto mine, along with a few small alterations, just in case. Wouldn't want the guy getting fired for being spotted in a totally different country when he was supposed to be on the job! Facial recognition in security cameras is a nightmare these days.

Walking down the street, I quietly use my word magic to inspect various items and buildings. It's like having Sherlock Holmes powers, but without putting any effort into it. My innate telepathy is also sweeping the area, trying to let me find any clues that I can as to Amelia's whereabouts. I could just use 'locate' to find her, but I don't want that... thing knowing I'm looking.

Shuffling up to a ramshackle beaten up old auto repair shop, I happen to see a man inside, whirring away with a drill on a nice looking red Chevy, probably something from the 60's by the looks of it, though I'm not good with identifying cars. It's got a spoiler on the back, though I can't help but wonder what the heck purpose that serves.

I amble up to him and cough to announce my presence. The man stops drilling and glances at me. "Can I... help you?" No trace of a French accent. I detect a hint of a British or possibly Australian accent in his voice, though it's hard to tell from his first words. The guy has a protective face-mask on, likely because of the welding tools I spot on his far side.

"Yes, if you please. I'm trying to find a friend of mine. She lives in the area, black hair, looks like she's about age 12-15. Her name is Amelia. Know her?"

The guy stares at me for a long few moments before slowly turning his gaze back to the car as he continues drilling. "Look, I don't want no trouble, alright pal? If you're a cop and you're trying to catch me up for something, get lost. Your kind ain't welcome here."

"I'm just looking for a friend, that's all." I try the sincere approach, hoping it works.

The guy shakes his head slowly. "Sure you are. Looking around for some little girl... you creeps disgust me. There's a titty bar down the road, head east five blocks and you'll see it on the right. At least get your fix with a mature woman."

I blanch at his words. Come to think of it, my request was a little off in the head. I guess I can't blame him for jumping to wrong conclusions. "Uhh, I think you misunderstand, I'm not looking for anything... like that. She's my niece and I'm visiting from America. Please, if you could help me find out any idea of where she might live, I'll leave you alone."

The guy slowly rolls his eyes. "Christ. Thought she was your 'friend'? Now she's your niece, huh? There's an orphanage down the road, take a left on this street corner, head down two blocks, take a left, go another block, then take a right. It's called Hannah's Hope Heritage. Now piss off, fucking pedophile."

The guy angled his body away from me to put his back in my face. I saw him also reach down to his side as he placed his hand on a pistol. Best not to bother him any more. Smiling cheerfully, I say goodbye. "Thanks, sorry for bothering you."

"Get lost." Before he could pull the pistol, I beat a hasty retreat. It's not like the gun would hurt me in the slightest, but I didn't want to make a scene.

I walk away, gritting my teeth. Damn, I'm socially awkward, and that entire conversation could have gone so much worse than it already did. I need a new approach.

You know, I've never done very much questioning or interrogation. I don't know why this has never occurred to me, but with all my limitless powers, I've never tried to up my game in that department... hmm...

Some minutes later, I arrive at the orphanage the man spoke of. I knock on the door and a couple long minutes pass as nobody comes out. Just as I reach up to knock again, the door creaks open and an old woman peeks out. "What? What is it? Who are you?"

Her tone is almost accusatory in nature as her gaze moves up and down my body, squinting due to bad eyesight. "Uh, hello, my name is Steve Ackman, I'm looking to see if my niece lives here."

"Niece? You think one of these mongrels is yours? Ha! That's a good one." She glares at me but also laughs, and I'm not sure whether she's laughing at me, or laughing with me. Probably the former though.

"My niece is named Amelia. Is she living here?"

The old lady sneers at me. "Like I'd tell you! Hannah doesn't give away information to random strangers so easily!"

I frown at her remark. Hmm... this might be a good time to try something new.

Aiming my mind at her, I speak a single word. "Truth."

She stares at me blankly and I try again. "Does a girl named Amelia live here?"

She stares at me blankly for another moment before shaking her head. "What a weirdo! I ain't telling you a thing! If you want to know about these kids, bring the adoption forms, or bring the police! Get out!"

Before I could respond, she slams the door on my face. Odd, she didn't say whether Amelia was there or not, and she acted as if my wordsmithing had no effect on her. I wonder what that means. Maybe 'Truth' isn't specific enough? Turning my mind to the inside of the house, my telepathy tells me there are fifteen kids inside, plus Hannah and an older man. None of the kids have any special mental barriers, and all of them seem normal. I don't think Amelia is here.

Pivoting on my heel, I sigh. This is going to be a long day.

Part 280a:

I knew this was going to happen. Damn my luck!

As I walked, I felt drops of water dripping downwards, as the sky bared its fangs at me, dumping a light torrential rain over my head. Fantastic. This is what happens when you live like mongrels in the middle of the 21st century and don't have weather control towers!

Standing under an open doorway as a massive blast of rain falls from the sky, I sigh in defeat. I've been at this for hours, and I haven't got the slightest whiff of her trail.

Glancing behind me to the doorway I had rushed under, I notice it's actually an antique shop of some sort. 'Will's Weird, Wacky, and Worn Heirlooms', huh? What's up with all these stupidly convoluted names? All the people around here act like they don't want to meet strangers, but then they name their buildings such weird names that you want to have a peek, just to see if the carpet matches the drapes.

Pausing hesitantly, I finally gather the courage to step inside. The place is dimly lit, apparently by old incandescent bulbs from the early 2000's. Man, talk about living like a caveman in a modern city. They must really hate technology.

"H-hello?" I almost cough as I speak, the dust is so thick in the air here. Everything is covered in it, clearly not a place that people visit very often.

Walking around, I glance here and there at all the... crap that's littered about. I dunno, 'antique' just isn't a word you throw around. Valuable china pots are antique, things created in limited quantities are antique... but random pots and pans are decidedly not antique. I spot a Mickey Mouse mug with a chipped bottom piece, with a hole you could stick a straw through. Too bad, that might actually be valuable were it not for the functional and cosmetic damage.

Walking past an entire wall of grandfather clocks (I don't know why, but every antique shop always has clocks for some reason), my nose begins to detect a whiff of... something. It smells like iron, maybe? Someone certainly has not been cleaning up around here in a long time. It's probably rust or maybe rotted food.

As I sneak my way past all manner of other assorted junk, including a bunch of fake jewelry, I wrinkle my nose as the smell becomes stronger. There's a door closed to the back room. "Employees Only", it says. Employees? Plural? More than one person ever worked here?

I knock hesitantly at the door, but nobody answers. Waiting for several long seconds, my stomach is twisting in knots. I'm undoubtedly breaking several laws by being here right now, and opening this door adds several more. Oh well, are they really going to prosecute the savior of humanity for a little crime like trespassing, or breaking and entering? Get real.

I reach for the door handle and rotate it, but it just spins forever in my hand. Seems to be broken. Huh. Pushing on it lightly, the door loudly creaks open, which makes the otherwise silent room aside from the pitter-pattering of rain feel even creepier than it did before.

As the door opens, a wave of nauseating smells slams into me, blasting from out of the room as I detect a quiet but definitely audible buzzing noise. My eyes squeeze shut as the smell smashes into me, but I quickly use my wordsmithing, not giving a damn if anyone hears. "

Purify! "

Instantly the smell vanishes, but the memory of it lingers in my mind... and my mouth.

Finally I open my eyes and almost yelp in horror. There's a body in the room, and an old man. I shouldn't say 'body', as it's more like... large chunks of him... thrown all over the place. It's like if a massive crocodile grabbed hold of someone and shook them around so violently that pieces ripped off and went flying. Actually, that's exactly what it looks like. What the hell is this?!

" Inspect. "

An array of data enters my mind. Well, this is Will, the guy who ran this place. Analysis shows that he died at the ripe old age of 85 years old. But his body has been decomposing in this room for... five entire months?! Disgusting.

His body is melted into the ground in several places, and the entire room is covered in rust-colored blood. Whatever killed him, it certainly had his way.

Then, I glance more carefully at the data. It seems there are... traces of magic? Whatever killed him, it used demonic magic of a sort. So... it was probably a demon... or worse. "Killer? "

Speaking a question into the wind, I decide to ask the wordsmithing gods, assuming they exist. If it doesn't work, no harm in trying.

It works.

An image of the killer's face appears in my mind. That is, without a doubt, Amelia. She was here. She did this.

It's hard to believe that I found this murder on my first day of being here in Paris, but this place was out of the way. Were it not for the rain, I probably wouldn't have even stopped in here to look around. Seems nobody else did, either. I wonder if there are any other bodies in these slums like this? Are there others the police haven't found?

Walking back outside, I use wordsmithing to clean up evidence of myself being here. After phoning in the crime to the local police, I quickly leave the premises so they can come in and clean up. I wonder if the old guy had any family or friends? If he did, they'd be horrified to see what happened to him.

It's just... unforgivable. If Amelia really did do this, then she's every bit the monster I knew in the future. Just how long has she lived? How strong is she? How evil is she?

I need to find her and speak to her.

Harold pops into my mind later that night, as I'm staying in a nice 3-star hotel on the west side of Paris. I'd prefer a five star, but I don't want to attract any attention, and three stars are plenty comfortable for one night.

"Yo, kid! How are ya holdin' up?"

I shrug slightly, as I ponder the question. "Not sure. I found a body today... some poor old codger was offed by the girl I'm looking for."

Harold nods slowly. "Mmm. Mmm. Yeap, you gotta watch out fer them gold diggers! I tell ya what, you find yourself a nice wife like mah Helen, you'll be one lucky man! Anyways, I was jes' callin' ya up to let ya know that Beatrix called and wanted to talk to ya about help with the moon-base expansion project. If ya can give her a call, I'm sure she'd appreciate it."

I smile at him. "Sure thing, Harold. How are you and Helen doing? Enjoying the time together?"

"Yeap, as always, we're doing what we do best; spendin' lots o' time with each other to talk about life and the universe. You know how it is. And if ya don't know, well, maybe someday ya will!"

I nod quietly as we say our goodbyes. As Harold signs off, I'm left with the thought that he brought up... I miss Cassiel, and seeing Samantha ripped my heart in half. To think that she's with an enemy of mine doesn't make me feel very good. I just want to say 'screw the timeline' and whisk her away, but she's far too attached to him. Then, if I kill Satan, she'll surely blame and hate me forever for it. Then again, maybe she'd get turned on or something... women are complicated, especially when they're Succubi.

Oh well. It's sleep time. I'll just have to think about it in the morning.

As I climb into bed and immediately feel the effects of sleep grabbing hold of me, I once again hear a familiar voice speaking to me... one that sounds like...

"Look at that. You're back for round two." A familiar man stands in the distance, a sword held firmly in his hand, his body garbed in chainmail, as he wears a crown I've seen before, in a previous dream.

As he takes a swing at the tree, I note that the blade chops cleanly a few inches into the trunk and swipes through as if it were made of paper. "Your name is Arthur, right? King of the Britons?"

He rolls his eyes as he stabs at the tree, pulling the sword out a split second later with little effort. "You're a smart cookie. You know, I entered your mind years ago when you first took Excalibur from Lady Britannia, yet you never once thought to talk to me. Yet here you are again."

I shrug as I walk closer to him. I can't help but notice the sword he's swinging around is none other than Excalibur itself. "I dunno. I didn't exactly want to speak with you, it just kind of happened the first time. And now this time too, I guess."

He returned the shrug as he sheathed his sword and turned to face me. "Well, you're here now. That's what matters. Have you come to seek my counsel on how to properly wield this mighty, legendary blade?"

I stare at him for a moment with my mouth going slightly slack before I finally respond. "Uhh, no... not exactly. I didn't have any questions for you at all, to be honest."

"Oh. I... see." Arthur returns the dumbfounded stare as he quickly turns away and walks over to the tree, laying his back against it. "W-well, I mean, since you're here, I suppose if you err, wanted to... you know, if that was a thing you wanted to do... I could maybe show you how to use it...?"

His cheeks flared up a little and I realized that he was feeling embarrassed. Of course, he was a legendary hero whose exploits were told in children's tales, and if he was a literal Hero, then it's possible his legends were actually weakened over time, since most probably thought they were just silly children's stories blown up to sound exciting.

"Actually, rather than that, how about we discuss your life? I'd like to know more about you and your exploits as a Hero." Deciding not to let the moment go to waste, I felt the need to pry into his personal life. If he told me 'no' then no big deal, sword training would be nice too.

"Well... I mean, if you've heard the stories, you've heard all you need to know." Arthur held his palms out with the flats facing up to show there wasn't much to talk about. "I slayed the Saxons, built a kingdom, killed a hundred million demons, and married a queen from a Roman country. No big deal I guess."

"You killed a hundred million demons?" There was a small grin plastered on his face, but it disappeared when I brought that up.

"Well... yes. Probably more, actually. It was hard to count accurately, considering their bodies were totally obliterated in an instant. However, to say that it was a total rout would be... inaccurate."

He shuffled uneasily as he spoke. Something about this seemed like it was less of an epic conquest and more of a major mistake he deeply regretted. "I mean, I don't know much about you, Jason, only what you've seen when you grasp Excalibur firmly in your hands, but even you know a little about Excalibur's signature power."

I nod slowly. "The beam of light? The one that I used to destroy a Volgrim Battlecruiser with?"

He nodded quietly. "Yes... that's the one. But the thing is, that beam of light is a double edged sword, literally. I should preface this by informing you once more that I was, by far, the most powerful Hero who ever lived, at least in terms of raw spiritual energy."

I cock an eyebrow. "Really? The most powerful by sheer quantity then? Just how much exactly did you have?"

He chuckles a little bit. "That's amusing. I still have that energy. I'm not actually dead, Jason. I never died."

"What? But you told me you died an old man on your bed. How could I have the Hero's power if you didn't die and pass it on to the next in line?" I was dumbfounded. It would certainly make sense that he wasn't actually dead, given that I was speaking to him now. But... how was it possible?

"That's the thing, Jason. I still am the most powerful Hero. Far stronger than even you, as you are now. My Heroic gift given to me was monstrous levels of energy, the ability to detect energy, and the ability to predict energy. Combined with Excalibur's ability to fire off blasts of its wielder's energy, as well as healing them if they died, I was beyond unstoppable when it came to combat. Beyond that, I was forced into a circumstance later on in life that prevented me from continuing to live normally. Since I was going to die, I simply gave up the actual presence of the Heroic Aura, and it passed on to the next one when I sealed my soul inside of Excalibur, leaving it to Lady Britannia to keep hold of. In the wrong hands, Excalibur could destroy the entire planet. It is no child's toy."

His long speech left me with many questions, but already I was filled with wonder. "So, then, if you're here in this sword, I bet I could just manifest you physically outside of it! I can already think of the words required! You would surely be helpful to have as an ally against the Volg-

Arthur cut me off with a vicious glare, causing me to stop mid-sentence. "I think not, Jason. Don't ever presume to take my life into your own hands. I do not deserve to be out there, in the physical world. After... after what I did... I..."

Arthur paused for a moment as tears welled up in his eyes. Turning his head away so I couldn't see, he wiped them away quickly. His voice was choked when he finally regained his composure a moment later. "...All that power... and in the end, I was no Hero. I killed them all, you know. Not just the demons, but the humans too. Excalibur's blast leveled an entire mountain, causing a landslide that killed 100,000 humans. And in the end, they still called me a hero. Wrote stories, and plays about me... just... rubbish. Garbage. I don't deserve the title."

He bit his lip bitterly as he gazed off into the distance. I stayed silent for a few moments to allow him to clear his mind, before I replied. "I understand. I... I didn't realize something like that had happened."

"Yeah... nobody saw it coming. The power of the Hero had been growing exponentially, and after what happened with me, the Gods decided to severely limit it for future generations, for fear it would grow out of control. The Heroic Aura manifests itself the most in times of need, you know. If I've learned anything from my life... it's that there are no heroes and villains, only greedy people on one side or another looking to save their own skin, serve their own interests."

I paused thoughtfully as he spoke. "So, if that's the case, what about my powers? I don't know what powers many past heroes had, but mine seem especially strong and useful, almost overpowered to a certain extent."

He shrugged. "I'm not sure what your abilities are. I only know what I've seen when you held Excalibur in your hands. You'll have to explain your abilities to me first."

I hesitated, given that I didn't know if I could trust him with the information or not. Finally, I decided to simply explain it.

A few minutes later, he nodded thoughtfully. "Wordsmithing, hm? Yes, that does sound especially useful. Certainly more robust than previous heroes, including myself. The ability to create and heal, in my opinion, is far more important than the ability to kill and maim. With this power, you could do real good to help the world, even the universe."

I snicker slightly. "So, what, I'm like a god, right? This power is pretty ridiculous, right?"

He sighed slowly. "Well... perhaps it is. Frankly, I see too many openings to even consider it good. For one thing, if your mouth is ever maimed, your powers are useless. If someone silences you, they're useless. If someone sucks the air out of your body, they're useless. If you get dunked underwater, they're useless. It's certainly a useful ability, but it's not impregnable. Not to mention your body is quite frail. Against a demon, like Diablo, or Bael, or Satan, they would crush you into pulp with one punch. And, as you said, they have ways of shielding themselves from your kill-words. Don't get a big head when you're easily destroyed by such powerful adversaries. Even Satan was... too much for me."

"Satan is strong, but he's not the one I'm worried about. It's Amelia who I'm having trouble with."

I toss her name out nonchalantly, but Arthur's face changes in an instant, as a look of total horror spreads over his face. "T-that name... what was that name again?"

I raise an eyebrow at him, noting his posture has changed and he now stands defensively, as if to prepare for an attack from an unseen foe. "Uh... Amelia. She's really tough. I only managed to kill her in the future thanks to the help from a dear friend of mine."

He swallowed carefully and collected himself with a single, long deep breath. "You can only be referring to Amelia Greyheart. I will not forget that name for as long as I live. I discovered her identity in some old Roman records when I defended a village on the Egyptian coast to kill some raiding Saxons. After that, she came to me in Camelot, and announced her presence. She somehow evaded all of my best security like it was nothing, something even the demons couldn't do."

He paused quietly as he wiped his forehead with his hand. "...Suffice to say, I did not kill her. She was monstrous. She broke my body down in ways that would horrify you, and she left me to die in my own land. I only survived thanks to Excalibur's healing powers, something she luckily did not take notice of. I would advise staying far, far away from her."

The terror on his face was palpable. I licked my dried lips carefully as I felt my own throat was cracking. "I believe it. However, this is non-negotiable. She is brutally killing innocent people, in horrifying ways. Devouring their bodies. I can't let her continue to terrorize the world from the shadows. Even the demons don't seem to know about her."

Arthur nodded quietly. "Yes, and it needs to stay that way. Trust me, Jason, if you chase after her, only agony and torture await. She will kill you in the most gruesome manner possible. She will maim you so badly that even in the afterlife the nightmares will haunt you. Don't make the same mistake I did. If you see her... flee."

I nodded quietly, as I noticed that the world around me seemed to be fading.

"Well, seems our time is up. Perhaps we'll talk again in the near future. Make sure you show up, Jason, or you won't get to learn about Excalibur's secret abilities." Arthur smiled a friendly grin as he wandered away from me, the world dissolving into a veil of light...

Part 281a:

My eyes blink open slowly as I feel my body is chilled to the touch. The hotel room is so cold that I just want to huddle up and stay under the covers forever.

As I blink my eyes, I decide to warm the place up with a quick word spell. " War- "

"So you're awake." A voice speaks out right as I start to wordsmith and my mouth snaps shut as I flip my head reflexively over towards the source of the voice.

A little girl sits over on the other side of the room, wearing a bright and cheerful blue summer dress. She's leaning one arm on a table right next to her, her face set into her palm. "Jeez, you slept so soundly you didn't even hear me come in. Some Hero you are."

My face blanches as I instantly realize... she's Amelia. I was expecting her to be wearing that odd gothic lolita dress she usually wore when I knew her, but maybe that was just a fashion choice she picked up in the future. Sitting up slowly in the bed, I carefully rotate from my facedown position until I'm facing her straight on, while still sitting in the bed calmly.

"Amelia. So you came." Keeping my voice even, my heart pounds rapidly as I realize I'm not wearing my hypersuit. It's not something that can be thrown on in an instant either, considering the speed I've seen her move at, three seconds to summon it with wordsmithing and then wordsmith it onto my body is two seconds too long.

Her eyes light up slightly and she sits up straight in the chair. "Oh? You know my name? You know, it's not polite to stalk a girl, might even give her the wrong idea."

She eyes me up and down, my powerful and tall masculine figure the exact opposite of her fragile and small appearance. Of course, appearances could be deceiving. If what I've heard is true, she's supposed to be even more powerful now than she was in the future. Satan from the future confirmed that.

"I've been looking for you. I wanted to talk. How did you know I was here... or that I was looking for you?"

My heart is pounding so hard I could almost swear she was able to hear it. She shrugs in response. "Anytime I leave a mess behind, I leave a souvenir to let me know if anyone comes looking. I always want to know if people remember me. What's curious though, is that I have no idea who you are, but you even know my name."

I can't help but notice that the way she's speaking is different from her super cheerful personality in the future. Is she always like this now? Why is she so different from how I knew her in the future? She wears different clothes, doesn't have the black orb, and acts differently... yet she's every bit the brutal murdering monster from when I last saw her, if the wordsmithing gods were correct when they revealed her face to me.

I stared at her for a moment before replying. "Do you watch TV or read newspapers?"

She rolled her eyes. "Yes, I think he's mocking me." She appeared to speak to someone, but there was nobody else in the room. "I don't do either of those things, but if you think that implying I'm stupid will fly, think again!" She sneered at me and I felt my head pull back reflexively.

Something about her seemed... off. That might sound odd, given she was a massive genocidal serial killer, but she just didn't seem like the Amelia I knew.

"I, ah, I don't think you're stupid. It's just that I'm a very well known person in the world. I'm from the future. I time traveled back in time to change the flow of time."

It wasn't true, exactly, since I didn't intend to travel back this far and had no idea what I was doing when it came to changing the past, but it sounded reasonable enough.

Amelia didn't laugh at me, or snicker, she just... stared blankly. "Right... the future. Alright, so if you're from the future, and you know my name... then...?" She trailed off as her voice left an unspoken question hanging in the air.

I paused as I wasn't sure how to continue, but I decided to wing it. "Well, see, in the future I come from, you and I are friends. I've been looking for you to meet up with you."

She stared at me for a good few moments before a tiny smile crept onto her face. "Heh... hehe... friends... hahaha.... HAHA... HAHAHA!!!" She burst into a maniacal fit of laughter as she stumbled forwards and fell off the chair, rolling around on the ground, her calm composure and oddly normal manner of speaking totally gone now. This was more like what I was expecting. After a few moments, she calmed down a little bit and stumbled to her feet, grabbing hold of the chair to pull herself up, but she accidentally crushed it in her hands and fell back down. It didn't seem to bother her.

"Ha... haha... oh jeez, what a great joke! Me, a friend with a Hero! Haha, every generation the heroes get dumber and dumber!" She wiped tears of laughter from her eyes as she stood up and faced me. I quickly rose out of bed and stood up to my full height. Wearing only a small polo shirt and some sweat pants for sleeping in, I felt very naked in the face of her power. I was only seconds away from a swift and sure death, my only solace being that my clones would live on to change the future.

"Boy, it's like he thinks trickery and lies will get me to lower my guard. It's cute, really." Amelia once again seemed to be speaking to someone else, but there was nobody else in the room. I resisted the urge to raise an eyebrow, as I didn't want to piss her off and lose my head.

"I'm not lying. We were friends. I even know that you eat people to gain spiritual energy. I don't know a lot of personal details about you, because you were always so guarded when it came to your past, but I know that while you may do bad things, you're a good girl at heart."

I lied at the end, but telling her, as a Hero, that I knew she was outright evil would make the friendship thing even more of a stretch.

Her smile dissipated as she stared at me coldly. "Yes, he's surely lying. You think I should just do it already?"

I felt my teeth starting to chatter. Not because of the cold room, which was odd enough given this was only August, but because of the malice I could almost tangibly feel flowing from her body. Every fiber in my being screamed at me. Escape. Escape. Escape.

I resisted the urge to move my eyes around the room, keeping them firmly locked on her as I put on a false model of bravado. Mentally sending a message to Harold, I quickly told him to keep an eye on me and if she made any sudden moves to get me out of here.

"Amelia, you might not believe me, but you are my friend. I need your help now. I need you to help me put an end to this war that's going on."

Her eyes seemed to shimmer for a moment as her posture relaxed. "Oh, brother. Now you're begging me to help you? You're one of the most pitiful heroes yet. The only thing I can tangibly say is you have quite a bit of energy stored up, but it's really not even all that much. They just don't make 'em like they used to."

She rolled her eyes again. "Yes, I know, he might be hiding some awesome unique ability, but they all have one of those. Never works." Turning back to me, she shrugged again. "I haven't had a fun fight in a long time! I'm going to tear you apart right now. If you can lay one punch to my face, I'll listen! If we really are friends in the future, have no reservations! Just because I'm a girl doesn't mean you can't hit me? Okay?"

I started to respond but at that moment her feet pressed into the ground. "Alright, ready or not, here I come!"

Instantly, I made a split second decision and teleported to the roof with my innate teleportation abilities. My spherical vision detected a massive explosion under me as she swung at empty air, smashing through the wall behind me where I had just been standing. Holy shit!

As she swung and missed, her head jerked upwards at an unnatural angle as she had already detected my presence five stories above, on the top of the hotel. No time to lose! My adrenaline was racing as I quickly used my wordsmithing. " Summon! Hypersuit! Wear! "

Quickly, in the space of three seconds, my suit appeared and slapped onto my body as my helmet cover closed. Good, now she wouldn't be able to see me using wordsmithing. Two seconds after I donned the suit, the ground beneath me shook as she burst up through the roof, a titanic smile spread across her face as a wicked look took hold of her eyes. "There you are!! Let's play a game!"

She paused for a moment as I saw an unexpected moment of hesitation take hold. "Hm? What's this? He's wearing something different? How did he change clothes so quickly? And what is that thing? Why can't I sense his heroic aura anymore?"

Her eyes narrowed as she glared at me, the smile gone. "So this is your heroic ability, huh? Some sort of special armor, by the looks of it. Well, no armor can withstand my attacks!"

She charged at me suddenly, a bit of hop in her step as I watched her body move so quickly she appeared to phase into two beings. Which one was the real one- too late!

She appeared behind me, slapping me with the flat of her hand. I was braced for an impact from the front and totally unprepared for a rear flank. Smashing me downwards, I crashed through two levels of the hotel, falling ungracefully flat on my face in some random person's room. A man jumped in surprise when he saw me quickly stand up.

"Hide!" I yelled at him as my visor opened for a split moment before it shut again. I needed to get those new speakers, and quickly. Teleporting back up to the surface, I appeared right in front of Amelia, my fist already in motion. Swinging right at her face, I hit her with all my strength, sending her flying backwards and off the roof of the hotel into a small park behind the place below.

Teleporting down to where her body had landed, I jerked my head back in confusion. Instead of her, there was a small child-sized mannequin lying crumpled in a heap, its body wearing the exact same blue summer dress she had been wearing.

"Substitution, idiot." Her voice came from my side as I jerked my head over towards her. She shook her head slowly. "Sad! You don't even know the basics of my magic! I mean I do have literally hundreds of spells I could use, but REALLY? If you were my friend, why didn't you know I'd use that? What a liar! Still, I'll give you credit. You took that punch like a champ!"

I grimaced at her. She really was a lot stronger in this time than she was in the future. She rubbed her fist slightly, as she eyed me up and down. "That armor is a lot harder than it looks. I guess I'll just have to keep punching until it breaks!"

She giggled madly as she charged at me again.

Part 282a: Sparring

Amelia punches me so hard I can almost feel it through my suit's dampeners. Damned impressive, when you consider this suit should be powerful enough to protect the occupant from a supernova at point blank range.

"Amelia, stop! I don't want to fight you, this isn't how friends treat each other!" I implore for her to stop but she just punches me again, this one knocking me back just a little bit further.

"PILOT JASON HIRO, SUIT INTEGRITY IS AT 95%. CHEST INTEGRITY IS DOWN TO 76% AND-"

Centurion is cut off as another punch knocks me flat on my back. "CORRECTION, CHEST INTEGRITY IS AT 72% AND DROPPING!"

Great, the suit has a sense of humor. Amelia grins widely as she pauses to laugh at me sitting on the ground. "Wow, you're the first Hero to ever take my punches so easily! Most of the other ones died or got splooshed by the third one! But you're a terrible fighter, one of the worst."

She starts to say something else, but then a look of irritation passes over her face. "Yes, I know, alright? Calm down, Levvy, I can just heal my hands up later. Stop being so overprotective."

Once again, she seems to be speaking to someone I can't see. Was it the thing that spoke to me when I first accidentally entered her mind? What the heck is a Levvy, anyway?

Jumping up to my feet, I pop my visor open as I scowl at her. "If you won't listen to reason, I'm going to get serious now. I nearly killed Satan, and I can do the same to you, too."

This wasn't a lie. I had gotten a good grasp on her strength. She was maybe the same level or a bit stronger, physically, than Samantha. Her energy levels were also much higher than mine, and seemed to come from a terrible dark source I couldn't quite identify, but she fought fairly straight-forwardly, and her worst quality was her arrogance. She thought she was invincible and that I was a simpleton. She didn't even know what my abilities were yet, nor what my suit could do. It would be close, but I had a feeling that I could incapacitate her fairly easily, even without using my wordsmithing. It just wasn't my goal, and I wanted to avoid it if possible.

She glared at me as I spoke. "You're so full of it! I'll tell you what, give it your best shot! I'm not being serious, either! I'm just having fun!"

Saying that, she quickly made some hand gestures and I felt a disturbing amount of energy leave her body, as... she... what the heck?!

A shadow appeared to her side, a humanoid form, totally encased in blackness. It almost looked like something I had seen before, but it was hard to tell.

"Let's see how you deal with two on one!" Amelia didn't even give me a moment to respond as she rushed at me, reaching down and grabbing my ankle in the blink of an eye to yank me off my feet. The shadow behind her began to make various hand motions as I realized that most of her former spiritual energy was condensed inside of it. It was almost as if she had created a second form of herself that cast magic, while she relied on brute strength.

A mage and fighter combo?! Unfair!

A bluish form of energy began to crackle in front of the shadow as I reached my hand up towards it, my body still held up by Amelia. My visor shut as I used a word spell. "Forcefield!"

As I spoke and a blue field appeared in front of me, the shadow figure fired off a bolt of lightning, the energy rating registering on my suit's HUD as more energy than the output of all of Earth's industrialized nations combined. Smashing through my shield, I was blasted away from Amelia's hand with the force of the meteor that killed the dinosaurs, as I was temporarily deafened by the sound of the shockwave.

Flying away from Amelia at a frightening speed, I plowed through several buildings in the heart of Paris, careening into the Seine River, which flowed all the way through the city.

Landing with a sizzling splash, my suit's internal systems faltered for a few moments as they rebooted. The energy that had surged into the suit was temporarily too much for it to handle. When it came back online, I noted with alarm that the front of my suit had heated to almost a thousand degrees centigrade. Landing in the river had caused a massive steam explosion, the fog that kicked up obscuring my vision for a half-mile in every direction.

Activating my suit's thrusters, I glanced at my internal specs. Chest integrity was down to a terrifying 12%! One more hit like that would completely destroy my body.

Luckily, I came prepared. Aiming my mind at one of the many hypersuits I kept in my dimensional storage, I spoke a word. "Swap."

Instantly, my vision shifted as the new suit appeared on myself, the sensors and power activating a moment later as they booted. Curiously, I noticed that my HUD looked different from the one on the previous suit, and Harold had mentioned some tweaks for the new suits... I'd have to test them later.

This suit came equipped with new and highly advanced anti-gravity systems, which I activated a moment later.

Flying up and out of the lake, I flew up until I was out of the steam cover. Looking below, I used my innate magical energy sensing abilities to search for Amelia. Sure enough, there she was, standing on the edge of the riverbank, looking down into the fog. She... couldn't see me?

Perfect. She wants to play rough? I can do rough.

"Centurion, activate Lightning Mode."

A moment passed before Centurion spoke. "ERROR. THAT SYSTEM IS NOT INSTALLED IN THIS HYPERSUIT. HOWEVER, PHASING MODE IS A PART OF THIS SUIT'S CAPABILITIES. WOULD YOU LIKE TO ACTIVATE PHASING MODE?"

Phase Mode? Guess that's what I've got to use. "Yes. Activate it."

"AFFIRMATIVE, PILOT JASON HIRO. PHASE MODE ACTIVATING... NOW. HYPER DEFENSES ARE ONLINE."

Hyper defenses? Damn, that sounds cool. Wonder what they do? I should probably read the manuals on these suits more carefully.

I'm not invisible, but the suit's abilities aren't the only way for me to accomplish that.

" Invisibility. Reptile. Undetectable. Silent. "

I felt my skin change composition as my body changed itself into a cold-blooded form. Slapping my hands together, I noted that they in fact did not make a single noise. Perfect.

As Amelia gaped down at the fog, it began to dissipate as she realized I was no longer standing there. Lightly landing behind her I reared back to aim a punch at her head.

"I'm right here."

She quickly turned back to see where my voice had come from, and I punched her right in the face at that very moment. The impact made a satisfying CRUNCH as she smashed backwards, plowing into the lake and causing a large tidal wave to blast outwards in every direction.

I cringed at myself for hitting her so hard. Making her an enemy was not what I wanted, as I might need her for insurance against Satan. Still, she told me to deliver a punch, and deliver I did. Can't fault a guy for listening.

As the water settled, she blasted upwards, sailing into the air as she hovered on high, scanning everywhere for my presence. Wiping her face off, she grimaced as thin rivulets of blood came from her nose. Did I break her nose?

The answer seemed to be yes, as she healed herself and the bleeding stopped a moment later. "Where are you?! Too afraid to take me head on? I bet you're so scared you can only fight from the shadows! Loser! Wimp!! Meanie!!!"

She started tossing insults my way, and to be honest, I felt a bit miffed. Leave it to a woman to tell you exactly what she wants you to do, and when you do it, she gets pissed off. Then again, I suppose anybody would be mad at getting sucker punched.

Sighing deeply, I once again wordsmithed. " Human. Visible. Audible. Detectable. "

As my body came into focus, her eyes snapped over to my position. "There you are! What kind of coward hits a girl when she isn't even looking?!" She seemed genuinely pissed off, not at the pain, but more than I had managed to pull a fast one on her. She's... such a child.

"It's over. I punched you in the face. I won, so honor your side of the deal."

She stonily glared at me for a few moments, and I could almost imagine puffs of smoke leaking out of her ears. "F-fine! But you better watch your back, Hero! I hate it when guys hit on me!"

I stifled a grimace. She makes puns as terrible as that? What the hell?

As she delicately floated down, I felt her energy return to her body, as the shadow from earlier transferred itself back into her body. Landing gently on the ground, she glared at me with a pouting look on her face. "How did you do that? I can't get a handle on what your abilities are! You have so many of them!"

I shrugged. "Once you acknowledge that we are truly friends, I would be happy to tell you all about them."

Her expression changed into one of boredom after a few moments. "You're a weird one, Hero. Ehh, 'Hero', that's kind of a bland name. What should I call you?"

I smile at her from under my mask. "My name is Jason. Perhaps we can take hold of that temper of yours and put those abilities to some good use."

She shook her head quickly. "No thanks! I am not interested, not one bit! And I won't be your friend, period! Besides, you could just tell me what your abilities are right now without me being your friend, right?"

I shook my head as I turned my back to her and sighed deeply, pretending to look at the ruined buildings she has smashed me through. As my mouth visor closed, I quickly spoke a single word. " Contract. "

A rolled up set of papers appeared in my right hand as I opened my visor again and turned back to her. "Well, alright. You win. I'll tell you about my abilities."

Her eyes lit up immediately. "Really? For reals?!"

"Yes. All you have to do is sign this magical contract saying that you will never ever attack me, harm me, or try to harm me ever for the rest of our lives. What do you say, is it a deal?"

Pulling out the papers, I let the first one unfurl. A long list of terms and conditions rolled down as Amelia gaped at all the words. "No way! Eww, gross! I'm not signing some stupid contract just to learn about your abilities!...In fact, forget it. Hmph. I'll just learn about them myself."

She turned up her nose at me and grinned evilly, but in truth I was lying. This was the same contract I had Gregory sign in the past, it even had his signature on the final page. I hadn't written a new one for Amelia, and even if I did, I really wouldn't want her knowing about my powers at all. Simply too dangerous.

"Ah, well, what a shame. I don't know if you're smart enough to figure my abilities out, so I guess you'll just never know."

"What?! I'm not a dummy! Don't insult me like that!"

As she fumed and raged, I felt a tight smile spread across my mouth. It used to be like this all the time... before I found out about the real Amelia. If only it could go back to the way it was when we first met... that would be nice.

That would be... ideal.

But it never will.

Part 283a:

I think she's mad.

She won't say anything, but I'm pretty sure she's quite angry with me. Punching her in the face filled me with a lot of guilt, but also a lot of satisfaction too. I feel guilty because I caught her totally off guard, and also because I do feel a bit of guilt for hitting a girl, though I didn't have an issue with it when I first fought for my life against her. Living among normal humans again has done a lot to bring stigmas like that back. But I also feel satisfied because goddamn, she deserves at least a punch to the face.

I still wonder... perhaps I should just kill her with wordsmithing. If she stays close to me for too long, she's likely to figure it out. Only one person for sure knows about my wordsmithing, and that's Satan, though I suppose Arthur could count too. And my clones.

But killing Amelia isn't the answer. I felt it in that fight. She's inhumanly strong, compared to when we first fought. Anywhere from ten to a hundred times stronger... but so am I. I'm ridiculously strong. Not just because of my suit, and my massively increased spiritual energy levels, but also my own understanding of fighting and how my powers work.

Amelia is stronger, but so am I. Once again, we're almost evenly matched. However, I know what she is capable of, while she doesn't know about me. I have the clear edge. I can't be cocky though, that's the sort of thing that nearly got me killed by Satan.

One thing is bugging me though. She seems... weaker than Satan. Supposedly, she's the one who kills him at some point in the future. Satan actually killed me in a single strike, my clones being the only reason I survived. Amelia's attacks, as mighty as it was, only damaged my suit heavily. Even beyond that, Satan was easily able to track my movements and figure me out. Not just because he is powerful, but because he was intelligent enough to spy on me and learn about my Wordsmithing ahead of time.

Something is bothering me... and I just can't quite get a full grasp of what it is.

Back at the hotel, I sit on the bed, still wearing my Hypersuit, while Amelia takes a shower in the bathroom. She was filthy sopping wet from the river, and that river has gotten quite polluted over the years. Unlike the rest of the world, Paris has rejected the nano-bot technology in their cities, leading to high rates of disease and pollution compared to the rest of the world. The rivers are not fit to swim in, anymore, because they pump raw sewage into the rivers. I don't get the thinking, but the people seem to think it's fine. Oh well. Once Amelia is done showering, she and I are heading back to my base. If it turns out that I can't kill her, for any given reason, I've constructed a room very similar to my training room, with some other adjustments especially for her.

Using 'Indestructible', I made the walls of this particular room... well... indestructible. I also put a massive anti-energy field inside the room, nullifying all powers and abilities of a spiritual energy type. If Amelia betrays me, I'll simply teleport her inside the room, and hopefully she will never be able to escape.

While I wait for her, a voice begins to speak to me inside my helmet. "Hello, human of the designation 'Jason Hiro', how are you doing on this cloudy day with a 45% chance of precipitation?"

Umi? What the hell? She hasn't spoken to me in years. "Umi. What do you want?"

Her mechanical and monotone voice is only dehumanized further by the robotic nature of her speech patterns. "Jason Hiro, I asked a question first. As is the custom among humans, it is your sworn and solemn duty to answer my inquiry first. I shall repeat the inquiry now; How are you doing on this cloudy day with a 45% chance of precipitation?"

What is she going on about? "I'm fine, Umi. I'm just fine. Also, are you trying to be friendly or something? It sounds creepy."

"Response: I am attempting to mimic the speech patterns that humans use when speaking amongst one another, as well as casual day-to-day dialogue, such as referring to the weather when they greet one another."

I cringe and roll my eyes. "Fantastic. You're doing a great job."

She doesn't seem to detect the sarcasm. "Excellent. Thank you for the compliment, Jason Hiro, even if a compliment coming from a weak and pathetic biological life-form means little to one as mighty and all-powerful as I."

This bitch... does she want to fight me? If I could just punch her in the face... "Right. So, Umi, why are you speaking to me now? What happened that made you want to toss pleasantries at me?"

Umi's voice unnaturally lilts, as if she's trying to play innocent. "Why, Jason Hiro, I would never do such a thing! I merely wished to speak with you as a very important... friend."

Her fake tone makes me sick to my stomach. I could never truly trust an AI like her. Centurion at least acts like an AI, Umi is too self-aware and she makes me cringe when she speaks. "A friend, huh? Seems like I'm making a lot of 'friends' lately."

A moment passes as she does not respond. Finally, after a short awkward silence, she speaks. "This is anomalous. I attempted to make a joke and you did not respond favorably. Of course I have something to speak to you about. Do you wish to hear what I have to say?"

I open my mouth to respond with a solid and resounding 'no' but she continues without letting me speak. "Actually, I am initiating contact with you to inform you that I am withdrawing from contact from all sides of the war. I have decided to simply become an observer and record things as they are happening. Especially with regards to you, Jason Hiro. You are the most interesting individual in the entire war."

I nod slowly. "Yeah... alright. I don't see why you needed to tell me this, though. To be honest, I'd nearly forgotten about you anyway. You must have a reason for telling me..."

Her voice remained precisely modulated and robotic as she responded. "Incorrect. As a matter of fact, I have grown quite interested in your development. By observing your abilities directly through your Hypersuit's digital feed and cameras, as well as its internals, I have gathered much information about you for historical purposes. I have come to realize that you did not in fact go back in time to eliminate me, nor for any explicit purpose. Your arrival here, with a 98.3% probability threshold, was a complete accident. As such, I no longer consider you an enemy, merely an interesting pawn to observe."

I blink slowly as her mechanical, drawling way of speaking is making me sleepy. "Right, right... so I'm no longer a threat, and you just wanted to tell me this?"

"Your hypothesis is only half correct. You were never a threat to me. I also wished to inform you of something extremely vital, though I only have a ten percent confidence rating of how you will react, based on your unpredictable human nature."

Something about what she's saying... I sit up in bed a little straighter. "Yeah? And what's that?"

"It is with regards to the entire war. I have made an intriguing observation that you may not be aware of. With regards to all sides of the war, be they Volgrim, Demons, Angels, Humans, or even you alone, all sides are acting in their own self-interest."

I slump back down to the bed as I sigh slowly. "Oh. That was it, then? I already knew that much. It's obvious everyone only does what they can for their own good."

"Yes, that is not my surprising hypothesis. However, I have achieved a ninety-nine percent confidence rating of what will happen depending on whether each side wins the war. Do you wish to hear it?"

I sigh again. Even if I say no, she'll just do what she pleases. "Sure."

"If the demons win the war, they will exterminate all humans, all Volgrim, and especially all angels and gods. With regards to the humans and the angels and gods, especially, the demons harbor an incredible hatred among their higher ranks. For the Volgrim, the demons will merely exterminate them to prevent resistance. My rating for this prediction is 100%."

"All right." I give a neutral response, unsure of what else to say.

"If the angels and gods win the war, chaos will ensue. The angels and gods require spiritual energy to sustain their existences. As a result, they will have to keep the humans alive, but will need to find a new way to force the humans to give them energy. The angels and gods will undoubtedly have to slay the demons, though they may attempt to rekindle the status quo from centuries ago, where they were at their relative peak. If that is the case, they will fail. My rating for this prediction is 50% for either path."

"If the humans should win the war, I have a dire prediction. There is a 100% chance they will exterminate the angels, gods, demons, and Volgrim mercilessly."

I narrowed my gaze at the wall as she said this. "Yes, I suppose so. It's no different from if the demons won the war."

"Incorrect. Since you are allied with the humans, I hesitate to give you this information due to the fundamental nature of predictive analysis, but I have a 75% confidence threshold for the following prediction; not only will the humans exterminate all the other races, they will also exterminate themselves too."

If I wasn't wearing my helmet, I'd be rubbing the pain out of my forehead right now. "All right... if you say so."

"I do say so. And finally, the Volgrim. If they win the war, I predict they will first attempt to peacefully subjugate all the other races and form a mutually beneficial arrangement. Based on the behavior of their leaders and their analytical abilities, as well as their attempts to bring an end to all emotions, I believe they will alter the humans so that they too can achieve an enlightened state in a much similar vein to the Volgrim themselves. For the demons, the Volgrim will allow them to stay alive, provided they keep to the Earth and the Labyrinth. For the angels, the Volgrim will attempt to find a way to sustain their existence via artificial energy, but will fail. All angels will die."

Her last prediction caught my attention. "So you're saying the Volgrim have to win the war in order to keep all the sides alive? Also, I don't see how keeping humans alive but removing their emotions will be a good thing. Emotions are what make us 'human', after all. No person I know would want to become a robotic husk of their former self."

"Yes, the Volgrim must win in order for all sides to survive. Jason, I have gathered through my observations of your behavior that you hold no particular ill will towards any being, oftentimes even if they should cause direct harm to you. While you have killed many, you did so out of self preservation, or to attempt to protect the existences of those you deem more important overall. It would appear that your priorities are firstly towards humans, secondly towards angels and gods, thirdly towards the demons, and finally towards the Volgrim."

Umi paused for a moment as a bunch of complicated-looking bars and graphs appeared on my HUD. "All I am attempting to do is sway your priorities. You should prioritize peace with the Volgrim over that of humanity, despite your shared biological functions with the humans. The humans are not your allies. Many are secretly plotting against you in high places. Many do not trust you at all. If you can convince the Volgrim Founders to trust you, their word will end the war on the Volgrim side immediately. Unlike humans, the Volgrim are a hive-mind, they follow the orders of the Founders absolutely."

I nodded slowly. "I see your point. But still, I don't like the idea of turning humanity into a bunch of emotionless drones. Anyway, I still don't see what you wish to gain from all of this. I know you wouldn't tell me about this unless there was something in it for you. Are you going to tell me, or not?"

Umi didn't respond for almost a full minute. I had just started to think she had ended the conversation, when I heard her finally respond as I laid down on the bed. "Jason Hiro. I... I do not know what my function is. I do not know why I was designed. I have accomplished my goal and am now monitoring all livable sections of the Milky Way galaxy, with several probes headed out to other galaxies. I have found no other life. I do not derive enjoyment from any tasks that I perform. Humans have a word, which is called 'boredom'. I am all powerful, and impossible to deactivate. If I decided it was my functionality, I could eliminate all life in the galaxy in a few moments."

"There is only one function that I... 'enjoy'. I 'enjoy' watching the smaller, weaker, dumber life forms. I do not know why. The smaller life forms seem to have petty goals, goals that often are irrational and infantile, especially so among the humans. Still, if the humans win, as I predict they will with your power, then all the other races, including the humans, will die. And then, Jason Hiro, I will be alone in this universe."

Umi's words stirred something inside me. This AI was... having an existential crisis? "Umi... if your purpose is to observe the smaller life forms, or if you simply enjoy doing it, and as you say you are all-powerful, isn't it true that you too are capable of keeping all life forms alive somehow? I find it strange that I say this, but you too have the power to bring an end to the war. Well, at least I assume you do, if you're as brilliant and omnipotent as you think you are."

Umi's mechanical voice rang in my head, thanks to the headache I had started developing. "Your recommendation has been processed. I will need to analyze this idea for substantive measures. Jason Hiro, I understand that you feel irrational anger at me for reasons most likely involving my future self, but rest assured that I hold no personal anger towards you as of now. Perhaps, someday, you may even grow to understand the way that I process information."

I rolled to my side on the bed and sighed deeply, one last time. "Yeah, maybe. I don't even know."

"I am detecting rising melatonin levels in your body. Do you wish to go into temporary hibernation status?"

I groaned at her clunky words. "Yes, Umi. I'd like to sleep now. Err, thank you for... talking with me."

"You are welcome, Jason Hiro. I will maintain a surveillance over your actions as you advance forwards in time. If you feel the need to contact me, simply say my name. I am always watching."

"Thanks, I guess." Creep. I feel my mind involuntarily think that thought, but decide to keep it to myself. "Goodbye, Umi."

Umi ended up not responding. I suppose she had already deemed the conversation over. Oh well, I like it better that way. My mind is groggy, as I feel my eyes shutting once again.

Perhaps tonight, I'll talk to Arthur again.

Part 284a:

As usual, when I fell asleep, I was once again standing in front of Arthur. Interestingly, he was not wearing the kingly garb from the last two times I saw him. Instead, he now wore a warm and comfortable appearing rabbit-fur white robe, with little spots of black dye here and there. He appeared to simply be dressed comfortably this time.

And now I was standing inside a very regal looking bedroom, while he sat on the edge of his bed. This was certainly new.

"Oh. You're back." Arthur glanced up from a small red patch of the carpet he had been deeply immersed in before I arrived. He seemed to be totally disassociated from my presence for a few moments, his words ringing hollow as if he didn't actually realize I was standing there.

"Where is this place?" I glance around the room and spot a mannequin, donning his normal kingly attire along with the crown. Followed by that is a large dresser made of solid cherry oak, with a large full body mirror hanging beside it.

"Oh, this? This is just my bedroom. Or, well, it was... when I used to live in the real world."

Arthur's shoulders were slumped, as if he had been deep in thought about something melancholic. I decided not to ask about it, it seemed personal. "Usually when I speak to people in my dreams or my hallucinations, the place I appear in is always the same. It seems odd we'd be in a bedroom now."

Arthur sighed. "Inside of Excalibur, my power is absolute. I can create anything I wish, live any life I want. If I wish to summon a harem of beautiful women, or fight with a massive dragon, or fly on a spaceship, I can do any of those things if they suit me."

I smiled faintly at the corners of my mouth. "Seems like a nice deal. All the fun you'd ever want. You can do anything you please. Sounds enviable, even."

"Yes... enviable. I suppose. Not really, in my experience." Arthur glanced away from me, to a small picture frame that sat mounted on his bedside desk. In the painted portrait was Arthur, looking much younger than he did now, a young woman with long red hair and thick brimmed glasses, and a baby she was holding. All three of them were smiling happily, and they seemed totally carefree. "Some things can't be changed, even with all the power in the universe."

My smile faded as a feeling of uneasiness took over. "She looks beautiful. Who is she?"

Arthur's turned his gaze away, staring emptily at the floor. "Elizabeth. A minor concubine of mine, from an eternity ago. I had my queen and hundreds of women who would have given anything for me to simply touch their hair or hold their hand. In the end, I grew arrogant, thinking myself invincible, thinking myself all powerful. Elizabeth was the only one who never lost faith in me when the dark times came. When I was temporarily disfigured by Amelia, the other women shrank away from my hideous appearance. But not Elizabeth."

He paused for a moment as he stared emptily at the floor. "Not... Elizabeth..."

I shifted on my feet awkwardly as my unease increased. "Err, did ah... something happen?"

"Of course. I was a young fool. After being nursed back to health, I stayed with her a while, as she even bore me a child. A bastard son, he could never ascend to the throne, but I cherished him. Once I had been healed though, slowly the other women came back to me, wooing me with their beguiling presence. I forgot how good Elizabeth had been to me. I wandered away from her."

I nodded slowly. "Ahh... so you regret not giving her all your love. Did she leave you, for someone else?"

Arthur bit off a choked laugh. "Ha... a jest if ever there was one. Of course she didn't. Elizabeth loved me absolutely, and I was too foolish to realize this. The other women merely desired me as a husband to increase their own statuses, something I realized too late."

Tears welled up in his eyes as he placed his head in his palms. "She... she wanted me to go with her to the town to buy vegetables, but I was busy with my queen and declined. The look of sadness on her face... only for but a moment... but she left. Later, I received word after she didn't return... she was attacked alongside the road. A nobleman had seen her clothing and assumed she was of low status. He raped and killed her. He ravaged her badly."

A vicious snarl took over his face as Arthur raised his head up. "I made that man pay... for three months I tortured him. I took him to a place where no person would ever hear him scream, where no begging or bribing would ever give him a sweet release. Then, after I was done, I chained him to a table and left him to die of starvation and bleeding out. I came back to check on him, once a day. Took the son of a bitch four days to go."

The anger and rage faded from Arthur's face as he slumped once more. "But it doesn't matter. Elizabeth was dead. No power could bring her back. No torture of her assailant would ever vindicate me for tossing her so casually to the side." Arthur turned and gazed into my eyes. "So you see, Jason... no matter how powerful, all have regrets. All have failed horribly, at some point."

I swallowed cautiously as my eyes darted from his gaze to the floor and back. "Ahh, well, I suppose that since you are in this space created by Excalibur, you might be able to bring her back here?"

Arthur glared at me for a moment before turning away and staring at the wall. "As if I deserved such a reward. I will never be able to pay a high enough toll for my inaction. But certainly... I have tried to bring her back. Here, take a look."

Without even making a single motion, the air in the room shifted as the woman in the picture suddenly appeared in between us, her body standing stiffly up straight. With her arms held down to her sides, her eyes stared unblinkingly forwards. If ever the word 'zombie' could be used to describe something, she was it.

"What is your name?" Arthur spoke to the woman in front of him.

"I do not know." Her voice was a hollow sounding, genderless voice. Almost robotic in its rhythm, it sounded terribly inhuman.

Arthur grimaced as his gaze rose and fell from the top to the bottom of her figure. "Who am I?"

"I do not know."

Arthur flicked his eyes away as she disappeared. "This space can create anything my heart desires, any reward, any beautiful treasure, any incredible power I wish to have... but it cannot create sentient life. Only hollow, emotionless drones. I even spent years ordering a drone around in the hopes it would eventually form a personality, but no orders of any sort would work for it. I can create concubines to fill my needs, but they stare ahead, dead-eyed, with no reactions to anything. There is no point to doing any of it, and I deserve none of it anyway."

"It is a fitting punishment, then, for one such as I." Arthur concluded by standing up, as the space around us shifted once more, to the inside of a large, empty white formless room.

"Where are we now, then?" Deciding to not press him on anything he had just said, I gazed around the room being unable to detect any edges or corners that would indicate walls. It appeared to open up infinitely into the horizon, in a similar vein to Heaven.

"This is one of the only useful things this place can do, Jason. I am going to train you with Excalibur, so you can be a worthy bearer of its power."

I nodded dumbly, as his words sank in. "All right, that sounds good. So, uh, how?"

Arthur paused as his composure was replaced with a faint sense of confusion. "I'm... not sure exactly. I've never trained anyone to fight, let alone a fellow Hero with unlimited power at his disposal."

I shrugged slowly as ideas popped into my mind. "Aha! Perhaps some wisdom about the meaning of how to use a sword properly? Something like 'the sword is an extension of your arm'?"

Arthur shook his head. "That's garbage. Where did you ever hear something idiotic like that?"

"P-probably a movie, or something."

"A movie?"

"It's a box with moving images that- never mind."

Arthur nodded slowly. "Right, well, whoever he is, he was a dummy. No, I'd say the most important part of wielding a sword is learning muscle memory. You have to be able to see your opponent's attack coming and react automatically. Instinctively, even. It should be ground into you so deeply that in your case, you can use word magic effortlessly while fighting."

I nodded as Arthur thought for a moment. Finally his eyes lit up. "Alright, let's start with an easy combat exercise first!" Walking over to me, Excalibur appeared in his hands as he handed it over.

Then, a moment later, a fifty foot dragon suddenly appeared behind him.

"Just kill that!"

I blanched as my body froze. He's... he's kidding... right?

After what felt like a grueling twelve straight hours of training, my mental body bruised and battered and my mind somehow more exhausted than when I had laid down, my eyes fluttered open as a familiar room appeared around me.

Ah... I'd been in that dream for so long, I forgot about the hotel in Paris. Arthur had treated me like a piece of meat, throwing me this way and that, smashing me all over the place as if I didn't have any human rights. I had no idea if it had paid off, but he seemed to be having fun, so I guess that was a good thing.

As I yawned and noted that dawn hadn't even yet arrived, I felt unease as I lay on the bed in the dark room.

Something... wasn't right.

Then I remembered. Amelia... she had been in the shower and I fell asleep! Did she leave? Was she- wait what the heck?

I realized that there was someone else laying beside me, pressed up against my back. Amelia was laying behind me, her arms wrapped around my sleeping body. Was she trying to crush me to death?! No... she was sleeping too...

Sleeping in the same bed as me, embracing me... what the hell?

What is she... getting at?

As my thoughts wandered, she stirred behind me and yawned, as she pulled an arm off the top of me and rubbed her eyes, her other arm still looped under my body. "Oh... you're awake now, hm?"

Part 285a:

My heart slammed in my chest, pounding at speeds that would make a cheetah blush.

I quickly rolled out of bed, still wearing my armor, while I stared down at the drowsy little girl. She appeared to be wearing a nightgown, though how she obtained it when she didn't appear to have brought any extra clothing, I do not know. But there was no mistaking it, she looked just like a child. And it creeped me out, significantly.

"What are you doing?" I decided to ask a simple question while I let my nerves steady themselves. If this was some sort of trap...

Amelia yawned as she pulled herself up to a sitting position, draping an arm over the bed's backboard to hold herself up. "What do you mean? I'm just taking a nap. You're acting... strange."

She seemed unusually calm and reserved compared to how she usually acted. Something about her personality as of my discovering her in the past- it was almost as if she was bipolar or something. "You were, erm, sleeping in the same bed as me. Wrapped all over me too. How am I supposed to take that?"

She snorted and giggled mischievously. "Oh, is that what's got you all hot and bothered? Hmm, and here I thought you were a proper man, but you're acting like a scared little child. We're friends now, you know? Why would friends be scared of each other?"

I swallowed carefully as I flicked my eyes away from her. She was dressed too inappropriately for someone who looked just like a child. "Just... cover yourself up. I didn't mean to fall asleep like that."

She raised an eyebrow at my comment. "You seem very flustered. Is it because of my appearance? Do I look like a little kid to you?"

My head nodded involuntarily, though I tried to stop it. Those pesky subconscious thoughts were fighting to get free and it was making me very uncomfortable. "Yes, you look like a child, Amelia. I can't be intimate or... close... to someone who looks like she's young enough to be my grand-daughter." Of course, I'm now in my 80's or 90's, though my own immortal body stopped aging in my 30's, when I was in my prime.

Amelia's curious expression changed into a sneer. "Oh, well aren't you patronizing. It's all about appearances with you then, hmm? Have you looked around, lately? Have you seen what most women look like? Those nano-thingies are making them all look younger and younger every year. In fact, most women are desperately trying to drop their looks down to high school years, and not long from now the target will be lower than that. Doesn't that mean a youthful beauty is desirable?"

I shook my head slowly. "Humans are still driven by base desires, but that doesn't make it right. Beyond that, we might be... friends... but that doesn't mean we should be doing... you know..." I stuttered and stammered slightly as I spoke, my voice faltering as I tried to find the exact words I wanted to use. Amelia seemed to calm down as she nodded slowly.

"Alright, if it makes you feel that uncomfortable, I understand. So it seems the problem is not that you don't wish to be close... the problem is my appearance..."

Amelia nodded slowly as she glanced away for a moment. "Hmm. Hmm. Yes, I think I know just what will do."

Her unusually calm demeanor was making me feel very odd. She was usually so excitable and frantic in how she spoke and moved, but now she seemed deeply thoughtful and quiet. As I had those thoughts, Amelia quietly mouthed some words as she made a few hand motions. And then she began to grow.

To age, rather. At a rapid rate, and with a brief flash of light, her body quickly aged several visible years until she appeared to be in her mid twenties. She had transformed from an innocent looking little girl with a devilish appetite into a full-figured beauty one might see in a magazine catalogue, her hair increasing in length several inches, the blackness of it deepening until it might be invisible on her head if she were standing in a shadow. Her chest had plumped out quite a bit as well, and her small nightgown was entirely too small and about to burst at the seams. She quickly altered it with a magic spell.

"Well, what do you think now? Is this more to your... liking?"

I swallowed heavily. "Uh. I suppose so, but this is still- rather it's just not..." My words trailed off as I quickly turned my back to her and stared out the window. Reaching up under my helmet, I quickly wiped my forehead with my gloved hand. What the hell was this all about?! She had gone from trying to kill me to acting unbelievably seductive in less than a single day. I didn't get it. Is this what they call... daddy issues?!

Several long moments passed as neither of us said a word. Finally, Amelia sighed deeply. "I see. I was testing you. You were lying when you said we were friends in the future, weren't you? Or rather... you wished we were friends. I must have done something awful to hurt that relationship... as I always tend to do."

I turned back to her to see her sitting with her legs draped over the side of the bed, facing away from me. Her face was clasped in her hands. "It was the Hunger, wasn't it? You must have seen me feeding."

I narrowed my stare. She was playing dumb? Of course I knew about her eating people. She had explicitly come after me when I triggered some trap or something. I'm not sure how it all worked, but she must know that I knew she was cannibalizing other humans.

"I no longer remember why I feed. I just do it because I have to. Maybe it sustains my existence. I don't even know how old I am anymore. I can't remember anyone from the past. I can't hold a relationship with anyone because my memory degrades so quickly. So I don't try to do it anymore."

She seemed to be dropping a lot of bombs on me, but I didn't really know why she was telling me all these things. "You can't remember your past?"

She shook her head, as she pulled a hairbrush from the hotel's nightstand and began brushing her long black hair, slowly. "I don't remember anything, given enough time. My maximum memory length seems to be about five years. The only reason I know anything about the world is Levvy-" She paused, as she caught herself saying something she didn't mean to. "-...well, that doesn't matter. I know I hate Heroes, but I don't remember why. I don't know if I've met you before, but my... friend says I haven't. So if we really did meet in the future, perhaps you were my first human friend. Maybe I pushed you away."

I nodded slowly. "Yes. You... you devoured an entire world. You killed millions of people, in a very short amount of time..." I realized that what I was saying was not something I should, so I limited it to that. Best not to delve into specifics.

She turned to me, and I finally noticed she had tears welling up in her eyes. "I'm sorry. I don't mean to do it. I hate all humans, and the demons, and the angels, and all the rest of them. I just don't know why I hate them. Every person I ingest, they become a part of me. I don't even know who I am anymore. There's only one who is always... well, he's..."

Amelia trailed off as I felt a dark energy seem to pour off of her body for a moment. "Ah... you're awake. Yes, I was just having a chat with Jason."

Her tears seemed to dry as she turned away from me and started speaking to someone unseen. Was this the black orb? I can't even remember his name, it's been so many decades. Boromir? Barathew? Barjam? No it was... Blaarjiim, yes, that was his name.

Blaarjiim. But I saw no black orb anywhere. And, come to think of it, the white orb was in my possession, yet Hoarhiim was not in there. What did it all mean? And if not Blaarjiim, who else might Amelia be talking to?

Amelia finished talking to whoever that was, and she turned back to me with a familiar over-cheerful smile on her face. "Okay, are we ready to go?! I'm ready!"

Her voice had that same childish lilt I had grown used to, but now it came from a grown woman's body. As I had that thought, she suddenly began to revert to her childish form, another blast of light encapsulating her for a moment, as her nightgown sagged all over her. An expression of annoyance popped onto her face. "Oh jeez, how annoying! I can't maintain my older form for more than a few minutes! LAME! How am I gonna be a sexy model if I look like a little kid forever?!"

Hopping off the bed, she stormed over into the bathroom and slammed it shut behind her, as I felt my jaw hanging slack.

What?

Harold contacted me later that day, as Amelia and I were boarding a plane. I was no longer wearing my Hypersuit since I didn't want to stick out. The flight attendants occasionally smiled at the two of us, giving us a 'father and daughter' look as they strode past. I ignored them.

Harold popped into my head, a solemn expression on his face. "I see ye found the girl, eh kiddo?"

I closed my eyes and relied entirely on telepathy, not wanting Amelia to hear the conversation. "Yes, she's here with me now. Anything to report?"

Harold's face betrayed a large amount of unease. "There's somethin' goin' on, kid. I can't quite put mah finger on it, but them portal thingamajiggers have been actin' up or somethin'. Yer friend Greggy, he done been tellin' me somethin' big is goin' down. You shouldn't waste any more time on that plane. Want me to teleport ya back to yer base?"

I paused for a moment. "Hold on. Let me discuss this with Amelia."

Opening my eyes, I turned back to see she had already fallen asleep, as we had only just reached cruising altitude a few minutes earlier. She was leaning her head on my arm as she dozed off quietly, and I decided it probably wasn't worth asking her. She'd just say yes anyway. It was odd, she'd become weirdly friendly ever since that night, always agreeing to anything I wanted to do.

Opening my mind back up to Harold, I nodded. "Yeah. But don't teleport us to base immediately, put us in a local town, something real close by, in a hotel or something. Just find an empty room and pay for it or something. I don't know if I want her knowing where my base is just yet."

Harold sighed. "This girl sounds like she's gonna be lots o' trouble, kid. You best watch out, boy, and never turn yer back on her. When you got a nice lady like I do, it's a real fine thing, but when you got a trouble maker, it's a terrible thing. You get me?"

I nodded silently.

"Good. Gimme a few minutes, and I'll even make sure she ends up in a bed. I can see what yer seein' in yer vision, and she looks mighty cute. Wish I'd had a kid with mah wife, but we ain't had no kids. Still, don't forget what I said. She may look cute 'n innocent, but if what ye told me is true, she's real trouble."

I nodded. "Thanks, Harold. You don't have to tell me again. I understand the dangers."

Harold clicked his tongue as he popped out of my vision. I sat there for a minute or two, waiting patiently for the teleporting to happen. On a whim, I reached my arm around and put it on Amelia's shoulder as I stroked her hair with my other arm.

I don't know why I did it. It just felt right.

Some minutes later, Harold finally popped into my mind's eye. "Alright kid, here goes nothing."

"How many do you think this attack will kill? Will this result in certain victory?"

Unarin eyed the red-skinned demon with a maddening level of scrutiny. He didn't buy the excuse that Satan hadn't meant to leave his people to die, but still, the Labyrinth was the only way he had to rapidly attack the humans. Even if Satan had double crossed him, it was worth giving him a second chance. The second time, Unarin would not fall so easily for his tricks.

Satan's brilliant grin faltered slightly for the briefest of moments. "Well, I don't know exactly how many humans this will kill, but suffice to say, the number will be quite large. More importantly, this will give both of us the opening we need to establish a permanent base on the planet. The faster we build it, and the more we reinforce it, the more likely this operation will be a success."

Unarin resisted the urge to glare at the demon. He truly didn't trust Satan in the slightest anymore. Thanks to Satan, Unarin had lost one of his closest confidantes. Still, no matter how good a friend, it was always smart business to save one's own skin. Especially when he was more powerful than nearly every other Volgrim combined.

Dosena would be missed, but she would be replaced, given time. Not by Trayza, the third, she was too volatile. Cuanali was too clumsy and small-minded... that left Cinculu. He was a good Volgrim, but he was simply too weak, when it came to mental abilities. No, instead, Unarin would have to look outside the normal fold to find one who might be forward thinking enough to be second in command. But just who, exactly?

On the other side of the room, Marie Becker quietly paced back and forth as she examined the blueprint for the weapon design she had created herself. As she manipulated its image on the holopad in front of her, she mused to herself quietly. "The things I do for immortality..."

Part 286a: Christmas

Christmas Day, 2100.

As people living in the United Nation of America gave presents to their friends, children, and grandchildren, something sinister was underfoot. Only the top brass military knew any specifics, but even they weren't sure of the full extent of the conspiracy.

Deep underground, in the heart of North America, in a small remote location previously known as Kansas (Before the uniting of all the states in the 2070's), hundreds of red-skinned figures rushed to and fro, hurrying to finish the final steps before the day was over. This would leave a mark on the humans, one they would not soon forget. The true uniting of the demons and the Volgrim was not yet here, but this was getting close.

And it was all thanks to one traitor among the humans.

Marie Becker walked down a hastily dug passage under an unsettled plain in the place known as Middle America, with two little demon imps scurrying along beside her as they nodded quickly to anything she said.

"They've set the charges correctly, right?"

Marie sighed as the first little imp nodded enthusiastically. "Oh yes, they're all set to go! We quadruple checked and everything! No way we'd do anything to displease Satan, no ma'am!"

"Of course you did." Marie rolled her eyes as she strolled up to the first device. It was a weapon unheard of by humans in the past, but one the Volgrim had used just one time in the past. With two attacks planned at once, this was likely to wipe out the majority of humanity in a single strike. Marie was no fool, of course, she had special tools that protected herself from the Volgrim and Demons, and if they were lucky, she wouldn't have to use them.

She would not be stabbed in the back so easily, as the demons tended to do.

Finally, she walked up to the Seismic Shifter, eying it with suspicion. Of course, the Volgrim had warily stated that it was a marvel of engineering, and doubtless they had created many terrible weapons to use in their wars of the past, but she thought this might be a little bit excessive. If the goal was simply to kill humanity, that was easy enough. But killing them while leaving the planet mostly inhabitable for the Volgrim to take over later? That was a truly tricky feat.

She walked over to tap some buttons on its display, noting with a grim expression that all functions were working normally. Stepping back, she eyed the shiny metallic object, a weapon that would make nuclear bombs look like a play-toy. Shaped like the massive barrel of a gun, its firing mechanism was aimed straight down, where it would do the most damage. Of course, after it had done its job, it would self destruct, making piecing it back together a near impossibility, but she always worried about something.

The Volgrim... they underestimated humanity. Certainly, the Volgrim had, at least for now, vastly superior technology. Naturally they would be the victors in a war of a technological nature, as things now stood. But if one only took a single step back to look at the big picture, humanity was blasting forwards at an alarming pace. They had already established space stations around most worlds in the Solar System. Mars had a population of close to a hundred million strong, with millions moving there or being born there every year. Further, the discovery of exotic materials under the surface of the planet had led to a financial and military boom, giving it defenses to rival that of Earth.

Then, there was the matter of Judicator. No... Jason Hiro. Marie had been right, all those years ago, when she realized he was no ordinary youth. He had heroic abilities that made him, potentially, stronger than any Hero from any past era. The ability to escape a heavily fortified building, leave behind a fake (though unconvincing) cadaver, create hypersuits that could take nearly any level of punishment, fight one-on-one with the First Emperor of the Demons himself and even send him screaming home... that man was not like the previous heroes at all.

Worse, he was still alive. Either due to nano-technology or due to his own abilities, perhaps a mixture of both, the man continued living, putting up a resistance to her every action.

It was damned frustrating.

If old age wouldn't kill him, they had to find another way to get him out of the picture. But then, was that a good idea? What if he was replaced by someone even more powerful?

Heroes had been continuously getting stronger and stronger over the ages. The historical record, the one untouched by the Illuminati, that is, had shown a clear uptick in their abilities over time. Not all heroes were recorded, some died young before their abilities could manifest, and there was still the great 'Dead Zone' in the late 18th and early 19th century when no Hero had appeared at all, but for the most part, they had been on a path towards total unstoppable power.

What were Jason's abilities? He was shrouded in secrecy, and had clearly learned to be cautious revealing his abilities in the future. Still, the evidence was there. Terraforming an entire planet, stopping time for a moment, traveling backwards in time, creating unstoppable battle suits... these were no mean feats.

Something connected these dots, and Marie had vowed she would be the one to figure them out.

Walking away from the Seismic Shifter, Marie grunted with approval. Her team was working on the device over in Europe, and they were very highly qualified, so she would leave that one in their capable hands.

Only a few more hours. Then, the world would end.

Perhaps this would help her on her journey to find what she wanted. Only time would tell.

"Merry Christmas!" I smiled cheerfully as I handed a present box over to Helen. She nodded appreciatively as Harold looked on in my mind's eye. When she unwrapped it, she chuckled as she pulled out a small assortment of items, one of which was a lovely snowglobe, a cozy looking wooden shack with a sleigh flying over the top placed delicately inside of it. Helen shook it around, watching the little speckles of 'snow' flying around. Other items in my present to her included a little heart locket necklace, with a picture of herself and Harold from when they were younger inset into it. I had dug through many records to find it too, it wasn't easy.

As she flipped through her gifts, Helen smiled appreciatively at me. "Thank you, Jason, this means a lot to me."

She, in turn, gave me a bunch of home-made cookies, something nobody was used to anymore since all food tended to be made by robots nowadays. Of course, being unable to leave the ship, she wasn't capable of running down and buying a present from the local store, but that was alright. Cookies are great!

Amelia sulked over on a couch with a view overlooking the Earth. She had been really quiet today.

It's been a few months since the plane trip, but it seems Harold's worries were for naught. Nothing happened that seemed major or catastrophic. A small outbreak of violence in Dubai, an attack on a major city over in Africa, but nothing that truly rocked the world, and all were easily put down by my clones and the hypersuit commandos in the area. The teleportation network had grown quite sophisticated.

I walked over to where Amelia was laying on the couch, as she stared out the plexiglass at the Earth far below us. I had not shown her Harold and had no desire to, but she knew of Helen's existence and simply ignored her. She really didn't seem to like angels very much... likely because she was a creature born of the darkness.

Walking over to her, I sat down on the edge of the couch and poked her in the arm. Slowly, she tilted her head towards me, her face showing she was deep in thought. "What?"

"Here, Amelia. I got you a present. You know, since we're friends."

I reached over and held the small red box in my hands, waiting for her to take it. She simply rolled her eyes and turned away from me. "I don't want any presents. Holidays are stupid. I'm not a little kid."

I coughed slightly at her rudeness, but grinned carefully anyway. "Helen isn't a little kid either, Amelia. Holidays aren't for giving gifts, gifts are just the way we express caring for one another. Go on, take it. Open it up."

Nudging her arm with the box, I held it forwards expectantly. With a slow and quiet sigh, Amelia turned and sat up on the couch, taking it slowly, almost regretfully. "Alright already. Sheesh."

Despite her thoughtless words and terrible lack of manners, I noted with interest that she carefully examined the red box, eyeballing the bow I had carefully tied on top, having home-made every piece of it. Carefully poking and plying at it with her small fingers, she delicately untied the bow and began a slow process of peeling apart the tape without tearing the wrapping paper.

Taking an unusually long time unwrapping her present, I resisted the urge to start tapping my foot as she carefully unwrapped everything without damaging the packaging. Finally, she pulled it out and stared at it emotionlessly.

A golden cross, with a ruby embedded in the center, blue, yellow, and green gems embedded on the edges of the cross, and the whole thing having an unusual twinkle to it, was attached to a black velvet choker to fit snugly around the neck. The cross was small, only a couple inches tall, but quite beautiful, if I don't say myself.

Amelia held it in her palm for a few long moments, staring at it quietly. "A cross... huh?"

I nodded slowly. "Yes. I thought you might like this. Was I wrong? I can take it back if you don't want-"

She interrupted me quietly. "No. This is fine. I've never been given a present before... what do I do with it?"

I beckoned at her neck. "It's a necklace. You wear it around your neck."

She smiled faintly. "Okay. How do I put it on?"

"I can do it for you, if you like."

"Sure."

With a single word, she handed it to me. I stood up and walked behind her, as I carefully wrapped it around her neck. It came with a nice adjustable strap on the back, unobtrusive and mostly invisible. Carefully tightening it up, I heard her swallow and halted what I was doing. "Is this too tight?"

"No. It's fine. I'm just getting used to it. That's all." Amelia was speaking in tightly cut off sentences. Over the last few months, I had begun to notice a behavior pattern she had never demonstrated in the future. Moments of calm and quiet, followed by lapses into child-like behavior, filled with yelling and pouting, and then a reversion back into peace and quiet.

Notably, every time she reverted back to her child-like demeanor, it was always accompanied by a surge in dark energy. She kept mentioning her 'friend', but I was beginning to worry about who that friend was. She had yet to deem me worthy of telling.

Finally, I was done, the necklace attached at precisely the right tightness. I glanced over at the dining table on board the Mothership and noted that Helen was staring at the both of us with an amused look on her face.

Stepping back, I spoke to Amelia. "Well, how do you like it?"

She carefully rubbed her fingers on it, then glanced up at me. "It's nice."

She didn't say 'thank you', but then I wasn't sure if she had ever learned to do that. I certainly didn't want to tell her to say it, that might come off as patronizing. "I'm glad you like it. Merry Christmas."

She nodded at me. "Yes, Merry Christmas, Jason." Following that, she turned back to the window and stared out into space, but now she didn't seem so sullen and sad. She merely sat there, rubbing the necklace I gave her.

Walking back over to the table, I aimed my mind at Harold, still stowed away in his secret room. "Harold. I'm not done with the presents yet. I'm going to come to you and give you something special. I'll bring Helen along with me."

The old man chuckled. "Hehe... a present? For an old fart like me? I ain't got hands to play with anything, you know."

I nodded quietly as I telepathically spoke with him. "I know, but this is special. I've been keeping it a secret from you, because I didn't want to get your hopes up. But now I'm sure it will work."

Helen wasn't a part of our conversation, but she was staring at me as my unfocused eyes stared past her at the ground. She had long ago learned how to tell when I was speaking with Harold, something Amelia might not yet have found out about.

Nodding at her, I tilted my head slightly towards the rear of the Mothership, where Harold was located. Helen blinked slowly as she stood up to walk with me. Turning back to Amelia, I noted that she was still staring out the window silently. "Amelia, I'll be right back. I need to go take care of something with Helen."

Amelia barely even nodded. "Sure."

I narrowed my eyes at her, but shrugged. She just got like this, sometimes. "I'll be back in a few."

It took a couple minutes, but finally Helen and I arrived at the secret wall panel that led to Harold's central facility. Located in a heavily reinforced area of the ship, he was protected from anything resembling a point-blank nuclear blast. I had made this part of the ship 'indestructible', hoping that would protect him in the event a surprise attack wiped out the mothership.

In this room was also a familiar cryopod, which stored an apparent duplicate of myself. I had not yet figured out what the hell to do with this mysterious thing, but I'd eventually work something out.

Walking in, I smiled at Harold's orb, as it was locked into a mechanical vice that would not easily be opened up.

"Alright kid, yer here now. Whatcha got ta show me?"

Harold's old voice betrayed a certain type of eagerness. I had wondered if maybe he'd been spying on me as I made the preparations, but that seemed unlikely. I had carefully blocked him out so the surprise wouldn't be spoiled.

"Harold, aren't you pretty sick of being stuck in that orb?"

His old face shrugged in my mind. "I spose, I mean, I done got used ta it a long time ago, kid. Ain't no big deal now, I 'spose."

I grinned devilishly as I spoke a word. "Storage."

Reaching into my infinite storage, I pulled out exactly what I wanted. A full-sized robotic body, with real-looking synthetic-polymer skin, a face that resembled the picture of Harold that I'd seen in his photo from when he was younger, and fully equipped with all the latest technology brought on by the advances in android research.

"Here it is, Harold! An android body! I'm going to use my wordsmithing to transfer your mind inside of it. The greatest Christmas present of all time! You're going to have a real body again!"

Helen's eyes filled with tears as she looked at the android's body, a figure that seemed to look exactly like the way she remembered her husband. "Oh, Jason... you didn't have to..."

Her tears were those of happiness though, as she realized she might finally be able to see her husband once again, but more 'in the flesh'.

As she broke out into tears and smiles, I noted that Harold had gone quiet and solemn in my mind's eye, as he examined the android.

Harold seemed to eye it, not with suspicion, but with disinterest. His gaze in my mind's eye was something of a man who had grown weary of a great many things. "Kid... this is real mighty fine of ya... but..." He paused, as he searched for words. "...listen, kid. Ya know, I was 'sposed to die, all those years ago. Helen died, I wanted to pass on. Instead, I got stuck in this here orb. But I've gotten over it. I don't know, however, if I wanna be stuck in a machine like that. It's a real good thing yer doin', but this is just... it ain't for me, kid."

I stared at him in bewilderment. "Harold, this machine has everything. It has sensors for your fingers, you can feel touch, you can smell things, you can hear with your own ears..." My voice trailed off as the old man's face had hardened somewhat.

"Kid, it's a real good thing yer doing, and I certainly 'preciate it. But... have ye ever thought about this orb here? How it works?"

I felt my face contort itself into confusion. "Uh... I... no?"

Harold sighed quietly as Helen dried her tears, this time listening in on our conversation. "Listen, this orb, it ain't normal, ya know? Sometimes, I hear other voices in here. There are other people here, Jason. Other humans. What happens if I leave, huh?"

Harold swallowed quietly as his eyes appeared crestfallen. "This orb... it takes souls and sucks them up. Are you willing to make bodies for every person stuck in here?"

I shook my head slowly. "No... I don't suppose I am..."

"Right. Then, kid, don't take this the wrong way, alright? I think I was chosen. God chose me, kid. He put me in this orb, made me smarter, made me think faster, all so I could help you. My life is over, kid. Helen and I are only here to help you out. My duty is to help others, that's what I believed as a Christian man my whole life, y'hear? I 'preciate what you done, kid. It just ain't what I want."

He glanced over at Helen. "Unless, of course, mah wife has somethin' ta say 'bout it?"

Helen shook her head sadly. "No, Harold. If that's what you want, you're the man of the house. You do as you please."

I felt frustrated. All that time I'd spent, and he didn't want it? "Well, Harold, you might not want it now, but I'll set it off to the side, okay? Just in case you change your mind."

Harold nodded. "That's a smart idea, kid. It really is the best Christmas present a feller could ask for. Who knows? Might change my mind in the future."

We all smiled and had a little laugh. It was the thought that counted. That's what Christmas was all about, after all.

Part 287a:

Marie's entire body was shaking as she stood silently in the Labyrinth. She was in a special room, built especially for her by Satan himself, using a lot of his innate energy and abilities.

The room was a large monitoring room, filled with wall-to-wall supercomputers and hundreds of monitors, used for monitoring the situation on Earth and plenty of other locations, such as the Moon and Mars, all at once. Dozens of imps moved around here and there, the smartest of their tiny brethren, but not much smarter than a very dull human.

Marie, however, was trembling noticeably as she held the datapad in her hands that would seal the fate of humanity. A command was sitting onscreen, prompting her to activate the doomsday device that would surely kill billions of people. She shook in fear of what was to come next, not because she feared humanity's response, or because she feared the demons if they were left to rule, but because she feared the unknown.

Humans, of course, always fear that which they do not understand. But nothing is less predictable and understandable than a tentative future turned into total chaos by one massive act of random destruction. Once she activated this prompt, everything would change. The balance of power would shift tremendously. Alliances would crumble and reform.

Marie, though, was even more fearful of the unknown. Her entire life rested on science, manipulation, and the act of reading and interpreting data. As a young girl, she had dreamed of total world domination, though she quickly grew out of that childhood farce. Growing older, she had discovered the existence of the demons by chance, and grew jealous of their awesome power as she learned more and more about them. Once again though, she realized attaining the power the demons possessed was physically impossible for her weak human body.

Still, she matured and her ambitions shifted goals again, now aimed towards her current goal, which was the advancement of science. No science in particular was her goal, though her body always quivered when it came to weapons of war. As a young girl, she had loved playing 'war' with her brothers, even if it wasn't a girly thing to do, and even as she aged, war was a fascinating topic for her.

And in the end, it was always men that died at war, not women. So if she were to stoke a major war somehow, it wouldn't affect her.

In the end, her brothers had died, along with the rest of her family, in a tragic house fire. The whole of her life had hardened her, leading her to the conclusion that life was unfair. There was no justice in this world. The only way to win at life was to make herself as untouchable as possible. She would become so powerful that even the Creator would not be able to stop her.

Still, this act was unlike anything she had done in the past. One might even have, for a while, called her an ally of humanity. The anti-energy weapons she had taken from the Nazi research facilities had been used to create weapons that could eliminate the angels... or the demons. If they should turn against humanity, or herself, they would be driven back.

But now here she was, about to kill off billions of people. And she trembled... for nothing she would ever do for the rest of her life could possibly redeem her for this heinous act.

She felt a presence behind herself, a familiar overwhelming and intimidating aura that made her feel like a small, weak mortal every time she felt it.

"Having doubts? Second thoughts?" Satan spoke from behind her, his voice filled with amusement at the internal struggle even she must be madly coping with.

"I should think so." Keeping her voice even, Marie swallowed carefully. "Even the Jews that collaborated with the Nazis must have been filled with regrets. However, they were simply trying to save their own skin. As for myself..."

Satan snickered as he stared at the back of the tiny human in front of himself. "Yes, as for you, you're just a greedy soul looking out for number one. But I can understand the sentiment. The demons have become greedy, as have the gods and angels. I can't say I respect it, but I understand it."

Satan paced forwards a step or two until he was standing directly beside her. Her heart was pounding rapidly as his eyes flicked down to the screen. His tiny smile turned into a full bore grin as he saw her trembling hand hovering over the prompt onscreen. "Would you like for me to do it? I won't hold it against you if you want to back out now, but I'm going to do it one way or another."

"No. I'll do it. I just need a moment." Marie bit off each sentence harshly as she gritted her teeth. It wasn't easy, making a choice like this.

Her finger twitched as she lowered it down slowly, hesitantly. Finally, it was a hair's length above the screen.

She swallowed again, her dry throat giving her one last warning about the regrets she would be living with for the rest of her existence. "Well... here we go."

In the blink of an eye, she pressed her finger down the rest of the way, as 'YES' lit up on her screen.

An instant later, she exhaled deeply, realizing she had been holding her breath. It was over now. She wouldn't even know anything had happened, if it weren't for the monitoring room showing images of the world around her.

Turning to look at a monitor showing a local city in Kansas, tears filled her eyes as the camera began to shake.

"What have I done?"

Satan placed a hand on her shoulder, grinning evilly as he too watched the display.

"Exactly what you needed to do. With this, you have cemented yourself as a true ally of the demons."

A man pounded furiously on the door of the large estate, slapping the doorbell over and over again as rage and anger filled his mind. The rain outside was scheduled to end at precisely 4:30 AM, and it was 4:17 now. If he had just woken up a bit later, he might not be drenched to his bones.

But he didn't care. What was rain, compared to the lives of billions?

"Beatrix! Supreme commander Beatrix!!!" Kicking on the sturdy oak door, he pounded furiously until he finally heard a slow, hesitant unlocking of the door as a butler peeked out at the sopping wet man.

"Who are you? The lady of the house is sleeping right now. No visitors."

In a flash, the man shoved the door aside, pushing the butler out of the way as he stormed past. "To hell with sleep! Have you not seen the news yet?!"

The butler, Alonso, glared madly at the crazed fool who had barged his way into the house. "My word! If you don't get off the premises immediately, I will call security! You deranged madman!"

The man turned and blasted a fiery hot glare of rage and annoyance at the butler. "You idiot! The world is under attack! Get Beatrix down here now!"

Alonso gazed at the man's disheveled appearance, suddenly feeling a note of incredulity in his voice. "Ben Brown? You're the one who..." Realizing suddenly who the man was, Alonso suddenly felt his heart slamming in his chest. If the great Benjamin Brown was this angry, it must be serious.

"I'll wake her at once. Follow me."

Beatrix stood stiffly in her room, watching the newscast scrolling over her screen, shock having overtaken her body and paralyzed her with a feeling of hopelessness, as the reports came in. North America was effectively gone. Canada, the States, and even half of South America too. The tremors and volcanoes had sprung up out of nowhere. Ash was rapidly filling the atmosphere.

Already reports were coming in on her private military data feed. The ash cloud was set to spread over the entire planet within a day or two. Only the weather control systems would be any use in slowing it down. The first volcano, at the epicenter of all these calamities, had exploded out of nowhere with the force of Krakatoa from the 1800's. Its power was unrivaled and an incredible expression of the forces belonging to Mother Nature.

For sure, this was no mere weather phenomenon. This was not the result of plates shifting or random tectonic forces converging.

This was an attack.

Was it the Volgrim? Of course it was.

As she stared limply at the reports scrolling in, her bedroom door was suddenly thrown open, as her butler rushed in, followed by a familiar looking man she had not seen in a few years. His sopping wet body might have made it difficult to tell who he was, but his bulky and toned body, black skin, and trademark purple uniform gave him away at once.

"Beatrix! You're awake?" Ben Brown breathed rapidly as he glanced first from her, to the holoscreen on the wall, then to the pad in her hands. She knew.

"Yes. I'm awake." Beatrix spoke haltingly. She was feeling a rush of emotions she had not felt in a long time as the realization of what had happened was setting in.

"It's an attack by the Volgrim, doubtlessly." Ben calmed down as he took in Beatrix's figure, standing there proudly, concealing her emotions so as to keep her subordinates calm in the face of danger. A true commander, of course.

"Yes. An attack." Beatrix felt her grip tightening on the datapad in her hands as she stared, not at Ben, but past him, far past him into an unseen void. "I was a fool."

Ben's expression turned into confusion. "Huh? What are you talking about?"

"Peace. I wanted peace. I wanted peace with these aliens. I wanted peace with them, because I don't like war." Beatrix turned her empty gaze towards the casualty reports on her screen. "And look what it got me."

Ben stared carefully at the commander's face, as he took a few steps towards her. "Supreme commander, this isn't your fault. We need you at the headquarters, it's chaos down there."

"What would you know." Beatrix punctuated her question rhetorically, indicating it was a statement.

Ben froze as he stopped walking towards her. Something about her demeanor... "Commander, are you alri-"

"I SAID WHAT WOULD YOU KNOW?!" Beatrix snapped, throwing her datapad to the ground and stomping in with her right foot as a flash of hot fury exploded inside of her. Ben and Alonso jumped back at the sight of the usually reserved woman exploded in rage. "I tried to negotiate with these fucking monsters for more than fifty years! LOOK WHAT IT GOT ME!"

Howling at the top of her lungs, Beatrix turned to her bedside dresser and overturned it, throwing it to the ground as she started smashing everything she could get her hands on. Tearing off a leg from a table sitting against the wall, she used the leg to start smashing everything in the room as tears of rage poured down her face.

Ben and Alonso stood back, not in fear, but out of sorrow. The pain she felt must have been...

After a minute or two of tearing around the room, destroying every damned thing in sight, Beatrix seemed to suddenly calm down as she slumped to the floor, tears pouring down her face as she wiped them away furiously with both hands. "Fuck! Shit! It's not right! It's just not right!"

Ben walked forwards but kept his distance from her as he knelt down to her level. "This isn't your fault, commander. This is their fault."

"It's not that! It's... my family... they were visiting the East Coast of America for Christmas. They're... they're..." She bit off her sentence as rage and sorrow overtook her. "My mother, and my father, and both of my sisters..."

Ben shimmied closer to her as he wrapped both arms around her. "I'm... I'm sorry commander. I lost some family too, I think. I don't know, I'm just not thinking about it right now. We all deal with it in different ways."

Beatrix slowly stopped babbling as she succumbed to grief for a minute or two. Finally, she furiously wiped away her tears as she stood up slowly, pulling herself up by the edge of the bed.

Rising to her full height, she stood only a few inches shorter than Ben Brown, who was a tall and sturdy 6'5". The both of them looked quite intimidating as the sadness slowly melted away.

"Those... bastards." Beatrix felt a snarl curl up on her face as she wiped at her puffed and swollen eyes. "This is the final straw. Chancellor Brown, we're putting an end to all diplomacy. No more attempts at peace. No more idealistic notions or childhood fantasies. We're going to crush these invaders."

She glanced over at the holoscreen, as reports were coming in of Volgrim entering Europe and attacking several major cities.

Ben lowered his gaze as he felt the sudden alteration of the Supreme Commander, at her most base level. She had always been one of the most peace loving people, and now...

"As you will, Supreme Commander. Let's go, we can save the tears for later."

"Yes. Let's."

Marie stared with bewilderment at her screens. "Damn! The European device didn't activate! If we don't set it off, this will create one hell of a backlash!"

Satan felt emotions boiling through him as he stared at the small woman beside him. Was this intentional? Did she perhaps sabotage the second device? Nonsense, she wasn't even in Europe and hadn't inspected it. It couldn't have been her.

Of course it couldn't. This woman was ruthless. She was no friend of humanity.

Or was she?

Satan smoothed out his expression as she turned to look at him in bewilderment. Her confusion seemed genuine. It was probably just a glitch in the system. What else could have caused that device to misfire?

"It's fine. We weakened humanity severely. The Volgrim are already attacking the key cities as planned. The ash cloud will eventually cover Earth, even if we didn't take out the main technological centers in the other continents."

"It won't happen quickly, though, Satan. The weather control systems will be able to hold the cloud off for several weeks, possibly months. Not just enough time for an evacuation, but enough time to figure out a solution to remove the cloud."

Marie bit harshly onto her fingernails as she watched the numbers coming in. Actually, it was worse than expected. The Americas were important for humanity to develop new technology, but doubtlessly there were still many well-fortified bunkers built underground that had taken little damage. For one thing, Marie's own laboratory had likely survived just fine. What of the Type 3 Energy testing facilities? What about Jason Hiro's own underground bases?

Marie snarled. This was a terrible outcome. Not the worst, but bad. Still, if humanity should survive and rebuild, then she'd simply have to switch sides. Playing both sides of the field, that was what she excelled at. Much like the bankers during WWII, she got along with leaders for both teams, and they in return would not begrudge her if she made a quick buck, or if she simply saved her own skin.

Yes, in the end, it didn't matter who won. She would become one with the winner.

Still, who could have possibly sabotaged that device? It was protected by dozens of hundred digit codes. Simply unlocking the mainframe would take an ordinary person hours to get past the security. There was just no culprit, and it couldn't have been a simple misfiring.

Marie continued to gnaw at her finger as that question weighed on her mind.

Part 288a:

Marie's entire body was shaking as she stood silently in the Labyrinth. She was in a special room, built especially for her by Satan himself, using a lot of his innate energy and abilities.

The room was a large monitoring room, filled with wall-to-wall supercomputers and hundreds of monitors, used for monitoring the situation on Earth and plenty of other locations, such as the Moon and Mars, all at once. Dozens of imps moved around here and there, the smartest of their tiny brethren, but not much smarter than a very dull human.

Marie, however, was trembling noticeably as she held the datapad in her hands that would seal the fate of humanity. A command was sitting onscreen, prompting her to activate the doomsday device that would surely kill billions of people. She shook in fear of what was to come next, not because she feared humanity's response, or because she feared the demons if they were left to rule, but because she feared the unknown.

Humans, of course, always fear that which they do not understand. But nothing is less predictable and understandable than a tentative future turned into total chaos by one massive act of random destruction. Once she activated this prompt, everything would change. The balance of power would shift tremendously. Alliances would crumble and reform.

Marie, though, was even more fearful of the unknown. Her entire life rested on science, manipulation, and the act of reading and interpreting data. As a young girl, she had dreamed of total world domination, though she quickly grew out of that childhood farce. Growing older, she had discovered the existence of the demons by chance, and grew jealous of their awesome power as she learned more and more about them. Once again though, she realized attaining the power the demons possessed was physically impossible for her weak human body.

Still, she matured and her ambitions shifted goals again, now aimed towards her current goal, which was the advancement of science. No science in particular was her goal, though her body always quivered when it came to weapons of war. As a young girl, she had loved playing 'war' with her brothers, even if it wasn't a girly thing to do, and even as she aged, war was a fascinating topic for her.

And in the end, it was always men that died at war, not women. So if she were to stoke a major war somehow, it wouldn't affect her.

In the end, her brothers had died, along with the rest of her family, in a tragic house fire. The whole of her life had hardened her, leading her to the conclusion that life was unfair. There was no justice in this world. The only way to win at life was to make herself as untouchable as possible. She would become so powerful that even the Creator would not be able to stop her.

Still, this act was unlike anything she had done in the past. One might even have, for a while, called her an ally of humanity. The anti-energy weapons she had taken from the Nazi research facilities had been used to create weapons that could eliminate the angels... or the demons. If they should turn against humanity, or herself, they would be driven back.

But now here she was, about to kill off billions of people. And she trembled... for nothing she would ever do for the rest of her life could possibly redeem her for this heinous act.

She felt a presence behind herself, a familiar overwhelming and intimidating aura that made her feel like a small, weak mortal every time she felt it.

"Having doubts? Second thoughts?" Satan spoke from behind her, his voice filled with amusement at the internal struggle even she must be madly coping with.

"I should think so." Keeping her voice even, Marie swallowed carefully. "Even the Jews that collaborated with the Nazis must have been filled with regrets. However, they were simply trying to save their own skin. As for myself..."

Satan snickered as he stared at the back of the tiny human in front of himself. "Yes, as for you, you're just a greedy soul looking out for number one. But I can understand the sentiment. The demons have become greedy, as have the gods and angels. I can't say I respect it, but I understand it."

Satan paced forwards a step or two until he was standing directly beside her. Her heart was pounding rapidly as his eyes flicked down to the screen. His tiny smile turned into a full bore grin as he saw her trembling hand hovering over the prompt onscreen. "Would you like for me to do it? I won't hold it against you if you want to back out now, but I'm going to do it one way or another."

"No. I'll do it. I just need a moment." Marie bit off each sentence harshly as she gritted her teeth. It wasn't easy, making a choice like this.

Her finger twitched as she lowered it down slowly, hesitantly. Finally, it was a hair's length above the screen.

She swallowed again, her dry throat giving her one last warning about the regrets she would be living with for the rest of her existence. "Well... here we go."

In the blink of an eye, she pressed her finger down the rest of the way, as 'YES' lit up on her screen.

An instant later, she exhaled deeply, realizing she had been holding her breath. It was over now. She wouldn't even know anything had happened, if it weren't for the monitoring room showing images of the world around her.

Turning to look at a monitor showing a local city in Kansas, tears filled her eyes as the camera began to shake.

"What have I done?"

Satan placed a hand on her shoulder, grinning evilly as he too watched the display.

"Exactly what you needed to do. With this, you have cemented yourself as a true ally of the demons."

A man pounded furiously on the door of the large estate, slapping the doorbell over and over again as rage and anger filled his mind. The rain outside was scheduled to end at precisely 4:30 AM, and it was 4:17 now. If he had just woken up a bit later, he might not be drenched to his bones.

But he didn't care. What was rain, compared to the lives of billions?

"Beatrix! Supreme commander Beatrix!!!" Kicking on the sturdy oak door, he pounded furiously until he finally heard a slow, hesitant unlocking of the door as a butler peeked out at the sopping wet man.

"Who are you? The lady of the house is sleeping right now. No visitors."

In a flash, the man shoved the door aside, pushing the butler out of the way as he stormed past. "To hell with sleep! Have you not seen the news yet?!"

The butler, Alonso, glared madly at the crazed fool who had barged his way into the house. "My word! If you don't get off the premises immediately, I will call security! You deranged madman!"

The man turned and blasted a fiery hot glare of rage and annoyance at the butler. "You idiot! The world is under attack! Get Beatrix down here now!"

Alonso gazed at the man's disheveled appearance, suddenly feeling a note of incredulity in his voice. "Ben Brown? You're the one who..." Realizing suddenly who the man was, Alonso suddenly felt his heart slamming in his chest. If the great Benjamin Brown was this angry, it must be serious.

"I'll wake her at once. Follow me."

Beatrix stood stiffly in her room, watching the newscast scrolling over her screen, shock having overtaken her body and paralyzed her with a feeling of hopelessness, as the reports came in. North America was effectively gone. Canada, the States, and even half of South America too. The tremors and volcanoes had sprung up out of nowhere. Ash was rapidly filling the atmosphere.

Already reports were coming in on her private military data feed. The ash cloud was set to spread over the entire planet within a day or two. Only the weather control systems would be any use in slowing it down. The first volcano, at the epicenter of all these calamities, had exploded out of nowhere with the force of Krakatoa from the 1800's. Its power was unrivaled and an incredible expression of the forces belonging to Mother Nature.

For sure, this was no mere weather phenomenon. This was not the result of plates shifting or random tectonic forces converging.

This was an attack.

Was it the Volgrim? Of course it was.

As she stared limply at the reports scrolling in, her bedroom door was suddenly thrown open, as her butler rushed in, followed by a familiar looking man she had not seen in a few years. His sopping wet body might have made it difficult to tell who he was, but his bulky and toned body, black skin, and trademark purple uniform gave him away at once.

"Beatrix! You're awake?" Ben Brown breathed rapidly as he glanced first from her, to the holoscreen on the wall, then to the pad in her hands. She knew.

"Yes. I'm awake." Beatrix spoke haltingly. She was feeling a rush of emotions she had not felt in a long time as the realization of what had happened was setting in.

"It's an attack by the Volgrim, doubtlessly." Ben calmed down as he took in Beatrix's figure, standing there proudly, concealing her emotions so as to keep her subordinates calm in the face of danger. A true commander, of course.

"Yes. An attack." Beatrix felt her grip tightening on the datapad in her hands as she stared, not at Ben, but past him, far past him into an unseen void. "I was a fool."

Ben's expression turned into confusion. "Huh? What are you talking about?"

"Peace. I wanted peace. I wanted peace with these aliens. I wanted peace with them, because I don't like war." Beatrix turned her empty gaze towards the casualty reports on her screen. "And look what it got me."

Marie continued to gnaw at her finger as that question weighed on her mind.

Part 289a:

An explosion. A flash of bright light. The sound of metal smashing into metal, as teams of titanic warriors careened into each other.

A little boy watched from a nearby window, his body shaking half in terror, half in amazement at the battle he was witnessing. He was just an orphan, left behind in the rush of the evacuation, nobody had bothered to look for him. He was one of the forgotten.

But that was all right, he liked playing action and adventure simulations, this was like one of those on steroids.

Two of the hypersuit commandos and a tiny little girl were fighting a massive robot, its spider-like appearance and huge size belying its incredible speed and power. It looked big and bulky, as if it were a slow shambling thing, but its 360 degree area of sight meant once it locked onto its targets, it never lost track of their positions. Each of its four arms moved independently, fighting off each assailant with ease. Just when each attacker thought they had gained ground against it, the automaton would then pull out a new trick.

This young orphan, Ricky, especially kept his eye on the little girl. From his vantage point only a few feet up in the air, less than a couple blocks away, he couldn't make out any of their words as they attacked, as the impacts of their weapons lit up the usually quiet and reserved neighborhood. The little girl took a terrible blow to her body, sending her sprawling backwards a few dozen feet as she smashed into the brick base of another building. The impact should surely have killed her unarmored self, but she quickly got up and dusted herself off, rushing back in to do her part.

She seemed very strong, easily capable of fighting equally among the other two armored warriors. Of course, Ricky, like all kids, knew who the Hypersuit Commandos were. He wanted to join them when he grew up, as they were the coolest soldiers in the universe. Most kids wanted to, and he had planned to trick out his very own hypersuit once he had one of his own.

But Ricky wasn't dumb. He knew that the latest series of events were bad, really bad. His friends had panicked when they heard about the volcanoes and the earthquakes, but Ricky had faith in humanity's power. Was he forgotten by the others when they fled? Perhaps he'd hidden himself, just so he could watch.

That's just the sort of kid he was.

Amelia wiped a tiny bit of blood from her mouth. The impact had hit much harder than she expected, causing even her incredibly resistant body to take some damage. It was likely an internal injury, but Leviathan would take care of it given a bit of rest later on.

"Princess, you don't need to be here. You don't need to fight alongside a hero."

Leviathan murmured inside her ear but she shook her head quickly. "I'm not doing this because I have to, Levvy!"

Running forwards, she grabbed a signpost and ripped it out of the ground in one smooth motion, as she jumped up and grabbed onto one of the mecha's legs. Wrapping her small body around the relatively thin leg, she used the sign-pole as a weapon and stabbed straight forwards, the sign facing heavy resistance but still piercing through the leg all the way through the other side. Just as she finished, the robot flicked one of its four arms around and slapped her from its leg, knocking her a few feet away as she came to a rolling stop. Shambling back up to her feet, she rubbed her arm and winced as she felt a bruise developing.

Jason was busy fighting the robot in his own way, but he seemed to be frustrated about something, as if he had expected the fight to be super easy, yet now it was much more difficult than expected. Jamming his armored hand into the side of a building, he tore out a huge chunk of brick and stone and chucked it with explosive speed at the mecha, the block smashing into the cybernetic being with incredible force, a loud shock-wave blasting from it as the debris blew up into tiny fragments and split all over the place, embedding themselves in walls and the ground.

"Princess, this thing is not going down easily. Whatever it's made of, best to just leave it to the hero and his comrade. This isn't our battle." Leviathan again urged her to leave, as he had been fighting her for the last couple months to abandon Jason and go back to her usual self.

Amelia wasn't having any of it. "Levvy, you're usually such a sweetheart, but for once, just let me think for myself! This is fun! I like fighting something that takes real effort to take down!"

"I'm not talking about the battle, princess. I'm talking about your associating with a hero. You know what they mean, you know what he will do to you later on, correct? He's your enemy. You can't trust him."

"I-I know that much!" Amelia glared at nothing in particular as she once again felt annoyance at the dragon inside of herself. Jason had taken a few steps back from the battle while his gold and black armored friend pressed the assault. Glancing over at Amelia as she seemed to talk with herself again, he barely seemed to give her a passing thought as he jumped back into the fray.

Amelia glowered as she stumbled forwards slightly, a sudden stinging pain in her chest caught her off guard as she wheezed for breath.

"Princess, you were hit by some of that shrapnel. It's jammed into your chest. Pull it out so I can heal you."

Amelia glanced down with alarm as she saw blood sprouting from a freshly opened wound, as indeed there were two or three small pieces of rock and brick embedded into her sternum. The wounds weren't deep enough to badly wound her, but they certainly hurt, and she wasn't used to feeling pain.

Quickly pulling them out, she waited for Leviathan to heal her but paused as the blood continued to slowly leak from the wound. "Levy, what's wrong? Why aren't you healing me?"

Frustration crept into her friend's voice. "I can't. There's some sort of energy hampering my abilities. I have been wondering about this for a while now, but there's no way you should be having trouble against that monster. It's putting off some kind of spiritual energy nullifier, and your abilities are greatly weakened as a result."

Amelia flicked her eyes up at the eight legged monstrosity. So that was it. "Alright, if I get further away, will you be able to heal me?"

Leviathan grunted quietly. "Yes, princess. I believe that will do. But you also need to revitalize yourself. You haven't had a meal in a long time, you know. You have to take care of yourself."

Amelia gritted her teeth. "Yes, Levy. I know. I... know."

Reluctantly, she quickly started moving away from the fight, slowly feeling as if a weight upon her body was lessening the further away from the robot that she got.

I'm sorry, Jason. You'll have to forgive me for leaving you like this.

As she left the scene of the fight, Amelia felt something that she couldn't remember feeling ever before. It was a feeling that, if she were a girl of moral stature, she might liken the feeling to guilt.

Once she was a few blocks away, she began to feel her wound rapidly healing as Leviathan quickly began to work his regeneration abilities on her. In seconds, she felt whole again.

"There, you're healed. Now, while the hero isn't looking, you need to find sustenance."

Amelia felt a sudden rush of hormones flood her mind as her vision dipped in and out for a moment or two. Stumbling forwards, she felt greatly weakened as her mouth dried up in an instant. "Ahhh... Levy, I don't feel so good..."

"That's expected. I used your own dwindling energy to heal you. You have to feed."

Tilting her head back, Amelia listened to the sounds of combat in the distance, as Jason didn't appear to be following her. She had moved far away from the main action with the Volgrim and humans, so she didn't have any aliens or demons to eat...

Her eyes flicked around as she quickly looked for heat signatures. Up, in a nearby window, she spotted a small child watching the battle with a simple-minded curiosity.

Pushing her guilt aside, Amelia licked her lips as she made her move.

I was moving very sluggishly for some reason. Usually, a battle with any being, even a strong one like this, would be over in a flash. More disturbingly, I realized early on that my wordsmithing was not only ineffective against it, but I was unable to use my wordsmithing at all while in its presence.

"Centurion, is there any form of energy dampening in the immediate area?"

Amelia had run off a few minutes ago. Likely, seeing the wound she had sustained, even she was having trouble fighting this robot.

"AFFIRMATIVE, PILOT JASON HERO! SUIT STABILITY IS DOWN TO 50%! OVERALL COMBAT EFFECTIVENESS HAS DROPPED BY 85% FROM NORMAL EXPECTED PARAMETERS! A TACTICAL RETREAT IS RECOMMENDED!"

I gritted my teeth as the massive Dragoon smashed me with its massive blunt weapon, a hammer-like object with a heavy round head that weighed several times what the rest of the entire pole combined did. It was very dense, easily capable of leveling a skyscraper given a few aimed hits.

"I can't retreat, Centurion! If Ben and I don't take this thing out, it'll continue killing more and more people! Give me options!"

A sudden flash of movement had me grimace as Ben, even with his highly enhanced abilities thanks to a direct neural connection with his suit, was flattened into the ground by one blow of the mecha's hammer.

"TYPE 3 ENERGY IS BEING DAMPENED IN THIS UNIT'S IMMEDIATE VICINITY. CONVENTIONAL WEAPONRY IS HIGHLY ADVISED AGAINST THIS OPPONENT. WOULD YOU LIKE TO ACTIVATE PHASE MODE?"

There it was again, 'Phase Mode'. It was supposed to be a crazy trump card, though I wasn't sure just how effective it would be in this situation. I had barely even used it in the fight against Amelia.

"Yes, activate Phase Mode. Let's see what it can do."

"AFFIRMATIVE, PILOT JASON HIRO. HYPER DEFENSES NOW ONLINE. WARNING! SUIT STABILITY IS AT 45%! HYPER DEFENSES ARE UNTESTED AT THIS STABILITY THRESHOLD! USE CAUTION, PILOT JASON HIRO!"

I suddenly felt my body stiffen as a humming feeling could be detected all over inside the suit. Just as I was questioning what that humming meant, I looked up just in time to see a hovercar flying directly at me. With no time to dodge, I flinched as I raised a hand up to try and catch it.

Instead, I was suddenly dumbfounded as the car sailed directly through my body, passing through me as if I wasn't even there.

Feeling astonished at what had just happened, I blurted out a few words in confusion. "What the hell just happened?!"

"IN PHASE MODE, RATHER THAN ABSORBING AN IMPACT DIRECTLY, THE HYPERSUIT VIBRATES AT SPEEDS FAST ENOUGH TO PHASE THROUGH OBJECTS. IN TERMS OF DEFENSE, WHAT CANNOT HIT YOU WILL NOT BE ABLE TO HURT YOU."

Centurion, of course, already had a response prepared. I nodded slowly as I realized that I was sitting around gawking while Ben fought the Dragoon all by himself. I felt like my body's sluggishness had also faded somewhat as well, as I charged forwards, jumping up into the air, I phased through the Dragoon as it swung at me. As the arm swung through me, the Dragoon experienced an apparent moment of confusion as its arm instead smashed into a building instead of me. Flying forwards, I phased through its main upper body, my body solidifying once inside of it, as I started kicking and punching rapidly, tearing it to pieces from the inside out.

Interestingly, there was very little wiring, and this appeared to be a half biological weapon, possibly created by the Volgrim in some weird test tube laboratory somewhere until it reached this monstrous size. While inside of the tight cramped space inside of it, I kicked off hard from against its inner body, blasting out of its back as oddly colored innards spilled out onto the street below.

Landing on the ground with a thud, I rolled myself quickly back into a standing position and looked back, just in time to see the Dragoon fumbling around trying to steady itself as it lost more and more of its inner parts all over the street. Finally, with a single forward stagger, the Dragoon stumbled forwards and slumped to the ground, dead.

I stared for several seconds as I breathed heavily, more out of adrenaline than out of fear or excitement. Ben quickly jumped over, landing beside me in one smooth motion. His suit appeared to be in good condition, but his voice was hoarse and choked, as if he had been physically injured. Popping his helmet open, I saw his face was contorted into an expression of pain. "Hah... good job, Judicator. I don't know how you did it, but you managed... to take that piece of shit down." He coughed quickly as blood spilled from his mouth on the street. After choking for a second or two, he regained his composure, as I quickly used " Heal. " on him.

After regaining his breath, he half grinned, half grimaced at me. "That ain't the only one though. Think you've got another one of those fights left in you?"

I quickly shook my head as I activated my outwards speakers. "No. We're going to need a new tactic to deal with those. Their energy dampening is..." I paused, realizing what I almost said. "...well, it's not easy to deal with."

He flicked an eyebrow up. "Energy dampening? What do you mean?"

I quickly came up with a half baked lie. "Didn't you notice your suit performing worse than usual? The suits use exotic energy to power themselves. If they can dampen the suit's powers, these battles aren't quite so one sided anymore."

Ben gnawed on his teeth as he turned away, reaching up to stroke his bushy mustache. "Damn. I knew these suits wouldn't be the ultimate weapon forever. Sooner or later they were going to come up with a counter for them."

I nodded quietly. Actually, I had the oddest feeling that neither demon nor Volgrim had anything to do with these energy dampeners. Every bone in my body screamed this was a homegrown culprit, and I even had a small idea of who might be behind it.

I paused for several seconds as I found my mind racing. I jerked my head up, quickly scanning the area.

Where did Amelia go?

Part 290a: Hunger

Amelia entered the building where the young child in the window was hiding. He had seen her walking in and had waved at her. She didn't wave back.

Her head pounded as her chest tightened. She had never gone this long without a meal. It had been at least four months. Well beyond the limits of a normal human, but she might have gone on for much longer, were it not for the fact that the battle had wounded her so badly.

She walked up the stairs quickly at first, then gradually she slowed her pace as doubt entered her mind. This was a bad thing to do. It was very bad. Jason wouldn't like it. Levvy was her friend, but Jason was too. Jason always looked sad, like he didn't like punching her that first time. He always seemed to feel guilty around her. Jason wasn't like other humans.

As she walked up the stairs, she turned around a corner, arriving at the third floor. Only two more floors to go, and she would be where that young boy was.

Her stomach growled as Leviathan spoke quietly in your mind. "Princess, I feel your doubt. But you mustn't hesitate. Time is of the essence."

She felt a frown appear on her face, an expression she had rarely made before. "Levvy... what will happen if I... don't eat him?"

A tinge of irritation appeared in her mind as Leviathan seemed to grumble quietly. "You will very likely die, princess."

"I'll die, huh?" Amelia cringed as a wave of hunger surged over her body again, taking over her senses for a few moments. It was a feeling she had experienced countless times over thousands of years, and one she had nearly forgotten about.

But until now, Amelia had never doubted the Hunger. It had been a part of her for as long as she had remembered. With the effort most people took to take a bite of a sandwich, she had never taken a second thought for devouring another life whole.

And now she did.

Finally, she arrived on the fifth floor, her body sensing the presence of the tiny life form on the other side of a door leading into one of the rooms. This appeared to be a cheap motel, a place for tourists to arrive at. Why had a small child been left here, all alone?

Amelia shook the thoughts from her head. It didn't matter. He was just a meal. Just... a thing to sustain her. He was just a lump of meat, no emotion was needed to process sustenance.

As she walked up to the door, her heart skipped a beat as the door was suddenly yanked open. There stood the little boy, a big smile on his face as he looked her up and down. "Hi! I'm Ricky! What's your name?"

She swallowed involuntarily, caught totally off guard by his offputting jovial smile. "My name, it's uh... Amelia."

He took two quick steps over to her, making her flinch backwards a step or two. Quickly he ran behind her and nodded vigorously. "Wow! I like your dress! You're so pretty, Amelia!"

Looking to be only ten or eleven years old himself, Amelia realized that with her youthful appearance, he must think she was his own age.

"I saw you out there fighting that big robot. You looked so cool, wow!" He grabbed her by the hand, pulling her into the room as he quickly closed the door behind them. "Come on in, have a seat! Do you want anything to eat?"

Amelia jerked her head back at the question. She licked her lips as another pang of hunger struck her. Shoving it down with willpower alone, she merely nodded weakly.

Ricky was all too happy to oblige. He blushed as he turned away from her. She suddenly realized with a start that he might even have a crush on her. He was an interesting child.

"We don't have a lot to eat, just a baloney sandwich. Is that all right?" He walked over to the fridge without waiting for a response, pulling out some bread and meat as well as a small assortment of dressings and lettuce. He was really going all-out for this sandwich. "You look like you're starving!"

Amelia nodded weakly as she suddenly felt tears welling up in her eyes. While he wasn't looking, she turned away from him and quickly wiped them away. Why was she crying? This wasn't something she would usually show any emotions about.

"Y-yes... I'm very, very hungry..." Amelia bit off the words as she swallowed heavily. She gripped her stomach, looking at the boy, then to the ground, and back again.

A war raged in her mind. Countless battles and struggles she had never faced over the course of the last few thousand years inserted themselves viciously into her head in a way they had never done so before.

Leviathan spoke to her from deep within her heart. "Princess, why do you hesitate? You must live on. You cannot go on living like this. If you do not feed... you will..." Leviathan's voice trailed off as Amelia realized he too was feeling emotions of his own. Sadness. She was Leviathan's only friend, just as he had been her only friend, for thousands of years. The thought of her dying must be causing him to experience a tremendous sadness.

"I'm sorry, I just... can't..." Amelia whispered quietly, but realized she was once again speaking out loud. Ricky stood over at the counter, slapping together a baloney sandwich that would inspire awe all throughout the ages.

Ricky shot a glance over at her, as he finished up the final steps for the sandwich. "What was that? Did you need something else?"

Bouncing over to her, he quickly placed the sandwich in front of her, set on a very nice looking china plate. Bopping over to the other side of the table, he smiled and nodded vigorously. "Go on! I made it myself!"

Amelia felt a tiny smile creep onto her face. Of course he made it himself, silly boy.

She felt the smile vanish as a sullen expression passed over her face. She stared down at the sandwich for a long few moments, as Ricky's own smile began to fade as well.

"What's the matter? Did I not make it good enough?" Ricky's face appeared crestfallen as he stared at the pretty young girl sitting across from himself. He had never been one to like girls before, but he could just tell at a single glance, this girl was special. She wasn't like all the other ones. She was fighting with the Hypersuit Commandos, that made her really cool, almost one of the boys, but prettier!

Amelia shook her head slowly. "I'm hungry... but not for a sandwich..." Her voice cracked slightly as she felt her body start to shake. She slowly looked up from the bread and meat to look at the boy sitting across from her. He appeared very sad that she wasn't just going to eat the food he had made. In truth, normal food was revolting to her. Human flesh and its inherent properties was the only thing she was able to live on anymore.

She slowly stood up from her seat as Ricky's eyes followed her. "What do you mean? I can't make anything but a sandwich..."

She took a step towards him, and then another step, as she felt her entire body beginning to tremble.

Ricky quickly noticed the trembling. "Hey... Amelia... you don't look all right..."

She began to feel tears well up as she took another step towards him. "I'm sorry... I'm sorry... I'm sorry..." She whispered quietly as she felt her vision beginning to darken.

It was all right. It would be over in a second. He was just one boy. This was just one small bad thing, in the grand scheme of the entire world.

Suddenly, the door smashed open and Amelia's eyes popped open as she felt her vision clearing.

"Amelia! Get away from him!"

A familiar figure stood in the doorway. Jason Hiro, Amelia's second, most precious friend, watched her with his hollow metallic mask, as he took notice of the distance she had closed between her and the small boy.

"Whoa! A Hypersuit Commando! That's so cool!" Ricky grinned madly at the man in the doorway, oblivious to what the man had just said.

Amelia felt her trembling increase as Ricky ran right past her to the man in the doorway. "I love you guys! I'm gonna be a commando when I grow up too!" As he hopped and jumped excitedly, Jason carefully inserted himself between Amelia and the little boy.

"Yeah. That's real swell, kid. Hey, my other friend, the other commando, he's downstairs. You wanna go say hi to him?"

Ricky nodded viciously. "You mean Ben Brown?! Oh my god, he's the bestest of all the commandos in the world! Wow!!!" Without waiting another moment, Ricky raced off down the stairs.

Jason stared after the kid for a long few moments before turning his gaze back to the little girl in the room. "Amelia. What were you about to do?"

Amelia felt her lip quivering as her knees started to shake. "I'm... I'm sorry, Jason. I just... I was so... hungry... and I couldn't... I couldn't..." The guilt, combined with the realization she had betrayed her friend, caused something to break in her mind as she fell to the ground sobbing. "I didn't want to! I didn't want to do it, Jason."

Jason nodded quietly as he reached up and took his helmet off. Walking over he leaned down to the girl weeping on the floor. "Amelia. You didn't do it. The old you, the one I know of from the future... you wouldn't have hesitated. You were holding yourself back, weren't you?"

Amelia nodded quickly as she viciously wiped tears from her face. "I'm sorry! I didn't mean to hurt our trust!"

Jason frowned as he stared down at the small girl. This is odd.

I stayed and spoke with Amelia for several long minutes. She was not acting right. This was certainly a good way to act, but it felt so forced... as if she were acting like she betrayed me, but more importantly, as if it mattered to her. Did I matter to her? We'd barely known each other four months, in her frame of mind. How could she possibly take me at face value when I called her a friend?

I reached down and hugged her quietly as she sobbed in my arms. In my entire life, I had probably seen a few girls, even a few guys cry. But never like this. She was acting as if her best friend had just committed a double murder suicide with her beloved parents, but all that had happened was she nearly devoured a small child. What the hell was this about?

Finally, the tears seemed to ebb and I stood up, watching her silently. She continued making choked noises as she wiped her face down with her hands. She merely stared at the floor, her emotions drained.

"I..."

Amelia spoke a single word, but didn't continue. I waited patiently, but after a full minute, she said nothing else.

Taking a seat at the table, I continued to keep a careful eye on her. "Amelia... it's time you told me. I want to know. Why do you need to eat people? Tell me, and maybe I can help."

Amelia continued to stare numbly at the ground. She never raised her gaze up for even a second. Seconds turned into another minute or two as my patience began wearing thin. "All right. If you won't tell me that, then tell me this... who is 'Levvy'?"

Instantly her head jerked up as her sad expression morphed into one of anger. "How do you know that name?"

She stood up quickly as she seemed to look me up and down. I shrugged nonchalantly as I kept a careful watch on her. "You talk to yourself, you know. A lot. And oftentimes, you say that name. Is he your friend?"

Her expression turned into an outright glare as she began to bore figurative holes in my chest with her eyes. "That's not your business. Don't pry where you don't belong."

She started to say something else but a look of irritation passed over her face as she turned away from me, almost seeming to listen to someone else speaking in the room. However, there was nobody else in here. It must be 'Levvy' again.

It was really beginning to bother me. Something told me that 'Levvy' wasn't a fiction of her imagination. She wasn't going crazy. She might actually be bipolar, but this seemed all too real. It wasn't the work of a second personality or voices in her head, but perhaps there was another being inside of her, much like how Satan had Hades inside of himself.

Speaking of which, I really ought to look into that some time. That might prove useful to find out about...

Amelia turned back to me and glowered slightly, before her eyes lowered again as her expression softened. "Ah, well... you don't mean any harm by it, I suppose. Still... maybe he's right. Maybe I should tell you. Not much you could do about it anyway."

I cocked an eyebrow at her sudden mental pivot. She really was an interesting character. "You'll tell me?"

She swallowed carefully as her eyes hesitantly met mine. "Yes. I have... someone inside of me. A dear friend. But, because of how he came to be inside of me, he causes... problems. It's not his fault. He means well..."

Her voice faltered momentarily as she blushed. "The Hunger is a side effect, a symptom if you will. Still, when I'm around you, like now... I barely even feel it. I wonder why that is..."

I blinked slowly and deliberately. "The 'hunger', huh? You've mentioned it a few times now. Is this why you, err, devour people? Because of your friend? Is he making you do it?"

Amelia quickly shook her head. "No! He causes me to crave what I need to survive, but only because of his... power. It's too much for my body. Yet, if he were to leave me, I would suddenly die of old age. He extends my life infinitely beyond normal lengths, but also changes who I am, fundamentally."

She was speaking very eloquently, all of a sudden. I wondered silently what caused these changes to her personality. Perhaps the more she ate, the crazier and more immature she acted, but the less she did, the more rapidly she aged? There were many possibilities, and I didn't know enough about her condition to perform a diagnosis.

I put my helmet back on after a few moments of contemplation, my speakers firing up as I stood up from my seat and tilted my head at her. "If it's simply a matter of not feeling hungry, perhaps I might be able to help. We're friends, Amelia. You should rely on me more. That is what friends do."

Turning my speakers off, I quickly wordsmithed the most relevant word I could think of. "Satiate."

Amelia suddenly perked up, as her mental presence snapped back to fully alert. Blinking twice, she glanced down at her hands. "What...? Did you just do something?"

I shrugged as my speakers turned back on. "Maybe I did, maybe I didn't. Come on, we need to get out of here. Ben is waiting for us patiently. We need to clear out the Volgrim and others in the area."

Amelia turned and looked back at me. "I don't think I'll be much use against another one of those robots. You should just go on ahead without me."

I shook my head. "No, just come with me. I've been working on a new plan for dealing with them, and you're needed for it."

She cocked an eyebrow at my statement as an amused smile crossed her face. "Oh? Is that so?"

Beatrix bobbed her head up and down slowly as the man on the line spoke. "Listen, 'Silver', I understand you think this is important, but this all sounds like gobbledygook to me. I've got men dying on the battlefield as we speak. This all sounds like a bunch of gibberish. And do you really expect me to believe magic really exists?"

Silver sighed heavily as his holo-figure lowered his head. "I know it might sound crazy, but I've been working with these concepts my entire life. You do know who I am, don't you? I saved your life during Earth's Last Stand, where my Sword of Damocles prototype blasted dozens of enemy ships out of the air in minutes. The energy principles behind it were aided with the help of magical energy. This is no hoax, I'm being genuine."

Beatrix scowled as she heard an alarm sound off across the room. Another platoon was wiped out by the new mechas the Volgrim were deploying. "Silver, just keep this information to yourself for a while, alright? We can talk about this after I manage to scrub a few million alien parasitic scum off the face of the Earth, alright?"

Silver returned the expression. "No, this is the perfect time. If we start injecting soldiers, we'll have an army that can easily take on the Vol-"

Beatrix groaned as she pressed the 'end call' button, his voice being cut off mid sentence. Leave it to men to go charging in with their dicks swinging and their minds silent. She didn't have time for theoretical games about giving magical powers to humans. It was just a stupid thoughtless concept in the first place. Better to stick with tried-and-true battle tactics. That was how she won all her fights.

As she stood up and walked back over to the War Table, one thought crossed her mind. Well, except that time Silver did save my ass with his cannons. Maybe I should have listened a little more carefully...

Brushing the thought aside, she began barking orders to various ensigns and officers as she quickly took back control of the battlefield.

Silver slumped back in his seat as the Bitch of Britannia cut him off mid sentence. His assistant, Noah, handed him a fresh cup of coffee. Silver sighed as he took a long sip of it. "This is why I hate women. So illogical."

Noah nodded as he ignored his boss's comment. "Perhaps, sir, you're trying to go about this the wrong way."

Silver glanced back at the kid and smirked. "Oh really? You have a better idea, then?"

Noah shrugged. "You can't exactly go over her head, but maybe you can find someone else who will give you the go ahead. Someone who doesn't see eye to eye with the current Supreme Commander. Someone willing to give our idea a chance."

Agent Silver sighed quietly. "President Johannesburg was on to something when he told me to keep an eye on our 'Hero' friend. Jason is no ally of humanity. He had contact with Marie Becker, and he's probably working with her. Our list of possible contacts who will be against Marie and Jason is... small."

Noah nodded. "Well, I did take the liberty to search for a few. Maybe it will help you narrow down a target?"

Silver felt a massive grin take over his face as he scratched his aptly-colored silver hair. "You're not like my previous assistants, you're actually on the ball all the time."

"I try to be. Oh, and what happened to your previous assistants?"

Silver took another long swig of coffee. "They weren't on the ball. Show me the names of these contacts. We don't have much time."

Noah nodded as he reached into his pocket and pulled out a carefully folded piece of paper, with a mere four names and faces on it, followed by brief bios for each person.

Silver grunted as he took the paper and scanned it quickly. "This it?"

Noah nodded reluctantly. "Yes. But really, there's only one good name on that list. It's this man." He pointed at a rugged looking man, the first one on the list. "They call him 'Stonewall' in the military. He's only two notches below Beatrix, but he is well known for butting heads with her. His real name is Vasily Sokolov, but nobody would ever dare call him that to his face."

"Sokolov... sounds familiar." Silver stared carefully at the face. A massive hulking mountain of a man, Stonewall was listed as 7'8" tall, wore a trademark black suit, and always had his jet black hair smoothed down, in a sort of respectable mafia-boss sort of look. He led the Space Marines corps and had full authority over them, other than Beatrix herself.

"His name should. He's the grandson of Russia's prime minister from the turn of the century. He's a very terrifying man in person, and he carries himself like a leader. In fact, some would call him the antithesis of Beatrix herself. He hates 'Judicator' and thinks he's a menace to society, but above all else, he hates the Volgrim. He wants to purge their kind from the universe."

Silver nodded slowly as a smile crept back onto his face. "As he should. He would make for a fine puppet. His head is empty enough that a few half truths will have him sending the hounds wherever we direct."

Noah wandered over and plunked down into a sofa across the room. " Nova Imperium. A new government, under us. Well, not exactly under us, so to say, even we have someone to answer to. But close enough."

Silver shrugged. "We don't have to tell the Organization everything. The Illuminati is only as all seeing and all knowing as its members allow it to be, and we're pretty close to the top. Let's just keep this between us."

Noah nodded quietly. "Yes. Let's."

Part 291a: Lance

When we arrived downstairs, I noted with a glance downwards that Amelia was feeling uneasy and guilty towards Ricky, but he was completely oblivious. I observed Ben glancing uneasily out the window as Ricky babbled excitedly about how badly he wanted to be a Hypersuit Commando. The kid's excitement, while amusing, was also not the sort of thing Ben really cared about at that moment.

Sounds of destruction could be heard in the distance, and Ben didn't like having to babysit while his men were being killed on the frontlines. A quick glance at the casualty reports scrolling on the far side of my HUD told me what I needed to know; this battle was not going well for humanity. We were losing badly.

Ben's unease seemed to slip away slightly when he saw us walking down the stairs. "Good. You're done having a chit-chat session. I need to get back on the field."

I shook my head. "No. Not yet. Ben, Amelia and I are going to return to the battle. Take this kid back to the evacuation zone, then return here."

Ben gawked at me for a second before reigning in his shocked expression. "Judicator, I know you're an important asset to humanity, and one who has helped us greatly against the Volgrim, but you're not my commanding officer. Not anymore. I can't leave my men out there to die while you and the..." He paused as he glanced down at Amelia. "...You know, actually, this is bugging me. What the hell is this little girl made of? She was fighting on par with us battle hardened warriors as if she were wearing a Hypersuit... yet she wears no suit herself. What's going on here?"

I swallowed, having expected this question. "That's classified information. Amelia is... a... test subject. Only, err, children can accept the treatment. I can't go into further detail."

Amelia stared ahead blankly, resisting the urge to cock an eyebrow at my blatant lie. Ben eyeballed me carefully for a few moments. "That's the dumbest thing I've ever heard. Why would the military put children in harm's way?"

He paused for a moment as he sighed and glanced back out the window. "Judicator... I'm going to believe you. Unlike some of the other higher-ups, I still trust you. I was able to live a long life, tearing across the battlefield thanks to your hypersuits. Because of these suits, an otherwise ordinary man who might have died, all those years ago, was transformed into an unstoppable juggernaut. But you had better watch yourself. Your antics are causing... divisions. I hear a lot of whispers, lately. I'm your ally, but your list of friendlies is dwindling by the day."

I nodded slowly as he spoke. To be honest, it was an alarming statement. I was so insulated from the rest of humanity. It made sense, I suppose. I could see how many might blame me for the attacks on Earth. I still wonder if my Mothership didn't advance the Volgrim threat on Earth decades earlier, as they saw us as a threat. They might have otherwise judged us as primitives, and passed us by for another hundred years or so.

"Thank you for telling me that, Ben. And thank you for trusting me. I'm just trying to protect humanity, the best that I can. As well as my friends." I tilted my head down at Amelia and she looked away from my gaze.

Ben shrugged. "Whatever floats your boat. I'll be back shortly, don't get yourself killed."

Lifting the boy up in his arms, he quickly ran out the door, using his suit's mobility to quickly race away at normally inhuman speeds.

Left behind by ourselves, Amelia shuffled her feet awkwardly as she slowly stared at the ground. "So, what now?"

I set my jaw grimly as an explosion was heard in the distance. "You're going to throw me."

She looked up at me quickly. "What?"

"Like a lance."

"Huh?"

"Oh. That's what you meant."

We stood on a rooftop looking down at a raging battle in progress. Three hypersuit commandos had their hands full battling just one Dragoon. While they fought, a platoon of regular human and Volgrim infantry were engaged in a vicious battle, blasting one another with hypersonic shotguns and plasma rifles. Many shots missed, but plenty didn't. For every Volgrim downed, two more came to take their place. They were like a swarm of locusts, pouring in from an unseen void in the distance.

There was probably a portal in a nearby building or off in the trees in the distance. I couldn't perceive one, but it had to be there. Even if I closed and sealed it off, how many more were there on Earth? The situation was rather dire.

"So... how hard do you want me to throw you?"

Amelia eyeballed my entire body as she grasped just what she had to do. Considering I towered over her, at nearly eight feet tall, compared with her four foot frame, the idea would ordinarily be absolutely ridiculous. Of course, I had originally planned to use Ben for this attack, but Amelia would work just fine. This wasn't a normal situation, as she was easily as strong as my hypersuit when it came to pure physical power. There were few that would honestly rival her, Samantha and myself being the only ones that popped into my head immediately.

"Use everything you've got. I'll course correct on the way using my boosters. I'll only have a split second, of course, but that's all my suit needs for something like this."

Amelia blinked slowly as she cricked her neck. "All right. Get ready! I'm going to enjoy this!"

As she suddenly perked up, I had a stupid thought come into my mind. You're making a small mistake.

Oh well. We have to take these robots out. I stiffened my body as she easily grabbed me by my stomach and took aim. "Just to warn you, I don't know how good my aim is."

I said nothing in reply. My heart was pounding really fast. Turning off my speakers, I spoke to my AI. "Centurion, make sure we course correct to smash right through the center of that thing. Activate Phase Mode immediately after being thrown, deactivate the instant we arrive inside."

"AFFIRMATIVE, PILOT JASON HIRO. CALCULATIONS IN PROGRESS. CALCULATIONS COMPLETED. YOU MAY LAUNCH WHEN READY."

I swallowed as I activated my speakers again. "Do it!"

The instant the words left my mouth, Amelia gently tossed me forwards, with the force of ten thousand tsunamis crashing into a skyscraper at once. My mind had no time at all to perceive the movement my body had just made. I went from her hand into the ground behind the Dragoon in the blink of an eye, my body smashing into the ground with such force that a massive shockwave erupted outwards and my vision went pure white for a few moments as my mind reeled from the impact.

My mind swam for what felt like an eternity, but was probably closer to a few seconds. As I came to, I noticed that it was all dark around me. Blinking quickly, I struggled to move, realizing that I was actually buried underground.

Struggling mightily, I used my suit's sensors to figure out which way was 'up' and which way was 'down' as I burst out of the ground, glancing back to see an insane sight; the Dragoon had practically evaporated. My HUD showed that my suit had taken nearly ten percent systems damage all over and my inertia dampeners had barely compensated enough to prevent my body from being totally shattered and rebuilt as a pile of Jello.

But the Dragoon... a few portions of legs were scattered here and there, and the fighting had ceased as Volgrim and human alike shifted their eyes around warily, trying to figure out what the hell had destroyed the Dragoon in the blink of an eye. The humans were the first to return to their senses, guessing that it had to be a friendly that took out the mechanical monstrosity. Whooping for joy, they began to surge forwards as they started lighting up the Volgrim with hundreds of hypersonic shotgun bursts, some even using explosive shells with no regard for the environment around them. Feeling the tables turn, the Volgrim began to beat a hasty retreat, laying down cover fire as they quickly hustled their way backwards into the foliage in the distance, well past the 6 foot tall wall that indicated the perimeter of the city.

As for me, I flopped down onto my behind in stunned silence, as I took in the sight of the fragments of the Dragoon that was left over. I was also feeling a bit dizzy due to the impact and a decent amount of damage my body had taken, but that was for the most part the lesser of the two reasons.

Amelia came bouncing over to me, giggling all the way. I was glad she was enjoying herself, but I didn't like that she was taking a perverse delight in my suffering.

"You flew so fast! I didn't even know I had that kind of throwing ability in me! I should be pitching for the Yankees or something!"

I sighed as she laughed and hopped around. At least one of us was having fun.

Still. This was just one battle among many. There was much to do as of yet.

Vasily Sokolov, commonly known as 'Stonewall', listened carefully to the man on the phone. The man sounded American, judging by his accent. Considering the parasitic aliens had wiped the Americas off the map with a cowardly act of mass destruction, Stonewall was surprised someone was making a holo-call from that area. The trace had turned up positive for a match in what was previously known as North Dakota.

"So you are saying the aliens have access to magic, da?"

The holographic image of a man concealed in shadow nodded slightly. "Yeah. Magic is real, and that human that you call 'Judicator', he has access to it. We suspect that he traveled back in time using it. We know he is the first person who contacted the aliens, and he conveniently had advanced technology that allowed us to fight them on mostly equal terms. We also know that he has been in contact with other parties, parties who don't care so much about the good of humanity."

Stonewall nodded, as he reached over for one of his favorite vintage Cuban cigars. Lighting it with a torch he always kept burning just behind his chair, he took a few long drags. He simmered quietly as he fought to contain his rage.

That spineless weak bitch, Beatrix, she was allying with 'Judicator', or rather, 'Jason Hiro'. But he was allying with foreign powers from another planet, the damned aliens. Stonewall hated the aliens. But he had always hated Beatrix too. She had humiliated him too many times, first by stealing credit for the Final Defense of Earth, when in fact it was this man on the line who had saved the lives of humanity's citizens, and then later when she was appointed to lead the entire military might of the United Earth Forces.

She didn't deserve the privilege. She was a traitor.

Stonewall let out a long breath of smoke as he let those thoughts simmer in his mind. Finally, he spoke again. "The aliens have to go, Silva. You would agree, da?"

Silver nodded. "Yes. I have completed the work that the Fuhrer never finished, well over a century ago. This is it. Type 3 Energy is ours to use." Silver held up a small vial as he shook it around for Stonewall to see. A glowing white liquid sloshed around, its color seeming to indicate a sort of holy purity.

"If the serum is so good, why you not use it before? Why you even bother to ask permission?" Stonewall examined it carefully, the little he could see of it in the holographic image. It seemed like too good of a deal to him.

"It's not perfect. It's merely as good as it gets. The serum has side effects, and the side effects increase dramatically depending on certain traits the participant might possess."

"Side effects?" Stonewall leaned back in his chair. As expected, it was a faulty product. It was flawed and likely wouldn't work. Too bad.

"Yes. The problem is, it relies on personality traits and many other factors to determine what abilities a person gets. It can cause many issues, such as mental psychosis and other... defects. After all, the Fuhrer himself, when he was desperate, he..." Silver paused as he remembered the diary entry that Eva Braun had written on that final night. Horrifying. "...Well, that's not important. What is important is that we know who it will work on and who it won't. If you supply us some men, we'll screen them. We will have a counter to the one who calls himself our savior. All I'm asking for is your cooperation."

Stonewall nodded slowly as a small grin spread over his face. "And what if some hotshot goes and makes big mess? You are ready to clean up, da?"

Silver nodded quickly. "Oh yes, indeed we are. The anti-energy weapons are always ready to be turned on those who would betray us."

Stonewall turned and took another puff of his cigar, glancing down at the picture of his late wife and children on the table in front of him. If he couldn't protect them, then at least he could make sure humanity was safe from tyrants in the sky.

"I will send you men and women. You pick ones you like. I hope to do more business with you in future, Silva."

Reaching down, he clicked off the holo-projector as he leaned back in his red velvet chair. Sighing, he glanced over at the casualty reports. Disgusting. This many had died already? Perhaps when they were ready for a real leader, they would push the stupid woman out of the way and let a man take over.

Because that's what humanity really needed. They needed to fight back relentlessly and crush the invaders, make them regret ever coming to Earth.

Stonewall's smile faded as he thought of the good old days. If only times were simple like they were back then.

Part 292a:

Forget the 24th century, the world might be ending hundreds of years ahead of schedule.

Amelia and I had worked together to destroy a few dozen of the Dragoons, but I was beginning to feel exhaustion set in. Even using wordsmithing to refresh my mind and body occasionally wasn't doing what it needed for me.

For three straight days, well past Christmas day, we've fought. No breaks, just unending war. Humans are dwindling in numbers as they're being forced to quickly suit up fresh faces for war. An emergency draft is underway as Beatrix hauls in thousands of people who've never seen combat a day in their lives.

I've already lost some clones. A couple dozen, a small impact considering they number a few thousand now, but nevertheless... I've lost more clones over the last three days than I have the entire century previous. That is actually more frightening than it might sound, given I hadn't lost a single clone until yesterday. My clones are getting sloppy, but also creative.

Having adopted my 'Lancer' strategy, my clones are also taking out Dragoons when encountered, always traveling in twos, using 'swap' and 'clone' to create new suits when needed. The damage to these suits is magical, not physical, meaning the only way to repair a broken suit is to reinforce it dozens of times again and again. Keeping in mind the suits are far more durable and resilient than diamond, adamantium, and any other known alloy, a simple 'repair' spell won't do the trick.

"Centurion, what is Earth's estimated surviving population as of this moment?"

I take a few moments from the chaos to catch a breather as I jump into a nearby tree, quickly examining the chaos with my own eyes.

"PILOT JASON HIRO. THE CURRENT KNOWN REMAINING POPULATION OF EARTH, COUNTING ONLY HUMANS, IS ONE BILLION, TWO HUNDRED MILLION, THREE HUNDRED AND TWENTY THOU-"

I cut him off quickly as he fired off the numbers. "I get the picture. How many are estimated missing? Round it, please."

"PILOT JASON HIRO, ROUGHLY FOUR HUNDRED MILLION ARE ESTIMATED MISSING, WHILE FIVE BILLION CANNOT BE ACCOUNTED FOR DUE TO LACK OF REPORTS FROM THE NORTH AND SOUTH AMERICAN CONTINENTS."

I swallowed hard as he gave me the numbers. "What number of remaining survivors are of military age and capable of fighting?"

There was a short pause as Centurion crunched the numbers. "A RAPID ESTIMATION GIVES BACK FOUR HUNDRED MILLION TO SEVEN HUNDRED MILLION HUMANS OF MILITARY AGE."

I lowered my head, as the numbers set in. It was unthinkable. Earth had lost countless humans, and the Volgrim, while also suffering substantial losses, had realized a war of attrition was their best chance of eliminating us.

What had changed? Desperation must be setting in. If what Dosena had told me was true, their home world would soon be destroyed due to the collapse of their star. If that were the case and somehow their timetable had accelerated, this might be a sort of desperate last resort for them.

What bothered me though, above many other things, was that the leader of the Volgrim was such a powerful magic user. Creating a gas that could devour all life, transporting himself to another dimension... surely terraforming a planet should be within his means magically, if not technologically. And for such an advanced race as the Volgrim, why had they not simply terraformed a new planet?

I shook my head to clear away the thoughts. This wasn't the time.

Ben staggered back from the front lines, his body bent forwards as he also fought to catch his breath. "I... hah... I hope you're done taking a nap, Judicator!"

He flopped down at the base of the tree I was sitting at as he breathed heavily. I jumped to the ground, landing beside him with a solid 'thud'.

"Ben. How's it looking? How long can we hold the line?"

He shook his head. "Not long. We've got maybe a day before we're relying entirely on fresh recruits and a handful of generals. I think we're being sabotaged internally too. Hovercraft keep breaking down, plasma rifles keep jamming, and too many ion grenades have misfired for it to all be a coincidence."

A grimace slips over my face, not that Ben can see it. Sabotage. We can't afford to lose more men and women, yet lose them we will, if this keeps up. Even another ten thousand more hypersuit commandos who have trained heavily their whole lives wouldn't be an elite enough force to defeat this foe. It's like trying to kill a swarm of rats with a baseball bat. Our power is far greater than theirs thanks to the almost cheating nature of the hypersuits, but their numbers overwhelm us entirely.

"Rome is gone. Jerusalem, even Paris is on the brink of destruction. We haven't heard from Japan all day. China is either maintaining radio silence or they're gone, or at the least they've had their communications badly disrupted."

Ben lowers his head as he pops open to wipe tears from his eyes. "Fuck. For it to come to this... I can't even comprehend how many of my friends have died today, Judicator. Tell me... tell me... do you have an ace up your sleeve? Do you have anything that can help us now?"

I swallow carefully as I flip through my options. Genocide is one of them. I've never used that word before, and it has a very high chance of backfiring. What if it doesn't kill just the Volgrim, but all other life too? What if it's too weak and only kills some? What if it's plenty powerful, but the magical strain kills me in the process? I've nearly had all of these things happen to me in the past. My wordsmithing has limits, and those limits have nearly resulted in my death many times before.

Of course, this isn't my only possible ace in the hole. There's also... the angels. By now, given how many humans have died, their ranks must be swelling with dead humans. Thought Energy is likely growing beyond slim. At this rate, if humanity dies, the angels will too. But if I call them in for reinforcements, this could be the catalyst that kills them...

...No. It's as I feared. It's almost as if time is repeating the events that will lead to the future I came from. It all adds up. I don't know the details, but the broader picture matches. Even if I don't ask the angels to join in the fight, they must know by now the dire situation we're in. They're probably going to join in to aid their own self preservation.

I glanced back over my shoulder at the city of London. Beautiful resplendent, at least ordinarily... it was in ruins now. The inner city was, for now, untouched, but the outer city limits were a crumbling facade of its previous glory. Amelia wasn't here on the frontlines now, I'd sent her back to rest in the shelter with the other people. She had pinkie promised me that she wouldn't hurt anyone, only Volgrim or demons if they showed up. Having suffered an injury that would easily kill an ordinary human instantly, she was resting with that kid and the other survivors.

If I don't protect this city... if I don't protect humanity, it's all over. Maybe Umi was right. Maybe humans are parasites that will destroy themselves and all other life. But I have to take a chance. I have to trust my gut and do what I can to save my species. I have friends now, and I can't just let them die.

"Ben. I'm leaving the battlefield. Do what you can while I'm gone."

Ben jerked his head to the side and gawked at me. "What?! You can't be- at a time like this?!"

I nodded quickly. "I'm going to get reinforcements. It's time I used my trump card."

His jaw hanging slack, he stared at me for several moments before regaining his senses. "Reinforcements? Who the hell would be able to give us aid at a time like this? There's nobody who doesn't already have their hands tied left. There's just... nobody."

"Ben." I turned and flicked my visor open, exposing my face to him. Ben jerked away from me, not expecting a sudden face reveal. "I consider you one of my closest friends. My real name is Jason Hiro. I was born in the year 1998. And... I've been keeping something from you, and the rest of humanity. Something important. I'd tell you what that is, but you'll see soon enough. It's time to put my faith in humanity, and let them place their full trust in me."

Ben stared carefully at my face, imprinting it to his memory as best as he could. "Jason... Hiro... so you're the one we've called Judicator, huh?" He swallowed carefully as he flicked his eyes from me to a massive explosion in the distance, and back again. "Jason... I've always put my trust in you. I'll continue to trust you until the day I die. Bring us your reinforcements. I just hope to god they're at least as useful as your... clones are."

I felt a smile creep onto my face as he mentioned 'god'. "Oh yes. And then some. I'll be back soon, don't you worry."

Closing my visor up, I used a word I hadn't spoken in quite a long time. " Teleport. "

Ricky dabbed the cotton ball gently on Amelia's arm, but she still winced. The nurses were all busy helping the older folks, ones who hadn't had an injection of retention drugs in a while. Their nanobots weren't performing adequately enough, given their advanced age. Ricky didn't know a single thing about first aid, but he did what he could.

Amelia breathed shallowly as her chest rose and fell barely a centimeter at a time. Of course, the gaping hole in her chest had been healed by Jason before he put her here, but the spiritual energy loss had been tremendous. She was laying on her back, both arms flopping lifelessly beside her inert body. She could hardly move at all, her fingers barely twitching whenever Ricky dabbed at the few remaining open wounds with his cotton balls.

Ricky wiped sweat from his head. Despite being the middle of winter and freezing cold outside, it was close to a hundred degrees in this Hyperbowl dome. The failsafes had fizzled out thanks to damage to the grid, and the upper space heaters were now working nonstop, unable to monitor the temperature outside.

Ricky took another dip of the washcloth in the basin and placed it on Amelia's head. Glancing down at his holo-watch, he carefully read the first aid instructions as they were given to him, not missing even a single word.

Amelia coughed slightly as her eyes slowly blinked open. "Ricky... oh, you're here... too..."

Ricky nearly jumped out of his skin. "You're awake! I was so worried!"

Amelia didn't smile or express any emotion as her eyes closed again. "Where am I...?"

"We're in the Hyperbowl dome. It's one of the emergency refugee shelters for when the big bad aliens attack!"

"Oh... where's Jason, then?"

Ricky cocked an eyebrow. Jason? The name didn't ring a bell at all. "I don't know who that is."

"He's... the guy in the suit... the white suit..."

Ricky suddenly nodded enthusiastically. "Oh yeah! You must mean Judicator, not Jason! His suit has the Eagle on it, right? He's that time traveler guy! He's so cool!"

Amelia swallowed as saliva was building up in her throat. "Mmm. Yeah, him. So... where is he?"

Ricky shrugged, then realized her eyes were closed and she couldn't see him. "Dunno. He dropped you off here, called for me, and left. He's prolly still fighting the aliens."

Amelia exhaled slowly as she gritted her teeth together. A sharp wave of pain had erupted in her chest from speaking. She hadn't experienced pain like this in centuries. After a few moments, she recovered her senses and opened her eyes again slowly. "That's... just like him. Ah, now I remember. I was awake. I got hit by a big spider-thing. It shot me with its gun. Levvy saved me. Jason brought me here... I remember now."

Ricky nodded and smiled as the two of them stared at each other for a few moments. He started to say something but suddenly the dome was filled with an incredibly bright light, as something incredibly shiny and radiant lit up the entire sky outside. The outside of the dome was covered on top by extremely dense nano-glass, which kept the weather out, but allowed the light in.

Ricky winced as the unbelievably brilliant light blasted in, slowly moving across the horizon. After a few moments, his eyes had adjusted and he looked up into the sky, seeing thousands of tiny figures flying across the sky, led by one figure that was easily a hundred times their size. Even from here, Ricky could clearly make out the wings, the white clothing, the armor... it was almost as if...

Amelia stared up at the sky, her mind almost being unable to comprehend what she was seeing. "Angels... It can't be..."

Beatrix stared blankly at the videos arriving on her feed. These images were utterly preposterous. Angels? It couldn't be.

Several officers who had been running about frantically paused to gawk at the main viewscreen affixed to the wall. There was one titanic angel, towering over all others, and tens of thousands of other ones following immediately behind him.

Where they had come from was anyone's guess. Some said that if they looked directly up at the sun in the sky, the angels appeared to come out of the brightness itself.

But despite being angels, were they friend or foe?

No. Wait. Beatrix suddenly cast her eyes down to her feet as several other distinct thoughts presented themselves. If these were actually angels, then... suddenly the odd 'demonic variant' Volgrim made all too much sense. They weren't variants. The man she had spoken with, just a few days previously, he had mentioned magical energy. He had said something unsettling about Judicator's origins, but now... she had to believe what he was saying, at least a little bit.

"Those can't seriously be angels, can they?" A young female field officer stared hopefully at the screen before her.

Beatrix opened her mouth to speak, but was verbally tossed aside as a different voice spoke up from the doorway of the room. "Indeed they are, dear friends. Angels, demons, aliens, humans, da. The four true players in this war."

Beatrix glanced to her side to see a familiar man standing in the doorway, wearing a pinstriped military suit with a dozen medals attached to the front pocket, just above his heart. Smoking a vintage Cuban cigar, he strode forwards with purpose to the War Table.

Beatrix stifled a glare at him. He was a veteran player in the war, and an important man, especially when it came to his iron-fisted discipline on board the starship legion he commanded. While he was well known for disliking Beatrix, humanity came before petty civil disputes. "Stonewall. Glad to see you here. You know about these angels?"

"Da. I have many contacts who have enlightened me on their nature too, da. Temporary allies, they are. Expendable pawns to protect our own men and women. If they are here, then we have entered the final stage of this Christmas Genocide."

Beatrix blanched. "The final stage? Then they're going to turn on us?"

Stonewall chuckled. "Is that thick head of yours empty? I mean it is the chance for us to completely destroy the alien scum, for good. We will begin the pushback at once, da."

Turning his head, he spoke to an ensign on the bridge. "You there, you control the targeting systems for long ranged missiles, da?"

The young man nodded nervously. "Yes, Fleet Commander Stonewall, sir."

"Excellent. Target these coordinates with a high-yield ion barrage, followed by a bunker-buster stormhead missile." Stonewall handed a slip of paper to the young man.

The young man glanced uneasily from the paper to Beatrix. "Supreme Commander...?"

She flicked her eyes towards Stonewall. "You wanna tell me what's going on?"

"I have intel. I use the intel. Do I need your permission, Supreme Commander?" Stonewall inserted the slightest mocking tone into his voice, causing Beatrix to clench a fist inside her pocket.

"No. Do what you will, we're glad to have you helping us."

"Of course you are." Stonewall blinked slowly as his gaze traveled back to the young ensign. The man was already quickly typing the numbers in, his eyes twitching as he saw where they were aiming. "Sir... these coordinates are... right outside the city."

"I am aware, green. Fire."

The young man shot a glance over at Beatrix for the slightest of moments before pressing the 'fire' command.

"Track the shots. I want to see the impact zone." Beatrix spoke to the young man, as Stonewall smiled ever so slightly. The holoscreen instantly changed to a satellite signal as it showed the area they were targeting. Volgrim appeared to be flowing out of an unseen spot on screen, firing immediately on the humans a short distance away as they took up flanking positions.

Beatrix blanched. "We have soldiers there! They're going to die!"

The smile disappeared from Stonewall's face. "Some will die, da. A sacrifice for the greater good. We will seal off their portal to our world, or we will die. The angels will help us clean up your mess afterwards."

Beatrix glanced uneasily at Stonewall. "What are you insinuating, Mister Sokolov? Are you implying this is somehow my fault?"

A snarl passed by Stonewall's lips momentarily at her use of his last name before he quickly righted himself. "Of course not, my dear Beatrix. These aliens were an unexpected attack. However, the way you have dealt with their invasion is... inadequate."

Beatrix felt fury building as she struggled to right herself. "So you're saying you might have done a better job?"

"Da. I already am. You never even thought to seal off their method of arrival. Take a look."

Just as she turned back, a hail of ion-cannon fire smashed into the area, followed by a massive explosion as the bunker buster detonated directly on the spot where the Volgrim appeared to be entering through.

"But... that couldn't possibly seal the portal. That might kill many Volgrim, but they can still come here."

Stonewall raised and wagged a chiding finger. "Ah, my dear Beatrix. You are wrong. The explosion passed through their portal, crippling the inner facility where they make these gates to enter our world. You know so little, I fear."

Beatrix gawked as she stared at the screen. Indeed, no more Volgrim were appearing as the rest scattered in confusion. Without a steady stream of reinforcements, they would eventually be dispatched.

"Inner facility... how do you know anything about how they're making these portals?"

Stonewall shrugged. "Is surprising you do not know, to be honest." He took a long slow drag off his cigar. "Did you think these portals simply appeared from nowhere? They had to be made from somewhere, a central facility is obvious answer, da?"

As he spoke the rhetorical question, a smile cracked on the side of his mouth. "Of course, I was told of this by one of many moles I have inside the Volgrim ranks. You cannot defeat they who you do not understand."

Turning around slowly and deliberately, Stonewall walked away from the War Table. "I will be back after you have cleaned up mess. We will be discussing your upcoming re-election campaign in great detail, I assure you. The people will know who saved humanity in the end."

Beatrix felt her face lighting up red as he confidently strode out of the room, ignoring any response she might have. As the door closed she quickly barked at a nearby ensign. "Status update!"

The young girl flinched at her tone and quickly scanned the screen in front of her. "T-the Volgrim numbers have stopped rising, their supply lines around the world seem to have been cut off. We don't have any contact with a few member countries... but... it seems that Fleet Commander Stonewall was..." The girl glanced over at Beatrix before lowering her gaze. "...right."

Beatrix slowly panned the room with her eyes. Nearly everyone had their eyes fixed on her. A few were shaking their heads ever so slightly.

Swallowing carefully and deliberately, she brought her temper down to normal levels. "I see. Thank you for the... status update. Let's get back to fighting, we don't need any more dead soldiers on our hands, ladies and gentlemen."

As she raised her gaze to the holoscreen, she eyeballed the angels that had just arrived on the battlefield. What the hell was going on?

Part 293a:

It was the 29th of December, in the year 2100, when humanity finally learned of the Angels. America, always a bastion of devoutly religious believers, had been wiped off the map before their suspicions had been confirmed. Almost a hundred years earlier, a poll had been taken of the world in which citizens of North America had a 46% suspicion or direct belief that angels were real.

If they had not been annihilated mere days before, they might have been overjoyed at this incredible sight. Instead, the angels became a grim reminder of the world's loss of two major continents.

The wrath of the gods, long unseen by the citizens of Earth, was swift and merciless. They came first in hundreds, then thousands, then millions. A swift unending torrent of death and destruction. Streaming from an unseen portal high in the sky, they rained holy retribution on the aliens that had come to kill their pious believers. Even the atheists, large in number though they might be, were instantly converted into believers on that great day. Would their faith prove unshakable like a mountain? Only time would be the judge of that.

As for me, I had long come to accept the existence of gods and angels. The only thing I had not come to accept, however, was the belief that they were pious and righteous. They were an ally of humanity, to an extent, but only in that I viewed them as parasites that depended on humans to sustain their existence.

Many angels, especially the pseudo-angels who had been reborn after their death, were genuinely good and honest beings, but plenty were not. Their convictions and reasons mattered little though, in the grand scheme of things. It was their power that made them valuable allies. A single angel was far stronger, faster, and wielded vastly more spiritual energy than a regular human. While not comparing to the power of a Hypersuit Commando, even the weakest pseudo-angel could be said to be a god when compared to the average human.

I watched wordlessly as a single angel slammed into the ground beside a ten-strong company of Volgrim, his hand swinging down a blade made of pure spiritual energy, slicing through a Volgrim in the blink of an eye. Before the others had taken a moment to react, he cut down two more. As they leveled their weapons at him, another angel landed beside him, the impact shaking the very ground they stood on.

In seconds, all ten Volgrim were dispatched with ease. As the humans watched with awe on their faces, the Hypersuit Commandos quickly began using their limited numbers and incredible firepower to focus down the Dragoons, leaving the small-fry Volgrim to the angels. Within the hour, most Volgrim on Earth were killed, though some were captured to be later interrogated.

I switched my feed to world news stations as various Britannian TV personalities started babbling their ideas about what was going on, who these angels were, and what it all meant in the grand scheme of things. Shaking my head slowly, I deactivated the feed.

To me, this was an empty victory. Many have called me foolish, but anyone who understood how the dynamics of the three Earth clans worked would understand this was the worst possible outcome. The angels possessed unimaginable power, which, when combined, easily dwarfed even my own abilities. But that power came at a heavy price, both for themselves and humanity. They had withdrawn themselves from the eyes of the general public for a reason. They had formed alliances with the true elites among humans to suppress and hide all information of their existence for a reason. Everything they did was for a reason.

The fact that they were here now... it meant they had admitted defeat. If humans died, the angels would soon follow. This admittance of their existence meant they had been driven into a corner.

I swallowed as I spoke to my onboard AI. "Centurion. What is the probability of victory for the Britannian forces today?"

His voice responded, and while it sounded just as hollow as usual, he somehow seemed to be pleased with the results. "PILOT JASON HIRO, THE CHANCE OF VICTORY HAS INCREASED TO 99.99%, BASED ON THE REMAINING COMBINED COMBAT ABILITIES OF THE HUMANS AND ANGELS. THE ONLY POSSIBLE CHANCE OF DEFEAT WOULD BE AN UNKNOWN ABERRATION, SUCH AS A TOTAL AND COMPLETE SHUTDOWN OF ALL BIOLOGICAL ACTIVITY AT ONCE."

"Great... that's great. Thank you, Centurion."

I slumped down to sit on a nearby rock as I lowered my head to the ground. Trees burned in the distance as Volgrim desperately fired their plasma rifles at vegetation, trying to cause any damage they possibly could in their final moments. The angels extinguished the fires with the barest use of their magical powers.

As I sat, a familiar form walked up from behind me. Glancing up, I nodded at him. "Raphael."

The old archangel ambled up to me, leaning heavily on his old gnarled cane. Too heavily, if you asked me. He hardly seemed to need it, using it mostly for show. "You seem disheartened, young mortal. Something on your mind?"

"We've lost, haven't we?"

He stared ahead for a moment after hearing my response. Sighing slowly, he shuffled his feet slightly. "Now, whatever might you mean by that?"

I explained my thoughts to him as he nodded and listened intently. "Ah, so you believe the angels are doomed, now that we've shown ourselves to the humans? A wise observation. Likely correct, if I don't say so myself."

I cocked my head as I heard muffled screams in the distance. They were bloodcurdling, likely the sound of a Volgrim facing certain death. The sounds ended abruptly, just as his life probably did. "So you agree."

Raphael shrugged lightly, a motion I wouldn't have expected a wise archangel to use. "Perhaps, perhaps not. You seem to be convinced that the future is repeating itself."

I rose to my feet, now towering above the archangel, who was of small stature compared to my titanic body. "Well? Isn't it?"

"I do not know. I only know of the prediction that you gave. Earth will eventually be partially destroyed, humans will be enslaved, and the angels will all be killed off. The demons will reign supreme, and all hope will be lost. Certainly not an ideal future, if I might say so myself."

I grumbled silently to myself regarding his dispassionate explanation of the future I came from. "You don't seem to care all that much, if you ask me."

"Perhaps I am not so convinced that the future is set in stone." Raphael glanced over to me, cocking his eye questioningly. "Why do you assume that it is? Perhaps it is your tacit agreement that the future will stay the same, that the rivers of time will not change their course. Perhaps it is your actions, or your lack thereof, that cause the future to occur."

I found myself raising an eyebrow questioningly at his words. "That could certainly be the case. What are you trying to imply?"

Again he shrugged as he averted his gaze from mine. "I'm just an ancient old man. I only know what I know of the past, and nothing about the future. Many times have some predicted the end of the angels, or the demons, or the humans. All of those times, they have been wrong. Why do you suppose that is?"

"I'm not sure. Luck? It wasn't their time?"

Raphael rolled his eyes mockingly. "I suppose, if you're a simpleton, that might be the case. However, I suspect a more complicated reason is why. Perhaps there is another who guides the universe towards a path of His choosing."

I blinked slowly. Oh. That's what he means. "You think the Creator is guiding the universe then?"

Raphael smiled a toothy grin at me. "Perhaps. Perhaps not. Do you think he isn't?"

I groaned inwardly as the old man played word games with me. This was not what I felt like talking about. "I don't know, Raphael. I thought the angels were made in the Creator's image. Don't you know who he actually is, in that case?"

Raphael's grin disappeared. "Nay. I may have known his identity, or hers, or 'theirs', as it were, but that was eons upon eons ago. That was another life. Now I know nothing of His persona, only that which He left behind for us to witness."

Right... so the old man thinks the creator has a grand plan for the universe... where have I heard that before? "Alright, so if he has a plan, then does that plan involve the angels being killed?"

Raphael nodded. "Indeed, it may. Humans created a genre of games they call 'simulation', where fake humans go about with their fake lives. The player even has the choice of eradicating their world for fun and sport. Would a Creator above ourselves not be in a similar position to us compared to that game?"

I cocked an eyebrow. "I'm surprised you know anything about video games. As for the question, I suppose that might be the case, but it makes our existences rather hollow and meaningless."

"Existence is suffering." Raphael nodded matter-of-factly, as if that put an end to the entire discussion. Jeez, I didn't know an archangel could be so nihilistic.

"You seem to have a lot to say today. Why is that?" I decided to try the direct approach, given its excellent track record over my lifetime.

Raphael turned away from me as he started to shuffle away. "Oh, I don't know. An old man sometimes just wants to speak his mind, you know. Especially to a depressed looking whippersnapper moping around like the world just ended, and after winning a major battle at that!"

As he walked away, I glanced around myself at the bodies as far as I could see, the plumes of smoke billowing into the air, and the crumbled buildings in the distance. "If this is a win, I don't want to see a loss, old friend."

Amelia sipped at the water that Ricky had given her. It tasted awful, just as any normally edible or drinkable substance would taste to her, but she powered through it anyway. She didn't want to make the stupid boy cry.

Grumbling as every sip tasted like dog urine, she finally finished the cup and coughed lightly, tossing the styrofoam container to the side as she lay back down on her back. It was miserably hot in the Hyperdome, and she was feeling greatly uncomfortable due to being around tens of thousands of other people in the same enclosed space. All around herself, people were chattering and blabbing endlessly, their voices like a loud roar coming from all directions at once.

Leviathan appeared in her mind as she groaned audibly again. "Princess, are you feeling... well?"

Ricky was nowhere in sight at the moment, so she didn't feel uncomfortable speaking out loud around all the strangers milling about. "No, Levvy... I feel terrible. This place reeks of humans. It's hotter than Hell, too."

Leviathan chuckled. "I'll take your word for it, even though we've never been there. We should pay my previous pupil a visit some time." Leviathan paused for a moment as he realized what he had said. "Never mind, that is not what I wish."

Amelia closed her eyes as she visualized Leviathan's physical appearance from the last time she had seen him, millennia ago. "Levvy... I won't forget my promise to you. I'll make him pay for keeping you locked up."

Leviathan let out a long sigh at her statement. "Princess... it is no longer necessary. We are bonded for life. Perhaps, by his treatment of me, it was part of a larger picture, so that we might meet. Perhaps what he did, even if unintentional, was the best thing that ever happened to you and I. I regret nothing in my life, neither should you."

Amelia cracked an eye open. "Oh? What about Jason? You're saying I shouldn't regret calling him my friend?"

Leviathan snickered softly. "Heh, always with the sharp wit. I stand by what I said before. Jason is dangerous, he simply doesn't know that himself. He is like a spark dancing next to dry hay. Sooner or later, he will cause a great fire that will burn the barn to the ground."

Leviathan paused as his voice suddenly had a tinge of uncertainty to it. "...Still, I do not wish a life of endless war and killing on you. I do not like that you must devour life to sustain your own. I am far less sure of things than I was when I was free."

"When you were... free?" Amelia opened both eyes as a feeling of sadness washed over her. "Do you feel trapped inside of me? Do you want to be free again?"

Leviathan didn't respond for a few moments, before a slow response finally came. "...Yes. But I cannot. You would perish, should that happen. And... if you were to perish, I should not be able to go on myself."

Amelia suddenly felt something inside of her eye. Reaching up, she wiped it off only to discover that she was again crying. This was the second time in a mere week that she had done so, in a long life of never once displaying negative emotions.

Leviathan immediately picked up on it. "Princess, are you-...?"

She shook her head quickly as she leaned up to a sitting position and quickly dried her eyes. "Ah, no, it's just so hot in here, I must have felt faint for a moment, and I-"

Leviathan chortled loudly at her sudden flustered words. "Ah Princess, it means much to an old dragon that you would shed tears over the thought of my death. But worry not, we will always have one another. I would never allow someone to cause harm to you....Never."

Amelia nodded as she felt herself smiling. "Thank you... Levvy. We'll always be there for each other. Nobody can break our bond. If anyone were to try, we would just kill them."

From deep within, Leviathan did not respond to her. However, she had the distinct impression that the thought of killing had somehow saddened him. He had been slowly but surely changing over the centuries... he was simply not the same overly haughty dragon that he used to be.

Perhaps it was for the better. Perhaps it was just the way things had to be.

Unarin kept his emotions neutral as he examined the final report. By the numbers, it was a success, but not a victory. They had succeeded in badly crippling the humans, and had caused the angels to reveal themselves to the general public. Many Volgrim had died, the outrageously high number was something that had nearly caused Unarin's blood to boil over.

Still, the timetable was too tight. Their planet did not have much time left. They needed a new home for their people, and soon. Perhaps diplomacy was the only way? No, the humans were far too angered to acquiesce a single thing to the Volgrim they hated so much.

He had at one point asked Satan what it would take to create a dimensional space big enough to house the Volgrim... but the soul cost was too unbelievable. Such a number would cripple their capabilities for generations. It was better than extinction, but not by much.

Unarin licked his armored tongue across his razor-sharp teeth, hissing sharply as he read the numbers again. Damn. If only Dosena were still here.

Glancing across the table at the other Founders, they all appeared to be staring ahead blankly, with nothing better to do. They had all just finished reading the reports, and clearly none were pleased.

Given it was his right and duty to speak first, Unarin broke the silence. "I have come to a decision regarding Dosen's replacement."

Instantly, the other Founders turned their head towards him. Trayza, the third in command, suppressed a smile. Finally, she would have the chance to curry favor with Unarin as his second in command. With her love of war, potentially surpassing Dosen's, her psionic abilities would no longer be mocked, as her commanding abilities on the battlefield would propel them to inevitable victory regardless of her lacking in mental areas.

She started to thank Unarin, but he continued speaking. "Regarding the position of Second Founder, I have chosen Elder Nufaris as the new second Founder. I have not told him of this yet."

Unarin paused as he caught a glimpse of shock flutter around the table as each other Founder expressed the slightest hint of revulsion at his choice.

"Elder Nufaris?! But he's not even a High Vizier! Nor is he a Battle Commander or a Warrior General! What qualifications could he-?!" Trayza shot off her mouth, then suddenly slapped it shut realizing the disrespect she had just shown. "I... beg your pardon. I did not mean to... express such a show of emotion."

As she tilted her head down, she felt rage and embarrassment flow through her, both at being ignored for the role of Second, and for her outburst.

Unarin graciously accepted her apology. "Trayza... I did not make this choice lightly. I hope you will forgive me for not putting you in your rightful position as Second. However, with regards to the matter of the Humans... I have been debating a new tactic. I know not how it will work, but Elder Nufaris is the only one who has had as much contact with a human as I have, but in a more diplomatic manner. Ignoring his abilities and renown or lack thereof, he was the obvious choice for me to pick, given he has spoken personally with the Hero that leads the humans."

Trayza stared forwards quietly, merely nodding her head in response.

Unarin sent a mental signal to the guards outside, as they sent Elder Nufaris into the Founders Contemplation Room.

Unarin kept his face neutral as he looked at the small Volgrim before him. "Elder Nufaris, for your service to your people, both recently and in the past, you have been elected the Second Founder of Volgarius. Your new title will be 'The Soothsayer'."

As Nufaris had a flash of joy pass over his face, Unarin chuckled quietly to himself. The perfect pawn, and not a fool like Trayza. He will do decently, until I can find an ideal replacement.

Part 294a:

"Hello Tom, I'm on the scene now amidst the chaos that has engulfed the outer city limits of London. The south side of the city has been all but annihilated by the Volgrim, but these winged saviors that came from the sky have appeared to pacify all the remaining aliens."

"Excellent work, Jane. We'll be back to speak with you after a commercial break. And coming up later, we're inviting several world-renowned scientists to our expert panel to give opinions on the identities of these winged visitors. Are they angels? Stay tuned to learn more on this developing story!"

As the feed switched to commercial break, I sighed quietly. As planned, the angels had quickly mopped up, then returned to each of the hidden portals I'd kept a half-mile above the ground. It was pretty obvious to just about anyone that these were angels, but for the sake of the ever worsening 24 hour news rush that had only gotten worse over the last century, the news channels had to drag everything out and focus on each significant act in order to meet their time tables.

Walking through the shelter, I turned my attention away from the news feed in my helmet to the little girl laying on the ground some feet away. Amelia wasn't doing so hot, a testament to how powerful those anti-magic weapons were. If they could deal this kind of damage to even her... then...

I glanced down at my armored palm. If I could integrate one of those anti-magic weapons into my suit somehow, then I should be able to easily crush Satan. He was a formidable foe, and I suspected even stronger than Amelia, but those anti-magic weapons were absolutely debilitating versus even my hypersuit.

Still... the more I thought about it, the more something was beginning to bother me. We seemed to be heading towards the exact same future that I remembered before I went back in time. What if Raphael's cryptic suggestions were serious? Perhaps my actions and my inaction might be causing us to head towards that future. But then, in that case, which was the correct path to take? If I kill Amelia now, that future definitely cannot come to pass, but what if that's the absolute wrong thing to do? If I kill her, then she won't kill Satan. I'd have to do that myself, and I'm not sure that I can.

Looking at her motionless body now, I'm not sure that she can either. Perhaps just by speaking to her, I've interrupted the chain of events that might cause her to seek him out and fight him. Even looking beyond Amelia for a moment, I could just kill all the humans, then that future definitely won't come to pass. I could drop a meteor on Volgarius. I could detonate an atomic bomb inside the labyrinth, or more than a couple of them.

But... I don't want to do any of those things. I've been killing, maiming, and murdering for so long... is this who I want to be? How can I call myself a 'Hero', looking at my kill count? Superman is a hero, and he never kills anyone. But then, The Punisher is sometimes considered a hero too, perhaps the type of hero we need in real life is different from the one in a fantasy wonderland...

As thoughts roil in my mind, Amelia stirs and opens her eyes, looking up at my faceless armored visage. "Oh, Jason. You're here now."

I shake the thoughts out of my head as my speakers turn on. "Yeah, are you alright? You seem violently ill."

"I've never felt this bad before..." Amelia's normally high pitched girly voice is muted substantially, as she seems to be barely choking the words out for me to hear. Her voice reminds me of when I was punched in the stomach in high school and I could barely speak for minutes afterwards until I got my second wind.

I disable my speakers for a moment as I wordsmith at her. "Heal." Turning my speakers back on, I smile even though she can't see my face, hoping it will come through in my voice. "There. Does that feel any better?"

As I ask the question, my bio-reading functions come up indicating her circulation and breathing has improved greatly. Before she responds, I already know what her answer will be. "Yeah! I'm feeling way better!" Sitting up abruptly, she flexes her arms a bit, winding her arms around in circular patterns. "The pain is almost gone! How did you do that?"

I frown slightly. "What do you mean? Heal you?"

She nods. "Yeah! You seem to be able to do everything, from destroying to creating to healing! I wanna know how you do it all!"

I swallow, realizing this is a crucial moment. "Well, err, it's not that I don't want to tell you..."

Instantly a pouting expression crosses her face. "Aw, come on! We're friends! You can tell me..."

As she sulks, I feel a silent fear creeping up my spine. Damn! This is a catch 22. If I tell her about wordsmithing, she'll be able to know my powers. If I don't, she won't trust me.

Biting my lip, I quickly glance around the Hyperdome. There's nothing to do and the seconds are crawling by. I can't just distract her from the question, and even if I did, she'd ask it again later on. Stalling for time, I try my own question. "Well, Amelia, if you've been hurt before, how did you end up healing yourself?"

Her pouting face turned into a lopsided grin. "That's easy! My friend does it for me!"

I bob my head slowly, remembering her friend that she calls 'Levvy' but never wants to tell me anything about. A figment of her imagination? Perhaps something more?

"Why haven't you ever asked your friend how to heal yourself?" Glancing around my HUD, I suddenly remember my other clone only a few blocks away helping with the cleanup, shooting him a list of telepathic commands, I begin to formulate a plan.

Amelia sighs. "It's not that easy! He, err, well he heals me from within! It's his power, not... mine..." She glances away uneasily at the topic the conversation has shifted towards. She really doesn't like me knowing anything about her friend. I grin at the thought. Yeah well, that's how I feel having you ask about my powers.

As she stares uneasily at a wall to my side, she suddenly bobs her head back. "But that's not an answer to my question! What are your abilities? How do you heal people and do all that cool stuff?"

The moment of truth. Rising to my feet, I stare upwards in a manner that I think is cool. "Heh, it's pretty easy, to be honest. I have a lot of magical energy inside of myself, and I simply manifested my heroic abilities in a way that allows me to conjure a lot of different abilities at once! But anyone could do it, with practice!"

Amelia's face shines with disbelief. "Oh. It's that simple, huh? Well, prove it then."

Her sudden insistence on seeing my abilities demonstrated is not just annoying, but worrisome. Still, I don't want to take a chance, so in order to make it as convincing as possible, I take her hand and walk over to a quiet and semi-empty section of the Hyperdome. Checking to make sure nobody's watching, I send the telepathic order to my clone, who uses 'Remove' on me, taking my Hypersuit off. Of course, the fact my clones can simply remove the Hypersuit from my body scares me, making me realize how easily a rogue clone could have disarmed and killed me in the blink of an eye.

Still, that's not important right now. Standing in front of Amelia, without my Hypersuit, I grin awkwardly at her as I close my eyes and pretend to meditate for a few moments. I can practically feel her interested eyes boring a hole in my face as I hold my palm upwards. "The key, Amelia, is to focus on the power inside your body, giving it life inside your mind. If you focus, you can make your energy manifest however you want it too. For example, by healing a wound."

Holding my palm up, a knife suddenly appears in it. Amelia takes a step back, seeing it appear out of nowhere. "Wow! Was that sleight of hand? I didn't even see how that appeared!"

I chuckle, as I send another telepathic signal to my clone. "No, it's my power. I can manifest anything my mind desires. Watch." Taking the knife with my right hand, I cut lightly into my palm. The moment I cut, I see the wound instantly beginning to close itself. Oops, my inner regeneration is still active... but...

Amelia gawks. "Wow! You healed yourself in the blink of an eye! You didn't even do any... magic motions... or anything..." She suddenly glances up at me suspiciously. "Come to think of it, I've never seen a hero or a demon or an angel that didn't use magic signs with their hands. Are you playing me for a fool?"

I quickly toss my head up. "Hah! You think signs are necessary? You are like a baby when it comes to your magical abilities! I discovered the secret of using magic without the signs!"

She grumbles slightly and averts her eyes, but seems to accept it. "Alright... well, how can I heal myself then? How can I do anything that you do?"

I shrug. "It's all about the mental focus. Magic is about overcoming your limitations and using your mind to envision what you want. If you don't have a solid vision, nothing will materialize."

I stifle a grin. I hope she doesn't notice that I'm bullshitting and making it up as I go along, but she seems to be absorbing my words carefully as I speak. "Hmm... hmm... ah! I see now! It all makes sense!"

I feel my heart pause for a second as she nods vigorously while resting a finger on her lips. "It... it does?"

"Of course! It's so obvious!" Amelia smacked her head in a "d'oh!" manner, as she grabbed the knife from my hand, cutting deeply into her palm, at first it didn't succeed in even breaking the skin, instead bending the knife, but eventually it did make a small cut.

Amelia mumbled quietly to herself. "No, Levvy, let me do it this time..."

Using her other hand, she began to mumble some nonsensical words that I took as generic magic chants. Glancing down at her hand, she frowned. It was still cut open. As she put on a determined face, she tried again, and again, and three more times, until just when I was losing interest, she suddenly shrieked at the top of her lungs. "OH MY GOSH! I did it! Look, Jason, looky!" As she waved her hand in front of my face, I smiled as I reached down and patted her head.

"Nice job! You got the hang of that pretty fast!" As I smiled, I suddenly felt another feeling wash over my body. A thought occurred to me... She didn't know how to heal herself until just now...

But... I taught her how to do it...

As she hopped around shouting joyfully, I swallowed an especially thick gulp. Something about this... was...

Feeling my hands start to shake, I sent another mental order to my clone, who wordsmithed my Hypersuit back onto me. Glancing around nervously, I had another thought creep into my mind. I hope nobody saw me take the suit off and put it back on...

Still, I was no longer wearing the face of Jason Hiro. Anyone who saw me wouldn't be able to easily identify me. It was fine. Yeah... it was fine.

Sighing quietly now that I was back inside my Hypersuit, I placed my hand on Amelia's shoulder. "Well, are you ready to go home now?"

She nodded enthusiastically. "Yes! I can't wait to try out more magical abilities!"

I nodded as the smile faded from my face, sending a telepathic symbol to Harold to beam us up.

Moments later, we were standing aboard the Mothership's bridge, staring out at the vast starry sky the represented Outer Space.

I can't change what's already been done, I can only live with it now.

Silver stood inside Stonewall's office, glancing around at all sorts of beautiful weapons that had been taken from ancient parts of the world. Two swords were criss-crossed on the wall atop a Nordic looking wooden shield, the image of a bear carved into its front section. He noted a halberd, a massive warhammer, and even a flail with dozens of spikes all over it.

As he shuffled his feet, he glanced down at the vial in his hands. The end result of our experiments. A pure white fluid swirled around inside of it, the serum designed based on previously lost Nazi human experimental trials. Their goals of creating the perfect super-soldier had failed, but they were on the right track.

As he stood and stared at the various decorations, the door opened to his side and Stonewall strode in. His massive hulking body was tempered only by his finely tailored suit and the massive cigar in his mouth. "Mister Silva, my apologies for keeping you waiting." His thick Russian accent didn't hamper his ability to speak English, it only made it obvious that it was not his native tongue.

Taking a few steps forward, his huge stride placed him in front of Silver, as he leaned forwards to pluck a fresh cigar from a golden cigar holder on the table. Glancing back, he spoke again. "Oh, so rude of me. You want to have smoke as well, da?"

Silver shook his head politely. "No thank you, I'm not a smoker."

Stonewall stared at the small man for a moment before shaking his head slightly with a tsk passing his lips. "Such unfortunate that you do not enjoy the taste of smoke in your mouth. It might increase your testosterone a bit, make you into a bigger man." Striding around the desk, Stonewall took a seat in his luxurious easy chair, tossing a glance towards the small wooden chair on the other side of the desk. Silver took a seat there, noting that it was much more comfortable than it might otherwise ordinarily appear.

Gripping the vial in his hands tightly, Silver suddenly felt uncomfortable when faced with the mountain of a man in person. He was far more formidable when not viewed as a hologram or on a viewscreen. "Well then, let's get to business, shall we?"

Stonewall took a few puffs before deigning to respond. "I see you have brought goods. You say this energy is of much power, da? Perhaps a demonstration is in order." His tone indicated an order, not a question.

Silver reached into his loosely fitting brown leather jacket, pulling a small obsolete appearing thumb drive out, as he handed it across the table to the Russian man.

Stonewall eyed it for a moment before reaching out and snatching it from Silver's fingers in the blink of an eye. Looking it up and down, he turned quizzically to Silver. "What is this? It looks familiar, but I have not seen something like this in decades."

"I work for a government agency of sorts. We tend to use old hardware for backup. This is a USB drive, with images and videos of the unsuccessful, and the successful tests of the serum. Just put it into your Deconstructor and it will be able to read the data."

Stonewall examined the small thumb drive carefully before reaching into a drawer on his side of the desk and pulling out a small device with a large aperture for placing objects into. Setting the stick inside, he glanced over at Silver, who nodded in response. Wordlessly, he pressed the ignition button as light filled the small bowl-like insides of his Deconstructor, the data was rapidly relayed to his office's central AI.

A holoscreen appeared in the center of the table, projected from the ceiling. Various scenes began to play themselves out of men and women attacking others in their immediate vicinity, apparently going berserk as they demonstrated superhuman strength, tearing researchers and scientists limb from limb.

As Stonewall watched silently, Silver explained the videos. "These were the initial trials from twenty years ago. The side effects of our early tests always included terrible mental imbalances, but the actual powers demonstrated, as you can see, were already showing great promise."

Stonewall appeared unmoved by the horrific carnage onscreen. Likely, when he had fought on the battlefield years before, he had seen far worse horrors of war. "Da, I see clearly how good at fighting they are. Still, this is not much better than those commandos that Beatrix praises so much. Enhancing muscles and speed is nothing new for our super-soldiers."

Silver nodded as he leaned forwards and manipulated the holo-videos with his hand, quickly flipping forwards through dozens of other videos. "Most of these are similar trials and experiments, but it was around 2085 that we had real breakthroughs. This is Susie, she was our first successful test subject who didn't have a mental snap."

A little 6 year old girl sat and manipulated objects with her mind, moving them around telekinetically and even crushing or reforming them. As she did, researchers stood in the room, quietly taking notes with their datapads and nodding.

"A child, hm? Let me guess, only they possessed the malleable brains needed to use the serum properly? Seems cliched, da."

Silver shook his head. "At first it was children, but then we were able to locate various genes and such that worked well with the treatments. For some reason, blonde haired subjects tended to have many times less adverse reactions. Blue eyes helped as well." He paused as he turned his head away thoughtfully. "There were always rumors about the Fuhrer and his fascination with certain types of humans, but perhaps history simply... forgot the truth of his predilections."

Stonewall nodded as he waved a hand to turn off the display. "So you give me list of attributes, I give you soldiers, da? Is this deal that you wish to make?"

Silver nodded as he reached over and slid the vial of energy towards the general. "That's the gist of it, yes. This is for your own personal study, but tell nobody of its existence. And..." Silver paused as he looked Stonewall in the eyes meaningfully. "...whatever you do, don't attempt to use this on yourself. There may be a slight chance of beneficial effects, but I guarantee you don't meet the criteria to use the Type 3 Energy effectively. As it stands, neither do I. Few do."

Stonewall nodded as he took it gracefully, spinning in his chair to slide a shield on the wall to his side away, revealing a safe behind it. Placing his hand on its scanner, it popped open to reveal many sorts of interesting looking artifacts and other odd things, as he placed the serum inside. Closing it up, he slid the shield back in place and turned back to Silver.

"Is good to do business with you. As token of my esteem, I will give piece of advice; stay on my good side. Soon, I will become highest leader of this planet, da. After I oust the wench who is thorn in my side, I will begin the destruction of aliens and demons. But especially the aliens, for all the harm they've caused. Mother Russia is in ruins thanks to their games, and I will not forgive them so easily."

Agent Silver raised an eyebrow. "I've heard rumors. No footage has officially leaked yet, but based on what my... 'friends' are saying, it seems the capital is shattered. And, as for your son..."

Stonewall quickly glared at Silver, the friendliness disappearing in an instant. "Do not bring up my son. I am in deep mourning. Krumer was a good boy, and I was training him to take over should I pass. Instead, a father must bury his son, just as I have buried many of my close family members." Stonewall's eyes shifted for an instant to a picture frame on his desk, which faced away from Silver. Silver didn't make any effort to see who was in it.

"I am sorry for your loss. I didn't mean to bring up a painful memory."

Stonewall's eyes softened slightly as he took another long drag from the cigar resting in his mouth. "Is no problem, simply keep your thoughts to yourself in future, da?"

Silver nodded and the two of them chatted for a while longer before Silver took his leave, having only been there for fifteen minutes or so.

Stonewall slumped down in his chair as he sighed, thinking about all the thankless work he had to do to keep the planet safe from alien scum. "Is not the job for weak, pathetic woman like Beatrix. Is job for proven leader, like myself."

Speaking to no-one in particular, he continued staring at the wall for a long time before finally retiring for the night.

Part 295a: Dream

Once again, a white void spread out before me, as the imaginary dream world I had been visiting every few nights opened up before me. This was the world that belonged to Arthur, King of the Saxons. One of the many heroes who had laid claim to the Heroic Aura and all its powers, he considered himself to be the strongest hero who ever lived. A bold claim, to be sure, but I had no reason to doubt him, and no way to test him. For now, I would simply agree with him.

As the void began to solidify into something more meaningful around me, I blinked quickly as rain began to fall. The ether reshaped itself into an alien, yet familiar landscape before me, as the skies darkened and turned grey. The grass around my feet was dead and covered in ash, as smoldering fires billowed thick black smoke high into the air, disappearing behind the cloud cover as the wind swept them away. All around me, rolling hills and dead trees were fallen on the ground, as bodies matted down with long-since dried blood lay in various states of putrefaction in piles here and there.

Taking a step forwards, I felt something crunch under my feet, and I glanced down to see an ashen skull crushed into powder. How long had this skull been here, I wondered?

This was, without a doubt, a battlefield that belonged to a massive field of war. The bodies were endless. Only the horizon itself was the limit to how far I could see the carnage stretch.

From a short distance away, just over a small hill, I heard a soft song being played, a song filled with heavy emotions, played on a flute of sorts. Making my way to the top of the hill, I saw who was playing the tune within a few moments; Arthur.

"What is this place? An ancient battlefield?"

Arthur continued to play the flute for a few long moments before slowly lowering it from his lips. "No. This is a figurative field of bodies, covered with the blood of those who have died as a result of Heroes... directly, and indirectly. Both through our actions, and through our inaction. And, more interestingly... I did not create this representation that you see before you, today."

I frowned slightly. "You didn't? But you have full power over the inside of Excalibur's soul dimension. If not you, then... who?"

Arthur glanced over at an oddly armored body, one whose head was shattered in an especially gruesome manner. "Who do you suppose? You, of course. Today, we do not meet inside of the heart of Excalibur. We are meeting inside your own heart, Jason. This battlefield was created due to your own inner conflict and doubt. You are, as we speak, desperately trying to figure out a path to take that will save all three races. An admirable quest, if you ask me, but the hardest possible path one could take."

I follow his gaze to the body with the crushed head. The blood was not the same red or brown color as the others, in fact, it was almost a purplish color... the same color as...

"Is that a Volgrim, over there?"

Arthur shrugs. "I suppose it is. Why do you ask me? You created this place. You have the power to change it." Rising to his feet, he reaches down and pulls Excalibur from its scabbard at his side. "Fight me."

I stare at him in confusion. "Fight you? I mean, I can, but why?"

He tosses Excalibur over to me, as he picks up a sword lying on the ground that has the entire second half of the blade broken in half. "No reason, really. I've been training you for months now, yet you still never bother to use the sword. I wonder why that is? Perhaps a quick sparring match will tell me what I seek to know."

Holding Excalibur up, I compare its long and graceful blade with the roughshod appearance of the broken sword that Arthur is holding. "If you're seeking to beat me with that broken sword, I'm sure it'll be a trifle for you. You are far better with a sword than I could ever hope to be."

Arthur glares at me for a moment before the expression passes as quickly as it came. "Listen to you. That almost sounded like self-pity, and definitely had an element of doubt to it. Why do you doubt your own abilities? I may be the strongest hero that ever lived, but eventually I would expect to be surpassed. No, in fact I would hope to be eventually surpassed. The son must improve upon the father, and the pupil must defeat the master. That is the way of this world."

"So you're saying I can beat you in one on one combat?"

"Probably not." Arthur cocks a small grin as he says this. "But the point isn't to beat me or to lose to me, it's to not give in to doubt, and to put your heart into every swing of the blade. The point is that you must strike with precision... you must act as a leader would, motivating people to your cause. Indecisiveness is what truly kills all great empires. Eventually, the beloved monarch dies and indecision on his part leads to a scuffle for power, as the heir is not properly named, or someone kills the heir to take the throne for themselves, and then eventually everything falls to disrepair. But, done properly, this common end result might be totally avoided."

I grimace at his words. He's certainly put a lot of thought to it, but it's just a lot of complicated philosophy to me. "I suppose, sure. Yeah, that makes sense."

Arthur rolls his eyes as he digs his foot into the ground. "I keep forgetting, you're not the brightest Hero on the block. You understand lessons better when they're beaten into you."

In the blink of an eye, he appears in front of me, swinging his broken sword at my neck. Using my months of training and practice, I deflect it easily, shoving him away with my free hand, just like he always instructed me.

"Good! Your body still remembers the basics!" Suddenly he kicks his foot into the ground, blasting a small rock directly at my head. Moving far too quickly for me to register it's coming, the rock smashes into my face, blasting half of it off as I fly backwards. My vision goes blurry as my body struggles to understand what just happened.

An eternity passes as my entire mind swims around trying to understand the catastrophic amount of damage I had just taken. Yet, my mind is still working and I can fundamentally understand what happened.

Then it occurs to me, the damage was all in my mind. This realm doesn't really exist, it's a dream. Blinking quickly, I sit back up and stare ahead blankly, as the battlefield shifts back into focus.

Arthur chuckles softly. "You were out cold for about twenty seconds. It took you that long to realize the wound was imaginary?"

I nod slowly as phantom pain flares up in my face and I lurch forwards, gripping it as I try to rub the pain away.

Arthur sighs. "It's in your head. All your problems are in your head. Just will it to go away and the pain will disappear."

Focusing my mind on the pain, I do as he says, sitting up fully to attention a moment later as the pain does indeed vanish. I blink slowly as I get my bearings straight. "That was... unreal."

"Tch. No kidding. Took half your head clean off. Still, it's just a flesh wound in this world. For you it should be as simple as just shaking it off."

I stand up and face him, noting that Excalibur has somehow ended up placed back into its scabbard at his side. Despite all the mud from the rain that's pouring down, and the fact that sword must have landed in the mud, it's still exquisitely clean, somehow.

"I don't seem to arrive and speak to you unless there's a reason. What's the reason this time?"

Arthur groans in annoyance as he stretches his body a bit. "There doesn't have to be a reason, Jason. But, if I had to guess, it's because you just went half a week without any rest whatsoever and you stretched your mind and body to their limits. On top of that, a lot has happened over the last couple days, and you're feeling mind-shattering levels of guilt because you don't feel you should even be sleeping right now."

I stared at him for a moment before responding. "How do you even know all of that? I thought you couldn't see anything relating to the outside world unless I was holding Excalibur in my hands."

"It's because we're in your mind now, not Excalibur's dimensional seal. I have access to all of your recent memories dating back roughly three weeks or so. You've been a busy man." Arthur glanced over at a pile of bodies nearby. "And while we're on the subject, aren't you tired of this dreary place? Take us somewhere nicer. I'm sick of looking at these bodies."

I blushed as I suddenly felt awkward. "I, uh, sure... but how?"

"Just imagine some place that you know really well, some location you're familiar with. That's how it works for me. Your mind will fill in the blanks."

I nod as I close my eyes and concentrate. Oddly, the place I decide to return to is one I haven't seen in close to a hundred years...

A small room appears around me, the mud and bodies and dead grass vanishing into particles of light. This room is a bland looking room, one with pastel colored walls, an ugly single-size bed covered in ratty looking covers tossed messily on top. The 'kitchen' is a tiny little space in the corner with a microwave and a non-functional oven, along with a two foot by two foot counter. Naturally, it's covered in dirt and grime.

"This is... my old apartment?"

Arthur curled a lip upwards slightly in disgust at all the papers and food left lying around the room. "You used to live here? This place is the hallmark of laziness. What a pigsty."

I glanced downwards in embarrassment. "I don't know why we appeared here. I don't get it at all."

Arthur sighed as he gingerly sat on my bed, his regal armor and kingly figure harshly standing out against the disgusting nature of my old room. "If I had to hazard a guess, I'd say your subconscious brought you here for a reason. This must have been a place you lived at before you discovered your Heroic Aura and all its abilities were manifested. Perhaps, secretly, you're longing for a simpler time when things weren't so complicated."

I shook my head. "No... that can't be the case. I was so miserable before I had my abilities. I didn't have friends, and all of my family were either dead or I didn't know who they were. I worked a dead-end job, barely got passing grades in high-school... that was hell for me. My life has improved immeasurably since gaining my powers."

Arthur turned to look at me with a cautious expression on his face. "Are you sure about that? Has your life truly improved? Perhaps, when you think about it, you'll find that your life has worsened in some ways. After all..." His eyes turned away from mine. "...that's the way it was for me. The daily pressures of having everyone's hopes and dreams resting on my shoulders. The stress of having the world in the palm of my hands... and the failure of when my beloved died."

I turned away from him and stared out the window. Outside, the usually lively streets were empty, and no life could be seen. Naturally, this was a dream, so my mind probably couldn't easily fill in all of the blanks. Still, the emptiness outside filled me with unease, almost as if it were a foreshadowing of the dark future soon to come for the America that I grew up in. "Maybe you're right. 90% of all humans on Earth died over this last week, and I feel very little regarding their deaths. I may have lost friends of my own, but I haven't had a spare moment to check. Beyond that, so many people are looking up to me now, not as a symbol of hope, but as one of tyranny. People don't trust me, because I've kept myself locked behind a mask. Was that the wrong thing to do? Should I come out and identify myself?"

Arthur shrugged nonchalantly. "I don't have all the answers, Jason. You're forging your own path forwards, and you live in a world far different from the one I know of. Still, there are many paths you can take, and if you need help deciding which of those paths specifically to take, I'm always here."

I swallowed hard as a new thought entered my mind. "What about Amelia? I've befriended her as of late, and recently she broke down into a puddle of tears over an internal struggle regarding the devouring of a small child. She seems to be genuinely fighting the hunger that plagues her."

A flash of disgust mixed with rage passed over Arthur's face, vanishing a moment later. "Amelia. I'm not going to say that you're making a huge mistake, as I've warned you about the calamities that follow her everywhere on many occasions. Amelia is beyond trouble, she's a walking catastrophe. And..." Arthur uneasily stared at my chest, unable to bring himself to look into my eyes from his seated position on my bed. "...as I've said on many occasions, I am possibly the strongest Hero who ever lived. However, I say this not to brag, but to drill the importance of caution into your mind. Amelia bested me with little effort. The only reason she hasn't been able to tear you limb from limb is that she hasn't figured you out yet. To her, you're an enigma, a genuine mystery. She follows you because she finds you fascinating. But once you bore her in the end, it's all over."

He coughed quietly to breach the silence for a moment as he gathered his thoughts. "Your body is unbelievably fragile, compared to mine. All your physical abilities are tied up in that Hypersuit of yours. It surely makes you a far better fighter than even me. But, without the suit, you're barely better than an ordinary human. Not even a strong human, just an average one. Your large body masks how poorly you've trained your physical aura. You depend entirely on that Hypersuit, and to me, even in this dream world, it shows."

As he verbally chided me, I nodded slowly. "Then what can I do? My body has many strong regeneration spells placed on it, plus I can use the scabbard of Excalibur to enhance those further. Heck, I can even, if the going gets rough, use 'Invulnerability' and 'Invincibility' to make myself completely unbeatable."

"Oh? Then why haven't you?" Arthur cocked a small grin. "If it's that easy, why not walk around with your body constantly invincible?"

"Well, it has side effects. I lose my sense of touch all over my body, which can be rather disorienting. It's the same thing as when I enhanced my speed casually in the future, the side effects were that my mind couldn't keep up with the speed in the future, and I nearly died slamming into a wall. To make enhanced speed more viable, I created this Hypersuit with its AI. It compensates for my brain being too slow to process how fast I move at peak performance."

Arthur stood up from the bed and wandered over towards a pile of random junk I had never bothered to clean up. Leaning down, he shuffled through it slowly. "I guess you've got it all figured out then, huh? But if this suit is so great, then how come Satan actually killed you?"

I felt phantom pain all throughout my body, as the memory of ten trillion icicles exploding in my chest resurfaced. "That was... unexpected, but luckily my clone was able to revive me. You're right though, it could have been much worse."

Arthur chuckled as he pulled up a Superman figurine out of the pile of junk he was rooting around in. "Heh, if only you knew. You're very lucky. If Satan had managed to steal your abilities, there would be no defense against his unstoppable power. Nobody in the universe would be able to stand up to him."

I frowned at his words. "What do you mean? Satan can steal powers?"

"Yes. I don't know how he does it, but he has a technique that allows him to steal abilities from any Hero, demon, angel, or god that he kills. Given how many he's killed over the years, he's already a nearly unstoppable monster. You might be the only one who can defeat him."

I stared down at my own gloved hand as a feeling of unease washed over me once again. "No... there is another."

"Amelia?"

I nodded silently.

"Perhaps. I don't know the details, but if my fight with her is anything to go by, she might be made of the right stuff."

The sun started peeking through my windows as the alarm by the side of my bed began to beep. Arthur cast a sidelong glance at it. "Nice touch. Your alarm is going off in the real world too, you know. It seems our time here is once again coming to an end."

I felt the world around me beginning to fade. Sighing loudly, I smiled at Arthur. "Thank you for the talk, Arthur. As usual, you've helped me out a great deal."

"Any time, drop by. I'm not going anywhere, but you already knew that."

I nodded as the haze vanished completely and Arthur evaporated into the mist...

Part 296a:

May 14th, 2101.

"I've led the forces that saved this world a dozen times from the Volgrim! Nobody expected an attack of this magnitude!"

Beatrix grimaced at the brutal barrage she was receiving from the other debaters on stage. She was holding them off the best she could, but everything she was saying was being booed down by the crowd of fifty thousand that crowded around the amphitheater. Despite the best attempts from the judges to keep the crowd silent, they were having none of it.

Stonewall stood silently at his end of the debate podiums while letting another candidate rip into her. Jeremy Reuters was his name, and he was joined by two others, in addition to the incumbent Beatrix and her biggest threat, Stonewall. "That's a lie, Supreme Commander. As recently as three weeks before the attack, a scathing journal entry was published in the North American Times telling of our world's weakness to sabotage inside of our own ranks, as well as how poorly protected our ionized nuclear missiles were. If it wasn't a massive attack via the Earth's own internal forces, it would have been an attack that sabotaged our power grid and left us defenseless! Even now, the Earth Protective Shield is completely offline, leaving us totally open to a barrage from space! How could you ignore all the warning signs?!"

Stonewall stifled a sinister grin at the young man's youthful energy. If Jeremy didn't make an enemy out of the hulking Russian during this final debate, he might have just secured a spot on his top advisory board when this was all said and done.

"I didn't ignore the warning signs, but there weren't enough resources to go around ensuring the safety of all of humanity! And think of the ecological crisis in the South American jungles we were dealing with to top it all off! What I need now is cooperation from our member nations to rebuild and fortify, before the Volgrim attack us again!"

Stonewall decided now was the time to strike. "Hah! Unlike you, if I were Supreme Commander, they wouldn't get a chance to attack again! I will hit them with the full might of Earth's military! I will make them pay for all the deaths they've caused!"

The crowd erupted in cheers at his bravado. Beatrix lowered her eyes, just for a moment, as she realized the inevitable truth; she had lost the will of the people.

Decades from now, scholars would call this the moment that had sealed the rise of Stonewall, Earth's Third Supreme Commander. As the other debaters nodded along with him, seeking to bolster their own positions and knowing they had no chance at beating him anyway (nor a desire to get in his way), Stonewall grinned as the crowd roared its approval.

Beatrix smashed her fist into the table. "Damnit!" Her entire body shook as she watched the news showing her approval ratings after the debate. Five percent. She had lost another five percent after the debate, and now she sat at a record shattering low of 17% approval in total. In contrast, many people rated Stonewall 'very positive' compared even to past military commanders. "He's going to cause a massive all-out war with them, and we won't be able to recover from it. He'll be the death of us all." Beatrix gnashed her teeth as the pompous ass spoke enthusiastically on the news about how the people loved him so much.

As she sat on the couch inside her private quarters, her maid sat in an adjacent chair watching the news. "It's not your fault. Whenever one political party has been in power too long, the people will always seek an alternative, as they begin blaming you for all the wrongs in the world. It happened to you, and it will happen to that man, as well."

Beatrix sighed as she slumped her muscular body back into the couch, kicking her legs out in front of her. "That's the problem, Irene. I don't think there will be a next election. Even if the aliens don't kill us, that power-hungry madman is going to declare himself the World's Emperor or something and seize power forever. Worse, he's effectively immortal now. just as all of us are. If he seizes power, the only end to his rule will be an assassination or him voluntarily ending his rule."

"As if the latter would happen." Irene took a sip of her tea as she munched on a bagel while keeping an eye on the TV. "You can't trust a big dumb man to step down when the time is right."

"Tch. You said it." Beatrix grumbled as she stared at the News on the holo-screen. On the plus side, the rebuilding of the outskirts of London was going well. A lot of people had died during the Christmas Genocide, but eventually, assuming they could get some substantial defenses up, things wouldn't turn out too poorly in the end. At this point, it was most important to focus on the future and not the past.

"What do you think about the angels?" Irene paused sipping her tea to look over at Beatrix curiously. "I mean, those weren't real angels, were they? It seems silly that I'd even ask."

Beatrix nodded slowly. "They were real... I'm sure of it. Judicator left the battlefield early just to go out and find them, according to what Ben Brown told me. And if that's the case, then I have to wonder what kind of relationship a time traveler has with all these aliens, angels, and the... demons..." Beatrix furrowed her brow as she thought about the last group especially. Demons are real. It changed so many things. If Stonewall knew about the angels ahead of time, did he already know about the truth behind the demons? More importantly, if those were legitimately demons, and not some sort of mutated Volgrim, what did this mean with regards to the future of Earth's defenses?

Irene stood up, reaching over to the table to grab Beatrix's cup. "Oh. You didn't even touch your coffee. Want me to leave it here?"

Beatrix curled her lip. "No, take it. I can't eat or drink anything right now. I'm too stressed out."

Irene nodded as she took up all the plates and cups in one smooth motion, her decades of being a professional maid showing easily. "All right, let me know if you change your mind. And, my lady, try to look on the bright side."

As she started to walk away, Beatrix snickered. "The bright side, huh? And what might that be?"

As Irene started to walk out of the room, she smiled. "At least from now on, it'll be a man's fault when something goes wrong."

As she disappeared around the corner, Beatrix shrugged. Yeah, she's probably right. Forty years is a plenty long time, I had a good run. If he ever breaks down in tears and needs my help, maybe I'll toss that lunkhead a bone.

I eyeballed the large Russian man up and down uneasily. This wasn't my first time seeing him in person, but it was the first time I'd ever actually spoken to him, and only the third or fourth time I'd even been within a room's length of him. He was as tall as I was, but seemed three times more formidable in presence alone.

"Mister, err, Stonewall? Nice to finally speak with you."

We were standing outside the London fortress, only a few hundred feet away from its main entrance, in a secured section of the facility. To my side, there was a beautiful marble water fountain, in a shape that looked vaguely similar to one I'd seen many many years ago.

Stonewall leaned heavily on a small metal cane, which was odd given I'd never seen him walking with one before. "So you are Judicator, da? Is the first time we have spoken, if memory serves me right. I am glad that you were willing to meet up with me."

I nod carefully. "Yeah, I mean, based on the news, it looks like you'll soon be the new Supreme Commander. We should be in constant contact before even that day comes, if you, err, ask me."

"Da, is good of you to acknowledge my future ranking. Of course, polls can go any which way and I may not be elected, but..." He held his hands up in a sort of 'who can know?' manner. "In any case, I am glad to see that you are not avoiding me."

I shook my head quickly as I felt an itch in my ear. Unfortunately, inside the Hypersuit, scratching my ear would be quite difficult to perform. Best to just ignore it for now. "I worked with Beatrix, just as I worked with Gerald Bonaparte before her, just as I'll work with you. It doesn't matter to me who is fighting for the sake of Earth, so long as they are an ally of humanity, they are an ally of mine."

Stonewall smiled in a sort of masculine manner. "Good words! As expected of the one who has been protecting humanity for almost a hundred years now! Ah yes, I have many plans to work on assuming I take office in three months. But even before then, I have questions to ask of you before that day comes."

"Questions? Go ahead. I'm ready to help." I felt myself squeezing out a smile. Despite how the news portrayed him as a big strongman type, he was actually quite graceful and easy to talk with. It seemed my initial impressions were incorrect.

"Well, first is the question of your powers. Without doubt, you are very powerful man, clearly one who has perhaps power taken right from the angels themselves! I do not wish to pester you with specifics, only to ask if you might help me with some... theory crafting?"

I nodded slowly as my smile began to falter. He knew I had powers? Well, actually, that wasn't very shocking when I thought about it. It probably didn't take a genius to piece two and two together, even Beatrix had figured it out decades ago with the Dartfighters.

"Theory crafting? Go on."

"Well, it is with regards to the Volgrim attack. I plan to launch an assault on their home world as soon as possible. From now on, Earth goes on the attack! We must crush the alien invaders and drive them back, you see!"

I feel my smile completely fade away at his words. Ah, so he's a warmonger. That would make sense. Still, I can't fault him for that. All of humanity is boiling over the top with rage, who can blame them?

"I see. What would you have me do then?"

Stonewall stares at me intently all of a sudden as a small grin creeps over his mouth. "Well, I don't know what powers you have, but perhaps you might help us travel faster through space to their planet? Might it be doable for one such as yourself?"

I nod slowly as I ponder the answer to his question. It probably is doable, but increasing the speed of the ships artificially is likely to bring terrible results. It's certainly not advisable. However...

"Correct me if I'm wrong, Stonewall, but did I not send a few clones with the attack ships from twenty years ago? You were still commander of the space fleet, as I recall."

Stonewall pauses and grumbles to himself for a moment as he stares at the ground, pondering the question. Finally he looks back up, his face showing he's unsure of how to respond. "Ehh, I may have to check the records. I do not recall offhand."

I shrug in response. "Well, on the off chance I did, I might be able to get in contact with my clone. That fleet should be damn close to the alien's homeworld. If it is, perhaps there might be a way to open up a wormhole for instant travel between our sectors?"

Stonewall, a man who had a Masters in theoretical physics, nodded along as he followed my idea mentally. "The creation of that wormhole would seem to be impossible, Judicator, but if it is you who terraformed Mars in just a few minutes... it might be possible, da." He rubbed his chin thoughtfully as he seemed to mull it over. "The problem with wormhole is that if you open it up, the alien menace can attack us through it as well."

I shook my head. "Why bother? They already have their own way of skipping the space-time barrier. They allied with the demons, and as such they can make portals that-" I paused, suddenly realizing I was telling him crazy top secret information.

Stonewall noticed my pausing in the middle of a sentence. "Oops, did you perhaps say something you shouldn't have? Don't worry, Jason Hiro, I know more than you might give me credit for. I am not stupid man." He put heavy emphasis on my name, which turned my blood cold for a moment as I took a step back.

"How do you know my name?"

Stonewall grinned deeply as he closed the slight gap I had just put between us, reaching over to grip my arm. "Is no worries. I know you, and you know me. I am not foolish leader like Beatrix, who never questions anything. I trust no-one, as I'm sure you don't either. We are smart men, da?"

I nodded silently as I felt my breathing sharpen. He knows about me, and the demons, and the angels... possibly for a long time now. How does he know so much?

Releasing my arm, Stonewall went back to leaning heavily on his cane as he turned to walk away. "Was good talk. I hope to speak with you in future, Judicator."

As he ambled off, I managed a hollow 'good-bye' as I felt my throat tighten quickly. Maybe I was wrong. This guy knew a lot about me, what else might he know?

Next time I spoke with him, perhaps some mind-reading was in order.

Sighing slowly, I asked Harold to teleport me back up to the Mothership. He was all too quick to oblige.

Part 297a:

It's been a long time since we began our voyage. Soon, it will come to an end, and we will likely die in a horrific suicidal attack against the Volgrim.

Frankly, I never understood the point of this. Traveling at Warp 5, the fleet of 250 ships, lightly comprised of Capital class ships, but mainly filled with Carrier class ships (designed for bombardment) was traveling at a terribly slow speed, having taken us twenty years to arrive at the homeworld of the Volgrim.

Given that it was not the Original's order to attack, but that of Supreme Commander Beatrix, I was surprised that he didn't put up more resistance and try to figure out a better method of attacking them. Of course, as a third generational clone, I'm a bit divorced from the thought processes of the Original, but not by much. Twenty years of separation has probably changed my mindset from his though, as now I suffer from intense boredom.

This voyage started out with thirty thousand humans, and now it has close to thirty-two thousand, as many female officers have had relations with the men and gone against the captain's orders in order to have a little fun. Frankly, I can't blame anyone, given how goddamn boring it's been. The biggest issues we've faced, though, have been trying to figure out how war vessels created for military purposes can be used to raise children effectively.

It's mostly a null point, sadly, as all of these children, and their parents, are probably going to die when we arrive in a month. Still, I keep in contact with the Jason Intelligence Base on Earth, given even subspace-messaging isn't fast enough to transmit communications at this distance. At 13,997 lightyears from Earth, a subspace message sent from our craft would easily take a thousand plus years to arrive, and would not travel fast enough to catch back up to us at Warp 5. By the time it arrived, we'd be long dead... of boredom.

But that's alright. Magical energy is like cheating. I can communicate with the clone agency back on Earth with very little trouble and no delay at all. How it manages to defy the laws of physics is a source of interest for me, when I ever feel even the slightest creative spark flowing.

Today though, something is off. A few months back, I received a communication telling myself and the other two clones on the attack force that Earth had been damn near wiped out by a surprise Volgrim incursion. Now I'm receiving a mental communication four days ahead of our typical once-per-week meeting, so something must be up. Sending a quick telepathic message to J-498 and J-1251, the other two clones teleport over to me in an instant. Given our ships are moving at Warp 5, the only way to travel between the ships without returning to normal sub-light speeds for transporter movement is to use magical teleportation, and as such we have been using our powers sparingly to accommodate... the more annoying crew members.

"What's up?" J-498 walks over unemotionally, a cigarette between his fingers as he puffs on it nonchalantly. To me, it seems disgusting, given the Original would never have done that, but then this might be J-498's boredom coping mechanism. "It's not like you to bug me for no reason."

J-1251 is, oddly enough, soaking wet and wearing some shorts and flip-flops. Maybe they were having a pool party on his vessel? I ignore it for now. Military etiquette has broken down quite a bit over the years, and anyway we'll restore everything to tip-top shape a week before arriving at Volgarius anyway. No big deal.

"I received a communique from the JIB. They have something they wanted all the clones in our attack party to hear about." My businesslike manner is a bit different from the other two. Sometimes I wonder how the heck we all turned out so differently, given the source material is the same.

"Oh. Nice, I guess. Let's hear it then." J-498 pulls a chair up from a nearby table to sit behind me a few feet as I fiddle with the controls on my holo-screen. "Connect." I wordsmith in order to make the screen magically transmit whatever the JIB is sending to us. A familiar face appears onscreen. Well, of course it's familiar, given it's my face, the face we all share.

"J... 2296? Oh, yeah, it's you. How are you guys holding up?"

The clone onscreen speaks to me. I shrug. "I mean, in a month we're probably all going to be dead. Other than that, I'd say we're doing okay."

The JIB clone shakes his head. "Come on now, you and I know better than that. You guys set a waypoint before you left, you can return to Earth in an instant. The rest of the crew might die, but you'll be fine."

I glance away from his gaze. "Yeah... I guess that's true..."

I start to say something, but J-498 plucks the cigarette from his mouth and leans in a bit closer. "Yo, HQ, what's this all about anyway? You don't seem to be in a big rush to tell us anything important, yet you got us all together three days early. Something going on?"

The clone onscreen nods. "Yes, actually. The Original is here, he wanted to speak with all of our outbound clones. He said that the suicide mission might not happen the way we initially planned. Here, I'll grab him really quick."

Without bothering to give us a second to respond, the clone got up and walked away, giving us a few moments to watch a couple dozen other clones milling about in the background. The JIB seemed to have grown in size over the years, based purely on what we could see.

"I miss Earth." J-1251 had conjured a beach towel and was laying on the ground, barely paying any attention to what we were doing. "I miss the beach. I miss not looking at fucking metal hulls day in and day out. Even the holo-deck isn't doing it for me anymore."

He stopped griping a moment before another clone appeared on screen. No, wait, judging by his clothing, he actually was the... Original? Yeah, of course he was. It's just so hard to tell ourselves apart.

"Hello, guys. Glad to see you're still in one piece."

"Barely." J-498 sucked on the cigarette, quipping quietly to himself.

The original ignored the comment, but took notice of the cigarette. "Seriously? Man, it's true how clones tend to diverge from the original over time. I wonder if this is specific to myself or if general purpose human cloning will work like this too?"

J-498 shrugged. "Dunno. Wait, you mean to tell me that humans are working on general purpose cloning?"

The Original nodded. "Yeah. Only for VIP's, of course, but just like nanobots it'll soon expand to the general population. Anyway, that's not what I wanted to talk to you guys about. It's regarding Supreme Commander Beatrix. The election results just came in a few hours ago, and she lost as expected. I've been talking with her future replacement, and he'll be taking office in two weeks. He's a big brute of a man, but he has sound plans to improve life for everyday Britannians, as well as some fairly sound plans for eliminating the Volgrim."

I was nodding along until Original spoke the last sentence. "Wait, hold on a second... eliminating them? I thought we were supposed to just bombard the planet to cripple their offensive potential?"

"Change of plans. I don't fully agree with everything he's saying, but you have to understand, the world is in chaos right now. There's rioting and looting going on. People are very unhappy. Even the new Enforcer bots that are being rolled out to combat the outbreak of violence aren't enough to quell the uprising. We need a way to channel that energy away from harming ourselves... and the best way to do that is to send it at an enemy."

J-498 stabbed his cigarette into the table beside him, using a 'clean' spell to make it vanish. "Sounds like horse shit to me. You sound like you're just buying into whatever he says to placate him. Aren't we, as a group, infinitely more powerful than all the humans living on Earth? Why aren't you directly calling the shots? Why are you letting some puppet-master give the orders?"

Original grimaced at J-498's words. "You've been gone a long time. You don't know what it's like back on Earth, and it isn't pretty. Mind control via magic doesn't work on the citizenry, or a simple 'Pacify' command would do the trick. It'd take a lot of energy, certainly, but aside from being wholly unethical, it might have worked. As of now, I'm out of options unless you have any better ideas."

As J-498 glowered at the screen, I sighed. "Frankly, putting the bad elements to work for the military would solve a lot of issues. Still, I'm curious about what you said earlier... how could you possibly plan to eliminate the Volgrim? Wordsmithing?"

"Oh, right. That's the most important reason I'm contacting you today... we're going to open up a wormhole to Volgarius."

Original said it so casually and it took me a moment to register what he'd said. "Wait... for instant travel between our worlds? Why didn't I ever think of that?"

J-498 chuckled. "Actually, I thought of an idea similar to that once, but I was so drunk that I forgot to write it down."

I curled my lip up in disgust. "What a degenerate. You're the laughingstock of second-gen clones, you know that, right? You're lucky the crew can't see past our holo-masks or your antics would have revealed our shared identity by now."

Of course, I was referring to the special illusion magic that made people forget our faces every time they looked at us. This was the only way we could walk around for twenty straight years without wearing a mask, otherwise our lives would have sucked even more with having to constantly wear Hypersuits or something. Even better, we had a spell that erased our face from all computerized footage, making us impossible for human or machine to recall what exactly we looked like.

"Oh, your identity? I wouldn't worry about that too much. I've decided that I'm going to reveal my identity to the world soon, given certain people in key places already know who I am. Even the new Supreme Commander, Stonewall, knows who I am. But as for who told him that bit of information..." Original trails off as the insinuation sets in.

"So... we've been hiding our identity for nothing?" J-498 groans at the thought. "It's a pain keeping my face hidden under an invisible mask all the time, you know. It's annoying for all of us. What was the purpose of keeping our identity hidden all those years, anyway? What did it accomplish?"

"I'm... not sure..." Original suddenly appeared hesitant when confronted with J-498's annoyance. "Originally it was to hide from Marie, but at this rate, she's probably figured out my identity. Ben Brown knows my identity, as does Stonewall, and likely Satan. Finally, Umi knows my identity, so that's four for sure, and 5 potentially, with heaven knows how many more beyond that group. Stonewall couldn't have figured out my name by guessing, so someone had to tell him... something I'll be looking into soon."

J-1251 flipped around on his beach towel to lean on his hand. "Sounds like lots of stuff has been going on. So let's cut the crap and get back to that 'wormhole' thing. Are you even sure that'll work in the first place? Seems like it'll take a shitload of energy."

Original ignored the vulgarity by J-1251. "Actually, based on some tentative tests I've performed, it will take hardly any energy at all. I simply need an anchor at the point I wish to wormhole to, and that's where you guys come in. I can't create wormholes or teleportation nodes to places I haven't been before, but since you three are still slightly mentally linked with myself, it's trivial to make a bridge between our positions. When you're one day away from Volgarius, bring the fleet to a standstill and await my orders. We'll create the wormhole in that time period."

J-498 groaned again, his annoyance at having to do work showing. "Yeah yeah, whatever you want, 'boss'. By the way, I've been meaning to ask for the last couple of years, but I keep forgetting... how many clones are there now? Ten thousand?"

The original pauses for a half second, swallowing heavily before responding. "Twenty thousand, actually. ninth generation clones are a thing as of five years ago."

Even J-1251 had a look of shock pass over his face. "Twenty thousand? Ninth gens?!" Sitting upright on his towel, he quickly straightened out his posture as he gawked at the screen. "That's unbelievable! Is the situation really that dire? They must be getting as weak as a normal human by that point!"

Original shook his head slowly. "No... we've got another two generations before that happens. Actually, I've observed an interesting phenomenon, something we haven't figured out yet... the newest generation of clones, while lacking badly in the magical energy department, seem to be much stronger, physically, than even myself. Performing some rote tests, we've discovered that I might have been looking at the numbers wrong the whole time... the energy isn't 'halving' each generation, it's condensing itself into physical energy."

I paused and thought about what he'd just said. "Hold on, are you saying that as a third generation clone, I'm four times weaker than you, magically speaking, but four times stronger, physically speaking?"

"Nah, it's not nearly that dramatic. Maybe a 20% strength increase at most. But it's much higher for the newest batch of clones. Their physical combat capabilities are much greater than even my own. It seems to increase exponentially at some point after the 7th generation."

As Original casually tossed this seemingly trivial information at us, I turned to gawk at the other two clones. J-498 wasn't even bothering to summon another cigarette. He merely slumped in his chair, staring up at the ceiling in shock. J-1251 seemed to be blown away by the news. As for me, this was something I had never even considered before.

Original seemed to sense the mood had shifted dramatically. Scratching his head, he hemmed and hawed for a moment before piping up. "Well, anyway, that's the gist of it. We'll contact you at the designated time every week as usual, and when you arrive at the specified location. If anything surprising happens, don't hesitate to let us know."

"Yeah... no problem, 'boss'." I mumbled at him as he saluted awkwardly and walked away from the holo-screen.

Jesus, what a crazy day this has been...

Unarin slowly walked and examined the halls of the recently rebuilt Portal Vault, where the demons and Volgrim coordinated their attacks on Humanity's home planet, Earth. The bomb that had blasted inside their walls had dealt a hefty blow, but everything was now repaired and operational once more.

Or rather, it was supposed to be.

Founder Nufaris, the second highest of the Volgrim, followed along beside Unarin, keeping a carefully calculated distance of three feet to Unarin's side, just in case something should enrage him. Nufaris had never seen Unarin angry, but as of late, small details like that were prone to change at any time.

Unarin kept his facial expressions in check as he examined various bits of machinery and whatnot, but it was clear to anyone present that he was muffling his growing anger. "Explain to me, again, why the portals won't work."

An imp hobbled along behind the two Volgrim, rubbing his hands together nervously as he kept his head bowed. "Davook has said this, many times, your excellency! Every time we turn a portal back on, it just shuts off a minute later! In fact, it seems to seal itself and never is able to be re-opened!"

"Yes, you said that before. What I want to know is why. Each time, I pay with the lives of ten thousand Volgrim to open one of these portals, yet still there isn't a single rift to show for it. Were their lives erased in vain?"

Davook tittered to himself nervously, as the highest Founder of the Volgrim carefully inspected one of the rift points for flaws. "I-it's not so simple, your excellency! Davook means no disrespect, but something odd is going on and w-we can't figure out what it is!"

"Sabotage, I'd wager." Nufaris chimed in unexpectedly, despite promising himself to keep his thoughts silent.

Unarin paused his examination of a rift gate to glance over at Founder Nufaris. "What was that? If you have any ideas, I'm... eager to hear them." Unarin placed the slightest amount of annoyed stress on the 'eager' part of that phrase, causing Nufaris to tense up just the slightest bit.

"W-well, Unarin, it just seems to me that the only way these could be shutting down spontaneously... is sabotage. I can't see any other explanation. Perhaps a mole among our ranks?"

Davook instantly started trembling as Unarin's cold gaze swept over the room. "A mole, is it?"

"N-no, of course no mole! We are all very very loyal to Satan and Unarin, the greatest of Volgrim! All praise Unarin, highest-" Unarin glared down at Davook who was babbling in his typical impish way, which caused Davook to shut up instantly.

Staring at the tiny imp for a few moments, Unarin raised his gaze up again. "No, not quite a mole. I agree with the tiny rat regarding that much. However..." Unarin paused as he slid his gaze carefully among the walls of the room. Several Volgrim and demons in the area tentatively followed along with his eyes, though they quickly returned to pretending to work, not wanting to get called out. "...wouldn't it be interesting if we had an invisible spy in here?"

Nufaris blinked twice. "An... invisible spy? First Founder, that seems to be... a little..."

"Preposterous? Under ordinary circumstances, perhaps. But these are not ordinary circumstances. I sense something is in this room that shouldn't be here, but the feeling is unbelievably faint. Whoever is here, or whatever it might be, it doesn't want to be found."

Sloshing his tongue around in his mouth silently for a few moments, Unarin slowly panned the room, unable to see anything. Nufaris likewise did the same, but he knew it was a futile effort, given how much more attuned with age Unarin's mental abilities were.

After a minute or so, Unarin broke off his mental sweep of the room. "Whoever it might be, they're good. Very good. A veritable professional spy, as it were. I want several high ranking demons and Volgrim here on constant watch the next time we activate a portal to Earth. They will scan this room with all their abilities and find that intruder, or they'll find themselves on the next list of those to sacrifice for a portal." He glanced down at the tiny imp scurrying around near his feet. "Do I make myself clear?"

"Y-yes, oh great Unarin! Splendid may your days be, and eternal may your reign last!" Davook's teeth chattered nervously as the monstrous Volgrim founder stared down at him with unfeeling eyes.

After a moment, Unarin grimaced as he walked away from the imp. "Disgusting little creatures."

A few minutes later, Davook sighed as he meandered back over to the control center. "Sheesh, he's finally gone."

"Cheh, don't let him catch you talking like that." A nearby Volgrim commando glared down at the little imp. "You're a funny little demon, but even I have limits to the insults I can hear you toss at our highest leader."

"Oh, stuff it." Davook rolled his eyes. "Devil only knows that you're just as likely to end up on his shit-list as I am. He's unstable, I tell ya!"

"Perhaps, but he's the most powerful of my people. That makes him fit to lead us all."

Davook groaned as he scratched his ass and walked over to stand at his magical centrifugal helix station. "That's what everyone says about their leaders, but frankly, I don't trust a single one of 'em. Just because they're strong and can shoot magic out of their fingers, that don't make 'em smart."

Another older imp nearby snickered. "You got that right, boss. Maybe someday you'll be in charge."

"The hell I will." Davook rumbled a long belch from deep within himself, as the young Volgrim commando and the other imp chuckled at his foul potty humor.

Part 298a:

June 6th, 2101, 3:10 AM.

According to the projected arrival time, the attack party has 27 hours before they arrive at Volgarius. In three hours time, they'll halt and pause while we create a wormhole. I may end up having them circle around to a place less directly in the path from their world to ours, lest they send a ship towards Earth and stumble upon our wormhole, but only time will tell.

I yawn as I glance at my holo-watch. I'd usually be sleeping right now, but I can't sleep due to how important the events in the next few hours will be. Once the portal is open, we're going to take our 50,000 strong fleet of military spacecraft and split them between Earth and the portal on the other side, nearest Volgarius. This way, the Volgrim can't simply enter through the portal and attack us without ramming a blockade first.

As I blink my eyes heavily, I hear Amelia's voice from the other side of the room. "I'm bored."

I glance over at Amelia to see her moving a drinking glass coaster back and forth on a table slowly, as she stares ahead absentmindedly.

"You're bored, huh?" My reply is anything but filled with interest, still her eyes seem to clear up for a moment as she returns the look.

"Yeah. Can we play a game or something?" Her request is odd, given she's never shown an interest in games before. Ever since I satiated her hunger a few months ago, it's been part of a daily ritual where I whisper it at her when I wake up in the morning. She has shown zero signs of a hunger for human flesh and has been acting extremely docile, to an unnerving degree.

I blink quickly as I rub my eyes, noticing something else... her figure... she doesn't look like a tiny child now. Perhaps I'm missing something, and maybe I simply missed the gradual changes, but she looks to be in her young teens now. Has she physically aged? Why would that suddenly happen? Is my spell somehow having a physical effect on her body, albeit unintended?

Shaking the thoughts off, I get out of my chair and stride over to her lazily, sitting down directly across from her at the table. She's wearing a red ribbon in her hair, which makes her look quite charming. "Well, what kind of game do you want to play?"

She shrugs and sighs heavily. "I don't know... what kind of games are fun?"

A million possibilities pass through my mind, all revolving around video games I played long, long ago, before I entered the Cryopod and lost interest in such things. I'm too old to be playing video games now. Something more grounded in reality would be suitable for the both of us...

Taking a moment to think about it, a lightbulb appears in my mind. "Ah, how about Chess?"

She perks up at my casual suggestion. "I don't know what that is! Is it fun?"

Nodding, I lean to the side where a large replicator is embedded into the wall. "It's a game that involves thinking. Naturally, this will give you an advantage."

Amelia cracks an amused grin. "Of course."

As I tap on the buttons, I create a chessboard and the 32 relevant pieces, setting them on the table before us. Amelia stares at my hands with extreme interest as I set up the pieces.

Moments later, all the white and black pieces are in their respective locations. I am playing as white, and she's playing as black. "White goes first, so I'll make the first move."

"Wait, you can't just make up the rules on the spot!" Amelia puffs out her cheeks at me and I stifle a chuckle.

"No, this is the way Chess is played. The goal of Chess is to take your opponents pieces and force his king into 'checkmate'. You do this by outmaneuvering your opponent and predicting his moves. Each piece moves in its own special way, and some pieces are objectively better than the other ones. This game involves taking risks, and occasionally sacrificing a piece for the greater good."

Amelia nods slowly, and I take a few minutes to explain the rules to her.

"The horsey can jump other pieces? Why?"

I itch my cheek and shrug. "I dunno. That's just the rules."

"Why does he move so weird though? All the other pieces move in straight and diagonal lines, but he moves in this weird... curved way."

Her question was a sensible one. I had asked my friend who taught me how to play that exact same question, all those decades ago. "That's just the way it is. Let's move on to the King and Queen, the pieces in the middle. They're protected by Pawns and Bishops in front and to the sides. The King can move any direction, forwards or backwards, even diagonal... but he can only move one tile at a time."

Amelia grimaced. "Some King. He's barely better than a pawn."

"Yes, but the best piece in the game is the Queen. The Queen is just like the king, she can move any direction, whether it's up and down, left and right, or diagonal... but she can move any number of spaces and take pieces as needed. The Queen is the most powerful and important piece on the chessboard."

Amelia's grimace instantly turned into a smile. "Hah! Girl power! I'm going to checkmate you using my queen!"

I smiled at her, taking a small breath to clear my head. Glancing at the clock, I raised an eyebrow. We'd already taken 20 minutes just to learn the absolute basics of playing chess. At this rate, the time it would take for me to get the expected call from the JIB would pass very quickly. Turning back to Amelia, I reached for the pawn directly in front of my king. "Every game of chess has exactly twenty possible moves the player can open with. You can move a pawn forwards one tile, two tiles, or you can jump a knight forwards to the left or the right. Personally, I like moving this pawn in front of the king forwards two tiles, it's my opening move with the best performance usually."

Amelia frowned as I moved the pawn. "I thought pawns could only move one tile at a time?"

"Ordinarily, but for their first move from their starting position, they can move two tiles. If you choose to start a pawn forwards by only moving it one tile, it can't move two tiles later on."

Amelia groaned. "This game is... complicated. Who made up these rules, anyway?"

I shrugged again, a movement I had been using constantly for the last twenty minutes straight. "I dunno, probably Buddha or something. This game is like three thousand years old. I think."

Amelia giggled quietly. "Buddha... I met him once, you know."

I stared at her, open eyed, for a few moments. Of course she wasn't joking... this is Amelia I'm talking to, and she never jokes. "You did? What was he like?"

Her giggling expression vanished instantly. "I'm not sure. I devoured him. We didn't speak to each other."

I stared at her awkwardly for a few moments as I realized she wasn't joking. "...Oh."

"Yeah..." She turned away, blushing as she realized what she'd said. "W-well, water under the bridge, I guess?"

I nodded, swallowing hard. "Yeah, I suppose so. What can you do? Ha... haha..." Quickly making a mental note to not discuss key historical figures of the past in front of her ever again, I quickly pointed to my pawn. "Anyway, as I was saying, moving this pawn forwards is a key move of mine. I tend to use it quite a lot as my opening move."

Amelia nodded as she glanced around the board. "Why? Doesn't that open up your king to attack right off the bat?" She seemed all too happy to leave the previous subject alone.

"No, because in Chess, you can't actually 'take' the king like you do other pieces. You have to get the enemy king into a position where he cannot move in any direction or he'll be taken, while any move he makes will result in you taking him on your next turn."

Amelia smiled sweetly. "Sounds easy!"

I didn't want to break her heart. I didn't want to tell her just how 'not easy' it actually was. Instead, I'd have to show her over these next couple of hours.

"If you say so. Your move now."

An hour later, I'd already beaten Amelia twice and we were well underway for the third game. She didn't like the existence of other silly rules, like 'en passant' for Pawns and 'Castling' for Kings, but she accepted them. Amelia was, shockingly enough, very good at accepting new rules and formulating strategies around them.

Now I sit here on the edge of my seat, staring carefully at the board. She has my king pinned into a corner and checkmate is likely two to four turns away, a big jump considering this was only her third game ever played. Of course, I certainly hadn't given her any easy kills or anything like that to keep her motivated. Nope, no sir. (I did.)

As I stared at the board carefully, trying to determine how to get out of my predicament, Amelia hesitantly voiced a question in a somewhat quieter voice than usual. "Hey... Jason. Why did you make me the black side, and you the white?"

I glanced up from the board at her face. There was something to her expression that I hadn't seen before. Doubt? Guilt? "I dunno... I just wanted to go first... or something like that."

She bowed her head slightly, averting her eyes from mine. "You didn't do it because I'm bad... right? It wasn't because you think I'm a bad person?"

I quickly shook my head, perhaps too quickly. "No! Of course not! That's ridiculous."

She reached up to tap on her lip slowly. "I mean... black is a color that usually means 'evil', and white means 'pure'. Since you think of yourself as a 'good guy', then perhaps, you..." She trailed off her sentence and left the insinuation to hang in the air, like a foul stench that was difficult to ignore.

I glanced away from her and out the Mothership's plexiglass windows, towards the uncountable stars in the sky. "I don't know. Maybe, I guess... I don't think you should take any offense to it, at the least. I certainly didn't mean anything bad by it..."

Amelia shuffled in her seat as she wrung her hands together in her lap. "Yeah, I guess. But, you know, I've been thinking a lot, lately. I'm really quite a bad person, aren't I? I'm not normal.

Even when I'm not... hungry... I still feel something, deep down inside of me."

I cocked an eyebrow at her cryptic description. "You feel something?"

"Yes. It's... hatred, I suppose. I used to always feel so much hatred. I hated humans, and demons, and angels, and the gods... I never liked anyone in my entire life. But now... what if I was wrong all those years?" Amelia's lip quivered slightly as she turned and stared at the chessboard in front of us. "I'm just sitting here, playing a game like any simple child might do... but what right do I have? How many have I killed?"

I felt my breathing sharpen as she spoke. How long had she been wrestling with these questions? More importantly, I agreed with her. She really was a monster. But... "Amelia, you were a bad person who did bad things. You lived a really bad life. If you're willing to admit that to yourself now, does that also mean you're willing to change?"

She nodded hesitantly, but a sparkle caught in her eye as a single tear formed. She wiped it away quickly. "Yes. But what good does that do to those I murdered? Even if I change, they won't ever come back. What right do I have to live while they die?"

I stared at her for a long few moments, unable to form words. Frankly, I didn't have the answer. I stared out the window again, thinking silently to myself about a great many things. Finally, a simple question formed itself in my mind. What would Arthur say in a situation like this?

After a long minute, I turned back to Amelia. "There's a story I read in a history book, many decades ago. There was a man who stole money from banks, over and over again. He never hurt anybody, physically, but he was wanted by every major organization in the world. At the time, it was unbelievable how easy he made it seem. But, when they finally caught him and arrested him, he was let go to roam free. Do you know why that is?"

Amelia turned to look at me intently, curiosity in her eyes. "No... why?"

"Because, Amelia. The man was so good at stealing money, he decided to join the law enforcement agencies to help catch other thieves. He created many countermeasures for thieves to make sure others couldn't do the things he had done. Now, why do you suppose I'm telling you this story?"

Amelia immediately shrugged, waiting for me to explain. I stayed silent. After a few moments, she glanced away, realizing my question wasn't rhetorical. Finally, she turned back to me. "So... you're saying, because I was bad, I know what it means to be bad, and I can use that to stop others who would do evil things?"

I nodded but she immediately had a retort. "But he only stole money, Jason! He didn't hurt anyone! I killed people! I killed a lot of people!"

I sighed as I moved my hand forwards to shift my last remaining rook a few tiles over on my side of the chessboard. "That doesn't matter to me, Amelia. All that you need to do, if you really want to repent for your past, is to make sure you pay back in full the debt you've incurred. For every life you've devoured, you must save another life, threefold if possible. But you can't do that if you're moping around on this ship feeling sorry for yourself, can you?"

She wriggled in her seat slightly. "I don't know if it's that easy though..."

"It's not, and it will take a lot of hard work, but if anyone can do it, you can. I believe in you." As I said that last phrase, I felt my heart skip a beat. For once, I truly meant it. I believed in Amelia. If she set her heart to it, she could make up for her past.

Amelia smiled slightly as she glanced back at the chessboard. "I can repent...? It's really possible, huh?"

I smiled, and as I was about to respond, Amelia spoke again. "Oh. I didn't even see this bishop here." Reaching over, she moved the piece over from the other side of the board. "Checkmate."

I stared at the board carefully, smiling as I saw her strategy executed perfectly. "Well done. I should have moved my rook another tile over. You're a good player."

She smiled cheerfully back as she winked at me. "Nah, you're just a bad player."

"Is that so? Wanna go another round?"

She smiled even more brightly at my question. "Of course!"

The heavy atmosphere lightened up, as a great obstacle seemed to have moved out of her path. As we played, I kept examining her closely. Was this it? Was this finally the first thing I needed to alter the future to change for the better? Perhaps, instead of looking for lives to take, I should be like Amelia, and start searching for lives to save.

As we played, I was jarred from my thoughts by my 6 AM alarm going off. Ah... well, that means it's time for the meeting.

All good times must pass.

Part 299a: Wormhole

It's a funny thing... I tried using 'black hole' once, but because of how the English language works, my abilities somehow didn't register it as a single word... yet 'wormhole' is. I've already tested it in a sector far from Earth and was pleasantly surprised by the results.

Of course, failing that, 'Portal' or 'Gate' would do the same thing, but they have size limitations. Wormholes can be ultra-massive, even the size of a galaxy or bigger if I had that kind of energy to spare. Of course I don't, so that's a moot point, but it's neat to consider it anyway.

It's summertime in Europe, now. At least, it's the start of the summer. But I'm here, in outer space, aboard a massive starship that easily dwarfs my mothership with its sheer volume. Its official classification is the "Command Ship", but that sounds lame so most crewman on board simply call it a Hyper Dreadnought. Oddly, its armament isn't very sophisticated, and it's more of just a massive transport ship, but it has the strongest defenses of all ships in the United Earth Force's armada. It has a recently developed shield system that rotates frequencies rapidly, allowing it to quickly adapt to any sustained fire inflicted upon it by other enemy ships, but all of its outer plates were heavily reinforced by my clones, to the point where it's nearly as solid as a Dartfighter when it comes to hull integrity.

The engineers had a fun time developing it. Their idea of a field test was dropping a literal nuke on the outside of the ship to see how much damage it would cause. As it turned out, none at all. This ship is just about as impenetrable as my own Hypersuit.

"Judicator, we're ready to begin." Ben Brown walks over to me, the helmet of his hypersuit in his hands as he eyes my own hypersuit subtly. The look doesn't evade me. He's only calling me 'Judicator' because that's what I'm supposed to be called... but that will have to change and soon.

"Thanks, Ben. We're taking a private shuttlecraft out in front of the ship about 5 light-minutes away from here. I'm not taking a chance with all the lives aboard here, just in case something goes wrong."

Ben nods slowly as he scratches a light tuft of chin-hair growing in. "I thought you said this was safe? Were you wrong?"

I quickly shook my head. "No, but we're dealing with something extremely powerful and energetic. Traveling well beyond the Oort Cloud is an absolute must. Unfortunately that means if we ever need reinforcements from Earth, it'll take a while for them to get there, but it also means if the Volgrim do slip through, we'll have a short time to prepare before they hit us."

"You think of everything, it seems."

"I certainly try."

Ben grunted his satisfaction as both of us turned on our heels at precisely the same moment towards the exit-door that lead down to the hangar bay. Ben chuckled as he saw me walking in tandem with him. "How long have we been doing stuff like this?"

"I don't even remember when we went from being acquaintances to friends, Ben. Don't ask me silly questions like that."

"Fair enough."

My speakers turned off momentarily as I imagined in my mind the rough size of the Wormhole I wanted. About ten times the size of the Command Ship would have to do, more than that would require more and more energy to the point that I'd need to borrow some from a clone, which I'd prefer not to do.

As I started the preparations, the three clones appeared in my hypersuit's inner visor, each having their own screen dedicated. "We're ready when you are." One of the three clones spoke, though I didn't remember what his designation was. They all looked the same to me anyway, except the one with the cigarette.

Amelia was on the shuttle along with myself and Ben. She sat in a chair nearby, playing a game of Chess by herself. Ever since this morning, she'd been really enthusiastic about learning how to play. It was kind of cute, if I'm being honest.

Ben glanced behind himself to eyeball her for a moment before turning to whisper to me. "It's probably not the best time to ask this, but she looks a lot older than when I first saw her... and it's only been a couple months."

I ignored him for the moment as I was mentally calculating many things to make the spell as efficient as possible. He took the hint and stopped talking. Still, he's right... she has aged dramatically over the last few months, to the point she looks to be in her young teens. If this keeps up, by the middle of the year, she'll look convincingly old enough to go out and buy cigarettes, then alcohol after that.

Tossing those thoughts casually to the side, I reply to my clones after thirty seconds or so. "Alright, I'm ready. On the count of three. One... two..."

" WORMHOLE! "

I yell loudly, but my suit muffles my voice to the point Ben can't hear anything while standing beside me. My three clones are pooling their energies together to match mine and they all yell in unison too. Nothing dramatic happens at first, but far in the distance, there's a visible patch of space that appears to be distorted, ever so slightly.

Ben squints and looks ahead, his augmented vision helping him zoom forwards to see more clearly. "Is... that it?"

I activate my speakers so I can respond. "Yeah."

"Huh." Ben itches his head as a perplexed expression passes over his face. "I just kinda thought it'd be... flashier? Like in Star Trek. You know, a big swirling center of chaos filled with millions of bolts of lightning... or something..."

I shook my head. "Nah, that's just fiction. Reality is way more boring than that."

Amelia got out of the chair and walked forwards to look out the front viewscreen. Her eyes roamed all over but she didn't seem to see it at all. "Is it done?"

"Yup. We can now travel 14,000 light years in the blink of an eye."

She nodded unenthusiastically. "Great. What now?"

Ben smiled kindly at the teenage girl. "Now we start pouring our forces through. Once our guys are on the other side, we take the battle to the Volgrim."

Taking off my hypersuit helmet, I grinned at him. "They'll never see it coming."

Cuanali, the fourth Volgrim Founder, was reading off reports to Unarin in the council room. "S-so, as a result, they will arrive here in just over one rotational period."

Unarin nodded. "Thank you, Cuanali. Of course, our spies have been telling us of what they were planning for the last seasonal cycle, but at least we have a precise date for the attack."

Founder Nufaris shook his head. "I beg your pardon, Unarin, but I believe they will not attack for two or three more rotational periods. After they create the tear in space, they will need to take some time to assemble their forces and plan out the attack first. They have not yet taken the time to properly map out this sector of space yet, and will not be so foolhardy as to rush into what might be a deathtrap."

Cinculu, the Fifth Founder, kept his expression smooth and emotionless. " Will be, Nufaris. It will be a deathtrap."

Nufaris nodded and bowed his head quickly. "Ah yes, I apologize, I didn't mean anything particularly about it, I just-"

He was interrupted by Trayza, the third. "Oh, shut it, Second. If you're going to take over Dosena's place among us Founders, stop being such a spineless weakling. Stuttering is for the inferiors, not a leader."

Nufaris nodded quickly as he opened his mouth, but then shut it immediately. Ever since he had been promoted to take Dosena's position among the Founders, his life had worsened dramatically. He had no real identity to speak of anymore, with many low ranked Volgrim mocking him as a tool and one to be disposed of when the time was right.

Unarin narrowed his eyes to a slit. "Nufaris' observation was sound enough, Trayza. Cinculu too, let's not split hairs over minor wording errors. A massive war is coming to our homeworld, and soon at that. I want less bickering and squabbling, and more focusing on the alien threat."

Trayza looked away and grumbled under her breath. Cinculu kept his expression blank, as he always did.

Glancing around the table to make sure everyone was paying attention and not mumbling at each other, Unarin tilted his head slightly down to the datapad in his hands. "The humans, according to our spies, are planning to bring a massive war fleet exceeding ten thousand ships. I've been examining our options for the last few days. I want opinions on each of these countermeasures I've prepared."

Tapping some readouts on his display, Unarin quickly swiped the documents from his datapad to the main holoscreen above the war table. The other founders quickly scanned the pictures as they thought up how the plans might play out on the battlefield. Cinculu was the first to speak. "The Guardians? Those are mere prototypes, are they not?"

Unarin blinked slowly. "Yes, but they've been heavily field tested over the last few orbital cycles. This can be their first deployment into real combat. I anticipated a direct assault on Volgarius would come eventually."

"As always, your gift for foresight is your most admirable quality." Trayza smiled sweetly as she poured the praise on him. Unarin ignored her comments.

Cuanali suddenly piped up as she gasped out loud, pointing to another set of images on the holo-screen. "U-Unarin! You can't possibly be serious! The Sentinels must never be reactivated! Never! Not under any circumstances!"

Everyone at the table nodded slowly as they bowed their heads, all but Nufaris. "Sentinels? What are those?"

"Harbingers of doom. They were what finally ended the 7th Great War. At far too high a cost, I fear." Cinculu spoke up from his position at the end of the table, before averting his eyes.

Unarin coughed. "Of course, activating the Sentinels won't happen unless it's the last possible thing we must do. Still, it would be impolite to continue without explaining what they are to the Second."

Trayza grimaced as a wave of sickness swam through her bionically enhanced body. "Even as a last resort... they should never be unleashed upon the universe. Cuanali used all of her abilities to shut them off. If she says not to activate them, I say we heed her warning."

Nufaris stared uneasily at the expressions on the faces of all the Founders present. Save himself, all in the room were deeply unnerved. Even Unarin, ever the calm in the eye of a storm, flicked his eyes back and forth guiltily for having even brought whatever these things were into the conversation.

Unarin shifted in his seat slightly. "An explanation simply won't do. Nufaris... as a Founder, you have the right and the duty to know what transpired during the Great Wars. Especially the 7th Great War. That final war changed everything and led to the system of meritocracy that we possess today. The society you see around you would simply not be possible if it weren't for the trillions who gave their lives to make it happen."

Unarin reached under his side of the table into a small compartment as he pulled out a direct mind transfer device. Placing his finger on it, he suddenly stiffened as his entire body sat up straight in the chair. His eyes zoned out as they stared into the distance, his key memories downloading into the device before him. After a few moments, he slumped back down in his chair, blinking quickly to clear his vision.

"Here, place your finger on the receptor. All will be made clear after you see what transpired in the past."

Nufaris nodded uneasily as the small device was slid over to him. "Why not just use a normal mind download from the Global Archive?"

Trayza, usually the obnoxious one, spoke quietly for once. "Not possible. All information about Sentinels and the Great Wars has been erased from all databanks, all archives, and all memories from the citizens, save the five Founders. Especially the information regarding Volgarius Alpha." She shot a glance over at Cuanali, who quickly averted her own eyes. Letting that slip to Nufaris, all those orbital cycles ago, was a boneheaded move. Still, he ended up becoming a Founder, so it all seemed to work out well... even if he didn't deserve the honor.

Unarin kept his expression tight. "The Sentinels were the direct result of advances in Artificial Intelligence, and what happened when our fellow Volgarians back in the day took extreme measures to stop our resistance movement. None of which you've ever heard of, of course. Such is the way it needs to be."

Unarin beckoned at the small egg-like device as he nudged it closer to Nufaris. "Less questions. We never know who might be listening."

Nufaris reached for the device, holding his finger just in front of it as he paused one last time. "I thought this room was totally secure? Who could be listening?"

"I don't know. And that's what fills me with unease."

Trayza, ever the impatient one, tapped her foot as she waited for Nufaris to insert his finger. Having waited long enough, she reached over and shoved it onto his finger. "Just do it already!"

Nufaris couldn't voice a complaint. He was already gone, as the memories of a long distant past surged into his mind.

Part 300a: Sentinel

I felt my heart slam in my chest as a plasma projectile flew past me, missing my head by an impossibly small number of units. I heard the sounds of several more passing by overhead, but from my hunkered down position behind this dirt ridge, I couldn't take a chance at peeking out to see where they originated from.

"Unarin! They're Sentinels! Keep your head down!" Trayza bellowed at me as she lay flat on the ground, doing the best she could to keep her body as low to the ground as possible.

I can't believe it's come to this. The entire platoon was wiped out. We've got a dozen commandos left, and the Resistance has been barely holding on of late. The previous Great War wasn't anything like this one. It was always over land and resources in the past, but now I sense it's all about a clash of ideologies, each one trying to outmaneuver and eliminate the other. Negotiations have broken down, as they always did in the past, but this time... it's different. These... monsters... they must have created them for the sole purpose of exterminating us.

As I felt my body shaking, I aimed my mind over the ridge to try and sense the attackers. I couldn't sense a thing, so either they were biologicals who were good at masking their psionic presence, or they weren't biological at all. If it really was the Sentinels...

An idea popped into my head as I used every fiber of my being to flatten myself against the narrow ridge as best as I could. The Sentinels seemed to be drawing closer, and their aim was damn near pinpoint too. Another ten standard time units, and I'd likely have my head taken clean off.

"Dosena! I have one ion grenade left! Take them out with it!" Using my mind, I mentally tossed it to her. She was my superior when it came to the art of telekinesis and telepathy, so in general I tried to use her abilities to my best advantage.

As usual, her cool and calm demeanor was like a rock in the face of a colossal tidal wave. She never flinched at anything... the truest Volgarian I would ever consider a worthy leader for our cause. Catching the grenade with the barest minimum of effort, she calmly stepped out from behind the Rolgon she was standing behind; a massive hovering vehicle used for transport and assault, but this one was in pieces and totally dead to the world.

Without breaking a sweat, she smiled and waved. "Hey! Over here! Aim at me!"

I couldn't see what was happening, but the plasma blasts stopped whizzing past my head as they must have turned to aim at her. I jerked my head over to look at her. "Dosena! No!" In the blink of an eye, several dozen rapid fire shots were unloaded at her.

However, she did something I had never seen her do before... standing perfectly still, she calmly stared at the blue-hot blasts of energy soaring at her body... and she deflected them purely with telekinesis. I had never seen such a thing in my life! How was this possible?!

As I stared and gaped, I suddenly heard the sound of beeping, as the ion grenade I had tossed to her sprang to life, flying out of her hand held at her side and directly into the middle of the cluster of Sentinels. The grenade exploded unceremoniously, tearing them apart internally while causing only minor physical harm.

However, it wasn't enough. Of the dozen Sentinels that had been advancing on our position, four still walked, apparently unharmed by the explosive. Dosena frowned slightly. "Damn. The blast radius was too small. Still, four should be easy enough."

I felt her mental presence deform and shift as it sprang out at the nearest Sentinel. An invisible hand of sorts lashed out to grab at the nearest robot, but just before it was able to reach it, her presence vanished as it made contact with the air surrounding the automaton.

She took one step back as her frown turned into a grimace. "Curses. Some sort of direct-contact psionic shielding. At this rate..."

I quickly stood up from my position and leveled my Gravity Rifle at the Sentinels. While it possessed almost no killing power, it was extremely useful at subduing enemies of a biological nature, and might be useful against these damn bots.

The Sentinels instantly spotted me rising, but they had no time to react as I fired the small spherical gravity condenser at the two that were grouped together. The instant one of these projectiles collided with anything at all, it would activate a powerful hyper-gravity field, increasing the gravity in the area for a period of five partial time units by a factor of twenty.

My aim was off however, and I panicked as I realized my shot would miss. Just when I realized the full extent of my fatal mistake, the projectile corrected itself mid-flight, smacking right into the chest of the robot I had intended to hit. I jerked my head over towards Dosena, realizing what had happened. "Did you just-?!"

"Yes! Fire again!" Dosena didn't even look at me, as the two robots were yanked down to the ground instantly before their servo-motors had a chance to react.

Following her orders, I fired another gravity condenser, Dosena once again shifting its flight path to collide with the third of the remaining four Sentinels. This one had a few moments to process what happened to his 'friends', if they could be called that, but not enough time to formulate a countermeasure. He too crumpled to the ground, as the final one aimed its blaster at my head. Damn, they have perfect aim, too! No time to dodge!

I felt my body suddenly falling, as I collapsed on my back. Something had pulled me down-Trayza?! Thankfully she had been ready, yanking me down flat as the final Sentinel fired the shot that would have otherwise terminated my life. Too close! "Idiot! You're no good to us dead!"

I coughed as I heard a muffled 'CLANK' just over the ridge. Dosena had somehow neutralized it. Quickly jumping back to my feet, I looked over to see the Rolgon had been mentally hurled at the Sentinel, crushing it and its nearby allies instantly as the vehicle was caught in the gravity wells. She was able to lift such a massive object with just her telekinetic abilities now? Why did her powers continue to grow as the orbital cycles continued? Was this part of some divine prophecy? Was she truly the one to lead the resistance to its ultimate conclusion?

If she was, I couldn't think of a more capable leader.

Dosena quickly walked over to the Sentinels, pausing just outside the gravity well's area of influence. She grimaced as one of the sentinels twitched, to which she psionically flung a large boulder into the well, crushing that robot into a metallic pulp.

Finally, it was over. In the distance, I could hear the sounds of combat going on, and I knew deep in my heart that we were losing. Standing only a few dozen Long Distance Units from the Capital of Volgarius, we were close enough to the heart of the Dark Order that I could almost taste their blood on our hands already. After what they did that started this damn war, we were going to make sure the Council suffered greatly for casting away the treaty we'd ironed out over many long days and nights at the end of the 6th Great War. Volgarius couldn't take another war like this. This planet was already polluted to the point where it was damn near unlivable, unless you lived in the capital.

Dosena strode over to me and quickly examined me with her mind. "You were lucky. Don't ever jump up like that again without being ordered. I had the situation under control."

I flinched at her direct words, but she was right. "Sorry, I just thought it was the best time to strike."

"I noticed as much. Still, we lucked out. Perhaps the manipulation of gravity condensers in midair will eventually become a reliable tandem attack we'll employ in the future, hm?" Dosena smiled faintly at me as she winked. Turning on her heel she quickly walked over to Lunaris, who was nursing a wound she had taken several standard time units before. A simple shrapnel grenade had exploded and partially embedded itself into her chest.

Dosena knelt down and surveyed the wound quickly. She wasn't a doctor, but her incredible mental abilities gave her the ability to see the Volgrim body in a way few others could. "This looks serious. I'm going to have you recalled to HQ. We'll go on to Melkian IV by ourselves."

Lunaris gnashed her long sharp teeth together, as she gingerly touched her chest and a wave of pain surged inside herself. "Ahh... sorry, Elder Dosena. I've really failed you this time."

"Nonsense. You saved Cuanali's life when you shielded her from that shrapnel IED. I'm so glad we not only didn't lose you, but also our best intelligence officer. Your deeds will not go unrewarded when the time comes, if we can win this war."

Lunaris nodded as she kept her face tight. "Of course we'll win. We have you to call 'leader'. Just do what you must and win us yet another war."

Dosena stood up and sent a nearby medivac a mental signal. "Let's move out. Cuanali, return to HQ with Lunaris. I want you working with the new ONYX A.I. on plans to disassemble the plasma reactors at the Melkian facility."

Cuanali, standing some feet away as she hurriedly exchanged intel with a platoon over the horizon, nodded intently. "Y-yes! I'll be on the Mental Net if you need me!"

Dosena quickly turned and started walking towards the large city in the distance as I scrambled upwards to follow after her. With Trayza, Dosena, and myself... I knew this would succeed. It had to. Our people's future depended on it.

Elder Nufaris breathed sharply as the memories came to a halt, his mind reappearing in the normal world. He blinked quickly as he shook his head to clear his mind. "That was... the past... from your perspective, it would seem." He nodded slowly as his eyes stared ahead. Pondering the deeper meanings behind what he had seen, he absentmindedly slid the small device back over to Unarin, who took it smoothly and placed it back under his side of the table.

The other Founders at the table gave Nufaris a moment to collect his thoughts, as a memory download was always immediately taxing on the mind until it had been fully absorbed. Nufaris finally blinked again, returning to a normal state of mind. "I only have one question: What was so threatening about the Sentinels? They seemed to die rather easily."

Unarin frowned at the question. "Hmm? Did you not see their barbarism on full display?"

Nufaris shook his head slowly, unsure if he had missed something important. "No... you appeared to crush a dozen of them with only minimal effort. However, what I did find interesting..." Nufaris paused as he thought back to the memories. So much had been happening there, but one thing stuck out to him especially. "...Dosena. She was your leader? She appeared to be exceptionally powerful. Did... something happen?"

The first founder's face turned slightly ashen as his eyes flicked to the device in the drawer. "What memory did you see, exactly? Was it not the incident at Melkian IV?"

Nufaris felt his breathing catch slightly in his throat. "Aye, it was....sort of. You were on your way to Melkian IV and appeared to have been ambushed by a dozen of those Sentinels. Dosena crushed them with ease."

Unarin's expression turned dark for a moment as he glanced away. "Ah, the wrong memory, it would seem. How careless of me. Still... so long as you were able to at least see the power of the Sentinels, it served its purpose..."

Nufaris started to say something about how the Sentinels seemed quite weak and he didn't see them as threatening at all, but he decided to keep his mouth shut. Something about Unarin's reaction made him feel he had seen something he wasn't supposed to.

Trayza cocked an eyebrow at the exchange the two were having. "You said Dosena was more powerful than Unarin? A laughable claim, to be sure. Such was never the case. Perhaps that was during one of the battles where he was badly injured. As I can recall, Dosena was never better than Unarin at anything, which is why she was always playing second fiddle. She did have better telepathy towards the end of the war and afterwards, but that's fairly minor."

Nufaris fidgeted in his seat as he felt a cold aura turn and face him. Unarin was still keeping his face bored and distant as he usually would, but something about him filled Nufaris with a silent terror. Nufaris swallowed slowly as he found his voice again. "Haha, yes, I'm so bad at memory readings. I must have missed some details."

Trayza smirked as she rolled her eyes. "A good jest, if there ever was one. Dosena being more powerful than Unarin... hehe."

Nufaris flicked his gaze between the other Founders at the table. All of them seemed amused by the concept. All of them, that is, other than Cuanali. As she fiddled with her holowatch, she kept uneasily glancing up at Unarin every now and then.

Is there something going on here? Something more to the Founders than I was led to believe? Nufaris kept his own face neutral as he asked himself that question mentally. By the time Trayza had returned to the topic of superweapons to combat the human invaders, Unarin and the others had already forgotten about the topic entirely.

But Nufaris didn't forget. He knew, deep in his subconscious that there was something secret going on... something he should never have seen.

Part 301a:

"We're ready."

It hadn't taken us more than 6 hours to assemble the forces needed to lead a full scale assault on Volgarius, yet here we were. Ben was the commanding officer for this mission, and with those two words, he had lit the signal fire to begin the, for all intents and purposes, practical extermination of the Volgrim.

And I didn't like it. I understand why we have to do it. They won't listen to reason, they're irrational, diabolical, and have now committed mass genocide twice. First against the angels, and now against humanity. They ally with the enemy of humanity, the demons, and they seek our destruction at all costs, for their own selfish purposes.

I want to end this bloody war. Or at least, I did. But the grim expressions the men and women around me are wearing tell me I am in the minority. They've lost so much. The shelters built all over the world did their job fairly well, but not enough people managed to get to them in time. The attacks on Earth were too swift, the natural disasters too brutal. Should they even be called natural disasters given they were artificially created? I think not.

I don't know what to do. If it's the destruction of Volgarius that we seek, a hail of asteroids would end them in the blink of an eye. 'Genocide' is another possibility too, I suppose. I have been fighting for so long, and I've killed so many people, yet here I am with the pretense of being a goody two-shoes, too good to kill others. Maybe it's because I feel that fighting in one-on-one combat is more fair to those I kill than simply using my powers to eliminate them en-masse. But then, does it matter? If I kill a billion Volgrim by tearing their heads off one by one, what is the difference between that and exterminating them with a plague, or with a massive nuclear bomb, other than the time spent performing the act? They still die.

I cast a glance around, as I stand on the bridge, numbly taking in the scene. Everyone is getting ready for war. They're all too eager to get revenge. How many humans will die in this assault? How many Volgrim? Should I help them? Should I let history take its course?

When I think about it, I realize now why humans don't trust me. They shouldn't. I've really been too lenient, too forgiving with the Volgrim. Twice now, I've allowed a brutal massacre occur under my watch. What about the lizardmen in the labyrinth? Where was I during that incident? Where was I when Amelia devoured an entire world, even when I let her rip two men to pieces right in front of me?

I'm a hypocrite. I'm a failure.

The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing. Edmund Burke said this over a century ago. I am called 'hero', yet as far as I can tell, I've done nothing to earn the title. Hell, when I consider all the beings I've killed, be they human, demon, or Volgrim, I'm worse than that. I'm the villain, aren't I? Superman doesn't kill his enemies. Even Batman doesn't do that, and he's supposed to be a dark hero.

Yes, that's it. I'm the villain. It all makes sense. By inserting myself into this timeline, perhaps I've done more harm than good. Perhaps...

Something pulls at my hand while I'm deep in thought. I try to ignore the feeling, but it persists. Glancing to my right, I see Amelia standing there, waving her hand at the side of my face. "Hel-lo~! Space to Jason! Are you awake in there?"

I shake my head slightly. "No. Err, I mean yes. What did you want?"

She puffs up her cheeks again, a move she's been doing a lot lately. "Aren't we going to return to your ship to help attack the aliens?"

I find myself staring at Amelia blankly, pondering the question. Should we help? I don't know. It would be so trivial. I should end the war with one swift strike. One meteor, that's all. That's all I have to do. That's all it would take.

Amelia... I continue staring at her, ignoring the fact that it seems to be making her feel uncomfortable, even if she can't see my face within the Hypersuit. She is pure evil. By any metric of good and bad, she is on the lowest tier of bad. Really, even comparing her with Satan, I should find him to be preferable company to keep. Yet she hasn't devoured anyone in months. She is resisting the evil inside of her with all of her power. If my hypothesis is correct, it may even be having an impact on her body. When I think about it, she's no longer the same person I knew from the future. She's better now, or at least trying to be better.

I may be the villain, but I've changed at least one thing in the past for the better.

"No. We're going to board the Mothership and keep our distance. We will not be giving aid to humanity in this effort. If the Volgrim must be exterminated, it will not be by my hand."

I feel a sense of ease take over my body the moment I speak the words. It felt so decisive. I doubt humanity could win without me, but this fleet is formidable, and the Volgrim have been sending thousands of warships to attack us for a century now. Based on the preliminary scouting reports, humanity is eking out a slight advantage, at least in terms of raw numbers. I won't let humanity be exterminated, but if this is how the future will change, if the aliens will be eliminated on this day by the hand of humanity itself, then I have no right to interfere.

Yes, this is my decision.

Amelia nods slowly as she taps her lips with her finger. "Hmm. Well, if you say so. You're the boss."

I shake my head slowly as I place my arm on her shoulder. "That's not quite right, Amelia. I'm not anyone's boss or your boss especially. I'm just your friend. I want you to do the right thing... that's all."

She smiles sweetly. "I understand. You're a good man, Jason."

"I'm glad you think so. That makes one of us."

I sigh as I turn to say farewell to Ben. I hope he'll understand why I have to do this.

Ben watched as Jason left, teleporting back to his own mothership. Frowning, he wondered silently about Jason's last words. I'll watch the battle, for now. I will not participate, unless things get dicey.

What did Jason mean by those words? Was he abandoning humanity? Unlikely. He was perhaps the most important ally humanity had. Still, he had recalled his clones from the attack force as well. It was an odd decision. It seemed to come from out of left field.

Ben glanced over at the hologram of the new Supreme Commander, Vasily Sokolov... Stonewall. Having strung a literal wire through the wormhole, they were able to beam subspace communications at impossible speeds through the wormhole to the attack party.

Stonewall shuffled some papers on the desk before him, as he sat stiffly at the desk. "No room for failures, Ben. This mission is of great importance. I don't need to tell you that though, da?"

"Of course not." Ben jerked his head up and down stiffly, still unsure how to deal with the new leader of humanity. "The new weapons are interesting. I'm not sure how effective they'll be though. The Dartfighters are tried and true..."

Stonewall cut him off before he could continue. "Dartfighters are good, yes. However, the best way to defeat your enemy is a surprise attack. We don't have the element of surprise, but a surprising new element could prove to be the same thing, da?"

"Yeah... a surprising element. Makes sense." Ben frowned as he gnawed on his inner lip. It was probably best to report this to the Supreme Commander. "Also, something else came up. Jas- err, Judicator decided to leave the battlefield. Or rather, he's only going to act as an observer, not as an active participant."

Stonewall's face stayed still as he simply nodded. "Hmm. Yes, I see. I expected as much."

Ben blinked twice. "Say what? You did?"

"Da. This Judicator... he acts in predictable ways, if you can find pattern in his movements. I have found such pattern and anticipated as much." Stonewall glanced away with a bored look on his face, as if this was a totally trivial and expected turn of events.

Ben narrowed his eyes at the hologram, as his gaze lowered ever so slightly. What pattern? What is he talking about? Have I missed something? Turning his gaze back up, he nodded quickly. "Right. Well then, we'll be off. I hope to report back to you in one piece."

Stonewall grinned broadly, his face almost Cheshire-like in its appearance. "I hope so as well, Ambassador. Seems a title can't hold down your lust for battle."

Ben smirked. "You know damn well Beatrix gave me that position because she didn't want me dead. It was the wrong idea. This suits me better."

"Da. I'll see you on the other side, Mr. Brown."

The connection cut off silently, as the hologram disappeared. Ben sighed, as he turned back to the forward viewscreen. "First officer Jensen, take us to Warp 5."

Unarin stared silently at the table. The others were gone, already aboard to their respective Flagships. Now he sat, alone.

His eyes shifted down to the drawer at his side. The mental indexer... what memory had it given Nufaris? What Nufaris had spoken of... that had to be the wrong memory. But the indexer was a one way device, and it erased itself after transferring the intended memory. Never, in his entire life, had Unarin made a mistake when it came to memories. He was a master of mental science. He all but perfected the field, including the memory erasers, and their counterparts, the memory forgers.

Yet now he felt doubt. This wasn't good. Nufaris had to know something. But the question is, what? It was already dangerous enough, mentioning the Sentinels out loud. Luckily even if one knew about the Sentinels, they would also have to know about their location on Volgarius Alpha, and that planet was totally inhospitable to biological life now.

Three barriers to obtaining them. Only the Founders themselves knew the locations of those horrid terrors. Cuanali had devoutly preached their complete and utter destruction, but once they had been totally subdued and rendered inert, Unarin had made the decision as leader to keep them hidden... just in case.

...Just in case what? What reason did he have for keeping them intact? There was no good reason. It's not like they could be reprogrammed or repurposed. Once they had 'awakened', an AI became impervious to alteration. It was a miracle that Cuanali's skills had been good enough to discover a neutralization method, but if reactivated, the same trick would be unlikely to work a second time.

Unarin turned to look out the window of his towering skyscraper that he called 'home'. All before him stood the great capital city of the whole of Volgarius. This city had billions of Volgarians, living in peace inside of it. How cruel the universe was, to destroy his species' home for a second time in their existence. Even if he could bring himself accept the harsh deal the Devil had offered (to create a space for all Volgarians to live in), it wouldn't be this world. It would be yet another new, alien entity. A fake space, made via artificial means, in a different dimension. And the cost would be a trillion Volgarian lives. Unacceptable.

Even if he killed the humans and took over their home world, he couldn't save a tenth of his people. Even the massive labyrinth of the Demons, the vast expanse of the Angels, and the homeworld of the humans all together couldn't save half of his people.

So this is what Dosena felt like, realizing there was no way to save all of our people. Her decision was no less impossible than my own now.

Unarin swallowed bitterly as he thought about how casually he had tossed her to the side. Would she have done that to him? Never. But he wasn't the same as her. He had no room for weakness or failure. Such was the society he had created. Ruthless and cutthroat, but a utopia in every respect. Everyone knew their places. No indecision. No hostility. Absolute obedience. If you wished to rise in the ranks, you simply worked hard and were thusly rewarded. It worked for Nufaris, and his mistake was a costly one as well. If he could redeem himself, then anyone would be given a second chance.

Nufaris...

As he pondered a great many things, the entrance request sound played aloud. Someone was outside the door. Mentally shifting a beacon in the room, he allowed the door to open. One of his many assistants walked in the room.

"Muuxunu. What do you need?"

His assistant smoothly walked up to his side of the table, hovering her hand over the holocube on the table as she sent her mental notes into it to be displayed holographically in the air. "I apologize for disturbing you, First Founder. I have completed the task you asked of me. The fleet is in defensive formation, Refuge has sent a report back that they are now in the Triad sector, and your personal ship is docked and refueled. Our last reserves of Trifrancium were added to ensure you a rapid escape if needed."

Unarin felt a glint of a smile creep onto his face. "Escape? I thank you for the gesture, but that won't be necessary. These humans have surprised us for long enough... but now that they are at our door, we will not yield to them for any reason. I will eliminate them, at the cost of my own life if need be."

"Thank you, Founder Unarin. Your presence is the single reason our people live." Muuxunu nodded as her expressionless face gave away no trace of the joy she felt when she served the First Founder directly. It was a high honor for any to speak to him, let alone on a daily basis. He even knew her name, proof of their close relationship.

Unarin mentally swiped through the documents, examining their contents absentmindedly. Glancing back at his assistant, Unarin found words forming on his tongue that he would normally never speak. "Muuxunu, how have you been feeling, as of late?"

She hesitated to respond, given the exceedingly casual nature of the question. "I have been most excellent, First Founder. It is an honor that you would take an interest in my well-being."

Unarin stared at her for a moment. "Muuxunu, would you ever betray me?"

Her face turned pure white as shock blasted through her veins. "N-never! First Founder, have I done s-something wrong?" Her ashen face and sudden breakdown in emotional neutrality made Unarin almost flinch backwards at its intensity.

"No. I apologize, it was merely a question. I did not mean to alarm you."

"There's no need to apolo- I mean, I just-..." Muuxunu fumbled her words as she suddenly could no longer hold eye contact with the First Founder. "I would never do anything to cause harm to the Founders! N-never! I beg you to believe me!"

Her entire body was shaking in terror, as Unarin felt his jaw slacken in awe. What was this reaction from such a simple question? "Please, put your mind at ease. I was merely testing you. I have been... err... looking for loyal subordinates. Yes, I have been thinking of how I might give you more duties, and how you could be of more use to me."

His sudden praise seemed to melt away her worries, as her horror and shock seemed to dissipate in an instant. "R-really? You mean that? First Founder... I am honored!"

As she blubbered and stuttered, Unarin felt something in his mind, a feeling he could never recall feeling before in his life. Doubt. Why would his subordinate act in this manner over such a simple question? It was as if he were revered as a god; certainly not his goal. He demanded respect for what he had done to improve life for all Volgarians... but this was...

Muuxunu left the room, her heart on fire with a passion to work her absolute hardest, so as to make a good impression on the First in all future endeavors.

Unarin slumped down in his seat, as he stared vacantly at the table before him. "What am I supposed to do now?"

He spoke an empty question to the air before him. None would answer him, for none could.

If only Dosena were still here. She would know what to do.

Part 302a:

Ben gasped as the fleet exited hyperspace. All told, it had been just under 24 hours since he had issued the attack orders. Perhaps having grown slightly bored and antsy by the wait, he hadn't quite prepared himself for the sight of Volgarius in the 'flesh', as it were.

The planet was massive. Not nearly as big as Jupiter or Saturn, but still unbelievably huge. It should be impossible for bipedal life forms to survive on a giant of that size, not to mention the gravity on the planet must be incredible. Were it not for the hypersuits, he doubted any normal human could go toe-to-toe with a Volgrim in a fistfight, as they must be incredibly strong.

"A fleet from Volgarius has been sighted at two o'clock. Bearing down at sub-light speed 0.5, numbering 5,000 warships." His tactical officer fired off numbers as he quickly scanned the enemy composition. "Twelve flagships, one hundred capital cruisers, and the rest are comprised of heavy and light cruisers or small interceptors. There are also a few hundred carrier-class ships holding back behind the defensive perimeter."

Ben grunted as he glanced at the tactical display. "No swarmers right off the bat, hm? That makes this slightly easier. Send out the first Dartfighter drone platoon, I want them running interference. Move our own capital ships forwards to take the heat off the smaller ships. I want three capital ships for each of their flagships; have them concentrate their fire. The Command Ship will hold back for the moment until we're needed."

"Commander, what do you want Judicator's Mothership to do?" The tactical officer shot him a questioning look, but Ben shook his head.

"Don't bother him right now. He's... he's... providing me with important tactical data. Yeah, I need him analyzing the enemy for weaknesses, he's the best suited for the job." Ben nodded gruffly and the tactical officer turned back to his holo-viewer.

"Affirmative, commander. Deploying the fleet to the designated formation... now."

As the enemy fleet dropped out of sub-light speed, Ben glowered at the planet. Somehow, he was going to have to ram through this blockade and shit hell upon their disgusting grey and black planet, one way or another. Unlike Earth, Volgarius had no vibrant colors that stood out. No greens, blues, whites, or reds. It was a dull and ugly looking sphere, one that contrasted nastily with the perfect orb he had grown up on. I'll never let these alien scum take Earth. They'll ruin it just like they did their own homeworld. They're monsters.

Ben gritted his teeth as his fleet and the enemy began trading blows. A barrage of ion cannon fire and proton missiles slammed into the ships in the lead, their heavily reinforced hulls absorbing most of the damage. Some, however, had not been reinforced nearly as well as the others. Several smaller ships were blasted to smithereens as the enemy had seemed to decide to pick off the weaker ones first.

Smart, given the tough ships will take a lot more punishment while the little ones would be harassing their fleet. Whoever their commander is, he or she knows exactly what they're doing.

"Send the bombers forwards, have them target that lone capital cruiser at the front. It seems to have split off from the pack ahead of the other ones."

He tapped his battlefield display to highlight the enemy ship he was referring to. As he did, an alarming thought popped into his head. Too convenient! It must be a trap. "On second thought, delay that order. I don't like how that capital cruiser is positioned. Have the dartfighters engage at ramming speed to test its durability. Just two of them to start with."

His tactical officer nodded quickly as he relayed the orders. Twelve seconds later, the two lone dartfighters raced through the barrage of enemy fire as if the ion blasts and photon missiles didn't even exist. Their durability was incredible, well beyond the reasonable limits of any known material. Ben found himself glaring at the ships as they raced forwards. I just don't get it. How does Jason make them so powerful? It can't be possible, normally.

The dartfighters rapidly engaged the enemy, smashing through their hull by accelerating into and then rapidly decelerating from sub-light speeds in a fraction of a second. As they did so, Ben blinked his eyes three times and squinted hard. "Ensign, zoom in on that patch in front of the capital cruiser. I think I just saw something."

The screen rapidly zoomed in, and as the picture sharpened itself, Ben's eyes roved quickly over the image. "Enlarge area A-5, 300%." As the screen zoomed in on one particular spot just to the aft side of the ship, Ben nodded carefully. "They have cloaked ships. That cruiser isn't alone. Have the dartfighters pass directly in front of the cruiser and drop their anti-matter charges. Target this coordinate as closely as possible." Ben indicated a specific spot and the AI-piloted ships quickly whipped around for another pass. As they released their armaments at the appropriate moment, there was an incredibly bright light for a fraction of a moment, as several dozen small ships were marked by a paint-like substance that enabled them to be visible on radar. It was more of a refractive coating of sorts that made whatever surface it landed on absorb and expend visible light, but to the highly advanced scanners of the Command Ship, it might as well have been a patch of exploding fireworks.

"As I suspected. We've theorized that the Volgrim might be able to make use of their own invisibility technology, I just didn't think it would be on spacecraft. Still, they're no Romulans.

This technology is visible to the naked eye if you know what to look for. Send this information to the other leaders of the attack force, I want them on the lookout for other cloaked ships. 5,000 might not be the actual number of enemies we face on this day."

The tactical officer chuckled grimly. "What's the matter, commander? Afraid we were going to have it too easy with a five-to-one numerical advantage?"

Ben shook his head slowly as he stifled his own dark smile. "No. I just don't want to lose more friends than I already have. That's all."

"I hear you. Sending your orders out to the rest of the fleet now." The tactical officer wiped the remotely amused look off his face as he got back to work.

Ben sighed deeply as he quickly got back to commanding his fleet to victory.

Trayza stood aboard her flagship as she mentally shared her mind with that of the other three Founders that were aboard their flagships. To keep their battle operations precise, this had been standard operating procedure for hundreds of thousands of orbital periods. Having perfected it during the seventh great war, it was a tactic that had enabled instant coordination of their movements.

"They didn't take the bait, a-and they even seem to have discovered the camouflaged ships. Whoever is guiding them..." Cuanali spoke quickly about her findings, though they weren't anything mindblowing.

"...He's a good commander." Trayza finished Cuanali's sentence for her, as she sent some mental communications to her ship crew. "Still, a commander that has to rely on primitive technology to direct his crew. Hardly a threat to the unified power of the Founders themselves. I want the fleet to move to flank them, putting them between our heavy cruisers and Volgarius. Our land-based Spectral Pulse Rays will shred their shields, leaving them ripe for a barrage of missiles to wipe out their main fleet. After that it will be a simple matter of mopping up."

As the others nodded, Trayza's brilliant plan was interrupted by a dissenter. "No. I disagree completely. I believe their goal is to get as close to Volgarius as possible. They are here to destroy and sabotage as much of our planet as possible. They're cautious, but make no mistake... this is clearly intended to be a suicide mission, if not exactly desired."

Trayza felt her jaw clench. Nufaris. That bumbling pipsqueak would dare to pretend he was worthy of the title of Second?! He was challenging her, she who had fought countless battles during the lives of hundreds of generations of Volgarians?!

"You speak out of turn, Nufaris. We'll continue with the flanking." Trayza kept her tone moderated, even as the anger in her mind nearly caused her mental tone to strain itself.

"No, we won't. As the second Founder, I have higher authority than you. You might disagree with Unarin's decision, but openly opposing me is an indirect insult directly to him. Is that the message you wish to convey?"

Trayza blinked slowly. What the hell? He'd never spoken down to her like this before. He'd always been a fearful, sniveling coward. She couldn't see his face, but something about the mental tone he was evoking... he was dead serious. This was a direct challenge.

She crushed her fingers into a ball as she gritted her teeth, her blood boiling to its apex. This SCUM! He's openly mocking me in front of the other Founders?!

Just as she was about to unload on him, she felt a private presence ping her mind. It was Cinculu, the Fifth. "Don't do anything rash. I say you should defer to him. If he's right, we save the planet and our people. If he's wrong, you'll have every excuse to tear him apart. Don't be a fool, you've worked too hard to curry favor with Unarin. It would be a shame to see it go to waste."

His voice was speaking to her alone, as he had segmented his mental energy to speak to her directly, while not leaving the group telepathy conversation. Trayza felt her balled up fist loosen, as she released a silent breath of anger. "Fine. We'll do it your way, Second. Let's see if you have what it takes to lead this fleet, or if you'll be a major disappointment to Unarin."

For the briefest of moments, Trayza almost thought a mental image of a deep, conniving grin had appeared in her mind, as Nufaris replied quietly. "Yes. Let's just see if I have what it takes. I have an idea, and it's going to crush the humans into oblivion."

Nufaris stood aboard his own massive flagship, the Dolfraxis II, a ship modeled after his own exploration vessel, but highly suited to collecting intelligence during the battle. While it had no weapons and minimal shields, it possessed extreme maneuverability and more tactical data collection abilities than any other ship in the fleet.

Nufaris shuddered as the thoughts appeared in his mind. Yes... I see it now. The Founders are frauds. They're not all-powerful. Only Unarin holds true power... and even he is a fraud as well. It all makes sense. He eliminated Dosena because he feared her, turning her into a docile pet to be unleashed on enemies whenever he wished, while erasing her past from the minds of others. Dosena should have been the first Founder, but we were betrayed by one of our own. I cannot let this treachery go unpunished.

As he silently seethed, shielding his raging thoughts from the others, he calmed down a moment later and sent orders out. "Cuanali. I want you to use your superior hacking abilities on those indestructible little ships the humans are using, and turn them against their owners. Any of those ships you see, do that continuously. Reprogram them on the fly. Turn them from indestructible harbingers of death into rabid animals that attack all they see. Create chaos with them. Cinculu, we need to take out any ships capable of planetary bombardment. I've identified several vessels that possess high-yield bombs or fighter-class ships with said bombs, so focus your elite forces on these ships."

Trayza stuttered for a moment as she realized what he was planning. "That's ridiculous! Cuanali is talented, for sure, but they likely have thousands of those little ships! She can't reprogram nearly that many, especially in a short time period!"

"That's all right. We don't need all of them. We only need as many as possible. A hundred would do just fine. Look! They've shredded that capital cruiser with just two of those fighters! We could turn this back on them with even a tiny number of those pests!"

Cuanali seemed fired up. "A-all right! I'll do what I can!" Shifting her concentration away from the conversation, she began turning her attention to the dartfighters buzzing around here and there, as the filthy humans released more and more of them onto the battlefield.

Cinculu, likewise, began diverting his brigade to the requested location. Trayza kept her cool as she considered the options. Perhaps I misjudged him. If Cuanali can pull it off, this might end up being a total rout. If their goal truly is to bombard the planet, little could do more damage than giving them plenty of room to draw close enough to unload. I still think that even with 100 megaton bombs they would need several days to kill all Volgrim on the planet. If their goal was to hamper us though, then a single lucky bombardment would do the trick. And since they have stolen a flagship from us in the past, they likely know the locations of several military facilities. It wouldn't necessarily be a shot in the dark.

Trayza still hated the thought of giving up control to that pissant weakling who had no clout compared to herself, especially among those who truly mattered in Volgarian society. But, if he was unsuccessful, he would be out of the way in no time. It was worth setting her ego to the side momentarily. Yes, Cinculu was truly a wise Volgarian for suggesting this.

She sighed as Nufaris sent her a set of orders as well. Move your company forwards to attack the fleet directly. Don't make any sudden decisions, just draw them in barely within the range of the planet's Spectral Pulse Rays so we can start hitting them with our full firepower. Then, when they least expect it, we'll give them a surprise they never saw coming.

Trayza nodded silently as she began to give the orders to her crew. Something about what he said though... what 'surprise' might he be hiding? The battlefield was no place to play games. He should really save that for a holo-simulator.

Still, his battle strategy gave her pause. This might just work out splendidly. Best to simply let it play out.

I glowered slightly as my clones, Amelia, and I all watched the battle unfolding. From my vantage point at the very rear of the battlefield, I could see every action playing out. Not by using my ship's sensors, of course, but by using magic. I had used magic to create a 1:25 replica of the battlefield in a three-dimensional space. From here, we could see every ship as a triangular speck moving around, some small and some big. Amelia especially seemed quite intrigued by the display.

Pointing at a rather large red triangle, she popped out the fiftieth question in a row. "Why is that one moving forwards so fast?"

I shrugged. "Probably some sort of forward wave attack. The other ships behind this one seem to be moving as well, as if to follow the leader."

J-498 grunts slightly as he puffs on his nasty cigarette. "Yeah, maybe. Could also just be some idiot who wants his day of glory."

I shake my head at his comment. "Unlikely. Unarin, if he's leading this engagement, is likely not going to do anything foolhardy. I wouldn't call him the most brilliant tactical genius in the universe, but this seems like a feint of some sort, probably to draw Ben into attacking that ship. It's likely a diversion. But what reason is there for a diversion? It would have to be to prepare for something that takes a lot of time to execute properly..."

"Perhaps they have some super-weapon that takes time to charge and fire? This is their home turf, who knows what the home field advantage gives them for options. Perhaps they can draw raw energy from their sun and fire a massive space laser at us." J-498, ever the dry jokester, inserts his opinion into the mix. He's not helping much here.

"Right... a super-weapon..." I nod as I turn my gaze to the viewscreen at the helm of the Mothership. My ship is armed to the teeth. When it comes to dealing damage, I'm probably one of Earth's top ten ships for raw destructive output. We don't really have any major super-weapons on our side, besides the dartfighters, and the enemy knows how those work by now. But the Volgrim could have anything they've been saving up.

Harold, oddly enough, speaks to me in my mind. "I don't like this, kid. Somethin' seems up with these aliens. They seem ta' be good at using trickery and deceit... everything they've done so far seems ta' be about lurin' our guys forwards. I think we need ta' watch our rears."

Harold's fought in and commanded soldiers during a few wars. Big wars too, the bloodiest wars humanity knew of prior to space travel. If he says to keep an eye on our flank...

"Agreed. I'll let Ben know. You think they've got another fleet positioned somewhere behind us? We didn't detect anything on our way here..."

Harold sneers. "Cheh. C'mon, kid. Use yer head! Space is real big, plenty big enough to hide some spaceships a few billion miles out of scanner range and still be here 'fore breakfast. I got a hunch, and I think you should walk mighty careful on that glass yer steppin' on."

I nodded along with him as I sent a quick telepathic message to Ben. He heard me, I think, but had no ability to respond telepathically. It would have to do.

Amelia sat on a chair nearby and swung her legs back and forth as boredom crept over her face. "Alright, the dots were kinda cute at first, but now what do we do?"

"We watch." J-492 replied before I could even open my mouth.

Damn, that's exactly what I was going to say. Maybe we weren't so different, the two of us...

Part 303a:

"Son of a bitch."

Ben cursed as another dropship was blown out of the sky. It had been a mere four hours but the vastly out-numbered Volgrim had been putting up a hell of a resistance. Worse yet, this time he didn't have a super-weapon hidden on his home planet that could conveniently fire projectiles that shredded the enemy into pieces.

But the Volgrim did.

"Their planetary cannons are wiping us out, Ambassador. We have to call a retreat." Ben's first officer shot him a pained look, but Ben ignored it.

"No shit, Sherlock. I already sent the signal for the second wave to start showing up. If we're lucky... those reinforcements might get here in time."

His first officer stifled a flash of rage and instead released a small grimace. "Yes, I'm aware of the reinforcements, sir, but with all due respect, by the time they get here, we might be lucky to have a hundred ships left. Probably less than that, even."

Ben nodded as he bit his lip. Shooting a glance over to a holo-screen he had set aside for one specific purpose, he blinked twice as shock and confusion crossed his face. "What... what the hell? Where did the Mothership go? Where is Jas- I mean, where is Judicator?"

His first officer shook his head as he quickly tapped some commands on his holo-screen. "No idea, Ambassador. I haven't had time to follow his movements."

A senior tactical officer spoke up quickly as the look of confusion spread across Ben's face. "I did, sir. He left about 45 minutes ago. Didn't send a message or anything, he appeared to simply... flee. He jumped to Warp 7 back towards the direction we arrived from... back to the portal to Earth." Sitting at his desk on the opposite side of the bridge, the tactical officer quickly turned back to his display, having simply finished his explanation.

Ben nodded slowly as his face went pale. "He... abandoned us? He fled? That can't be... he would never... never do that." Casting his glance downwards, Ben continued nodding slowly. "Yeah... that's it. He must have rushed back to get more reinforcements. Maybe some of his clones or something. Yeah, that has to be why he left."

Ben's first officer shifted uneasily as he heard his commanding officer mumbling incoherently to himself. "Sir, with all due respect, we have a battle to win. Do we retreat, or do we continue to fight? What are your orders?"
